Christ defined His true sheep as those who hear or listen to His voice and follow Him (John 10:27). To such disciples, He gives eternal life, and they will not perish (John 10:28). Again, no presumption is possible. Those are secure who persistently listen, hearken, and follow. For such people eternal life is both a present and a future reality.

Eternal Life as a Future Experience “What must I do to inherit eternal life?” the rich young ruler asked. (Mark 10:17 HCSB; cp. Matt 19:16; Luke 18:18). He saw eternal life as a final inheritance. His earnestness moved Jesus, and Jesus loved this young man (Mark 10:21). But he had to make a decision: Would he follow Jesus without his possessions? (Mark 10:22). His action said, “No.” He could not part with his possessions first and then follow Jesus.

In Matt. 19:27 Peter asked Jesus, “What will there be for us?” The disciples had left their dear ones and their possessions to follow Jesus. Jesus promised them loved ones and lands (possessions) with persecutions. Then

He added: “And eternal life in the age to come” (Mark 10:30 HCSB). Eternal life here refers to an unending future reality.

John 12:20–26 tells of some Greeks who wanted to see Jesus. We do not know how Jesus interacted with these Greeks. We do know He spoke about His death and what it meant to be a disciple: “The one who loves his life will lose it, and the one who hates his life in this world will keep it for eternal life” (John 12:25 HCSB). Jesus here contrasted eternal life with the present life. Believers are to guard their persons or souls by serving Christ and following Him (John 12:26). Such servants will be where Christ is, and the Father will honor them (John 12:26). To be where Christ is means to come into eternal life—a life freed from sin or moral evil.

Paul declared that “the one who sows to the Spirit will reap eternal life from the Spirit” (Gal. 6:8 HCSB). Eternal life is given by Jesus and the Holy Spirit. This future reality, already experienced to some limited degree in the present, involves the Father, Son, and Spirit. Fellowship in life eternal means fellowship with the triune God.

ETHAM [E' thām] Place-name meaning “fort.” The second station in Israel's wilderness wandering out of Egypt (Exod. 13:20; Num. 33:6–8). The nearby wilderness was called the wilderness of Etham (Num. 33:8). Its precise location is not certain.

ETHAN [E' thān] Personal name meaning “long lived.” 1. Man so famous for his wisdom that Solomon's outstanding wisdom could be described as exceeding Ethan's (1 Kings 4:31). Ezrahite may indicate Ethan was at home in Canaan before Israel entered, though this is uncertain. A list similar to 1 Kings 4:31 appears among the descendants of Judah in 1 Chron. 2:6,8. See Ezrahite. 2. Levite and temple singer (1 Chron. 6:42,44; 15:17) and instrumentalist (1 Chron. 15:19). He is associated with Pss. 88 and 89 in their titles.

ETHANIM [Eth' ā nīm] Canaanite name of the seventh month taken over by Israel (1 Kings 8:2), who also called the month Tishri. This was the first month of the civil year. Ethaniam means “always flowing with water” and refers to the flooding streams fed by heavy fall rains.

ETH-BAAL [Eth-bá'al] Personal name meaning “with him is Baal.” King of Sidon and father of Jezebel (1 Kings 16:31), who married Ahab, king of Israel (793-753 B.C.). Through her influence Baal worship pervaded the Northern Kingdom. See Jezebel.

ETHER [E' thēr] Place-name meaning “smoke of incense.” 1. Town in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:42). 2. Town occupied by tribe of Simeon (Josh. 19:7). Some Bible students identify this with the town in Judah, since Simeon's territory was within Judah's boundaries. Other scholars warn us not to identify the two places. Ether in Judah is modern Khirbet Attir, south of Lahav and a mile northwest of Beth Gibrin.

ETHICS Study of good behavior, motivation, and attitude in light of Jesus Christ and biblical revelation. The discipline of ethics deals with such questions as: What ought I do? How should I act so as to do what is good and right? What is meant by good? Who is the good person?

Biblical ethics likewise addresses some of the identical questions. While neither Testament has an abstract, comprehensive term, or definition that parallels the modern term “ethics,” both the OT and the NT are concerned about the manner of life that the Scripture prescribes and approves. The closest Hebrew term in the OT for “ethics,” “virtue,” or “ideals” is the word musar, “discipline” or “teaching” (Prov. 1:8) or even derek, “way or path” of the good and the right. The closest parallel Greek term in the NT is anastrophe, “way of life, lifestyle” (occurring nine times in a good sense with 2 Pet. 3:11 being the most significant usage). Of course the Greek term ethos appears 12 times in the NT (Luke 1:9; 2:42; 22:39; John 19:40; Acts 6:14; 15:1; 16:21; 21:21; 25:16; 26:3; 28:17; Heb. 10:25). The plural form appears once in 1 Cor. 15:33. It is usually translated “conduct,” “custom,” “manner of life,” or “practice.”

The Biblical Definition of Ethics Is Connected with Doctrine The problem with trying to speak about the ethics of the Bible is that ethical contents are not offered in isolation from the doctrine and teaching of the Bible. Therefore, what God is in His character, what He wills in His revelation, defines what is right, good, and ethical. In this sense then, the Bible had a decisive influence in molding ethics in western culture.

Some have seriously questioned whether there is a single ethic throughout the Bible. Their feeling is that there is too much diversity to be found in the wide variety of books and types of literature in the Bible to decide that there is harmony and a basic ethical stance and norm against which all ethical and moral decisions ought to be made. Nevertheless, when following the claims made by the books of the Bible, some conceive their message to be a contribution to the ongoing and continuous story about the character and will of God. This narrative about the character and will of God is the proper basis for answering the questions: What kind of a person ought I to be? How then shall we live so as to do what is right, just, and good?

As some have pointed out, the search for diversity and pluralism in ethical standards is as much the result of a prior methodological decision as is the search for unity and harmony of standards. One may not say the search for diversity is more scientific and objective than the search for harmony. This fact must be decided on the basis of an internal examination of the biblical materials, not as an external decision foisted over the text.

Three Basic Assumptions Can ethical or moral decisions rest on the Bible, or is this idea absurd and incoherent? Three assumptions illustrate how a contemporary ethicist or moral-living individual may be able to rest his or her decision on the ethical content of the biblical text from a past age. The three are: (1) the Bible's moral statements were meant to be applied to a universal class of peoples, times, and conditions; (2) Scripture's teaching has a consistency about it so that it presents a common front to the same questions in all its parts and to all cultures past and present; (3) the Bible purports to direct our action or behavior when it makes a claim or a demand. In short the Bible can be applied to all people. It is consistent and seeks to command certain moral behavior.

To take Scripture's universality first: every biblical command, whether it appeared in a biblical law code, narrative text, wisdom text, prophetic text, Gospel, or epistle, was originally addressed to someone, in some place, in some particular situation. Such particulars were not meant to prejudice their usage in other times, places, or persons. Lurking behind each of these specific injunctions can be found a universal principle. From the general principle, a person in a different setting can use the Bible to gain direction in a specific decision.

Are our problems, our culture, and our societal patterns so different that, even though we can universalize the specific injunctions from Scripture, they have no relevance to our day? Can we assume consistency between cultures and times for this ethic? All that is required here is that the same biblical writer supplied us elsewhere with a whole pattern of ethical thought that has led up to this contextualized and particular injunction. If we may assume that the writer would not change his mind from one moment to the next, we may assume that he would stand by his principle for all such similar situations regardless of times or culture.

Finally, the Bible claims to command mortals made in the image of God. Whether the ethical materials are in the imperative or indicative moods makes little difference. The writers of Scripture intended to do more than offer information; they purported to direct behavior.

Five Basic Characteristics of Biblical Ethics In contrast to philosophical ethics, which tends to be more abstract and human centered, biblical morality was directly connected with religious faith. Hence immoral men and women were by the same token irreligious men and women, and irreligious persons were also immoral persons (Ps. 14:1).

Biblical ethics are, first of all, personal. The ground of the ethical is the person, character, and declaration of an absolutely holy God. Consequently, individuals are urged, "You shall be holy, for I the LORD your God am holy" (Lev. 19:2 NASB).

In the second place, the ethics of the Bible are emphatically theistic. They focus on God. To know God was to know how to practice righteousness and justice.

Most significantly, biblical ethics are deeply concerned with the internal response to morality rather than mere outward acts. “The LORD looks at the heart” (1 Sam. 16:7 NASB) was the cry repeatedly announced by the prophets (Isa. 1:11–18; Jer. 7:21–23; Hos. 6:6; Mic. 6:6–8).

Scripture's ethical motivation was found in a future orientation. The belief in a future resurrection of the body (Job 19:26–27; Ps. 49:13–15; Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2–3) was reason enough to pause before concluding that each act was limited to the situation in which it occurred and bore no consequences for the future.

The fifth characteristic of biblical ethics is that they are universal. They embrace the same standard of righteousness for every nation and person on earth.

The Organizing Principle: God's Character That which gives wholeness, harmony, and consistency to the morality of the Bible is the character of God. Thus the ethical directions and morality of the Bible were grounded, first of all, in the character and nature of God. What God required was what He Himself was and is. The heart of every moral command was the theme that appeared in Lev. 18:5–6,30; 19:2–4,10,12,14,18,25,31–32,34,36–37, “I am the LORD” or “You shall be holy: for I the LORD your God am holy.” Likewise, Phil. 2:5–8 (HCSB) agreed: “Make your own attitude that of Christ Jesus, who, existing in the form of God...He humbled Himself by becoming obedient to the point of death—even to death on a cross.”

The character and nature of the holy God found ethical expression in the will and word of God. These words could be divided into moral law and positive law. Moral law expressed His character. The major example is the Ten Commandments (Exod. 20:1–17; Deut. 5:6–21). Another is the holiness code (Lev. 18–20). Positive law bound men and women for a limited time period because of the authority of the One who spoke them.

Positive law claimed the peoples' allegiances only for as long and only in as many situations as God's authority determined when He originally gave that law. Thus the divine words in the garden of Eden, "from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil you shall not eat" (Gen. 2:17 NASB) or our Lord's, "Untie [the colt]" (Luke 19:30 HCSB) were intended only for the couple in the garden of Eden or the disciples. They were not intended to be permanent commandments. They do not apply to our times. A study of biblical ethics helps us distinguish between the always valid moral law and the temporary command of positive law.

The moral law is permanent, universal, and equally binding on all men and women in all times. This law is best found in the Decalogue of Moses. Its profundity can be easily grasped in its comprehensiveness of issues and simplicity of expression. A few observations may help in interpreting these Ten Commandments. They are:

(1) The law has a prologue. This established the grace of God, as seen in the exodus, as the basis for any requirement made of individuals. Ethics is a response to grace in love, not a response to demand in fear.

(2) All moral law is double sided, leading to a positive act and away from a negative one. It makes no difference whether a law is stated negatively or positively, for every moral act is at one and the same time a refraining from a contrary action when a positive act is adopted.

(3) Merely omitting or refraining from doing a forbidden thing is not a moral act. Otherwise, sheer inactivity could count as fulfilling a command, but in the moral realm this is just another name for death. Biblical ethics call for positive participation in life.

(4) When an evil is forbidden in a moral command, its opposite good must be practiced before one can be considered obedient. We must not just refuse to murder, but we must do all in our power to aid the life of our neighbor.

The essence of the Decalogue can be found in three areas: (1) right relations with God (first command, internal worship of God; second, external worship of God; third, verbal worship of God); (2) right relations with time (fourth command), and (3) right relations with society (fifth command, sanctity of the family; sixth, sanctity of life; seventh, sanctity of marriage and sex; eighth, sanctity of property; ninth, sanctity of truth; and tenth, sanctity of motives).

The Content of Biblical Ethics Biblical ethics is based on the complete revelation of the Bible. The Decalogue and its expansions in the three other basic law codes join the Sermon on the Mount in Matt. 5–7 and the Sermon on the Plain in Luke 6:17–49 as the foundational texts of the Bible's teaching in the ethical and moral realm. All other biblical texts—the narratives of wrongdoing, the collection of Proverbs, the personal requests of letters—all contribute to our knowledge of biblical ethics. The Bible does not offer a list from which we choose. It hammers home a life-style and calls us to follow.

Several examples of the content of biblical ethics may help to understand better how the character of God, especially of His holiness, sets the norm for all moral decision-making.

Honor or respect for one's parents was one of the first applications of what holiness entailed according to Lev. 19:1–3. This should come as no surprise, for one of the first ordinances God gave in Gen. 2:23–24 set forth the monogamous relationship as the foundation and cornerstone of the family.

Husband and wife were to be equals before God. The wife was not a mere possession, chattel, or solely a “childbearer.” She was not only “from the LORD” (Prov. 19:14) and her husband's “crown” (Prov. 12:4), but she also was “a power equal to” him (the word “helper” Gen. 2:18 NASB is better translated “strength, power”). The admonition to honor parents was to be no excuse to claim no responsibility to help the poor, the orphan, and the widow (Lev. 25:35; Deut. 15:7–11; Job 29:12–16; 31:16–22; Isa. 58; Amos 4:1–2; 5:12). The oppressed were to find relief from the people of God and those in authority.

Similarly, human life was to be regarded as so sacred that premeditated murder carried with it the penalty of capital punishment in order to show respect for the smitten victim's being made in the image of God (Gen. 9:5–6). Thus the life of all persons, whether still unborn and in the womb (Exod. 21:22–25; Ps. 139:13–6) or those who were citizens of a conquered country (Isa. 10; Hab. 3), were of infinite value to God.

Human sexuality was a gift from God. It was not a curse, or an invention of the devil. It was made for the marriage relationship and meant for enjoyment (Prov. 5:15–21), not just procreation. Fornication was forbidden (1 Thess. 4:1–8). Sexual aberrations, such as homosexuality (Lev. 18:22; 20:13; Deut. 23:17) or bestiality (Exod. 22:19; Lev. 18:23–30; 20:15–16; Deut. 27:21) were repulsive to the holiness of God and thus condemned.

Finally, commands about property, wealth, possessions, and concern for the truth set new norms. These norms went against the universal human propensity for greed, for ranking things above persons, and for preferring the lie as an alternative to the truth. No matter how many new issues were faced in ethical discourse, the bottom line remained where the last commandment had laid it: the motives and intentions of the heart. This is why holiness in the ethical realm began with the “fear of the LORD” (Prov. 1:7; 9:10; 15:33).

The greatest summary of ethical instruction was given by our Lord in Matt. 22:37–39: to love God and to love one's neighbor. There also was the “Golden Rule” of Matt. 7:12. The best manifestation of this love was a willingness to forgive others (Matt. 6:12–15; 18:21–35; Luke 12:13–34).

The NT, like the OT, included social ethics and one's duty to the state as part of its teaching. Since God's kingdom was at work in the world, it was necessary that salt and light also be present as well in holy living.

While both Testaments shared the same stance on issues such as marriage and divorce, the NT often explicitly adopted different sanctions.

Thus, church discipline was recommended in the case of incest in 1 Cor. 5 rather than stoning.

The main difference between the two Testaments is that the NT sets forth Jesus as the new example of uncompromising obedience to the will and law of God. He came not to abolish the OT but to fulfill it. The NT is replete with exhortations to live by the words and to walk in the way set forth by Jesus of Nazareth, the Messiah (1 Cor. 11:1; 1 Thess. 1:6; 1 Pet. 2:21–25).

Some of the motivators to live ethical and moral lives carry over from the previous Testament but to these are added: the nearness of God's kingdom (Mark 1:15); gratitude for God's grace in Christ (Rom. 5:8); and the accomplished redemption, atonement, and resurrection of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 15:20–21). Like the OT love is a strong motivator; however, love does not take the place of law. Love is not itself the law; it is a “how” word, but it will never tell us “what” we are to do. Love is a fulfillment of the law (Rom. 13:9) because it constrains us to comply with what the law teaches. Thus, love creates an affinity with and affection for the object of its love. It gives willing and cheerful obedience rather than coerced and forced compliance.

Finally, the content of biblical ethics is not only personal, but it is wide-ranging. The letters of Paul and Peter list a wide range of ethical duties; toward one's neighbors, respect for the civil government, and its tasks, the spiritual significance to work, the stewardship of possessions and wealth, and much else.

The ethic which Scripture demands and approves has the holiness of the Godhead as its standard and fountainhead, love to God as its impelling motivation, the law of God as found in the Decalogue and Sermon on the Mount as its directing principle, and the glory of God as its governing aim.

ETHIOPIA [E thi o' pi a] Region of Nubia just south of Egypt, from the first cataract of the Nile into the Sudan. Confusion has arisen between the names

Ethiopia and Cush. The OT Hebrew (and Egyptian) name for the region was Cush. The ancient Greek translation of the OT, the Septuagint, rendered Cush by the Greek word Aithiopia, except where it could be taken as a personal name. English translations have generally followed the Septuagint in designating the land as Ethiopia and its inhabitants as Ethiopians. In some passages such as Gen. 2:13 and Isa. 11:11, various English versions alternate between Cush and Ethiopia. See Cush.

The biblical Ethiopia should not be confused with the modern nation of the same name somewhat further to the southeast. In biblical times Ethiopia was equivalent to Nubia, the region beyond the first cataract of the Nile south, or upstream, of Egypt. This region, with an abundance of natural resources, was known to the Egyptians as Cush and was occupied by them during periods of Egyptian strength. During the New Kingdom (1550-1070 B.C.), Ethiopia was totally incorporated into the Egyptian Empire and ruled through an official called the “viceroys of Cush.”

When Egyptian power waned, Nubia became independent under a line of rulers who imitated Egyptian culture. When Egypt fell into a period of chaos about 725 B.C., Nubian kings extended their influence northward. In 715 B.C. they succeeded in establishing control over all of Egypt and ruled as pharaohs of the 25th Dynasty. The most influential of these Ethiopian pharaohs was Taharqa (biblical Tirhakah), who rendered aid to Hezekiah of Judah during the Assyrian invasion of Sennacherib in 701 B.C. (2 Kings 19:9; Isa. 37:9).

The Assyrian Empire invaded Egypt in 671 B.C., driving the Ethiopian pharaohs southward and eventually sacking the Egyptian capital Thebes (biblical No-Amon; Nah. 3:8) in 664 B.C. Thereafter, the realm of Ethiopian kings was confined to Nubia, which they ruled from Napata. Ethiopia continued to be an important political force and center of trade (Isa. 45:14). Some time after 300 B.C. Napata was abandoned and the capital moved further south to Meroe, where the kingdom continued for another 600 years. Excavations in Nubia have revealed numerous pyramid tombs at Napata and Meroe as well as several temples to the Egyptian god Amun.

In NT times several queens of the kingdom of Meroe bore the title Candace. The Ethiopian eunuch to whom Philip explained the gospel was a minister of “Candace, queen of the Ethiopians” (Acts 8:27 HCSB). Candace should be understood as a title rather than a personal name.

Daniel C. Browning, Jr.

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH [Ē thī ó' pí ǎn] Unnamed person who was returning to his homeland after having been to Jerusalem to worship (Acts 8:27). He was an official in the court of the queen of Ethiopia. As he traveled, he met Philip the evangelist. Philip had come to the desert area in response to God's call. Philip declared the gospel to the eunuch, and the eunuch received Christian baptism at Philip's hands (Acts 8:26–39). His conversion illustrates the Christian faith transcending national boundaries and embracing one whose physical mutilation would have excluded him from full participation in Judaism.

ETHKAZIN [Ēth ká' zín] Place-name, perhaps meaning “time of the chieftain.” Town in tribal territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13). Its location is not known.

ETHNAN [Ēth' nán] Personal name meaning “gift.” Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:7).

ETHNI [Ēth' ní] Personal name meaning “I will give.” Levite, ancestor of Asaph (1 Chron. 6:41).

EUBULUS [yū byū' lūs] Personal name meaning “good counsel.” Companion of Paul who sent greetings to Timothy (2 Tim. 4:21).

EUNICE [yū' nīs] Personal name meaning “victorious.” The mother of Timothy (2 Tim. 1:5). Paul commended both her and her mother Lois for their faith. She was a Jewish woman whose husband was a Gentile. No details are known about her conversion to Christianity. See Timothy.

EUNUCH A male deprived of the testes or external genitals. Such men were excluded from serving as priests (Lev. 21:20) and from membership in the congregation of Israel (Deut. 23:1). Eunuchs were regarded as especially trustworthy in the ancient Near East and thus were frequently employed in royal service. By extension, the Hebrew word translated eunuch could be used of any court official (Gen. 37:36 and 39:1 refer to a married man). The Greek term translated eunuch is literally “one in charge of a bed,” a reference to the practice of using eunuchs as keepers of harems (Esther 2:3,6,15). Part of Isaiah's vision of the messianic era was a picture of the eunuch no longer complaining of being “a dry tree,” one without hope of descendants, because God would reward the faithful eunuch with a lasting monument and name in the temple which would be far better than sons or daughters (Isa. 56:3-5). Ethiopian eunuch of Acts 8:27 was reading from Isaiah's scroll.

A eunuch for the sake “of the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 19:12 HCSB) is likely a metaphor for one choosing single life in order to be more useful in kingdom work (cp. 1 Cor. 7:32–34).

EUODIA or EUODIAS [yū ó' dī ás] Female leader in the church at Philippi whose disagreement with Syntyche concerned Paul (Phil. 4:2–3). The name Euodia means either prosperous journey or pleasant fragrance. Euodia and Syntyche were perhaps deacons or else hostesses of house churches that met in their respective homes. Paul commended these women as two who struggled by his side for the spread of the gospel in a way comparable to Clement and other church leaders. See Philippians, Letter to the.

EUPHRATES AND TIGRIS RIVERS [yū phrá' tēs and Tí' grīs] Two of the greatest rivers of Western Asia. They originate in the mountains of Armenia and unite about 90 miles from the Persian Gulf to form what is now called the Shatt-al-Arab that flows into the gulf. In ancient times the Tigris flowed through its own mouth into the gulf. The Euphrates and Tigris were included among the four rivers of Paradise (Gen. 2:14).

Boats on the Euphrates River in modern Iraq (ancient Mesopotamia).

The Euphrates was known as “the great river” (Gen. 15:18; Josh. 1:4) or “the river” (Num. 22:5) to the Hebrews. It formed the northern boundary of the land promised by Yahweh to Israel (Gen. 15:18; Deut. 1:7). The Euphrates is mentioned in the book of Revelation as the place where angels were bound (9:14) and where the sixth vial was poured out (16:12).

The Euphrates is the longest, largest, and most important river in Western Asia. Many significant cities were located on the Euphrates, Babylon being the most important. Others located on its banks were Mari and Carchemish, the latter being the site of a famous battle between Babylon and Egypt in 605 B.C. (Jer. 46:2).

The Tigris is not as prominent in the Bible as is the Euphrates, but it is the site of the major vision of the Prophet Daniel (Dan. 10:4). Like the Euphrates, some significant cities were located on its banks. Nineveh, the ancient capital of the Assyrian Empire, was located on its east bank. Farther south was the site of Asshur, religious center and original capital of Assyria. See Babylon; Nineveh.

EURAQUILO [yu rá' quí ló] NASB transliteration of Greek name for northeast wind in Acts 27:14. See Euroclydon.

EUROCLYDON [yú rōc' lí dōn] Noun meaning “southeast wind raising mighty waves.” KJV reading of traditional Greek text in Acts 27:14, but most modern translations follow other Greek texts that read Eurakulon, the northeast wind. Whichever reading is correct, the wind created a mighty storm that shipwrecked the ship taking Paul to Rome.

EUTYCHUS [yú tí kūs] Personal name meaning “good fortune.” A young man who listened to Paul the apostle preach in Troas (Acts 20:9–10). Overcome with sleep, Eutychus fell from a third-floor windowsill and was picked up dead. Paul, however, embraced the youth, and Eutychus was restored to life.

EVANGELISM Active calling of people to respond to the message of grace and commit oneself to God in Jesus Christ. While many think of evangelism as a NT phenomena, profound concern for all people is also obvious in the OT (1 Kings 8:41–45; Ps. 22:27–28; Isa. 2:2–4). God's care for the first couple after they had sinned, His plan to “bless” all people through the Israelite nation, and His continuing attempts through the prophets and through discipline to forge His people into a usable nation all speak of His concern.

A young Iraqi man gazing across the Euphrates River that flows through Iraq and into the Persian Gulf.

While Israel's influence was primarily national and magnetic in nature, there were instances of individual and external witness (Dan. 3–6; 2 Kings 5:15–18; Jon. 3:1–10). Though Israel was largely a failure in carrying out her mission, the large number of God fearers at the beginning of the Christian era show that her magnetic attraction and proselytizing efforts were not entirely unfruitful.

It is, however, the NT that manifests the dynamic thrust of evangelism. While the word “evangelism” does not occur in the Bible, it is woven into the very fabric of Scripture.

Despite its obvious importance, a wide range of opinion seeks to define what it means and what it should include. Definitions range from the extremely narrow to the exceedingly broad.

Evangelism is derived from the Greek word euangelion, meaning “gospel” or “good news.” The verbal forms of euangelizo, meaning “to bring” or “to announce good news” occur some 55 times (Acts 8:4,25,35; 11:20) and are normally translated with the appropriate form of the word “preach.” Evangelism has to do with the proclamation of the message of good news.

In the light of the wide range of definitions and the continuing debate, it is well to consider two kinds of definitions. First, many insist on defining evangelism only in the strictest sense of the above NT words. It is preaching the gospel, communicating God's message of mercy to sinners. Such a definition places strict limits to arrive at a precise definition of evangelism. It refuses to speak in terms of recipients, results, or methods, laying all its emphasis on the message.

This type of definition is certainly correct, as far as it goes. It would represent the view of many evangelicals concerning evangelism. Many others, however, believe that such definitions are inadequate for the present day and that they are partly responsible for a truncated sort of evangelism too often practiced in the past.

Many would, therefore, prefer what might be described as a “holistic” definition or one that takes into account the “good news of the kingdom.” This might be stated: evangelism is the Spirit-led communication of the gospel of the kingdom in such a way or ways that the recipients have a valid opportunity to accept Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior and become responsible members of His church. Such a definition takes into account the essential work of the Holy Spirit, the various ways of conveying the good news, holistic concern for the persons involved, the need for actual communication and understanding of the message, and the necessity of productive church membership on the part of the convert.

Luke 8:2–56 shows how Jesus brought the good news. He not only preached; He demonstrated His power over the forces of nature in saving His fearful disciples. He exorcised a demon, healed a poor woman who had hemorrhaged for 12 years, and raised Jairus's daughter from the dead. Clearly He brought the good news by word and deed, and not by word only.

Paul, in similar fashion, described how he had been used to “make the Gentiles obedient by word and deed, by the power of miraculous signs and wonders, and by the power of God's Spirit. As a result, I have fully proclaimed the good news about the Messiah” (Rom. 15:18–19 HCSB).

Some warn that such definitions are dangerous, opening the door to an overemphasis on the social dimension of the gospel to the exclusion of the spoken message. Indeed they can be. A complete evangelism will include the verbalized gospel. Balance is a necessity, although different situations may sometimes call for more emphasis on one aspect or the other. The biblical mandate remains to “become all things to all people, so that I may by all means save some” (1 Cor. 9:22 HCSB).

EVE ^[Eve] Personal name meaning “life.” The first woman created and thus original ancestor of all people (Gen. 3:20; cp. 4:1–2,25). She also faced the serpent's temptation first (3:1; 2 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:13–14). Her fall illustrates the ease with which all persons fall into sin (2 Cor. 11:3). See Adam and Eve.

EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT God's unending punishment of sinners beyond this life is known as eternal punishment. The Bible teaches that unrepentant, unforgiven sinners will be punished (Dan. 12:2; Matt. 10:15; John 5:28–29; Rom. 5:12–21). The unending nature of this punishment is emphasized in Scripture in several ways. Isaiah 66:24 asserts that the wicked will be consumed with an unquenchable fire: “Then they shall go forth and look on the corpses of the men who have transgressed against Me. For their worm shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched; and they shall be an abhorrence to all mankind” (NASB). Jesus Himself alludes to the endlessness of the punishment of the wicked in Mark 9:47–48: “And if your eye causes your downfall, gouge it out. It is better for you to enter the kingdom of God with one eye than to have two eyes and be thrown into hell, where ‘their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched’” (HCSB). The emphasis of these and similar passages is that the fire in which the wicked are cast inflicts a torment upon them, but the fire does not consume them.

Further evidence for the endless duration of everlasting punishment is found in phrases describing the future abode of the unrepentant wicked. Concepts such as fire or burning (Isa. 33:14; Jer. 17:4; Matt. 18:8; 25:41; Jude 7), contempt (Dan. 12:2), destruction (2 Thess. 1:9), chains (Jude 6), torment (Rev. 14:11; 20:10), and punishment (Matt. 25:46) are linked with terms like “everlasting” or “eternal” to underscore that these states are unceasing. The wicked will experience and endure this horrific existence without reprieve or relief. The punishment never ends.

Several theological concepts have developed in the history of Christian thought that attempt to eliminate or limit the notion of everlasting punishment. One of the more notable of these is Annihilationism. This is the idea that human beings are not innately immortal. Immortality, or more properly eternal life, is the gift of God bestowed upon believers. Some forms of this belief (conditional immortality) teach that the wicked simply cease to exist after death. Other forms assert that the wicked may experience a time of punishment after death, but that the person will eventually “burn out” or cease to exist. They are “annihilated.” In all its varied forms, this school of thought denies the unending duration of punishment.

Two common reasons are typically offered as grounds for denying everlasting punishment. One of these is that everlasting punishment denies God's eternal love. For God to allow His creatures to exist in eternal torment is a contradiction of His loving nature. Another argument against everlasting punishment is that endless torment contradicts God's sovereignty because He allows unbelievers to exist for eternity. As significant as these points are, they both seem to lack any support from the Bible.

One of the more significant passages of Scripture that supports the doctrine of everlasting punishment and refutes the denials of endless punishment is Matt. 25:46. In this verse, the states of the righteous and the unrighteous are juxtaposed, with the word “eternal” applied to the final state of both. Jesus said that the righteous will enter “eternal life,” but the unrighteous will enter into “eternal punishment.” Although the word “eternal” may mean “quality of life,” the concept most certainly includes the notion of unlimited duration. Further, consistent rules of biblical interpretation necessitate that the duration of the life of the righteous, which is deemed eternal, be equally applied to the duration of the punishment of the wicked, also called eternal.

God is the Creator of all things. It may be that part of His plan was to make humanity in such a way that those persons who volitionally decide to live separate from God would experience eternal anguish as the consequence of their choice. God's intention for humanity is to live eternally in bliss and fellowship with God. Those who pervert this intention will and must experience the eternal consequences of that act. EVI [E'vi] Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “desire.” King of Midian killed in battle by Israelites during wilderness wanderings (Num. 31:8). He apparently ruled as a vassal of Sihon (Josh. 13:21).

EVIL Since pre-Christian times, philosophers have wrestled with the coexistence of a completely good sovereign God and evil and suffering. Christian theologians have struggled with how to relate God's providence and evil. Many believers have asked “Why me?” when personally faced with suffering. In contrast with other religions and philosophies, however, the Bible provides adequate answers.

Whereas many philosophers and theologians have discarded belief in divine omnipotence and goodness, or even the existence of God or evil, according to the Bible there is no true philosophical problem of evil. Instead, the Bible simply teaches that God has His reasons for allowing evil. Christian thinkers have traditionally classified God's reasons into two categories: (1) Creaturely volition (at least in the case of Satan and Adam) would not be free if there were no possibility to disobey God's will. Evil results, therefore, from the abuse of freedom. (2) Suffering can be providentially used to develop Christian character. Scripture, however, provides more than two reasons and in doing so never compromises the reality of either the living God or evil.

Biblical Reasons for Evil Isaiah 45:7 (KJV) reads: “I make peace, and create evil. I the LORD do all these things.” This translation has misled some to surmise that the simple explanation for evil is that God is its source. Exegetes, though, have long noted that the verse is not about the source of evil but rather about divine providence “causing well-being and creating calamity” (NASB). Biblical teaching steers clear from attributing evil to the Holy One: “God is not tempted by evil, and He Himself doesn't tempt anyone” (James 1:13 HCSB). The following scriptural reasons for evil often overlap and correlate (cp. J. Newport's Life's Ultimate Questions).

Free will At the very least, God created Adam and Eve (and by implication, Satan) with freedom to choose for or against God (Gen. 1–3). Their free moral agency, exercised in rebellion and issuing in disastrous evils, would not have been truly free without ability to disobey. God's providence is not compromised thereby. He is still sovereign over history and His justice and goodness are not impugned by the fall.

Retribution God must punish evil as the righteous guarantor of the moral order. Thus, some present suffering as a result of His judgment upon sin (Deut. 30; Isa. 3:11; Rom. 1:18), not including judgment in the age to come (Rom. 14:10–12; 2 Cor. 5:10; Rev. 20:11–15).

Discipline God uses suffering to make His people more like Christ. Indeed, God's goodness ensures that He trains and matures His children through trials (Prov. 3:11–12; Jer.18:1–6; Rom. 5:3–5; Heb.12:5–11).

Probation The godly await the final overthrow of evil. In the interim their faith is tested by evil which seems to have the upper hand, thus obscuring God's present rule (Pss. 37; 73). But by enduring testing, true saving faith is finally revealed and confirmed (Heb.10:32–39; James 1:2–4; 1 Pet. 4:12–19; 5:8–10).

Revelation Suffering can issue in a fuller knowledge of God. Hosea's domestic troubles were used by God to reveal truth to Israel (Hos. 1–3). Though suffering may induce further blasphemy in the ungodly (Rev. 16:9–11,21), the righteous are victorious in the knowledge that God's love is at work for them in their tribulations (Rom. 8:28–38).

Redemption Suffering is sometimes borne redemptively for others. The supreme instance is Christ's vicarious atonement for sinners (Isa. 53:4–12; 1 Pet. 2:21–24; 3:18), but believers may suffer on behalf of others (Col. 1:24).

Mystery The book of Job teaches that reasons behind one's suffering may be hidden from the sufferer and misunderstood by observers. Job ultimately learns to rest in God, even without a full explanation (Job 42:1–6). Even the Lord Jesus cried out on the cross: “My God, My God, why have You forsaken Me?” (Matt. 27:46 HCSB; cp. Ps. 22:1).

Final victory The full solution to evil awaits the coming age. At history's darkest moment, Christ will return to conquer evil (2 Thess. 1:5– 10; Rev. 19:1–21). God will vindicate His children and wipe away their tears (Isa. 25:8; Rev. 7:16–17; 21:4).

EVIL-MERODACH [E' vil-mə-rō' dāk] Babylonian royal name meaning “worshiper of Marduk.” Babylonian king (562-560 B.C.) who treated Jehoiachin, king of Judah, with kindness (2 Kings 25:27). The Babylonian form of the name is Amel-Marduk. He was the son of Nebuchadnezzar. See Babylon.

EXACTOR KJV term for a taskmaster or a tax collector used only at Isa. 60:17 (ruler, HCSB). Most often the KJV translated the underlying Hebrew word as “oppressor” (Job 3:18; Isa. 3:12; 9:3; 14:2,4; Zech. 9:8; 10:4). Elsewhere the term is translated “taskmaster,” one who “exact” labor (Exod. 3:7) or as “raiser of taxes” (Dan. 11:20). The image is of one who drives people like a mule driver drives his beast (Job 39:7). Isaiah's picture is striking. In the future God is preparing for the only “rule” known to be peace and the only “oppression” known to be righteousness (60:17).

EXCOMMUNICATION Practice of temporarily or permanently excluding someone from the church as punishment for sin or apostasy.

Old Testament In the OT excommunication came as a curse from God as punishment for sin (Deut. 27:26; 28:15; Ps. 119:21; Mal. 2:2–9; 4:6). The Jewish community assumed authority to curse on God's behalf (Num. 23:8; Isa. 66:5). Old Testament terms for excommunication include: karat, to be excluded or cut off (Exod. 12:15,19; Lev. 17:4,9); cherem, banish, devote, or put to destruction (Exod. 22:19; Lev. 27:28–29; Josh. 6:17); and qelalah, desolation or thing of horror (2 Kings 22:19; Jer. 25:18). The covenant community protected itself from curse and temptation by distancing covenant-breakers from the community even to the point of executing them.

New Testament Expulsion from the synagogue was one form of NT excommunication. Christians were frequently subject to expulsion, which was punishment for blasphemy or for straying from the tradition of Moses (Luke 6:22; John 9:22; 12:42; 16:2). Many early Christians thus endured excommunication from the worship place of their fathers to be Christians. The apostles practiced excommunication based on the binding and loosing authority Jesus gave to them (John 20:23; Matt. 18:18). They excommunicated church members for heresy (Gal. 1:8) for gross, deliberate sin (1 Cor. 5; 2 John 7) and perhaps for falling away from church belief and practice (Heb. 6:4–8). The purpose was to purify the church and to encourage offenders to repent (1 Cor. 5:5–6; 2 Cor. 2:6–10; 2 Thess. 3:15). Punishment ranged in scope from limited ostracism to permanent exclusion and may even have included some form of physical punishment if the church continued synagogue practice (Luke 4:28–30; John 8:2–11; Acts 5:1–5; 7:58). New Testament terms for excommunication include: being delivered to Satan (1 Cor. 5:5; 1 Tim. 1:20); anathema or cursed and cut off from God (Rom. 9:3; 1 Cor. 16:22; Gal. 1:8). The NT churches apparently used excommunication as a means of redemptive discipline. See Apostasy; Binding and Loosing.

In Church History During the Middle Ages when church and state became intertwined, excommunication was often used as a political tool. In 1054 the Catholic Church was divided into east and west. Each claimed primacy as the true church. They “resolved” the issue by excommunicating each other.

Contemporary In its broadest sense, excommunication now means denial of sacraments, congregational worship, or social contact of any kind. Excommunication is practiced in this manner by both Protestant and Catholic churches. However, the term itself is used mainly in the Catholic Church and usually indicates the permanent ban. Lesser punishments are called censures.

EXECRATION Act of cursing; an object of cursing. The term appears in the KJV twice (Jer. 42:18; 44:12), both times in reference to the fate of the remnant who disobeyed God's word and sought safety in Egypt. The text may be understood in at least two ways. First, their name would become an object of cursing (NIV), that is, others would curse the remnant.

Alternately, their name might be used as a curse (TEV) in the form “May you be like the remnant whom God destroyed.” See Blessing and Cursing.

EXECUTIONER One who puts another to death, especially as a legal penalty. KJV uses the term only once (Mark 6:27 for the one beheading John the Baptist). Some modern translations prefer a more generic term such as “soldier of the guard” (NRSV, REB) or simply “guard” (TEV). The OT law does not make provision for the role of the representative executioner who acts on behalf of society. Where “official” executioners are mentioned, they are portrayed as the agents of despotic rulers (Dan. 2:14,24; Mark 6:27). The execution of Jesus is the chief example of such abuse of power. See Capital Punishment

EXERCISE The Bible speaks only briefly of physical exercise. First Timothy 4:8 recognizes the value of bodily training but subordinates it to the greater value of godliness. Because the human body was created by God, it is incumbent on people to care for their bodies. This is particularly true for Christians whose bodies are temples of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 6:19), which are to be presented to God as living sacrifices (Rom. 12:1). Using the imagery of a runner, the Apostle Paul speaks of the need to pommel and subdue his body in order to qualify it for life's race (1 Cor. 9:24–26).

EXHORTATION Argument (Acts 2:40) or advice intended to incite hearers to action. The ability to exhort or encourage to action is a spiritual gift (Rom. 12:8) sometimes associated with prophets/ preachers (Acts 15:32; 1 Cor. 14:3). Elsewhere mutual exhortation is the responsibility of all Christians (Rom. 1:12; 1 Thess. 5:11,14; Heb. 3:13, 10:24–25). Hebrew Scriptures provided NT preachers with a source of exhortation (Rom. 15:14; Heb. 12:5–6). The synagogue sermon was described as a “word of exhortation” (Acts 13:15 KJV; HCSB, message of encouragement). As such it called for applying the truths of the scriptural text to life. Indeed, exhortation is the goal of orderly worship (1 Cor. 14:31). Letters of exhortation were common in the ancient world. Messengers often supplied additional encouragement to supplement the written message (2 Sam. 11:25; Eph. 6:22; Col. 4:8). Two NT documents describe themselves as exhortations (1 Pet. 5:12; Heb. 13:22). The effect of the letter of the Apostolic Council was similarly described as exhortation (Acts 15:21). Though it does not designate itself as such, the letter from James is an exhortation.

EXILE Events in which the northern tribes of Israel were taken into captivity by the Assyrians and the southern tribes of Judah were taken into captivity by the Babylonians. Sometimes the terms “captivity” and “carried into captivity” refer to the exiles of Israel and Judah.

In OT times the Assyrians and Babylonians introduced the practice of deporting captives into foreign lands. Deportation was generally considered the harsher measure only when other means had failed. Rather than impose deportation, Assyria demanded tribute from nations it threatened to capture. As early as 842 B.C., Jehu, king of Israel, was paying tribute to Shalmaneser, king of Assyria. Not until the reign of Tiglath-pileser (745-727 B.C.) did the Assyrians begin deporting people from the various tribes of Israel.

In 734 B.C. Tiglath-pileser captured the cities of Naphtali (2 Kings 15:29) and carried away as captives the inhabitants of the tribes of Naphtali, Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 5:26). In 732 Tiglath-pileser took control of Damascus, the capital city of Syria. At that time he appointed Israel (the Northern Kingdom) her last king—Hoshea (732-723 B.C.). Hoshea rebelled about 724 B.C. and was taken captive by the Assyrians (2 Kings 17:1–6).

Samaria, the capital city of Israel, held out until early 721 B.C. Shalmaneser V (727-722 B.C.) laid siege to the city. The eventual fall of Samaria occurred at the hands of Sargon II (722-705 B.C.). These events marked the end of the 10 northern tribes (2 Kings 17:18).

The Assyrians exiled the Israelites into Halah, Gozan, and Media (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11; Obad. 20). The Assyrians brought into Samaria people from Babylon, Cuthah, Ava, Hamath, and Sepharvaim (2 Kings 17:24; Ezra 4:10). Sargon II recorded that 27,290 Israelites were deported.

The prophets Hosea and Amos had prophesied the fall of Israel. These two prophets proclaimed that Israel's fall was due to moral and spiritual degeneration rather than to the superior military might of the Assyrian nation. Assyria was only the “rod of mine anger” (Isa. 10:5).

History of the Exile of Judah More than a hundred years before the Babylon exile, Isaiah, the prophet, had predicted Judah's fall (Isa. 6:11–12; 8:14; 10:11). In addition, the prophets Micah, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, and Ezekiel agreed that Judah would fall.

There were three deportations of Jews to Babylon. The first occurred in 598 B.C. (2 Kings 24:12–16). The second deportation took place in 587 B.C. (2 Kings 25:8–21; Jer. 39:8–10; 40:7; 52:12–34). After the second deportation, Gedaliah was appointed governor of Judah by the Babylonians but was assassinated (2 Kings 25:22–25). A third deportation, a punishment for Gedaliah's assassination, occurred in 582 B.C. (Jer. 52:30).

Life in the Exile meant life in five different geographical areas: Israel, Judah, Assyria, Babylon, and Egypt. We possess little information about events in any of these areas between 587 and 538 B.C.

Israel Assyria took the educated, leading people from the Northern Kingdom and replaced them with populations from other countries they had conquered (2 Kings 17:24). They had to send some priests back to the area to teach the people the religious traditions of the God of the land (2 Kings 17:27–28). Such priests probably served a population that contained poor Jewish farmers dominated by foreign leaders. When Babylon took over the area, they established a provincial capital in Samaria. Leaders there joined with other provincial leaders to stop Zerubbabel and his people from rebuilding the temple (Ezra 4:1–24). Gradually, a mixed population emerged (Ezra 10). Still, a faithful remnant attempted to maintain worship of Yahweh near Shechem, producing eventually the Samaritan community. See Samaritans.

Assyria Exiles from the Northern Kingdom were scattered through the Assyrian holdings (2 Kings 17:6). Apparently, their small communities, isolated from other Jews, did not allow them to maintain much national identity. We do not know what happened to these people, thus the popular title: the lost tribes of Israel. Some may have eventually returned to their original homeland. Others may have established the basis of Jewish communities that appear in later historical records.

Judah The Babylonians did not completely demolish Judah. They left farmers, in particular, to care for the land (Jer. 52:16). Some citizens who had fled the country before the Babylonian invasion returned to the land after Jerusalem was destroyed (Jer. 40:12). The Babylonians set up a government that may or may not have been dependent on the provincial government in Samaria. Jews loyal to the Davidic tradition assassinated Gedaliah, the governor (2 Kings 25:25). Then many of the people fled to Egypt (2 Kings 25:26; Jer. 43). People remaining in the land continued to worship in the temple ruins and seek God's word of hope (Lamentations). Many were probably not overjoyed to see Jews return from Babylon claiming land and leadership.

Babylon The center of Jewish life shifted to Babylon under such leaders as Ezekiel. Babylon even recognized the royal family of Judah as seen in 2 Kings 25:27 and in recovered Babylonian records. Exiled Jews based their calendar on the exile of King Jehoiachin in 597 (Ezek. 1:2; 33:21; 40:1). Jehoiachin's grandson, Zerubbabel, led the first exiles back from Babylon in 538 (Ezra 2:2; Hag. 1:1). Most of the exiles in Babylon probably followed normal Near Eastern practice and became farmers on land owned by the government. Babylonian documents show that eventually some Jews became successful merchants in Babylon. Apparently religious leaders like Ezekiel were able to lead religious meetings (Ezek. 8:1; cp. Ezra 8:15–23). Correspondence continued between those in Judah and those in exile (Jer. 29), and Jewish elders gave leadership to the exiles (Jer. 29:1; Ezek. 8:1; 14:1; 20:1). First Chronicles 1–9, Ezra, and Nehemiah show that genealogies and family records became very important points of identity for the exiles. People were economically self-sufficient, some even owning slaves (Ezra 2:65) and having resources to fund the return to Jerusalem (Ezra 1:6; 2:69). Still, many longed for Jerusalem and would not sing the Lord's song in Babylon (Ps. 137). They joined prophets like Ezekiel in looking for a rebuilt temple and a restored Jewish people. They laughed at Babylonian gods as sticks of wood left over from the fire (Isa. 44:9–17; 45:9–10; 46:1–2,6–7; Jer. 1:16; Ezek. 20:29–32). A Babylonian Jewish community was thus established and would exercise strong influence long after Cyrus of Persia permitted Jews to return to Judah. These Jews established their own worship, collected Scriptures, and began interpreting them in the Aramaic paraphrase and explanations which eventually became the Babylonian Talmud, but continued to support Jews in Jerusalem.

Egypt Jews fled Jerusalem for Egypt (2 Kings 25:26) despite God's directions not to (Jer. 42:13–44:30). Many Jews apparently became part of the Egyptian army stationed in northern border fortresses to protect against Babylonian invasion. As such, they may have joined Jews who had come to Egypt earlier. Archaeologists have discovered inscriptions at Elephantine in southern Egypt showing a large Jewish army contingent there also. They apparently built a temple there and worshiped Yahweh along with other gods. These military communities eventually disappeared, but Jewish influence in Egypt remained. Finally, a large community in Alexandria established itself and produced the Septuagint, the earliest translation of the Hebrew Bible into Greek.

The Edict of Cyrus in 538 B.C. (2 Chron. 36:22–23; Ezra 1:1–4) released the Jews in Babylon to return to their homeland. Though conditions in the homeland were dismal, many Jews did return. The preaching of Haggai and Zechariah (520-519 B.C.) urged these returning captives to rebuild their temple in Jerusalem. The temple was completed in 515 B.C., the date which traditionally marks the end of the Babylonian exile. Gary Hardin

EXODUS Israel's escape from slavery in Egypt and journey towards the promised land under Moses. Historically and theologically this is the most important event in the OT. More than a hundred times in all parts of the OT except the Wisdom Literature, Yahweh is proclaimed as “the one who brought you up from the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.” Israel remembered the exodus as God's mighty redemptive act. She celebrated it in her creeds (Deut. 26:5–9; 1 Sam. 12:6–8). She sang of it in worship (Pss. 78; 105; 106; 114; 135; 136). The prophets constantly reminded Israel that election and covenant were closely related to the exodus (Isa. 11:16; Jer. 2:6; 7:22–25; Ezek. 20:6,10; Hos. 2:15; 11:1; Amos 2:10; 3:1; Mic. 6:4; Hag. 2:5). (The English word “exodus” does not occur in the KJV.) The exodus in the OT was to Israel what the death and resurrection of Christ was to Christians in the NT. Just as Israel commemorated her deliverance from Egyptian bondage in the feast of Passover, Christians celebrate their redemption from sin in the observance of the Lord's Supper (Luke 22:1–20; 1 Cor. 11:23–26).

Historicity The only explicit account of the exodus we have is the biblical account (Exod. 1–15). No extrabiblical witnesses directly speak of the sojourn of Israel's ancestors in the land of the Nile. However, Egyptian sources do confirm the general situation that we find in the end of Genesis and the beginning of the book of Exodus. There are many reports in Egyptian sources of nomadic people called Habiru coming into Egypt from the east fleeing from famine. Extrabiblical evidence from Egypt indicates that Egypt used slave labor in building projects (Exod. 1:11). At one time the land in Egypt was owned by many landholders; but after the reign of the Hyksos kings the Pharaoh owned most of the land, and the people were serfs of the king (Gen. 47:20). Old Testament scholars accept the essential historicity of the exodus.

The Nature of the Event Some scholars see the exodus as the miraculous deliverance of the people of God from the grip of Pharaoh's army at the Red Sea. Others see it as an escape across a sprawling wilderness and sweltering desert of a small mixed band of border slaves. Some argue that the military language in the account indicates that the event was a military skirmish. Such language may be the language of holy war.

The Bible stresses that the exodus was the work of God. God brought the plagues on Egypt (Exod. 7:1–5). The miracle at the sea was never treated merely as a natural event or as Israel's victory alone. In the earliest recorded response to the event, Miriam sang, “Sing to the LORD, for He is highly exalted; the horse and his rider He has hurled into the sea” (Exod. 15:21 NASB).

Elements of the wonderful and the ordinary contributed to the greatest OT events. The natural and supernatural combined to produce God's deliverance. The exodus was both miraculous and historical. An air of mystery surrounds this event as all miraculous events. Despite the time reference in 1 Kings 6:1 and Judges 11:26, when the exodus occurred is still a hotly contested issue. Rather than this 15th century date, many scholars place the exodus during the 13th century when Ramesses II was Pharaoh.

We do not know precisely where it happened since the Hebrew term may have meant the Red Sea as we know it, one of its tributaries, or a “sea of reeds” whose location is unknown. We do not know who or how many may have been involved. The record makes it clear that God delivered Israel from bondage because of His covenant with the patriarchs and because He desired to redeem His people (Exod. 6:2–8).

The Date of the Exodus The Bible does not give an incontrovertible date for the exodus. First Kings 6:1 says, “In the four hundred and eightieth year after the sons of Israel came out of the land of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel, in the month of Ziv which is the second month, that he began to build the house of the LORD” (NASB). Though this verse refers primarily to the beginning of the building of Solomon's temple and only in a general way to the time of the exodus, it does indicate a 15th century B.C. exodus event. One problem is that the fourth year of Solomon's reign is calculated by a round-about means. First, King Ahab is mentioned in an extrabiblical inscription that states that Ahab fought in a coalition of armies against the Assyrians in the battle of Qarqar (ca. 853 B.C.). Second, the reigns of Israelite kings are then added together, going back through time to get to Solomon's reign. Allowing for differing calculations of accession year dating in Northern Israel and Judah and for overlapping coregencies and such, several possible dates have been arrived at for the beginning of Solomon's reign. However, the competing chronological systems for the beginning of Solomon's reign differ by no more than a decade (970; 967; 966; 961 B.C.). The fourth year of Solomon's reign would then be dated anywhere from 966 to 957 B.C. So even without the precise date for the beginning of his reign, the Bible seems to affirm a 1446-1437 B.C. date for the exodus. The most commonly accepted early date (among conservatives) is 1446 B.C.

Three major objections to this conclusion have been raised. (1) Pithom and Rameses. Exodus 1:11 says that the Israelites in Egypt built the store cities of Pithom and Rameses. It is argued that the name “Rameses” is not used until the time of the new kingdom (ca. 1300 B.C. and following). However, the conservative response is that a later editor of the Pentateuch probably used these two later names for clarity with his current audience

(similar to a modern historian saying, William the Conqueror crossed the “English Channel”—clearly an anachronism). (2) The 480 years time span. This has been taken as a symbolic length of time (12 generations of 40 years each; possibly relating to the genealogy from Aaron to Zadok in 1 Chron. 6:3–8). However, there is no definitive reason to take this number as symbolic. The phrasing only appears this way in 1 Kings 6:1, and the continuation of the verse further specifies the exact timing of the foundation of the temple in Solomon's fourth year. Another problem shows up when all the numbers are added from Exodus to 1 Samuel. They add up to over 550 years, but these may be explained by overlapping judgeships and such. According to Jephthah the judge, Israel had already occupied the land of Canaan for 300 years before his time. This would preclude a late exodus/conquest that only leaves a 200-year span for the period of the judges (Judg. 11:26). (3) The archaeological evidence for a 13th-century conquest. Due to the scarcity of evidence and the differing interpretations of the data, there is no real consensus today on the entry of Israel into the land of Canaan. There are three major views today of the rise of Israel as a nation from the 13th to the ninth centuries B.C. First, there was a 13th-century conquest following Albright's model. Second, there are varying views of nomadic settlement/emergence from the central hill country of Canaan around the 13th century. These models try to deal seriously with the lack of conquest data and the contradiction of mixed cultural evidence in the central hill country in the late Bronze Age (ca. 1200 B.C.). Third, there are those who use the scarcity of data to minimize the historicity of the Bible text and thus hold to a ninth-century date for the nation of Israel beginning with Omri/Ahab. As for data, the Merneptah Stele (ca. 1220 B.C.) indicates Israel was in Canaan by this date—but does not preclude an early date. The data from Lachish, Bethel, Hazor, Debir, and so forth could be interpreted to support a 13th-century conquest, but some of these destruction levels could be attributed to the time of Judges. Bryant Wood's analysis of the Jericho evidence has shown that John Garstang's original interpretation of an early (ca. 1400 B.C.) destruction level at Jericho was correct. Wood's latest pottery analysis of an Italian excavation at Jericho indicates that the retaining fortification wall around Jericho was both built and destroyed in the late Bronze I period. This is further evidence for an early date for the destruction of Jericho (and conquest) as well as an early date for the exodus. The identification of Ai with Et-Tell has shown to be inconclusive since the site did not exist as a town at either the early or the late date. However the site of Khirbet el-Maqatir, excavated by Bryant Woods and Garry Byers, did exist nearby in the late Bronze Period and may be the biblical Ai. Nelson Glueck's survey of the Transjordan, where he concluded there was no evidence of Edomites, Moabites, or nomadic tribes for the Israelites to run into in the early date, has been overturned. Maxwell Miller's survey of the Transjordan (specifically the Moabite plateau) has shown that there is evidence of nomadic tribes throughout the time periods in question for both dates of the exodus. See Pithom and Rameses.

The Pharaoh of the Exodus The pharaoh of the exodus is tied directly to the interpretation of the data for the dating of the exodus/conquest. If one takes the late exodus date (ca. 1270 B.C.), the pharaoh of the oppression would have been Seti I, and the pharaoh of the exodus would have been Ramesses II (1304-1237 B.C.). However, taking the early exodus date (ca. 1446 B.C.), the pharaoh of the oppression was Thutmose III, and the pharaoh of the exodus was Amenhotep II (1450-1425 B.C.). Neither date has absolute conclusive chronological evidence, which leads many to conclude the exodus/conquest did not happen or at least happened in stages. While there is conflicting evidence, there is no concrete reason to contradict 1446 B.C. dating for the exodus as alluded to in the Bible. Amenhotep II is depicted in ancient texts as a strong warrior and military pharaoh who made several campaigns into Canaan and then abruptly stopped his military activity. Amenhotep II's father, Thutmose III, was one of the strongest and wealthiest pharaohs of the 18th dynasty. Egypt was at the zenith of its power and wealth when Amenhotep II rose to rule and became the pharaoh of the exodus. Though not conclusive, the Dream Stele of Thutmose IV, son and successor of Amenhotep II, indicates that Thutmose IV was not the firstborn son of Amenhotep II—a possible allusion to the tenth plague on the firstborn of Egypt.

The Number Involved in the Exodus In our English Bibles Exod. 12:37 says, “Now the sons of Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth, about six hundred thousand men on foot, aside from children” (NASB). For various reasons (water/food supply in Sinai; evidence of burials, etc.) current scholarship translates the Hebrew word for “thousand” as “clan or military unit.” This view results in drastically reducing the numbers of Israelites in the exodus, as well as in the rest of OT. However, they must admit that this translation cannot be used consistently in this manner throughout the OT for some numbers are more specific. Numbers 1:46 states more specifically that God commanded Moses to take a census in the second year after the exodus from Egypt and the men of war numbered 603,550. It is not unusual for round numbers to be used at times both in the Bible and the Ancient Near East, but this does not mean the rounded numbers lack historicity, or veracity. Just prior to entering the promised land, in Numbers 26, God commanded Moses to take a census after the plague caused by immorality with the Moabite women. The Israelites numbered 601,730 men of war (Num. 26:51) over the age of twenty (Num. 1:3). The differences in the numbers found in Exod. 12 and Num. 26 may be attributed to the death of the older exodus generation through both divine judgment and natural causes as well as the increase through new births in the first 20 of the 40 years of wandering in the wilderness of Sinai. Some scholars try to get around large numbers which are specific by breaking the number into two parts—the thousands being military units/clans and the hundreds standing for the actual number of men, but this method breaks down when we see in Num. 1:46 [603,550] 603 military units/clans but a total of only 550 men. If the statistics are correct that males over the age of twenty make up approximately 25 percent of the total population, then the Israelites numbered well over two million people at both the beginning and the end of the wilderness wanderings.

The exodus was the work of God. It was a historical event involving a superpower nation and an oppressed people. God acted redemptively in power, freedom, and love. When the kingdom of God did not come, the later prophets began to look for a second exodus. That expectation was fulfilled spiritually in Christ's redemptive act.

EXODUS, BOOK OF Central book of the OT, reporting God's basic saving act for Israel in the exodus from Egypt and His making of His covenant with the nation destined to be His kingdom of priests.

Literary Setting The book of Exodus is the second book of the OT and of the Pentateuch. (See Pentateuch for discussion of date and authorship.) Exodus builds on the Genesis narrative of creation, human sin, divine punishment and renewal, the call of Abraham to bless the world, and the struggles of Isaac and then Jacob to carry out God's call. This ends with Joseph taking his father's family into Egypt to avoid the harsh sufferings of famine. Exodus takes up the story of the children of Jacob in Egypt, now under a new pharaoh and seen as feared foreigners instead of welcomed deliverers from famine. Israel thus became slave laborers in Egypt (chap. 1). God delivered the baby Moses from danger, and he grew up in pharaoh's court as son of pharaoh's daughter. Still he cared for the Israelites. Trying to protect one of his own people, he killed an Egyptian. Thus, Moses had to flee to the wilderness of Midian, where he helped seven endangered shepherd girls. He settled among them and married one of the girls. There, God called him at the burning bush of Mount Horeb/Sinai and sent him back to rescue Israel from Egypt (chaps. 2–4). With his brother Aaron, he faced a stubborn pharaoh, who refused to release the Israelites. When pharaoh made life harder for Israel, the Israelites complained about Moses. God took this as opportunity to reveal Himself to Israel, to pharaoh, and to the Egyptians. God brought the plagues upon Egypt. Pharaoh stubbornly refused to let Israel go until his firstborn son and the eldest sons of all Egypt died in the final plague. This tenth plague became the setting for Israel's central religious celebration, that of Passover and Unleavened Bread in which Israel reenacted the exodus from Egypt and rejoiced at God's supreme act of salvation for His people (chaps. 5–13). As Israel fled Egypt, the pharaoh again resisted and led his army after them. The miracle of the Red Sea (or perhaps more literally, the Sea of Reeds) became the greatest moment in Israel's history, the moment God created a nation for Himself by delivering them from the strongest military power on earth as He led them through the divided waters of the sea and then flooded the sea again as the Egyptians tried to follow (chap. 14).

After celebrating the deliverance in song and dance (15:1–21), Israel followed God's leadership into the wilderness, but soon the difficult wilderness life proved too hard. The Israelites cried for the good old days of Egypt, even after God supplied their food and drink needs and after He defeated the Amalekites (15:22-17:15). Moses' father-in-law Jethro brought Moses' wife and children back to him in the wilderness and praised God for all that He had done for Moses and the people. Jethro also advised Moses how to organize a more efficient judicial system, relieving Moses of stress (chap. 18). Then Israel came to Sinai, where God called them to become His covenant people, a holy nation to carry out Abraham's mission of blessing the nations. God gave the Ten Commandments and other laws central to the covenant (chaps. 19–23), and then confirmed the covenant in a mysterious ceremony (chap. 24). Moses went to the top of the mountain to receive the remainder of God's instructions, especially instructions for building the sacred place of worship, the tabernacle (chaps. 24–31). Impatient Israel got Aaron to build an object of worship they could see, so he made the golden calf. The people began worshiping. This angered God, who sent Moses back down to the people. Moses prayed for the people despite their sin but then saw the people's sinful actions and threw the tablets with the law to the ground, breaking them. Moses again went up and prayed for the people. God punished them but did not destroy them as He had threatened. God showed His continued presence in the Tent of Meeting and in letting His glory pass by Moses (chaps. 32–33). God then gave Moses the law on two new tablets of stone and renewed the covenant with the people, providing further basic laws for them. Such intense communication with God brought radiance to Moses' face (chap. 34). Moses then led Israel to celebrate the Sabbath and to build the tabernacle (chaps. 35–39). Moses set up the tabernacle and established worship in it. God blessed the action with His holy glorious presence (chap. 40). This provided the sign for Israel's future journeys, following God's cloud and fire.

Theological Teaching In Exodus Israel learned the basic nature of God and His salvation. They also learned the nature of sin, the characteristics of God's leader, the components of worship, and the meaning of salvation. In Exodus Israel learned the identity of the people of God.

God is Ruler of the world, able to act for His people even on the home territory of the world's most powerful political and military force. God chooses to act for the people He elects. God knows the situation of His people even when another nation has forced them into slavery. God saved His people through calling out a leader to communicate God's will and to face their enemies. God empowered the leader at a time of the leader's personal weakness rather than at a time of strength. He worked in the forces of nature to show His unequaled power and to demonstrate His concern for His own people.

Salvation, power, and concern were not all that God revealed of Himself. He also showed a holy nature in that special preparations were made to enter His presence. He revealed His great glory, so majestic even the leader could not view it. Most of all, He revealed His will to be present among His people and lead them through their daily activities.

In so doing, He showed the way He expected His people to live, a way of holiness, a way of priesthood among the nations. This way centered on life guided by the Ten Commandments. Such a life reflected the nature of God Himself, who could be identified as “The LORD God, compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in lovingkindness and truth; who keeps lovingkindness for thousands, who forgives iniquity, transgression and sin; yet He will by no means leave the guilty unpunished” (Exod. 34:6–7 NASB).

God expected His people to live the way of holiness, the way of the Ten Commandments. Failure to do so is sin. Sin centers particularly in giving another god credit for what God has done and in worshiping what human hands have made rather than the true God who allows no images of Himself. To avoid sin, God's people had to follow God's chosen leader, even when the path led through the wilderness and demanded a lifestyle lacking in some of the food and luxuries they had learned to take for granted. The leader followed God's will and not the people's. In so doing, the leader interceded with God for a sinful people, willing to give up his own place with God in exchange for the people's salvation. Only a leader who communed face-to-face with God could develop such an attitude. Thus Moses became the leader without parallel for Israel.

The leader's lasting role included the establishment of a worship place and worship practices. God's people gained their identity in worship. The leader showed them when, where, and how to worship.

The people offered worship because they had experienced God's salvation. For them salvation meant physical deliverance in military action against a powerful world enemy. It involved following God's instructions and waiting for God's miraculous help. Salvation set up a relationship between God and the people, a relationship based on God's initiative in delivering the people and on God's initiative in inviting the people into covenant relationship. This meant the people could trust God to lead them through their personal and national history. It also meant that God expected a trusting people to obey Him as He set out the way of life they should follow. Salvation was not just receiving God's salvation. It was following in faith the lifestyle God described for them. See Covenant.

Outline

- I. God Saves His People (1:1–4:17).
 - A. God's people face oppression in fear (1:1–22).

- G. Care for the stranger, widow, orphan, and poor (22:21–27).
- H. Respect for God and human rulers, dedication of children, and being holy (22:28–31).
- I. Practice honesty; do not hurt the righteous or innocent (23:1–9).
- J. Keep the sabbatical year, the Sabbath day, sacred occasions (23:10–19).
- K. God will provide spiritual guidance (23:20–33).

VIII. God and His People Must Ratify the Covenant (24:1–18).

- A. The people commit themselves to do God's will (24:1–11).
- B. God ratifies the covenant with His holy presence (24:12–18).

IX. God Plans to Be Present with His People (25:1–31:17).

- A. As their hearts move them, people are to give for God's worship place (25:1–7).
- B. God will dwell among His people in His place of holy worship (25:8–27:21).
- C. God's minister mediates His holy presence for a holy people (28:1–29:37).

- D. People respond to the holy Presence with sacrificial giving (29:38-30:38).
 - E. Craftsmen respond to the holy Presence by dedicating God-given skills (31:1–11).
 - F. People respond to the holy Presence with Sabbath worship (31:12–17).
- X. God Restores a Sinful People (31:18–34:35).
- A. God provides guidelines for life in His presence (31:18).
 - B. An impatient people break the covenant by making and worshipping other gods (32:1–6).
 - C. God reacts against a disobedient people in wrath (32:7–10).
 - D. Intercessory prayer brings divine repentance (32:11–14).
 - E. Judgment comes to a disobedient people through God's chosen leaders (32:15–29).
 - F. A mediator's majestic intercession is not sufficient (32:30–35).
 - G. God withdraws His immediate presence from a sinful people (33:1–4).
 - H. Mourning and repentance, even by a disobedient people, catch God's attention (33:5–6).
 - I. Worship at God's chosen place is an essential element in restoring the covenant (33:7–11).
 - J. The unseeable presence of God reaffirms the covenant relationship (33:12–23).
 - K. God renews His covenant with His people (34:1–35).
- XI. God Honors the Obedience of His People with His Holy Presence (35:1–40:38).
- A. God gives His people specific requirements (35:1–19).
 - B. Obedient people provide resources and skills needed for God's work (35:20–36:7).
 - C. Obedient people use their resources to build God's dwelling place (36:8–39:43).
 - D. The leader of God's people prepares for worship (40:1–33).
 - E. God's presence fills the worship place continually for His obedient people (40:34–38).

EXORCISM Practice of expelling demons by means of some ritual act. Although the Hebrew Bible does make reference to demonic beings (Lev. 17:7; Deut. 32:17; Isa. 13:21; 34:14; 2 Chron. 11:15; Ps. 106:37 NRSV), there is no account of demons being cast out of a person or a place. The office of the exorcist, long known in the religious practice of Mesopotamia, is totally absent from the Hebrew Bible. The demons that are mentioned there are usually dreadful earthly beings, sometimes resembling goats or satyrs who live in dry regions. Twice a loanword, shedim (Akkadian: shedu, “protecting spirit”), is used to describe the foreign gods (Deut. 32:17; Ps. 106:37) and is usually translated “demons” in English.

In the NT the demons were earthly powers or spirits allied with Satan. Jesus' power to exorcise is demonstrated in the Synoptic Gospels of His power over Satan (Matt. 15:21–28; Mark 1:23–38; 5:1–20; 7:24–30; 9:14–29). Exorcism is included in the list of wonders Jesus performed at Capernaum and in Galilee (Mark 1:34,39). Mark 3:11 reports that Jesus had to silence the unclean spirits because they recognized Him and proclaimed Him Son of God.

Jesus gave His disciples authority over unclean spirits (Mark 3:14–15; 6:7) which they generally exercised with success (Mark 6:13) but not always (Mark 9:18). Mark 9:38–41 makes reference to someone who did exorcisms in the name of Jesus even though he was not a follower of Jesus. Jesus told the disciples not to forbid him. In another vein, Acts 19:13–16 tells of wandering Jewish exorcists in Ephesus who attempted to exorcise demons in the name of the Jesus preached by Paul but without success.

John says nothing of Jesus exorcising demons, but the issue of demons is not lacking in that Gospel, for His opponents often accused Jesus of being possessed (John 7:20; 8:48–49,52; 10:20). Similarly, in the Synoptics, the scribes accused Him of casting out demons by the power of the prince of demons (Mark 3:22).

The usual technique of exorcism, as shown by contemporary magical papyri, was to adjure the demon (by name, if possible) through the power of one or more gods to depart the one possessed. This was often accompanied by preparations of herbs and the imposition of amulets. Magical words of extended, repeated syllables were also part of almost all exorcistic formulas. By contrast, the exorcisms of Jesus in the Synoptics involved His command without reference to other divine beings (Mark 1:25; 9:25) and with only a single reference to anything like technique in saying about the boy the disciples could not exorcise that the demon involved could only be cast out by prayer (Mark 9:29). Something close to the usual technique of exorcism was demonstrated by the Gerasene demoniac who tried unsuccessfully to exorcise Jesus, calling Him by title and adjuring Him in the name of the Most High God to leave him alone (Mark 5:7). Jesus relied on His own unique power to demonstrate demons had no place or power in His kingdom. See Demonic Possession; Divination and Magic; Healing; Miracles. Fred L. EXPIATION, PROPITIATION Terms used in Christian theology that directly correlate and define the nature and effect of the atonement in relation to God and believers. The two terms have somewhat different meanings and are sometimes placed in opposition to each other by theologians, though it is also possible to see them as complementary. Expiation speaks of the process by which sins are nullified or covered. Propitiation, taking a personal object, speaks of the appeasement of an offended party—specifically the Christian God—from wrath or anger. Expiation falls under the concept of propitiation. In Scripture it cannot exist without propitiation. Other terms used for propitiation are appeasement and placation.

Biblical Terminology In the OT, the Hebrew word kaphar normally translated into English as “to make an atonement” is used almost always in the context of quenching the wrath of God. For example, Num. 25:11–13 states that the Lord told Moses that Aaron “has turned away my wrath” because he “made atonement for the sons of Israel” (NASB). Other examples are Exod. 32:30–33; Num. 16:41–50; Isa. 47:11; and Mal. 1:9–10. In relation to man being the object of appeasement, Gen. 32:20, 2 Sam. 21:3–14; and Prov. 16:14 are used. Other texts speak to gods or idols being the object of appeasement (Deut. 32:17; Jer. 32:35; and Ps. 106:37–38). Although the word kaphar is sometimes translated as “to cover” or “to wipe” (cp. Ps. 85:2–3), which would lean toward the idea of expiation, the word is almost always in context of propitiation. Therefore, the satisfaction of God's wrath is a theme addressed in context of OT sacrifice.

Although the controversy over expiation and propitiation is found in the OT, the tension builds upon the NT Greek word hilasmos (hilaskomai is the verb form, hilasterion is the cognate noun form) with four key passages: Rom. 3:25; Heb. 2:17; 1 John 2:2; and 4:10. The diverse renderings of this word in modern translations illustrate the great controversy surrounding the meaning and effect of the atonement. For example, the word hilasterion in Rom. 3:25 is translated as “propitiation” (NASB, KJV, HCSB), “expiation” (RSV), “means of expiation” (NEB) and “a sacrifice of atonement” (NIV, NRSV). The NIV, supporting the idea of placation of wrath, offers a marginal option as “the one who would turn aside his wrath, taking away sin.” The NRSV's marginal option for Rom. 3:25—“place of atonement”—leaves the reader ambivalent about the function of the atonement but appeals to the locus (site) of the blood sprinkled on the Day of Atonement, the Mercy Seat. The Septuagint uses the word hilasterion 28 times, all of which refer to the Mercy Seat, except Amos 9:1. This rendering of hilasterion as “mercy seat” in the NT carries a certain ambiguity, however, since Christ was the personal incarnation of Deity and the means of atonement, not an impersonal place of atonement. It is best not to translate the word as “mercy seat.”

Paul has articulated that God's wrath is fixed on all human beings due to their heinous sin (Rom. 1–3, especially 1:18–32). Paul, in Rom. 3:25, demonstrates God's initiation in satisfying his wrath in Christ as the hilasterion or propitiation. If Paul intended to discuss expiation alone in this verse, he would have forsaken his theme up to that point in his letter.

Hebrews 2:17 has tas harmartias (the sins) as the direct object of hilaskomai, which might cause one to think the best translation would be “expiation.” However, this passage, while speaking of the atonement washing away our sins, does not negate the notion that God's wrath is under consideration and even mentions of a “merciful high priest,” which indicates placation of righteous anger. The other passage is found in 1 John

2:2, which tells of an “Advocate” needed to avert the angered God. Although 2 Cor. 5:18–20 does not use the word hilasmos, it does speak of God who “reconciled us to Himself through Christ” (HCSB) denoting a previous enmity between God and believers. This imagery could not be explained by expiation alone but must build upon propitiation, thus the translations should reflect this proper meaning.

Theological Formulation The necessity of propitiation is found in God Himself in that sin provokes His wrath. However, some scholars, such as C. H. Dodd and A. T. Hanson, either believe that the wrath of God is nonexistent or it is an impersonal, cause-and-effect occurrence. Dodd believed that the word hilasmos in Greek (classical and Koine) means “to propitiate” and that pagan worship involved a similar appeasement of their deities through sacrifice. Nonetheless, he did not feel this applied to Hellenistic Judaism or the NT. He then interpreted the OT and NT texts solely in an expiation fashion, thereby denying propitiation. Dodd's theological concern to redefine God's nature without reference to His righteous wrath against sin seems to have determined his conclusions. Other scholars, such as Leon Morris and Roger Nicole, have adequately defended and supported the reality of God's wrath and the doctrine of a propitiatory atonement.

The doctrine of propitiation in Scripture is in stark opposition to the propitiation of pagan ritualistic sacrifice. First, the object of pagan sacrifice would be either personal deities who are not absolute in power or an impersonal, absolute deity, neither of which can produce atonement. The object of scriptural sacrifice is the personal, absolute Triune God. Second, deities of pagan worship display wrath in an irrational and capricious manner. The Deity of Scripture displays wrath due to His internal nature, not whimsical, external causes. Third, the subject of pagan propitiation is the worshipers who offer the sacrifice. The subject of averting the wrath of God the Father is God the Son who voluntarily brings effectual atonement, because humanity is unworthy to sacrifice to the God against whom they have rebelled. This manner of sacrifice is displayed in the OT in Lev. 17:11, where God has given Israel the atonement to propitiate His wrath.

The effect of the atonement is directly linked to God's wrath. If God has no wrath or anger towards sinners, there is no need for propitiation. Mere expiation will do. If there is expiation without propitiation, God is both indifferent to sin and therefore unjust. Propitiation is the only way God can offer mercy and forgiveness to sinners and, at the same time, be just. “He presented Him to demonstrate His righteousness at the present time, so that He would be righteous and declare righteous the one who has faith in Jesus” (Rom. 3:26 HCSB).

Another attribute of God which some scholars believe is incompatible with God's wrath is love, but the two attributes are shown to be compatible through the atonement, “in that while we were still sinners Christ died for us” (Rom. 5:8 HCSB; cp. Exod. 34:7). The tension must be reconciled because this theological flaw—namely, not reconciling the seeming paradox of God's love and wrath—is probably the reason for much of the controversy over whether expiation or propitiation is the correct understanding. Those who cannot reconcile the apparent paradox reject wrath and propitiation in exchange for love, a move that is unnecessary. In 1 John 4:9–10, the author states that “by this (atonement) the love of God was manifested” (NASB). The crucifixion is the very incarnation of love. While sinners hated their Creator, he sought a way for reconciliation for his people. Isaiah 53:10 further states that “the LORD was pleased to crush Him, putting Him to grief” (NASB). Jesus was not a victim. This act on His part was love without parallel, a complete giving of Himself for us, “a sacrificial and fragrant offering to God” (Eph. 5:2 HCSB).

Jeremiah H. Russell

EYE Organ of sight.

Literal Uses The eyes were especially valued organs. If a master struck a slave, blinding him in an eye, the slave was to go free as compensation for the eye (Exod. 21:26). The OT law of retribution limited vengeance of personal loss to “an eye for an eye” (Lev. 24:20). Jesus replaced this concept of justice with His requirement of love for enemies (Matt. 5:38–48). An eye defect disqualified one for priestly service (Lev. 21:20). An exceptionally cruel punishment was to gouge out the eyes of an enemy (Judg. 16:21; 2 Kings 25:7). This act was interpreted as bringing disgrace on the land of the blinded ones (1 Sam. 11:2). The description of Leah's eyes (Gen. 29:17) is of uncertain meaning. The KJV rendering "tender" can be understood either positively (lovely, NRSV) or negatively (weak, NASB).

Extended Uses The OT often speaks of the eye where we would speak of the person, reflecting the Hebrew concept of bodily parts as semi-independent entities. The eye can thus approve actions (Job 29:11). The eyes can be full of adultery (2 Pet. 2:14) and can desire (Ps. 54:7) or lust (Num. 15:39; 1 John 2:16). The eyes despise (Esther 1:17), are dissatisfied (Prov. 27:20; Eccles. 4:8), and can dwell on past provocation (Job 17:2). Job even spoke of entering a covenant with his eyes as if they were a second party (31:1). Eyes can be evil, that is, greedy or stingy. Such an evil eye refuses to loan when the sabbatical year is near (Deut. 15:9) and begrudges a brother food (28:54). The evil eye of Matt. 6:23 is often interpreted as an unhealthy eye in contrast to the single (whole, healthy) eye of 6:22. The Matthean context of teaching on treasure in heaven (6:19) and serving mammon or riches (6:24) as well as the usage in Matt. 20:15 suggest that the familiar OT idea of the evil eye as the stingy eye is in mind here also. The eyes can be generous to the poor (Prov. 22:9 KJV). The eyes can scorn and mock (Prov. 30:17), spare an enemy (1 Sam. 24:10; Isa. 13:18), or wait for a time to sin (Job 24:15). The eyes can offend (Matt. 5:29), that is, cause someone to sin. Jesus' call to pluck out the offending eye is an exaggerated call to let nothing cause one to sin.

Expressions The "apple of the eye" is a description of the pupil. Proverbs 7:2 called for making God's law the apple of one's eye, that is, something of value to be guarded (kept) carefully. To "make any baldness between your eyes" (Deut. 14:1 KJV) means to shave one's forelocks (NRSV, REB). Bribes blind the eyes of judges causing them to ignore justice (Deut. 16:19; 1 Sam. 12:3). The difficult expression "covering the eyes" (Gen. 20:16 KJV) denotes either compensation for injury (REB), covering the offense (NIV), or else exoneration or some similar term (NRSV, NASB, TEV). In some way Sarah was vindicated; Abimelech and his company could see nothing to criticize in her behavior; and her marriage was saved.

The difficult expression, “daughter of the eye” (Lam. 2:18 NASB margin), rendered “apple of the eye” by the KJV, is generally understood as a poetic equivalent for the eye. To see “eye to eye” (Isa. 52:8) is either to see in plain sight (NRSV) or to see with one's own eyes.

Sunrise (“eyelids of the morning” in Job 3:9) over the Mediterranean coast of Israel.

Eyes which have been enlightened or brightened (1 Sam. 14:27) are likely an image for being refreshed (REB, TEV) (cp. Ps. 13:3). Light of the eyes can parallel strength (Ps. 38:10; cp. Prov. 15:30). The Lord's commands could enlighten the eyes (Ps. 19:8) in this sense of giving strength or in the sense of giving understanding.

To fasten one's eyes (Acts 11:6) is to look closely. Heavy eyes (Mark 14:40) are drowsy eyes. To have one's eyes opened (Gen. 3:5; 21:19) is to be made aware or to recognize. The image of tearing out one's eyes (Gal. 4:15) pictures willingness to do anything. Winking one's eyes (Ps. 35:19; Prov. 6:13; 10:10; cp. 16:30) is associated with hate, treachery, and troublemaking.

God's Eye(s) God's eye or eyes is a frequent picture of God's providential care. God guides with His eye (Ps. 32:8), that is, gives counsel while offering His watch care. Deliverance from death and famine result from God's watchful eye (Ps. 33:18–19). The image of God's eye(s) roving throughout the earth (2 Chron. 16:9; Prov. 15:3; Jer. 16:17) symbolizes God's knowledge of all human activity and His control over it. Apocalyptic pictures involving numerous eyes (Ezek. 1:18; 10:12; Rev. 4:6), likewise, reassure of God's awareness of His people's plight wherever they might be.

Other Uses The Hebrew term for eye is used in a variety of expressions not related to sight or seeing. The word can be translated “spring” (Gen. 16:7; Num. 33:9). The term can refer to the (sur)face of the land (Exod. 10:5,15; Num. 22:5,11) or to facets (faces) of a stone (Zech. 3:9). The term is used for the sparkling of wine (Prov. 23:31) perhaps in reference to bubbles that resemble eyes. The word sometimes translated “color” in Num. 11:7 is also a word for eye.

The Samuel reading may be the original with the Chronicles reading the result of early copying, but no certain decision can be made.

EZBON [Éz' bɔn] Personal name, perhaps meaning "bare." Son of Gad and grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:16). Numbers 26:16 has a similar sounding Hebrew name, "Ozni." The Samaritan Pentateuch has a longer Hebrew name of similar sound, so that the precise spelling and pronunciation of the name are not known. Whatever the name, he was one of the Hebrews who entered Egypt with Joseph.

EZEKIEL [ə zé' kí əl] Personal name meaning "God will strengthen." Ezekiel was a sixth-century B.C. prophet who ministered to the Judean exiles in Babylon. All that is known of Ezekiel derives from his book. He was a son of Buzi (1:3), taken captive to Babylon in 597 B.C., along with King Jehoiachin and 10,000 others, including political and military leaders and skilled craftsmen (2 Kings 24:14–16). Ezekiel lived in his own house near the river Chebar, an irrigation canal that channeled the Euphrates River into surrounding arid areas. He was married and ministered from his own home (3:24; 8:1; 33:30–33). His wife died suddenly (24:18), but he was not allowed to mourn the loss.

Ezekiel's Role We know Ezekiel primarily as a prophet who received oracles from God and passed them on to the people (cp. 2:5; 33:33). However, his pronounced priestly interests give good reason to interpret him primarily as a priest who also was a prophet. The Lord's call to him came in his 30th year (1:1), the age priests normally were inducted into office (Num. 4:30). In Jerusalem, he would have inherited the priestly office and prepared for it by traditional means. However, in exile the call came dramatically and directly from God. In a vision he was called into divine service and ushered into the presence of God. In autobiographical notes

Ezekiel described his reactions to events with priestly sensitivities, especially to issues involving cleanness and uncleanness (4:14). Some of the actions God assigned to him were appropriate only for a priest: “bearing the iniquity” of the people (4:4–6) and not mourning the death of his wife (24:15–27; cp. Lev. 21:4–5). This is especially true of temple visions in which the Lord Himself took Ezekiel into the temple and guided him throughout the building (chaps. 8–11; 40–43). In both visions Ezekiel's legitimate presence in the temple is contrasted with the illegitimate presence of others (8:7–18; 44:1–14). In his preaching and teaching Ezekiel fulfilled the role of a priest charged with the responsibility of teaching the Torah in Israel (Lev. 10:11; Deut. 33:10a). Ezekiel delivered oracles received from God, permeated by Mosaic theology and forms.

Priestly ministry is associated with sacrifices and other tabernacle/temple rituals (cp. Deut. 33:10b). But removed from Jerusalem, Ezekiel could not carry out temple duties. The primary priestly function left was teaching. Ezekiel is a model of the priest as teacher of the Torah. This is not to deny him the prophetic. Normally priests engaged in prophetic ministry through the Urim and Thummim (Num. 27:21). However, denied official priestly vestments, Ezekiel could not use these objects. Instead he received messages directly and verbally from God.

Like his contemporary, Jeremiah, Ezekiel initially resisted God's call. This accounts for the nature of the opening vision, with intent to overwhelm him and break his resistance (1:1–28a); for the Lord's warning to him not to be rebellious (2:8); for Ezekiel's deep emotional disturbance at his call (3:15); for the harshness of the Lord's warning not to fail as a watchman (3:16–21); and for the severe restrictions of his call (3:22–27).

Once he accepted the call, he proclaimed God's messages fearlessly. Because he displayed many bizarre actions, some have characterized Ezekiel as neurotic, paranoid, psychotic, or schizophrenic. However, his unusual behavior derives from his utter obedience to God. Ezekiel was gripped by the Spirit of God, had a profoundly theological perspective on contemporary historical events, and an unflinching determination to deliver the messages just as God gave them.

Historical Background to Ezekiel's Ministry Ezekiel was the only Israelite prophet to carry out his ministry entirely outside Israel's homeland. He received his call five years after he was deported to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar in 597 B.C. This tragedy, foreseen by the Prophet Isaiah more than 100 years earlier (2 Kings 20:16–18), represented the culmination of a series of historical events. After the horrendous apostasies of Manasseh, the godly king Josiah (640-609 B.C.) attempted sweeping religious reforms (2 Kings 23:1–25), but it was too little and too late. The doom of the nation had already been determined. All Josiah's successors were wicked. His son, Jehoahaz, ruled only three years before the Egyptians deposed him and replaced him with his brother Jehoiakim (609-598 B.C.).

Babylon replaced Egypt as the dominant political force in the ancient Near East after the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C. Under Nebuchadnezzar the Babylonian army marched as far south as Jerusalem, claiming Judah as his vassal. At this time Daniel and his three friends were taken to Babylon as hostages in order that they might prepare the way for the arrival of masses of Judeans in 597. Because Jehoiakim rebelled against Babylon in that same year, Nebuchadnezzar removed him from the throne and replaced him with his son Jehoiachin, but he too resisted the Babylonians, and Nebuchadnezzar deported him and all the upper classes (including Ezekiel) to Babylon and put his uncle Zedekiah on the throne. Remarkably, Zedekiah too resisted Nebuchadnezzar's authority. Finally, in 587 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar's armies besieged Jerusalem, which fell in 586.

Daniel I. Block

EZEKIEL, BOOK OF Classified with the major prophets and placed in the OT canon following Lamentations. Ezekiel is a series of oracles delivered in a number of identifiable literary forms such as woe oracle, judgment oracle, riddle, and other. Unlike Jeremiah, the order of Ezekiel is approximately chronological.

Because of the bizarre nature of Ezekiel's opening vision, well-intentioned people often give up reading the book before they even get through the call narratives. While many different theories concerning the significance of this vision have been proposed, the vision makes perfect sense if one interprets it within the context of ancient Near Eastern iconography. Virtually every feature of the heavenly throne chariot has been attested on images and reliefs from the ancient world. While the images may be confusing to us, in Ezekiel's day they made perfect sense. To a community that had lost its spiritual way and its confidence in the Lord, God broke through, declaring that He remained absolutely and gloriously sovereign over all things. Nebuchadnezzar's razing of Jerusalem was not a sign of Marduk's superiority over Yahweh; he came as the agent of Yahweh. God departed from the temple (chaps. 8–11) but appeared to Ezekiel far away in a defiled and pagan foreign land.

Since virtually all of Ezekiel's oracles are in the first person, readers seem to have access to the private memoirs of the prophet. Only once, in the editorial note in 1:2–3, is the I-form abandoned in favor of the third person. Elsewhere the prophet is named only in 24:24, in the context of a divine speech introduced by the first person. This contrasts with other prophets, who rarely use the first-person autobiographical form. Ironically, although the oracles are in autobiographical narrative style, occasions when the prophet actually admits the reader into his mind are rare. Only six times does he express his reaction to circumstances, venting revulsion or acknowledging the incomprehensibility of God's actions (4:14; 9:8; 11:13; 21:5 [20:49]; 24:20; 37:3). Elsewhere his responses are drafted as divine oracles. Although he must have heard the chatter of the people, the Lord repeatedly reminds him of what they are saying (11:15; 12:22,27; 33:30–33; 37:11), even of their reactions to his performed sign-acts (12:9; cp. 17:12; 24:19). In spite of the autobiographic form of the text, one wonders if the real Ezekiel is ever exposed. We see a man totally under the control of the spirit of the Lord; only what God says and does matters.

Ezekiel's Message Although many of Ezekiel's oracles are addressed to the population in Jerusalem or to foreign nations, his primary audience was fellow exiles in Babylon. Prior to 586 B.C. the elders of the community came to him at his house to hear a word from God (8:1; 14:1; 20:1), hoping for an announcement of their imminent return to Jerusalem. However, the exiles refused to acknowledge that they had been exiled because of their own rebellion against the Lord. Eventually they came to look on Ezekiel primarily as an actor performing theatre in his home. He could declare a word from God, but they did not care for the message; they wanted to be entertained (33:30–33).

Economically the exilic community fared relatively well. However, spiritually they were in shock and bitter over the Lord's “betrayal.” While in Jerusalem they staked their security on God's four immutable promises: (1) He had entered into an eternal covenant with Israel from which there would be no divorce; (2) He had given them the land of Canaan as an eternal possession; (3) He had established the Davidic kingship, promising them eternal title to the throne of Israel; (4) He had chosen Zion as His eternal dwelling place. Based on these promises, even as the enemy camped around Jerusalem, Judeans perceived themselves absolutely secure; their covenant God had obligated Himself to them, the land, the king, and the temple irrevocably and unconditionally. They forgot that the blessings associated with these promises are contingent on active demonstration of fidelity through lives characterized by obedience to God, in response to the privilege of being His covenant people. But God had abandoned them; they thought He had proved unfaithful; He had let Nebuchadnezzar into the city, in effect conceding that Marduk, the Babylonian god was stronger. Disillusioned and depressed, they continued the idolatrous ways that caused their exile in the first place.

Ezekiel's rhetorical strategy in chapters 4–24 is to demolish illusions of security by exposing the peoples' crimes. He argued that far from being innocent in this “divorce,” they were guilty and had brought the calamity on themselves. Although the order in which these major themes are addressed appears to be somewhat random, all his oracles were deliberately aimed at demolishing the four pillars on which they had based their security. Systematically he undermined the validity of their reliance on God's eternal promises of an immutable and unconditional covenant (e.g., 15:1–8; 16:1–60), of eternal and unconditional title to the land (4:1–3; 6:1–14; 7:1–27; 11:1–23), of the Davidic kings as an irrevocable symbol of His commitment to them (12:1–16; 17:1–24; 19:1–14), and of Jerusalem as the eternal dwelling place of God (8:1–10:22; 24:16–27). Courageously he declared they could not sin with impunity. On the contrary, built into the covenant were warnings of judgment if they persisted in rebellion (Lev. 26; Deut. 28). This was the eternal word that God would certainly fulfill. Not only were the promises eternal, so was judgment for ingratitude and disobedience.

When Jerusalem fell in 586, Ezekiel's message changed. Judgment had fallen, and he was vindicated as a true prophet. With few exceptions, thereafter, his messages were proclamations of hope. But Ezekiel emphasized always that Israel's future restoration would be a work of divine grace. First, he declared that God will deal graciously with Israel by destroying the threat of all their enemies (chaps. 25–32), and ultimately the worldwide conspiracy under the leadership of Gog of Magog (chaps. 38–39). Second, he declared that God would restore Israel to full status and wellbeing as His own covenant people. Ironically, he based that hope on the very promises of God that he had so systematically shown to be false bases of security in chapters 1–24. His restoration oracles show those ancient promises to be indeed eternal. The deportations were not the last word: Israel must return to the land promised to their fathers, the Davidic kingship would be restored, and God would again dwell in their midst and never abandon them again (chaps. 40–48). Ezekiel 36:22–38 are the theological heart of the restoration oracles. Ezekiel summarized the process. After the Lord cleansed the land, He would again gather the people and bring them back to the promised land. Then He would replace their hearts of stone with hearts of flesh and put His Spirit within them, so that they might walk in His ways and experience His generous blessing.

Ezekiel's Method In the past Ezekiel was described as emotionally unstable, a victim of neurotic and psychotic abnormalities. Today scholars recognize that he was not a man on the verge of a breakdown but used deliberate rhetorical tactics to get his message across to a hardened and resistant audience. No prophet was as creative as Ezekiel in the strategies employed to communicate his message. Inspired by God, he crafted powerful word pictures (17:1–24; 19:1–14; 27:1–9), demolished populist slogans with impeccable logic (11:1–21; 18:1–32), played the role of prosecuting attorney (16:1–63; 23:1–49), and, like watchman on the wall, warned them of certain doom (3:16–21; 7:1–27; 33:1–9). Once the judgment had fallen, he assumed a sympathetic stance, like a pastor (34:1–31), a bearer of good news (6:8–10; 36:16–38; 37:1–14), and like a second Moses, heralding a new constitution (40–48). But he also performed symbolic acts to expose the condition of the nation and her kings (chaps. 4–5; 12:1–20). Later he used the same strategy to declare his message of hope (37:15–28), but this was more than “street theatre.” In his own body Ezekiel bore his message of doom (2:8–3:3; 3:22–27; 24:15–27; 33:21–22).

The Significance of Ezekiel in History and Tradition Ezekiel offers little evidence of any positive fruits for his labors. On the contrary, the Lord tells him otherwise (3:4–11). The only encouragement he received was that however hardened his audience might be, God would make his forehead even harder. However, God did promise to vindicate him, declaring that when the disaster had struck, the people would recognize that a true prophet of God has been in their midst (2:5; 33:33).

To evaluate Ezekiel's effectiveness we must look to the events that followed his book. According to the internal evidence, Ezekiel delivered his last oracle in 571 B.C. (29:1), more than two decades after his call. Even then, there was no hint of positive response among the exiles. However, the following three decades witnessed a remarkable development: when Cyrus issued a decree in 538 B.C., permitting the Judeans to return home and rebuild the temple, more than 40,000 people returned, totally weaned off idolatry and eager to rebuild (Ezra 2:64). Most likely they came through the ministry of Ezekiel, having experienced a widespread spiritual revival. Whether he lived long enough to witness these developments, we do not know. The preservation of his prophecies testifies to his impact on the exiles.

Ezekiel's influence lasted long beyond his own century. Allusions to his book are common in the NT, beginning with Jesus' appropriation of the title “Son of Man.” This was the form by which God consistently addressed Ezekiel in the book (93 times), presumably to remind him that, though he was called into divine service, he was of the same genus as his audience. Echoing Ezek. 34, in John 10 Jesus explicitly identified Himself as the Good Shepherd, in contrast to the wicked shepherds. The efforts to stone Him for claiming this title reflect recognition that this was a title of divinity (cp. John 10:31–33). Jesus' parable of the vine and the vinedresser in John 15 has its roots in Ezek. 15. The book of Revelation contains many allusions to Ezekiel, at times taking over and adapting entire oracles. The living creatures of Ezek. 1 and 10 reappear in Rev. 4:6–9, and the picture of the throne of God in Ezek. 1:26–28 is picked up in Rev. 4:2–3. Revelation 20 makes heavy use of Ezekiel's oracle against “Gog, the land of Magog” (Ezek. 38:2). The vision of the Holy City Jerusalem in Rev. 21–22 is dependent upon Ezekiel's temple vision (40–48). Especially striking is the reference to the river flowing from the throne of God.

The prophecies of Ezekiel now are generally ignored. However, enslaved African American Christians expressed their hope through spirituals, and some have their origin in Ezekiel: “Swing Low Sweet Chariot” and “Ezekiel Saw Dem Dry Bones.” Scholars cannot agree on the significance of Ezekiel's prophecies of Israel's restoration. Covenant theologians tend to see these prophecies fulfilled in a spiritual sense in the church, while dispensationalists see Ezekiel's prophecies of Gog and Magog (chaps. 38–39) and the vision of the temple and the land (chaps. 40–48) are to be interpreted literally. The truth probably lies between the extremes.

Difficulties in Interpreting the Book of Ezekiel Although his language and themes are firmly rooted in the Sinai revelation and Deuteronomy, many of his oracles betray other influences, both in their language and in their motifs. His oracles against Tyre and Egypt (chaps. 27–32), for example, feature Canaanite and Egyptian mythological and environmental motifs. At other times, the language is simple Hebrew, but his choice of expressions is shocking, bordering on pornographic (chaps. 16 and 23). Apparently, the only way to penetrate his audience and wake them out of lethargy was using outrageous language and reconstructing Israel's history as God saw it in startling, if not repugnant, terms. Perhaps more than in other prophetic books, to understand Ezekiel one must ask not only “What does the text say?” (the text-critical question) or, “What does the text mean?” (the hermeneutical question), but also, “Why does he say it like that?” Having explored his world and his audience, the answers to all three questions become clearer.

EZEL [Eˀ zəl] Place-name of uncertain meaning, perhaps, “disappearance.” Rock where David hid from Saul and watched for Jonathan's signal (1 Sam. 20:19). He had hidden there previously, an apparent reference to David's escape in 1 Sam. 19:2. In 1 Sam. 20:41 the Hebrew text apparently refers to the same place as the “south side” (NASB), using a word for side which sounds much like Ezel. Early translations and modern translators have sought a different text to read at this point. Thus “the pile of stones there” (TEV; cp. NRSV) or “the mound there” (REB). The name and location of the site is uncertain. The point of the narrative is clear: David used a natural hiding place to escape Saul and to gain vital information from his friend, the king's son.

EZEM [E' zēm] Place-name meaning “mighty” or “bone.” Town in Judah's tribal territory but settled by tribe of Simeon (Josh. 15:29; 19:3; 1 Chron. 4:29). KJV spells Azem in Joshua. Ezem is modern Umm el-Azam about 15 miles south of Beersheba and southwest of Aroer. Archaeologists at Tell esh-Sharia about 13 miles northwest of Beersheba have found a broken piece of pottery with the name Ezem on it.

EZER [E' zēr] English spelling of two Hebrew names with different spellings and meanings. The first Hebrew meaning is “gathering” or “pile.” Ezer was a leader in Edom and a descendant of Esau (Gen. 36:21,27,30). He was a Horite and lived in Seir or Edom.

The second Hebrew meaning is “help” or “hero.” 1. Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:4) in the clan of Caleb. 2. Son of Ephraim and grandson of Jacob. With his brother Elead, he was killed as he tried to take cattle from the inhabitants of Gath (1 Chron. 7:21). Ephraim was born and lived in Egypt with his family (Gen. 46:20). When any of his immediate family would have had opportunity to visit Gath and steal cattle is a difficult question. It may be history of clans of Ephraim and refer to a moment of mourning in the history of families descended from Ephraim. The place in the middle of the list of descendants of Ephraim and ancestors of Joshua points to a time after that of Ephraim himself. Otherwise, a different Ephraim from the son of Jacob is meant, or Ephraim, the son of Jacob, entered Palestine, but the Bible did not preserve a story of his travels. 3. Member of tribe of Gad who joined David's wilderness army before he became king (1 Chron. 12:9). 4. Person who helped Nehemiah repair the Jerusalem wall. His father had political authority over Mizpah (Neh. 3:19). 5. Temple musician who helped Nehemiah dedicate the completion of the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 12:42, with a slightly different Hebrew spelling). See Ebenezer.

EZION-GABER (KJV, Num. 33:35–36; Deut. 2:8; 2 Chron. 20:36) or EZION-GEBER [E zī ōn-gē' bēr] Port city of Edom located on the northern shore of the Gulf of Aqaba. It is first mentioned in the Bible among the cities on the route of the exodus (Num. 33:35–36; Deut. 2:8). Solomon utilized this city for shipbuilding purposes. During this time it was a port from which ships manned by Phoenician sailors sailed to Ophir for gold and other riches (1 Kings 9:26–28; 10:11,22; 2 Chron. 8:17).

Nelson Glueck led excavations of the site of the ancient city and discovered the remains of four towns, the first dating to the time of Solomon. Interestingly, this first city shows evidence of being a carefully laid-out complex, built at one time according to a plan rather than gradually. A notable feature of this first town was a series of structures with flues and air ducts in the floors and walls. Glueck concluded that this city was a refinery for the copper and iron that were mined in the area. However, in 1962 Rothenburg challenged this view and persuaded Glueck that the remains indicate that the city was a large storehouse for grain and supplies.

After the division of the kingdom, the city fell to the kingdom of Judah. It was destroyed probably during the invasion of Palestine by Shishak (925 B.C.). The city was rebuilt by Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, who attempted a similar enterprise as Solomon but with disastrous results (1 Kings 22:48; 2 Chron. 20:35–37). The city was again destroyed in the reign of Jehoram when the Edomites revolted (2 Kings 8:20–22). Azariah rebuilt the city, and according to many scholars it was renamed Elath (2 Kings 14:22; 2 Chron. 26:2), though recent study sees Elath as a separate city. During the reign of Uzziah, the Edomites regained possession of the city. From that time on the city remained under the control of the Edomites. It was abandoned sometime between the eighth and fourth centuries B.C. and was never rebuilt.

Recent archaeological study has questioned the identification of Ezion-geber with Tell elKheleifeh. Its lack of a good harbor and of the proper pottery finds has led to exploration of the island of Jezirat Faraun, where a natural harbor exists. Also known as Pharaoh's Island and Coral Island, it is seven miles south of modern Eilat and 900 feet offshore from the Sinai Peninsula. The island is 1,000 feet from north to south and 200 feet from east to west. It may have served as the harbor and port while Tell el-Kheleifeh was Elath. See Commerce; Elath.

EZNITE Word of uncertain meaning describing the family or tribal relationship of Adino (2 Sam. 23:8), but most modern translations take a clue from the parallel text in 1 Chron. 11:11 and from the earliest Greek translation, omitting Adino the Eznite from the text. (Compare modern translations.) See Adino.

EZRA [Ez' ra] Priest and scribe of the fifth century B.C. He descended from Aaron through Phinehas and later Zadok (Ezra 7:1–5; 1 Chron. 6:4–14). Ezra was sent with a large company of Israelites to Jerusalem by King Artaxerxes of Persia in 458 B.C. (Ezra 7:7). His mission was “to study the law of the LORD, and to practice it, and to teach His statutes and ordinances in Israel” (7:10 NASB).

He was supplied with silver and gold and the vessels of the former temple from the king's treasury and given the power to appoint public officials to enforce the law. After he divided up the supplies among the tribes of Israel, he made sacrifices unto the Lord and began to initiate reform. His first act of reform was to deal with the issue of mixed marriages. The Israelites had intermarried among the surrounding nations. Through prayer, intercession, and preaching he quickly achieved some measure of success (10:19). Nehemiah records that he read the law before all of the people in 444 B.C. at the reinstatement of the Feast of Tabernacles (Neh. 8). Ezra was of profound importance to Israel and biblical scholars today. He was the main instigator of reform just after Israel's return from exile and one of the most important preservers and teachers of law in Jewish history. (He was probably the author of the books of Chronicles and Ezra and the final editor of the OT.) Additionally, he is the main source of information about the first return from exile.

EZRA, BOOK OF Name “Ezra” may be shortened form of a name meaning “God/Yahweh is my help.” Several had the name: a family head in Judah (1 Chron. 4:17), a priest in the return with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:1,13), and a prince at the dedication of Jerusalem's walls built by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:32–33). The most famous is the chief character in the book of Ezra.

The book of Ezra is intimately connected with Chronicles and Nehemiah. The connection is so obvious that possibly one person wrote and compiled all three. This unknown person is referred to as the Chronicler.

Ezra and Nehemiah were actually one book in the ancient Hebrew and Greek OT. Each book contains materials found in the other (e.g., the list in Ezra 2 is also in Neh. 7). Each book completes the other; Ezra's story is continued in Nehemiah (chaps. 8–10). Both are necessary to the history of Israel. A whole century would be unknown (538-432 B.C.), historically, apart from Ezra and Nehemiah. They are the next chapter of the history recorded in Chronicles.

The book chronicles two major events, that of Zerubbabel and the group of returnees who rebuilt the temple (chaps. 1–6), and that of Ezra (chaps. 7–10, completed in Neh. 8–10). Peculiarities in the book include the naming of Sheshbazzar (chap. 1) as the leader of the first group to return and not Zerubbabel. Two approaches are possible. One is that Sheshbazzar was a real historical person who actually led a small group of anxious Jews to Jerusalem. The other is that Sheshbazzar might have been another name for Zerubbabel. But it seems unlikely that a Jew would have two Babylonian names.

Another peculiarity, found in both Ezra and Nehemiah, is the use of lists. The list in Ezra 2 of those who returned with Zerubbabel is in Neh. 7. Other lists include those who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:1–14) and “the sons of the priests who had married foreign wives” (Ezra 10:18–43).

Another peculiarity is the Aramaic in Ezra. This was a widely used language of Ezra's era, related to Hebrew, used by Jews and Gentiles alike. Most of the book is written in Hebrew, but there are two large sections of Aramaic (Ezra 4:7–6:18; 7:12–26). The Aramaic generally deals with official correspondence between Palestine and Persia.

The lists and the Aramaic show that the author was determined to use official documents where possible. Establishing the legitimacy of the Jews was an important objective, and these helped do that.

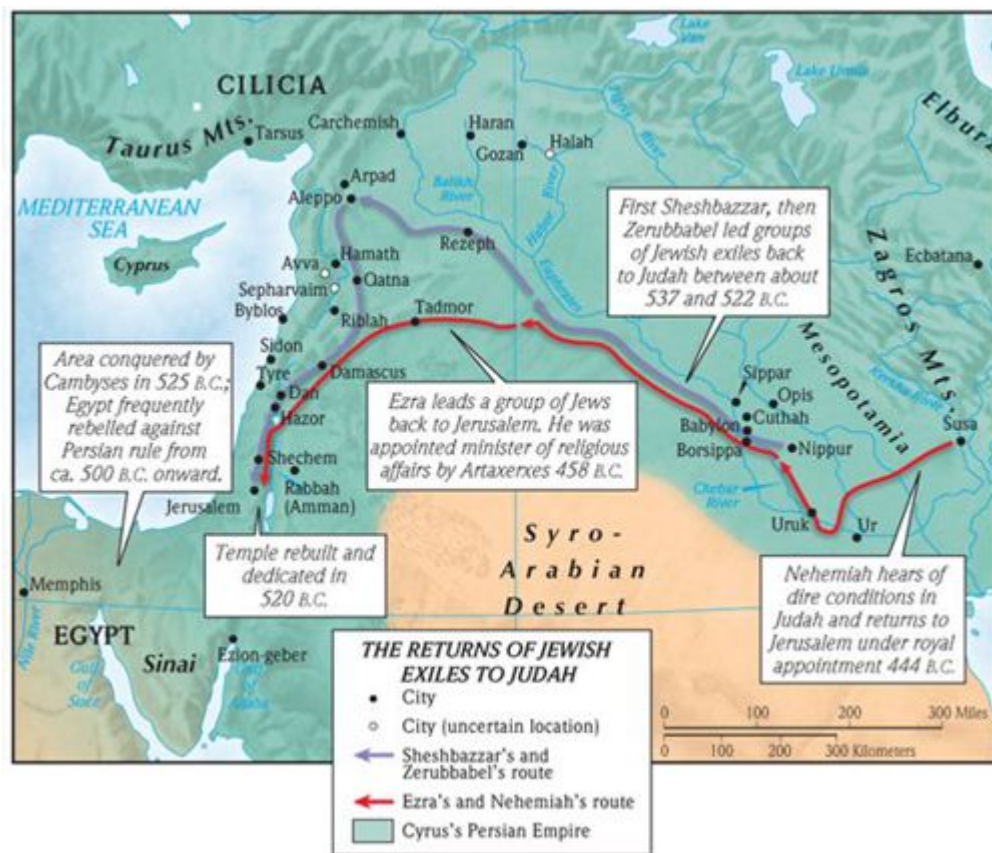

Ezra begins with the story of Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel and the first Jews to return to Jerusalem from captivity in 538 B.C. Their main objective was to rebuild the temple. Its foundation was laid in 536 B.C. Then there was a long delay. Haggai and Zechariah (Ezra 5:1) in 520 B.C. had encouraged the people to finish the project, which they did in 515 B.C. (6:14–15), and they “celebrated the dedication of this house of God with joy” (6:16 NASB).

Almost 60 years passed before Ezra went to Jerusalem (458 B.C.), six decades of silence. He left Persia with “the copy of the decree which King Artaxerxes gave to Ezra the priest, the scribe” (7:11 NASB), giving him unusual power and authority (7:12–26). As he “viewed the people, and the priests, and [he] found there none of the sons of Levi” (8:15). These were essential for his teaching program to implement the law of God in Jerusalem. During a three-day delay more than 200 ministers “for the house of our God” (8:17) were enlisted. Four months later the group, probably less than 2,000, arrived in the Holy City.

Soon Ezra was informed of the most glaring sin of the Jews, intermarriage with non-Jews, those not in covenant relation with Yahweh (9:2). Ezra was greatly upset (9:3–4). He prayed (9:6–15). In assembly people reached what must have been a heartrending decision: “Let us make a covenant with our God to put away all the wives and their children” (10:3 NASB). The book concludes with the carrying out of this decision (chap. 10).

Ezra's story reaches its climax in Neh. 8–10. There he read from “the book of the law of Moses, which the LORD had commanded to Israel” (Neh. 8:1). A great revival resulted.

Ezra's greatest contribution was his teaching, establishing, and implementing “the book of the law of the LORD” (Neh. 9:3) among the Jews. Ezra evidenced strong theology; he believed in the sovereignty of God, who could use a Cyrus, an Artaxerxes, and a Darius to accomplish His purposes. He believed in the faithfulness of God, who brought home the exiles who wanted to return. He believed in the sacredness and practicality of the Scriptures; he read them to his people and insisted that their teachings be carried out. He was a person of prayer; note his long confessional prayers (Ezra 9:5–15; Neh. 9:6–37). He was a preacher: he used a pulpit (Neh. 8:4); he publicly read the Scriptures; and he helped to interpret them to his congregation (8:8).

- I. God's Worship Must Be Restored (1:1–6:22).
 - A. God can use a pagan “to fulfill the word of the LORD” (1:1–4).
 - B. God's people respond to God's ways (1:5–6).
 - C. God will recover and reclaim His possessions (1:7–11).

- D. God's people, by name and as individuals, are important (2:1–67).
- E. God's people are generous givers for a good cause (2:68–70).
- F. God's people worship, regardless of the circumstances (3:1–6).
- G. God's people will give and organize to get a job done (3:7–9).
- H. God's people praise Him in success or in disappointment (3:10–13).
- I. God's people must reject some offers of help (4:1–3).
- J. God's work can be opposed and stopped (4:4–24).
- K. God's work and workers must be encouraged (5:1–2).
- L. God's work and workers are in His watch care (5:3–5).
- M. God's work may get pagan authorization and support (5:6–6:12).
- N. God's work must ultimately be completed (6:13–15).
- O. God's work must be dedicated publicly with joyful celebration (6:16–22).

II. God's Word Must Be Followed (7:1–10:44).

- A. God's Word needs skilled teachers and helpers (7:1–7).
- B. God's Word elicits commitment (7:8–10).
- C. God's work accepts all the help it can get from many different sources (7:11–26).
- D. God blesses His workers and expects to be praised (7:27–28).
- E. God's work warrants good records (8:1–14).
- F. God's work must enlist trained workers (8:15–20).
- G. God's work calls for faith, prayer, and humility (8:21–23).
- H. God's work warrants division of responsibility (8:24–30).
- I. God's work necessitates good stewardship and generous sacrifice (8:31–36).
- J. Gross violations of God's Word must be acknowledged (9:1–5).
- K. Acknowledged sin leads to prayer and confession with deep theological insights (9:6–15).
- L. God's grace and human confession call for active commitment (10:1–4).
- M. God's people must unite (10:5–9).
- N. God's call for the separated life must be made clear by God's leaders to God's people (10:10–11).
- O. God's way utilizes practical solutions for difficult problems (10:12–17).
- P. God's way expects “fruit consistent with repentance” (Matt. 3:8 HCSB) from all who are guilty (10:18–44).

EZRAH [Ēz' rā] Modern translation spelling of Ezra in 1 Chron. 4:17 to reflect different final letter in Hebrew spelling. This Ezra is a descendant of Judah about whom nothing else is known. The spelling of his name may be a Hebrew form, whereas the more common spelling is Aramaic. See Ezra.

EZRAHITE [Ēz' rā hit] Term used to describe the family relationships of Ethan, a famous wise man (1 Kings 4:31). The precise meaning of the Hebrew word is debated. It may mean one born in the land with full citizenship rights and point to a Canaanite origin for Ethan. A related word appears in Exod. 12:19,49; Lev. 17:15; Josh. 8:33, and other places. See Ethan.

EZRI [Ēz' rī] Personal name meaning “my help.” Supervisor of royal farm labor under David (1 Chron. 27:26).

Fish mosaic from the church of Santa Maria della Vittoria, Rome, 15th century.

FABLE Short, fictitious story that uses animals or inanimate objects as characters to teach ethical or practical lessons. Typically, the characters are portrayed as having human personality traits that are good or evil. The practical or moral lesson is obvious in the story when these character traits lead to either failure or success. Fables are rarely found in the Bible, but there are two clear examples in the OT. The fable of the trees of the forest selecting a king (Judg. 9:8–15) is designed to warn Israel of the dangers in selecting a weak and ruthless king. In 2 Kings 14:8–10 (2 Chron. 25:17–19), there is a fable addressed to Amaziah, king of Judah, about the folly of arrogance. In this story a thistle thinks that it is equal to the giant cedars of Lebanon and gets trampled by a wild beast of the forest.

FACE The front of a person's head. In the Bible several words are translated as “face.” In the OT panlm is the most common and has the actual meaning of “face.” Aph (nose) and ayin (eyes, aspect) are also at times translated as face. In the NT the words used are opsis and prosopon.

The word “face” has a variety of meanings. It is used literally to refer to the face of man or animals (Gen. 30:40), seraphim (Isa. 6:2), and the face of Christ (Matt. 17:2). Figuratively, it is used in reference to the face of the earth (Gen. 1:29), waters (Gen. 1:2), sky (Matt. 16:3), and moon (Job 26:9). Also, the word “face” is used theologically with regard to the “presence of God” (Gen. 32:30). Face may be the physical “face” or the surface seen. Being “face to face” (literally, “eye to eye”) is being squared off with each other, front to front, and fully visible (Num. 14:14). The face (eye) of the earth is the visible surface of the earth (Exod. 10:5,15), and the face of the waters is that surface which is seen (Gen. 1:2).

The word “face” may stand for the entire countenance. It is in the face that the emotions are expressed. The face of the sky expresses the weather, stormy and red, or fair (Matt. 16:2–3). Bowing one's face (nose or face) expresses reverence or awe (Num. 22:31; Luke 5:12). Bowing one's face (nose) toward the ground also includes the involvement of the entire person

(1 Sam. 20:41; Matt. 26:39), indicating complete submission. When angry or sad, one's countenance (face) will fall (Gen. 4:5). "A joyful heart makes a face cheerful" (Prov. 15:13 HCSB). To express displeasure or disgust, the face is averted or "hid" (Ezek. 39:23; Ps. 102:2); to "seek his face" is to desire an audience (Ps. 105:4). To "set my face against" is to express hostility (Jer. 21:10), while turning away the face shows rejection (Ps. 132:10). To "set their faces to" indicates determination (Jer. 42:17; Luke 9:51). The wicked man "puts on a bold face" (Prov. 21:29 HCSB), and "covered his face with his fat" (Job 15:27 NASB). When in mourning, the face is covered (2 Sam. 19:4).

Because the face reflects the personality and character of a person, the word is frequently translated as "person" (Deut. 28:50; 2 Sam. 17:11; 2 Cor. 2:10), or "presence" (Exod. 10:11). Sometimes it is translated merely as the indefinite pronoun "many" (2 Cor. 1:11). Frequently, the word "face" is translated with the phrase "respect persons" (KJV), or "being partial" (RSV), (Deut. 1:17; Prov. 24:23; Matt. 22:16; Gal. 2:6).

Many idioms and phrases also apply to "the face of God." His face "shines" (Ps. 4:6), indicating good will and blessing. He sets His face against sinners (Lev. 17:10), and hides His face (Ps. 13:1). Frequently, the word "face" is used in a theological sense with regard to the person or presence of God. Sometimes "face" is translated as "presence" (Gen. 4:16; Exod. 33:14; 2 Thess. 1:9). In the tabernacle, the "shewbread" (KJV) or "Bread of the Presence" (RSV), was a local manifestation of the presence of God. The literal Hebrew reads "bread of the faces." At other times, other words are substituted although the direct meaning is the "face of God." Moses asked to see God's "glory" (Exod. 33:18), but God answered that "you cannot see My face" (Exod. 33:20). The correlation indicates that in seeing God's face, one would experience His actual presence, and thereby be exposed to God's nature and character. Sinful and nonholy beings cannot survive being in God's holy presence without God's grace or merciful intervention (Exod. 33:17–23). Thus Moses (Exod. 3:6), Elijah (1 Kings 19:13), and the seraphim (Isa. 6:2) hide their faces in God's presence. See Glory; Shewbread; Presence of God; Eye.

FACETS NRSV, TEV translation of the Hebrew ayinim, meaning small plane surfaces, especially those on a cut gem (Zech. 3:9). The basic idea of the Hebrew ayin, as reflected in most English versions, is eye. By extension the root can designate a face or surface, hence the translation “facet.” Some commentators understand the Hebrew root to mean springs of water (cp. Gen. 16:7). The translation “eyes” points ahead to “the seven eyes of God which roam throughout the world” (Zech. 4:10), a symbol of the omniscience or omnipresence of God. The translation “springs” fits well with the idea of the removal of iniquity (3:9b). The eschatological spring or stream is well-known in visions of the temple (Joel 3:18; Ezek. 47; Zech. 13:1; 14:8). Zechariah 3:9, however, uses the masculine plural form rather than the feminine form used in other references to springs. Perhaps the masculine form is an Aramaism. Some scholars believe the stone was a stone slab occupying the place held by the ark of the covenant in the first temple. In this case the seven eyes represent the full presence of God in a way corresponding to the ark of the covenant.

FAIR HAVENS An open bay on the southern coast of Crete near the city of Lasea. Protected only by small islands, it did not appear to be a safe harbor for winter, so the sailors of the ship carrying Paul to Rome decided to try to reach Phoenix. They refused to listen to Paul's warnings and were caught in a ferocious storm (Acts 27:8–20).

FAIRNESS Prerequisite for wisdom (Prov. 2:9–10) and therefore an important value for life (Ps. 99:4; Prov. 1:2–3). The prophets linked fairness with righteousness (Isa. 11:4; cp. Ps. 98:9) and saw that when fairness was lacking, life became tenuous and uncertain (Isa. 59:9–11; Mic. 3:9–12). Biblical persons who exhibited fairness in their words or actions include Jacob (Gen. 31:38–41), Solomon (1 Kings 3:16–27), Jesus (John 7:53–8:11) and the thief on the cross (Luke 23:40–41).

Many injunctions in the Mosaic law are based on the principle of lex talionis (“an eye for an eye”). This principle holds that a person's misdeeds were to be punished by actions commensurate with their crime (Exod.

21:23–25; Lev. 24:17–21; Deut. 19:16–21). Later biblical writers understood that reciprocity also attained for behavior which was merely selfish or unwise but not criminal (Ps. 7:15–16; Prov. 26:27; Matt. 7:2; 2 Cor. 11:15; Gal. 6:7–10).

Biblical injunctions uphold fairness in matters of business (Lev. 19:36; Deut. 25:15; 1 Tim. 5:18), law (Exod. 23:3; Deut. 16:19), speech (Exod. 23:1), and family relationships (e.g., Deut. 21:15–17; Eph. 6:1–9).

God's fairness in His treatment of sin was understood by the biblical writers in different ways. During the early days of ancient Israel, God's fairness was viewed through the concept of corporate solidarity, so that the responsibility for a person's actions carried through to his family (Exod. 34:6–7). By the time of the exile and in the NT, responsibility for sin was seen to be an individual matter (Ezek. 18:10–32) and God's judgment of individuals as individuals was accepted as fair.

FAITH, FAITHFULNESS Contemporary English word “faith” derived from the Latin fides. Today faith denotes trust. Faith does not function as a verb in contemporary English; the verb “to believe” has replaced the verb “to faith.” The English noun “faithfulness” denotes trustworthiness or dependability.

The Biblical Concept The concept of faith has been radically redefined in some philosophical and theological circles during the past century. Those definitions rarely address the complexities of the biblical concept, a concept in which the whole person, the physical world, God's Word, and God Himself play crucial roles. Those alternative definitions often do not grasp the objective and subjective characteristics of biblical faith.

Throughout the Scriptures faith is the trustful human response to God's self-revelation via His words and His actions. God initiates the relationship between Himself and human beings. He expects people to trust Him; failure to trust Him was in essence the first sin (Gen. 3:1–7). Since the fall of humanity God nurtures and inspires trust in Him through what He says and does for the benefit of people who need Him. He provides evidence of His trustworthiness by acting and speaking in the external world to make Himself knowable to people who need Him. Thus, biblical faith is a kind of limited personal knowledge of God.

Hebrew Terminology The most significant Hebrew word for faith is aman, a root word that denotes reliability, stability, and firmness. Aman concretely meant to support or to uphold, as for example the strong arms of a parent would uphold an infant. Those arms are sure, certain, and firm. Forms of this root were used metaphorically to describe faith (a human response to God) and faithfulness (a virtue of God and his servants). When employed to describe relationships between God and people, aman is used to express a complex concept. It describes both the subjective and objective nature of trust in God and an objective quality of God Himself. God, who exists objectively outside of human beings, receives trust generated from within individuals (Deut. 7:9). He and His words are objectively faithful, constant, and reliable (Ps. 119:86). God enables people to possess these objective virtues, faithfulness and reliability (Josh. 24:14; Isa. 7:9).

Another significant Hebrew word used to convey the idea of faith is yare', usually translated “to fear.” Yare' occurs more often in the OT than aman, although the two express very similar concepts. To fear God is to believe Him with a reverential awe, even to the point that emotional trepidation occurs. To fear Him is to maintain a firm conviction that the Lord's directives are reliable (Ps. 119:89–91), protective (Ps. 33:18–19), and beneficial to the believer (Ps. 31:19). Someone who fears God dreads disappointing Him, but the fear of the Lord produces joy and fulfillment in the life of the one who fears (Eccles. 12:13). “To fear the LORD” is used synonymously with “serve Him in sincerity and truth” in Josh. 24:14. An element of human responsibility resides in this fear; “choose for yourselves today whom you will serve” (24:15). God does not force faith upon unwilling people. He presents His expectations and promised benefits to people, but their freedom to choose and to receive the consequences of their choices remain (Deut. 30:19). Refusal to choose Him can be followed by God's hardening the unbeliever's resistance (Exod. 10:20).

Like aman, the Hebrew root yare' reveals much about the objective and subjective characteristics of genuine faith. Old Testament authors used “the fear of the LORD” to underscore the importance of submission to God through what He has revealed objectively; this submission should occur subjectively in the minds, wills, and emotions of people who trust God's word. This submission results in objective behavior that reflects God's character.

As the OT period progressed, God gave more information about how He planned to empower more people with genuine faith or “the fear of the LORD.” Through Jeremiah, for example, God predicted that He would make an everlasting covenant through which he would enable people to fear him forever (Jer. 32:40). God describes a covenant in which He will write his law on the hearts of His people and allow them all to know Him personally (31:33–34). God's description reveals that to fear Him is to know Him personally. Such a relationship empowers people to please Him. OT prophets decried human inability to maintain this kind of fear toward the Lord.

Theme of Faith in the Old Testament The OT provides a clear definition of faith in the context of the unfolding purpose of God to redeem. God makes faith possible by providing for human beings verbal information about Himself and His plans; this information is connected to His redemptive actions in the world. These words and actions combine to offer an objective basis for the faith (Exod. 4:29–31). His words interpret and explain His saving acts so that people may receive from Him the blessings that the acts make available (Exod. 12:21–28; Deut. 11:1–11; and Isa. 55:1–3). Just as one may know another human by the words and actions of that human, so God has chosen to become knowable through His words and actions.

A consistent theme of salvation by faith can be traced through God's acts and deeds in the OT. People were saved by faith in God's self-revelation during that period, just as they would be saved through faith in His self-revelation during the NT period and beyond. God has always required faith as the proper response to His self-revelation.

Two pivotal OT passages reveal the theme of salvation by faith. Abram was proclaimed “righteous” by God when Abram believed God's promise (Gen. 15:6). In this verse a form of aman is used to describe Abram's response to what God said He planned to do for Abram. Abram linked himself to God through that promise, becoming convinced internally of the reliability of the promise-maker. Abram's confidence prompted God to label Abram “righteous,” completely acceptable in relationship to God. Abraham would go on to prove God's label was accurate. After years of seeing God's faithfulness, Abraham would obey God's call to sacrifice Isaac, to which Yahweh said “now I know you fear God” (Gen. 22:12). Abraham's faith was the kind of faith that withstood a serious test, showing therefore that Abraham's faith was synonymous with the fear of the Lord.

A second thematic statement appears in Hab. 2:4, “the righteous will live by his faith.” The nation of Judah was facing an enormous threat to its future existence, the Babylonian army, sent by God to judge Judah. But God offered a promise that the righteous will survive and thrive through the judgment. Because they believe the God who promises, they are “righteous.” Habakkuk 2:4 would be interpreted as a scriptural thematic statement by the Apostle Paul in the NT and seen as a hermeneutical key to understanding how God consistently relates to people. He justifies them by faith.

Genesis 15:6 and Hab. 2:4 unveil a grand soteriological principle: God saves people (whenever or wherever they may live) who trust sincerely both Him and what He says about how they can properly relate to Him. Both verses reveal that saving faith in the OT is viewed as a response to a verbal revelation from God about Himself, about His plan for the future, and about the accessibility of God and His future to a human in need. This verbal revelation is propositional; it is communicated in statements made by God. Those statements contain claims about the present and the future. God's modus operandi during the OT and NT periods was to make Himself knowable through words about how people can relate properly to Him. Those words are not the object of the believer's faith; God is the object. But His words mediate faith in Him. His words guide people to Him. Without the words, no one would know how to respond properly to Him. Old Testament believers praised God for revealing His word of salvation (Ps. 56:4).

New Testament Amplification The dominant NT term for faith is the Koine Greek word pistis, usually translated “faith.” It conveys the idea of trust, a firm internal conviction regarding the truthfulness of someone or some claim. The verb form, pisteuo, is usually translated, “I believe” or “I trust.” Pistis and pisteuo in the NT correspond to the OT terms aman and yare'. Pistis also appears in the NT with the definite article to describe particular Christian beliefs, termed “the faith.”

New Testament writers often show continuity with the OT's concept of faith. Paul argues that Abram's experience provides a model for how God continues to save by faith (Rom. 4). Paul's citation of “the righteous will live by faith” (HCSB) supports his arguments in his letter to the Romans (1:17) and the Galatians (3:11). Just as was true prior to the coming of Christ, it is impossible after the coming of Christ for someone without faith to please God (Heb. 11:6).

Faith in the NT continues to be a personal trustful response to God's self-revelation, although the content of that self-revelation has increased dramatically with the life, ministry, death, and resurrection of Christ. In the NT faith toward God responds to that which God has revealed verbally and actively in Jesus Christ. As the incarnate Son of God, Jesus is the perfect means by which one may know God (John 17:3).

In words and in actions God the Father made available in Christ His personal and propositional revelation. In the death and resurrection of the Son, the Father communicated His love, His justice, and His mercy (Rom. 5:8). These events, especially the resurrection of Christ, were interpreted by the NT writers as evidence that God had declared that Jesus is the unique Son of God (Rom. 1:4).

God communicated not only through His actions in Christ; He also communicated verbally. Jesus appointed apostles as His personal representatives (Matt. 10:2–4). In the power and under the leadership of God's Spirit, the apostles broadcast through their teachings and/or writings this propositional revelation. For example, John states plainly that his Gospel was written to help people believe (John 20:31). God provided actions and words to enable people to understand what He had done and can do for them in Christ.

Underscoring the objective nature of Christian faith, “the faith” was used by NT authors when referring to the essential Christian doctrines or propositions to which believers held (Acts 6:7; 14:22; Gal. 1:23; 3:25). Those doctrines help to mediate the object of the faith, God in Christ. Paul calls upon his readers to examine whether their beliefs are consistent with “the faith” (2 Cor. 13:5).

Role of Faith in Justification The euangelion or gospel, embodies the core beliefs by which saving faith in Christ can be mediated and whereby He can be known. According to 1 Cor. 15 the euangelion's objective veracity was evidenced by Jesus' postresurrection appearances. The Apostle Paul challenged readers to examine eyewitness evidence for the resurrection of Christ (15:1–6). God makes an enormous amount of evidence available from historical witnesses to the resurrection. Jesus did pronounce a blessing on those who believe without seeing His resurrected body, but eyewitnesses to that resurrected body were made available by Him (John 20:29; Acts 1:8). See Justification.

Paul was even willing to concede that, if Jesus did not rise from the dead, then Christian faith is meaningless and useless (1 Cor. 15:14–19). Christ's resurrection would be evidence that God wants people to believe that Jesus is the solution to human sinfulness, but without the resurrection people cannot rightly draw such a radical conclusion. Thus, the resurrection of Jesus serves at the primary historical basis for Christian faith.

Faith in Christ is based on the evidence of the testimony of eyewitnesses, but the evidence is not an end in itself. The gospel must be heard and understood before faith can happen; faith occurs when someone moves through the words and the evidence and “calls upon” or asks Christ to save (Rom. 10:9–13). To ask Christ to save is to trust what God says the death of Christ makes available, particularly regarding forgiveness and freedom from sin's power. When God saves, the believer internally identifies Christ's death as the death of his or her own sin (Rom. 6:1–14), making genuine and consistent obedience to God possible for the future. This is the kind of faith that will prove its genuineness by the transformed life God produces through it, as occurred with Abraham (James 2:14–26). Saving faith is never merely a superficial or verbal response. Nor is it merely an intellectual acceptance of the claims of the gospel. The kind of faith by which God justifies sinners moves through acceptance of those claims to Christ Himself.

An element of subjective personal choice is retained in the NT concept of faith (Luke 13:34). People still must choose, but this subjective choice should be understood in light of the objective elements that guide and empower the choice. Underscoring the subjective nature of the choice, saving faith occurs within the person's "heart," where the Holy Spirit illuminates the person's need of what Christ has done and can do for the person (Rom. 10:9–10; 1 Thess. 1:5). Recognition of need always precedes saving faith. God's Spirit enables someone to understand how Christ's death and resurrection were for the hearer. God gives the unbeliever the capacity to choose to trust God through what He says through His human witnesses about Christ. God's Spirit also bears witness by personally applying the words of the gospel internally to the hearer. The Spirit activates, guides, and empowers the choice.

If God left humans totally untouched by the work of the Spirit, then humans would naturally choose against God (Rom. 1–3). The Spirit "gives" Christian faith, enabling people to trust what God says He has done and will do to save. Faith, therefore, is a spiritual gift (Rom. 12:3). No one will be able to boast of self-produced saving faith; God chooses to enable some people to believe (Eph. 2:8–9). He alone deserves praise for producing faith within people. A paradoxical tension between divine sovereignty and human responsibility is maintained in the NT's depiction of saving faith.

Role of Faith in Sanctification God allows the testing of faith in order to sanctify the believer, as occurred with Abraham (James 1:2–8; 2:14–26).

God uses trials to test and to grow the quality of the faith of believers, to prove that His justification of them was an accurate appraisal. He desires that they grow in their relationship to Him that He might produce Christ's virtue of faithfulness within them (Matt. 25:21). As Christians learn to trust what God says they possess in Christ, they can discover freedom from sin and the power to glorify God as Christ produces his character in them (Eph. 1:15–23). God's Spirit enables sanctification in the same way that He enables justification, through faith in what God says He has done and will do in Christ (Gal. 3:1–5; 5:25).

Faith yields in the believer a confidence or sense of assurance as he or she continues to trust God through His promises (Heb. 11:1). This confidence becomes possible when a believer can identify with the help of the Spirit of God ways God has transformed him or her (Rom. 8:13–16; Phil. 3:10; 1 John 2:3; 3:14; 5:18–20). New Testament authors unashamedly refer to this confident faith as a knowledge of God, albeit a partial knowledge (1 Cor. 13:9). Only when Christ returns and consummates His kingdom will faith be unnecessary for the Christian. Then this knowledge of God will not be partial.

The Holy Spirit gives to some Christians a special charisma or grace-gift of faith whereby they discern God's will and trust God accordingly in particular situations where His will has not been objectively revealed (1 Cor. 12:9). For example, some Christians have been given the ability to discern God's will to heal a sick person and to pray successfully for the healing (James 5:15). All Christians have a gift of faith (Rom. 12:3) but not the gift (charisma) of faith, given to some for the purpose of ministry.

Conclusion The God of the Bible has consistently related to people via trust in what He says and does. Biblical faith is a complex idea; God, His word, His actions, the whole human being, and the physical world all play critical roles. When saving faith occurs, God has enabled someone to know Him through His revelation of Himself in words and actions in Christ. God Himself activates faith in the hearer of His word, enabling that hearer to become faithful in Christ, just as He is faithful (Rev. 19:11).

FALCON (NIV, NASB) (Deut. 14:13; Lev. 11:14; Job 28:7) See Eagle; Vulture.

FALL Traditional name for the first sin of Adam and Eve that brought judgment upon both nature and mankind.

In Genesis people are the dominion-havers created in the image of God (Gen. 1:26–28). Man and woman are placed on earth with a commandment to obey (Gen. 1:28). The biblical understanding of dominion suggests a serving stewardship rather than mere power (Matt. 20:25–28).

Sin in the Garden Genesis pictures humans as the special creation of God (2:7) placed in the special garden created by God (2:8–15). Three features are crucial for understanding the human role in the garden: (1) Adam was put in the garden to “cultivate it and keep it” (2:15 NASB). God provided this vocation for man's fulfillment. (2) The first people were granted great freedom and discretion in the garden. This freedom permitted them to take from the goodness of God's creation (2:16). (3) Yet their freedom and discretion were limited. God prohibited the taking of the fruit from the tree of knowledge of good and evil (2:17). Scholars have pointed out that these three features belong uniquely to humans. Each person faces vocation, freedom, and yet prohibition. Full humanity is experienced only when all three of these are maintained.

The “knowledge of good and evil” would make humans godlike in some way (Gen. 3:5,22). Some Bible students understand the tree to hold all knowledge—that is the complete range of experience. Others claim the tree provides knowledge of a moral nature. Some claim the acquired knowledge was simply sexual experience.

The tree's purpose within the narrative provides a clue toward a more satisfactory explanation. The tree was the object and symbol of God's authority. The tree reminded Adam and Eve that their freedom was not absolute but had to be exercised in dependence upon God. In prideful rebellion the couple grasped for the capacity to be completely selflegislating—establishing an absolute self-directing independence. Such absolute dominion belongs only to God. Their ambition affected every dimension of human experience. For example, they claimed the right to decide what is good and evil.

The Serpent The serpent made a sudden intrusion into the story. The serpent is identified in Genesis only as a creature. Theological reflection has identified him as an instrument of Satan and, thus, legitimately cursed and pictured as the enemy of woman's seed (Gen. 3:14–15). Later Scripture also declares that Satan is the ultimate tempter (1 John 3:8; Rev. 12:9). His presence, however, does not diminish mankind's responsibility. Scripture stipulates that man cannot blame his sin on demonic temptation (James 1:12–15).

The serpent began the conversation with a question that obviously distorted or at least extended God's order not to eat of the tree (Gen. 3:1). The questioner invited the woman to enter into a conversation about God and to treat Him and His word as objects to be considered and evaluated. Moreover, the serpent painted God as one who sadistically and arbitrarily placed a prohibition before the couple to stifle their enjoyment of the garden.

The woman apparently felt inclined to defend God's instruction. In her response to the serpent, she included a citation of God's command. The text does not tell us how she or the snake came to know God's command. Adam may have passed on this information that he initially received prior to woman's creation (Gen. 2:17–18). She may thus represent all who receive the word of God through “human” instrumentality but who are nevertheless called to believe (cp. John 20:29). She responded with a restatement of God's permission to eat freely of the garden provision (Gen. 3:2). She then told of God's prohibition of that one tree in the middle of the garden. Perhaps anxiety over doubting God's character moved her then to add to God's own words; she extended the instruction to include touching the tree, thereby making her own law. It is interesting that the first challenge to God's word did not involve deletion but addition by both the serpent and the woman. Mankind's first surrender to temptation began with doubting God's instruction and His loving character.

The woman's willingness to judge and her addition to God's instruction, though seemingly harmless, permitted the serpent boldly to continue with a direct attack on God's character. He declared that the couple would not really die. Instead, he argued that God's motive was to keep the couple from being like God. The serpent claimed that the phrases “your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil” (Gen. 3:5 NRSV, NIV) are God's reasons for giving the prohibitive command; in reality, these phrases express the human reasons for breaking the command. The couple was unhappy with their freedom as long as they thought more could be had. They sought unrestricted freedom—to be responsible to no one, not even God. The serpent seemed sure that eating would produce equality not death.

The woman stood before the tree. Crudely, she saw the fruit was good for food. In a more refined manner she judged it to be pleasant to the eye. More appealing to her vanity still was the newfound faith that it would bring knowledge (Gen. 3:6; cp. 1 John 2:16). She ate of the fruit and gave it to Adam who ate as well.

Results of Sin Sin had immediate results in the couple's relationship; the “self-first” and “self-only” attitude displayed toward God affected the way they looked at one another. The mutual trust and intimacy of the one-flesh bond (Gen. 2:24) was ravaged by distrust. This does not suggest that the knowledge of good and evil was sexual awareness. Intercourse was the command and blessing of God prior to the fall (Gen. 1:28). In the absence of mutual trust, complete intimacy implies complete vulnerability (Gen. 3:7).

The couple also felt compelled to hide from God when they heard Him walking in the garden. When loving trust characterized the couple's attitude, they were apparently comfortable in God's presence. After their sin, shame appropriately marked their relationships—both human and divine (Gen. 3:8). The sinners could not remain hidden. God pursued, asking, “Where are you?” (Gen. 3:9 NRSV). This may be a normal question, but some see it as God's sorrowful anticipation of what follows. Sinners finally must speak to God. Adam admitted that God's presence now provoked fear, and human shame provoked hiding (Gen. 3:10).

God's next question drew the man's attention away from his plight to his sin (Gen. 3:11). The couple had to face their Maker. The man admitted his sin but only after emphatically reminding God that the woman was instrumental in his partaking. Woman shared equally in the deed, but she quickly blamed the deceiving serpent (Gen. 3:12–13). Along with shame, blame comes quite naturally to humankind.

God moved immediately to punish. The serpent was not interviewed because he was not an image-bearer in whom God sought a representation and relationship. The snake's (literally) low status is symbolic of the humiliation God would bring on those who oppose Him. The ensuing strife would not merely occur on a natural level between the snake and other animals (v. 14) or between the snake and humans (v. 15). The “seed” of the woman is representative of the Messiah, and the “seed” of the serpent represents Satan and his followers. Thus, a fuller meaning of the verse promises Christ's ultimate victory over Satan (Gen. 3:14–15).

The woman's punishment was linked to her distinctive role in the fulfillment of God's command (Gen. 1:28). Her privilege to share in God's creative work was frustrated by intense pain. Despite this pain she would nevertheless desire intimacy with her husband, but her desire would be frustrated by sin. She would long to control her husband, though God had given him the role of “ruling” over her (Gen. 3:16).

Adam's punishment also involved the frustration of his service. He was guilty of following the woman's sinful advice and eating of the forbidden tree (Gen. 3:17). The fruitful efficiency known prior to the fall was lost. Now even his extreme toil would be frustrated by the cursed earth. The earth was apparently cursed because it was within Adam's domain. This corporate mentality is strange to us, but biblical writers recognize nature's need for redemption (Isa. 24; Rom. 8:19–23; Col. 1:15–20).

Results—Epilogue Man's prerogative to name woman (Gen. 3:20) was a sign of the fallen order, but hope persists. Mankind can carry on because the woman has the capacity to bear children. Hope ultimately emerged from divine determination to preserve His creation. Some may expect God to retreat and leave the sinful people alone to taste the misery that would follow, but grace-giving Yahweh provided clothing for fallen mankind (Gen. 3:20–21).

Yahweh acknowledged the partial truth of the serpent's claim: Adam's and Eve's autonomy had made them like the divine (Gen. 3:5,22). In these circumstances, access to the tree of life is inappropriate. Numerous questions regarding the conditional nature of the tree of life are left unanswered here (Ezek. 47:12; Rev. 2:7; 22:2,14,19). As a tragic judgment, the sinful pair was driven out of the garden, intended by God as His dwelling place. Guardian cherubim protected the garden and the tree (Gen. 3:22–24) and, thus, graciously protected people from entering into an infinite period of struggle. The serpent's lie concerning death (Gen. 3:4) became visible. Human sin brought death (Gen. 3:19,22). Some readers question why death did not come “on that day” as God had apparently promised (Gen. 2:17), but the Hebrew expression may mean simply “when” (NIV; cp. REB). One should also be reminded of God's grace to allow life to continue and the Hebrew understanding that death involves separation from God as much as physical death (Job 7:21; Ps. 88:5,10–12; Isa. 38:18–19).

New Testament The NT writers assumed the fallen state of both humans and nature. Both groan for redemption (Rom. 8:19–23). When comparing Adam and Christ, Paul declared that sin and death gained entrance into the world through Adam and that sin and death are now common to all people (Rom. 5:12; 6:23). Adam is pictured as a representative of mankind, all of whom share in his penalty (Rom. 5:19).

FALLOW DEER (1 Kings 4:23 KJV) See Deer.

FALLOW GROUND Virgin soil or else soil that has not recently been planted (Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:12). The central thrust of the prophetic message is clear: the nation Israel, “Jacob,” is to return to Yahweh by “cultivating” the covenant values of righteousness and steadfast love. The precise significance of the fallow ground is unclear. Perhaps the unplowed earth represents Israel's failure to do what was needed to keep the covenant. Or perhaps the virgin soil represents a new relationship with God. Here the call is for Israel to abandon the worn-out fields of unrighteousness (symbolized by thorns) and to move on to the new, fertile (Prov. 13:23) ground of covenant living.

FALSE APOSTLES Designation for Paul's opponents in 2 Cor. 11:13; also designated deceitful workers (11:13) and servants of Satan (11:15). Such “apostles” were characterized as preaching a “rival Jesus” (likely a lordly, miracle-working “success story”), possessing a different spirit (a self-seeking motivation evidenced by a different lifestyle than Paul's), and a different gospel which disregarded the cross (and its corollary of suffering for those who follow Christ). The false apostles appear to have been Jewish Christians (11:22), well-trained in speech (11:6), who perhaps claimed “visions and revelations of the Lord” (12:1) as authenticating marks of apostleship (cp. the role of Paul's Damascus Road experience, Acts 9:15; 22:14–15; 26:16–19). Though they cut in on Paul's missionary territory, the “false apostles” are characterized as boasting (2 Cor. 10:13–16) according to human standards. Their leadership style was oppressive (11:20). In contrast to Paul, these false apostles relied on the Corinthian Christians for financial support (11:7–11,20; 12:14). They perhaps accused Paul of being “paid what he was worth.” Paul countered that suffering for Christ was the mark of true apostleship (11:23). Weakness, not dominating power, reveals God's power (11:30; 12:5,9). If the “super-apostles” (11:5; 12:11 NRSV, REB, NIV) are identified with the leaders of the Jerusalem church, they should be distinguished from the false apostles at Corinth. The latter may have claimed the authority of the former.

The false apostles of Rev. 2:2 are characterized as evil men and liars. They should perhaps be identified with the Nicolaitans active at Ephesus

(2:6) and Pergamos (2:15), and with the followers of the “false prophetess” at Thyatira (2:20).

FALSE CHRISTS Imposters claiming to be the Messiah (Christ in Greek). Jesus associated the appearance of messianic pretenders with the fall of Jerusalem (Matt. 24:23–26; Mark 13:21–22). Jesus warned His followers to be skeptical of those who point to signs and omens to authenticate their false messianic claims. Jesus also urged disbelief of those claiming the Messiah was waiting in the wilderness or was in “the inner rooms” (perhaps a reference to the inner chambers of the temple complex). Josephus mentioned several historical figures who might be regarded as false christs: (1) Theudas, who appeared when Fadus was procurator (A.D. 44–46) and summoned the people to the Jordan River wilderness with the promise that he would divide the Jordan like Joshua and begin a new conquest of the land; (2) various “imposters” during the term of Felix (A.D. 52–59) who led crowds into the wilderness with promises of signs and wonders; (3) an “imposter” during the term of Festus (A.D. 60–62) who promised deliverance and freedom from the miseries of Roman rule for those who would follow him into the wilderness; (4) Manahem ben Judah (alias “the Galilean”) during the term of Florus (A.D. 64–66) who came to Jerusalem “like a king” and laid siege to the city. These messianic imposters and the barely distinguishable false prophets repeatedly urged the Jewish people to take up armed resistance to Rome or to stay in Jerusalem to fight. In contrast, Jesus urged His disciples to attempt to save themselves by fleeing the city. The Christian inhabitants of Jerusalem remembered this advice when the war with Rome broke out (A.D. 66) and fled to safety in Pella in Transjordan. Some interpreters expect false christs to arise before the future coming of Christ.

FALSE PROPHET Person who spreads false messages and teachings, claiming to speak God's words.

Old Testament While the term “false prophet” does not occur in the OT, references to false prophets are clear. The pages of the OT are filled with men and women who fit the description of a false prophet given in Jer. 14:14 (NASB): “The prophets are prophesying falsehood in My name. I have neither sent them nor commanded them nor spoken to them; they are prophesying to you a false vision, divination, futility and the deception of their own minds.” Other examples are in Jer. 23:21–33 and Zech. 10:2. Punishment for prophesying falsely was severe. False prophets were cast away from God's presence and permanently humiliated. They suffered the destruction of their cities (Jer. 7:14–16; 23:39).

A false prophet was also one who prophesied on behalf of another god. A familiar example is the story of Elijah and the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18:20–39). In a test against Elijah and the true God, the prophets of Baal suffered humiliating defeat.

Israel could not always distinguish between the true and the false prophet as seen in 1 Kings 22; Jer. 28. The prophet could only say, wait and see whose prophecy proves true in history (Deut. 18:22; 1 Kings 22:28; Jer. 29:9; cp. 1 Kings 13).

New Testament Jesus and the apostles spoke many times about false prophets. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus taught about the marks of a false prophet and the consequences of being one (Matt. 7:15–23). He also cautioned His followers to beware of false prophets who would arise during times of tribulation and in the end times (Matt. 24:11,24; Mark 13:22). He said to be careful when the world loves a prophet's words because a prophet who is false is apt to be popular (Luke 6:26).

The apostles instructed believers to be diligent in faith and understanding of Christian teachings, in order to discern false prophets when they arise (2 Pet. 1:10; 1:19–2:1; 1 John 4:1). The tests of a prophet are: (1) Do their predictions come true (Jer. 28:9)? (2) Does the prophet have a divine commission (Jer. 29:9)? (3) Are the prophecies consistent with Scripture (2 Pet. 1:20–21; Rev. 22:18–19)? (4) Do the people benefit spiritually from the prophet's ministry (Jer. 23:13–14,32; 1 Pet. 4:11)?

Punishments for false prophets were just as severe in the NT as they were in the OT. Paul caused a false prophet to be stricken with blindness (Acts 13:6–12), but most other punishments were more permanent in nature. Jesus said the false prophets would be cut down and burned like a bad tree (Matt. 7:19). Second Peter 2:4 describes being cast into pits of darkness. The ultimate punishment appears in Rev. 19:20; 20:10—the false prophet, the beast, and the devil will be thrown into a lake of fire and brimstone and be tormented forever. See Prophecy, Prophets.

FALSE WORSHIP Broad category of acts and attitudes that includes worship, reverence, or religious honoring of any object, person, or entity other than the one true God. It also includes impure, improper, or other inappropriate acts directed toward the worship of the true God.

Worship offered to a false object is the most obvious and easily recognized form of false worship. Worship of idols is but a part of false worship in the biblical world. Many times other gods were worshiped, not because of the appeal of the idols or images but out of a false sense of the power of the “god.” The most consistent problem with false worship seen in the OT is with the nature or fertility deities—Baals and Ashtaroah, Anath, Astarte—the male and female representations of reproduction and growth. Understanding of the basic form and nature of this kind of false worship has been clarified by discoveries made at Ugarit and the subsequent interpretation and study of these. Baal was commonly believed to have control over growth of all crops and reproduction of all flocks. Many of the forms of this false worship involved sexual acts—activities abhorred in the OT laws. Yet the appeal and practice of these rituals continued, probably because of Baal's reputed power in those areas so entwined with life and livelihood of the ancient Hebrews. During the time of great Assyrian power in the ancient world, even the Hebrews seem to have thought that the Assyrian gods were more powerful than their Yahweh; so they began to worship them. The Prophet Zephaniah, who lived and prophesied in this time, condemned those who “bow down on the housetops to the host of heaven” (Zeph. 1:5 NASB). Associated with this type of worship was the fairly prevalent view in the OT world that a god had his own territory and that he was relatively powerless outside that place. Perhaps the most direct statement of this is in the story of Naaman (2 Kings 5, esp. v. 17). After the Syrian commander was cured of his leprosy, he requested a “two-mules' burden” of dirt from Israel to take with him to Syria so that he could worship the true God.

The many references to false gods with obviously false worship in the OT coupled with the almost total absence of such in the NT might suggest that there was little problem with other gods in the NT world. Such is far from true. The world of the first century was filled with religions other than Judaism and Christianity. The presence of falseness in worship because it was directed to false gods continued to be a religious problem. Native national gods and fertility deities similar to Baal and Ashtaroah of the OT period still abounded. A new force was present in the mystery religions—Hellenistic religions that focused on the hope for life beyond death. The Orphic and Eleusinian mysteries were perhaps the most common of these. Emperor worship was a serious challenge in the days of the early church. Probably most Romans saw the emperor cult as merely an expression of patriotism and loyalty to the state. However, the Christian standard was to “give back to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's” (Luke 20:25 HCSB). Often the Christian was faced with imperial orders to participate in this kind of false worship. Refusal could bring serious penalties, often execution. In late NT times and the years following, Mithraism became the primary competitor with Christianity. This pagan worship of Mithra, represented by sol invictus (the invincible sun) was a powerful challenge to Christianity. Exclusively a male religion, emphasizing power and strength, Mithraism was especially popular in the Roman army.

False worship does not necessarily center in practice of pagan or idolatrous cults. It is often a problem for those who proclaim worship of the one true God. False worship of this sort usually centers in some form of deliberate or unintentional disobedience. Its presence in the Bible extends from the self-exalting disobedience in the Garden of Eden to compromising accommodation with the emperor cult and other pagan religions seen in the book of Revelation.

The primary forms of false worship are addressed in the Decalogue (Exod. 20): “You shall have no other gods before [in addition to] Me” (v. 3)—a command for exclusive loyalty to and worship of Yahweh; “You shall not make for yourself an idol” (v. 4a)—a clear requirement of worship without images; and “You shall not take the name of the LORD your God in vain” (v. 7a)—a command to honor in all of life the God whose name the Hebrews claimed and bore.

The Hebrews were guilty of syncretistic or artificially mixed religious practices. The temples built by Jeroboam, son of Nebat, the first king of Israel (the Northern Kingdom) after its break from the Jerusalem-centered Kingdom of Judah, were probably dedicated to such worship. When these temples were established in Bethel and Dan, Jeroboam the King “made two golden calves, and he said to them, ‘It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem; behold your gods, O Israel, that brought you up from the land of Egypt’” (1 Kings 12:28 NASB). This mixing of the gold calf—a symbol of Baal—with the worship of the God who delivered the Hebrews from their Egyptian bondage was false worship.

A very similar practice was prevalent in the time of Elijah. In his confrontation with the Baal prophets on Mount Carmel in the time of Ahab and Jezebel (1 Kings 18:20–46), the prophet of the Lord addressed the assembled people. “How long will you hesitate between two opinions? If the LORD is God, follow Him; but if Baal, follow him”(1 Kings 18:21 NASB).

False worship includes trusting in military power (Isa. 31:1), trusting in the “works of your hands” (Jer. 25:7), serving God in order to receive physical and material blessings (as Job's friends), offering unacceptable, tainted or maimed sacrifices to God instead of the best (Mal. 1:6–8). False worship also occurs when one prays, fasts, or gives alms before men “to be seen by them” instead of in sincere devotion to God (Matt. 6:1–18 HCSB).

The subjects of false and true worship are best presented in Mic. 6:8, “What does the LORD require of you but to do justice, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with your God” and in the words of Jesus to the Samaritan woman in John 4:23–24: “True worshippers will worship the Father in spirit and in truth. Yes, the Father wants such people to worship Him. God is Spirit, and those who worship him must worship in spirit and truth” (HCSB). See Canaan; Worship.

FAMILIAR SPIRIT See Medium.

FAMILY A group of persons united by the ties of marriage, blood, or adoption, enabling interaction between members of the household in their respective social roles. God has ordained the family as the foundational institution of human society.

Terminology Within the ethnic “people” (am) of Israel descended from Jacob were three levels of family relationships. One was the tribe (shevet or mateh) comprising the descendants of one of Jacob's sons. Within the tribe were the “clans” (mishpachah), and within the clan were the family units, which were the basic units of Israel's social structure. They were typically referred to as “the father's house” (bet-'av, Josh. 7:16–18). This unit would be similar to what we mean by “family,” but it was usually larger than our “nuclear family,” including three or four generations of sons and their wives and children, who lived on the same land under the leadership of the family patriarch or “head.” The group of elders who judged at the gate of a town (e.g., Deut. 21:19) probably comprised all the local “heads.” The perception and value of the twogeneration “nuclear family” may be inferred from repeated references to the parent-child relationship.

The terms “father” and “mother” could refer to any male or female ancestor, whether one or more generations removed, and whether living or dead. Likewise, “son” or “daughter” could refer to any of one's male or female descendants. Similarly, the terms “brother” and “sister” could refer to any other relative in the same clan (cp. Gen. 12:5 with 14:16).

The term most frequently used in the NT is oikos and the equivalent, oikia, “house, household.” Synonymous with the Hebrew expression, “father's house,” it was used of the members of a household, even including servants and any other dependents.

Old Testament The importance of the family unit in Israel is suggested by the fact that about half of the capital crimes were family related, including adultery, homosexuality, incest, persistent disobedience to or violence against one's parents, and rape (Lev. 20; Deut. 21–22). The basis for the family unit was the married couple (Gen. 2:4–5:1). From the union of the husband and wife, the family expanded to include the children, and also various relatives such as grandparents, and others.

Along with paternal authority over the family came responsibility to provide for and protect the family. The father was responsible for the religious and moral training of his children (Deut. 6:7,20–25; Exod. 12:26–27; Josh. 4:6–7), and before the law he acted as the family priest (Gen. 12:7–8; Job 1:2–5). After establishment of the Levitical priesthood, the father led the family in worship at the sites designated by God with the priests performing the sacrifices (1 Sam. 1). Moral purity was stressed for men and women in Israel with severe penalties for either party when sin occurred (Lev. 18; Prov. 5). The father was to give his daughter in marriage (Deut. 22:16; 1 Sam. 17:25; Jer. 29:6) to only an Israelite man, usually one from his own tribe. A daughter found to have been promiscuous before she married was to be stoned on her father's doorstep (Deut. 22:21).

Contrary to the practices of the surrounding nations, wives were not considered property. Though most marriages in the OT were arranged, this does not mean that they were loveless. The Song of Songs extols the joys of physical love between a husband and wife. God is used as an example of the perfect husband who loves His “wife” Israel (Hos. 1–2) and delights to care for her and make her happy.

Mothers gave birth and reared the children, ran the home under her husband's authority, and generally served as her husband's helper (Gen. 2:18; Prov. 31:10–31).

The importance of children in ancient Israel may be inferred from the law of Levirate marriage, which provided for the continuance of the family line (Deut. 25:5–10; Ps. 127:3–5). They were also the instruments by which the ancient traditions were passed on (Exod. 13:8–9,14; Deut. 4:9; 6:7). God delights to be praised by children (Ps. 8:2). Children were taught to respect their mothers as well as their fathers (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16; 21:13; 27:16; Prov. 15:20; 23:22,25; 30:17) and to heed their instruction (Prov. 1:8; 6:20). Discipline was one way of showing love to one's children (Prov. 3:11–12; 13:24).

Polygamy (more specifically “polygyny”) was one of the abnormal developments of the family in the OT and was first practiced by Lamech, a descendant of Cain. It is never cast in a positive light in Scripture but is a source of rivalry and bickering, as is seen in the lives of Abraham and Jacob (Gen. 16; 29–30). The harems of the kings of Israel are presented as excess that is rebuked in the monarchy (Deut. 17:17). Because of polygamy the kings of Israel were persuaded to worship false gods (1 Kings 11:1–10). The normal family unit in Israel was never polygamous, nor was polygamy widely practiced outside of the monarchy.

Relatives identified as off-limits for marriage (that is, incestuous; see Lev. 18:6–18; 20:11–14,19–21) seem to have been those normally considered members of the “father's house.” This included one's father or mother, son or daughter (of whatever generation), sister or brother, uncle or aunt, or a step-relation, half-relation, or in-law, that is, one's father, mother, son, daughter, sister, brother, uncle, or aunt by marriage. The exception was in the case of “Levirate marriage,” that is, an unmarried male's marriage to the childless widow of his deceased brother.

New Testament As the family is the basic unit in society and in OT Israel, it was also essential to the life and growth of the early church. The apostolic missionaries sent by Jesus were to focus on households (Matt. 10:11–14), early worship consisted in part of “break[ing] bread from house to house” (Acts 2:36; see also 5:42; 12:12; 20:20), and later churches met regularly in homes (Rom. 16:23; 1 Cor. 16:19; Col. 4:15). Conversions even sometimes happened by household (Acts 10:24,33,44; 16:15,31–34; 18:8; 1 Cor. 1:16).

The family also served as a proving ground for church leaders, who should exhibit marital faithfulness, hospitality, competent household management, including wise parenting skills, and having wives “worthy of respect” (1 Tim. 3:2–13; Titus 1:6–9).

In the NT family structure is not discussed as much as the roles and responsibilities of those in the household. The common family unit was a monogamous relationship that included the extended family. By the first century there was a greater measure of independence within the family based upon Roman culture and urban living. Close ties were common between members of the family in Israel.

Jesus reaffirmed the monogamous family and rebuked immorality and divorce during His ministry. He spoke about the indissolubility of the family and that even the civil courts could not break the family bonds (Mark 10:1–12). The responsibility to care for those in the family is seen at the cross where Jesus, though suffering, gave the Apostle John the responsibility to care for His mother (John 19:26–27).

Much of the NT teaching on the family is found in Paul's writings. Household ethics are described in Eph. 5–6 and Col. 3–4. In these texts husbands are responsible for the physical, emotional, religious, and psychological health of wives. A wife's submission is in the marriage context.

Wives are called to be household administrators. As household managers wives are responsible to give the family guidance and direction. Paul states that performing these tasks will inhibit gossiping and other unprofitable activities (1 Tim. 5:14). Thus any decision made within the family without the counsel and guidance of the wife is unwise.

Family roles in the NT also include children, who are commanded to obey their parents (Eph. 6:1–4). Each member of the family has responsibilities. Jesus affirms the importance of children and their importance to Him in Matt. 18:2–14; 19:13–14; Mark 10:14–16.

Family as Metaphor The OT often uses familial terms to describe God's relationship to the people of Israel. They are sometimes said to be His “son” or His “sons/children,” and at other times they are His wife. (Ps. 103:13). Unfortunately Israel is often described as a wayward wife, or rebellious children, because of their rebellion against God (Jer. 2:32; 3:14).

The church of Jesus Christ could be described as “God's household” of which both Jewish and Gentile believers were family members (Eph. 2:19; see Mark 10:29–30; 1 Tim. 3:15). The result is that one's responsibility to his spiritual family is similar to his responsibility to his physical family (Gal. 6:10; 1 Pet. 3:8), though one should not depend on the church to meet the needs of his own family (1 Tim. 5:3–8). FAMINE AND DROUGHT Famine is an extreme shortage of food, and drought is an excessive dryness of land. The Bible reports or predicts the occurrence of several famines and droughts.

Causes of Famine Drought was the most common cause of famines mentioned in the Bible. Drought caused famines in the time of Abraham (Gen. 12:10), Isaac (Gen. 26:1), Joseph (Gen. 41:27), and the judges (Ruth 1:1). Drought and famine also plagued the Israelites in the days of David (2 Sam. 21:1), Elijah (1 Kings 18:2), Elisha (2 Kings 4:38), Haggai (Hag. 1:11), and Nehemiah (Neh. 5:3). At times the coming of droughts and famines was predicted by prophets (2 Kings 8:1; Isa. 3:1; Jer. 14:12; Acts 11:28). Other natural forces also caused famines: locusts, wind, hail, and mildew (Joel 1:4; Amos 4:9; Hag. 2:17). The Israelites also experienced famines caused by enemies. Occasionally oppressors destroyed or confiscated food (Deut. 28:33,51; Isa. 1:7). The siege of cities also resulted in famine, such as the siege of Samaria by Ben-hadad (2 Kings 6:24–25) and the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 25:2–3).

The famines that Israel experienced were often severe, some lasting for years (Gen. 12:10; 41:27; Jer. 14:1–6). During famines, starving people resorted to eating such things as wild vines, heads of animals, garbage, dung, and even human flesh (2 Kings 4:39; 6:25,28; Lam. 4:4–10).

Famine and Drought as the Judgment of God God created the world as a good environment that would normally provide ample water and food for mankind (Gen. 1). However, the productiveness of the earth is related to people's obedience to God. For example, the sins of Adam, Eve, and Cain resulted in unfruitfulness of the earth (Gen. 3:17–18; 4:12). Israel's relationship with God also directly affected the fertility of the promised land. When the people obeyed God, the land was productive (Deut. 11:11–14). However, when they disobeyed, judgment came on the land by drought and famine (Lev. 26:23–26; Deut. 11:16–17; 1 Kings 8:35). Furthermore, the NT reports that famine will be a part of God's coming judgment of the earth in the last days (Matt. 24:7; Rev. 6:8).

While the Bible states that some famines and droughts are the judgment of God (2 Sam. 21:1; 1 Kings 17:1; 2 Kings 8:1; Jer 14:12; Ezek. 5:12; Amos 4:6), not all such disasters are connected to divine punishment (Gen. 12:10; 26:1; Ruth 1:1; Acts 11:28). When God did send drought and famine on His people, it was for the purpose of bringing them to repentance (1 Kings 8:35–36; Hos. 2:8–23; Amos 4:6–8). Moreover, the OT contains promises that God will protect His faithful ones in times of famine (Job 5:20,22; Pss. 33:18–19; 37:18–19; Prov. 10:3). FASHION The practice of using clothing to make a statement regarding one's status or position in society was just as prevalent in the biblical world as it is today. However, clothing styles did not change as rapidly in antiquity and so the effort to remain stylish was less hectic.

The exact meanings of many technical terms in the Bible describing specific articles of clothing and accessories remain lost; other terms are clearer. The basic wardrobe in biblical times included a long shirt-like undergarment (the tunic—e.g., John 19:23), an outer garment that could be decorated according to one's status (the robe—e.g., 1 Sam. 18:4), various girdles (loincloths, belts and sashes—e.g., Matt. 3:4; Rev. 1:13), headgear (e.g., 2 Sam. 15:30; Zech. 3:5), footwear (e.g., Ezek. 24:17), and jewelry (e.g., Exod. 32:2; Judg. 8:24–26).

Fine clothing was worn by kings and priests (Exod. 28:1–43; 39:1–31; Matt. 11:8) or others worthy of status (Gen. 37:3; Luke 15:22). Such clothing was a valued commodity (cp. Josh. 7:21) and made a precious gift (Gen. 45:22; 2 Kings 5:5; Esther 6:8) but could lead to showiness (Isa. 3:18–26). Believers are instead instructed to clothe themselves modestly so that their true, inward beauty might prevail (1 Tim. 2:9; 1 Pet. 3:3–5).

The outward adornment of clothing was used by the biblical writers to signal the inner spiritual nature of God's people. Once elegantly adorned (Ezek. 16:10–14), Israel sinned and became dressed in filthy rags (Isa. 64:6; Zech. 3:3–4; cp. Rev. 3:4). Those who become righteous are clothed in fine white robes (Zech. 3:4–5; Rev. 3:4–5; 7:9,13).

FASTING Refraining from eating food. The Bible describes three main forms of fasting. The normal fast involves the total abstinence of food. Luke 4:2 reveals that Jesus “ate nothing”; afterwards “He was hungry.” Jesus abstained from food but not from water.

In Acts 9:9 we read of an absolute fast where for three days Paul “did not eat or drink” (HCSB). The abstinence from both food and water seems to have lasted no more than three days (Ezra 10:6; Esther 4:16).

The partial fast in Dan. 10:3 emphasizes the restriction of diet rather than complete abstinence. The context implies that there were physical benefits resulting from this partial fast. However, this verse indicates that there was a revelation given to Daniel as a result of this time of fasting.

Fasting is the laying aside of food for a period of time when the believer is seeking to know God in a deeper experience. It is to be done as an act before God in the privacy of one's own pursuit of God (Exod. 34:28; 1 Sam. 7:6; 1 Kings 19:8; Matt. 6:17).

Fasting is to be done with the object of seeking to know God in a deeper experience (Isa. 58; Zech. 7:5). Fasting relates to a time of confession (Ps. 69:10). Fasting can be a time of seeking a deeper prayer experience and drawing near to God in prevailing prayer (Ezra 8:23; Joel 2:12). The early church often fasted in seeking God's will for leadership in the local church (Acts 13:2). When the early church wanted to know the mind of God, there was a time of prayer and fasting.

FATE That which must necessarily happen. The OT speaks of death as the common fate of humankind (Pss. 49:12; 81:15; Eccles. 2:14; 3:19; 9:2–3). The OT similarly speaks of violent death as the destiny of the wicked (Job 15:22; Isa. 65:12; Hos. 9:13). See Election; Predestination.

FATHER See Family; God.

FATHERLESS Person without a male parent, often rendered orphan by modern translations. Orphans are often mentioned with widows as representatives of the most helpless members of society (Exod. 22:22; Deut. 10:18; Ps. 146:9). In societies where the basic social unit was the clan headed by a father (the eldest male relative, perhaps a grandfather or uncle), those without a father or husband were social misfits without one to provide for their material needs and represent their interests in the court (Job 31:21). Life for the fatherless was harsh. Orphans were often forced to beg for food (Ps. 109:9–10). They suffered loss of their homes (Ps. 109:10), land rights (Prov. 23:10), and livestock (Job 24:3). The fatherless were subject to acts of violence (Job 22:9), were treated as property to be gambled for (6:27 TEV, NRSV, NASB, NIV), and were even murdered (Ps. 94:6).

God, however, has a special concern for orphans and widows (Deut. 10:18; Pss. 10:14–18; 146:9; Hos. 14:3) evidenced in the title “a father of the fatherless” (Ps. 68:5). Old Testament law provided for the material needs of orphans and widows who were to be fed from the third year's tithe (Deut. 14:28–29; 26:12–13), from sheaves left forgotten in the fields (24:19), and from fruit God commanded to be left on the trees and vines (24:20–21). Orphans and widows were to be included in the celebrations of the worshiping community (Deut. 16:11,14). God's people were repeatedly warned not to take advantage of orphans and widows (Exod. 22:22; Deut. 24:17; 27:19; Ps. 82:3; Isa. 1:17). In the NT James defined worship acceptable to God as meeting the needs of orphans and widows (1:27).

God's exiled people were described as orphans without home or inheritance (Lam. 5:2–3). The OT image of the orphan without a helper at the court perhaps forms the background for Jesus' promise that His disciples would not be left orphans (John 14:18 NASB, NIV, NRSV; “comfortless,” KJV; “bereft,” REB). They would not be defenseless since the Holy Spirit would act as their advocate (14:16). Paul described his painful separation from the Thessalonian Christians as being orphaned (1 Thess. 2:17 NRSV). See Poor, Orphan, Widow.

FATHER'S HOUSE Name given to extended family units in the ancient Near East reflecting a social organization in which a dominant male headed the family. These units might be large (Jacob's house included 66 descendants when he entered Egypt, Gen. 46:26). A father's house could designate the clans within a tribe (Exod. 6:14–25) or even an entire tribe (Josh. 22:14). The common designations “house of Jacob” (Exod. 19:3; Amos 3:13), “house of Israel” (Exod. 40:38), and the unusual designation “house of Isaac” (Amos 7:16) all refer to the nation of Israel in terms of a father's house.

During patriarchal times a marriage was expected to be within the house of one's father (Gen. 11:29; 20:12; 24:4,15,38,40; 29:10; Exod. 6:20; Num. 36:8–10). Some of these marriages within the clan were later prohibited (Lev. 18:9,12; 20:17,19). In patriarchal times married women were regarded as remaining part of their father's house (Gen. 31:14; cp. 46:26 where the enumeration of Jacob's house does not include his sons' wives). In later times married women were regarded to have left their father's houses (Num. 30:3,16). Widows were expected to return to their fathers' houses (Gen. 38:11). Genesis 31:14 suggests that in patriarchal times married women might normally expect to share in their father's inheritance. Later law limited this right to cases in which there were no sons to inherit (Num. 27:8).

In John 2:16 “My Father's house” is a designation for the temple which was then equated with Christ's body (2:21). The reference to “My Father's house” with its many dwelling places (14:2) can be explained in two ways. “House” can be understood as a place or as a set of relationships, a household. Already in the Psalms the temple is the house of God where the righteous hope to dwell (23:6; 27:4). It is a short step to the idea of heaven as God's dwelling where there is ample room for the disciples. If house is understood as household, the focus is on fellowship with God. In contrast to servants, a son abides in his father's house (John 8:35). As Son of God, Jesus enjoys unique fellowship with God. By believing in Christ, we are empowered to become children of God (1:12), members of God's household, and share in fellowship with the Father. The two meanings do not exclude each other. Both are included in Jesus' promise in John 14:2.

FATHOM Measure of depth equaling six feet (Acts 27:28). See Weights and Measures.

FATLINGS, FATTED Generally a young animal penned up to be fed for slaughter. Sometimes a general reference to the strongest or to the choice among a flock or herd is intended. In Pharaoh's dream fat cows (Gen. 41:2,18) symbolized years of prosperity. Saul was tempted to spare the choice animals of the Amalekites (1 Sam. 15:9). In Ezek. 34:3,16,20 the fat sheep symbolize the prosperous leaders of Israel. As choice specimens, fattened animals made an appropriate offering to God (2 Sam. 6:13; Ps. 66:15; Amos 5:22). Fattened animals are often associated with banquets.

Fattened cattle formed part of the menu for the wedding banquet of the king's son in the parable in Matt. 22:4. In the parable of the loving father, a son is welcomed home with a banquet of a fatted calf (Luke 15:23,27,30). Fattened animals were used as a symbol for slaughter. In the NT James pictured the oppressive rich as fattening their hearts for a day of slaughter, perhaps a reference to God's judgment on them (5:5).

FAWN Young deer; term used in modern translations for KJV's "hind" and "roe." See Deer.

FEAR Natural emotional response to a perceived threat to one's security or general welfare. It ranges in degree of intensity from a sense of anxiety or worry to one of utter terror. It can be a useful emotion when it leads to appropriate caution or measures that would guard one's welfare. On the other hand, fear can be a hindrance to the enjoyment of life if it is induced by delusion or if it lingers and overpowers other more positive emotions such as love and joy, perhaps leading to an inability to engage in the normal activities of life. In the Bible, however, fear is perhaps more often than in popular culture regarded not as pure emotion but as wise behavior. Terminology The concept of fear is referred to in the Bible several hundred times, either explicitly or by implication through effects such as trembling, shaking, shuddering, or cringing. The word group most often associated with fear in the OT (occurring 435 times) is the verb yara', “to fear, honor,” the adjective yare', “in fear of, fearful,” and the related nouns, mora', “fear, terror, awe,” and yir'ah, “fear, worship.” These are supplemented by other word groups such as one related to the root chatat, “be terrified, disheartened, dismayed,” and pacad, “tremble, be in dread.”

In the NT the concept of fear is most often associated with the root phob (146 times), as in the verb phobeo, “to fear, reverence, or respect,” related nouns, phobos, “fear, terror, reverence, respect” and phobetron, “terrifying sight,” and the adjective phoberos, “fearful.” Synonyms are also found, such as tarasso, “disturb, terrify,” and the word group deilia, “cowardice,” deiliao, “be cowardly, fearful,” and deilos, “cowardly, timid.”

Emotions of Terror and Anxiety The familiar concept of fear induced by a threatening situation is common in the Bible. The first emotion explicitly referred to is Adam and Eve's fear of divine retribution for eating the forbidden fruit (Gen. 3:10). In this case, their fear induced them to hide. Jacob's fear of Esau caused him to pray in Gen. 32:11. Sometimes fear causes silence or inhibits action, as when “Ish-bosheth did not dare to say another word to Abner, because he was afraid of him” (2 Sam. 3:11; cp. 2 Chron. 17:10).

A common biblical theme is fear of one's enemies, often found in passages of divine encouragement not to fear. For example, before engaging in battle Israel's priest was to exhort them not to be “fainthearted or afraid; do not be terrified or give way to panic before them” (Deut. 20:3). And the Lord commanded Joshua, “Be strong and courageous. Do not be terrified; do not be discouraged, for the LORD your God will be with you wherever you go” (Josh. 1:9; Deut. 31:6; Isa. 44:8; Luke 12:32; John 16:33). On the contrary, the Lord promised Israel that He would cause their enemies to panic and flee from them in terror (Exod. 15:14–16; 23:27; Deut. 2:25; 11:25). It may be said that a believer is one who fears nothing but God (Deut. 7:21; Prov. 29:25; Isa. 8:13; Matt. 10:28).

We should notice from these verses that the Bible does not portray fear of danger simply as an emotion over which the believer has no control. The biblical command not to fear is a command not to panic or be immobilized by fear or not to allow one's fear of perceived danger to hinder obedience to God. The antidote to such fear is the conviction that God is able to protect and to accomplish His will and that His promises can be trusted (2 Kings 6:15–17; 2 Chron. 15:7–8; Pss. 34:4; 56:3–4; Prov. 3:24–26; Isa. 41:10, 43:1; Matt. 10:26–31; Heb. 13:6; 1 Pet. 3:13–17; Rev. 2:10).

The same can be said of anxiety, which can be no less destructive to faithfulness than terror (Phil. 4:6). It was probably Abraham's anxiety over his childlessness that prompted the Lord's charge not to fear in Gen. 15:1, and it was failure to heed that charge that led to the birth of Ishmael in chapter 16. Anxious fear or worry becomes the sin of pride and unbelief when it diverts one's attention from following the Lord (Isa. 51:12–13; Mark 4:19; Luke 10:41) or causes someone to trust their own resources or abilities or those of someone else rather than God's (Matt. 6:19–34; Ps. 55:22).

Attitude of Respect and Submission Another indication that the biblical concept of fear was not necessarily an involuntary emotion is that the same words were also used of one's proper response to someone in authority: a child to parents (Lev. 19:3), citizens to their leaders (Josh 4:14; Rom. 13:7), a servant to his master (Mal. 1:6; Eph. 6:5), and a wife to her husband (Eph. 5:33). In these cases, “fear” carries with it the expectation of obedience. Respect or honor may be the sense in which Israel “feared” Solomon when they saw evidence that he possessed God's wisdom (1 Kings 3:28). Respect or reverence is also the proper attitude toward God's sanctuary (Lev. 19:30). Fear can be the opposite of treating someone or something as common, insignificant, irrelevant, or otherwise unworthy of attention (Esther 5:9).

Fear of God Any of these senses—terror, honor, submission—may be involved when God is the object of fear, with the additional sense of worship. For those who are enemies rather than followers of the Lord, terror is most appropriate (Jer. 5:22). Such terror is limited by the fact that God is not capricious but acts consistently according to His righteous character and revealed will. Nevertheless, those guilty of idolatry and injustice have every reason to fear His coming wrath in judgment (Ps. 90:11; Isa. 13:6–11; 30:30–33; Zeph. 1:18; Heb. 10:26–31). Terror is the only reasonable response when confronted by a Being whose knowledge and power have no limits, unless one's safety has been assured. The Bible contains many cases of a divine or angelic appearance to which fear is the natural response (Exod. 3:6; 20:18–20; Dan. 10:10–12; Luke 1:12–13,30). Following the resurrection of Christ, for example, an angelic appearance caused the guards at the tomb to faint with fear, but the believing women were told they had nothing to fear (Matt. 28:4–5).

The proper attitude of believers toward God is often said to be respect, reverence, or awe rather than fear. The biblical terminology, however, is the same, and God's character remains unchanged. The description of God often translated “awesome” is literally “feared” or “fearful” (Exod. 15:11; Neh. 1:5; Job 37:22; Ps. 89:7; Dan. 9:4). Confining the believer's attitude toward God to “reverence” or “awe” rather than “fear” may lose sight of those aspects of the divine character that compel obedience—His perfect holiness and righteousness and His unlimited knowledge and power. Knowing that God's wrath has been satisfied in Christ relieves the believer from the fear of condemnation but not from accountability to a holy God (2 Cor. 5:10–11; 7:1; 1 Tim. 5:20; 1 Pet. 1:17).

“Fear” and “love” are both terms found in ancient Near Eastern literature associated with covenant loyalty. To fear God is to have allegiance to Him and consequently to His instructions, thus affecting one's values, convictions, and behavior (Gen. 20:11; Lev. 25:17,36,43; 1 Sam. 12:14,24; Ps. 128:1; Prov. 8:13). True believers are often referred to as those who fear God (Gen. 22:12; Job 1:9; Pss. 31:19; 33:18; 103:11,13,17; 115:11,13; 118:4; Mal. 3:16; 4:2; Luke 1:50). So the fear of God expressed in humble submission and worship is essential to true wisdom (Prov. 9:10; 15:33; Isa.

33:6). A true believer may be defined as one who trembles at God's word (Gen. 22:12; Exod. 1:17; Ps. 119:161; Isa. 66:2,5; Jer. 23:9). See Awe, Awesome; Reverence.

FEAR OF ISAAC Name or title that Jacob used in referring to God (Gen. 31:42; cp. 31:53; 46:1). Evidently the patriarchs used various names to refer to God until He revealed His personal name to Moses (Exod. 6:3). Some scholars translate the Hebrew expression “Kinsman of Isaac” or “Refuge of Isaac.” See God of the Fathers; Patriarchs.

FELIX (Fē' līx) Procurator of Judea at the time Paul the apostle visited Jerusalem for the last time and was arrested there (Acts 23:24). Antonius Felix became procurator of Judea in A.D. 52, succeeding Cumanus. He remained in office until A.D. 60, when the emperor Nero recalled him. He is depicted in Acts as a man who listened with interest to Paul's defense but failed to make any decision with regard to the case or with regard to the personal implications of Paul's message. Rather, he hoped Paul would pay him a bribe (Acts 24:26). Contemporary historians Tacitus and Josephus paint Felix as a brutal, incompetent politician who was finally replaced (cp. Acts 24:27). FELLOES (KJV, REB) Rim of a wheel (1 Kings 7:33).

FELLOWSHIP Bond of common purpose and devotion that binds Christians to one another and to Christ. “Fellowship” is the English translation of words from the Hebrew stem chabar and the Greek stem koin. The Hebrew chabar was used to express ideas such as common or shared house (Prov. 21:9), “binding” or “joining” (Exod. 26:6; Eccles. 9:4), companion (Eccles. 4:10), and even a wife as a companion (Mal. 2:14). Chaber was used for a member of a Pharisaic society. Pharisees tended to form very close associations with one another in social, religious, and even business affairs. A most important dimension in the life of these cheberim was a sharing together in the study of Scripture and law and table fellowship.

The Gospels record no sayings of Jesus in which He used the koin-stem to describe “fellowship” among disciples, though certainly the close association shared by Jesus and His followers laid the foundation for the church's post-Easter understanding of fellowship.

Koinonia was Paul's favorite word to describe a believer's relationship with the risen Lord and the benefits of salvation which come through Him. On the basis of faith, believers have fellowship with the Son (1 Cor. 1:9). We share fellowship in the gospel (1 Cor. 9:23; Phil. 1:5). Paul probably meant that all believers participate together in the saving power and message of the good news. Believers also share together a fellowship with the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. 13:14), which the apostle understood as a most important bond for unity in the life of the church (Phil. 2:1–4).

The tendency of many Christians to refer to the Lord's Supper as “communion” is rooted in Paul's use of the term koinonia in the context of his descriptions of the Lord's Supper. He described the cup as “sharing in the blood of Christ,” and the bread as “sharing” of the body of Christ (1 Cor. 10:16 HCSB). Paul did not explain precisely how such “sharing” takes place through the Supper. He emphatically believed the Supper tied participants closer to one another and to Christ. Such “sharing” could not be shared with Christ and with other gods or supernatural beings. Thus Paul forbade his readers from partaking in pagan religious meals, which would result in sharing “fellowship” with evil, supernatural forces or demons (1 Cor. 10:19–21).

Immediately after Paul spoke of “fellowship” with Christ through participation in the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 10:16), he said, “Since there is one bread, we who are many are one body” (1 Cor. 10:17 HCSB). This illustrates clearly Paul's belief that fellowship with Christ was to issue into fellowship between believers. Once we grasp this, it is easy to understand why Paul was so angry over the mockery that the Corinthians were making of the Lord's Supper. While claiming to partake of this sacred meal, many Corinthian Christians ignored the needs of their brothers and sisters and actually created factions and divisions (1 Cor. 11:17–18), “For in eating, each of you takes his own supper ahead of others, and one person is hungry while another is drunk!” (1 Cor. 11:21 HCSB). Because the “fellowship” among the Corinthians themselves was so perverted, Paul could go so far as to say “when you come together in one place, it is not really to eat the Lord's Supper” (1 Cor. 11:20 HCSB).

Koinonia with the Lord results not only in sharing His benefits (the gospel and the Holy Spirit), but also sharing His sufferings (Phil. 3:10; Col. 1:24). These texts express clearly just how intimate was Paul's perception of the close relationship between the believer and the Lord. The pattern of self-sacrifice and humility, demonstrated most profoundly through Jesus' suffering on the cross (Phil. 2:5–8), is to mark the current life of the disciple. Just as Jesus gave so completely of Himself for the sake of His people, so, too, are believers to give completely of themselves for the sake of the people of God (2 Cor. 4:7–12; Col. 1:24). The pattern of following Christ in suffering continues for the believer, in that just as Christ entered into glory following His suffering (Phil. 2:9–11), so, too, will the believer in the future share in the glory of Christ if “we suffer with Him” (Rom. 8:17 HCSB; cp. Phil. 3:10–11).

Paul believed that Christians were to share with one another what they had to offer to assist fellow believers. Paul used the koin-stem to refer to such sharing. One who has received the word ought to “share” it with others (Gal. 6:6). Though it is not translated “fellowship” in English versions, Paul actually used the term koinonia to denote the financial contribution which he was collecting from Gentile believers to take to Jerusalem for the relief of the saints who lived there (Rom. 15:26; 2 Cor. 8:4; 9:13). The reason he could refer to a financial gift as koinonia is explained by Rom. 15:27: “For if the Gentiles have shared in their [the Jewish Christians'] spiritual benefits, then they are obligated to minister to Jews in material needs” (HCSB). In this case, each offered what they were able to offer to benefit others: Jewish Christians their spiritual blessings, Gentile Christians their material blessings. Such mutual sharing of one's blessings is a clear and profound expression of Christian fellowship.

Finally, for Paul, koinonia was a most appropriate term to describe the unity and bonding that exists between Christians by virtue of the fact that they share together in the grace of the gospel. When Paul wished to express the essential oneness of the apostolic leadership of the church he said concerning James, the Lord's brother, Peter, and John, that they “gave the right hand of fellowship to me” (Gal. 2:9 HCSB). When we realize that this expression of koinonia came on the heels of one of the most hotly debated issues in the early church, namely the status of Gentiles in the people of God (Gal. 2:1–10; Acts 15), we can see how powerful and all encompassing Paul's notion of Christian fellowship was.

Like Paul, John also affirmed that koinonia was an important aspect of the Christian pilgrimage. He affirmed emphatically that fellowship with God and the Son was to issue in fellowship with the other believers (1 John 1:3,6–7). See Lord's Supper; Holy Spirit.

FENCED CITY KJV term for a fortified or walled city. See Cities and Urban Life; Fortified Cities.

FERRET White European polecat mentioned by KJV in Lev. 11:30. Other translations read “gecko.”

FERTILE CRESCENT Crescent-shaped arc of alluvial land in the Near East stretching from the tip of the Persian Gulf to the southeastern corner of the Mediterranean Sea. The term was coined by James Henry Breasted in 1916 and does not occur in the Bible.

Conditions in the Fertile Crescent in antiquity were favorable for settled life, and the rise of civilization occurred along its river valleys. This band of land between the desert and the mountains was suitable for farming and was somewhat isolated by geographical barriers on all sides. The northeast is bordered by the Zagros Mountains, the north by the Taurus and Amanus ranges. On the west lies the Mediterranean Sea, and the concave southern limit is determined by the vast Syro-Arabian Desert. The Fertile Crescent is composed of Mesopotamia in the east and the Levant, or Palestine and Syria in the west.

Egypt was separated from Palestine by the Sinai, and thus is not a part of the Fertile Crescent. The Nile River, however, provided an ideal situation for the rise of early civilization parallel to that of Mesopotamia. See Mesopotamia, Palestine.

FERTILITY CULT General term for religions marked by rites which reenact a myth accounting for the orderly change of the seasons and the earth's fruitfulness. Such myths often involve a great mother-goddess as a symbol of fertility and a male deity, usually her consort but sometimes a son, who like vegetation dies and returns to life again. In Mesopotamia the divine couple was Ishtar and Tammuz (who is mourned in Ezek. 8:14); in Egypt, Isis and her son Osiris; in Asia Minor, Cybele and Attis. In Syria the Ugaritic myths of the second millennium B.C. pictured Baal-Hadad, the storm god, as the dying and rising god. (A local manifestation of this god is mourned in Zech. 12:11; Syrian kings derived their names from this deity, 1 Kings 15:18; 2 Kings 6:24; 13:24). His wife was the goddess Anath. In the earliest Ugaritic myth Asherah, the great mother-goddess, was the consort of El, the chief god in the pantheon. As Baal replaced El as the major deity, he became associated with Asherah (Judg. 6:25–30; 1 Kings 18:19). Ashtoroth, the daughter of Asherah, is used as the Hebrew word for womb or the fruit of the womb (Deut. 7:13; 28:4,18,51).

Fertility cults attribute the fertility of the cropland and herds to the sexual relations of the divine couple. Sacral sexual intercourse by priests and priestesses or by cult prostitutes was an act of worship intended to emulate the gods and share in their powers of procreation or else an act of imitative magic by which the gods were compelled to preserve the earth's fertility (1 Kings 14:23–24; 15:12; Hos. 4:14). Transvestism (prohibited in Deut. 22:5) may have been part of a fertility rite like that practiced by the Hittites. Sacrifices of produce, livestock, and even children (2 Kings 17:31; 23:10) represented giving the god what was most precious in life in an attempt to restore order to the cosmos and ensure fertility.

Elijah's struggle with the priests of Baal and Asherah at Mount Carmel is the best known conflict between worship of Yahweh and a fertility cult (1 Kings 18:17–40). Under Ahab, Baalism had become the state religion (1 Kings 16:31). The account of the priests of Baal lacerating themselves (1 Kings 18:28) is illuminated by the Ugaritic myths where El gashes his arms, chest, and back at the news of Baal's death. The priests of Baal customarily reenacted this scene from the myth at plowing time. Both skin and earth were cut as a sign of mourning (prohibited by Deut. 14:1). Baal's resurrection came with the return of the rains. The biblical narrative is clear that Yahweh, not Baal, is the Lord who withholds and gives rain (1 Kings 17:1; 18:20–45).

The Israelites' sacred calendar celebrated the same seasons as their neighbors (barley harvest, same as feast of unleavened bread; wheat harvest, same as Pentecost; fruit harvest, same as feast of booths). The Israelites interpreted these seasons in light of God's redemptive acts in their history. Israel recognized God as the one responsible for rain (1 Kings 18), grain, wine, oil, wool, and flax (Hos. 2:8–9). Israel conceived of the earth's fruitfulness in a way quite unlike that of her neighbors. Yahweh had no consort; thus fertility was not tied to Yahweh's return to life and sexual functioning. Rather, the ability of plants and animals to reproduce their own kind was rooted in creation (Gen. 1:11–12,22,28). The orderly progression of the seasons was not traced to a primordial battle but was rooted in God's promise to Noah (Gen. 8:22). The fertility of the land was ensured not by ritual reenactment of the sacred marriage but by obedience to the demands of the covenant (Deut. 28:1,3–4,11–12).

In the NT Diana or Artemis of the Ephesians (Acts 19:35) was a many-breasted fertility goddess. Aphrodite was also associated with fertility. Her temple at Corinth was the home of cult prostitutes responsible for the city's reputation for immorality (cp. 1 Cor. 6:15–20). Many of the mystery religions that competed with Christianity in the early centuries of the church developed the myths of the older fertility cults. FESTAL GARMENTS, FESTAL ROBES Terms used by modern translations for two Hebrew expressions. The Hebrew expressions underlying “festal garments” mean a change of clothing (Gen. 45:22; Judg. 14:12–13,19; 2 King 5:5,22–23); the term underlying “festal robes” means clean, pure, or white clothing (Isa. 3:22; Zech. 3:4). Modern translations are not consistent in translating the terms, translation depending on the context. In the ancient Near East possession of sets of clothing was regarded as a sign of wealth. Common people would own few clothes. Thus a change of clothes might suggest clothes reserved for a special occasion as reflected in some translations (Judg. 14:12–13,19 NRSV, TEV; 2 King 5:5,22–23 TEV). The white garments of Isa. 3:22 are likely fine linen robes. The reference in Zech. 3:4 is either to the high priest's robes (perhaps the special robes reserved for the Day of Atonement, Zech. 3:9), which represent the restoration of the priesthood, or a simple reference to clean robes as a symbol of Joshua's innocence of any charges (symbolized by the filthy rags).

FESTIVALS Regular religious celebrations remembering God's great acts of salvation in the history of His people. Traditionally called “feasts” in the English Bibles, these can conveniently be categorized according to frequency of celebration. Many of them were timed according to cycles of seven. The cycle of the week with its climax on the seventh day provided the cyclical basis for much of Israel's worship; as the seventh day was observed, so was the seventh month (which contained four of the national festivals), and the seventh year, and the fiftieth year (the year of Jubilee), which followed seven cycles each of seven years. Not only were the festivals as a whole arranged with reference to the cycle of the week (Sabbath), two of them (the feast of unleavened bread and the feast of tabernacles) lasted for seven days each. Each began on the 15th of the month—at the end of two cycles of weeks and when the moon was full. Pentecost also was celebrated on the 15th of the month and began 50 days after the presentation of the firstfruits—the day following seven times seven weeks.

Sabbath The seventh day of each week was listed among the festivals (Lev. 23:1–3). It functioned as a reminder of the Lord's rest at the end of the creation week (Gen. 2:3) and also of the deliverance from slavery in Egypt (Deut. 5:12–25). The Sabbath day was observed by strict rest from work from sunset until sunset (Exod. 20:8–11; Neh. 13:15–22). Each person was to remain in place and not engage in travel (Exod. 16:29; Lev. 23:3). Despite such restrictions even as kindling a fire (Exod. 35:3) or any work (Exod. 31:14; 35:2), the Sabbath was a joyful time (Isa. 58:13–14). See Sabbath.

New Moon This festival was a monthly celebration characterized by special offerings, great in quantity and quality (Num. 28:11–15), and blowing of trumpets (Num. 10:10; Ps. 81:3). According to Amos 8:5, business ceased. The festivals of the new moon and Sabbath are often mentioned together in the OT (Isa. 1:13; 66:23; Ezek. 45:17; 46:1,3). This festival provided the occasion for King Saul to stage a state banquet and for the family of David to offer a special annual sacrifice (1 Sam. 20:5,6,24,29). David's arrangements for the Levites included service on the new moon (1 Chron. 23:31), and the ministry of the prophets was sometimes connected with this occasion (2 Kings 4:23; Isa. 1:13; Ezek. 46:1; Hag.1:1). Ezekiel mentioned four times receiving a vision on the first day of the month (Ezek. 26:1; 29:17; 31:1; 32:1). This day (along with others) is included in prophetic denunciations of abuses of religious observances (Isa. 1:13–14). The new moon of the seventh month apparently received special attention (Lev. 23:24; Num. 29:1–6; Ezra 3:6; Neh. 8:2). Although the exile brought a temporary cessation (Hos. 2:11), the festival was resumed later (Neh. 10:33; Ezra 3:1–6). It was on the first day of the seventh month that Ezra read the law before the public assembly (Neh. 7:73b—8:2). For Paul, new moon festivals were viewed as only a shadow of better things to come (Col. 2:16–17; cp. Isa. 66:23).

Annual festivals required the appearance of all males at the sanctuary (Exod. 34:23; Deut. 16:16). These occasions—called “feasts to the LORD” (Exod. 12:14; Lev. 23:39,41)—were times when freewill offerings were made (Deut. 16:16–17).

Passover The first of the three annual festivals was the Passover. It commemorated the final plague on Egypt when the firstborn of the Egyptians died and the Israelites were spared because of the blood smeared on their doorposts (Exod. 12:11,21,27,43,48). Passover took place on the 14th day (at evening) of the first month (Lev. 23:5). The animal (lamb or kid) to be slain was selected on the 10th day of the month (Exod. 12:3) and slaughtered on the 14th day and then eaten (Deut. 16:7). None of the animal was to be left over on the following morning (Exod. 34:25). The uncircumcised and the hired servant were not permitted to eat the sacrifice (Exod. 12:45–49).

The Passover was also called the feast of unleavened bread (Exod. 23:15; Deut. 16:16) because only unleavened bread was eaten during the seven days immediately following Passover (Exod. 12:15–20; 13:6–8; Deut. 16:3–8). Unleavened bread reflected the fact that the people had no time to put leaven in their bread before their hasty departure from Egypt. It was also apparently connected to the barley harvest (Lev. 23:4–14).

A young Jewish boy receives his first phylactery during his bar mitzvah.

During NT times large crowds gathered in Jerusalem to observe this annual celebration. Jesus was crucified during the Passover event. He and His disciples ate a Passover meal together on the eve of His death. During this meal Jesus said, “This is My body,” and “this cup is the new covenant in My blood” (Luke 22:17,19–20 HCSB). The NT identifies Christ with the Passover sacrifice: “For Christ our Passover has been sacrificed” (1 Cor. 5:7 HCSB).

Feast of Weeks The second of the three annual festivals was Pentecost, also called the feast of weeks (Exod. 34:22; Deut. 16:10,16; 2 Chron. 8:13), the feast of harvest (Exod. 23:16), and the day of firstfruits (Num. 28:26; cp. Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:17). It was celebrated seven complete weeks, or 50 days, after Passover (Lev. 23:15–16; Deut. 16:9); therefore, it was given the name Pentecost.

Essentially a harvest celebration, the term “weeks” was used of the period of grain harvest from the barley harvest to the wheat harvest, a period of about seven weeks. At this time the Lord was credited as the source of rain and fertility (Jer. 5:24). It was called “day of firstfruits” (Num. 28:26) because it marked the beginning of the time in which people were to bring offerings of firstfruits. It was celebrated as a sabbath with rest from ordinary labors and the calling of a holy convocation (Lev.23:21; Num. 28:26). It was a feast of joy and thanksgiving for the completion of the harvest season. The able-bodied men were to be present at the sanctuary, and a special sacrifice was offered (Lev. 23:15–22; Num. 28:26–31). According to Lev. 23:10–11,16–17, two large loaves were waved before the Lord by the anointed priests. These were made of fine flour from the new wheat and baked with leaven. They were a “wave offering” for the people. They could not be eaten until after this ceremony (Lev. 23:14; Josh. 5:10–11), and none of this bread was placed on the altar because of the leaven content. Also two lambs were offered. The feast was concluded by the eating of communal meals to which the poor, the stranger, and the Levites were invited.

Later tradition associated the feast of weeks with the giving of the law at Sinai. It had been concluded by some that Exod. 19:1 indicated the law was delivered on the fiftieth day after the exodus. Some thought that Deut. 16:12 may have connected the Sinai event and the festival, but Scripture does not indicate any definite link between Sinai and Pentecost. In the NT the Holy Spirit came upon the disciples at Pentecost (Acts 2:1–4), at the festive time when Jews from different countries were in Jerusalem to celebrate this annual feast. See Firstfruits; Pentecost.

The Day of Atonement The third annual festival came on the 10th day of the seventh month (Tishri-Sept./Oct.) and the fifth day before the feast of tabernacles (Lev. 16:1–34; Num. 29:7–11). According to Lev. 23:27–28, four main elements comprise this most significant feast. First, it was to be a “holy convocation,” drawing the focus of the people to the altar of divine mercy. The holy One of Israel called the people of Israel to gather in His presence and give their undivided attention to Him. Second, they were to “humble their souls” (“afflict your souls,” Lev. 23:27 KJV). This was explained by later tradition to indicate fasting and repentance. Israel understood that this was a day for mourning over their sins. The seriousness of this requirement is reiterated in Lev. 23:29, “If there is any person who will not humble himself on this same day, he shall be cut off from his people” (Lev. 23:29 NASB). Third, offerings are central to the Day of Atonement. The Bible devotes an entire chapter (Lev. 16) to them; they are also listed in Num. 29:7–11. In addition to these, when the day fell on a sabbath, the regular Sabbath offerings were offered. The fourth and final element of the day involved the prohibition of labor. The Day of Atonement was a “sabbath of rest” (Lev. 23:32), and the Israelites were forbidden to do any work at all. If they disobeyed, they were liable to capital punishment (Lev. 23:30).

The center point of this feast involved the high priest entering the holy of holies. Before entering, the high priest first bathed his entire body, going beyond the mere washing of hands and feet as required for other occasions. This washing symbolized his desire for purification. Rather than donning his usual robe and colorful garments (described in Exod. 28 and Lev. 8), he was commanded to wear special garments of linen. Also, the high priest sacrificed a bullock as a sin offering for himself and for his house (Lev. 16:6). After filling his censer with live coals from the altar, he entered the holy of holies where he placed incense on the coals. Then he took some of the blood from the slain bullock and sprinkled it on the mercy seat (“atonement cover,” Lev. 16:13 NIV) and also on the ground in front of the ark, providing atonement for the priesthood (Lev. 16:14-15). Next he sacrificed a male goat as a sin offering for the people. Some of this blood was then also taken into the holy of holies and sprinkled there on behalf of the people (Lev. 16:15). Then he took another goat, called the “scapegoat” (for “escape goat”), laid his hands on its head, confessed over it the sins of Israel, and then released it into the desert where it symbolically carried away the sins of the people (Lev. 16:8,10). The remains of the sacrificial bullock and male goat were taken outside the city and burned, and the day was concluded with additional sacrifices.

According to Heb. 9–10 this ritual is a symbol of the atoning work of Christ, our great high Priest, who did not need to make any sacrifice for Himself but shed His own blood for our sins. As the high priest of the OT entered the holy of holies with the blood of sacrificial animals, Jesus entered heaven itself to appear on our behalf in front of the Father (Heb.

9:11-12). Each year the high priest repeated his sin offerings for his own sin and the sins of the people, giving an annual reminder that perfect and permanent atonement had not yet been made; but Jesus, through His own blood, accomplished eternal redemption for His people (Heb. 9:12). Just as the sacrifice of the Day of Atonement was burned outside the camp of Israel, Jesus suffered outside the gate of Jerusalem so that He might redeem His people from sin (Heb. 13:11-12).

Feast of Tabernacles The fourth annual festival was the feast of tabernacles (2 Chron. 8:13; Ezra 3:4; Zech. 14:16), also called the feast of ingathering (Exod. 23:16; 34:22), the feast to the Lord (Lev. 23:39; Judg. 21:19). Sometimes it was simply called “the feast” (1 Kings 8:2; 2 Chron. 5:3; 7:8; Neh. 8:14; Isa. 30:29; Ezek. 45:23,25) because it was so well-known. Its observance combined the ingathering of the labor of the field (Exod. 23:16), the fruit of the earth (Lev. 23:39), the ingathering of the threshing floor and winepress (Deut. 16:13), and the dwelling in booths (or “tabernacles”), which were to be joyful reminders to Israel (Lev. 23:41; Deut. 16:14). The “booth” in Scripture is not an image of privation and misery but of protection, preservation, and shelter from heat and storm (Pss. 27:5; 31:20; Isa. 4:6). The rejoicing community included family, servants, widows, orphans, Levites, and sojourners (Deut. 16:13-15).

The feast began on the fifteenth day of Tishri (the seventh month), which was five days after the Day of Atonement. It lasted for seven days (Lev. 23:36; Deut. 16:13; Ezek. 45:25). On the first day, booths were constructed of fresh branches of trees. Each participant had to collect twigs of myrtle, willow, and palm in the area of Jerusalem for construction of the booths (Neh. 8:13-18). Every Israelite was to live for seven days in these during the festival, in commemoration of when their fathers lived in such booths after their exodus from Egypt (Lev. 23:40; Neh. 8:15). The dedication of Solomon's temple took place at the feast (1 Kings 8:2).

	Note 1	The Jewish year is strictly lunar, being 12 lunations with an average of 29 1/2 days making 354 days in the year. The Jewish sacred year begins with the new moon of spring which occurs between our March 22 and April 23 to a cycle of 19 years. We can understand it best if we imagine our New Year's Day, which now comes on Jan. 1, with no regard to the moon, varying each year with Easter, the time of the Passover, the time of the full moon which, as a new moon, had introduced the New Year into winter before.					Note 2	Because the Jewish calendar contains a 13th month, Veadar or Adar Sheni, intercalated 7 times every 19 years, to render the average length of the year nearly correct, and to keep the seasons in the proper months. The Jewish day begins at sunset of the previous day.

After the return from exile, Ezra read the law and led the people in acts of penitence during this feast (Neh. 8:13-9:3). Later, Josephus referred to it as the holiest and greatest of the Hebrew feasts. Later additions to the ritual included a libation of water drawn from the pool of Siloam (the probable background for Jesus' comments on "living water," John 7:37-39) and the lighting of huge menorahs (candelabra) at the Court of the Women (the probable background for Jesus' statement, "I am the light of the world," John 8:12 HCSB). The water and the "pillar of light" provided during the wilderness wandering (when the people dwelt in tabernacles) was temporary and in contrast to the continuing water and light claimed by Jesus during this feast which commemorated that wandering period.

Feast of Trumpets Modern Rosh Hashanah is traced back to the so-called "Feast of Trumpets," the sounding of the trumpets on the first day of the seventh month (Tishri) of the religious calendar year (Lev. 23:24; Num. 29:1). The trumpet referred to here was the shophar, a ram's horn. It was distinctive from the silver trumpets blown on the other new moons.

This day evolved into the second most holy day on the modern Jewish religious calendar. It begins the "ten days of awe" before the Day of Atonement. According to Lev. 23:24-27 the celebration consisted of the blowing of trumpets, a time of rest, and "an offering by fire." The text itself says nothing specifically about a New Year's Day, and the term itself (rosh hashanah) is found only one time in Scripture (Ezek. 40:1) where it refers to the 10th day. The Postexilic assembly on the first day of the seventh month, when Ezra read the law, was not referred to as a feast day (Neh. 8:2-3). The fact that the OT contains two calendars—a civil and a religious one—further complicates our understanding of the origins of this holiday. Until modern times this day did not appear to be a major feast day.

Two feasts of Postexilic origin are noted in Scripture—Purim and Hanukkah.

Purim Purim, commemorating the deliverance of the Jews from genocide through the efforts of Esther (Esther 9:16-32), derives its name from the “lot” (pur) which Haman planned to cast in order to decide when he should carry into effect the decree issued by the king for the extermination of the Jews (Esther 9:24). In the apocryphal book of 2 Maccabees (15:36), it is called the Day of Mordecai. It was celebrated on the fourteenth day of Adar (March) by those in villages and unwalled towns and on the 15th day by those in fortified cities (Esther 9:18-19). No mention of any religious observance is connected with the day; in later periods, the book of Esther was read in the synagogue on this day. It became a time for rejoicing and distribution of food and presents.

Hanukkah The other Postexilic holiday was Hanukkah, a festival that began on the 25th day of Kislev (Dec.) and lasted eight days. Josephus referred to it as the Feast of Lights because a candle was lighted each successive day until a total of eight was reached. The festival commemorates the victories of Judas Maccabeus in 167 B.C. At that time, when temple worship was reinstated, after an interruption of three years, a celebration of eight days took place. The modern celebration does not greatly affect the routine duties of everyday life. This feast is referred to in John 10:22, where it is called the Feast of Dedication.

Two festivals occurred less often than once a year: the Sabbatical year and the Year of Jubilee.

Sabbatical Year Each seventh year Israel celebrated a sabbath year for its fields. This involved a rest for the land from all cultivation (Exod. 23:10,11; Lev. 25:2-7; Deut. 15:1-11; 31:10-13). Other names for this festival were sabbath of rest (Lev. 25:4), year of rest (Lev. 25:5), year of release (Deut. 15:9), and the seventh year (Deut. 15:9). The Sabbatical year, like the Year of Jubilee, began on the first day of the month Tishri. This observance is attested by 1 Maccabees 6:49,53 and Josephus. Laws governing this year of rest included the following: (1) the soil, vineyards, and olive orchards were to enjoy complete rest (Exod. 23:10-11; Lev. 25:4-5); (2) the spontaneous growth of the fields or trees (Isa. 37:30) was for the free use of the hireling, stranger, servants, and cattle (Exod. 23:10-11; Lev. 25:6-7), fruitful harvest was promised for the sixth year (Lev. 25:20-22); (3) debts were released for all persons, with the exception of foreigners (Deut. 15:1-4) (probably this law did not forbid voluntary payment of debts, no one was to oppress a poor man); (4) finally, at the Feast of Tabernacles during this year, the law was to be read to the people in solemn assembly (Deut. 31:10-13).

Jewish tradition interpreted 2 Chron. 36:21 to mean that the 70 years' captivity was intended to make up for not observing sabbatical years. After the captivity this Sabbatical Year was carefully observed.

Year of Jubilee This was also called the year of liberty (Ezek. 46:17). Its relation to the Sabbatical Year and the general directions for its observance are found in Lev. 25:8-16,23-55. Its bearing on lands dedicated to the Lord is given in Lev. 27:16-25.

After the span of seven sabbaths of years, or seven times seven years (49 years), the trumpet was to sound throughout the land; and the Year of Jubilee was to be announced (Lev. 25:8-9).

The law states three respects in which the Jubilee Year was to be observed: rest for the soil—no sowing, reaping, or gathering from the vine (Lev. 25:11); reversion of landed property (Lev. 25:10-34; 27:16-24)—all property in fields and houses located in villages or unwalled towns, which the owner had been forced to sell through poverty and which had not been redeemed, was to revert without payment to its original owner or his lawful heirs (exceptions noted in Lev. 25:29-30; 27:17-21); and redemption of slaves—every Israelite, who through poverty had sold himself to another Israelite or to a foreigner settled in the land, if he had not been able to redeem himself or had not been redeemed by a kinsman, was to go free with his children (Lev. 25:39-41).

It appears that the Year of Jubilee was a time of such complete remission of all debts that it became a season of celebration of freedom and grace. In this year oppression was to cease, and every member of the covenant family was to find joy and satisfaction in the Lord of the covenant. God had redeemed His people from bondage in Egypt (Lev. 25:42), and none of them was again to be reduced to the status of a perennial slave. God's child was not to be oppressed (Lev. 25:43,46); and poverty could not, even at its worst, reduce an Israelite to a status less than that of a hired servant, a wage earner, and then only until the Year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:40).

After the institution of the Year of Jubilee laws (Lev. 25:8-34), the year is mentioned again in Num. 36:4. No reference to the celebration of this festival is found in Scripture apart from the idealistic anticipation of Ezek. 46:17, but the influence of such laws illuminate such passages as the conduct of Naboth and Ahab in 1 Kings 21:3-29; and the prophetic rebukes found in Isa. 5:8 and Mic. 2:2.

FESTUS (Fēs' tūs) Successor of Felix as procurator of Judea (Acts 24:27); assumed this office at Nero's appointment in A.D. 60. He held it until his death in A.D. 62. Paul the apostle appealed to Porcius Festus for the opportunity of being tried before Caesar, and Festus granted that request. See Paul; Herod; Rome and the Roman Empire.

FETTER Translation of several Hebrew and Greek terms referring to something that constrains, especially a shackle for the foot. Fetters were made of wood, bronze (Judg. 16:21; 2 Chron. 33:11), or iron (Ps. 149:8). Fetters worn on the feet were often joined by a rope or chain to hobble the prisoner (Mark 5:4). Fetters were painful to the feet (Ps. 105:18). Paul claimed that though he wore fetters, the word of God was not fettered (2 Tim. 2:9 REB, RSV).

FEVER Elevated body temperature or disease accompanied by such symptoms. The “burning ague” (Lev. 26:16) is an acute fever marked by regular periods of fever, sweating, and then chills. Fever accompanying “consumption” or “wasting disease” (Deut. 28:22 REB) could refer to any number of diseases: malaria, typhoid, typhus, dysentery, chronic diarrhea, or cholera. The “extreme burning” of Deut. 28:22 is understood by most modern translations as a reference to the weather (“fiery heat” RSV, NASB; “scorching wind” TEV) rather than to a fever. Jesus healed two persons afflicted with fevers—Peter's mother-in-law (Matt. 8:14-15; Mark 1:30-31; Luke 4:38-39) and an official's son (John 4:52). In Luke the healing was portrayed as an exorcism. In Acts 28:8 Paul healed Publius's father of a fever and dysentery (“bloody flux” KJV). See Diseases.

FIELD Unenclosed land. In the Hebrew definition of field, both the use of land (pasture, Gen. 29:2; 31:4; cropland, Gen. 37:7; 47:24; hunting ground, Gen. 27:3,5) and the terrain (land, Num. 21:20, literal translation, “field of Moab”; Judg. 9:32,36) were insignificant. The crucial distinction is between what is enclosed and what is open. A field may be contrasted with a tent (Num. 19:14,16), a camp (Lev. 14:3,7), vineyards which were customarily enclosed (Exod. 22:5; Lev. 25:3-4), or with a walled city (Lev. 14:53; Deut. 28:3,16). Villages without walls were regarded as fields (Lev. 25:31). Fields were likewise distinguished from barren wasteland (Ezek. 33:27). Fields were marked with landmarks (Deut. 19:14).

The NRSV translated the Hebrew term shedemah, one of the words generally translated “field,” as “vineyard” at Deut. 32:32. The REB rendered the term differently each place it was used (terraces, Deut. 32:32; slope, 2 Kings 23:4; vineyard, Isa. 16:8; field, Jer. 31:40; orchards, Hab. 3:17).

FIELD OF BLOOD See Akeldama.

FIERY SERPENT God used snakes of fiery appearance or burning bite to teach His people. The Hebrew word for burning or fiery is the same as for seraphim in Isa. 6 but refers to different kinds of creatures. To punish the Israelites for complaining about their lot in the wilderness, God sent fiery serpents among them. As a result, many died. The serpents were natural residents of the wilderness (Deut. 8:15). Subsequently, God directed Moses to make a representation of a fiery serpent and place it on a pole. The brass serpent made by Moses became the means of healing for those that had been bitten by the fiery serpents but had not died. Jesus used this to point to His own fate of being lifted up on a cross (John 3:14; cp. 12:32). See Moses; Numbers.

Isaiah used the fear of snakes to warn complacent Philistines that God would raise up a more fearful enemy who could be compared only to a serpent (seraph) which flew or darted (Isa. 14:29 NIV;cp. 30:6).

FIG, FIG TREE Important fruit and tree of the Holy Land. Adam and Eve used leaves from the plant to make clothing (Gen. 3:7). Jesus cursed a fig tree because it was without fruit (Mark 11:13-14,20-21). See Plants.

FIGURED STONE Idol of carved stone (NIV) in contrast to one of molten metal, associated with Canaanite worship (Lev. 26:1; Num. 33:52), according to modern translations. KJV reads, “image of stone” and “pictures.” The same Hebrew term is used in Ezek. 8:12 for idolatrous shrines decorated with base reliefs of gods in the form of animals (8:10; prohibited in Deut. 4:16-18). Various identifications of the animals have been suggested, beasts similar to the lions and serpent-dragons of the “Ishtar Gate” in Babylon, animals similar to those serving as mounts for the gods in stone carvings at Maltaya, Egyptian mortuary deities, and totem animals.

FIGUREHEAD Emblem on the prow of a ship (Acts 28:11 NIV, NRSV, NASB). The figure (“sign” KJV) in Acts is the Twin Brothers Castor and Pollux, sons of Zeus and Leda, identified with the constellation Gemini. Sight of the constellation was a good omen in bad weather. Thus the figurehead was something of a good luck charm.

FILIGREE Modern translation of ornamental work, especially of fine metal wire. KJV reads, “ouches”; REB, “rosettes.” Gold filigree was used in the settings of precious stones (Exod. 28:11,20; 39:6,13) and as clasps (Exod. 28:13,25; 39:16,18) for clothing or jewelry. The design in Exodus was likely a rosette or simple floral pattern.

FILLETS Either metal bands binding the tops of pillars used in construction of the tabernacle (Exod. 36:38; 38:10-12,17,19) or else rods connecting the pillars to one another (TEV). Jeremiah 52:21 uses a different Hebrew word to refer to a measuring line used to measure the circumference of a pillar.

FINANCIAL PLANNING The Bible provides examples of both effective and ineffective financial planning in the face of economic adversity. Examples of good financial planning include Joseph's preparation for famine in Egypt (Gen. 41:34-36), the servants who wisely invested their master's money (Luke 19:13-19) and the Corinthian believers who laid aside money to help others (1 Cor. 16:1-2; cp. 2 Cor. 9:1-5). Proverbs 27:23-27 counsels a shepherd to know well the condition of his flocks so that they will provide for him in the future. Diversification of investments is advised in Ecclesiastes 11:2.

Poor financial planning can be seen in the man who built bigger barns without thought of his impending death (Luke 12:16-21), the man who started to build a tower without the money to complete it (Luke 14:28-30) and the servant who refused to invest his master's money (Luke 19:20-21).

The Bible recognizes that having sound plans helps ensure a successful venture (Prov. 6:6-8; 21:5; 27:23-27; 30:25; Isa. 32:8; 2 Cor. 9:5). A key element in planning is the wise counsel of others (Prov. 13:18; 20:18), especially God, who causes plans to succeed or fail (Ps. 32:8; Prov. 3:6; 16:1-4, 9; Isa. 29:15).

FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY Two maxims underlie the Bible's principles of financial responsibility: the earth and its resources belong to God (Lev. 25:23; Job 41:11; Pss. 24:1; 89:11; Hag. 2:8), and they have been entrusted to people to use wisely (Gen. 1:29-30; 9:1-4). The overall message of the Bible regarding finances is one of personal thrift combined with generosity toward others. The Bible places a high value on saving money to provide for oneself and others in times of need (Gen. 41:1-57; Prov. 6:6-8; 21:20; Eccles. 11:2; Luke 12:16-21; 1 Cor. 16:2). Because God blesses those who give to others (Deut. 15:10; Ps. 112:5; Prov. 11:25; 22:9; Mal. 3:10; 2 Cor. 9:6-12), the willingness to give generously (Matt. 25:31-46; 2 Cor. 8:3) and without thought of return (Deut. 15:11; 23:19; Ps. 15:5; Matt. 5:42; Luke 6:34; Rom. 11:35) is considered a mark of financial responsibility. Those who save to provide only for themselves, or are unable to save because of extravagant spending, are held to be foolish (Job 20:20-22; Prov. 21:20).

Other marks of financial responsibility include careful financial planning (Prov. 27:23-27), hard work (Prov. 28:19; Eph. 4:28; 2 Thess. 3:10; cp. Prov. 24:33-34), diversification of investments (Eccles. 11:2), paying debts when they become due (Prov. 3:27-28), providing for one's family (1 Tim. 5:8), and leaving an inheritance to one's children (Num. 27:7-11; Prov. 13:22; cp. Ruth 4:6; Eccles. 5:13-14).

Jesus' stewardship parables speak of financial responsibility as a precursor of greater areas of responsibility in the kingdom of God (Matt. 25:14-30; Luke 16:1-13; 19:11-27).

Paul H. Wright

FINERY Modern translation of Hebrew term for the luxuriousness of the jewelry and clothing worn by the society women of Jerusalem (Isa. 3:18). KJV reads "bravery"; NASB, "beauty." The Hebrew word describes the beauty or glory of Aaron's priestly clothes (Exod. 28:2), the glory of God's house (Isa. 60:7), battlefield honor (Judg. 4:9), and the pompous (NASB) pride (NIV) of the Assyrian king (Isa. 10:12). Thus finery in itself is not bad, but prideful human attitudes concerning it soon became sinful. See Fashion.

FINGER OF GOD Picturesque expression of God at work. The finger of God writing the Ten Commandments illustrated God's giving the law without any mediation (Exod. 31:18; Deut. 9:10). Elsewhere the finger of God suggests God's power to bring plagues on Egypt (Exod. 8:19) and in making the heavens (Ps. 8:3). Jesus' statement, "If I drive out demons by the finger of God, then the kingdom of God has come to you" (Luke 11:20 HCSB), means that since Jesus cast out demons by the power of God, God's rule had become a reality among His hearers.

FINING POT KJV term for a crucible (NRSV, NIV) or smelting pot (REB), a vessel used to heat metal to a high temperature as part of the refining process (Prov. 17:3; 27:21). See Crucible.

FIR TREE KJV term for a tree most often identified with the pine (NIV, REB, TEV). Others have identified the tree with the juniper (NASB at Isa. 41:19 and 60:13 only) or cypress (NRSV, NASB elsewhere). See Plants.

FIRE The word "fire" in our English Bibles normally translates the Hebrew word esh in the OT and the Greek word pur (the root from which such English terms as "pyromaniac" and "pure" are derived) in the NT. Both terms signify the physical manifestations of burning: heat, light, and flame. Ancient peoples kindled fire either by rapidly rubbing dry pieces of wood together creating enough friction to ignite dry vegetation or by striking flint rocks thus creating sparks (cp. 2 Macc. 10:3). Normally, fires were maintained and perpetuated to avoid the need for kindling. Abraham, for example, apparently carried a torch with him on his way to sacrifice Isaac in order to prevent having to kindle one at the altar (Gen. 22:6-7).

Throughout both the OT and NT, fire functions as a significant theological symbol. It is frequently associated with such important concepts as God's presence, divine judgment, and purification. In fact, in the OT, fire served as the primary means by which God manifested His presence and exercised judgment. Because of the sacrificial system, fire was an important aspect of early Israelite worship; it was the means by which animal sacrifices were offered up to God as a "pleasing aroma" (Gen. 1:8; Exod. 29:18,25,41).

The first time God appeared to a human in Scripture, He assumed the form of a smoking firepot and a flaming torch (Gen. 15:17). Similarly, God appeared to Moses as a fiery bush when He first revealed His covenant name (Exod. 3:2), and He spoke from the midst of a fire on top of Mount Sinai when He gave the Ten Commandments to Israel (Exod. 19:8; 24:17; Deut. 4:11-15). God also led the Israelites through the desert by means of a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night (Deut. 1:32-33).

God often communicates the protective nature of His presence by means of fire as well. The Prophet Elisha was surrounded by an angelic army of flaming horses and chariots when the king of Aram tried to attack him (2 Kings 6:17). Zechariah foresaw a future Jerusalem without the usual protective outer wall because God told the prophet “For I...will be a wall of fire around her”(Zech. 2:5 NASB).

The NT continues to portray God's presence in the form of fire especially in the person of the Holy Spirit. The outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost was signaled by the appearance of fire on each believer's head (Acts 2:3). In his first letter to the Thessalonians, Paul warns believers not to “quench the Holy Spirit” (1 Thess. 5:19 NASB). The word “quench” normally refers to extinguishing a fire. Since God so frequently indicated His presence by means of fire, fire became a metaphor for God emphasizing both His holiness and His retributive justice (Deut. 4:24; Heb. 12:29).

In addition to symbolizing God's presence among His people, fire serves as an instrument of divine judgment. The destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah is the first example of God's use of fire to judge and destroy wickedness (Gen. 19:24). Later in Scripture, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah became a type indicating the severity of future judgment (Deut. 29:22-23; Isa. 13:19; Lam. 4:6; Luke 17:29; 2 Pet. 2:6; Jude 7). A special fire called the “fire of the LORD” consumed the outer edges of Israel's camp in the wilderness when the Israelites complained, and the same supernatural fire fell from heaven and consumed the soldiers whom Ahaziah had sent to seize Elijah the prophet (2 Kings 1:12). On numerous occasions Jesus described the eternal punishment of the damned in terms of an unquenchable fire (Matt. 5:22; 13:40; 18:8; 25:41; Mark 9:48; John 15:6).

Even in contexts where divine judgment is not explicitly mentioned, fire was a preferred means of destruction, especially for things associated with extreme defilement or evil. For example, the city of Jericho, along with certain other Canaanite cities, was completely burned—all the inhabitants, animals, and goods—as an act of devotion to God and as a means of purging the land from the abominable practices of the Canaanites (Josh. 6:24). Idols were also frequently destroyed with fire (Deut. 7:5; 9:2; 12:3; 2 Kings 19:18).

Certainly, fire played an important role in day-to-day domestic activities such as cooking (Exod. 12:8), warming homes (Isa. 44:16), and purifying metals (Jer. 6:29). The preponderance of biblical references to fire, however, express its power as a symbol of divine presence, divine protection, and divine judgment. See Baptism of Fire; Molech.

FIREPAN Utensil made of bronze (Exod. 27:3) or gold (1 Kings 7:50, KJV, “censers”) used to carry live coals from the altar of burnt offering (Exod. 27:3; 38:3), as censers for burning incense (Num. 16:6,17), and as trays for collecting the burnt wicks from the tabernacle lamps (Exod. 25:38; 37:23; the “snuffdishes” of the KJV).

FIRKIN Unit of liquid measure (John 2:6). Firkin is an archaic English word that was used to translate a Greek term referring to a measure of approximately 10 gallons. See Weights and Measures.

FIRMAMENT Great vault or expanse of sky that separates the upper and lower waters. God created the firmament on the second day to separate the “waters from the waters” (Gen. 1:6-7). One use of “heaven” in the Bible is to refer to the ceiling or canopy of the earth. Heaven in this sense is also referred to as the firmament or sky (Gen. 1:8). Into this expanse God set the sun, moon, and stars (Gen. 1:14-18).

In Gen. 1:6 the firmament separates the mass of waters and divides them into layers. The firmament is mentioned 17 times (KJV) in Genesis, the Psalms, Ezekiel, and Daniel. It is described as bright, transparent like crystal, revealing the handiwork of God, and signifying His seat of power (Pss. 19:1; 150:1; Ezek. 1:22; Dan. 12:3).

Some scholars argue that the Hebrews had a primitive cosmology where the firmament was visualized as a rigid, solid dome—a celestial dam (Gen. 7:11; 2 Sam. 22:8; Job 26:8; 37:18; Prov. 8:28; Mal. 3:10). Above the firmament flowed the heavenly waters. The firmament was punctuated by grilles or sluices, “windows of heaven” through which rain was released. Others argue that such interpretations are unsound, in that they confuse poetic and figurative language with literal prose. Others say Israel's inspired writers used language of experience and appearance rather than language of precise scientific description. See Heaven.

FIRST AND LAST See Alpha and Omega.

FIRSTBORN First son born to a couple and required to be specially dedicated to God. The firstborn son of newly married people was believed to represent the prime of human vigor (Gen. 49:3; Ps. 78:51). In memory of the death of Egypt's firstborn and the preservation of the firstborn of Israel, all the firstborn of Israel, both of man and beast, belonged to Yahweh (Exod. 13:2,15; cp. 12:12-16). This meant that the people of Israel attached unusual value to the eldest son and assigned special privileges and responsibilities to him. He was presented to the Lord when he was a month old. Since he belonged to the Lord, it was necessary for the father to buy back the child from the priest at a redemption price not to exceed five shekels (Num. 18:16). The husband of several wives would have to redeem the firstborn of each.

The birthright of a firstborn included a double portion of the estate and leadership of the family. As head of the house after his father's death, the eldest son customarily cared for his mother until her death, and he also provided for his sisters until their marriage. The firstborn might sell his rights as Esau did (Gen. 25:29-34) or forfeit them for misconduct as Reuben did because of incest (Gen. 35:22; 49:3-4).

The firstborn of a clean animal was brought into the sanctuary on the eighth day after birth (Exod. 22:29-30). If it were without blemish, it was sacrificed (Deut. 15:19; Num. 18:17). If it had a blemish, the priest to whom it was given could eat it as common food outside Jerusalem (Deut. 15:21-23), or it could be eaten at home by its owner. Apparently the firstborn of a clean animal was not to be used for any work since it belonged to the Lord (Deut. 15:19).

The firstborn of an unclean animal had to be redeemed by an estimation of the priest, with the addition of one-fifth (Lev. 27:27; Num. 18:15). According to Exod. 13:13; 34:20, the firstborn of an ass was either ransomed by a sheep or lamb, or its neck had to be broken.

Figuratively, Israel was God's "firstborn" (Exod. 4:22; Jer. 31:9) and enjoyed priority status. God compared His relationship to Israel with the relationship of a father and his firstborn son. Within Israel, the tribe of Levi represented the firstborn of the nation in its worship ceremony (Num. 3:40-41; 8:18).

Christ is the "firstborn" of the Father (Heb. 1:6 NIV) by having preeminent position over others in relation to Him. He is also described as "firstborn among many brothers" (Rom. 8:29 HCSB) and "firstborn over all creation" (Col. 1:15 HCSB). Paul (Col. 1:18) and John (Rev. 1:5) refer to Christ as "firstborn from the dead"—the first to rise bodily from the grave and not die again.

Hebrews 12:23 refers to the "assembly of the firstborn whose names have been written in heaven" (HCSB). Christian believers, united with and as joint heirs with Christ, enjoy the status of "firstborn" in God's household. See Family.

FIRSTFRUITS Choice examples of a crop harvested first and dedicated to God. In accordance with Mosaic law, individual Israelites brought to the house of the Lord “the choice (that is, “the best”) first fruits of your soil” (Exod. 23:19 NASB; 34:26), including grain, wine, and oil, which were used—except for the grain (Lev. 2:14-16)—for the support of the priests (Num. 18:12; Deut. 18:4). According to Deut. 26:1-11, the offering was brought in a basket to the sanctuary for presentation. The book of Proverbs promises prosperity to those who honor the Lord with the firstfruits (Prov. 3:9-10).

According to Lev. 23:9-14, the first sheaf of the new crop of barley was presented as a wave offering before the Lord. This took place on the day after the Passover Sabbath and was a public acknowledgment that all came from God and belonged to Him (Num. 28:26; cp. Exod. 23:16; 34:22). Not only were the Israelites to be mindful that the land of Canaan was the Lord's possession and that they had only the rights of tenants (Lev. 25:23), but they were also to be aware that the fertility of Canaan's soil was not due to one of the Baals but rather to the Lord's gift of grace.

Israel was described as God's “firstfruits” (Jer. 2:3). Christ in His resurrection is described as the “firstfruits” of them that slept (1 Cor. 15:20,23). The Holy Spirit is spoken of as a “firstfruits” (Rom. 8:23), and believers are also spoken of as “a kind of firstfruits” (James 1:18). The saved remnant within Israel is described as “first-fruits” (Rom. 11:16), as are the 144,000 of the tribulation period (Rev. 14:4). The first converts of an area were designated “firstfruits” (Rom. 16:5; 1 Cor. 16:15). In each case the emphasis was on special dedication and blessing. See Festivals.

FIRST RAIN KJV term at Deut. 11:14 for the early rain. See Rain.

FISH, FISHING Animals living in water and breathing through gills; the profession and/or practice of catching fish to supply a family or society's need for food. Methods of catching fish included angling with a hook (Job 41:1), harpoons and spears (Job 41:7), use of dragnets (John 21:8), and thrown hand nets (Matt. 4:18).

Old Testament Fish are mentioned often but not by the different kinds. Fish were a favorite food and a chief source of protein (Num. 11:5; Neh. 13:16). The law regarded all fish with fins and scales as clean. Water animals that did not have fins and scales were unclean (Lev. 11:9-12).

Fish abounded in the inland waters of Palestine as well as in the Mediterranean. Fish caught in the Mediterranean were brought to ports such as Tyre and Sidon. The Sea of Chinnereth or Galilee was also a fishing center. The fish were preserved in salt and brought to Jerusalem where they were sold at a specially named “Fish Gate” in the city. The strong currents of the Jordan River carried many fish to the Dead Sea where they died (Ezek. 47:7-11).

References to fishing as an occupation are rare in the OT because, for the most part, in OT times the Mediterranean coast was controlled by the Philistines and Phoenicians. The Israelites depended largely on foreign trade for their fish (Neh. 13:16). Two OT texts (Song 7:4 KJV; Isa. 19:10 KJV) speak of fishpools and fishponds, possibly an indication of commercially raised fish or of fish farming.

The most famous OT fish was the great fish of the book of Jonah (1:17), one that God prepared especially for the occasion and one whose species the OT does not indicate.

New Testament During NT times commercial fishing businesses were conducted on the Sea of Galilee by fishermen organized in guilds (Luke 5:7,11). Fishermen were hard workers, crude in manner, rough in speech and in their treatment of others (John 18:10). Fishermen owned their ships, took hirelings into their service, and sometimes joined to form companies (Mark 1:20; Luke 5:7).

Fish provided food for the common people (Matt. 14:17; 15:34). The risen Lord ate fish with the disciples in Jerusalem (Luke 24:42) and by the Sea of Galilee (John 21:13). The primary method of preparing fish was broiling (John 21:9). The most famous NT fish was the one used to pay the temple tax for Jesus and Peter (Matt. 17:27).

Theological The Bible contains numerous figurative uses of fish and fishing. Human helplessness is compared to fish taken in a net (Eccles. 9:12; Hab. 1:14). Fish caught in a net symbolized God's judgment (Ps. 66:11; Ezek. 32:3). Jesus mentioned fishing when He called disciples to be witnesses (Matt. 4:18-19). Jesus compared the kingdom of heaven to a net thrown into the sea and loaded with fish of many varieties (Matt. 13:47).

In early Christian churches the Greek word for fish (ichthus) came to be interpreted as a cipher for Jesus. The first letter of each of the Greek words for “Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior” spell ichthus. We do not know when this cipher was first used; but once the identification was made, the fish became a standard Christian symbol.

FISH GATE A north gate of the second quarter of Jerusalem (Zeph. 1:10) mentioned in connection with fortifications built by Manasseh (2 Chron. 33:14). The gate was rebuilt during the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 3:3; 12:39). The name is perhaps derived from the proximity of the gate to the fish market (cp. Neh. 13:16-22).

FISHHOOK Curved or bent device of bone or iron used in biblical times for catching or holding fish (Job 41:1-2; Isa. 19:8 KJV, “angle”; Matt. 17:27). Habakkuk described God's people as helpless fish who would be captured by hooks (1:15) and nets. Amos 4:2 refers to the practice of ancient conquerors of leading captives with hooks through their lips. Such was the fate of Manasseh according to one interpretation (2 Chron. 33:11 NASB, NIV, TEV).

FITCHES KJV term for two different plants. The first is black cummin (Isa. 28:25,27). Ezekiel 4:9 refers to either spelt, an inferior type of wheat (NASB, NIV, TEV), or else vetches (REB), a plant of the bean family. See Plants.

FLAG KJV term for a water plant generally translated as “reed” (Exod. 2:3,5; Job 8:11) or rush (Isa. 19:6) by modern translations. See Plants.

FLAGON Large, two-handled jar for storing wine (Isa. 22:24 KJV; Exod. 25:29; 37:16 REB, NRSV). The Hebrew term ashishah translated as “flagon” by the KJV (2 Sam. 6:19; 1 Chron. 16:3; Song 2:5; Hos. 3:1) refers to a cake of raisins, often used as offerings to idols.

FLAGSTAFF Pole on which a standard is displayed (Isa. 30:17). The same Hebrew term is translated “mast” elsewhere (Isa. 33:23; Ezek. 27:5). The REB used the translation “mast” at Isa. 30:17 as well. The NASB preferred the translation “flag” for this text though the margin note, pole, can account for all occurrences of the term.

FLASK General term translators use to describe vessels. It does not appear in KJV. The term refers to a small container of perfumed oil in 2 Kings 9:1-3. The same Hebrew word appears in 1 Sam. 10:1. At Jer. 19:1 (RSV) refers to an earthenware water jar or jug. The vessel perhaps had a narrow neck making it impossible to mend (19:10). This Hebrew word recurs in 1 Kings 14:3. At Matt. 25:4 small containers for lamp oil are meant. The Greek term appears only here in the NT. Luke 7:37 refers to a small alabaster container such as had been used for expensive perfumes for thousands of years. See Cruse.

FLAX Plant (Linum usitatissimum) used to make linen. The fibers of the flax stem are the most ancient of textile fibers. Flax was cultivated by the Egyptians before the exodus (Exod. 9:31) and by the Canaanites before the conquest (Josh. 2:6). The making of linen was a common household chore in biblical times. Proverbs 31:13 described the virtuous wife as one who sought wool and flax. The linen making process involved pulling and drying flax stalks (often on rooftops, Josh. 2:6). The stalks were deseeded, soaked until the fibers were loosened (retted), and redried. A hackle, a comb or board with long teeth, was used to separate the outer fibers from the inner core. Further combing (carding) cleansed and ordered the fibers so that they might be spun into thread for weaving (Isa. 19:9). The remaining short, tangled fibers (the tow) were used to weave a coarse fabric or make twine (Judg. 16:9; Isa. 1:31).

Flax fibers were also used to make torches and lamp wicks. Isaiah 43:17 pictures armies as a wick which the Lord would extinguish. In Isa. 42:3 the Servant of the Lord is one who will not quench a dimly burning wick. The picture suggests one who will help and comfort the powerless rather than bring harsh judgment. Matthew understood Jesus' ministry as the fulfillment of this Scripture (Matt. 12:20). See Linen.

FLEET Group of ships. Solomon built a fleet of ships at Ezion-geber with the help of Hiram of Tyre (1 Kings 9:26-27; 10:11,22). KJV translated “fleet” as “navy” or “navy of ships.” Solomon's fleet was used for commercial rather than military purposes. See Ezion-geber; Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

FLESH The term “flesh,” while prevalent in older English translations of the Bible such as the KJV and ASV (1901), has largely been replaced by numerous other terms in most modern English translations. Undoubtedly this shift is due to the wide variety of nuances the word “flesh” can have in the biblical context that are better rendered by other words in a modern setting. Nonetheless, such seemingly unrelated terms as “skin,” “food,” “meat,” “relatives,” “humankind,” and “sinful nature” in modern English translations often render the same single word in the original languages: basar in Hebrew and sarx in Greek. Due to the obvious flexibility of the word, each of its primary meanings is listed below followed by an explanation and biblical examples.

“Flesh” as a Designation for the Body or Parts of the Body “Flesh” frequently refers to the skin or the body—all the material that covers the skeleton of humans and animals. For example, “flesh” clearly refers to the body as a whole in Lev. 14:9 where cleansed lepers are commanded to bathe “their flesh” in water. The psalmist also uses “flesh” in reference to his whole body when he says “my flesh trembles in fear of you” (Ps. 119:120 NIV).

While the term predominately refers to the human body, it can also refer to the bodies of animals. For example, when Joseph explains Pharaoh's dream concerning the seven fat cows and the seven lean cows, he consistently refers to the lean cows as “thin of flesh,” a Hebrew idiom meaning “skinny” (Gen. 41:1-3). Paul distinguishes between various kinds of animal “flesh” or body types when he explains the physical resurrection to the Corinthian Christians (1 Cor. 15:39). Since “flesh” can be used of animal bodies, it can, by extension, refer to meat or food as well (Exod. 21:28; Isa. 22:13).

The term can also, however, refer to part of the body. For example, the Bible often uses “flesh” as a euphemism for the male genitals. This use of the term is most common in contexts related to the covenant sign of circumcision (Gen. 17:11,14; Rom. 2:28; Gal. 6:13).

Occasionally, “flesh” is used in contrast to the term “soul” (nephesh in Hebrew) thus distinguishing a person's physical existence from his spiritual existence (Isa. 10:18; Pss. 63:1; 84:3). Similarly, “flesh” is used in contrast to the word for heart/mind (leb in Hebrew) to distinguish the body from the mind, will, and emotions (Ps. 16:9; Prov. 14:30).

Flesh as a Designation for Mankind or Blood Relatives Scripture occasionally uses the term “flesh” as a general designation for all living things. In Gen. 6:17, God warned that the flood He was about to bring upon the earth would destroy “all flesh.” This included animals and human beings alike. More narrowly, “flesh” can be used as a designation for all humanity. The famous prophecy in Joel 2:28-32 which is quoted and fulfilled in Acts 2:17-21 promised that God's Spirit would be poured out on “all flesh.” Clearly, in this case, only humanity is in view.

In an even narrower sense, “flesh” can refer to one's relatives. Leviticus 18:6, for example, employs the terms in prohibitions against sexual intimacy with close family members.

The use of the term “flesh” as a designation for humanity suggests an important contrast between man and God. Man is “flesh,” but God is “spirit”; man is finite and mortal, but God is infinite and immortal. Numerous passages stress this contrast by pairing the word “flesh” with the word “spirit” (Gen. 6:3; Isa. 31:3; Matt. 26:41). The word “flesh” by itself, however, can also stress the weakness and sinfulness of humanity in contrast to the power and holiness of God (Pss. 56:5; 78:39; 2 Chron. 32:8).

Flesh as a Designation for the Sinful Nature In the NT, especially in the Pauline epistles, the term “flesh” takes on a specialized theological meaning. Paul consistently uses the term “flesh” in reference to the fallen human nature that is incapable of conforming to God's holy expectations (Rom. 7:5,18; 8:3-9; Gal. 3:3). In this sense, “flesh” is unaided human effort—mere human strength without the power of the Holy Spirit. It is this “flesh” that offers sin a foothold in a believer's life (Rom. 8:3-4,9; Gal. 3:3; 5:16-17). Paul explains that the flesh and the Spirit are in conflict with each other within believers necessitating the believer's denial of sinful desires and cooperation with the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8:13; Gal. 2:19-21; Col. 3:5).

Unfortunately, many have misunderstood Paul's specialized use of the term “flesh” and have taken the passages mentioned above to mean that our bodies are inherently evil. Nothing, however, could have been further from Paul's mind. Paul taught that Christ Himself came in the flesh and yet lived a sinless life (Rom. 1:3; 1 Tim. 3:16). Furthermore, the body is God's creation and therefore is good when it is devoted to God in holy service (1 Tim 4:4). In fact, Paul referred to the believer's body as the temple of the Holy Spirit indicating its sacred nature and purpose (1 Cor. 6:19-20). The notion that the physical body is inherently evil and therefore an obstacle to spirituality came not from Paul but from Plato. See Anthropology: Body.

FLESH AND SPIRIT Terms noticeably used in tandem in the NT to contrast diametrically opposed lifestyles. The term “flesh” is often ascribed the connotation of an ungodly lifestyle of selfishness and sensual self-gratification. The term “spirit” signifies the opposite characteristics. One who walks by the Spirit lives with a conspicuous God consciousness that directs his or her dispositions, attitudes, and actions.

This use of these terms is evident especially in Paul's writing. In Rom. 7 Paul spoke frankly about his constant struggle between the continuing power of his flesh and the sincere intentions of his will to live obediently to God. “For I do not do the good that I want to do, but I practice the evil that I do not want to do” (Rom. 7:19 HCSB). This battle is because of the “flesh” the believer battles even after salvation. Paul poses the question then, “Who will rescue me from this body of death?” (Rom. 7:24 HCSB). He answers with confidence, “I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord! So then, with my mind I myself am a slave to the law of God, but with my flesh, to the law of sin” (Rom. 7:25 HCSB). Even though believers wrestle with the flesh, those who are in Jesus Christ are no longer under compulsion to live in a fleshly manner. In Gal. 5 Paul provides the most extensive treatment of this subject. He encourages Christians who indeed “live by the Spirit” also to “walk by the Spirit” so that they may avoid carrying “out the desire of the flesh.” The admonition here as well as in other Pauline passages is for Christians not to live carnally. A carnal Christian is a believer who, although regenerate, persists in living a life ruled by fleshly desires (Rom. 8:7; 1 Cor. 3:1).

Other texts in the NT use the terms “flesh” and “spirit” to underscore this same struggle. John instructed believers not to behave in such a way as to fulfill the “lust of the flesh” (1 John 2:16 HCSB).

This contrast should not be pushed to mean that human, physical existence is evil. Literal human flesh was created “good.” Some early Christian Gnostic groups perverted this concept and taught that anything related to physical existence should be considered evil in and of itself. This false dichotomy led some sects to become ascetic, depriving their physical bodies of proper food, sleep, and care in an attempt to purify them. Other groups came to the conclusion that what one did with the body was of no consequence spiritually, even acts of moral license.

Through the power and freedom of Christ, one must determine to live godly and not turn this freedom into “an opportunity for the flesh” (Gal. 5:13 HCSB). The goal is to demonstrate a life ruled by the constant presence of the Holy Spirit characterized by the traits of “love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faith, gentleness, and self control” (Gal. 5:22-23 HCSB).

FLESH HOOK Large fork used for handling large pieces of meat, especially at the sacrificial altar. Those in the tabernacle were of brass (Exod. 27:3; 38:3), those in the temple of bronze (2 Chron. 4:16) or gold (1 Chron. 28:17).

FLESHPOT Kettle used for cooking meat. The murmuring of the Israelites against Moses (Exod. 16:3) included the exaggerated claim that they customarily relaxed by the fleshpots in Egypt and had more than enough bread. In the ancient Near East meat was not part of the common people's regular diet.

FLINT Three Hebrew terms which are applied loosely to any hard, compact rock or specifically to nearly opaque, cryptocrystalline varieties of quartz. Flint may be flaked to give a very sharp, hard edge. Flint tools, including scrapers, ax heads, knives (Exod. 4:25; Josh. 5:2-3 REB, NIV, NASB, NRSV, TEV), arrowheads, sickle blades, and other tools were used from the earliest prehistoric times.

The hardness of flint is proverbial. God's miraculous provision for the Israelites in the wilderness is pictured as water (Deut. 8:15; Ps. 114:8) or oil (Deut. 32:13) flowing from flinty rock. God protected the Prophet Ezekiel by making his forehead harder than flint (Ezek. 3:9). A face set like flint pictured the determination of the Servant of the Lord (Isa. 50:7; cp. Luke 9:51). Zechariah 7:12 pictures the people's unwillingness to repent as hearts of flint.

FLOAT KJV translation of two Hebrew terms (1 Kings 5:9; 2 Chron. 2:16) rendered raft by modern speech translations. The pine and cedar logs for construction of the temple were lashed together to form rafts which were floated down the coast.

FLOCK Sheep and goats under the care of a shepherd (Gen. 30:31-32). God's people are sometimes described as sheep without a shepherd (Num. 27:17; Ezek. 34:5,8; Matt. 9:36; Mark 6:34), that is, in need of leaders who would rule them justly and nurture them spiritually. God's people can be described as a flock shepherded by God (Ps. 100:3; Jer. 23:3; Ezek. 34:31) or by Christ, "the great Shepherd of the sheep" (Heb. 13:20; cp. John 10:11; 1 Pet. 5:4).

The unity of all Christians is pictured by the image of one flock composed of many folds (John 10:16). Flocks can refer to individual congregations under the care of a pastor (1 Pet. 5:2-3).

Judgment is sometimes pictured as the sorting of a flock. In Ezek. 34 the fat, strong sheep (the oppressive leaders of Israel) are separated from the weak sheep that they victimized (34:16-17,20-21). In Matt. 25:32-46 sheep are separated from goats on the basis of concrete acts of love shown to the needy.

Shepherd with a flock of sheep.

FLOGGING Punishment by repeated lashes or blows of a whip or rod(s). The OT recognized flogging as a form of punishment (Deut. 25:1-3) though limiting it to 40 blows so that the neighbor who was punished would not be degraded. Children were disciplined with rods (Prov. 23:13-14). Floggings were sometimes inflicted unjustly (Prov. 17:26; Isa. 53:5).

Jesus warned His disciples that they would face flogging (Matt. 10:17; beatings, Mark 13:9) in the synagogue. Paul had believers flogged in his days as a persecutor of the church (Acts 22:19-20). The apostles were flogged by order of the Sanhedrin (Acts 5:40). Paul received the “forty lashes minus one” at the hands of the synagogue five times (2 Cor. 11:24 HCSB). Paul was also beaten with rods three times (11:25), perhaps at the hands of Gentile officials as at Philippi (Acts 16:22-23).

FLOOD Genesis 6-9 tells the story of the flood that covered the whole earth, and of Noah, the man used by God to save the world of men and beasts.

The Events The deluge was brought on by sin. The first six verses of Gen. 6 speak of the “sons of God” having relations with the “daughters of men.” Some have seen the sons of God as angelic (or demonic) beings, and thus the evil as demons cohabiting with humans. More likely, the sons of God were the sons of the godly line of Seth, and the daughters of men were women from the profane line of Cain. The evil then was the righteous being unequally yoked with unbelievers, thus stamping out the remnant on the earth, so that “the earth was corrupt in the sight of God, and the earth was filled with violence” (Gen. 6:11 NASB). Noah was apparently the only remnant left. “But Noah found favor in the eyes of the LORD” (Gen. 6:8). He was a man of faith, whose trust in God “condemned the world” (Heb. 11:7).

The Lord commanded Noah to construct an ark of “gofer wood.” Into this ark went 14 (“by sevens”) of all clean animals and two each of the unclean animals (Gen. 7:1-5). There were more of the clean animals since they would be needed for food and for sacrifice once the flood was over (8:20-22; 9:2-4). God then sent judgment in the form of rain, which fell on the earth for 40 days (7:17) and prevailed for 150 days (7:24). Finally the ark settled on the mountains of Ararat. Noah sent out doves three times until the last one did not return. He then opened the ark, praised God, offered a sacrifice, and received God's covenant promise not to judge the world by water again (8:21-22).

The Issues Few texts have inspired more interest than this one. It has become the source for discussion about ethics (capital punishment), theology (the Noahic Covenant), and apologetics (evidence for the flood). Of the latter, several issues have been most prominent. The first has to do with the ark's remains. Over the last 30 years much interest has been focused on photographs which seem to depict a large wooden structure buried atop Mount Ararat in Turkey. It remains to be seen whether this will ever be resolved and whether it actually is the ark. Second, there is much discussion over evidence for the flood. New data pours in seemingly by the week. Not long ago scientists discovered the remnants of a city a hundred feet or more beneath the surface of the Black Sea. It appears that this sea was not always there or not always so expansive. This would be clear evidence of a flood in ancient times. The third issue is whether the flood was local or worldwide. Proponents of a local flood only, some of whom are evangelicals, stand in sometimes vocal opposition to those who believe the flood to have been universal. Both OT and NT texts seem clearly to teach that the flood was universal (Gen. 7:19-24; 2 Pet. 3:6). But that does not mean that any one way of arguing for a universal flood, such as the catastrophist approach, for instance, is the last word on the matter. Much work remains to be done. What can be said is that the scientific evidence for a flood, even for a universal flood, is strong and growing daily.

FLOUR Fine-crushed and sifted grain used in making bread (Exod. 29:2; 1 Sam. 28:24), often translated as fine or choice flour. Typically meal, which was ground course from the whole kernels of grain together with the bran, was used to make bread (Lev. 2:16; 1 Kings 17:12). The firstfruits cereal offering was of course grain since it represented the common table fare. Most often cereal offerings were of fine flour (Lev. 2:1-2,4-5,7), ground from the inner kernels of wheat only, the best part of the grain (Deut. 32:14). Fine flour was a luxury item (Ezek. 16:13; Rev. 18:13) such as might be baked as bread for an honored guest (Gen. 18:6; 1 Sam. 28:24).

FLOWERS Colorful blooms containing a plant's reproductive organs. Flowers grew abundantly during springtime in Palestine. Flowers grew mostly in open fields, since flower gardens as we now know them were not cultivated. Flowers grew in crop fields and in groves of trees around houses. Numerous kinds of wild flowers could be found in the plains and mountains of Palestine. The words "flower" or "flowers" refer to colorful blossoms, towering plants, open flowers, and flourishing flowers. In Palestine the warm spring temperatures joined with the winter rains to produce beautiful, blooming plants and flowers.

Almond blossoms (Gen. 43:11; Exod. 25:33-34; 37:19-20; Num. 17:8; Eccles. 12:5). This tree, a member of the rose family, had beautiful pink blossoms that the Israelites used as models for engravers to adorn the cups of the golden lampstand.

Bulrush (Exod. 2:3; Job 8:11; Isa. 18:2; 35:7). Sometimes referred to as “flag,” “papyrus” (NIV), “reed” (NASB), or “rush” (NEB). This tall, slender reedlike plant grew along the banks of the Nile River and provided the earliest known material for making paper and covering the frames of boats (Isa. 18:2).

Calamus leaves (Exod. 30:23; Song 4:14; Isa. 43:24; Jer. 6:20; Ezek. 27:19). The leaves from this plant were a sweet-smelling cane or ginger grass. The leaves, when crushed, gave a much relished ginger smell. It was apparently imported from India for use in worship (Jer. 6:20). Several Hebrew expressions lie behind “calamus.” The basic Hebrew term qaneh means “cane.” It is modified in Exod. 30:23 by the word for balsam, apparently referring to sweet cane or Cymbopogon. A similar plant may be meant by qaneh tob in Jer. 6:20, tob meaning either “good” or “perfumed.” Elsewhere, qaneh occurs without modification and may refer to different types of cane. For example, in 1 Kings 14:15 the giant reed Arundo donax may be meant (cp. Job 40:21; Isa. 19:6; 35:7).

A type of flour mill from the Roman period. The flour falls into the wooden box.

An ancient flour mill in Capernaum.

Camphire flowers (sometimes referred to as Henna) (Song 1:14; 4:13; 7:11; see REB). The camphire was a small plant or shrub that bore beautiful cream-colored flowers that hung in clusters like grapes and were highly scented. It was used for orange dye.

Caperberry flowers (Eccles. 12:5 NASB). The caperberry was a prickly shrub that produced lovely flowers and small, edible berries as it grew in rocks and walls. It was supposed to stimulate sexual desires and powers. KJV, NRSV, NIV, TEV translate the Hebrew term as “desire” in Eccles. 12:5, but REB and NASB follow recent Hebrew dictionaries in translating it “caperberry” or “caper-buds.”

Cockle flowers (Job 31:40). Purplish red flowers of a noxious weed called the “cockle” or “darnel” (Lolium temulentum). This plant grew abundantly in Palestinian grain fields. Its Hebrew name is spelled like the Hebrew word for “stink” and thus is translated “stinkweed” by NASB.

Crocus (Song 2:1; Isa. 35:1). Spring flowering herb with a long yellow floral tube tinged with purple specks or stripes. It is sometimes translated as rose. Technically, it was probably the asphodel (Isa. 35:2 REB).

Fitch (Isa. 28:25-27). KJV calls this flower the “fitch,” but the better designation is probably the nutmeg flower. This flower was a member of the buttercup family and grew wildly in most Mediterranean lands. The plant was about two feet high and had bright blue flowers. The pods of the plant were used like pepper. Technically the plant is probably dill (NRSV, NASB, REB) or more precisely black cummin (Nigella sativaro). NIV translates “caraway.” See Fitches.

Leek (Num. 11:5). Member of the lily family, a bulbous biennial plant with broad leaves. The bases of the leaves were eaten as food. The bulbs of this plant were used as seasoning. Israel relished the memory of leeks (Allium porrumro) from Egypt.

Lily (1 Kings 7:19,22,26; 2 Chron. 4:5; Song 2:1-2,16; 5:13; 6:2-3; 7:2; Hos. 14:5). The term “lily” covered a wide range of flowers. The most common was Lilius candidum. The lily mentioned in Song 5:13 refers to a rare variety of lily that had a bloom similar to a glowing flame. The “lily of the valley” (Song 2:1-2,16) is known as the Easter lily. The lily mentioned in Hos. 14:5 is more akin to an iris. The beautiful water lily or lotus was a favorite flower in Egypt and was used to decorate Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:19,22,26; 2 Chron. 4:5). The “lilies of the field” (Matt. 6:28; Luke 12:27; HCSB, wildflowers) were probably numerous kinds of colorful spring flowers such as the crown anemone.

Cyclamen is one of the flowers found in Israel. The flowers appear between December and early May but there is a single region near Jericho where the plants flower in the autumn.

Mandrake (Gen. 30:14-16; Song 7:13). The mandrake, an herb of the nightshade family, had a rosette of large leaves and mauve flowers during winter and fragrant and round yellow fruit during spring. The mandrake grew in fields and rough ground. It was considered to give sexual powers and probably can be identified as Atropa Mandragora, often used for medicine in ancient times.

Mint (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42). Aromatic plant with hairy leaves and dense white or pink flowers, probably Jucande olens. Mint was used to flavor food. The Jews scattered it on the floors of houses and synagogues for its sweet smell.

Myrtle branches (Neh. 8:15; Isa. 41:19; 55:13; Zech. 1:8-11). Myrtle bushes (Myrtus communism), which grew on Palestinian hillsides, had fragrant evergreen leaves and scented white flowers. The flowers on the myrtle branches were used as perfumes.

Pomegranate blossoms (Exod. 28:33, Num. 13:23; 1 Sam. 14:2; 1 Kings 7:18). Blossoms from the pomegranate tree (Punica granatunro) had dark green leaves with large orange-red blossoms. Decorators carved pomegranates on public buildings. The fruit symbolized fertility and was used to tan leather and for medicine.

Rose (Song 2:1; Isa. 35:1). Several varieties of roses could be found in Palestine. The rose was a member of the crocus family. Traditionally, what is considered a rose is not the flower mentioned in Scripture. The “rose” is more generally considered an asphodel. See Crocus above.

Saffron (Song 4:14) (Curcuma longa or Crocus sativasro). A species of crocus. In ancient times the petals of the saffron flower were used to perfume banquet halls. The type meant in Song 4:14 may be an exotic plant imported from India.

Israel's Star of Bethlehem flower.

The blossoms and fruit of a pomegranate tree growing in Israel. The pomegranate is one of seven species with which the land of Israel is blessed (Deut. 8:8). It is a frequent theme in Jewish art and is found atop the columns on the façade to the temple.

Other Though not specifically mentioned by kind in the Bible, other varieties of flowers grew in Palestine. Appearing as early as January were the pink, white, and lilac blossoms of the cyclamen. Dominating many landscapes were the various shades of reds and pinks of the crown anemones, poppies, and mountain tulips. Some short-lived summer flowers were the yellow and white daisylike chrysanthemums.

Figurative Uses of “Flowers” The striking manner in which flowers burst into bloom for a few short weeks in spring and then faded into withered leaves was viewed as an illustration of the transient nature of human life (Job 14:2; Ps. 103:15; Isa. 40:6; 1 Pet. 1:24). The flowers of spring (Song 2:12) signify renewal. The “fading flower” of Isa. 28:1 represented the downfall of God's disobedient people. The “lilies of the field” (Matt. 6:28) grew unassumingly and without any outward signs of anxiety. If God takes care of the lilies, so God will take care of His children who need not worry uselessly. The phrase “flower of her age” (1 Cor. 7:36 KJV) described a girl reaching womanhood. The rich pass away just as quickly as the period of time for blooming flowers passes away (James 1:10-11). FLUTE See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

FLUX, BLOODY KJV term for dysentery (Acts 28:8). See Dysentery.

FODDER Feed for domestic animals. The Hebrew suggests a mixed feed, either of several grains (though barley was the common grain for livestock, Judg. 19:19; 1 Kings 4:28) or a mix of finely cut straw, barley, and beans formed into balls. Silage refers to fodder which has been moistened and allowed to ferment slightly (Isa. 30:24 NRSV). Fodder was salted to satisfy the animals' need for salt and to give a tastier feed.

FOOD When Jesus was a guest at a meal, He referred to the two main meals of the day: “When you give a lunch or a dinner, don't invite your friends, your brothers, your relatives, or your rich neighbors, because they might invite you back, and you would be repaid. On the contrary, when you host a banquet, invite those who are poor, maimed, lame, or blind” (Luke 14:12-13 HCSB). There were only two main meals for the Jewish family. Breakfast was taken informally soon after getting up and normally consisted of a flat bread cake and a piece of cheese, dried fruit, or olives. Sometimes the bread was wrapped around the appetizer, and sometimes the bread was split open to make a bag where the morsels might be placed. To eat bread for a meal in such a way was so natural and normal that “eating bread” came to have the same meaning as “having a meal.” “Give us today our daily bread” is a request that God will meet our need for daily food (Matt. 6:11 HCSB). It was quite usual for the men and boys to leave the house for their work, eating their breakfast as they went, while mother, daughters, and the younger children were kept at home. There was no midday meal as such, although a rest may have been taken for a drink and a piece of fruit. When Ruth stopped with the reapers, she ate parched grain moistened with wine (Ruth 2:14 NRSV).

While the men in the family were at work, the women and children would, among their daily activities, prepare for the evening meal. Water for cooking was collected by the older girls who drew it from the well or spring at the beginning of the day before it began to get hot, and the goats were milked too. Water collection was quite a serious business as well water could be polluted by animal usage, and house runoff from mud roofs was not normally safe to drink. Water collected, the girls then went to the market to purchase food for the meal. Fresh vegetables were bought from traders who sat with their produce around them on the ground of the market place, and if needed, olive oil and seasoning. Some families collected bread from the village baker, who owned a communal oven, returning the bread that each family had left as dough the night before (Hos. 7:4-6). Other families baked their own bread upon returning home. The house had in the meantime been cleaned (Luke 11:25) and the washing done. Grain had been crushed in the handmill, and the fire fanned so that it was hot enough for baking bread. After the midday rest, the evening meal was prepared on the fire; a vegetable or lentil stew was made in the large cooking pot, herbs and salt being used to add to the flavor. Only on special occasions such as a sacrifice or festival day was any meat added to the stew, and only on very rare occasions was the meat roasted or game or fish eaten. When the time came for the meal, the pot was placed on a rug on the floor as the whole family sat around it. A blessing or thanksgiving was made, and each member of the family used a piece of bread as a scoop to take up some of the contents of the pot because there was no cutlery. (Communal dipping into the pot made it essential that hands were washed before the meal.) Later in history a table and benches sometimes replaced the rug on the ground (1 Kings 13:20), but the communal pot was still at the center. At the close of the meal, fruit would be eaten and the wine would be drunk.

Formal meals were always preceded by an invitation. The host then insisted that people come until the invitations were accepted (Luke 14:16-24). When the guests arrived, their feet were washed by the most humble slaves, and their sandals were removed (John 13:3-11). This was to protect the carpeted floors from dirt as well as to make it more comfortable to sit on one's heels. Their heads were anointed with olive oil scented with spices. The oil was rubbed into the hair (Luke 7:36-50). Drinking water was then provided. In large houses the special guest moved to the "top table" in a room with a raised floor and would sit on the right-hand side of the host. The second guest would sit on the host's left-hand side (Luke 14:7-11; 20:46).

One did not so much "sit" at table as recline at table. Couches were drawn up to the tables, head towards the table, and cushions provided so that guests could rest on their left arm and use the right to serve themselves from the table. Using this arrangement it was possible for the servants to continue to wash the feet (Luke 7:46), but to make conversation persons had to turn almost on their backs and literally be "on the bosom" of the person to the left (John 13:23-25). In the time of Jesus, the triclinium or couch arranged around three sides of a table, was the height of fashion.

Servants used the open side so that they had access to the tables to bring in or to take away dishes of food.

The meal started with a drink of wine diluted with honey. The main dinner that followed was of three courses, beautifully arranged on trays. There were no forks, so guests ate with their fingers except when soup, eggs, or shellfish were served. Then spoons were used. Finally there was a dessert of pastry and fruit. During the meal the host provided entertainment of music, dancing (individual, expressive dances), and readings from poetry and other literature. Such an occasion was an important local event, and people of humbler means were able to look in from the darkness outside (Luke 7:37). When the meal was completed, there was a long period devoted to talking. Stories were related, and gossip was shared. Such festivities were always the envy of poorer people who tried to copy them in their own way.

Whether such meals were formal or informal, abundant or scant, there were always food laws that had to be observed. Only animals which chewed the cud and had divided hoofs, fish which had fins and scales, and birds which did not eat carrion could be eaten (Lev. 11:1-22).

FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS A cause of controversy in the early church centering on what Christians were permitted to eat.

“Food offered to idols” is a translation of a single Greek word which has also been rendered “things offered unto idols” (KJV) and “meat sacrificed to idols” (NJV). The identification of the object of the offering by the term “idol” suggests that it was a name that originated outside first-century paganism. It reflects the perspective and conclusion of someone who spoke as a Jew or Christian.

Pagan sacrifices could be thought of as typically consisting of three portions. One small part would be used in the sacrificial ritual. A larger portion would be reserved for the use of the priests or other temple personnel. The largest part would be retained by the worshiper to be used in one of two ways. The one who offered the sacrifice sometimes used the remaining portion as the main course in a meal that might be served at or near the pagan temple. It is this type of religio-social event that stands behind the question raised by the letter (1 Cor. 8:1) from the church at Corinth to Paul and consequently as the background for Paul's response in 1 Cor. 8. The second method of disposing of the worshiper's portion would be to offer it for sale at the local marketplace. Meat that was sold in this fashion would be bought and then served as a part of a regular family meal. This situation is reflected in Paul's comments in 1 Cor. 10:23-11:1.

FOOL, FOOLISHNESS, AND FOLLY Translations of several uncomplimentary words that appear approximately 360 times throughout the OT and NT to describe unwise and ungodly people. The words are especially predominant in the Wisdom Literature of the OT. Persons who do not possess wisdom are called “fools”; their behavior is described as “folly.” The picture, which emerges from the biblical material, is quite simple: folly is the opposite of wisdom, and a fool is the opposite of a wise person. Both wisdom and folly are depicted as philosophies or perspectives on life. The religious person chooses wisdom, whereas the nonreligious person opts for folly. Wisdom leads to victory; folly to defeat. Wisdom belongs to those who fear God, and the “fear” of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom (Prov. 1:7). Wisdom is the essence of life. The foolish person is the one who is thoughtless, self-centered, and obviously indifferent to God.

Old Testament Usage Seven different Hebrew words are usually translated by the single English word “folly.” Some of the shades of meaning suggested by these various words include: (a) deliberate sinfulness; (b) simple-mindedness; (c) malicious simple-mindedness; and (d) brutal or subhuman activity.

The fool may be the one who is aloof. “Fools fold their hands” (Eccles. 4:5a NRSV). This aloofness is also described in terms of the farmer who “chases fantasies” instead of tending to the farm (Prov. 12:11b HCSB).

In other passages the fool is described as the one who denies that God exists: “The fool says in his heart, ‘God does not exist’” (Ps. 14:1 HCSB). Foolish behavior is also characterized by an inability to recognize the true character of God. Job chastised his wife for behaving as the foolish do when she denied the steadfast love of God (Job 2:10).

The simple-minded fool is encouraged to change in Prov. 9:4-6. But the fool may be the one who is intentionally perverse. Nabal and Saul represent this kind of intentional and malicious folly toward David (1 Sam. 25:25; 26:21).

New Testament Usage The contrasting elements of wisdom and folly evident in the OT were clearly in the mind of Paul when he asked, “Hasn't God made the world's wisdom foolish?” (1 Cor. 1:20b HCSB). However, in the NT, this polarity between wisdom and folly is not always stressed. In fact, it is possible that a certain kind of wisdom can actually be folly. In Matt. 7:26; 25:2-3; Rom. 2:20 “folly” is used synonymously with “experiential wisdom.” Wisdom based only on human intellect and experiences without considering God is folly.

In Matt. 23:17 folly is equated with blindness. The characteristics of folly include thoughtlessness, the pursuit of unbridled aspirations, and a lifestyle characterized by envy, greed, and pride.

Foolishness is also described in paradoxical terms in the NT. In 1 Cor. 1-3 the incarnation is portrayed as “foolishness,” but it is precisely this kind of perceived “foolishness” which is better than worldly wisdom. Our understanding of this paradoxical relationship affects the manner in which Christ is proclaimed (1 Cor. 1:18-2:5). We must rely on God's gift and power of proclamation not on human powers and wisdom. The writer of Matthew records Jesus stating that “whoever says to his brother, ‘Fool,’ will be subject to the Sanhedrin. But whoever says, ‘You moron!’ will be subject to hellfire” (5:22b HCSB). FOOT Part of the human and animal body used for walking. In Scripture “foot” refers mainly to the human foot (Exod. 12:11; Acts 14:8). It may also be used of the feet of animals (Ezek. 1:7) or, anthropomorphically, of God's feet (Isa. 60:13). The “foot” as a measure of length does not appear in Hebrew or Greek, but some English versions give the equivalent in feet (Gen. 6:15 NIV; KJV, NRSV, NASB, cubits).

In the ancient world with unpaved roads, feet easily became dirty and had to be washed often. From earliest times hosts offered to wash their guests' feet (Gen. 18:4), usually done by the lowest servant (John 13:3-14). High honor was paid by anointing another's feet (Deut. 33:24; Luke 7:46; John 12:3).

Because it was so easy to soil one's feet, to remove the shoes was a sign of getting rid of dirt and so indicated holiness in worship (Exod. 3:5). To shake the dust off one's feet meant total rejection of that place (Acts 13:51). For both the Israelites and the Romans, punishment might include binding the feet in stocks (Job 13:27; Acts 16:24). Often “feet” symbolize the whole person, since it is hard to act without using the feet (“refrained my feet from every evil way” [KJV] means “kept myself from evil,” Ps. 119:101; cp. Luke 1:79; Acts 5:9; Rom. 3:15).

Several biblical expressions contain “feet.” “Put your feet upon the necks of these” suggested total victory over someone (Josh. 10:24). This was also implied by the phrase to put someone “under your feet” (Rom. 16:20; 1 Cor. 15:25). “To fall at [someone's] feet” showed humble submission, often when one had a request (1 Sam. 25:24; Luke 17:16). “To cover [one's] feet” was a euphemism for relieving oneself (1 Sam. 24:3). For one's foot “to slip” or “to be taken in a snare” meant calamity (Pss. 9:15; 66:9). “The feet of him who brings good news” meant the person's coming (Isa. 52:7). To sit “at the feet” meant to be a listener or disciple of someone (Acts 22:3). “Laid them down” at someone's feet suggested that the thing was a gift (Acts 4:35).

A perfume bottle in the shape of a sandaled foot from around 550 B.C. in Sicily.

FOOTMAN KJV translation of two unrelated Hebrew terms. The first refers to foot soldiers as distinguished from cavalry (2 Sam. 8:4), to soldiers in general (1 Sam. 4:10; 15:4), or to men of military age (Exod. 12:37). The second term refers to a runner who served in the honor guard that ran ahead of the king's chariot (1 Sam. 8:11; 2 Sam. 15:1), to the king's guards in general (1 Kings 14:27-28; 2 Kings 10:25), or to royal couriers (Esther 3:13,15).

FOOTSTOOL Piece of furniture for resting the feet, especially for one seated on a throne (2 Chron. 9:18; James 2:3). The footstool of Tutankhamen of Egypt was carved with pictures of his enemies. Other Pharaohs were portrayed with their feet on their enemies' heads. The footstool thus became a symbol for dominion. God is pictured as a king enthroned in heaven with the earth as His footstool (Isa. 66:1; Matt. 5:35).

In Ps. 99:5 and Lam. 2:1 it is difficult to determine with certainty whether God's footstool is the ark, the temple, or Zion (cp. Isa. 60:13; Ezek. 43:7). Only 1 Chron. 28:2 is an unambiguous reference to the ark as a resting place for God's feet.

In Ps. 110:1 God makes the messianic King triumph over His enemies, who are then made His footstool. This text is quoted six times in the NT. It served as the basis for Jesus' riddle about David's son who is also his Lord (Matt. 22:44; Mark 12:36; Luke 20:43). Elsewhere, the Scripture was applied to the ascension of Christ (Acts 2:34-35), the exaltation of Christ (Heb. 1:13), and the future victory of Christ (Heb. 10:13).

FOOTWASHING An act necessary for comfort and cleanliness for any who have traveled dusty Palestinian roads wearing sandals. Customarily, a host provided guests with water for washing their own feet (Judg. 19:21; Luke 7:44, where the complaint was that Simon had not provided water). Footwashing was regarded as so lowly a task that it could not be required of a Hebrew slave. In this context the statement of John the Baptist that he was unworthy to untie the sandal (to wash the feet) of the One coming after him (Mark 1:7) indicates great humility. As a sign of exceptional love, a disciple might wash a master's feet (contrast John 13:13-14). The initiative of the woman who was a "sinner" in washing Jesus' feet (Luke 7:37-50) was more than expected hospitality. Hers was an act of great love that evidenced the forgiveness of her sins (7:47).

Bronze statuette from the Roman period of two soldiers carrying a wounded comrade.

Jesus' washing of the disciples' feet (John 13:4-5) has both an ethical and a symbolic sense. The ethical sense is emphasized in John 13:14-15 where Jesus presented Himself as the example of humble, loving service (cp. Luke 22:27). The command to do for one another what Christ had done for them ought not to be confined simply to washing feet. What Jesus did for the disciples was to lay down His life for them (John 15:13). Thus the ethical imperative calls for giving our lives in extravagant acts of selfless service. Footwashing is one expression of this. Like the Lord's Supper, the footwashing is an enacted sermon on the death of Christ. This symbolic sense is highlighted in the picture of Jesus' laying aside His garments and then taking them up (a picture of Christ's laying down and taking up His life, John 10:17-18), the note that the footwashing is necessary for the disciples to receive their inheritance ("part" 13:8), and the statement that it affects cleansing (13:10). Some interpreters see a connection with baptism (and the Eucharist) as sacraments of cleansing. Instead, the footwashing, like baptism and the Supper, bears witness to the same salvific event, the selfless giving of Christ in the humiliating death of the cross.

Washing the feet of other Christians was a qualification for service as a "widow" in the early church (1 Tim. 5:10). Footwashing is here representative of humble acts of service (TEV).

The ceremonial washing of feet was first attested by Augustine in connection with Easter baptism. The association of the rite with Maundy

Thursday was fixed by the council of Toledo (694). The developed Catholic practice involves a priest washing the feet of 12 poor men. Martin Luther criticized ecclesiastical authorities who washed feet as an act of humility and then demanded greater humility in return. The Anabaptists practiced footwashing as a symbol of washing in the blood of Christ and to impress the example of Christ's deep humiliation. Footwashing was commonly practiced by Baptists in early America. Today the regular practice is confined to smaller Baptist bodies, Mennonites, and some others.

FORBEARANCE Specifically, a refraining from the enforcement of a punishment; generally, a synonym for patience. Forbearance makes it possible to influence a ruler (Prov. 25:15 NASB; patience, NIV, NRSV, HCSB; patient persuasion, TEV). Jeremiah prayed that God not take him away in His forbearance (15:15 NRSV), that is, that God not be so patient with Jeremiah's enemies as to allow them to destroy him. In Rom. 2:4; 3:25 forbearance refers to God's patience expressed in God's willingness to hold back judgment for a time. God's forbearance does not mean that God condones sin but that God gives opportunity for repentance. God is able to maintain His reputation as a righteous judge in spite of God's overlooking the past sins of Israel and the present sins of those who place faith in Christ (3:26) because the cross was an effective sacrifice of atonement. God's forbearance is an opportunity for salvation (2 Pet. 3:15).

FORD Shallow place in a stream or river that permits crossing by foot. The Romans were the first to build bridges in Palestine. Before their time river crossings were generally limited to fords. Fords are mentioned in connection with three rivers in Palestine: the Arnon (literally "rushing torrent," Isa. 16:2), the Jabbok (Gen. 32:22), the Jordan. All three rivers have swift currents and offer few fording places. Fords were thus strategic points. To secure the fords meant success in battle (Judg. 3:28; 12:5-6); their loss meant defeat (Jer. 51:32).

FOREHEAD Part of the face above the eyes. Because it is so prominent, the appearance of the forehead often determines our opinion of the person.

The Emblem of Holiness was placed on Aaron's forehead (Exod. 28:38). This symbolized acceptance before the Lord. A mark was put upon the foreheads of those in Jerusalem who mourned for the wickedness of Jerusalem. They were spared in a time of terrible judgment (Ezek. 9:4).

The Bible indicates that a person's character can be determined by observing the forehead. A set forehead indicates opposition, defiance, and rebellion (Jer. 3:3). Hardness of the forehead indicates determination to persevere (Isa. 48:4; Ezek. 3:8-9). It has been used as a representation of Satan (Rev. 13:16-17). The forehead is used as a very dishonorable word when read of the harlot's forehead (Jer. 3:3), indicating utter shamelessness. At the same time, it stands for courage as when God told Ezekiel that He had made the prophet's forehead harder than flint against the foreheads of the people (Ezek. 3:9).

In the apocalyptic literature of the NT the foreheads of the righteous were marked (Rev. 7:3; 9:4; 14:1; 22:4). The apocalyptic woman dressed in purple and scarlet had her name written on her forehead (Rev. 17:5). See Face.

FOREIGN AID Financial assistance provided by the government or citizens of one country to citizens of another country in times of economic hardship. The best known instance involved the sale of grain by the government of Egypt “to all the earth” during a prolonged famine in the days of Joseph (Gen. 41:57). Perhaps in response to this event, Moses noted that God's blessing to Israel included the conditional promise that Israel would one day be prosperous enough to lend to other nations rather than having to borrow from them (Deut. 15:6; 28:12).

The NT reports that Christians from Antioch, Macedonia, and Achaia provided financial assistance to believers in Judea and Jerusalem (Acts 11:27-30; Rom. 15:26; 2 Cor. 8:1-7; 9:1-5).

These examples suggest that Christians should be willing to aid persons who live in other countries in times of need, whether through the church or government.

FOREKNOW, FOREKNOWLEDGE To know beforehand. The verb (Gk. proginosko) and the noun (Gk. prognosis) are composites formed from the prefix, pro (before) and the verb, ginosko (know, understand, perceive, be acquainted with). Scripture uses these terms to signify knowledge of events before they occur or knowledge of things before they exist. Of the seven occurrences of these terms in the NT, two refer to human knowledge: Acts 26:5 refers to previous knowledge that the Jews had of Paul, and 2 Pet. 3:17 refers to the believer's knowledge of future events based on divine revelation. All other references are to God's foreknowledge. Although the idea of foreknowledge is present in the OT, there is no Hebrew equivalent to the Greek terms.

Scripture reveals God as being omniscient, that is, having exhaustive knowledge of all things—past, present, and future. Both the OT and the NT testify to God's comprehensive knowledge. The Lord's eyes run to and fro throughout the whole earth (2 Chron. 16:9); God's eyes are everywhere (Prov. 15:3). His understanding has no limit (Ps. 147:5). God has comprehensive knowledge of the actions of men (Job 34:21), man's thoughts (1 Sam. 16:7; 1 Kings 8:39; Ps. 139:2; Prov. 5:21), and even his motives (1 Chron. 28:9). To underscore the range of God's knowledge, Jesus spoke of God's awareness of the birds in the air and the hairs on human heads (Matt. 10:29-30). Nothing is hidden from God's sight (Heb. 4:13). John captured the essence of the biblical teaching: “God...knows all things” (1 John 3:20 HCSB).

God's foreknowledge is that aspect of God's omniscience that relates to the future. Scripture clearly indicates that God's knowledge is not limited to the past and present. He is the One who announces events before they occur, and He makes known the end from the beginning (Isa. 42:9; 46:10a). It is this knowledge of the future, among other things, that distinguishes God from the false gods (Isa. 44:6-8; 48:14). It was not the prophets' clairvoyance but God's foreknowledge that made possible their predictions.

Nathan foretold the death of David's son (2 Sam. 12:14); Elijah foretold the deaths of Ahab and Jezebel (1 Kings 21:19, 23); Amos foretold Israel's captivity (Amos 5:27) and restoration (Amos 9:14). By God's foreknowledge the prophets foretold that Jesus would be born in Bethlehem (Mic. 5:2); that He would suffer vicariously (Isa. 53:4-6); that He would be raised from the dead (Ps. 16:10). Predictive prophecy was possible only because God revealed His foreknowledge to the prophets.

While it is clear that the Greek words prognosis and proginosko have the connotation of knowing something beforehand (prescience), many interpreters find that a richer meaning is intended in their NT usages. Some passages indicate that God's foreknowledge is closely related to His foreordination. In the OT, events of history are the unfolding of God's eternal plans (Gen. 45:4-8; Isa. 14:24-27; 42:9; Jer. 50:45). The NT writers perceived in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus the outworking of God's eternal plan to save sinful humanity. The Gospels declare that those things which the prophets had said were now fulfilled in the life and death of Jesus (Matt. 1:22-23; 2:5-6,15; John 19:24). Using forms of the word prognosis, Scripture teaches that the crucifixion was not a chance happening in history. It was according to the foreknowledge of God, according to His eternal plan. Speaking of Jesus' death, Peter proclaimed, "This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge" (Acts 2:23a NIV). In his first epistle, Peter wrote of Christ: "Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world" (1 Pet. 1:20a AV, KJV). This foreknowledge involves more than prior knowledge; it includes foreordination.

Other passages indicate that God's foreknowledge is of people. God's foreknowledge of people is not primarily a reference to His intellect but to His benevolent will by which He sets people apart to Himself. Here foreknowledge means to set one's affections upon beforehand.

This is apparent in Paul's two uses of this verb in Romans. "For those He foreknew He also predestined to be conformed to the image of His Son" (8:29 HCSB); "God has not rejected His people whom He foreknew" (11:2 HCSB). God is depicted, not as having awareness of events or circumstances (prescience), but of people. It is not what God foreknew but whom He foreknew. It often is argued that Paul is using the Hebrew meaning of knowledge (yada') as found in such passages as Amos 3:2 and Jer. 1:5. This knowledge involves a personal relationship with Israel, His people. He did not choose them based on something good that He foresaw in them but by His mercy. Thus, whereas God has prior knowledge (prescience) about the other nations, He is not said to foreknow them. Likewise, God has prior knowledge of all people, but He foreknows only those who are His redeemed (Rom. 8:29).

Attempts to reconcile divine foreknowledge with human freedom and responsibility have occupied theologians and philosophers throughout church history. Some have argued that God's foreknowledge, whether construed as prescience or foreordination, entails the denial of human freedom. On such grounds some have denied that God knows the future, either because He has chosen not to know it, or, as the "open theists" have more recently argued, that He is unable to know it. Others have tended to stress foreknowledge and foreordination to the near exclusion of human choice. A better approach is to accept the biblical teaching that God foreknows and foreordains all things while not violating human free agency and moral responsibility. The biblical writers were not ashamed to place these truths together. In Acts 2:23 Peter proclaimed that the crucifixion of Jesus was according to God's foreknowledge and foreordained plan. Yet Peter held Christ's tormenters accountable for their actions, seeing that they acted on their own malicious desires.

FORERUNNER Greek term prodromos (one who runs ahead) occurs only once in the NT (Heb. 6:20) where it serves as a designation for Christ. In secular Greek the term was frequent as a military term for advanced scouts or cavalry that prepared for a full assault. This sense is seen in the earliest Greek translation of the Apocryphal book, the Wisdom of Solomon (12:8), where wasps were the forerunners of the armies of Israel (cp. Exod. 23:28; Deut. 7:20; but also Josh. 24:12 where the hornets completed driving out the Amorite kings so that no Israelite assault was necessary). Elsewhere in the earliest Greek translation of the OT (Septuagint) prodromos is used metaphorically for the first ripe fruit (Num. 13:20; Isa. 28:4). This usage suggests that the Christian hope of entering God's presence is guaranteed by the forerunner's already reaching this goal (cp. the idea of Christ as firstfruits of the dead, 1 Cor. 15:20,23.) A similar idea is expressed in the image of Christ as the pioneer of salvation (Heb. 2:10), the first of many children that God brings to glory through suffering. Significantly, Christ is forerunner for us. Having run ahead on the road of suffering, Christ became the source of salvation that makes our following possible (Heb. 5:8-10).

In English, forerunner indicates one who precedes and indicates the approach of another. In this sense John the Baptist is termed the forerunner of Jesus, though the NT does not use this term of John. The OT used the common image of advance agents sent ahead of a king to make arrangements for his travel to picture the mission of a prophetic messenger preparing the way for God's coming (Isa. 40:3; Mal. 3:1). The application of these texts to John by the NT writers (Matt. 11:10; Mark 1:2; Luke 1:76; 7:27) affirms that the coming of Jesus is the coming of God.

FORESAIL Small sail used to steer a vessel in strong wind (Acts 27:40). KJV refers to the "mainsail." Paul's ship likely had a large central mast with a long yardarm supporting the large, square mainsail and a smaller foremast, sloping forward like a bowsprit, which carried the foresail.

FORESKIN Loose fold of skin covering the glans of the penis which is removed in circumcision. Removal of the foreskin was a bodily reminder of God's covenant with Abraham (Gen. 17:11,14,23-25). In Deut. 10:16 the "foreskin of the heart" (KJV, NRSV) is associated with stubbornness in disobedience. The difficult text in Hab. 2:16 is likely a scribal corruption of the word "stagger" involving the inversion of two letters. NRSV, TEV, and REB thus translate "stagger" together with the Dead Sea Scrolls and several ancient versions. The reading in the Masoretic text, "to show oneself to be uncircumcised," does not mean simple exposure (NIV, NASB) but to be recognized as one cut off from the covenant. See Circumcision; Covenant.

FOREST Large, naturally wooded areas, characteristic of the central hill country, the Galilee, and the Bashan.

Large expanses of forest covered the majority of the hills in Palestine during the OT period. After the exodus, the inability of the Israelite tribes to conquer much of their inheritance forced them to develop new settlements and camps in the wooded hill country. Unable to rescue their portion from the hands of the Canaanites, the clans of Ephraim and Manasseh cleared the forests among the hills in their territory to provide room for settlement (Josh. 17:15-18). Forests also provided excellent staging areas for warfare, such as the rebellion of Absalom against David that ended with a battle in the forests of Ephraim (2 Sam. 18:6-8). The valuable cedars of Lebanon were imported from Tyre by Solomon for his extensive building projects in Jerusalem (1 Kings 5:8-10). Solomon's palace, "the house of the forest of Lebanon," was so named for its extensive use of these cedars (1 Kings 7:2). As the population expanded, forested areas were cut down, and terraced orchards took their place. Large portions of the forests around Jerusalem were destroyed during the Roman siege of the city in A.D. 70.

FORGIVENESS Term used to indicate pardon for a fault or offense; to excuse from payment for a debt owed.

Terminology The two main terms for forgiveness in Hebrew are nasa', "to take away (sin)" and salach, "to pardon." God is always the subject of the latter. The LXX expands the OT's forgiveness vocabulary to 20 terms. The NT expresses forgiveness with a select group of words, especially aphiemi.

Old Testament God is characterized early in the life of Israel as a God who both forgives and holds the guilty accountable (Exod. 34:7; cp. Neh. 9:17). He is the source of forgiveness for Israel at Sinai (Exod. 32:32; 34:9). He provides forgiveness for sin through the sacrificial system (Lev. 4:20,26,28,31; 5:10,13,16, 18; 6:7; 19:22). Solomon trusts God to forgive the repentant in his prayer of dedication for the temple. He utilizes the formula “Then hear...and forgive,” establishing God's sovereignty and willingness to forgive. God's forgiveness is directed primarily to His covenant people to sustain His covenant through them. However, outsiders may also become the object of God's merciful forgiveness (1 Kings 8:41-43; cp. 2 Chron. 6:32-33). Forgiveness is tied to the cultic setting in both the 1 Kings narrative and the 2 Chronicles narrative. Thus, forgiveness is the vehicle in which God reappropriates the blessings of His gracious covenant.

The prophets hold this same covenant grace out to Israel if she would only repent from her presumption on God's grace and her election (Dan. 9:9; Isa. 44:22; Jer. 33:8; Mic. 7:8). Social injustices that arise are often the fruit of Israel's indifference towards God's covenant and become the target of God's wrath (Amos 2:6, etc.). Israel also must repent of land/covenant defiling sins such as idolatry, bloodshed, and sexual sins, before forgiveness is procured.

The Psalms reveal the God of Israel as the same God found in the Torah. He does not allow the guilty to go unpunished, yet He is a God of forgiveness. In particular, the psalmist finds God to be the only source of forgiveness (Pss. 19:12; 25:11; 32:5; 65:3; 78:38). This reliance on God results in hymns of praise to God (Ps. 136).

New Testament Forgiveness is a vital idea for NT theology. John's baptism was for repentance and the forgiveness of sins (Mark 1:4; Luke 1:76-77). The idea is found in the confession of the Christ child's destiny (Matt. 1:21; Luke 1:77). It is the blood of Jesus' atonement that yields eternal forgiveness of sins (Matt. 26:28; Heb. 10:11-12; Lev. 16; 17:11). Jesus places enormous emphasis on horizontal (human to human) forgiveness. Matt. 18:21-35 details the parable of the unforgiving slave, enclosed by the divine demand to forgive. In Jesus' model prayer, the forgiveness the individual receives is dependent upon the forgiveness the individual gives to those who offend him. Jesus distinguishes His own ministry as one by which forgiveness is mediated to sinners through His blood (Matt. 26:28).

Paul discusses forgiveness, using the terminology mentioned above, only scarcely. He prefers to discuss the concept under the idea of righteousness. However, he defines forgiveness as the fundamental condition for Christian fellowship (2 Cor. 2:7-10). He refers to the idea of redemption as the “forgiveness of sins,” (Col. 1:14). Because Christians have been redeemed, they are obligated to forgive as they have been forgiven (Col. 3:13).

Guaranteed Forgiveness? The idea that God's business is to forgive and thus forgiveness is secured by any and all who ask, regardless of intent, has no biblical ground. God established the sacrificial system for the dissolution of ritual impurity and the forgiveness of moral impurities. Yet for the “person who does anything defiantly” there is no forgiveness of sin via sacrifice (Num. 15:30-36). The illustration used in Numbers is a young man who breaks the Sabbath. His judgment occurs on the spot. This defiant sin is treated differently in other cases (Josh. 7; 1 Sam. 12; cp. Ps. 51), so it would be inaccurate to say there is no forgiveness for it. However, there is a grave risk of immediate and irrevocable judgment.

The NT also speaks of a sin that will not be forgiven (Mark 3:29; Luke 12:10). Presumably the sin of indignantly categorizing the spirit of Jesus, whom Jesus identifies as the Holy Spirit, as demonic reveals the desire to vilify God and to deny Him any place as sovereign.

FORK Two types of forks (pronged implements) are mentioned in Scripture: an implement used in the sacrificial cult and a farm tool used to winnow grain. See Fan; Flesh Hook; Winnowing.

FORMER RAIN KJV term at Joel 2:23 for the early rain. See Rain.

FORNICATION Various acts of sexual immorality, especially being a harlot or whore.

Old Testament Normally women are the subject of the Hebrew verb zanah, but in Num. 25:1 “people began to play the harlot” (NASB). The clearest example is that of Tamar sitting on the roadway to entice Judah (Gen. 38:12-30). Such action was subject to criminal prosecution bringing the death penalty (Gen. 38:24; cp. Lev. 21:9; Deut. 22:21). Fornication meant being unfaithful to a marriage commitment (Judg. 19:2).

Israel's neighbors practiced a fertility religion in which prostitution was part of the worship. This led naturally to describing worship of other gods as prostitution (Exod. 34:15-16; Judg. 8:27,33; Hos. 4:13). This concept is central for Hosea's preaching based on his experience with his unfaithful wife Gomer. Ezekiel also used this concept (Ezek. 16; 23) and extended it to include political treaties with foreign enemies (Ezek. 16:26,28; 23:5).

New Testament The NT also condemns prostitution. Here again prostitution played a central role in worship in places like Corinth and Athens. Greek philosophers could even distinguish the roles of prostitutes for pleasure, slave mistresses to give daily care to the master's body, and wives to produce legitimate children. Some Stoic philosophers reacted against such practices and condemned sex outside marriage. Many women used the situation to take slave lovers for themselves or become lesbians.

Jesus went against Jewish tradition and forgave prostitutes and opened the way for them to enter God's kingdom through faith (Matt. 21:31-32; cp. Heb. 11:31; James 2:25), though He still regarded fornication as evil (Mark 7:21).

Paul extended the use of the Greek term for fornication to cover all sinful sexual activity. He dealt with the problem particularly in writing the Corinthians who faced a society permeated with sexual religion and the sexual sins of a seaport. A believer must decide to be part of Christ's body or a prostitute's body (1 Cor. 6:12-20). The believer must flee sexual immorality and cleave to Christ, honoring Him with the physical body.

Fornication is thus a result of sinful human nature (Gal. 5:19) and unsuitable for God's holy people (Eph. 5:3; 1 Thess. 4:3).

The book of Revelation also says much about fornication, condemning those guilty to eternal punishment (Rev. 2:21-22). Revelation, as well as the prophets, extends the meaning of fornication to include political and religious unfaithfulness (Rev. 14:8; 17:2,4; 18:3; 19:2).

As a whole, the NT uses porneia, most often translated “fornication,” in at least four ways: voluntary sexual intercourse of an unmarried person with someone of the opposite sex (1 Cor. 7:2; 1 Thess. 4:3); as a synonym for adultery (Matt. 5:32; 19:9); harlotry and prostitution (Rev. 2:14,20); various forms of unchastity (John 8:41; Acts 15:20; 1 Cor. 5:1). FORT, FORTIFICATION Walled structures built for defense against enemy armies. Cities of the ancient world were fortified for defensive purposes as far back as archaeological records exist. The oldest fortifications in Israel are at Jericho, where a Neolithic stone tower and part of a wall have been dated to 7000 B.C. No other examples exist until 3000 B.C., the Chalcolithic Period (about 4000-3000 B.C.) being one of open villages without fortification. Beginning in the Early Bronze Age, mudbrick walls, towers, and gates were built on stone foundations at Ai, Arad, Beth Yerah, Gezer, Jericho, Megiddo, and elsewhere. From this time until the Roman Period (the time of Christ), cities were almost always surrounded by walls. The stone foundations and those portions of wall above the ground that utilized stone construction were made of uncut fieldstone. In the time of Solomon, however, well-dressed ashlar (carefully trimmed limestone blocks) began to be used in the construction of unique fortification systems. These included casemate walls (that is, two parallel stone walls with dividing partitions connecting them) and huge six-chambered gates allowing easy entrance and exit for his chariots (a gate plan introduced much earlier by the Hyksos invaders, around 1700 B.C., who also used chariots). Similar, but smaller fourchambered gates were used later in the time of Ahab and Jeroboam II, attached to offsets-insets solid walls. A glacis was sometimes built against the outside wall for added protection against the battering ram. A glacis was a sloping embankment of beaten earth, clay, gravel and stones, sometimes covered with plaster. Examples of huge, dressed stone walls and gate towers of the Hellenistic/Roman Periods may be seen today at Samaria, Caesarea Maritima, and Tiberias. Citadels were often built on the acropolis of the enclosed city.

FORTIFIED CITIES The term “fortified city” (often “fenced city” or “defenced city” in the KJV) refers to a town with strong defenses, usually a massive wall structure and inner citadels or strongholds. In general the fortified city was a major military or administrative center for a region. Size was not so much the factor, though many of the fortified cities were large cities. Location was much more critical.

The Bible contains two lists of fortified cities, one for Naphtali (Josh. 19:35-38), and a list of cities Rehoboam fortified for Judah (2 Chron. 11:5-12). These two lists seem to include most of the walled cities within the tribal area.

Fortified cities served a strategic function. They could guard a major highway (as did Lachish and Hazor). They could protect mountain passes (Megiddo and Taanach). They could serve as border fortresses (Arad and Hazor). Surely troops would be garrisoned in a fortified city. At times of imminent danger, much of the populace from the surrounding area might find protection in a fortified city (Jer. 4:5; 8:14).

Masada, the site of a palace built by Herod the Great, provides its own natural fortification.

Other closely related terms used in the Bible include chariot cities and store cities (1 Kings 9:19). Chariot cities were major military centers where the chariot troops were garrisoned. Store cities probably served as central supply bases for the military.

FORUM The open place of a market town or the town itself. The Appii Forum (Acts 28:15) or market town of Appius was located 43 miles to the southeast of Rome on the Appian Way.

FOUNDATION That on which a building is built; the first layer of a structure that provides a stable base for the superstructure. Bedrock was the preferred foundation (Matt. 7:24). The best alternative was a solid platform of close-fitting cut stone (1 Kings 5:17). Modest homes had foundations of rough stone. Generally, building sites were leveled by filling in the foundation trenches with gravel or small stones. Often, the foundation is all that remains of ancient structures. The prohibition of laying a foundation for Jericho (Josh. 6:26) was a prohibition of rebuilding the city as a fortified site rather than of inhabiting the place. The splendor of the new Jerusalem is pictured in its foundation of precious stones (Isa. 54:11; Rev. 21:19).

A panoramic view of the ruins of the Forum.

The OT pictured the earth (dry land) as resting on foundations (2 Sam. 22:16; Pss. 18:15; 82:5). God is pictured as a builder who marked out the foundations (Prov. 8:29) and set the stone (Ps. 104:5). The mountains (Deut. 32:22; Ps. 18:7) and the vault of the heavens (2 Sam. 22:8; Job 26:11) are also pictured as resting on foundations. God's great power is expressed in the images of the earth's foundations trembling (Isa. 24:18) or being exposed (2 Sam. 22:16) before the Almighty. "From the foundation of the world" (HCSB) means from the time of creation (Isa. 40:21; Matt. 13:35; John 17:24).

Christ's teaching is compared to a rock-solid foundation (Matt. 7:24; Luke 6:48). Foundation serves as a metaphor for the initial preaching of the gospel (Rom. 15:20; Heb. 6:1-2 which outlines the foundational topics), for the apostles and prophets as the first generation of preachers (Eph. 2:20; cp. Rev. 21:14,19); and for Christ as the content of preaching (1 Cor. 3:10-11).

The foundations of Ps. 11:3 are the foundations of life, security, community, justice, and religion. To lay a good foundation for the future (1 Tim. 6:19) is to be generous and ready to share. The foundation of 2 Tim. 2:19 is an enigma. The context suggests that God's foundation is the core of true believers known only to God. Other suggestions include Christ, God's work, the church, Christ's teaching, and God's eternal law.

FOUNTAIN Spring of water flowing from a hole in the earth. The limestone rock of Palestine is especially suited for the formation of springs. In semi-arid country springs are highly prized as water sources and often determine the location of settlements. Thus the frequency of the Hebrew root En, meaning spring, in placenames: En-dor (Josh. 17:11); En-eglaim (Ezek. 47:10); En-gannim (Josh. 15:34); En-gedi (15:62); En-haddah (19:21); En-hakkore (Judg. 15:19); En-hazor (Josh. 19:37); En-rimmon; (Neh 11:29); En-rogel and En-shemesh (Josh. 15:7); and En-tappuah (17:7). Enaim (Enam, Josh. 15:34) means “two springs.” The goodness of Canaan was seen in its abundant water supply, “a land of brooks of water, of fountains and springs, flowing forth in valleys and hills” (Deut. 8:7 NASB).

During the Roman period man-made fountains such as this one at Pompeii (first century A.D.) supplemented natural spring-fed fountains.

The OT portrays the earth's dry land resting on foundations over the fountains of the deep (Gen. 7:11). The unleashing of these waters amounted to a return to the chaos before the creation (Gen. 1:1,9).

Provisions of spring water is an expression of God's providential care (Ps. 104:10). God's special concern for the poor and needy is pictured in terms of providing fountains and springs (Isa. 41:17-18). The blessedness of the endtime includes pictures of fountains flowing from the temple (Ezek. 47:1-12; Joel 3:18), Jerusalem (Zech. 14:8), or the throne of God (Rev. 22:1-2) with amazing life-giving powers.

Fountain in the center of Cisterna, a possible site for The Three Taverns in Italy.

The metaphorical use of fountain for source is common. The teaching of the wise is a fountain (source) of life (Prov. 13:14; contrast 25:26).

FOUNTAIN GATE A city gate at the southeast corner of the walls of ancient Jerusalem (Neh. 2:14; 3:15; 12:37), probably so named because people brought water from the En-rogel or Gihon springs into the city through this gate. The gate is possibly identical with the “gate between the two walls” (2 Kings 25:4; Jer. 39:4; 52:7). See Gate.

FOWL See Birds.

FOWLER One who traps birds. All biblical references are figurative. A variety of means are mentioned in Scripture: snares (Pss. 91:3; 124:7); traps (Ps. 141:9; Jer. 5:26-27); ropes (Job 18:10 KJV, “snare”); and nets (Hos.

7:12). God is praised as One who delivers from the fowler's snare (Pss. 91:3; 124:7), an image of the power of the wicked. Opposition to the Prophet Hosea is pictured as a fowler's snare set in the temple (Hos. 9:8). Hosea 7:12 pictures Israel as a dumb bird that God will catch with a net so the nation can be disciplined. Prov. 6:1-2,5 picture indebtedness as a snare to be avoided. Jesus warned that the day of God's coming judgment would be as unexpected as the closing of a trap (Luke 21:35).

FOX Doglike carnivorous mammal, smaller than the wolf with shorter legs (Neh. 4:3). It has large erect ears and a long bushy tail (Judg. 15:4). It is referenced as cunning and crafty (cp. Luke 13:32).

FRACTURE Breaking of a bone (Lev. 24:20, KJV “breach”). The law of retribution limited retaliation to “fracture for fracture.”

FRAME Term used by modern translations to render a number of Hebrew terms. Frame refers to the “carrying frame” (NRSV) for the lamps and tabernacle utensils (Num. 4:10,12; KJV, NASB, bars; REB, poles); the rim that served as a brace for the legs of the table of the presence (Exod. 25:25,27; KJV, border); the frames for the side panels of the stands used to transport the temple lavers (1 Kings 7:28-36; 2 Kings 16:17; KJV, ledge); the skeletal structure over which the tabernacle curtains were spread (Exod. 26:15-29; 35:11; KJV, NASB, boards); and the casing of windows and doors (1 Kings 7:4-5). Frame is also used in reference to the human form (Job 41:12; Pss. 103:14; 139:15). Frame can be interpreted either as “how we are formed” (NIV) or “what we are made of” (TEV). Frame is also used as a verb, meaning “to join.” The tongue's “framing words” is a picturesque expression for speech (Ps. 50:19). Most often frame means to plan or devise (Ps. 94:20) or to act on plans (Jer. 18:11).

FRANKINCENSE Ingredient used in making the perfume for the most holy place in the tabernacle (Exod. 30:34). It is a resinous substance derived from certain trees in the balsam family. Frankincense was one of the gifts presented to the child Jesus by the magi (Matt. 2:11).

FREEDMEN, SYNAGOGUE OF THE Greek speaking synagogue in Jerusalem involved in instigating the dispute with Stephen (Acts 6:9; KJV “Synagogue of the Libertines”). The Greek syntax suggests two groups of disputants. The first consisted of the Synagogue of the Freedmen, composed of Cyrenians and Alexandrians (NASB, TEV). It is possible that this first group has three parties, the freedmen (freed slaves), the Cyrenians, and Alexandrians. Some early versions have Libyans in place of “libertines,” giving three groups of North African Jews. The second party in the dispute was composed of Greek-speaking Jews of Asia and Cilicia. These may have belonged to the Synagogue of the Freedmen as well (REB). Some have identified the freedmen as the descendants of Pompey's prisoners of war (63 B.C.).

FREEWILL OFFERING Gift given at the impulse of the giver (Exod. 35:21-29; 36:3-7; Lev. 7:16). The distinctive mark of the freewill offering was the “stirred hearts” and “willing spirits” of the givers. The tabernacle was constructed using materials given as freewill offerings (Exod. 35:29). The people's desire to give was so great that Moses was compelled to ask that no more gifts be given (Exod. 36:3-7). Freewill offerings were traditionally given at Pentecost (Deut. 16:10). See Sacrifice and Offering.

FREEDOM A key biblical theme finding expression in both the spiritual and social ramifications of salvation in Christ. Scripture portrays freedom in a complex and multifaceted manner. It addresses issues related to political freedom, freedom from the institution of slavery, freedom from oaths and obligations, freedom from guilt and punishment, and freedom from sinful, destructive habits. Naturally, these categories are not airtight; there is considerable overlap, but these constitute the basic categories for understanding the Bible's conception of freedom.

Political Freedom The central redemptive event of the OT, the exodus, resulted in Israel's freedom from Egyptian domination. While it is true that the exodus involved freedom from slavery, the more significant result was the fulfillment of the divine promise ensuring the formation of Abraham's offspring into an independent political entity with its own land (Gen. 12:1-3; 15:18). Israel's political freedom, however, did not take the form of a democracy; God formed a covenant with Israel in which He ruled over the nation as king and the nation worshiped and served Him as devoted subjects—a form of government referred to as a “theocracy” (Exod. 19:5-6). Israel's freedom consisted of her independence from other human kingdoms, not of an independence from her divine king.

Freedom from Slavery In many biblical contexts, freedom is a social category standing in contrast to the social category of slavery. Though the institution of slavery did exist in the social structure of ancient Israel, it was regulated by strict laws ensuring the humane treatment of slaves. The Torah, for example prohibited any Hebrew from owning a Hebrew slave longer than six years unless the slave voluntarily agreed to remain in the service of the master (Exod. 21:2-5; Deut. 15:12-18). In fact, the Law commanded that any Hebrew who became poor and sold himself into slavery was not to be treated as a slave but as a hired worker. Furthermore, he was to be released on the year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:39-43). Any slave who suffered physical injury at the hands of his master was to be freed (Exod. 21:26). Thus, it was God's intention that His chosen people enjoy social freedom in the ancient Israelite economy. They were not to live in the promised land as they had lived in Egypt before their redemption.

In the NT, Paul advised slaves to gain their freedom if possible, but if not, to serve Christ faithfully as a slave. Their social position was irrelevant to their status in Christ's kingdom and their calling in ministry (1 Cor. 7:21-22). Though a believer may be a slave in society, he is free in Christ and can thus live in spiritual liberty while enduring social bondage. Paul's letter to Philemon appears to be singularly concerned with the release of Onesimus, a runaway slave who belonged to Philemon. In social terms, therefore, the Bible acknowledges that freedom is preferable to slavery but not essential to enjoying the spiritual freedom offered by the Gospel.

Freedom from Obligation and Guilt Scripture also relates the concept of freedom to the concepts of obligation, oath, and guilt. In the OT, people commonly are bound to and released from oaths (e.g., Gen. 24:8,41). The two-and-a-half tribes that lived on the east side of the Jordan were under obligation to help the rest of the Israelites conquer the land of Canaan. God said that once the land was subdued they would be free from this obligation (Num. 32:22). Similarly, Paul speaks of a spouse's freedom from marriage in the case of the mate's death or in the event that an unbelieving spouse forsakes the marriage (1 Cor. 7:15,39).

This concept is then broadened to include freedom from punishment brought on by guilt. For example, a woman suspected of marital infidelity was subjected to a bitter water ritual to determine her guilt or innocence. Before administering the test, the priest would say, "If you are innocent of uncleanness, may you be free from the curse of the bitter water" (cp. Num. 5:19-22). Paul uses the term freedom in a similar sense in Rom. 8:1-2 when he says, "Therefore no condemnation exists for those in Christ, because the Spirit's law of life in Christ Jesus has set you free from the law of sin and of death" (HCSB).

Freedom from Confinement and Distress Scripture frequently describes God as one who "sets prisoners free" (Pss. 102:20; 146:7; Isa. 45:13; 58:6; 61:1; Luke 4:18). In these contexts, God is freeing people from either literal or metaphorical confinement. The concept is frequently broadened to include distress or dire circumstances (Ps. 118:5; Zech. 9:11; 1 Cor. 7:32).

Freedom from Sin The work of Christ brought new depth and significance to the biblical concept of freedom. Paul in particular proclaims a new freedom available in Christ, freedom from sin. Beyond freedom from the penalty of sin, Paul also speaks of freedom from the power of sin, the Spirit-empowered ability to resist habitual disobedience (Rom. 6:7-22; Gal. 4:1-7). Closely related to this is Paul's declaration of freedom from the law, not freedom from God's standard of righteousness but freedom from the frustration of our fallen nature's inability to keep God's law (Rom. 7:7-20). Not only did Christ fulfill the demands of the law in His own life and sacrificial death, He continues, through the Holy Spirit, to fulfill it in the lives of transformed believers.

Thus, contrary to popular opinion, freedom is not the ability to do whatever one desires. This inevitably leads to enslavement to one's own passions. Rather, the Bible defines freedom as the ability to deny one's self, to deny one's desires in the interest of pleasing and glorifying God. See Election; Slave, Servant.

FRIEND, FRIENDSHIP Close trusting relationship between two people. Nowhere does the Bible present a concise definition of “friend” or “friendship.” Instead, both the OT and NT present friendship in its different facets.

Two Hebrew root words, rh and 'hb, are used to describe friendship. R'h denotes an associate or companion, while 'hb connotes the object of one's affection or devotion—a friend. Consequently, friendship may be simple association (Gen. 38:12; 2 Sam. 15:37) or loving companionship, the most recognizable example being that between David and Saul's son, Jonathan (1 Sam. 18:1,3; 20:17; 2 Sam. 1:26).

Friendship, however, was not limited to earthly associates. The OT also affirms friendship between God and human persons. The relationship between God and Moses (Exod. 33:11) is likened to friendship because they conversed face-to-face. Both 2 Chron. 20:7 and Isa. 41:8 characterize Abraham as the friend of God. Friendship between God and His people is alluded to in Isa. 5:1-7, the song of the vineyard. Proverbs features the most references to friendship, nearly all of them cautioning against dubious friendships or extolling the virtues of a true friend (14:20; 17:17-18; 18:24; 19:4,6; 22:11, 24; 27:6,10,14).

In the NT, the predominant word for friend is philos. A derivative, philia, is often used for friendship. Jesus is described as the “friend of...sinners” (Matt. 11:19 HCSB). He called His disciples “friends” (Luke 12:4; John 15:13-15). The NT highlights the connection between friends and joy (Luke 15:6,9,29), as well as warning of the possibility of friends proving false (Luke 21:16). Echoing the OT, James pointed to Abraham, the friend of God, as one whose example of active faith is to be followed (James 2:23). James also warned against friendship with the world (James 4:4).

Only in 3 John 14 is “friend” a self-designation for Christians. As a means of describing the relations between church members, friendship was overshadowed by the model of family relations, brotherhood and sisterhood (1 Tim. 5:1-3; 1 Pet. 1:22; 2:17). See Body of Christ; David; Jonathan; Love; Neighbor.

FRIEND OF THE KING Title of a court official (1 Kings 4:5). The king's friend was counselor and companion to the monarch. He functioned somewhat as a secretary of state. Hushai evidently held this office in David's court; Zabud held it in Solomon's.

FRINGE Tassels of twisted cords fastened to the four corners of the outer garment, worn by observant Jews as a reminder of covenant obligations (Num. 15:38-39; Deut. 22:12; cp. Zech. 8:23). The woman suffering from chronic hemorrhage touched the tassel of Jesus' cloak (Matt. 9:20; Luke 8:44). The English translations (with the exception of the NRSV) obscure this point by using different terms to translate the Greek kraspedon when it refers to Jesus' outer cloak (hem, KJV; fringe, NASB; edge, NIV, TEV; simply garment, RSV) and to the outer garment of the Pharisees (borders, KJV; tassels, NASB, NIV, TEV; fringe, RSV). Though Jesus observed the OT requirement, He criticized those who wore excessively long tassels to call attention to their piety (Matt. 23:5).

FROG Amphibious animal specifically used by God as a plague against Pharaoh and his people. When the Lord sent Moses to free the Israelites, Pharaoh's heart was hard. Moses told Pharaoh that frogs would come into the palace and to the houses of his officials and his people. Aaron stretched out his hand over the waters, and frogs covered the land. The court magicians also did the same, and more frogs came on the land. Pharaoh called on Moses to pray to the Lord to take the frogs away and he would let the people go. Moses prayed, the frogs died, but Pharaoh still refused to let the Israelites go free (Exod. 8:2-15). See Animals.

FRONTLETS Objects containing Scripture passages worn on the forehead and between the eyes, primarily at prayer times. Jews followed scriptural commands, literally, writing Exod. 13:1-16; Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21 on small scrolls, placing these in leather containers and placing these on their forehead and left arm (Exod. 13:9,16; Deut. 6:8; 11:18).

By NT times, the frontlets were known as phylacteries (Matt. 23:5). Jewish men wore phylacteries during prayer times, except on the Sabbath and feast days.

Phylacteries were bound with thongs to the forehead, though some phylacteries were worn on the upper arm so that when a person crossed his arms the Scriptures contained in the phylactery would be close to the heart.

Jesus condemned individuals who called attention to themselves by wearing larger than usual phylacteries (Matt. 23:5).

FRUIT Edible pulp surrounding the seed(s) of many plants. Various types of fruit are mentioned; among the most common are grapes, figs, olives, pomegranates, and apples (perhaps to be identified with apricots or quince). Israel, in contrast to her neighbors, recognized the process by which trees reproduce by means of seeds carried in fruit to be a part of God's good plan at creation (Gen. 1:12,29). The continuing fruitfulness of Israel's trees was dependent on faithfulness to the covenant (Deut. 28:4,11,18). The first fruit to ripen was offered to God (Exod. 23:16; Neh. 10:35).

Figuratively, “the fruit of the womb” is a common expression for descendants (Gen. 30:2; Deut. 7:13; Ps. 127:3; Isa. 13:18). Fruit often indicates a thought close to our word “results.” The fruit of the Spirit is the results of the Spirit's workings in the lives of believers (Gal. 5:22-23). Similar is the use of fruit where we would speak of manifestations or expressions. The fruits of righteousness (Phil. 1:11; James 3:18), of repentance (Matt. 3:8), of light (Eph. 5:9) are expressions of righteousness, repentance, and moral purity. Jesus cautioned that false prophets could be identified by the fruit they produced (Matt. 7:15-20), that is, by the qualities manifested in their lives. Jesus similarly warned of the necessity of bearing fruit that was compatible with citizenship in the kingdom of God (Matt. 21:43). Fruit sometimes has the sense of reward (Isa. 3:10; John 4:36; Phil. 4:17). Fruit is also used as a picture for Christian converts (Rom. 1:13; 1 Cor. 16:15).

FRUSTRATION Hebrew verb “to frustrate” (from parar) means to make ineffective or void and is used primarily to describe God's response to the plans of people. The Bible declares that God frustrates the plans of those who trust in their own devices or who operate according to their own agendas (Job 5:12; Ps. 33:10; Isa. 44:25) and relates several instances of persons who became frustrated in opposing God. These include Pharaoh (Exod. 8-12), Ahithophel (2 Sam. 17:14,23), Ahab(1 Kings 18:17; 21:1-4), the men of Sanballat and Tobiah (Neh. 4:7,15), and Pilate (John 19:1-16).

Those who strive to follow God often experience frustration in its more general sense of a dissatisfaction arising over unmet expectations. The psalmist cried out in frustration over God's apparent inactivity on his behalf (Ps. 22:1-2; 38:1-22; 39:1-13), and Paul expressed frustration over the lack of faith evident in the Galatian believers (Gal. 3:1-5). Partly in response to such frustrations, Paul learned to be content in every situation (Phil. 4:11-13) and counseled that everything eventually works for good for those who love God and are called according to His purpose (Rom. 8:28). God's promises of comfort extend to those who are frustrated (Isa. 40:1; 1 Cor. 1:3-7), while the spiritual maturity, which enables believers to overcome frustration, arises from trust in God in the midst of trials (Ps. 22:5; Prov. 3:5-6; Phil. 1:6; James 1:2-4).

FRYING PAN KJV term for the vessel used for cooking the cereal offering (Lev. 2:7; 7:9), simply “pan” in modern translations. A kettle for deep fat frying is perhaps intended.

FUEL Materials used to start and maintain a fire. Numerous types of fuel are mentioned in Scripture: wood (Isa. 44:14-16); charcoal (Jer. 36:22; John 18:18); shrubs (Ps. 120:4); thornbushes (Eccles. 7:6; Nah. 1:10); grass (Matt. 6:30); weeds (Matt. 13:40); vines (Ezek. 15:4,6); branch trimmings (John 15:6); animal or even human dung (Ezek. 4:12); and the blood-stained clothing of fallen warriors (Isa. 9:5). Oil was used as a fuel for lamps (Matt. 25:3). Coal was not known to the Hebrews.

Fuel is frequently used figuratively as a symbol of total destruction. Disobedient Israel is portrayed as “fuel for the fire” (Isa. 9:19; Ezek. 15:6; 21:32). For Jesus, God's extravagant love evidenced in clothing grass destined to be burned as fuel with beautiful flowers illustrated even greater care for human beings (Matt. 6:30).

FULFILL Verb used in three senses that merit special attention: an ethical sense of observing or meeting requirements; a prophetic sense of corresponding to what was promised, predicted, or foreshadowed; and a temporal sense related to the arrival of times ordained by God. The ethical sense of “fulfill” appears in the OT only in connection with meeting the requirements of a vow (Lev. 22:21; Num. 15:3), never in connection with the law. In the NT Jesus submitted to John's baptism, identifying Himself with sinful people, in order “to fulfill all righteous” (Matt. 3:15 HCSB), that is, to meet God's expectation for His life. Jesus described His mission not as coming “to destroy the Law or the Prophets” but “to fulfill” (Matt. 5:17 HCSB). The NT repeatedly speaks of love as the fulfilling of the law (Rom. 13:8-10; Gal. 5:14; James 2:8).

“Fulfill” is most common in Scripture in the prophetic sense of corresponding to what was promised, predicted, or foreshadowed. The fulfillment of prophecy in the life of Jesus is a major theme in Matthew's Gospel. Isaiah's prophecy (7:14) found fulfillment not only in Christ's virgin birth but also in His nature as “God is with us” (Matt. 1:22-23 HCSB; cp. 28:20). Jesus' ministry in both word (Matt. 4:14-17) and deed (8:16-17) fulfilled Scripture (Isa. 9:1-2; 53:4). Jesus' command of secrecy (Matt. 12:16) and His habit of teaching in parables (13:35) likewise fulfilled Scripture (Isa. 42:1-3; Ps. 78:2), as did His humble entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:4-5; Zech. 9:9) and His arrest as a bandit (Matt. 26:55-56). At several points Jesus' life story gave new meaning to the history of Israel. Like Israel, Jesus was God's Son called out of Egypt (Matt. 2:15; Hos. 11:1). The suffering of Israel's mothers (Jer. 31:15) was echoed by the mothers of Bethlehem (Matt. 2:17-18). Both foreshadowed the fate of the Christ child who was spared only to die at a later time.

Luke and Acts are especially interested in Christ's suffering and later glorification as the fulfillment of the expectations of all the OT, the Law, Prophets, and Writings (Luke 24:25-26,44-47; Acts 3:18; 13:27-41). Jesus interpreted His journey to Jerusalem as a second “exodus” (Luke 9:31), an event that would result in freedom for God's people.

In John the failure of the people to recognize God at work in Jesus' signs or to accept Jesus' testimony was explained as fulfillment of Scripture (12:37-41; cp. Mark 4:11-12). John also viewed details of the passion story as the fulfillment of Scripture (John 19:24,28; Pss. 22:18; 69:21). Typological fulfillment in which Jesus corresponded to OT institutions is more common than correspondence to predictive prophecy. Jesus was “the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world” (John 1:29 HCSB), likely a reference to the Passover lamb (John 19:14). Like Bethel (Gen. 28:12) Jesus offered access between heaven and earth (John 1:51). At Cana Jesus' gift of wine corresponded to the blessings of God's future (John 2:1-11; Isa. 25:6; Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13; Zech. 9:17). Jesus' body which was to be destroyed and raised was identified with the temple (John 2:19,21). In His being lifted up on the cross (John 3:14), Christ corresponded to the serpent Moses raised in the wilderness (Num. 21:9). In the same way, Christ in giving His life corresponded to the life-giving manna from heaven (John 6:31-32; Exod. 16:15). Often, time references in the Gospel of John suggest that Jesus gave new meaning to the celebrations of Israel (Passover, 2:13; 6:4; 11:55; booths, 7:10; dedication, 10:22).

Paul spoke of Christ as the One in whom “every one of God's promises is ‘yes’” (2 Cor. 1:20 HCSB). Like John, Paul made frequent use of typology. Christ was foreshadowed by Adam (Rom. 5:12-21; 1 Cor. 15:22,45-49), by the rock in the wilderness (1 Cor. 10:4), and by the Passover lamb (1 Cor. 5:7).

Temporal phrases such as “the time is fulfilled” point to times ordained by God, for example, the time of Christ's ministry (Mark 1:15; Gal. 4:4; Eph. 1:10), the time of Gentile domination of Israel (Luke 21:24), or the time of the appearance of the lawless one (2 Thess. 2:6).

FULLER One who thickens and shrinks newly shorn wool or newly woven cloth; also one who washes or bleaches clothing. The Hebrew term comes from the root “to tread” and refers to the common method of cleansing clothing by treading them by foot. Cleansing was also done by beating clothing with sticks. The ancient Hebrews were not acquainted with bar soap. Clothing was cleansed in a solution of alkali obtained by burning wood to ash. Putrid urine was sometimes used in the process. Due to the foul smell, fullers worked outside the city gates. All the biblical references are metaphorical (Ps. 51:7; Jer. 2:22; 4:14; Mal. 3:2) and refer to cleansing from sin.

FULLER'S FIELD Site outside Jerusalem's walls, located near the conduit between the Gihon Spring and the upper pool (2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 7:3; 36:2). The road to the Fuller's Field was the scene of an encounter between Rabshakeh, agent of the king of Assyria, who stopped within hearing distance of those on the city walls, and the leaders of Jerusalem. See Rabshakeh.

FULLNESS Completeness or totality. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof" (Ps. 24:1 KJV). Scripture sees that nothing is really complete until it serves the purpose for which God has created it. Thus Eph. 1:23 (NRSV) speaks of God as "him who fills all in all." He is the one who gives everything its ultimate significance and richness. This fullness is most clearly expressed in Jesus Christ (Col. 1:19; 2:9) from whom all true believers receive the divine life of fullness (John 1:16; 10:10). It is a life full of joy (John 15:11) and peace despite the fact of tribulations in this world (John 16:33). See Eternal Life.

FULLNESS OF TIME Traditional rendering of two similar Greek expressions in Gal. 4:4 and Eph. 1:10. The first refers to a past event, the sending of Christ to redeem those born under the law. While the sending of God's Son encompasses the whole of Christ's incarnate ministry, the NT specifically relates the sending to Christ's death as a saving event (John 3:17; Rom. 8:3; 1 John 4:9-10). The sending of Christ in the fullness of time refers not so much to world conditions in the sense that the prevalence of Greek as a common spoken language, Roman roads, and the Roman enforced peace made the rapid spread of the gospel possible. Rather the emphasis is on God whose sending of Christ is not a “last-ditch effort” but part of God's gracious plan from the beginning.

The reference to the fullness of time in Ephesians is more difficult. Some translations understand the time when all things are gathered together in Christ to lie in the future (NIV, TEV); others, in the past (REB). A major theme of Ephesians is that Christ has already broken down the dividing wall of hostility between Jew and Gentile (2:11-22, esp. 2:14,21). Therefore, it seems likely that the crucial shift in time between the past with its hopelessness and hostility and the present age of reconciliation has already occurred.

FURNACE Device, generally of brick or stone, used to heat materials to high temperatures. In biblical times furnaces were not used for central heating. Rather furnaces were used to smelt ore, melt metal for casting, heat metal for forging, fire pottery or bricks, and to make lime. The furnace of Dan. 3 was probably a large furnace used for smelting ore or for firing bricks. Biblical references to furnaces are mostly figurative for experiences of testing (of the Egyptian bondage, Deut. 4:20; 1 Kings 8:51; Jer. 11:4; of adversity, Isa. 48:10). God's stubbornly rebellious people are pictured as “rejected silver” (Jer. 6:30) and as dross, the waste product of the smelting process (Ezek. 22:17-22). Such pictures may form the background of the furnace of fire which symbolizes divine punishment (Matt. 13:42,50).

FURNACES, TOWER OF KJV and NASB designation (Neh. 3:11) for a tower designated “Tower of the Ovens” in other modern translations. The tower was adjacent to the “corner gate” located at the northwest angle in the second or middle wall of Jerusalem. The “Baker's Street” (Jer. 37:21) may have passed by this tower.

FURNITURE Equipment in a home used for rest, beautification, storage, and workspace.

Sacred Furniture Biblical interest in furniture focuses on the sacred furnishings of the tabernacle and the temple. We have in Exod. 25-27; 30; 37-38 a full description of the tabernacle with all its objects of furniture. Lovingly detailed accounts of the ark of the covenant, the altar of incense, and other furnishings are so clear that we can easily visualize and reconstruct them in the form of models. Likewise, 1 Kings 6-7 provides similar data about the temple of Solomon. See Tabernacle; Temple.

Common Furniture But this is not the case regarding the furniture of the common people living out their daily lives in their tents and houses. The Bible occasionally refers to basic furniture items such as beds, chairs, etc., but we have virtually nothing about manufacturers, building materials, designs, or appearances.

Biblical terminology illustrates the problem. Old Testament Hebrew has no word equivalent to the English terms “furniture” and “furnishings.” The Hebrew word keli is so translated in passages such as Exod. 31:7, but in this very same context the very same word (keli) is also rendered as “utensils,” “articles,” or “accessories.” In fact, the word keli is so fluid that it may refer to any humanly manufactured material object.

Similarly, the NT carries us no further, for it uses no word that could be translated as “furniture” in the English versions.

Sources of Data The Bible remains a source of data, however, at least to the degree that it refers to such items as beds and chairs. Beyond the Bible itself we must resort to artifacts recovered by archaeology. Palestine, however, does not enjoy the climate that would have saved wooden furnishings for study today. Only a few such objects have survived, and even these have greatly disintegrated over time. This being the case, we must resort to secondary artifacts such as written records, seals, sculpture, ivories, and tombs.

Individual Objects of Furniture Domestically, Israelite furniture reflected the simplicity of the ordinary household dwelling. Some Israelites preferred to live in tents (Jer. 35), preserving the traditions of nomadic and wilderness days. The furnishings of such a living place would have to be readily portable and as light as possible. Chests of some sort would be used when the family or clan was settled, then double as carriage crates when on the move. A few simple rugs covered the ground floor. The tent itself and all its paraphernalia—pegs, ropes, interior curtains for separating the “rooms” inside, along with a few sleeping mats—might be all the “furniture” such a family owned. The same would apply to those living in small shelters.

A more permanent home would be furnished according to the family's relative wealth or poverty. Like the tent-dwellers mentioned above, a poorer family would own, at the minimum, simple bedding and kitchen equipment. Reed mats would be rolled out on the floor for resting and sleeping. In some cases these mats would have to serve as tables and chairs, as well, since real ones were probably beyond the means of poorer families. All homes needed interior lighting, of course, so even the poor would own, in all probability, several lamps, i.e., saucer-shaped bowls with a pinch in the rim for a wick fueled by a pool of olive oil; such a lamp often sat on a supporting stand. Widemouthed jars for food and water were essential, as were also some sort of stone and clay oven and a grinding mill for preparing grain. A few of these houses might also have stone or wooden benches, some covered with cloth or carpet material around the inner walls; but this was likely the exception among the poor rather than the rule. Since most homes of biblical days had few windows, they would also have had few, if any, curtains.

Even the homes of the comfortable and the wealthy would also seem all but bare in contrast to the homes of any socioeconomic class in a developed nation of the West today. Consider the home of the “wealthy woman” of Shunem (in lower northern Palestine about five miles east of Megiddo), found in 2 Kings 4:8-37. Because of her special concern for the prophet Elisha, she and her husband built “a small room on the roof” (4:10 NIV) of their house for him to use when he was passing through their vicinity. They furnished it with “a bed and a table, a chair and a lamp” (4:10 NIV), for which he was sincerely grateful.

Only a century later Amos (760-750 B.C.) condemned the decadent prosperity of the wealthy class in his day. He spoke of the mansions of Samaria (Amos 3:15; 5:11; 6:11) and their opulent beds and couches encrusted with ivory (3:12,15; 6:4). By then the gap between the relatively poor and the relatively rich had grown to scandalous proportions, as evidenced by the quality of their furniture (cp. Esther 1:6). It seems most likely that apart from the highly ornamented furniture mentioned in Amos, the household furniture of the vast majority of Israelites was merely functional, rather than aesthetic.

Furniture and Artifacts Archaeology has shed some (but not much) light on ancient Palestinian furniture. The excavation of ancient Jericho in the 1950s discovered a series of tombs containing both the skeletal remains of the dead and practical provisions to serve their needs in the afterlife. The pertinent finds date to about 1600 B.C. Furniture styles were slow to change, and the artifacts found at Jericho were probably like those used by the Israelites long after.

One body had been laid on a wooden bed consisting of a rectangular frame enclosing wooden crosspieces tenoned to the rails. The crosspieces and rails enclosed five panels of woven rush. The bed probably supported a mattress about six inches above the floor.

Beside the bed was a table measuring about 58 inches by 16 inches, supported by only three legs about 10 inches above the floor. Each leg tenoned into a rounded corner extension below the underside of the table. Survivors left a wooden platter of mutton on the table.

Two cylinder seals from Tell es-Sa'idiyeh on the Jordan River and dated to about 750 B.C. show simple chairs in their impressions. One has a tall straight back and, apparently, a seat of woven rush. Further details are unclear. The other chair has a curved, ladder-back design with four cross-slats.

FURROW Narrow trench cut in the earth by a plow (1 Sam. 14:14; Job 31:38; 39:10; Pss. 65:10; 129:3; Hos. 10:4; 12:11). The KJV rendered two Hebrew terms as “furrow” which are best translated otherwise. At Ezek. 17:7,10 modern translations opt for bed (NASB, RSV), plot (NIV), or garden (TEV). At Hos. 10:10 modern translations understand a reference to two sins (iniquity, NRSV; guilt, NASB; sin, NIV, TEV; shameful deed, REB).

FUTURE HOPE Expectation of individuals after their death and of the world when God brings present world affairs to an end.

Future hope focuses upon the expectancy of the consummation of the individual's salvation at the close of the age. With the ushering in of the eternal order at the return of Christ, the believer's hope becomes experienced reality rather than anticipation of future experience (Rom. 8:24-25). This eschatological orientation of NT future hope grows out of the OT prophetic anticipation of God's future deliverance (Isa. 25:9; see especially Paul's use of Isa. 11:10 in Rom. 15:12).

Old Testament Terms In the Hebrew OT several terms are used to convey the idea of hope: qawah (to be stretched out towards, to long after, wait for [with God as object 26 times]), yachal (to wait, long [for God, 27 times]), chakah (to wait [for God, 7 times]), sabar (to wait, hope [for God, 4 times]). The corresponding nouns are not commonly used; only nine times in reference to hope in God. Of the 146 uses of these verbs or nouns, only half have the thrust to spiritual reality rather than a nonreligious meaning. In these 73 religious uses the concept of hope is closely related to trust. God is the ground and frequent object of hope; "to hope in Yahweh," "to wait for Yahweh" are common expressions. Implicit to hoping in God is submission to His sovereign rule. Consequently, hope and fear of God are often expressed together (Pss. 33:18-20; 147:11; Prov. 23:17-18). To hope in God is to stand in awe of Him and His power with the confidence that God will faithfully perform His word. Thus hope becomes trust in the righteous character of Yahweh.

Between the Testaments In the interbiblical period the eschatological thrust of hope became prominent but also confusing with its differing expectations. This future hope was often directed toward the expectation of the Messiah and the restoration of the kingdom of Israel. With the emergence of numerous individuals making messianic claims, arousing the expectations of the people, but then collapsing into defeat and destruction, the future hope of Israel took on a pessimistic tone especially in rabbinical thought. Not before Israel achieved complete obedience to the law could God's kingdom be established.

This national uncertainty tended to create a personal uncertainty about what constitutes the required obedience for pleasing God, thus ensuring the resurrection of the body and inclusion in that coming messianic kingdom. In contrast to this pessimistic view, one finds in Qumran a confident eschatological hope. However, this hope was only possible for the select few who were the elect of God. In Hellenistic Judaism, future hope was submerged into the Greek concept of the immortality of the soul, as Philo's writings illustrate.

New Testament The writers in the NT express the concept of future hope primarily by the Greek word elpis and its cognates.

The use of hope in reference to the return of Christ is seen in Matt. 24:50 (also Luke 12:46) and in 2 Pet. 3:12-14. In Jesus' teaching on watchfulness, failure to be expecting the return of the Son of man can cause disaster. In 2 Peter this expectation of the day of the Lord stands as the incentive to holy living. In both passages the element of uncertainty often associated with the Greek word has disappeared and is replaced with the sense of confidence based upon the promise of the Lord to come again.

Content of Future Hope The objects of the various Greek words relating to future hope provide insight into what constitutes this hope. Most basic is the expectancy of the return of Christ, described as the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 1:7) and as the coming of the day of God (parousia; 2 Pet. 3:12), or just simply as hope in our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Thess. 1:3; cp. Luke 12:36; Phil. 3:20; Heb. 9:28). This expectancy constitutes a blessed hope and is defined as the manifestation of the glory of our great God and our Savior Jesus Christ (Titus 2:13; cp. Rom. 5:2; Col. 1:27). Accompanying this manifestation of Christ is the expectancy of a new heaven and a new earth (2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1); the resurrection of the righteous and the wicked (Acts 24:15); the revelation of the sons of God (Rom. 8:19); our adoption as sons which is defined as the redemption of our bodies (Rom. 8:23); the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ for life eternal (Jude 21); God's grace (1 Pet. 1:13). As Abraham awaited the Holy City, so the believer looks forward to it (Heb. 11:10). The hope of Israel in the promise of God is realized in the Christian hope of resurrection (Acts 26:6-8). These constitute the hope of life eternal long promised beforehand (Titus 1:2; 3:7), of salvation (1 Thess. 5:8) and of righteousness (Gal. 5:5).

The basis of this hope lies in God. In Him who is the Savior of all mankind one puts hope (1 Tim. 4:10; 5:5; Rom. 15:12; 1 Pet. 1:21), rather than in uncertain riches (1 Tim. 6:17); in His name is hope placed (Matt. 12:21), or in Christ (1 Cor. 15:19). This hope is linked closely to the gospel (Col. 1:23), to our calling into God's grace (Eph. 1:18; 4:4) and to faith and the presence of the Holy Spirit (Gal. 5:5). It is a dynamically living hope (1 Pet. 1:3) which motivates one to holy and righteous living (2 Pet. 3:14). As such it stands as a member of the Christian triad of faith, hope, and love (1 Cor. 13:13; 1 Thess. 1:3; Col. 1:4-5). GAAL (Gá' ál) Personal name meaning “abhorrence,” “neglect,” or perhaps “dung beetle.” Man who usurped Abimelech's leadership in Shechem but met sudden defeat from Abimelech and left the city (Judg. 9:26-41). The early translations spell his name and that of his father in several different ways, showing perhaps that Israelites intentionally distorted his name to shame his reputation.

GAASH (Gá' ásh) Personal name meaning “rising and falling noisily.” A height in the hill country of Ephraim that cannot be located any more precisely. Joshua was buried there (Josh. 24:30). Hiddai, one of David's 30 military heroes, came from the brooks of Gaash (2 Sam. 23:30).

GABA (Gá' bá) (KJV) See Geba.

GABBAI (Gáb' bá í) Personal name traditionally interpreted as meaning “tax collector.” Member of tribe of Benjamin who settled in Jerusalem in time of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:8). Many modern commentators think copying errors have introduced the name into the text from an original Hebrew text meaning “heroic men,” though no existing Hebrew text has this reading.

GABBATHA (Gáb' bá thá) English transliteration of Greek transliteration of Aramaic place-name meaning “elevation.” A platform in front of the praetorian or governor's palace in Jerusalem, where Pilate sat in judgment over Jesus (John 19:13), pronouncing the sentence to crucify Jesus. Before announcing the decision, however, Pilate introduced Jesus as King of the Jews, giving the Jewish leaders one last chance to confess their Messiah. The Greek name for the place was lithostrotos, or “stone pavement.” The location is either the fortress Antonia or Herod's palace. Tourists see the Antonia site at the present Convent of the Sisters of Zion, but archaeologists have dated the pavement there later than Jesus' time.

GABRIEL (Gá' brí ěl) Personal name meaning “strong man of God.” The heavenly messenger who interpreted to Daniel the meaning of the vision of the ram and the goat. He appears four times in the Bible, each time bringing to human beings a message from the Lord. Twice he appeared to Daniel (8:15-27; 9:20-27). In the NT he appeared to announce the births of John the Baptist (Luke 1:8-20) and Jesus (Luke 1:26-38). See Angels.

GAD (Gād) Personal name meaning “good fortune.” 1. Seventh son of Jacob and the progenitor of the tribe of Gad (Gen. 30:9-11). His mother was Leah's maid Zilpah. At the conclusion of the period of wilderness wandering, when the Israelites were preparing to occupy Canaan, the tribe of Gad requested permission, along with the tribe of Reuben and half the tribe of Manasseh, to settle east of the Jordan. Their reason was that they owned large numbers of livestock and the territory east of the Jordan was particularly suitable for raising livestock (Num. 32). This territory became known as Gad (Jer. 49:1). Though the exact limits of Gad's tribal territory are difficult to determine, the Gadites generally occupied land to the northeast of the Dead Sea (Josh. 13:24-28). See Tribes of Israel. 2. Syrian god known from inscriptions from Phoenicia and Palmyra and used in biblical names such as Baal-gad (Josh. 11:17) and Migdal-gad (Josh. 15:37). It also apparently is meant in Isa. 65:11 where the prophet condemned the people for setting “a table for Fortune” (NASB; Hb. Gad). 3. Prophet who advised David as he fled from Saul (1 Sam. 22:5) and who brought God's options for punishment after David took a census of Israel (2 Sam. 24:11-14). Gad also brought David God's orders to build an altar, apparently on the site of the future temple (2 Sam. 24:18-19). The Chronicler pointed his readers to records of David's reign by Gad (1 Chron. 29:29) and of Gad's assistance in showing David God's plan for temple worship (2 Chron. 29:25).

Entrance to the Church of St. Gabriel in Nazareth.

GADARA (Gād' á rá) Place-name for home of Gadarenes used in TEV (Matt. 8:28). See Gadarene.

GADARENE (Gād' á rën) Resident of Gadara, one of the cities of Decapolis (Mark 5:1; Gerasenes, HCSB). In the NT it is mentioned only in the Gospel accounts of the healing of the Gadarene man who was afflicted by demons (Matt. 8:28-34; Mark 5:1-17; Luke 8:26-37). The textual tradition in the Greek manuscripts of each of these passages shows confusion among Gadarenes, Gerasenes, and Gergesenes. Textual evidence appears to favor Gadarenes in Matthew, Gerasenes in Mark and Luke. Origen, an early church father, apparently introduced Gergesenes into the tradition. Gadarene, in the context, would have to refer to the larger area, not just the city of Gadara. Gergasenes points to the modern city of Kersa on the lake's edge. Gerasene comes from the city of Gerasa about 30 miles southeast of the lake. Early tradition may have confused the Hebrew or Aramaic spelling of Gedara and Gerasa or may have seen Gerasa as the dominant town in the area. Whatever the original name, Gentiles and their pigs dominated the area. It has been identified with modern Um Keis, approximately five miles southeast of the Sea of Galilee. The designation “country of the Gadarenes” evidently applied to an area that extended as far as the shore of Galilee.

GADDI (Gād' dī) Personal name meaning “my good fortune.” Spy from the tribe of Manasseh sent by Moses to examine the land of Canaan prior to Israel's conquest (Num. 13:11).

GADDIEL (Gād' dī ēl) Personal name meaning “God is my good fortune.” Spy from tribe of Zebulun that Moses sent to examine Canaan, the land to be conquered (Num. 13:10).

GADFLY (Jer. 46:20 NIV, NRSV) Stinging insect (stinging fly, TEV), either a horsefly (Tabanidae, NASB) or a botfly (Oestridae). See Insects.

GADI (Gā' dī) Personal name meaning “my good fortune.” A variant Hebrew spelling of Gaddi using same word as Gadite. Father of Menahem, king of Israel (752-742 B.C.) (2 Kings 15:14,17).

GADITE (Gād' ite) Member of tribe of Gad. See Gad; Gadi.

GAHAM (Gā' hām) Personal name meaning “flame.” Son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24).

GAHAR (Gā' hār) Personal name meaning “drought” or “small in spirit” or “red-faced.” Clan head of family of temple servants who returned from Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:47).

GAIUS (Gā' ūs) Greek form of Latin name Caius meaning “I am glad, rejoice.” 1. Macedonian Christian who was one of Paul's traveling companions (Acts 19:29). Along with Aristarchus, he was seized during the riot in Ephesus incited by Demetrius the silversmith. 2. Christian from Derbe who accompanied Paul the apostle into Asia (Acts 20:4). 3. Paul the apostle's host in Corinth (Rom. 16:23). According to 1 Cor. 1:14 he was one of the individuals in Corinth whom Paul personally had baptized. 4. The Christian John loved and to whom he addressed 3 John (3 John 1).

GALAL (Gá' lá) Personal name meaning "roll" or "turtle." 1. Levite among those who settled in Jerusalem after the exile (1 Chron. 9:15). 2. Grandfather of Adda, a Levite who led in Nehemiah's thanksgiving (Neh. 11:17). He came up and settled in Jerusalem after the exile (1 Chron. 9:16).

GALATIA (Gá lá' tíá) Geographical name derived from Gaul because its inhabitants were Celts or Galli (Gauls). The original settlement was in central Asia Minor. King Nicomedes of Bithynia invited the Celtic warriors across the Bosphorus River to help him fight his brother in 278 B.C. The invaders fought on their own, capturing cities until stopped by Antiochus I in 275 B.C. They then occupied the northern part of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Pontus and Bithynia, on the east by Tavium and Pessinus in the west. For the most part, true Galatians lived in open areas, leaving city occupation to their predecessors, the Phrygians. The true Galatians constantly switched sides in ongoing battles in the area. Finally, in 25 B.C. Rome made Galatia a province of the empire and extended its borders, adding Lycaonia, Isauria, and Pisidia with Ancyra serving as the governmental center. Various Roman rulers added and subtracted territory from the province, so its precise boundaries are difficult to draw. Paul visited Galatia (Acts 16:6; 18:23), though his precise route is not clear. It is not known whether he visited Phrygian-dominated cities or the true Galatians in the countryside or whether his letter was addressed to the original territory in the north or to the Roman province with its southern additions (cp. 1 Cor. 16:1; 2 Tim. 4:10, where some manuscripts have Gaul, and 1 Pet. 1:1). See Asia Minor, Cities of; Galatians, Letter to the.

GALATIAN (Gá lá' shón) Specifically, a member of the Celtic or Galli tribes which invaded and settled Galatia, but more generally any resident of the territory or province of Galatia. See Galatia.

The image of a dying Gaul. The Gauls or Galli who inhabited the region of Galatia were a warlike people.

GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE Galatians is Paul's most intense letter. His anger at their situation is evidenced by the omission of his usual expression of praise after the salutation. The Galatian churches were founded by Paul (4:13-15), but others, probably from Jerusalem, visited the Galatians espousing views contrary to what Paul had taught. Their teachings centered around the need to supplement faith in Christ with obedience to the law of Moses. Circumcision was required, since it marked the “conversion” of a Gentile male to Judaism. The false teachers were referred to as “Judaizers.”

Paul forcefully presented his position that justification comes by the grace of God, by faith alone in Christ alone. By justification Paul means both being declared guiltless before God and being granted status as a member of God's covenant community. One's salvation is in no way contingent on observing the law of Moses. Relying on observance of the law demonstrates that one lacks the necessary faith that Christ alone is sufficient for salvation.

Two problems make determining the origin and destination of Galatians difficult. The first is the exact identity of the Galatians. The word itself referred either to an ethnic group (also known as Gauls or Celts) in northern Galatia or to those living in the Roman province of Galatia. If Paul used the term in its provincial sense, then he probably wrote to believers in cities in the south such as Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, and Pisidian Antioch, in churches established on Paul's first missionary journey. If so, Paul could have written Galatians as early as A.D. 49, although others maintain he wrote from Corinth about A.D. 53. On the other hand, some scholars have held that Paul wrote to ethnic Galatians living in northern Galatia. They believe Acts 16:6 and 18:23 should be interpreted that Paul went north on his second journey. If so, Paul did not write Galatians until around A.D. 55. It is more likely Paul addressed those in the south for two reasons. First, Paul tends to use provincial titles (cp. 2 Cor. 9:2). Second, we have no evidence Paul ever visited northern Galatia.

The second problem is how visits to Jerusalem mentioned in Galatians correlate with those visits in Acts. Acts describes five visits by Paul to Jerusalem (Acts 9:26; 11:27-30; 12:25; 15:4; 18:21; 21:7,15), and Paul mentions two visits in Galatians. Galatians 1:18-19 describes Paul's first postconversion visit to Jerusalem. Most agree this is the visit of Acts 9:26. Many traditionally held that the second visit mentioned in Galatians (2:1-2) is the third visit of Acts, the "Jerusalem Conference" visit. Yet it seems more likely the visit of Gal. 2:1 is the "famine relief" visit in Acts 11:27 and 12:25 for these reasons. First, Gal. 1-2 describes his visits to Jerusalem (1:20). It is unlikely he would neglect to mention a visit, since the issue had become highly charged. Second, Paul describes a private meeting in Galatians; the meeting in Acts 15 is public. Meeting with the apostles in private would explain why Luke does not mention details of the visit in Acts 11-12. Third, the agreement in Gal. 2 is for Paul to go to the Gentiles and Peter to the “circumcision.” The agreement in Acts 15 was that Gentiles need not be circumcised to be saved but that they should observe certain restrictions. Nothing is mentioned about spheres of ministry in Acts 15. Fourth, reference to a request by the apostles “that we would remember the poor” (Gal. 2:10 HCSB) would be natural if the visit was for famine relief, as was the case in Acts 11:27 and 12:25.

The letter can be divided into three main sections. In the first (Gal. 1:10-2:21) Paul defends his apostleship as given directly by God through Christ, not dependent on Jerusalem or those who were apostles before him. He describes his relationship with Jerusalem as distant but largely positive. Paul fulfilled his commission without authority from Jerusalem. The only problem came in a confrontation with Peter over table-fellowship with Gentiles at Antioch. Paul concludes by stating the main argument of the epistle: Justification is by faith in Christ and the works of the law must not be added. Faith is living one's life in constant submission to Christ and in relationship to Christ. In fact, Paul says, “Christ lives in me.”

In the second section (3:1-5:12) he supports his thesis by appeals to the Galatians' own experience, inheritance practices, and the experiences of Abraham. His first appeal to the Galatians' experience reminds them of their receiving the Spirit, which Paul equates with conversion (3:1-5). They received the Spirit by believing the message Paul preached. Now they thought they could add something to the Spirit by works of the flesh, that is, circumcision. Paul reminds them that Abraham was declared righteous when he was uncircumcised. He, too, had simply believed God and this faith was credited to him as righteousness (3:6-9). Reliance on the law placed one under the curse of the law (3:10-14). The purpose of Christ's work was to free (redeem) from the curse.

Paul also appeals to their knowledge of inheritance and adoption practices. Once an adoptee was placed in a will, it could not be changed. A promise was made to Abraham concerning a blessing to be given to all nations. God would never alter a promise (3:17). That would be like changing a will after it was put into effect.

Paul continues the same reasoning in chapter 4 but changes the hypothetical to that of a “minor” treated as a slave until a time set by the father for the child's legal status to change. When that time comes, then things are completely different (4:1-7). So with the coming of Christ, in the fullness of time, the children of God are no longer slaves to the law.

After a reminder they once welcomed Paul despite physical infirmity, Paul concludes by appealing to the birth of Abraham's sons. Isaac was the son through whom the promise came. Ishmael's birth was natural or “of the flesh.” Isaac, born to Sarah late in life, was born according to the promise of God. Believers too are children of the promise and should not depend on the flesh. To be circumcised was to depend on the flesh. They must trust the promise of God in Christ.

The third major section (5:13-6:10) contains Paul's appeal to live by the Spirit. They must not lose their spiritual freedom by giving in to sin. Life in the Spirit does not rule out moral absolutes. Paul's emphasis on justification by faith was an argument for the Galatians to live out their freedom. That freedom, however, must not be taken as meaning there is no moral accountability. The command that they not live by the law of Moses is not inconsistent with directions on how to live. The “works of the flesh” are obvious and must be avoided. They must nurture the fruit of the Spirit (5:22-23a) and act in love toward each other. In this way they will fulfill the law of Christ.

The closing section is written in Paul's own hand and again challenges them not to return to dependence upon the law (6:11-18).

Outline

I. Introduction (1:1-10).

A. Paul greets the Galatians and reminds them his commission came from God (1:1-5).

B. Paul reprimands the Galatians (1:6-10).

1. They are turning to another gospel of a different kind (1:6).

2. There is no other (true) gospel than the one he preached to them (1:7).
3. People who preach another gospel are to be accursed, eternally condemned (1:8-9).
4. Paul seeks to please God and not other persons (1:10).

II. Paul Defends His Gospel (1:11-2:21).

- A. He received his gospel directly from Jesus Christ (1:11-12).
- B. He recounts his previous life in Judaism (1:13-14).
- C. He reminds them of his calling to preach to the Gentiles (1:15-17).
- D. He visited Jerusalem for 15 days (1:18-24).
- E. After 14 years he made a second visit to Jerusalem (2:1-10).
- F. He confronted Peter at Antioch for withdrawing from Gentile believers (2:11-14).
- G. He summarizes his understanding of the true gospel—faith alone justifies (2:15-21).

III. Paul Explains His Gospel (3:1-5:12).

- A. The Galatians received the Spirit without obeying the law (3:1-5).
- B. Abraham was accounted as righteous without obeying the law (3:6-9).
- C. All under the law are under the curse of the law (3:10-14).
- D. The promises to Abraham could not be altered by the law (3:15-18).
- E. The law had a temporary role (3:19-22).
- F. Christ came to give to all who believe status as God's children (3:23-29).
- G. Christ's coming means we can call out to God as “Abba” (4:1-7).
- H. Knowing God makes observance of special days or celebrations unnecessary (4:8-11).
- I. Paul recounts his visit with the Galatians (4:12-20).
 1. They received him well despite his physical infirmity (4:12-13).
 2. They welcomed him as if an angel, or as Jesus Christ Himself (4:14).
 3. They would have done anything for him (4:15).

- 4. Paul appeals to them to return to their former belief and trust (4:16-20).
- J. Paul appeals to the example of Sarah and Hagar (4:21-31).
 - 1. Isaac was born of the promise to the free woman.
 - 2. Ishmael was born to the slave girl by natural means.
- K. Conclusion: They must not forfeit their freedom (5:1-12).
- IV. Paul Explains Freedom in the Spirit (5:13-6:10).
 - A. Freedom is to be used to serve each other through love (5:13-15).
 - B. Freedom results in being led by the Spirit (5:16-26).
 - 1. The “works of the flesh” are obvious and dangerous (5:16-21).
 - 2. The “fruit of the Spirit” are borne by those who crucify the flesh (5:22-26).
 - C. Freedom is to be used to minister to others (6:1-10).
 - 1. They must help the wayward, the burdened, and those who teach them (6:1-6).
 - 2. They will reap what they sow in due time (6:7-10).
- V. Conclusion (6:11-18).
 - A. The Judaizers have false motives (6:11-13).
 - B. Paul will boast only of Jesus Christ (6:14).
 - C. Being a new creation, not being circumcised, is the intent of the gospel (6:15-16).
 - D. Farewell (6:17-18).

GALBANUM (Exod. 30:34) See Plants.

GALEED (גַּלְעָד) Place-name meaning “pile for witness.” Place where Jacob and his father-in-law Laban made a formal agreement or covenant determining the boundary line between their peoples and agreeing not to harm one another (Gen. 31:43-52). The place was also called Sahadutah and Mizpah. The heap of stones marking Galeed was in Gilead, north of the Jabbok River. See Mizpah.

GALILEAN (Gäl' ī lē' ān) Person who lived in Galilee. Dialect distinguished them from Jews in Jerusalem and Judah, particularly the difficulty in distinguishing the sounds of the gutturals that are important in Hebrew and Aramaic. Peter's Galilean style of speech set him apart from the courtyard crowd during Jesus' trial (Mark 14:70; cp. Acts 2:7). Jesus was identified as being from Galilee (Matt. 26:69). Pilate used this as an excuse to get Herod to hear Jesus' case (Luke 23:6-7). Galileans had a reputation for rebellion and disregard of Jewish law (Acts 5:37), so they could be regarded as sinners (Luke 13:2). Apparently, Pilate had killed some Galileans while they offered the Passover sacrifices in Jerusalem (Luke 13:1). On His return to Galilee from Judea and Samaria, Jesus received a warm welcome from the Galileans. This surprising statement is modified by the story that followed showing the welcome apparently depended on an expectation of miracles, not on appreciation for whom Jesus was or from faith in Him (John 4:43-54).

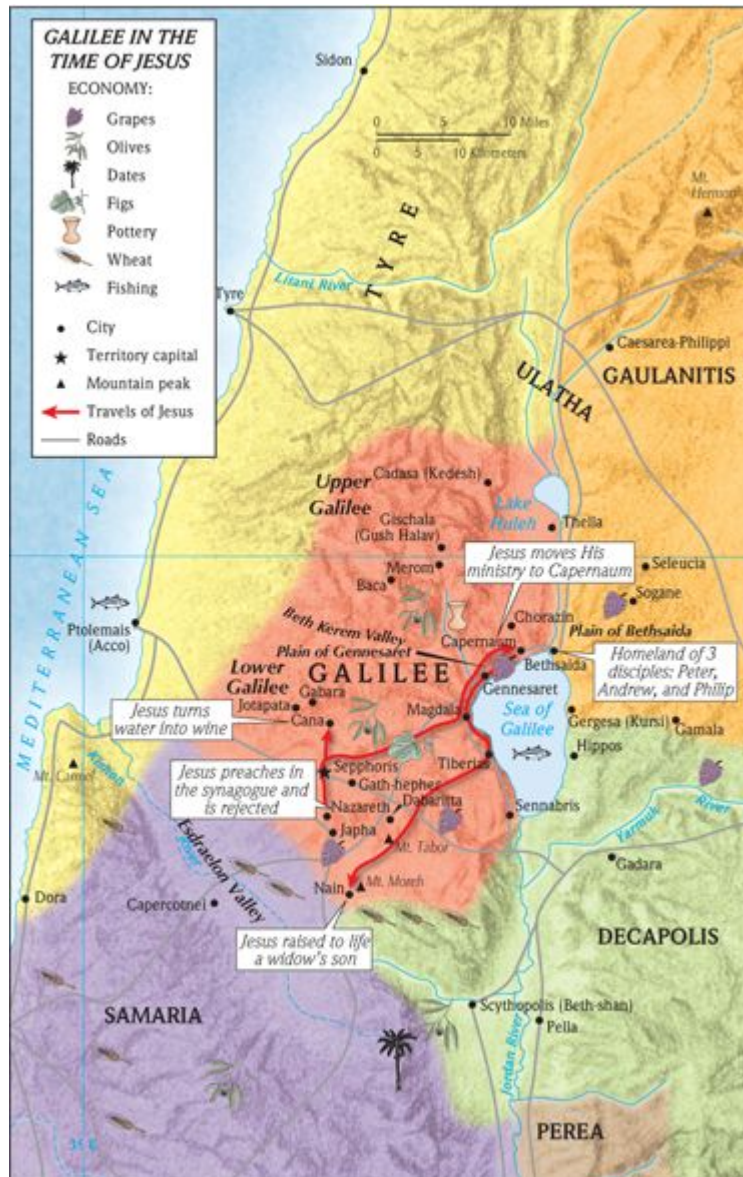

Sea of Galilee with a view of the boat landing at Capernaum.

GALILEE (Gäl' ī lē) Place-name meaning “circle” or “region.” The northern part of Palestine above the hill country of Ephraim and the hill country of Judah (Josh. 20:7). The Septuagint or early Greek translation referred to a king of the nations of Galilee in Josh. 12:23, though the Hebrew reads, “Gilgal.” Many scholars see the Greek as original (NRSV, REB). This would indicate a leader of a coalition of city-states whom Joshua defeated. Kedesh in Galilee was a city of refuge (Josh. 20:7) and a city for the Levites (Josh. 21:32). Solomon paid Hiram of Tyre 20 cities of Galilee for the building materials Hiram supplied for the temple and royal palace (1 Kings 9:11), but the cities did not please Hiram, who called them Cabul, meaning “like nothing” (1 Kings 9:12-13). Apparently, Galilee and Tyre bordered on each other. The cities may have been border villages whose ownership the two kings disputed. The Assyrians took the north under Tiglath-pileser in 733 (2 Kings 15:29) and divided it into three districts—the western coast or “the way of the sea” with capital at Dor, Galilee with capital at Megiddo and beyond Jordan or Gilead (Isa. 9:1).

The term “Galilee” apparently was used prior to Israel's conquest, being mentioned in Egyptian records. It was used in Israel but not as a political designation. The tribes of Naphtali, Asher, Issachar, Zebulun, and Dan occupied the territory which covered approximately the 45-mile stretch between the Litani River in Lebanon and the Valley of Jezreel in Israel north to south and from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan River west to east.

In the time of Jesus' Galilee, Herod Antipas governed Galilee and Perea. Jesus devoted most of His earthly ministry to Galilee, being known as the Galilean (Matt. 26:69). After the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, Galilee became the major center of Judaism, the Mishnah and Talmud being collected and written there.

GALILEE, SEA OF Place-name meaning “circle.” A freshwater lake nestled in the hills of northern Palestine. Its surface is nearly 700 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, some 30 miles to the west. The nearby hills of Galilee reach an altitude of 1,500 feet above sea level. To the east are the mountains of Gilead with peaks of more than 3,300 feet. To the north are the snow-covered Lebanon Mountains. Fed chiefly by the Jordan River, which originates in the foothills of the Lebanon Mountains, the Sea of Galilee is 13 miles long north and south and eight miles wide at its greatest east-west distance. Because of its location, it is subject to sudden and violent storms that are usually of short duration.

In the OT this sea is called Chinnereth. It is named only rarely, however, and all references but one relate to the Hebrew conquest of Palestine under Joshua. In NT times it was also called the “lake of Gennesaret.” Luke referred to it by that name once (5:1); the Jewish historian Josephus always called it by that name, and so did the author of First Maccabees. Once John called it the “Sea of Tiberias” (6:1).

The Sea of Galilee as viewed from the northwest.

Looking eastward across the Sea of Galilee.

In the first century the Sea of Galilee was of major commercial significance. Most Galilean roads passed by it, and much travel to and from the east crossed the Jordan rift there. Fish was a major food in the area, and the fishing industry flourished because there was no other significant freshwater lake in the region. Capernaum, which played a major role in the ministry of Jesus, was a center of that industry. The other lake towns of importance were Bethsaida, which means “the fishing place,” and Tiberias, a Gentile city constructed by Herod Antipas when Jesus was a young man. See Chinnereth.

GALL 1. Bitter, poisonous herb (perhaps Citrullus colocynthis), the juice of which is thought to be the “hemlock” poison that Socrates drank. Gall was frequently linked with wormwood (Deut. 29:18; Jer. 9:15; 23:15; Lam. 3:19; Amos 6:12) to denote bitterness and tragedy. Wormwood and gall were often associated with unfaithfulness to God, either as a picture of the unfaithful (Deut. 29:18) or as their punishment. Modern speech translations generally translate the Hebrew word for gall in light of the context of the passage (poisonous growth, Deut. 29:18 NRSV; poisonous water, Jer. 8:14; 9:15; 23:15 NRSV; poison, Amos 6:12 NRSV). Gall is still used at Lam. 3:19. On the cross, Jesus was offered sour wine drugged with gall, perhaps opium, which He refused (Matt. 27:34; cp. Ps. 69:21). Simon the magician was described as full of the gall of bitterness (Acts 8:23) because he wanted to prostitute the gift of the Holy Spirit. 2. Expressed by two different Hebrew words, used in three senses in connection with the liver: (1) as an organ, either the liver or the gallbladder, through which a sword might pass when one was run through (Job 20:25); (2) as bile, a sticky, yellow-greenish, alkaline fluid secreted by the liver, which might be poured out on the ground when one was disemboweled (Job 16:13); (3) in a figurative sense (Job 13:26) for bitterness (bitter things, NASB, NIV, NRSV; bitter charges, REB, TEV).

GALLERY Architectural feature of the temple annex (Ezek. 41:15-16) and two buildings near the temple (42:3,5). The English “gallery” is an ambiguous term referring to a number of features: a corridor (REB); a roofed walkway or colonnade; an outdoor balcony or terrace. The meaning of the underlying Hebrew word is contested. Some suggest the meaning was “passageway” on the basis of similarities with Akkadian. Others suggest the term means slope or embankment. In this case the temple measurements in 41:15-16 would refer to the base of the elevated inner court. English translators understand either a reference to interior corridors of the temple annex or columned porches (contrast 42:6). The two buildings in chapter 42 were apparently constructed “stair-step” style with each floor smaller than the one beneath it. Here the gallery is perhaps the terrace formed by the flat roof of the floor below. Others have suggested the Hebrew refers to underlying rock formations that protruded into the structure.

GALLEY Long, narrow ship propelled mainly by oars. The galleys were used as warships (Isa. 33:21). Such vessels were designed to sail near the shore or on rivers. The image in Isaiah is of a Jerusalem free from the threat of invasion.

GALLIM (Gal' ĩm) Place-name meaning “heaps.” Village near Anathoth in tribal territory of Benjamin. Saul gave his daughter Michal as wife to a citizen of Gallim after taking her away from David (1 Sam. 25:44; cp. 2 Sam. 3:14-15). Gallim lay on the road that conquerors took from Bethel down to Jerusalem (Isa. 10:30). It may be modern Khirbet Kakul, northwest of Anathoth or even further to the northwest just south of Ramah at Khirbet Ercha. See Michal.

GALLIO (Gal' ĩo) Personal name of unknown meaning. The deputy or proconsul of Achaia headquartered in Corinth, where his judgment seat has been discovered. Certain Jews brought Paul before Gallio seeking to get Roman punishment of him. They charged that Paul advocated an unlawful religion (Acts 18:12-17). Gallio refused to involve himself in Jewish religious affairs, even ignoring the crowd's beating of Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue.

Gallio was the son of Marcus Annaeus Seneca, a Spanish orator and financier, and the elder brother of Seneca, the philosopher and tutor of Nero. Lucius Junius Gallio, a rich Roman, adopted Gallio, naming him Lucius Junius Gallio Annaeus. Gallio's name appears on an inscription at Delphi that refers to the twenty-sixth acclamation of Claudius as emperor. This places Gallio in office in Corinth between A.D. 51 and 53. He was apparently proconsul from May 1, 51, to May 1, 52, though dates a year later are possible. The date gives evidence from outside the Bible for the time Paul was in Corinth and founded the church there.

Finding the climate at Corinth unhealthy, Gallio apparently welcomed the opportunity to return to Rome, where he counseled Nero until he and Seneca joined a conspiracy against the emperor. First Seneca died; then Nero forced Gallio to commit suicide about A.D. 65. GALLON Word used by modern translations to transfer Greek metretes into modern terminology. A metretes contained about nine gallons (cp. John 2:6; KJV reads “firkins”). See Weights and Measures.

GALLOWS English translation referring to the platform on which a person was hanged. The Hebrew term translated “gallows” in Esther (2:23; 7:9-10; 9:25) is the word for “tree.” It is frequently suggested that tree should be understood as “stake” and that those executed by the Persians were impaled rather than hung. The earliest Greek translation understood the passage in this sense.

GAMAD (Gā' mād) (NRSV, TEV) or GAMMAD (NIV, REB) Place-name of uncertain meaning in Ezek. 27:11. The early translations apparently read a Hebrew text with letters easily confused with those of Gamad and meaning “watchers.” Others interpreted it as “dwarf” or “pygmies.” Others have pointed to a people called Kumudi from northern Syria listed in early Egyptian sources. They were apparently allies of Tyre in its fight against Babylon.

GAMALIEL (Gá má' li' èl) Personal name meaning "God rewards with good."

1. Son of Pedahzur; a leader of the tribe of Manasseh, who helped Moses take the census in the wilderness (Num. 1:10; cp. 7:54-59). 2. Highly regarded Pharisee who was a member of the Sanhedrin (Acts 5:34). He squelched a plan by the Sanhedrin to kill the apostles by reminding the members that interference with what the apostles were doing might prove to be opposition to God. If the work of the apostles were a purely human work, Gamaliel said, it would come to nothing anyway. According to Acts 22:3, this Gamaliel had been Paul's teacher. He was the grandson of the great Rabbi Hillel. He died about A.D. 52.3. A leading Jewish rabbi in the late first and early second centuries A.D. He was the grandson of the Gamaliel mentioned in the book of Acts. He is credited with many of the adaptations in Judaism necessitated by the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70.

GAMES Archaeological finds from the ancient Near East provide ample evidence for the existence in antiquity of numerous types of games, including early forms of checkers and chess. Likewise, various children's toys found in Palestine confirm that Hebrew children, like their counterparts in nearly every culture and era, played recreational games. There is, however, no specific mention of organized games of any kind in the OT.

Skills frequently mentioned in the OT, such as running (1 Sam. 8:11), archery (1 Sam. 20:20), using a sling (1 Sam. 17:49), or wrestling (Gen. 32:24), imply training and practice, but there are no specific references to competitive events. Israelites either avoided athletic competition or refrained from writing about it.

In contrast to Hebrew culture, Hellenistic culture prized games and competitive events as a central part of life. In order to become good citizens Greek youths received both intellectual and physical training. At the gymnasium a well-rounded education included skills such as boxing and running. The gymnasium, a central part of Hellenistic towns and cities, was also the site of a marketplace, as well as a training facility for mature athletes. Prevalent also in Hellenistic culture were organized competitive events such as chariot racing, wrestling, footraces, boxing, and archery. The Olympic games are a primary example of the important role of athletic games in Hellenistic culture. Competitive games continued, with some changes, in the Roman era but with an added emphasis on combative events such as gladiatorial contests and fighting wild animals. For both Greeks and Romans, these events were connected to the worship of the gods.

With Alexander the Great's conquest of Palestine in 332 B.C., Hellenistic culture swept into Israel, including Greek games and competitions. As a result, arenas and gymnasiums began to appear in Israel. A descendant of one of Alexander's generals, Antiochus IV Epiphanes, who reigned over Palestine (175-164 B.C.), even had a gymnasium built in Jerusalem. Apparently many Jews, including some priests, participated in the events held there (see 1 Macc. 1:14; 2 Macc. 4:9). For many Jews the spectacle of a gymnasium in Jerusalem was repulsive (not least because athletes competed in the nude). Although Hellenistic games became less prevalent in Israel after the Maccabean revolt (167 B.C.), the presence of Hellenistic culture and athletic competition remained in Israel. Herod the Great (47-4 B.C.) built, among other things, a stadium and hippodrome in Caesarea, a theater in Jerusalem, and possibly a hippodrome in Jericho. By the first century, Jews in Palestine and in the Diaspora, and of course Gentiles throughout the Mediterranean world, were familiar with competitive games.

In the NT there are direct references to games and competitions, particularly in Paul's epistles. For those living in Corinth in the first century, illustrations from competitive games would be easily understood not only from everyday life but also because it was the site of the Isthmian games (A.D. 51), an event second only to the Olympics in prestige. Paul used the footrace as an illustration of Christian endurance, reminding them that even though all competitors run in the race, only the winner receives the prize (1 Cor. 9:24). He used the strict and severe training of the athletes competing in the games as an analogy to the discipline required for the Christian life, reminding his readers that athletes undergo training to win a "perishable wreath." The celery wreath given to the winners at the Isthmian games may have come to their minds. Paul's message was clear: if athletes do all this to win a perishable crown, how much more should Christians endure and undergo discipline to receive an "imperishable crown" (1 Cor. 9:25). Turning to his own life, Paul used himself as an example of one who does "not run aimlessly." The runners in the games ran toward a fixed mark, perhaps a stone (what we would call a "finish line"). They did not run carelessly but for one purpose: to finish the race (Paul used a similar analogy in Phil. 3:12-14). Furthermore he says, "I do not...box like one who beats the air. Instead, I discipline my body and bring it under strict control" (1 Cor. 9:26-27 HCSB). Paul fought against his sinful desires with the pitiless intensity of competitors in a boxing match. Thus Paul utilized two of the most well-known events to make a clear illustration about the Christian life.

Paul also used athletic games as an analogy for his whole life. He concluded that he had "finished the race" and therefore would receive the "crown of righteousness" (2 Tim. 4:7).

The writer to the Hebrews also used competitive games as a metaphor for perseverance: "Therefore since we also have such a large cloud of witnesses surrounding us," comparing the saints who have gone before to the crowds gathered in the athletic arenas, every effort should be made to "run with endurance the race that lies before us." Moreover, the focus, the finishing line, is Jesus "the source and perfecter of our faith" (Heb. 12:1-4).

GAMMADIM (Gām' má dīm) Citizen of Gamad. See Gamad.

GAMUL (Gā' mūl) Personal name meaning “receiver of good deeds.” Head of one of the priestly divisions in the temple under David and Solomon (1 Chron. 24:17).

GANGRENE Greek gangraina (2 Tim. 2:17) can refer either to gangrene, a death of soft tissue resulting from problems with blood flow (NASB, NRSV, REB) or to an ulcer (canker, KJV; open sore, TEV). In 2 Timothy gangraina is used figuratively for false teachings which destroy people who accept them.

GANGS It was not unusual in antiquity for persons who saw themselves as poor, oppressed, or disenfranchised to gather themselves together under a charismatic leader and live largely under their own authority, sometimes cooperating with existing authority structures and sometimes opposing them. Whether such groups should be called “gangs,” “brigands,” or simply “bands of adventurers” depends largely on the particular circumstances involved.

The tendency toward gang formation was greatest in times of weakened centralized authority. Hence Abimelech (Judg. 9:4), Jephthah (Judg. 11:3), men attached to Ish-bosheth son of Saul (2 Sam. 4:1-3), Jeroboam (2 Chron. 13:6-7), and even David (1 Sam. 22:2) became commanders of gangs of men who had withdrawn from mainstream society. While David's gang was composed of men who had been oppressed, it is implied, by the economic policies of King Saul (1 Sam. 22:2), that the gangs of Abimelech, Jephthah, and Jeroboam consisted of “worthless fellows.”

The Bible mentions other instances of ganglike behavior in the rape of the Levite's concubine by the men of Gibeah (Judg. 19:22-26), the attempted rape of Lot's guests by the men of Sodom (Gen. 19:4-11), and the taunting of Elisha by boys (2 Kings 2:23-24).

GARDEN In biblical times an enclosed plot of ground on which flowers, vegetables, herbs, and fruit and nut trees were cultivated (Gen. 2:8; 1 Kings 21:2; Esther 1:5; Isa. 51:3; John 18:1-2).

Characteristics The primary OT words for “garden” (gan and gannah) derive from a root meaning “to surround.” Gardens were plots of ground enclosed or surrounded by walls or hedges. Some were large (Esther 1:5), the most prominent gardens being royal ones (2 Kings 25:4; Neh. 3:15; Jer. 39:4). Most gardens were situated close to the owner's residence (1 Kings 21:2). Occasionally a house might be located in the garden (2 Kings 9:27). An abundant supply of water was especially important (Gen. 13:10; Num. 24:6; Isa. 1:30; 58:11; Jer. 31:12). Gardeners were employed to tend the more substantial gardens, sowing seed and watering (Deut. 11:10; John 20:15). Orchards or small vineyards were sometimes called gardens.

Uses Obviously a garden provided food for its owner (Jer. 29:5,28; Amos 9:14), but it also served other aesthetic and utilitarian purposes. It was a place of beauty where plants were pleasing to the sight (Gen. 2:9). As a guarded and protected place (Song 4:12), persons could retreat there for prayer (Matt. 26:36-46), for quiet or solitude (Esther 7:7), or even for bathing (Susanna 15). It provided a cool escape from the heat of the day (Gen. 3:8; Susanna 7). Friends could meet in gardens (John 18:1-2), or banquets could be served there (Esther 1:5). It thus was often associated with joy and gladness (Isa. 51:3). On the other hand, pagan sacrifices were sometimes offered in gardens (Isa. 65:3; 66:17); and gardens were used as burial sites (2 Kings 21:18,26; John 19:41-42).

Important Gardens The garden of Eden (Gen. 2:8; 3:23-24) was planted by God (2:8) and entrusted to Adam for cultivating and keeping (2:15). Following their sin, Adam and Eve were banished from the garden; but “Eden, the garden of God” (Ezek. 28:13) continued as a symbol of blessing and bounty (Ezek. 36:35; Joel 2:3). The “king's garden” in Jerusalem was located near a gate to the city that provided unobserved exit or escape (2 Kings 25:4; Neh. 3:15; Jer. 39:4; 52:7). The “garden” (John 18:1) called Gethsemane (Matt. 26:36; Mark 14:32) was a place where Jesus often met with His disciples (John 18:2) and where He was betrayed and arrested.

GAREB (Gá' rēb) Personal name and place-name meaning “scabby.” 1. Member of David's personal army (2 Sam. 23:38). 2. Hill in Jerusalem marking point of city wall which Jeremiah promised would be rebuilt (Jer. 31:39).

GARLAND In modern translations two Hebrew and one Greek term, all referring to wreaths worn on the head. Garlands symbolized instruction or the benefit of wisdom (Prov. 1:8-9; 4:7-9). In Isa. 61:3,10 garlands form part of the bridegroom's wedding apparel (ASV, NEB). Israel's days of exile, pictured as mourning, would give way to the celebration of God's salvation, pictured as a wedding. At Acts 14:13 the priest of Zeus brought Paul and Barnabas garlands. In Greek mythology the gods were frequently portrayed wearing garlands. Mistaking the apostles for Zeus and Hermes, the priest deemed garlands a suitable gift.

GARNER KJV term for a barn, storehouse, or granary (Ps. 144:13; Joel 1:17; Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17). To garner (Isa. 62:9 NASB, NRSV) means to gather (a crop) for storage. See Granary.

GARRISON Body of troops stationed for defense, often in the sense of occupying forces. In the tenth century B.C. the Philistines had garrisons deep in Jewish territory at Gibeath-elohim (1 Sam. 10:5), Geba (1 Sam. 13:3), and Bethlehem (2 Sam. 23:14). David, in turn, placed garrisons in Damascus (2 Sam. 8:6) and in Edom (2 Sam. 8:14) with the result that the natives became his servants, that is, they were subjugated and forced to pay tribute.

The KJV has garrisons at Ezek. 26:11 where modern translations have a reference to pillars in honor of the gods of Tyre. The KJV of 2 Cor. 11:32 mentions that the city of Damascus was guarded with a garrison. Modern versions simply note the city was guarded. The parallel in Acts 9:24 only mentions guards at the gate.

GASH In modern translations to cut the skin as a sign of mourning (NASB, Jer. 41:5; 47:5; 48:37) or in the worship of pagan deities (1 Kings 18:28). See Fertility Cult.

GASHMU (Gāsh' mu) Aramaic form of Geshem used in Neh. 6:6. See Geshem.

GATAM (Gā' tām) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau (Gen. 36:11). He headed a clan of Edomites (Gen. 36:16).

GATE A gate, like a door, a wall, or a threshold, sets a boundary between that which is inside and that which is outside. "Gate" is the more prominent term since it provided the most common access into towns and villages, temples, and even houses. In reality a gate serves both to allow access and to limit access. Open gates allowed entrance, though gatekeepers were often employed to ascertain that only authorized persons gained entry (1 Chron. 9:22). Shut gates offered protection and safety for those inside (Josh. 2:5). Because the gate was the primary means of entry, it was often the site where enemies assembled for attack or forced entry (Jer. 1:15).

Those who resided inside a household compound were members of that household: family members, workers attached to the family unit, servants, or guests. All within the gate were treated as part of the family—they were included under Sabbath rest commandment (Exod. 20:9-10) and as participants in major festivals (Deut. 16:11,14). Guests were to be offered the same protection as family members (see Gen. 19; Judg. 19). Likewise those within the gates of the city were to be afforded the same protection as citizens.

Biblical examples of those excluded by the gate include lepers who were kept outside the gates (2 Kings 7:3), the poor man Lazarus in the parable Jesus told (Luke 16:20), as well as the lame man outside the temple (Acts 3:2). All of these were “outsiders,” outside the gate. They were not considered part of the community or family within.

Physically, a gate might be a simple opening in a wall, or it might be an elaborate entry complex with multiple chambers and doors, and several sharp turns designed to impede access. Gates typically had doors of wood or metal that were shut at night and in the event of threatened attack. Towers were often built adjacent to the gate to provide additional protection for the gate entry.

The Bible has several figurative or symbolic allusions to gates. Jacob, after his dream at Bethel, describes the place as “the house of God,...the gate of heaven” (Gen. 28:17 NASB). In effect for Jacob this spot marked a symbolic boundary between heaven and earth. Both Job and the psalmist speak of the gates of death (Job 38:17; Ps. 107:18). The gates of death mark the boundary between life and death. King Hezekiah in the book of Isaiah speaks of being consigned to the gates of Sheol the rest of his days, a clear reference to his death (Isa. 38:10). Jesus says of the church “the gates of Hades shall not overpower it” (Matt. 16:18 NASB). Hades, the realm of the underworld and the dead, has no power over Christ's church.

In summary, “gate” marks a boundary, either physical or figurative between inside and outside. It serves to permit or prevent movement from without to within. See City Gate; Gates of Jerusalem and the Temple.

GATE BETWEEN THE TWO WALLS City gate on the southeast side of Jerusalem, perhaps identical with the Fountain Gate. Zedekiah and his sons were captured by the Babylonians after escaping through this gate (2 Kings 25:4; Jer. 39:4; 52:7). See City Gate; Fountain Gate; Gate.

GATEKEEPER One who guards access to a place, either a city (2 Sam. 18:26; 2 Kings 7:10-11), a residence (John 18:17), the sacred precincts of the ark (1 Chron. 15:23-24), or the temple (1 Chron. 23:5). KJV uses “porter.” Temple gatekeepers were charged with preventing anyone unclean from entering the temple (2 Chron. 23:19) and with guarding the temple treasuries and storehouses (1 Chron. 9:26; 26:20-22; Neh. 12:25).

GATES OF JERUSALEM AND THE TEMPLE Jerusalem's many gates have varied in number and location with the changing size and orientation of its walls throughout its long history. Persons could enter through an important city gate on the west from Jaffa (Tel Aviv) Road, as they do today. On the east, those coming from the Kidron Valley entered principally through the Sheep Gate (modern Stephen or Lion Gate) in NT times and by a recently found gate (spring 1986) south of the modern city walls in OT times. This latter gate may date to the reign of Solomon, being similar to Solomonic gates found at Megiddo, Gezer, and Hazor. Entrance to the temple itself was on its eastern side through the Beautiful Gate (Acts 3:10), near the Golden Gate recently found beneath the city eastern wall. On the north, the principal gateway (Damascus Gate) opened onto the Damascus Road. Seven gates now allow entrance to the old city of Jerusalem.

GATH (Gath) One of the five cities that comprised the Philistine city-state system (1 Sam. 6:17). The inhabitants of Gath were referred to as the Gittites (1 Sam. 17:4; 2 Sam. 6:10-11). Because the Hebrew term gat meant “winepress” and since vineyards and winepresses were widespread in the land, a number of towns in Palestine were named Gath. Usually the name was used with another name that helped distinguish one site from another, such as, Gath-Hepher, Gath-Rimmon, and Moresheth-Gath.

By far the most frequently mentioned Gath in the OT is Gath of the Philistines. In addition to Gath, the other towns of the Philistine city-state system were Ekron, Ashdod, Ashkelon, and Gaza (1 Sam. 6:17). We may reasonably assume that Gath was the principal city among the five and served as the hub of the Pentapolis.

Gath was strategically located for Philistine purposes. While we do not know the exact location, we do know the general area in which Gath was located. Based on information from the biblical accounts, Gath was located inland as opposed to the other Philistine towns that were on or near the coast. It was located in the Shephelah, that is, the band of foothills that lay between the coastal plain on the west and the central hill country on the east. Since the Israelites, at least during the period of the settlement, occupied the central hill country, Gath was in a position to protect Philistine territory from raids by the Israelites. At the same time it was convenient for the Philistines to initiate raids on Israelite communities from the city of Gath. Since a number of sites have been eliminated in recent years based on archaeological excavations, one of the most likely candidates for Philistine Gath is Tell es-Safi, 12 miles east of Ashdod.

A number of the highlights of Gath's history are reflected in the OT. Prior to the coming of the Israelites, Gath was a Canaanite city occupied by the Anakim, a group known for their large stature (Josh. 11:21-22). During the conquest of Canaan, Joshua and the Israelites apparently did not take the sites of Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (Josh. 11:22). We may assume that the Philistines took these towns at this point. Gath was one of the locations to which the Philistines took the ark (1 Sam. 5:8-9) and was the hometown of Goliath (1 Sam. 17:4) and Obed-edom (1 Chron. 13:13). One of the most interesting bits of information is that at one point while Saul was in pursuit of David, David found sanctuary with Achish, the king of Gath, and perhaps became a vassal of the Philistines (1 Sam. 27:1-7). Eventually David defeated the Philistines and made Gath an Israelite town (1 Chron. 18:1). Apparently Achish continued to be the king of Gath, perhaps as a vassal king, even during the reign of Solomon (1 Kings 2:39). During the period of the divided monarchy, Gath's history went through a series of changes. Rehoboam, the king for Judah (931-913 B.C.) fortified Gath and made it a fortress city of Judah (2 Chron. 11:5-12). Hazael, king of Syria (about 843-797 B.C.), besieged the city and captured it (2 Kings 12:17). Shortly thereafter, the inhabitants of Gath apparently rebelled against Hazael and established to some degree their independence. Finally, Uzziah, king of Judah (792-740 B.C.), partially destroyed Gath and made it once again a part of the territory of Judah (2 Chron. 26:6). Around 711 B.C., Sargon II, the king of Assyria, conquered and perhaps destroyed the city. Apparently, at this point, Gath's history came to an end. This conclusion is reinforced by the fact that Gath is obviously omitted in the lists of Philistine sites mentioned by the prophets (Jer. 25:20; Amos 1:6-8; Zeph. 2:4; Zech. 9:5-6). See Philistines.

GATH-HEPHER (Gath-hē' phēr) Place-name meaning “winepress on the watering hole.” A city on the eastern border of Zebulun's tribal allotment (Josh. 19:13). The prophet Jonah came from Gath-hepher (2 Kings 14:25). It is located at modern el-Meshed or nearby Khirbet ez-Zurra, three miles northeast of Nazareth.

GATH-RIMMON (Gāth-rīm' mon) Place-name meaning “winepress on the pomegranate tree.” Town in tribal territory of Dan (Josh. 19:45) and set aside for Levites (Josh. 21:24). It is usually located at Tell Jerisheh on the Yarkon River in modern Tel Aviv, but some scholars locate it two miles to the northeast at Tell Abu Zeitun. First Chronicles 6:69 lists Gath-rimmon in the tribe of Ephraim, but this is usually understood as a copyist's omission of a sentence at the beginning of verse 69. Gath-rimmon also appears in the Hebrew text of Josh. 21:25 though not in the earliest Greek translation or in the parallel in 1 Chron. 6:70. Most scholars recognize that a copyist repeated Gath-rimmon from verse 24, the original reading probably being Ibleam. See Ibleam.

GAUZE, GARMENTS OF One of the fine items associated with Jerusalem socialites (Isa. 3:23 NRSV). The meaning of the underlying Hebrew is debated. The sense is either a gauze garment (NRSV; interpreted as a revealing garment, TEV; scarves of gauze, REB) or a mirror (hand mirror, NASB). The KJV has glasses in the sense of looking glasses. At this time a mirror would be a piece of polished metal. At Isa. 8:1 the Hebrew word translated as gauze garment (or mirror) is translated as (writing) tablet.

GAZA (Ga' zā) Place-name meaning “strong.” Philistine city on the coastal plain about three miles inland from the Mediterranean Sea. It was the southernmost town of the Philistine city-state system which also included Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath (1 Sam. 6:17).

While the site is especially associated with the Philistines, many other groups have inhabited it throughout history. That history extends from a period prior to the arrival of the Philistines, a period when the Avvim occupied the village (Deut. 2:23), on down to the present. The inhabitants of Gaza at times were referred to as the Gazites or Gazathites (Judg. 16:2).

Gaza's important role in ancient history was due to its strategic location on the major coastal plain highway that connected Egypt with the rest of the ancient Near East. Because of its strategic location, Gaza witnessed the passage of numerous caravans and armies and often got caught in the middle of the political struggles of the ancient Near East. This is reflected in a brief review of the highlights of Gaza's history. According to the records of Thutmose III, Thutmose captured Gaza on his first campaign to Palestine and made it a major Egyptian center. The Amarna Letters identify Gaza as the district headquarters for Egyptian holdings in southern Palestine. For Solomon, Gaza was the major center on the southern border of his kingdom which ran “from Tiphseh even to Azzah (Gaza)” (1 Kings 4:24 KJV).

Gaza was often affected by the political struggles and turnovers that took place during the Assyrian and Babylonian periods. Tiglath-pileser III collected tribute from Gaza during his military campaign against Israel and Syria about 734 B.C. Hezekiah “smote the Philistines, even unto Gaza” (KJV) as he tried to re-establish Judah's independence (2 Kings 18:8) about 705-704 B.C. Sennacherib reinforced his control of Gaza as a vassal state as he invaded Judah in 701 B.C. Pharaoh Neco conquered Gaza about 609 B.C. and made it an Egyptian holding, but it remained in Egyptian hands for only a few years. Sometime after 605 B.C. the Babylonian King Nebuchad-nezzar conquered Gaza and made it a part of his empire.

GAZEZ (Gä' zëz) Personal name meaning “sheepshearing.” Name both of Caleb's son and grandson (1 Chron. 2:46). As other names in the list represent cities in southern Judah occupied by the clan of Caleb, Gazez may also be a city, though nothing else is known about it.

GAZZAM (Gäz' zam) Personal name meaning “caterpillar” or “bird of prey.” Leader of a clan of temple servants who returned from Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:48).

GEAR Context of Acts 27:17 indicates that the Greek term underlying “gear” (RSV) refers to some type of nautical equipment or apparatus. The two interpretations most often given are “lowered the sail” (KJV, TEV) and “let out the (sea) anchor” (NASB, NIV, NRSV, REB). Some commentators suggest that the passage means that all the ship's gear (ropes, sails, yards, pulleys) was secured or stored below deck.

GEBA (Gē' bā) Place-name meaning “hill,” and variant Hebrew spelling of Gibeah, with which it is sometimes confused, though the two represent different towns in the territory of Benjamin. Geba was given to Benjamin (Josh. 18:24) but set aside for the Levites (Josh. 21:17). This is evidently the base camp for Saul and Jonathan in their fight with the Philistines (1 Sam. 13:16-14:18), though the Hebrew texts and modern translations confuse Geba and Gibeah here. King Asa of Judah (910-869 B.C.) strengthened the city (1 Kings 15:22). In the days of King Josiah (640-609 B.C.) Geba apparently represented the northern border of Judah as opposed to the southern border in Beersheba (2 Kings 23:8). Isaiah described the ominous march of the Assyrian army coming through Geba on its way to Jerusalem (Isa. 10:29). For Zechariah (Zech. 14:10), Geba represented the northern border of a Judah to be flattened out into a plain dominated by God ruling on Mount Zion in Jerusalem. At some period Geba's inhabitants were forced to move to Manahath (1 Chron. 8:6), perhaps when the tribe of Benjamin first settled there or during the exile. Exiles returned to Geba under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:26). Some citizens of Geba lived in Michmash and other cities in Nehemiah's day, unless the Hebrew text is read differently (REB) to mean they lived in Geba as well as the other towns (Neh. 11:31). Levite singers lived there (Neh. 12:29).

The southern site of Geba, modern Jeba, a few miles north of Jerusalem.

Geba is variously located, some scholars going so far as to locate a southern Geba of Benjamin at Jeba across the Wadi Suweinit from Michmash, about five-and-a-half miles north of Jerusalem, and a northern Geba (Josh. 18:24) at Khirbet et-Tell, seven miles north of Bethel. At neither of these places has archaeology yet shown evidence to correlate with the biblical materials.

GEBAL (Gē' bāl) Place-name meaning "mountain." 1. Seaport known to Greeks as Byblos whose help for Tyre Ezekiel described (Ezek. 27:9). Mentioned in Egyptian texts before 2000 B.C. and in many Egyptian and Assyrian texts through the centuries, Gebal was located at modern Dschebel about 25 miles north of Beirut. It was the most famous of the Syrian ports. It belonged to land that remained for Joshua to conquer (Josh. 13:5). Stone masons from Gebal cut stones for Solomon's temple (1 Kings 5:18). Archaeologists have discovered settlements here as early as 8000 B.C. The fine sarcophagus of King Ahiiram found there contained the earliest evidence we have of the Phoenician alphabet. About 900 B.C. Tyre replaced Gebal as the strongest city of Phoenicia. Still its fame for building ships and trading throughout the world continued. 2. Member of a coalition against Israel which the psalmist lamented (Ps. 83:7). It is the northern part of Arabia near Petra in the mountainous country south of the Dead Sea. The Genesis Apocryphon from the Dead Sea Scrolls also mentions it.

GEBER (Gē' bē) Personal name meaning “young man” or “hero.” Solomon's district governor for Gilead beyond the Jordan (1 Kings 4:19) was the son of Uri. He collected provisions to supply the royal court. The district governor over Ramoth-gilead was Ben-geber or the son of Geber. See Ben-geber.

GEBIM (Gē' bīm) Place-name meaning “water ditch.” It lay on the line of the march that conquerors took against Jerusalem (Isa. 10:31). The exact site is not known, but it lay between Tell el-Ful and Mount Scopus near Jerusalem.

GEDALIAH (Gēd ā li' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh has done great things.” 1. Son of Ahikam who was appointed ruler of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon in 587 B.C. (2 Kings 25:22). Jerusalem had fallen to the Babylonians, and many of the residents of Judah had been deported. Ahikam, the father of Gedaliah, was an ally of the Prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 26:24; 39:14), and Gedaliah may have been in sympathy with Jeremiah's political views. That could explain why Nebuchadnezzar selected Gedaliah to be governor. Gedaliah's time in office was brief. After only two months he was murdered by a group of fanatically zealous nationalists under the leadership of Ishmael (Jer. 40:1-41:18). 2. Royal official under King Zedekiah (597-586 B.C.) who was with the group that got the king's permission to imprison Jeremiah in a cistern (Jer. 38). 3. Temple singer and prophet who played the harp with his father Jeduthun and five brothers (1 Chron. 25:3). He headed one of the 24 divisions of temple servants (1 Chron. 25:9).

An abbreviated form of the Hebrew name is given to a priest with a foreign wife under Ezra (Ezra 10:18) and the grandfather of the Prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

GEDEON (Gēd' ə on) KJV transliteration of Greek for Gideon in Heb. 11:32. See Gideon.

GEDER (Gē' dēr) Place-name meaning "stone wall." City whose king Joshua killed (Josh. 12:13). The site is unknown and could be easily confused with several places called Beth-geder, Gederah, Gederoth, or Gederothaim. Some scholars believe a copyist confused this text with the preceding Gezer or miscopied a similarly appearing Gerar. First Chronicles 27:28 mentions an official from Geder, but the relationship of this Geder to that of Josh. 12 to the other cities mentioned above cannot be determined.

GEDERAH (Gə də' rah) Place-name meaning "sheepfold" or "stone wall." A village in the Shephalah or valley of Judah (Josh. 15:36). It is located at modern Tell el-Judeireh north of Maraeshah and 10 miles southeast of Lod. Villagers were noted for skill in making pottery, much of which was made for the king (1 Chron. 4:23). The home of one of David's soldiers (1 Chron. 12:4) apparently belongs in Benjamin (1 Chron. 12:2), but he may have been living in Judah before joining David at Ziklag. Otherwise, this is a different Gederah located at Jedireh near Gibeon. See Geder.

GEDERATHITE (Gə də' rá thīt) See Gederah.

GEDERITE (Gə' dēr' it) Citizen of Geder. See Geder.

GEDEROTH (Gə də' rōth) Place-name meaning "walls." City in tribal allotment of Judah in the Shephelah or valley (Josh. 15:41). It may be an alternate spelling of Gederah or Qatra near Lachish. When the Philistines took Gederoth with other cities, King Ahaz (735-715 B.C.) sent to Assyria for help (2 Chron. 28:18). See Geder; Gederah.

GEDEROTHAIM (Gəd ə rō thá' ĩm) Place-name meaning "two walls" or common noun referring to sheepfolds (cp. REB translation, namely both parts of Gederah). A town in the valley or Shephelah of Judah allotted to Judah (Josh. 15:36). The list contains 14 cities without Gederothaim, causing several commentators to identify Gederothaim as a part of Gederah or as a copyist's duplication. See Gederah.

GEDOR (Gə' dōr) Place-name meaning "wall." 1. Town in hill country of Judah allotted to tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:58). It is located at Khirbet Judur three miles north of Hebron and Beth-zur and west of Tekoa. 2. In 1 Chron. 4:18 Jered is the father of Gedor. See Socho. 3. The Gedor in 1 Chron. 4:39 probably represents an early copyist's change from Gerar, which is quite similar in appearance in Hebrew and appears in the earliest Greek translation. If Gedor is the original reading, its location in the tribal allotment of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:24) is not known. A Benjaminite from Gedor had two sons in David's wilderness army (1 Chron. 12:7). This could be a city in Benjamin of unknown location or one of other Gedors discussed above. A member of the tribe of Benjamin was named Gedor (1 Chron. 8:31). See Geder

GEHARASHIM (Gə hār' ə shĭm) Place-name meaning "valley of the handcrafts workers." A member of the genealogy of Judah and Caleb in 1 Chron. 4:14, a list which often includes place-names. It is listed as a place where members of the tribe of Benjamin lived in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:35). This might indicate that descendants of Judah and Caleb had once occupied territory in Benjamin. It is apparently near Lod in Benjamin's allotment about 30 miles northwest of Jerusalem.

GEHAZI (Gə hā' zi) Personal name meaning "valley of vision" or "goggle-eyed." Servant of the Prophet Elisha (2 Kings 4:12). The Bible portrays him as a man of questionable character. On one occasion he tried to force a grieving woman away from the prophet (2 Kings 4:27). Despite the prophet's commission, he could not restore a child to life (2 Kings 4:31). Later he tried to secure for himself the reward Elisha had refused from Naaman the Syrian and then lied to Elisha (2 Kings 5:20-25). For his duplicity with regard to Naaman, Gehazi was stricken with the disease of which Naaman had been cured. Gehazi did testify to the king of Elisha's good deeds and helped the widow get her lands restored (2 Kings 8:1-6). See Elisha.

GEHENNA (Gə hēn' na) English equivalent of the Greek word (geena) derived from the Hebrew place-name (gehinnom) meaning “valley of Hinnom” and came to be used in NT times as a word for hell. The valley south of Jerusalem now called the Wadi er-Rababi (Josh. 15:8; 18:16; 2 Chron. 33:6; Jer. 32:35) became the place of child sacrifice to foreign gods. The Jews later used the valley for the dumping of refuse, the dead bodies of animals, and executed criminals. The continuing fires in the valley (to consume the refuse and dead bodies) apparently led the people to transfer the name to the place where the wicked dead suffer. In the period between the OT and NT, Jewish writing used the term to describe the hell of fire in the final judgment. In some writings, but not in the Bible, Gehenna was also seen as the place of temporary judgment for those waiting the final judgment.

The NT uses “Gehenna” to speak of the place of final punishment. Jesus warned that those who called another “You moron!” faced the danger of the fire of Gehenna (hellfire, Matt. 5:22 HCSB). He taught that it is better to destroy a part of one's body than to have one's whole body thrown into Gehenna (Matt. 5:29; 18:9; Mark 9:43,45,47). In Gehenna worms are constantly at work in a fiery environment that burns forever (Mark 9:48). Only God can commit people to Gehenna and so is the only One worthy of human fear (Matt. 10:28; Luke 12:5). Jesus condemned the Pharisees for making converts but then turning them into sons of Gehenna, that is, people destined for hell (Matt. 23:15). He scolded the Pharisees, warning they had no chance to escape Gehenna through their present practices (Matt. 23:33). James warned many that they could not control their tongues that Gehenna had set on fire (James 3:6). See Hades; Hell; Hinnom.

GELIOTH (Gē lī' 1ōth) Place-name meaning “circles” or “regions.” Border point north of Jerusalem in tribal allotment of Benjamin (Josh. 18:17). It appears to correspond to Gilgal in the description of Judah (Josh. 15:7). See Gilgal.

GEMALLI (Gə māl' lī) Personal name meaning “my camel” or “camel driver.” Spy who represented tribe of Dan in searching out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:12).

GEMARA Portion of the Talmud containing commentary on the Mishnah. The word “Gemara” (Aramaic, “to learn”) refers specifically to the discussions on the Mishnah conducted in the rabbinic academies of ancient Palestine and Babylon. The Mishnah and Gemara combined comprise the Talmud. Most of the Gemara is written in Aramaic. Two Gemaras exist, the Palestinian and the Babylonian. See Mishnah.

GEMARIAH (Gēm ə rī' ə) Personal name meaning “Yahweh has completed or carried out.” 1. Messenger King Zedekiah (597-586 B.C.) sent to Babylon. He carried a letter from Jeremiah to the exiles (Jer. 29:3). 2. Son of Shaphan, the court scribe, who had a room in the temple, where Baruch read from Jeremiah's sermons to the congregation (Jer. 36:10). Later, Gemariah sought to keep the king from burning Jeremiah's scroll (v. 25). See Shaphan.

GENDER EQUALITY Adam and Eve were created in God's image to be equal in personhood but distinct in gender (Gen. 1:26-27; 5:1-2). The phrase “a helper who is like him” (Gen. 2:18), conveys equality and compatibility on the one hand but also indicates a functional distinction that was part of creation.

Adam and Eve were co-participants in the fall, but Adam as head of the race was the one held responsible by God (Gen. 2:16-17; Ps. 90:3; Rom. 3:18; 5:12,15; 1 Cor. 15:22). The fall introduced distortions into the male-female relationship resulting in martial conflict (Gen. 3:16b).

Redemption in Christ aims to reverse the effects of the fall.

Although gender differences remain, all persons—male and female—are one in Christ (Gal. 3:26-28) and participate in unique ways through the work of the Holy Spirit in the life of the church (Acts 2:17-18; 1 Cor. 12:7). The Apostle Paul appealed to the order of creation—man first, then woman—to argue for the submission of women to men in certain functions of the church, namely teaching and preaching (1 Tim. 2:11-12; cp. 1 Cor. 11:8-9). Husbands have been given headship over their wives in a way analogous to the headship of Christ over the church (Eph. 5:23) and must be motivated in their relationship by agape love (Eph. 5:25).

Women held important positions of authority in both the OT (Exod. 15:20; Judg. 4:4-14; 2 Chron. 34:22-28; Prov. 31:29) and NT (Acts 1:14; Rom. 16:1-3; 1 Cor. 1:11; 16:19; Phil. 4:2-3). Both men and women exercise leadership in raising and nurturing their children (Exod. 20:12; Prov. 1:8; Eph. 6:1-4).

GENEALOGIES Written or oral expressions of the descent of a person or persons from an ancestor or ancestors.

Old Testament Genealogies are presented in two forms: in concise lists or within narratives that will contain additional information. Genealogies may be broad or display breadth, presenting only the first generation of descendants (“The sons of Leah...the sons of Rachel...the sons of Bilhah...the sons of Zilpah” Gen. 35:23-26). They may be deep or linear, listing several sequential descendants, usually from two to 10 (“the son of Solomon was Rehoboam, Abijah his son, Asa his son,” 1 Chron. 3:10). Linear genealogies serve to legitimate the last-named person(s) in the list of names. Segmented genealogies display both depth and breadth (“These are the generations of the sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth....The sons of Japheth were Gomer...the sons of Gomer” Gen. 10:1-29). Descending genealogies progress from parent to child (1 Chron. 9:39-44; see also Matthew's genealogy of Jesus in Matt. 1:1-16), and ascending genealogies proceed from child to parent (1 Chron. 9:14-16; see also Luke's genealogy of Jesus in Luke 3:23-38). Biblical genealogies do not always name all the members of the family line. They serve a selective function, depending on the purpose(s) of the author. For example, Exod. 6:14-26 presents a five-generation list of ancestors of Moses and Aaron. The purpose of this genealogy is to legitimize Moses and Aaron in their new leadership roles. The genealogy of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:23-27) demonstrates that there were at least 12 generations from Joseph to Joshua, suggesting that some of the ancestors of Moses and Aaron were not included in the Exodus genealogy.

M. D. Johnson identified nine functions/ purposes of genealogies. (1) Demonstrate existing relationships between Israel and neighboring tribes by tracing them back to common ancestors, showing simultaneously the degree of kinship as well as the distinction between Israel and her neighbors. The genealogies of Lot (Gen. 19:36-38), Nahor (Gen. 22:20-24), Keturah (Gen. 25:1-6), Ishmael (Gen. 25:12-16), and Esau (Gen. 36) are examples of this function. (2) Create a coherent and inclusive genealogical system for Israel. An example is the Genesis toledot book. (3) Establish continuity through the periods not covered by the biblical narratives. Genesis 5 and 11 are examples of this purpose. Ruth 4:18-22 also serves this purpose. (4) Assign dates for the flood (Gen. 5), the birth of Abraham (Gen. 11), or dividing Israel's preexilic history into two equal parts (1 Chron. 6:1-15) by listing the high priests prior to and following Solomon's reign. Because some genealogies are selective, this function is not a measure of absolute chronological reckoning. (5) Perform the military function of numbering the warriors of Israel. Examples are Num. 1 and 26. (6) Demonstrate the legitimacy of an individual in his office, particularly with respect to the priesthood. Examples are Ezra 8 and Neh. 7, and Exod. 6:14-26. (7) Establish and preserve the homogeneity of the Jewish community. The genealogies of Ezra and Nehemiah and the rabbinic tradition serve this purpose. (8) Assert the continuity of the children of God through the period of national disruption (the exile). Thus the postexilic community is the same Israel of the monarchy. The genealogies of 1 Chron. 1-9 are examples. (9) Divide history into orderly periods and demonstrate that the course of history is governed and ordered according to the divine plan.

New Testament The genealogy of Jesus in Matt. 1:1-17 traces the family of Jesus in three lists of 14 ancestors: from Abraham to David, David to the exile, and from the exile to Joseph. Luke presents an ascending genealogy from Jesus to Adam, the son of God (Luke 3:23-38). Several proposals have been presented to harmonize the two genealogies. One widely accepted view is that Matthew focused on the messiahship of Jesus and the legal descent of the heir to the throne of David, by listing the line of kings from David to Jechoniah. Luke's purpose was to focus on the physical descent of Jesus through His mother, Mary. Luke was concerned to present Jesus' humanity while Matthew emphasized His kingship. Both emphasized Jesus' virgin birth and His divine nature. With regard to other figures of the NT, the writers demonstrated much less concern with the ancestry of the men and women than does the OT. God has now revealed the One through whom He would reunite humanity, not by a common ancestor but by a common spiritual rebirth.

GENERAL With reference to Sisera (Judg. 4:7) and Joab (1 Chron. 27:34), a general (NRSV) is the highest-ranking officer in command of an army. General, commander, and (chief) captain are used interchangeably for such an officer in English translations. KJV consistently translates “captain” or “chief captain.”

GENERATION Period of time and its significant events comprising the life span of a person but also used to talk of a more indefinite time span. Two Hebrew words are at times translated “generation.” The more significant of these is toledot, derived from the Hebrew verb, “to bear children.” Toledot gives structure to the book of Genesis (2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1,32; 11:10,27; 25:12-13,19; 36:1,9; 37:2). Thus creation, Adam, Noah, Noah's sons, Shem, Terah, Ishmael, the sons of Ishmael, Isaac, Esau, and Jacob each provide a generation and a structural unit in the Genesis narrative. In writing a narrative this way, Israel followed a pattern long used by Near Eastern neighbors, that of describing creation as a series of births. Israel, as so often under divine inspiration, radically changed the pattern. Israel's neighbors spoke of the birth of gods, such births representing at the same time a part of the universe, since the sun, the moon, the stars were all looked upon as gods. Israel simply spoke of the birth of creation by God's words and actions. This started a process by which human generations would endure as long as the creation generation endured. Each human generation lasts from the death of the father through the death of the son. This was the time when the son functioned as head of the larger Hebrew extended family. Often the aged patriarch presided over the active leadership of his sons as seen particularly in the cases of Isaac and Jacob. Human history in its simplest form of family history is then the way God tells His story of working with human beings to bless them and to accomplish His purposes for them. He works not only in miraculous, unique events; He works also in the continuing series of human births and deaths. Elsewhere toledot appears in genealogical lists such as Exod. 6, Num. 1, 1 Chron. 1–9.

The Hebrew term dor is related to the word for circle and refers to the life circle of an individual, either from birth to death or from birth to the birth of the first child. It can have extended uses in metaphorical language.

Dor occurs over 160 times in the OT. A generation was a general term for those persons living at a particular time. A generation did not necessarily have a specific number of years. Genesis 15:13-16 apparently equates 400 years with four generations, thus 100 years per generation. Numbers 32:11-13 may reckon a generation as 60 years; it included people 20 and above and giving them 40 more years to die. Or one may interpret this to mean a generation is the 40 years of adulthood between ages 20 and 60. God promised Jehu his sons would rule to the fourth generation, apparently meaning four sons (2 Kings 10:30; 15:12). Jehu began ruling about 841 B.C., his first son Jehoahaz about 814 B.C., and the fourth generation Zechariah died about 752 B.C. The five generations ruled less than 90 years, while the four sons' generations ruled about 60 years. In this instance a generation would be fewer than 20 years. After his tragedies Job lived 140 years and saw four generations (Job 42:16). This would make a generation about 35 years. Basically, generation is not a specific number of years but a more or less specific period of time (cp. Job 8:8; Isa. 51:9). The literal Hebrew expression “generation and generation” thus means through all generations or forever (Ps. 49:11). Similarly, “to your (his, their) generations” means forever (Num. 10:8).

The generations come and go (Eccles. 1:4). A generation also represents those who can gather for worship, so that the gathered worship community forms a generation (Pss. 14:5; 24:6; 73:15). The generations of people change, but God has given His name Yahweh to be remembered through all generations (Exod. 3:15). He is the refuge for all generations (Ps. 90:1). The danger is that a generation will arise that does not know Yahweh (Judg. 2:10; cp. Ps. 12). Thus one generation must tell God's acts and write them down for the next generation (Pss. 22:30-31; 102:18; cp. Ps. 79:13).

God's people must be taught faithfulness. God is faithful to a thousand generations by His very nature (Deut. 7:9). His salvation is available through the generations; that is forever (Isa. 51:8).

In the NT “generation” refers to a specific contemporary audience. Jesus often used the term to describe the evil nature of the people He addressed (Matt. 11:16; 12:39; Luke 17:25). The message of the NT can be summarized: “to Him be glory in the church and in Christ Jesus to all generations, forever and ever” (Eph. 3:21 HCSB).

GENESIS, BOOK OF The first book of the Bible and the first of five written by Moses. Genesis describes the creation of all things by the mighty acts of the one true God, human rebellion, punishment, and restoration (Gen. 1-11:9). The remainder explains the origins of the people of God, Israel, and their place in God's plan of redemption (Gen. 11:10-50:26). See Pentateuch.

Contents Most understand that the structure of Genesis is related to the repeated phrase variously translated, “These are the generations of X,” “These are the records of X,” or “This is the account of X.” The Hebrew word toledot occurring in this phrase normally means “descendants,” but in Genesis it usually means “family history.” It has a figurative sense in its first occurrence in 2:4 of the heavens and the earth. There it introduces a section that recounts what happened to God's creation, namely, the introduction of sin and death. Furthermore, the first 11 chapters of Genesis recount the earliest history of the earth, showing why God's plan of redemption through Abraham was needed so badly. The rest of the book concerns (1) the patriarchs— Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and his sons, (2) God's oath to bless and redeem mankind through them, and (3) how Abraham's descendants came to be in Egypt.

Genesis 1:1–11:9 Genesis 1:1–2:3 describes the origin of the universe, “the heavens and the earth”: six days of creation and the seventh day when God rested. Genesis 2:4–4:26 describes in more detail God's creation of mankind and how mankind corrupted itself through sin. Genesis 5:1–6:8 surveys what became of Adam's descendants down to the time of Noah. Genesis 6:9–9:29 recounts the story of the flood, God's covenant with Noah, and God's curse on Canaan and the Canaanites. Finally, Gen. 10:1–11:9 records the geographical distribution of Noah's sons (10:1-32) and explains the reason for so many human languages and nations as God's curse on man's pride at the Tower of Babel (11:1-9).

Genesis 11:10–50:26 Genesis 11:10–26 surveys the descendants of Noah's son Shem down to the time of Terah and his sons Abram, Nahor, and Haran. Some consider this section as concluding the first main division of the book. Genesis 11:27–25:11 recounts the story of God's dealings with Abram (meaning “exalted father”), whose name God changed to Abraham (meaning “father of a multitude”). God promised to bless Abraham, to make his name great, to be an enemy to Abraham's enemies, and to give him a multitude of descendants who would become a great nation. Most important, God promised to bless all nations through him (Gen. 12:1-3). In Genesis 15 God reaffirmed His covenant with Abraham and guaranteed the covenant unconditionally. Abraham tried to fulfill God's promise of a son by taking his wife's servant Hagar as a slave-wife, who bore for him Ishmael (Gen. 16). However, God's promise was fulfilled by giving Abraham and Sarai (whose name God changed to Sarah) a son, Isaac (Gen. 21). The story of Abraham ends with the account of his death after providing a wife for Isaac. After listing the descendants of Ishmael, whom God blessed for Abraham's sake (Gen. 25:12-18), the story of Isaac's descendants is given in Genesis 25:19–35:29. This is primarily the story of God's dealings with Isaac's son, Jacob, whom God chose over Esau as the one through whom the promise of redemption would be fulfilled. After listing the descendants of Esau (36:1–37:1), the account of Jacob's descendants is given in Gen. 37:2-50:26. This is primarily the story of Joseph and how God brought Jacob and his sons to live in Egypt. Although the family was preserved by the godly character of Joseph, Jacob's fourth son Judah would be the one through whom God's redemptive promise would be fulfilled (49:8-12). Genesis 47-50 completes the story of the patriarchs, following both Jacob and Joseph to their deaths, and foreshadowing the return to Canaan in the book of Exodus. See Abraham; Adam and Eve; Anthropology; Creation; Earth; Flood; God of the Fathers; Humanity; Image of God; Isaac; Jacob; Joseph; Names of God; Noah; Sin.

Interpretive Issues Until the 19th century Moses' authorship of the first five books, the Pentateuch, was commonly accepted by both Jews and Christians. Six passages in the Pentateuch explicitly cite Moses as the author of at least parts of the work (Exod. 17:14; 24:4-8; 34:27; Num. 33:1-2; Deut. 31:9,24-26; 31:22,30). Although Genesis contains no such citation, the book is an integral part of the Pentateuch; Exodus makes no sense without it. Exodus through Deuteronomy give abundant testimony that God's revelation to the people of Israel came first through Moses, and the rest of the OT refers to “the book of the law” as coming from Moses (e.g., Josh. 1:7-8; 2 Kings 14:6; 2 Chron. 34:14; Dan. 9:11-13). Jesus and the NT writers considered the Pentateuch, including Genesis, as coming from Moses (see Luke 16:29,31; 24:27,44; John 1:17; 5:45-47; 7:19,22-23; Acts 3:22; 13:39).

With the enlightenment, however, many biblical scholars began following a critical path that radically diverged from the traditional view. They were motivated in part by a desire to peel away the layers of religious tradition to discover what really happened in the past and to free religious faith from its dogmatism and bondage to biblical literalism. Signs believed to point down this path were such features of the biblical text as (1) variations in the names used for God (Elohim/Yahweh); (2) the appearance of supposed redundancies such as two creation accounts (Gen. 1–2) and two wife-sister narratives (Gen. 12 and 20); (3) variant names for persons and places such as Canaanites/Amorites, Ishmaelites/Midianites, and Sinai/Horeb; (4) supposedly differing ideas such as the remoteness or immanence of God; and (5) anachronisms such as references to kings of Israel (Gen. 36:31) or to the city of Dan (Gen. 14:14 versus Josh. 19:47). Consequently, a new understanding of how and when the Pentateuch was produced arose in Europe especially in the 19th century. It came to be called “the documentary hypothesis” because the theory proposed four main documentary sources, J, E, D, and P, which were written and spliced together between the ninth and fifth centuries B.C. Through his work first published in 1878, Julius Wellhausen was the scholar most responsible for propagating this revisionist theory, not only of Pentateuchal origins but also of Israel's history.

This classic critical view has undergone many revisions but has shown an amazing resilience in spite of being contrary to what the Bible says about itself. Several troubling implications have also aroused various responses. First, if we cannot trust how the Bible describes its own origins, why should we trust it in other areas? Second, if the Pentateuch did not originate from the time of Moses, its reliability as a source for Israel's early history is called into question. Third, if the Pentateuch is a composite of sources whose theology and perspective is at odds with each other, how may the voice of God be heard? We may suggest that the path that has led to this unfriendly territory can be retraced and avoided by a reading of the biblical texts that is (1) more sensitive to literary conventions in the ancient Near East in the Mosaic era, (2) more tolerant of practices of ancient writers that are different than our own, (3) more open to the principle of divine verbal revelation, and (4) open to scribal practices of updating biblical texts during the process of transmission. The signs that have led so many down this critical path can in this way be understood as not diverging significantly from the traditional position of Mosaic authorship for Genesis and the rest of the Pentateuch. Many outstanding scholarly commentaries have been written on these books from this perspective. On Genesis see especially commentaries by V. P. Hamilton, K. A. Mathews, G. J. Wenham and Bruce Waltke. See Pentateuch.

The creation and flood accounts of Genesis bear similarities to stories from ancient Sumer, Babylon, and Assyria—another testimony to the antiquity of Genesis. Some even see this as evidence that Genesis borrowed from other cultures. The differences, however, are just as striking as the similarities. The Genesis accounts present a sovereign and gracious God of moral purity. The other accounts portray the gods (multiple) as worse than the worst of men, and creation as the result of sexual activity by the gods. A better explanation is that creation occurred as Genesis reveals. All people are descended from Noah, thus ancient cultures had “memory” of the beginnings and shaped the stories in their own way. See Creation; Flood.

The historicity of the flood has been rejected as mythological. Geological evidence shows a flood strata around the world. Fossils of fish are found on mountaintops. Yet scientists whose assumptions deny the possibility of a universal flood “conclude” one did not occur. The existence of Abraham and the patriarchs has been questioned. Assertions were made that he was a mythological or legendary figure, as was his city Ur. Yet Ur now has been discovered and excavated for many years, and the name Abram has been found carved in stone there.

Scholarship rightly practiced does not prove Genesis is not true in all that it teaches us about creation and the fall, the flood, the patriarchs, and the rest. There is every reason to conclude that Genesis is a reliable guide to what really happened.

Teachings God is the central character of Genesis. He is sovereign Lord and Creator of all things. Genesis assumes the fact of divine creation but does not try to prove it. Genesis does not specify when creation occurred or exactly how long it took. Genesis eloquently teaches that God created all things, including Adam and Eve, by special creation for fellowship with Himself. They were created innocent and with free wills. Freely they chose to disobey God, fell from innocence, and lost their freedom. Their fallen nature was passed to every other human being. The freedom of human wills is limited by fallen human nature. Humans are moral agents who make choices, but their wills are not free to obey God. Death came because of sin, and humanity was so corrupt that God wiped them out and started over with Noah. The second humanity also proved corrupt, and God confused their languages and scattered them. God's plan of redemption began to unfold by His calling of one man to found a family, one family chosen from among all the families of the earth. That family would be the source of blessing and salvation for all peoples. Through each generation in Genesis God demonstrated that the promise depended only on His sovereign power and that no circumstance, person, family, or nation could thwart His purposes. Human sin could not destroy God's plan, but rather provided Him opportunity to demonstrate His glory. Joseph may lie dead in a casket in Egypt, but his dying command was that his bones be carried home to Canaan when, not if, God brought His people again into the land He promised Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

GENNESARET (Gě̃n nēs´ à rět) Another name for the Sea of Galilee. Also used for the fertile valley northwest of this sea. See Galilee, Sea of. GENTILES People who are not part of God's chosen family at birth and thus can be considered “pagans.” Though not synonymous in English, “Gentiles,” “nations,” “pagans,” “heathens” are variants chosen by translators to render goyim Hebrew and ethnoim Greek. “Gentile” and “nation” suggest race or territory, while “pagans” and “heathen” suggest religion.

The doctrine of election in which Israel became a holy nation (Exod. 19:6; Lev. 19:2) among the nations by the covenant at Sinai draws attention to the fact that no other nation has such a God or such laws. The writer of Deuteronomy forbade communion with the nations (Deut. 7:3,6,16). The OT noted the filthy ways (Ezra 6:21) and worship abominations (2 Kings 16:3) of the nations.

Affliction by other nations increased tension between Israel and the nations which gave rise to invoking curses on the nations in the Psalms (Pss. 9; 59; 137). The ultimate punishment of Israel for disobedience was being scattered among the nations.

According to the prophets, the nations were under God's control and were unconsciously being used (Isa. 10:5-7) but in turn would be punished (Isa. 10:12-16). Joel depicted the judgment of the nations who had abused Israel in the valley of Jehoshaphat (Joel 3:12-16).

Solomon's prayer of dedication made clear that the door was never closed to the foreigner who wished to serve the Lord (1 Kings 8:41-43), and prophetic words and some psalms depict the nations gathering to worship the God of Jacob (Pss. 86:9; 102:15-17; Isa. 2:2-4; Zeph. 3:9-10). The Lord is the sole God of all peoples (Isa. 45:22-24). Israel's mission was to bring justice (Isa. 42:1) and light to the nations (Isa. 49:6).

Jesus' ministry is interpreted in the Gospels in terms of OT expectations for the Gentiles. He was a light to the Gentiles (Matt. 4:16-17; Luke 2:32). Though Jesus directed His work to Jews (Matt. 15:24) and at first limited His disciples to them (Matt. 10:5), He threatened that the kingdom would be taken from the Jews and given to a nation bringing its fruits (Matt. 21:43). Though Jesus was crucified by Gentiles (Matt. 20:19), equal blame is placed on both Gentiles and Jews (Acts 4:27).

Following the resurrection of Jesus, the commission included “all nations” (Matt. 28:19). The judgment scene in Jesus' parable envisioned “all nations” gathered before the glorious throne (Matt. 25:31-32). The promises included all those afar off (Acts 2:39). At the house of Cornelius, the Spirit was poured out on the Gentiles (Acts 10:45; 11:1,18; 15:7). The apostolic gathering in Jerusalem, by the apostolic letter, freed Gentiles from obedience to the law (Acts 15:19; cp. 21:19,21,25).

In the apostolic preaching the promise to Abraham (Gen. 12:3; 18:18) found fulfillment (Gal. 3:8). Though in times past the Gentiles had been without God (Eph. 2:12-22), God in Christ broke through all boundaries. Paul, sent to preach among the Gentiles (Acts 9:15; 22:21; 26:17; Gal. 1:16; 2:9), endured many dangers (2 Cor. 11:26). When rejected in the synagogues, he turned to the Gentiles (Acts 13:46; 18:6; 28:28), understanding his work in the light of OT predictions (Acts 13:47-48; Rom. 15:9-12). As the apostle to the Gentiles (Gal. 2:8-9), claiming that in Christ racial distinctions were obliterated (Gal. 3:28), Paul proclaimed an equal opportunity of salvation (Rom. 1:16; 9:24; Col. 3:11; cp. Acts 26:20,23). Gentiles were the wild branches in the allegory grafted into the olive tree (Rom. 11:16-25).

Paul experienced great resentment among the Jews because of the opportunity he was offering the Gentiles (1 Thess. 2:14-16). Nevertheless, in NT thought, the church made up of Jews and Gentiles was the holy nation, God's own people (1 Pet. 2:9).

The apocalypse with its shifting views, depicts a redeemed multitude of all nations (Rev. 5:9; 7:9), and the One who overcomes has power over the nations (Rev. 2:26), Babylon (Rev. 14:8; 18:2,23), the beast (Rev. 13:4), and the harlot (Rev. 17:15) are the deceivers of the nations. The devil is bound to deceive them no more (Rev. 20:3). All nations come to worship (Rev. 15:4) One born to rule with a rod of iron (Rev. 12:5). In the closing scenes of the book the nations walk in the light of the lamp of the Lamb; the glory of the nations is brought into the city (Rev. 21:23-24,26); the leaves of the tree of life are for the healing of the nations (Rev. 22:2).

GENUBATH (Gə nū' bāth) Personal name meaning “theft” or “foreign guest.” Son of Hadad, king of Edom, and the sister of Tahpenes, the wife of Egypt's pharaoh (1 Kings 11:19-20). The name of the Egyptian pharaoh is not known. See Hadad.

GERA (Gē' rā) Personal name meaning “stranger,” “alien,” or “sojourner.” 1. Son of Benjamin and grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:21). 2. Grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:3,5). Son of Ehud and clan head in Geba who was exiled to Manahath (1 Chron. 8:6-7 [see 1, above]). 3. Father of Ehud (Judg. 3:15). 4. Father of Shimei, who cursed David (2 Sam. 16:5). See Shimei.

GERAH (Gē' rah) Smallest biblical measure of weight equaling one-20th of a shekel. Archaeological discoveries show a gerah weighed about half a gram. See Shekel; Weights and Measures.

GERAR (Gə rār') Place-name possibly meaning “drag away.” City located between Gaza and Beersheba. Abraham and Isaac made treaties with the king of Gerar (Gen. 20; 26). Gerar was on the border of Canaanite territory (Gen. 10:19). TEV reads Gerar with the earliest Greek translation of 1 Chron. 4:39-40. Other translations follow the Hebrew reading “Gedor.” Gerar was the limit of Asa's pursuit of the defeated Ethiopians (2 Chron.

14:13-14). The site is possibly that of Tell Abu Hureirah on the northwest side of Wadi Esh-Sheriah. Numerous potsherds from the middle Bronze period (1800-1600 B.C.) indicate that the city flourished during the time of the patriarchs.

GERASA (Gēr' á sa) Two places bear this name. One of them is referred to in the Bible; the other is not.

According to some excellent ancient manuscript evidence, Mark 5:1 and Luke 8:26 located the healing of the demon-possessed man who lived among the tombs in “the country of the Gerasenes (Gadarenes)” (“Gerasenes” in NIV, NASB). This would point to a place named Gerasa. Such a place existed on the east side of the Sea of Galilee. Selecting among Gadara, Gergesa, and Gerasa as the scene of the healing of the demoniac is one of the more challenging tasks in NT studies. See Gadarene.

The other Gerasa was located some 26 miles north of present-day Amman in Jordan. Its ruins are among the most excellently preserved in the Middle East. See Arabia.

GERASENES (Gēr' á sēns) Citizens of Gerasa. See Gerasa.

The ruins of ancient Gerasa located in the modern country of Jordan.

GERGESENES (Gēr' gē sēns) KJV reading in Matt. 8:28. Modern translations read “Gadarenes.” See Gadarenes.

GERIZIM AND EBAL (Gēr' ɪ zīm and E' bāl) Closely related place-names meaning “cut-off ones” and “stripped one” or “baldy.” Two mountains that form the sides of an important east-west pass in central Israel known as the valley of Shechem. Ancient Shechem lies at the east entrance of this valley, and modern Nablus stands in the narrow valley between the two mountains.

Gerizim (modern Jebel et-Tor) stands 2,849 feet above the Mediterranean and 700 feet above the valley. Ebal (modern Jebel Eslamiyeh) was located directly opposite Gerizim and is 2,950 feet above sea level. Both of the mountains are steep and rocky and perhaps gave reason to the probable meaning of Shechem: “shoulder(s).” The mountains, standing like two sentinels, could be fortified and assure control of this important valley.

When the Israelites conquered central Israel, Joshua carried out the directive given by Moses, and placed half of the tribes on Mount Gerizim to pronounce the blessing (Deut. 27:12) and the other half on Mount Ebal to pronounce the curses (Deut. 11:29; Josh. 8:30-35). Joshua built an altar on Ebal (Josh. 8:30).

Jotham proclaimed his famous kingship fable to the citizens of Shechem from Mount Gerizim (Judg. 9:7), thus using its sacred tradition to reinforce the authority of his message. After the Assyrians captured the Northern Kingdom, the mixed race of people began mixing pagan worship and worship of Yahweh (2 Kings 17:33).

Gerizim disappears from biblical history until after the Babylonian exile and the Persian restoration. The Jewish historian Josephus reported that Alexander the Great gave permission to the Samaritans to build a temple on Mount Gerizim. Archaeologists think they have found remains of this temple, 66 by 66 feet and 30 feet high, built of uncut rocks without cement. Josephus also reported that John Hyrcanus destroyed the temple in 128 B.C. Archaeologists have also found remains of the temple to Zeus Hypsistos which Hadrian, the Roman emperor, built after A.D. 100. Over 1,500 marble steps led to the pagan temple. The small Samaritan community continues to worship on Gerizim today, just as they did in Jesus' lifetime when He met the Samaritan woman drawing water from Jacob's well. She pointed to traditional worship on the mountain (John 4:20). See Samaritans.

GERSHOM (Gēr' shōm) Personal name meaning “sojourner there,” “expelled one,” or “protected of the god Shorn.” 1. Firstborn son of Moses and Zipporah (Exod. 2:22). The inspired writer interpreted his name to mean “stranger” or “sojourner” from the Hebrew word ger, “sojourner.” His birth became a further sign for Moses that he had done right in escaping Egypt, the birth occurring in Midian. Apparently Gershom was the son circumcised in the unusual ritual of Exod. 4:24-26 in which Zipporah delivered Moses when God sought to kill him. Thus Gershom represented protection for Moses. 2. Son of Levi and head of a clan of Levitic priests (1 Chron. 6:16-20,43,62,71; 15:7). First Chronicles 23:14 shows that Moses' sons had been incorporated into the line of Levites (cp. 1 Chron. 26:24). 3. Man who accompanied Ezra on the return from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:2). See Gershon; Levites; Moses.

The forum and colonnaded road of Gerasa (modern Jerash) as seen from the temple of Zeus.

GERSHOMITES (Gēr' shō mīts) NRSV term for “sons of Gershom” (1 Chron. 6:62,71). See Gershom.

GERSHON (Gēr' shōn) Personal name meaning “expelled” or “bell.” Eldest son of Levi (Gen. 46:11). He was the progenitor of the Gershonites, who had specifically assigned responsibilities regarding the transporting of the tabernacle during the years of Israel's nomadic existence in the wilderness (cp. Exod. 6:16-17; Num. 3:17-25; 4:22-41; 7:7; 10:17; 26:57; Josh. 21:6,27). First Chronicles often spells the name “Gershom.” See Gershom; Levi; Priests; Levites.

GERSHONITE (Gēr' shōn it) Descendant of Gershon. See Gershon.

GERUTH (Gē' rūth) Part of a place-name meaning “hospitality” (Jer. 41:17) translated differently—KJV: “habitation of Chimham”; NASB, NRSV: “Geruth Chimham”; REB: “Kimham's holding.” Fugitives stopped there near Bethlehem on their way to Egypt fleeing from Ishmael, who had killed Gedaliah, whom Babylon had appointed governor of Judah after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. It apparently designated an inn or lodging place near Bethlehem. It may have represented the first stop across the border from Judah into Egyptian-controlled territory.

GESHAM (Gēsh' am) Personal name with variant spellings, perhaps meaning “rain.” Son of Jahdai (1 Chron. 2:47). Earliest translations give varying spellings, followed by modern translators. Thus NASB, NIV, NRSV, REB read “Geshan,” which is the actual Hebrew spelling. The early Greek traditions read “Gershom” and “Sogar.” Many of the names in the list are towns associated with Caleb, so that Gesham (Geshan) may also be a town.

GESHAN (Gēsh' an) Personal name of uncertain meaning. See Gesham.

GESHEM (Gēsh' ěm) Personal name meaning “rain.” Arabian ruler of Kedar who joined San-ballat and Tobiah in opposing Nehemiah's efforts to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:19; 6:1-19). His name appears on a silver vessel dedicated by his son Qainu to the goddess Han-Ilāt at Tell el-Maskhuta in Lower Egypt. An inscription found in Dedan also appears to describe extensive territories Geshem controlled. He was in name a vassal of Persia but apparently wielded great personal power with tribes in the Syrian Desert, southern Palestine, the delta of Egypt, and northern Arabia. He may have hoped to gain further control in Palestine and certainly did not want a local power to threaten him there. In 6:6 a variant spelling of his name—Gashmu (KJV, NASB)—appears.

GESHUR (Gē' shūr) Place-name, perhaps meaning “bridge.” Small Aramean city-state between Bashan and Hermon. It served as a buffer between Israel and Aram. David married Maacah, daughter of the king of Geshur, who became mother of Absalom (2 Sam. 3:3), which caused the two lands to be on friendly terms. Absalom later retreated to his mother's homeland (2 Sam. 13:37-38). Nowhere do David's battle reports mention Geshur (2 Sam. 8; 10). Many scholars think Josh. 13:2 and 1 Sam. 27:8 refer to a group of southern Philistine cities about which nothing else is known.

GESHURI (Gə shū' rī) KJV spelling for Geshurites. See Geshur.

GESHURITE (Gəsh' ū rīt) Citizen of Geshur. See Geshur.

GESTURES Movements of either a part or all of the body to communicate one's thoughts and feelings. Gestures often may involve external objects such as the tearing of one's clothing (Joel 2:13) or the casting down of one's crown before God (Rev. 4:10). A gesture does not have to accompany verbal speech. Just a piercing look (Luke 22:61) is sufficient to communicate persuasively. In a certain sense all gestures are visual symbols.

Cultural-Corporal Gestures These are the most common to the everyday life and customs of the ancient Near East.

Whole Body Gestures (1) Standing to pray indicates respect to God (1 Sam. 1:26; 1 Kings 8:22; Mark 11:25). (2) Sitting may communicate several things. David's sitting before the Lord indicated reverence, humility, and submission (2 Sam. 7:18), while the sitting down of Jesus at the right hand of God indicates finality and completion as well as power and authority (Heb. 10:12). (3) Kneeling and bowing express honor, devotion, and submission in worship (1 Kings 19:18; Isa. 45:23; Rev. 4:10; 5:8) and reverence in prayer (1 Kings 8:54; 18:42; Dan. 6:10; Luke 22:41). (4) Weeping is not only a sign of sorrow (Job 16:16; Jer. 9:10; Luke 22:62; John 11:35), but also of happiness (Gen. 46:29). (5) Dancing shows joy (Exod. 15:20; Judg. 11:34) and celebration in praise (2 Sam. 6:16; Ps. 149:3). (6) Tearing of one's clothes and heaping of ashes upon one's head signify deep grief (2 Sam. 1:11; 13:19), shocking horror (Num. 14:6; Josh. 7:6), and sudden alarm (Matt. 26:65; Acts 14:14).

Head Gestures (1) Shaking one's head communicates scorn and reproach (Ps. 22:7; Lam. 2:15; Matt. 27:39; Mark 15:29). (2) Lifting one's head can indicate exaltation (Ps. 27:6), contempt (Ps. 83:2), and freedom (2 Kings 25:27). (3) Bowing of one's head shows reverence in worship and prayer (Gen. 24:26; Neh. 8:6).

Face Gestures (1) Eye gestures are numerous and quite expressive. Winking the eye may show mischief and deceit (Prov. 6:13), which also can lead to sorrow (Prov. 10:10). Wanton eyes are sensual eyes that deserve condemnation (Isa. 3:16). Jesus' looking at Peter at the point of his denial is an example of eyes showing both hurt and condemnation (Luke 22:61). The lifting up of one's eyelids expresses haughtiness and pride (Prov. 30:13). One's eyes can show anger (Mark 3:5). The eyes, when uplifted in prayer, signify not only respectful acknowledgment of God but also devotion to Him (Mark 6:41; Luke 9:16). To fail to lift one's eyes up to God while praying indicates one's sense of unworthiness (Luke 18:13). Jesus' lifting up of His eyes upon the disciples shows His personal regard for them (Luke 6:20). (2) Mouth gestures also are plentiful in the Scriptures. To smile and laugh can mean more than just happiness and joy; it also can show goodwill (Job 29:24), scorn (Ps. 22:7; Mark 5:40; Luke 8:53) or even rebuke (Ps. 2:4). The shooting out of the lip communicates the idea of contempt (Ps. 22:7). Kissing is an act that expresses the warmth of a friendly greeting (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20), the affection of one for another (Song 8:1), the sorrow of one who dearly cares for another (Ruth 1:14; Acts 20:37), the deceit of one who hides true intentions (Prov. 27:6; Matt. 26:48), the submission of the weak to the strong (Ps. 2:12), and the seduction of a foolish man by a loose woman (Prov. 7:5-23). Spitting is an emphatic way of showing contempt in order to shame another (Deut. 25:9; Isa. 50:6; Matt. 26:67; 27:30). (3) To incline one's ear is to give attention to another (Ps. 45:10; Jer. 7:26). (4) An obscure gesture is the putting of the branch to the nose. This pagan gesture is an offense to God and possibly has obscene connotations (Ezek. 8:17). (5) A hardened neck indicates stubbornness (Neh. 9:16; Prov. 29:1; Jer. 7:26), while an outstretched neck reveals haughtiness (Isa. 3:16).

Hand Gestures (1) The raising of hands in prayer is a gesture signifying one's request is unto God (Ps. 141:2; 1 Tim. 2:8). The raising of one's hands can also be a symbol of blessing (Lev. 9:22; Neh. 8:6; Luke 24:50), or it can be an act that gives emphasis to an oath (Deut. 32:40; Ezek. 20:5,15,23,28). (2) The covering of one's mouth with the hand signifies silence (Job 29:9). (3) The lifting up of one's hand or the shaking of one's fist means defiance (2 Sam. 18:28; Isa. 10:32; Zeph. 2:15). (4) The laying of a hand or hands on someone can mean violence (Gen. 37:22), or it can mean favor and blessing as on a son (Gen. 48:14) or in healing (Luke 4:40; Acts 28:8). The placing of hands on someone's head shows favor and blessing as in the acknowledgment of an office (Acts 6:6) or in the coming of the Holy Spirit (Acts 8:17). The striking or shaking of hands indicates a guarantee or confirmation (Prov. 6:1; 17:18; 22:26), while the giving of one's hand to another is a sign of fellowship (2 Kings 10:15; Prov. 11:21). (5) To clap one's hands can mean either contempt (Job 27:23; Lam. 2:15; Nah. 3:19) or joy and celebration (2 Kings 11:12; Pss. 47:1; 98:8; Isa. 55:12). (6) The waving of one's hand can mean to beckon (Luke 5:7; John 13:24), to call for silence in order to speak (Acts 12:17; 13:16; 19:33), or to call on God for healing (2 Kings 5:11). (7) The dropping of hands shows weakness and despair (Isa. 35:3; Heb. 12:12). (8) A hand on one's head communicates grief (2 Sam. 13:19; Esther 6:12; Jer. 2:37). (9) The washing of one's hands in public declares one's innocence (Deut. 21:6-7; Matt. 27:24). (10) The pointing of a finger can show ill favor (Prov. 6:13) or accusation (Isa. 58:9). (11) The hand or arm outstretched is a sign of power and authority (Exod. 6:6). (12) To hug or embrace is to show warmth in greeting another (Gen. 33:4).

Foot Gestures (1) The placing of a foot upon one's enemy is a twofold gesture: it shows victory and dominance for the one standing and defeat and submission for the one downfallen and vanquished (Josh. 10:24; Ps. 110:1; 1 Cor. 15:25). (2) To shake the dust off of one's feet is a sign of contempt and separation (Matt. 10:14; Acts 13:51). (3) To wash the feet of another is to humble oneself as a servant (John 13:5-12). (4) The lifting of one's heel against another shows opposition (Ps. 41:9; John 13:18). (5) To cover one's feet is to relieve oneself with some degree of privacy (Judg. 3:24; 1 Sam. 24:3). (6) To uncover one's feet or to walk barefooted indicates grief or repentance (2 Sam. 15:30; Isa. 20:2). (7) The act of uncovering one's feet as in the case of Ruth with Boaz (Ruth 3:4) was an established practice indicating not only one's willingness to marry but also the protection of the husband over his wife.

Religious-Ceremonial Gestures These are a more specialized category of gestures in which prescribed body movements take on a more clearly religious meaning than that found in the previous category.

Old Testament Sacrificial Gestures Two examples are sufficient to represent this limited category of gestures. (1) Within the instructions given by Moses concerning the Passover are the following words: “Now you shall eat it in this manner: with your loins girded, your sandals on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and you shall eat it in haste—it is the LORD'S Passover” (Exod. 12:11 NASB). All of these actions symbolize urgency and readiness. This whole body gesture is one of the profound ways that God chose to emphasize the abruptness and costliness of their freedom from bondage. (2) Another whole body gesture with special emphasis upon the hands is the act of offering a burnt offering unto God. If the offering came from the herd it was to be a male without blemish, and it was to be offered at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation as a free will offering. “And he shall lay his hand on the head of the burnt offering,...And he shall slay the young bull before the LORD” (Lev. 1:4-5). The offering of this sacrifice emphasized God's holiness (a male without blemish) and human sinfulness and separation (only as far as the altar could a sinful person enter into the court of the tabernacle). The act expressed the need for substitution and death (the killing of the animal) and mediation (the ministry of the priests). In an ideal sense the act of coming to the entrance of the tabernacle was a public testimony of confession and commitment. The offering of a sacrifice was the language of covenant acted out in prayerful imagery. The act of putting one's hand upon the head of the animal and killing it served as the focal point of the offering for the sinner.

New Testament Sacrificial Gestures The two ordinances of the church continue the sacrificial theme. Both ordinances testify to the sacrificial death of Jesus Christ. (1) The ordinance of baptism is a whole body gesture that expresses one's identification with Christ's atoning work: His death, burial, and resurrection. To be baptized (Matt. 28:19) is to testify publicly of one's total commitment to Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord. (2) The Lord's Supper (Matt. 26:26-30; 1 Cor. 11:23-29) also emphasizes one's identification with the sacrificial death of Christ. It is through the observance of the Lord's Supper that one testifies to a willingness to deny oneself and take up the cross (Matt. 16:24) to follow Christ.

Prophetic-Symbolical Gestures Prophets dramatized their message with symbolic gestures. Here examples are limited to the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. The use of symbolical gestures by the prophets could range from the simple and obvious, such as Ezekiel's mock attack against a clay model of Jerusalem to symbolize God's impending judgment on the city (Ezek. 4:1-3) to the complex and theological, such as Jeremiah's purchase of a field (Jer. 32:1-44) to symbolize God's future restoration of the Southern Kingdom as its Kinsman (go' el) Redeemer.

In Isa. 20:3 Isaiah had “gone naked and barefoot three years” (NASB) as a symbol of the humiliation that Egypt and Ethiopia were to know when Assyria conquered them. In Jer. 27:1-7 Jeremiah wore a yoke of wood around his neck as a symbol of the future domination of the Babylonians over Judah and her neighbors; therefore, Jeremiah's message was one of submission to Babylonian rule. Ezekiel more than any other was known for his use of prophetic-symbolic acts. His laying on his side for many days (Ezek. 4:4-8) indicated a year for each day of their iniquity and of their impending siege. His eating of scant rations (Ezek. 4:9-17), the cutting of his hair and its various consequences (Ezek. 5:1-17), and the setting of his face toward the mountains of Israel (Ezek. 6:1-7) were all symbolic gestures which showed the judgment of God that soon was to come upon his people (Ezek. 12:1-28). GETHER (Gè' thèr) Aramean tribal name of uncertain meaning. They are Semites, their original ancestor being the grandson of Shem and great grandson of Noah (Gen. 10:23). Nothing else is known of them.

GETHSEMANE (Gèth sèm' á nò) Place-name meaning “olive press.” Place where Jesus went after the Last Supper, a garden outside the city, across the Kidron on the Mount of Olives (Matt. 26:36-56; Mark 14:32-52; Luke 22:39-53; John 18:1-14). Here Jesus charged the disciples to “watch” as He prayed. Judas led the enemies of Jesus to Gethsemane where Jesus was arrested and taken away for trial. Here Jesus, the Son, showed He had learned obedience to the Father even in suffering (Heb. 5:7-9).

Gethsemane was probably a remote walled garden (Jesus “entered” and “went out”) where Jesus went often for prayer, rest, and fellowship with His disciples. See Kidron Valley; Judas; Olives, Mount of.

GEUEL (Gò ù' èl) Personal name meaning “pride of God.” Spy from tribe of Gad that Moses sent to inspect the land before conquering it (Num. 13:15).

GEZER [Gèz' èr] An important city in the biblical period, located on a main juncture of the Via Maris, the Way of the Sea. It guarded the Aijalon Valley and the route from the coast up to Jerusalem and the Judean Hills. Gezer is located at Tell Jezer (Tell Jazari). It is a 33-acre mound situated in the foothills of Judah. It is known from biblical, Egyptian, and Assyrian sources. Gezer is mentioned in the annals of Thutmose III (ca. 1468 B.C.), Amarna Letters (14th century B.C.), and Merneptah's Victory Stela. Gezer is mentioned in an inscription and relief of Tiglath-Pileser III (eighth century B.C.). In addition to the historical sources, the site is well-known due to several archaeological expeditions. Two major excavations were carried out in 1902-1909 by R. A. S. Macalister and in 1964-1973 by William G. Dever and Joe D. Seger. Several smaller excavations were conducted by Alan Rowe (1934) and Dever (1984,1990).

Gezer was a major Canaanite city-state throughout the second millennium B.C. The mound of Gezer was initially occupied around 3500 B.C. and the settlement continued to grow until it was a walled city during the middle Bronze Age (ca. 2000-1500 B.C.) when major fortifications (gate, tower, glacis) were built and the “High Place” was founded. The city was destroyed (ca. 1500 B.C.) and rebuilt during the late Bronze Age when it came under Egyptian hegemony as evidenced by several palaces and residencies. Joshua defeated the king of Gezer who was part of a Canaanite coalition (Josh. 10:33). Gezer remained in Canaanite hands throughout the period of the judges (Josh. 16:10; Judg. 1:29) even though it formed the boundary for Ephraim's tribal allotment (Josh. 16:3) and was assigned as a Levitical city (Josh. 21:21). David fought against the Philistines near Gezer (2 Sam. 5:25; 1 Chron. 20:4).

Gezer was conquered by Egypt and given to Solomon as a dowry for his marriage to Pharaoh's daughter. It finally came under Israelite control as Solomon fortified Gezer along with Jerusalem, Hazor, and Megiddo (1 Kings 9:15-17). This Solomonic rebuilding is evidenced by construction of a four-entryway monumental city gate, a palace, and a casemate wall. This city was destroyed by Shishak (ca. 950-925). The city was rebuilt and experienced another destruction at the hands of the Assyrians (Tiglath-Pileser III, 733 B.C.). Gezer became known as Gazara in the Hellenistic Period and became an important city for the Hasmonean rulers.

GEZRITE (G&sz' r&nt) KJV spelling of name of people in 1 Sam. 27:8, where the Hebrew text tradition shows both Girzites (NIV, NASB, NRSV, TEV) and Gezrite. REB reads Gizrite. Gezrite or Gizrite would refer to inhabitants of Gezer, but Gezer is too far north for the Samuel context. We know nothing else of the Girzites. First Samuel 27:8 says they had lived in the southwestern edge of Palestine from time immemorial and that David raided them from his base at Ziklag.

Tel Gezer.

GHOST KJV uses “ghost” in two senses, for the human life force and for God's Holy Spirit. KJV never uses “ghost” for the disembodied spirits of the dead. All 11 OT references involve the phrase “give up the ghost” (for example, Gen. 25:8; 35:29), which means to cease breathing or simply to die. This phrase occurs eight times in the NT (Matt. 27:50; Acts 5:5; 12:23). The predominant NT use is for the Holy Spirit.

Modern translations use “ghost” (rather than “spirit” as the KJV) for the disembodied spirits of the dead. Jesus' disciples mistook Him for a ghost when He walked on water (Matt. 14:26; Mark 6:49) and when He appeared after the resurrection (Luke 24:37,39).

GIAH (Gi' ah) Place-name meaning “bubbling.” Place where David's general Joab confronted Abner, Saul's general, after Abner killed Joab's brother Asahel (2 Sam. 2:24). The earliest translations saw Giah as a common noun meaning “valley.” Its location near Gibeon is not known.

GIANTS Persons of unusual stature who often are reputed to possess great strength and power. The earliest biblical reference to giants is to the nephilim born to the “daughters of men” and the “sons of God” (Gen. 6:1-4). Interpreters differ on the origin of these giants. Some understand the “sons of God” to be angelic beings who intermarried with human women (Jude 6). Others view them as descendants of Seth who intermarried with the ungodly. Later descendants of the nephilim were called “the sons of Anak” (Num. 13:33) or Anakim (Deut. 2:11; 9:2). They inhabited the land of Canaan prior to Israel's conquest. Egyptian records testify to their presence as early as 2000 B.C. Similar races of giants had also inhabited Moab (Deut. 2:9-10) and Ammon (Deut. 2:19-20).

A second class of giants who inhabited pre-Israelite Palestine was the repha'im. Their last survivor was Og, king of Bashan (Deut. 3:11, 13). A valley near Jerusalem (Josh. 15:8; 18:16) and part of the wooded country in the tribal territory of Ephraim (Josh. 17:15) retained their name.

The OT also records cases of individual giants. The well-known Goliath (1 Sam. 17) was a Philistine champion. A family of giants from Gath were among the Philistine enemies slain by David and his followers (2 Sam. 21:16-22; 1 Chron. 20:4-8).

GIBBAR (Gīb' bār) Personal name meaning “young, powerful man.” A man, 95 of whose descendants returned from Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel in 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:20). The corresponding list in Neh. 7:25 has Gibeon. The correct reading cannot be determined.

GIBBETHON (Gīb' bə thōn) Place-name meaning “arched,” “hill,” or “mound.” City in the tribal territory of Dan (Josh. 19:44) but assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:23). During the monarchy the Philistines controlled Gibbethon. Nadab of Israel (909-908 B.C.) besieged it. During the siege Baasha murdered Nadab and assumed the kingship (1 Kings 15:25-28). The Israelite army was encamped against Philistine Gibbethon when Zimri assumed rule by assassinating Elah, the son of Baasha (1 Kings 16:15-17). Gibbethon has been variously identified as Tell el-Melat north of Ekron, and with Agir, two and a half miles west of Tell el-Melat.

GIBEA (Gīb' ʾā) Personal name meaning “hill.” Son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah (1 Chron. 2:49). See Gibeah.

GIBEAH (Gib' 1 ah) Place-name meaning “a hill,” closely related to names of Geba and Gibeon. Gibeah or Gibeath was the name of four different places in the OT. 1. City in hill country of Judah allotted to tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:57). This may be the home of King Abijah's wife Maacah (2 Chron. 13:2) and could be the same as the place-name presupposed in the list of Caleb's descendants (1 Chron. 2:49), a list including city names rather than personal names, perhaps indicating the clans who originally inhabited the cities. This Gibeah has usually been located at el-Jeba, seven and a half miles southwest of Bethlehem, but this is too far north to be connected with clans of Caleb. Otherwise, the location is not known. 2. City closely connected with Phinehas, the high priest and grandson of Aaron. Phinehas buried his father Eleazar there (Josh. 24:33). Some try to locate this on a hill near Shechem or Bethel. Others would identify it with the Levitical city of Geba in Joshua 21:17 in the territory of Benjamin. The Bible simply uses the general term “hill country of Ephraim.” It could even be near Shiloh. 3. The ark was lodged on a hill (Hb., Gibeah) during the period between its return by the Philistines and David's initial effort to move it to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:3-4). The Hebrew word is probably not a proper noun (Hebrew writing does not distinguish proper names with capital letters as does English). The best translation may be “hill” (NASB, NIV, NRSV, REB; cp. 1 Sam. 7:1-2). The hill here is apparently near Kiriath-jearim or Baalah (cp. Josh. 15:9-11). See Baalah. 4. The most significant Gibeah was the city in the tribal territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18:28). A bloody civil war between Benjamin and the other Israelite tribes broke out when the men of Gibeah raped a traveling Levite's concubine (Judg. 19:1-21:25). Saul had close family connections to the city (1 Chron. 8:29-33 also connects them with the nearby and similarly sounding Gibeon) and made it his capital after he became king (1 Sam. 10:5,26; 15:34; 23:19). If the “hill of God” (1 Sam. 10:5 KJV, NASB, REB) or “Gibeath-elohim” (NRSV) should be translated “Gibeah of God” (NIV) and equated with Gibeah of Saul, then the Philistines controlled the city prior to Saul gaining control. Apparently the Philistines built a fortress there which Saul took over, or Saul constructed his own royal complex, since archaeologists have uncovered a fortress from this period. After Saul's death, the city declined. Hosea and Isaiah referred to it during the eighth century B.C. (Isa. 10:29; Hos. 5:8; 9:9; 10:9). Isaiah shows it was on the natural path for an enemy army such as the Assyrians attacking Jerusalem from the north. Archaeologists have shown the city flourished once more after the destruction of Jerusalem and again in the Maccabean age. Gibeah is located at Tell el-Ful on a high ridge, three and a half miles north of Jerusalem. See Benjamin; Geba; Gibeon; Saul.

GIBEATH (Gīb'ī āth) Alternative Hebrew spelling for Gibeah (Josh. 18:28) preserved in KJV spelling. See Gibeah.

GIBEATH-ELOHIM (Gīb'ī āth-ē lō' hīm) Place-name meaning “hill of God.” See Geba; Gibeah.

GIBEATH-HAARALOTH (Gīb'ī āth-hā ār' ā lōth) Place-name meaning “hill of foreskins.” KJV translates the place-name in Josh. 5:3, while modern translations transliterate it. Joshua used traditional flint stone knives rather than more modern metal ones to circumcise the Israelite generation about to conquer Canaan.

GIBEATHITE (Gīb'ī ā thit) Citizen of Gibeah (1 Chron. 12:3). See Gibeah.

GIBEON (Gīb'ī ōn) Place-name meaning “hill place.” This “great city” (Josh. 10:2) played a significant role in OT history, especially during the conquest of Canaan. Archaeology has demonstrated that the city was a thriving industrial area that made it a primary community in Canaan.

Background of the City Little was known of Gibeon's exact location until the twentieth century. Originally the city was assigned to the tribe of Benjamin following Israel's victory in Canaan (Josh. 18:25) and made a city for Levites (Josh. 21:17). Beginning in 1956, excavations led by James B. Pritchard gave proof that the modern city of el-Jib was the site of ancient Gibeon. Lying eight miles northwest of Jerusalem, Gibeon was in an area of moderate climate, ample rainfall, with a wine-led economy. With an elevation of about 2,400 feet, Gibeon towered above most other cities, making it easily defended. Dating to about 3000 B.C., Gibeon served as the fortress city at the head of the valley of Ajalon that provided the principal access from the coastal plain into the hill country. Gibeon's power was strong as archaeology has found no sign of the city's destruction.

Role of the City Forty-five OT references are made to Gibeon. Its first major appearance in Israel's history involved the conquest of Canaan. The people of Gibeon concocted a deceptive strategy to protect themselves from the Israelites (Josh. 9). Pretending to be foreigners also, the Gibeonites made a treaty with Joshua. When Joshua later discovered the truth, he forced the Gibeonites to become water carriers and woodcutters for the Israelites. Honoring this covenant, Joshua led Israel against the armies of five kings who had attacked Gibeon. During these victories the Lord caused the sun and moon to stand still (Josh. 10; cp. Isa. 28:21).

By the time of David, Gibeon had become part of Israel's United Monarchy. Saul's family seems to have had some connections to Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:29-33; 9:35-39). Following Saul's death a crucial meeting occurred in Gibeon involving Abner and Joab, the respective generals of Saul and David (2 Sam. 2:12-17). A “sporting” battle (v. 14) by the pool of Gibeon ensued in which the men of Joab proved to be victorious. Archaeologists have discovered a spiraling shaft and tunnel with circular stairway leading to water and providing the city a way to get water inside the city walls during enemy attacks.

Gibeon also played host to part of Sheba's rebellion against David (2 Sam. 20:8-13). Joab pursued Amasa, a leader of the revolt, to the great stone in Gibeon where Joab left him “wallowing in his blood in the middle of the highway” (v. 12 NASB). Discovering that Saul had broken the covenant by killing some of the Gibeonites, David gave seven of Saul's male descendants to the people of Gibeon who then put the seven to death (2 Sam. 21:1-9). During one of the sacrifices Solomon made in Gibeon, the Lord appeared and granted the new king's request for wisdom (1 Kings 3:3-14; cp. 9:2). Apparently Gibeon was Israel's major place of worship before Solomon built the temple.

The pool at ancient Gibeon with a spiral staircase leading, down to the water level.

The next references to Gibeon took place about 600 B.C. Jeremiah spoke of the coming destruction of Jerusalem, contradicting Hananiah of Gibeon who predicted Nebuchadnezzar's doom (Jer. 28). Fleeing from justice, Ishmael, the murderer of the Babylonian-appointed “governor” Gedaliah, was overtaken at Gibeon (Jer. 41).

Final references to Gibeon highlighted the city's role in postexilic Israel. The Gibeonites assisted in rebuilding Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 3:7). Nehemiah's list of the returning exiles also included an entry concerning the number of “the children of Gibeon” (7:25). See Canaan; David; Gibeah; Joshua.

GIBEONITE (Gib' ī on īt) Citizen of Gibeon. See Gibeon.

GIBLITE (Gib' līt) [KJV] See Gebal.

GIDDALTI (Gid dāl' tī) Personal name meaning “I brought from there” or “I made great, praised.” Son of Heman to whom David gave the task of prophesying through playing musical instruments (1 Chron. 25:4). He became a leader of a clan of temple musicians (1 Chron. 25:29).

GIDDEL (Gid' dēl) Personal name meaning “he made great, praised.” 1. Clan leader of a group of temple servants who returned from the Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:47). 2. Original clan father of a group of royal servants who returned from the Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:56).

GIDEON (Gid ī ōn) Personal name meaning “one who cuts to pieces.” The fifth major judge of 12th century Israel. He was also called Jerubbaal and was the son of Joash of the tribe of Manasseh. He judged for 40 years (Judg. 6:11-8:35).

Gideon was given the task of delivering the Israelites from the Midianites and Amalekites, desert nomads who repeatedly raided the country. Their use of the camel allowed them to ride in, destroy crops, take plunder, and then escape back into the desert with such speed the Israelites could not catch them. Gideon was not a willing volunteer. Although he knew the will of God, twice he laid out the fleece in what seems an effort to avoid the will of God by imposing impossible conditions. God met his conditions both times and then set out the strategy that would guarantee victory for Israel.

To reduce their number, two tests were given to the 32,000 men in Gideon's army. This was done that Israel could not claim victory by any other means than continued dependence upon God. Those who were afraid and those who knelt down to get a drink of water were sent home. The remaining 300 were given pitchers, torches, and trumpets, and placed around the Midianite encampment. The strategy was one of terror: at Gideon's signal the pitchers were broken, the torches then became visible, and the trumpets sounded, giving the enemy the impression they were surrounded. They took flight, their leaders were killed, and the Midianite oppression was brought to an end.

The springs of Harod where Gideon divided his men for battle against the Midianites.

The hero of faith (Heb. 11:32) ended life on a sad note. He angrily punished Succoth and Penuel for not helping in his war against the Midianite kings (Judg. 8:1-17). He refused the people's offer to crown him king, testifying that only God was King (Judg. 8:22-23), but he ordered the people to give him their golden earrings, taken as war spoil from the Ishmaelites. He made a worship symbol, an ephod, out of it and led his people astray with it (Judg. 8:24-27). His family did not follow his God (Judg. 8:33). See Camel; Jerubbaal; Judges, Book of; Midianites.

GIDEONI (Gid ı 6' ni) Personal name meaning “one who cuts down or cuts to pieces.” Father of Abidan, a leader of the tribe of Benjamin during the encampment in the wilderness (Num. 1:11; 2:22; 7:60; 10:24).

GIDOM (Gi' d6m) Place-name meaning “cleared land.” Place where tribes of Israel punished tribe of Benjamin by killing 2,000 of Benjamin's soldiers (Judg. 20:45) for grossly mistreating a traveling Levite and his concubine. REB follows some scholars in omitting Gidom. No one knows its exact location between Gibeah and Bethel.

GIFT, GIVING Favor or item bestowed on someone. Gifts were given on numerous occasions for a variety of purposes: as dowry for a wife (Gen. 34:12); as tribute to a military conqueror (2 Sam. 8:2); as bribes (Exod. 23:8; Prov. 17:8; Isa. 1:23); as rewards for faithful service and to ensure future loyalty (Dan. 2:48); and as relief for the poor (Esther 9:22). Since gifts might be required by custom, law, or force, modifiers are sometimes used to specify gifts given voluntarily: “willing” or freewill offerings or gifts (Exod. 35:29); free gift or gift of grace (Rom. 5:15-17; 6:23); bountiful gift not motivated by covetousness (2 Cor. 9:5).

Both OT and NT witness to God as the giver of every good gift (1 Chron. 29:14; James 1:17). Human life is God's gift (Job 1:21), as are all things necessary for physical life: the sun for light (Jer. 31:35); plants (Gen. 1:29) and animals for food (Gen. 9:3); water (Num. 21:16); clothing (Gen. 28:20); grass for herds (Deut. 11:15); seasonal rains for crops (Lev. 26:4); companionship of male and female (Gen. 2:18-24; cp. 3:12); the ability to have children (Gen. 17:16); and sleep (Ps. 127:2). Various human abilities are likewise given by God: the ability to work (Deut. 8:18); artistic abilities (Exod. 31:6); the ability to acquire learning and master communication skills (Dan. 1:17). These gifts demonstrate God's general providence.

Scripture also witnesses to God's gifts as evidence of a special providence. In the OT such gifts include the promised land (Gen. 12:7), including its successful conquest (Deut. 2:36), possessing its cities (Deut. 6:10) and its spoils (Deut. 20:14); the Sabbath (Exod. 16:29); the promises (1 Kings 8:56); the covenants (2 Kings 17:15); the law (Exod. 24:12); and peace (Lev. 26:6). In the NT God's special providence is especially evident in the gift of God's Son (John 3:16) and of God's Holy Spirit (Luke 11:13).

God makes relationship with Himself possible by giving His people wisdom (1 Kings 4:29), understanding (1 Kings 3:9), a new heart (Ezek. 36:26), and a good Spirit to teach them (Neh. 9:20). The NT expresses these gifts as the power to become children of God (John 1:12), justification from sin (Rom. 3:24; 5:15-17), and eternal life (John 10:28; Rom. 6:23).

Both Testaments witness to God's gift of leadership to God's people as: priests (Num. 8:19; Zech. 3:7); Davidic kings (2 Chron. 13:5); deliverers (2 Kings 13:5); shepherds with godlike hearts (Jer. 3:15); apostles, prophets, evangelists, and pastor-teachers (Eph. 4:11-12). Paul spoke of God's giving the ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:18), authority for building up the church (2 Cor. 10:8), and grace for sharing the gospel with the Gentiles (Eph. 3:8). The NT also stresses God's gift of spiritual abilities to every believer (Rom. 12:6; 1 Cor. 12:4; 1 Pet. 4:10).

God's gifts should prompt the proper response from the recipients. This response includes not boasting (1 Cor. 4:7; Eph. 2:8); amazement at God's inexpressible goodness (2 Cor. 9:15); the using of gifts for the furtherance of Christ's kingdom (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6-11); and a life of good works (Eph. 2:10).

GIHON (Gi' hōn) Place-name meaning “gushing fountain.” The primary water supply for Jerusalem and one of the four rivers into which the river of Eden divided (Gen. 2:13). The river cannot be identified with any contemporary river.

During the OT period the spring of Gihon was the primary water supply for the city of Jerusalem. The name comes from a Hebrew word meaning “a bursting forth” and is descriptive of the spring that is located in the Kidron Valley. It does not produce a steady flow but gushes out at irregular intervals, twice a day in the dry season to four or five times in the rainy season. Water issues from a crack 16 feet long in the rock. At some point in the ancient past, a wall was built at the eastern end of the crack, diverting water into a cave at the other end. In the Jebusite period before David, a shaft went from the spring to a pool under the city. Water jugs were let down into the pool through another vertical shaft. This probably was the way Joab entered into the city and captured it for David (2 Sam. 5:8; 1 Chron. 11:6). During the early Israelite occupation, water was collected outside the city walls in an open basin called the “upper pool” (Isa. 7:3). An open aqueduct carried water from there to the “old pool” at the southern end of the city (Isa. 22:11; cp. Isa. 8:6). Along this conduit Isaiah confronted Ahaz (Isa. 7:3), and later Sennacherib's army demanded the city's surrender (2 Kings 18:17). Before Sennacherib's arrival, Hezekiah plugged the aqueduct and dug his famous water tunnel (2 Kings 20:20; 2 Chron. 32:30). GILALAI (Gil' ā li) Personal name, perhaps meaning “rolled away.” Temple musician who helped Nehemiah lead the thanksgiving service for the completion of the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 12:36).

GILBOA (Gil' bō' ā) Place-name of uncertain meaning, perhaps, “hill country” or “bubbling fountain.” Location of an Israelite encampment (1 Sam. 28:4). The Israelites under Saul were preparing to do battle against the Philistines.

At Mount Gilboa Saul and his three sons were slain (1 Sam. 31:8). David sang a lament over the Gilboa tragedy (2 Sam. 1:17-27). Mount Gilboa has been identified with modern Jebel Fuqus, on the eastern side of the Plain of Esdraelon. See Palestine; Saul.

GILEAD (גִּלְעָד) Place and personal name meaning “raw” or “rugged.” 1. The north-central section of the Transjordanian highlands. The name may originally have applied to a very small area. Usage of the name then grew and could be applied in different contexts depending on present political situations (cp. Judg. 10:17; Hos. 6:8). It occupies the mountain slopes and tableland east of the Jordan, northeast of the Dead Sea. Gilead is bisected by the Jabbok River; in OT times the kingdom of Ammon occupied its eastern fringe. It was often contested by other nations (Amos 1:3). Gilead extends about 50 miles from southern Heshbon not quite to the Yarmuk River in the north. Its east-west extent is about 20 miles.

Physically, Gilead is a rugged country; the Hebrew name Gil'ad may be translated “rugged.” Some of its peaks reach over 3,500 feet. It also has plains with grassland suitable for cattle, and in antiquity the northern half of the region particularly was heavily forested. The King's Highway, an important international trade route, passed through Gilead. Gilead was an agriculturally significant region as well. It was famous especially for its flocks and herds and also for the balm of Gilead, an aromatic and medicinal preparation, probably derived from the resin of a small balsam tree.

Mount Gilboa.

Many famous persons and events are associated with Gilead. The judges Jair and Jephthah (Judg. 11:1), Israel's King Jehu, and the Prophet Elijah were all Gileadites. Jacob and Laban met at its northeastern border (Gen. 31:22-23). Jacob encountered the angel of God at Peniel in Gilead (Gen. 32:30). Saul's son Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. 2:8-9), David (2 Sam. 17:24-26), and Jesus all retreated to Gilead for a time. Old Testament cities of importance were Heshbon in the south, Rabboth-ammon on the eastern desert fringe, Jabesh-gilead, and Ramoth-gilead. Rabbothammon is the NT Philadelphia; Pella and Jerash (Gerasa) are other important NT cities.

2. Great grandson of Joseph and original clan leader in tribe of Manasseh (Num. 26:28-32; 36:1). The clan was so strong it could be listed with Israel's tribes in Deborah's song (Judg. 5:17). They fought for recognition among other tribes (Judg. 12:4-7).

GILGAL (Gil' gal) Place-name meaning “circle” and probably referring to a circle of stones or a circular altar. Such a circle of stones could be found almost anywhere in Palestine and led easily to naming towns “Gilgal.” The many references to Gilgal in the OT cannot thus be definitely connected to the same town, since several different Gilgals may well have existed. 1.

Gilgal is most closely associated with Joshua, but the number of Gilgals involved continues an unsolved question. After crossing the Jordan, Joshua established the first camp at Gilgal (Josh. 4:19). There Joshua took 12 stones from the bed of the river to set up a memorial for the miraculous crossing. Gilgal, the first foothold on Palestinian soil, became Israel's first worship place, where they were circumcised and observed the Passover. There God appeared to Joshua and affirmed his mission (Josh. 5). This Gilgal apparently became Israel's military base of operations (Josh. 9:6; 10:6; 14:6), though some scholars would identify this with a Gilgal farther north near Shechem. Joshua set up Gilgal as the border between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:7; cp. 18:17), though many Bible students think the border town must be south of the original camp. Ehud, the judge, passed Gilgal in his mission to slay the king of Moab (Judg. 3:19,26). David passed through Gilgal as he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. 19:15,40). This Gilgal is often located at modern Khirbet Mefjir, a little more than a mile east of Jericho. Others would locate it at Khirbet en-Nitleh, two miles southeast of Jericho. Still others remain baffled at finding a location. The boundary town is often seen as Khan el-Ahmar or Araq ed-Deir. The military camp is at times located at Tell Jiljulieh east of Shechem but without archaeological support. This could be the same Gilgal of Deut. 11:30, if Joshua's original town is not meant. Gilgal was also one of the three places where Samuel annually held circuit court (1 Sam. 7:16). This could be near Tell Jiljulieh or at Joshua's first landing place near the Jordan. Saul was both crowned and rejected as king at Gilgal (1 Sam. 11:14-15; 13:14-15). Gilgal established itself as a major place of worship for Israel with ancient traditions. However, it also permitted worship associated with other gods and became the object of prophetic judgment (Hos. 4:15; Amos 4:4; 5:5).

2. Elijah and Elisha were associated closely with Gilgal. At one time Elisha made his headquarters there (2 Kings 4:38), where Elijah was taken up into heaven (2 Kings 2:1). This was apparently Tell Jiljulieh about three miles southeast of Shiloh, though it could still be Joshua's original Gilgal.

3. Gilgal of the nations is mentioned as a royal city near Dor (Josh. 12:23). The earliest Greek translation reads this as "kings of the nations in Galilee," which many scholars think is the original reading, a copyist of the Hebrew text using the word "Gilgal" since it had become familiar in the earlier chapters of Joshua. If the Hebrew Gilgal is original, its location is not known. See Beth-gilgal; Elisha; Joshua; Samuel; Saul.

GILO (Gi' lo) RSV, TEV spelling of Giloh to refer to Gilonite (2 Sam. 23:34). See Giloh.

GILOH (Gi' loh) Place-name meaning “uncovered” or “revealed.” Town in tribal allotment of Judah in Judean hills (Josh. 15:51). David's counselor Ahithophel came from Giloh (2 Sam. 15:12). Some scholars locate it at Khirbet Jala in the suburbs of Jerusalem, but most think Giloh was actually further south.

GILONITE (Gi' lo mt) Citizen of Giloh. See Giloh.

GIMZO (Gim' zō) Place-name of uncertain meaning. Town in the Shephelah or valley of Judah which the Philistines captured from King Ahaz of Judah (735-715 B.C.), leading him to ask Assyria for help and pay tribute to them (2 Chron. 28:18). It is located at Gimzu, about four miles east of Ramleh and three miles southeast of Lod.

GIN KJV term for a trap or snare. With the exception of Amos 3:5, all scriptural uses are figurative, either of the fate of the wicked (Job 18:9; Isa. 8:14) or of the schemes of the wicked (Pss. 140:5; 141:9). See Fowler.

GINATH (Gi' nāth) Place-name or personal name meaning “wall” or “enclosure.” Father of Tibni, the favorite of half of Israel for kingship when Omri became king about 885 B.C. (1 Kings 16:21). See Tibni.

GINNETHO (Gin' nā thō) KJV spelling in Neh. 12:4 of Levite who returned from Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. Hebrew texts have various spellings followed by modern translations: Ginnethon (NIV; REB); Ginnethoi (NASB, TEV, NRSV). This is apparently the same person listed as head of a clan of priests in 12:16. Probably the person who signed Nehemiah's covenant (10:6) belonged to the same family.

GINNETHOI (Gin' nā thōi), GINNETHON (Gin' nā thōn) See Ginnetho.

GIRDLE Several items of clothing in KJV. 1. An ornate sash worn by the officiating priests (Exod. 28:4,40) and by the wealthy of Jerusalem (Isa. 3:24). 2. A decorated band (NRSV), woven belt (TEV, NASB), or waistband (NIV, REB) for the high priest's ephod (Exod. 28:8,27-28). 3. A belt on which a sword or bow might be carried (1 Sam. 18:4; 2 Sam. 20:8; perhaps Isa. 5:27); a leather belt forming part of the proverbial garb of the prophets (2 Kings 1:8; Matt. 3:4). 4. An undergarment (Job 12:18; Jer. 13:1-11), often rendered waistcloth or loincloth.

To gird up one's loins means literally to tuck the loose ends of one's outer garment into one's belt. Loins were girded in preparation for running (1 Kings 18:46), for battle (Isa. 5:27), or for service for a master (Luke 12:35). The call to “gird your minds” (1 Pet. 1:13 NASB) means to be spiritually alert and prepared. See Cloth, Clothing.

GIRGASHITE (Gir' gá shít) or GIRGASITE (Gir' gá sít) Tribal name possibly meaning “sojourner with a deity.” One on the list of original tribal groups inhabiting Canaan, traced back to Canaan, son of Ham and grandson of Noah (Gen. 10:16). The Ugaritic texts from Ras Shamra also apparently mention them.

GIRZITE (Gir' zít) See Gezrite.

GISHPA (Gish' pá) or GISPA (Gis' pá) (KJV) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Supervisor of temple servants in days of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:21). It does not appear in the lists in Chronicles and Ezra, so some Bible students think the name is a copyist's change from Hasupha, which the Jews would pronounce similarly (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46).

GITTAH-HEPHER (Git' ta-hè' phēr) KJV spelling for Gath-hepher (Josh. 19:13) based on a variant Hebrew spelling in the text. See Gath-hepher.

GITTAIM (Git' tā 'ím) Place-name meaning “two winepresses.” City to which people of Beeroth fled after Israel entered Canaan. The Bible does not tell the precise time (2 Sam. 4:3). After the exile, part of the tribe of Benjamin settled there (Neh. 11:33). This could be the same as the Gath of 1 Chron. 7:21; 8:13, but that is not certain. The location is not certain, probably near Lydda and thus in Philistine territory at Rash Abu Hamid.

GITTITE (Git' tít) Citizen of Gath.

GITTITH (Git' tít) Word of uncertain meaning used in the titles of Pss. 8; 81; 84. It may represent a musical instrument resembling a Spanish guitar, a musical tune, or a rite or ceremony as part of a festival.

GIZONITE (Gí' zō nít) Citizen of Gizah or Gizon, a place not otherwise mentioned. It may be modern Beth-giz southwest of Latrun. David had military leaders from there (1 Chron. 11:34), though Gizonite does not appear in the parallel in 2 Sam. 23:34. Some Greek manuscript evidence points to Guni as the original reading. Some Bible students suggest the original reading was Gimzoni from Gimzo. See Gimzo; Guni.

GIZRITE (Giz' rīt) Citizen of Gezer. REB reading in 1 Sam. 27:8 for Girzite. See Gezrite.

GLAD TIDINGS KJV phrase for good news (Luke 1:19). A synonym for gospel as the news Jesus brought of God's kingdom (Luke 8:1; Acts 13:32; Rom. 10:15). See Gospel.

GLASS Amorphous substance, usually transparent or translucent, formed by a fusion of silicates (sometimes oxides of boron or phosphorus) with a flux and a stabilizer into a mass that cools to a rigid condition without crystallization.

Glass has a long history in the Middle East. Obsidian (volcanic glass) was brought into Palestine from Anatolia as early as 5000 B.C. Manufactured glass began to appear after 2500 B.C., but vessels made of glass did not appear until about 1500 B.C. The glass industry reached its zenith in Egypt between 1400 and 1300 B.C. One of the few artifacts not from Egypt is a conical beaker from Mesopotamia, found at Megiddo.

In Egypt and Phoenicia glass was opaque and was used chiefly to make ornamental objects—especially beads, jewelry, and small bottles. Highly skilled artisans created pieces that imitated precious stones such as lapis lazuli and turquoise.

The value of glass in ancient times may be indicated in Job where the glass is equated with gold and is used in parallel with jewels (Job 28:17). The Egyptians and Phoenicians made small bottles for perfume by welding sticks of glass around a core of sand and clay built around a bar of metal. The core and bar were removed after the glass cooled.

Glass drinking bowls became popular in Palestine by 200 B.C. Most of that found in Palestine originated in Phoenicia. The method still used was molding the glass over an object. About 50 B.C. came the revolutionary invention of glass blowing. This method was quicker and less expensive than creating molds for each desired type of vessel. Discovered probably in Phoenicia, blown glass became the vessels of choice in Palestine during the Roman period. Palestinian artists became famous for their brown glass. Many even began signing their creations—the first known designer products in history.

Transparent glass was not made until NT times as a luxury item. During this period, Alexandria, Egypt, became world famous as a center for the production of glassware. Such items as beakers, bowls, flasks, goblets, and bottles were made from the transparent glass. Corinth became known for the production of glass after the time of Paul.

Glass vase in the shape of a fish from Tel el-Atnama in Egypt

John probably had the transparent variety of glass in mind when he wrote Revelation. He described the walls and streets of the new Jerusalem being made of pure gold. The gold of the walls and streets was so pure that it was as clear as glass (Rev. 21:18,21).

John also described the sea as being like glass (Rev. 4:6; 15:2). Here the reference is probably not so much to transparency as to calmness. It has often been stated that the Israelites had a fear of the sea that always seemed to be in a state of chaos and tumult. The sea that John saw around the throne of God was not in a constant uproar; this sea was as smooth as glass.

The KJV uses glass in five other passages where a polished metal mirror is probably being referred to (Job 37:18; Isa. 3:23; 1 Cor. 13:12; 2 Cor. 3:18; James 1:23). Glass was not used to make mirrors in biblical times.

GLAZE Oxide mixture (usually of silica and aluminum) applied to ceramic surfaces that renders them impervious to moisture and gives them a glossy appearance. Some modern translations (NIV, REB, NRSV, TEV) divide the consonants of the Hebrew text of Prov. 26:23 differently from the KJV and NASB and find a reference to a glaze rather than to silver dross. The TEV gives the sense of the passage: “Insincere talk that hides what you are really thinking is like a fine glaze on a cheap clay pot.” See Pottery.

GLEANING Process of gathering grain or produce left in a field by reapers or on a vine or tree by pickers. Mosaic law required leaving this portion so that the poor and aliens might have a means of earning a living (Lev. 19:9-10; 23:22; Deut. 24:19-21; cp. Ruth 2). Isaiah compared the few grapes or olives left for gleaners to the small remnant of Israel God would leave when He judged them (Isa. 17:5-9). One day, however, God would again gather or glean His remnant one by one and return them to worship in Jerusalem (Isa. 27:12).

GLEDE KJV term for an unclean bird of prey (Deut. 14:13). The identity of the bird (Hb. ra'ah) is impossible to determine. The following suggestions have been offered: buzzard (NRSV); kite (REB); red kite (NIV, NASB). The Hebrew root suggests a bird with keen eyesight, for example a member of the hawk family. An easily confused Hebrew word (da'ah) occurs in Lev. 11:14 and in some manuscripts and early translations of Deut. 14:13. The bird in question may be the red kite (Milvus milvus). See Kite.

GLISTERING STONES See Antimony.

GLORY Weighty importance and shining majesty that accompany God's presence. The basic meaning of the Hebrew word kavod is heavy in weight (cp. 1 Sam. 4:18; Prov. 27:3). Thus it can refer to a heavy burden (Exod. 18:18; Ps. 38:4; cp. more idiomatic uses in Gen. 12:10; 47:4; Exod. 4:10; 7:14). On the other side, it can describe extreme good fortune or mass numbers, a use with many different English translations (cp. Gen. 13:2; Exod. 12:38; Num. 20:20; 1 Kings 10:2).

The verb thus often comes to mean “give weight to, honor” (Exod. 20:12; 1 Sam. 15:30; Ps. 15:4; Prov. 4:8; Isa. 3:5). Such honor that people give to one another is a recognition of the place of the honored person in the human community. A nation can have such honor or glory (Isa. 16:14; 17:3). This is not so much something someone bestows on another as a quality of importance that a person, group, or nation has and which another recognizes.

“To give glory” is to praise, to recognize the importance of another, the weight the other carries in the community. In the Psalms people give such glory to God; they recognize the essential nature of His “godness” that gives Him importance and weight in relationship to the human worshiping community (cp. Pss. 22:23; 86:12; Isa. 24:15). Human praise to God can be false, not truly recognizing His importance (Isa. 29:13; cp. 1 Sam. 2:30). At times God creates glory for Himself (Exod. 14:4,17; Ezek. 28:22). As one confesses guilt and accepts rightful punishment, one is called upon to recognize the righteousness and justice of God and give Him glory (Josh. 7:19; 1 Sam. 6:5). God thus reveals His glory in His just dealings with humans. He also reveals it in the storms and events of nature (Ps. 29; cp. Isa. 6). Glory is thus that side of God which humans recognize and to which humans respond in confession, worship, and praise (cp. Isa. 58:8; 60:1). Still, for the OT, the greatest revelation of divine glory came on Sinai (Deut. 5:24). Yet such experiences are awesome and fearful (Deut. 5:25). Such revelation does not, however, reveal all of God, for no person can see the entirety of the divine glory, not even Moses (Exod. 33:17-23).

The NT uses doxa to express glory and limits the meaning to God's glory. In classical Greek doxa means opinion, conjecture, expectation, and then praise. The NT carries forward the OT meaning of divine power and majesty (Acts 7:2; Eph. 1:17; 2 Pet. 1:17). The NT extends this to Christ as having divine glory (Luke 9:32; John 1:14; 1 Cor. 2:8; 2 Thess. 2:14).

Divine glory means that humans do not seek glory for themselves (Matt. 6:2; John 5:44; 1 Thess. 2:6). They only look to receive praise and honor from Christ (Rom. 2:7; 5:2; 1 Thess. 2:19; Phil. 2:16).

GLOSSOLALIA Technical term for speaking in tongues (Gk. glossa). See Tongues, Gift of. GLUTTON One habitually given to greedy and voracious eating. Gluttony was associated with stubbornness, rebellion, disobedience, drunkenness, and wastefulness (Deut. 21:20). A more general meaning for the Hebrew term as a “good-for-nothing” (Prov. 28:7 TEV) is reflected in some translations: wastrel (Deut. 21:20 REB); profligate (Deut. 21:20 NIV; Prov. 28:7 REB); riotous (Prov. 28:7 KJV). When Jesus was accused of being “a glutton and a drunkard” (Matt. 11:19 HCSB; Luke 7:34), it was in this expanded sense of being one given to loose and excessive living. Gluttony makes one sleepy, leads to laziness, and eventually to poverty (Prov. 23:21).

GNASHING OF TEETH Grating one's teeth together. In the OT gnashing of teeth was an expression of anger reserved for the wicked and for one's enemies (Job 16:9; Pss. 35:16; 37:12; Lam. 2:16). In the NT gnashing of teeth is associated with the place of future punishment (Matt. 8:12; 13:42,50). There the gnashing of teeth is perhaps an expression of the futility of the wicked before God's judgment or else a demonstration of their continuing refusal to repent and acknowledge the justness of God's judgment (cp. Rev. 16:9,11), See Hell; Everlasting, Punishment.

GNOSTICISM (nōs' tī sī zəm) Modern designation for certain dualistic religious and philosophical perspectives that existed prior to the establishment of Christianity and for the specific systems of belief characterized by these ideas, which emerged in the second century and later.

The term “Gnosticism” is derived from the Greek word gnosis (knowledge) because secret knowledge was such a crucial doctrine in Gnosticism.

Importance of Gnosticism Gnosticism emerged in schools of thought within the church in the early second century and soon established itself as a way of understanding Christianity in all of the church's principal centers. The church was torn by heated debates over the issues, and by the end of the second century many of the gnostics belonged to separate, alternative churches or belief systems viewed by the church as heretical. Gnosticism was thus a major threat to the early church, many of whose leaders, such as Irenaeus (died about 200), Tertullian (died about 220), and Hippolytus (died about 236), wrote voluminously against it. Many of the features of Gnosticism were incorporated into the sect of the Manichees in the third century, and Manichaeism endured as a heretical threat to the church into the fourth century.

Gnosticism is also important for interpreting certain features of the NT. Irenaeus reported that one of the reasons John wrote his Gospel was to refute the views of Cerinthus, an early gnostic. Over against the gnostic assertion that the true God would not enter our world, John stressed in his Gospel that Jesus was God's incarnate Son.

Heretical Gnostic Sects The gnostics who broke away or were expelled from the church claimed to be the true Christians, and the early Christian writers who set themselves to refute their claims are the major source for descriptions of the heretical gnostic sects. Although wide variations existed among the many gnostic sects in the details of systems, certain major features were common to most of them—the separation of the god of creation from the god of redemption, the division of Christians into categories with one group being superior, the stress on secret teachings which only divine persons could comprehend, and the exaltation of knowledge over faith. The church rejected such teachings as heretical, but many people have continued to find attraction in varieties of these ideas.

Gnostics generally distinguished between an inferior god or “demiurge” whom they felt was responsible for the creation and the superior god revealed in Jesus as the Redeemer. This was a logical belief for them because they opposed matter to thought in a radical way. Matter was seen as evil; thought or knowledge distinguished persons from matter and animals and was imperishable, capable of revealing God, and the only channel of redemption. The gnostic Marcion thus rejected the OT, pointing out that the lesser or subordinate god revealed in it dealt with matter, insisted on law rather than grace, and was responsible for our decaying, tragedy-filled world. The God who revealed Himself in Jesus and through the additional secret teachings was, on the other hand, the absolute transcendent God. He was not incarnate in human flesh because the absolute God would not enter evil matter—Christ only seemed or appeared to be a human person, but He was not.

Gnostics divided Christians into groups, usually the spiritual and the carnal. The spiritual Christians were in a special or higher class than the ordinary Christians because they had received, as the elect of the good deity, a divine spark or spiritual seed in their beings that allowed them to be redeemed. The spiritual Christians were the true Christians who belonged to the heavenly world that was the true one. This belief that the spiritual Christians did not really belong to this world resulted in some gnostics seeking to withdraw from the world in asceticism. Other gnostic systems took an opposite turn into antinomianism (belief that moral law is not valid for a person or group). They claimed that the spiritual Christians were not responsible for what they did and could not really sin because their fleshly existence was not part of God's plan. Thus they could act in any way they pleased without fear of discipline.

Gnostics placed great stress on secret teachings or traditions. This secret knowledge was not a product of intellectual effort but was given by Jesus, the Redeemer from the true deity, either in a special revelation or through His apostles. The followers of the gnostic Valentinus claimed, for example, that Theodus, a friend of Paul's, had been the means of transmission of the secret data. The secret knowledge was superior to the revelation recorded in the NT and was an essential supplement to it because only this secret knowledge could awaken or bring to life the divine spark or seed within the elect. When one received the gnosis or true knowledge, one became aware of one's true identity with a divine inner self, was set free (saved) from the dominion of the inferior creator god, and was enabled to live as a true child of the absolute and superior deity. To be able to attain to one's true destiny as God's child, one had to engage in specific, secret rituals and in some instances to memorize the secret data which enabled one to pass through the network of powers of the inferior deity who sought to keep persons imprisoned. Salvation was thus seen by the gnostics in a cosmic rather than a moral context—to be saved was to be enabled to return to the realm of pure spirit with the transcendent God.

The gnostics thought faith was inferior to knowledge. The true sons of the absolute deity were saved through knowledge rather than faith. This was the feature of the various systems that gave the movements its designation: they were the gnostics, the knowers. Yet what this precise knowledge was is quite vague. It was more a perception of one's own existence that solved life's mysteries for the gnostic than it was a body of doctrine. The knowledge through which salvation came could be enhanced by participation in rituals or through instruction, but ultimately it was a self-discovery each gnostic had to experience.

Origins of the Gnostic Concepts Gnosticism would not have been a threat to the early church if it had not been quite persuasive in the first centuries of the Christian era, and the question of where such ideas came from and what human needs they met must be addressed.

The classic answer to the question of why Gnosticism arose is that it represents the “radical hellenizing of Christianity.” In this view, Gnosticism resulted from the attempt of early Christian thinkers to make Christianity understandable, acceptable, and respectable in a world almost totally permeated by Greek assumptions about the reality of the world.

This classic view of the heretical gnostic sects as distortions of Christianity by Hellenistic thought has much strength because it is easily demonstrated how the gnostics could use NT texts, bending them to their purposes. In 1 Cor. 3:1-4, for example, Paul chides the Corinthian Christians for being “people of the flesh” (HCSB, NRSV) or carnal when they should be spiritual. This text could with ease be used as the foundation for supporting the Hellenistic idea of the superiority of certain persons in the Christian community.

The classic explanation does leave some problems unsolved, however. Little doubt exists that there are ideas, attitudes, and practices incorporated into many of the gnostic heresies that are found outside of Hellenistic thought and much earlier than the second century of the Christian era. In particular, the ultimate goal of the gnostics—to return to the absolute deity beyond matter and to be in some sense absorbed into the deity—belongs to near eastern pre-Christian mystical thought and not primarily to the Hellenistic world.

Although the radical conclusions of some scholars regarding a highly developed pre-Christian Gnosticism have been discounted, it does seem clear that there were many ideas, assumptions, and perceptions about deity, reality, and the relationships of persons to gods and the world that were incorporated into the gnostic sects from outside Hellenistic sources. Two literary discoveries have both inspired and tended to support this line of research—the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Nag Hammadi library with many gnostic documents.

GOAD Rod, generally about eight feet long, with a pointed end used to control oxen. During the time of the judges, the Israelites hired Philistine blacksmiths to “sharpen the goads” (1 Sam. 13:21 KJV), either by fashioning metal points for the pointed ends or making metal casings for the blunt end which might be used to knock dirt clods from the plow. Goads might be used as a weapon (Judg. 3:31). The sayings of the wise are “goads” that “prod” (1 Sam. 13:21, God's Word; The Bible in Basic English) thought (Eccles. 12:11). God warned Paul not to “kick against the goads” (HCSB; KJV, pricks) by refusing to submit to the heavenly vision (Acts 26:14).

GOAH (Gō' a) Place-name meaning “low” (as a cow) or “bellow.” A place, apparently on the west side of Jerusalem, where Jeremiah promised the walls would be restored after the Babylonian destruction (Jer. 31:39).

GOAT Hollow-horned, cud-chewing mammal with long, floppy ears, usually covered with long, black hair. Sometimes, they were speckled. One type of goat mentioned in the Bible has been identified as the Syrian or Mamber goat. Domesticated long before the biblical era, the goat in biblical times probably had long ears and back-ward-curving horns. Both male and female had horns. The most common color was black. It was a prominent source of food; the male also was used for sacrifices (Lev. 22:27). A goat (called a scapegoat) was selected at random once a year on the Day of Atonement to bear symbolically the sins of the nation of Israel (Lev. 16:10-22). The skin of the goat was used to make garments, musical instruments, and water bottles; goat hair was woven into fabrics (Exod. 26:7). Goats are extremely destructive to vegetation and thereby contribute to erosion, as they tear plants out of the soil. Some of the earliest drawings available depict goats eating on trees. Sheep and goats grazed in the same pasture, but it was necessary to separate the herds because the male goat was often hostile toward the sheep (Matt. 25:32). Today goats are found in colors of black, gray, brown, white, and a variety of patterns and mixtures. See Ibex.

GOATH (Gō' āth) KJV and REB transliteration of Hebrew in Jer. 31:39 for Goah. See Goah.

GOATSKIN Hide of goats that desert dwellers used for clothing (Heb. 11:37) and for containers for water (Gen. 21:14) and wine (Josh. 9:4). In Gen. 27:16 Rachel placed goatskin on Jacob's neck and arms as part of the plan to deceive Isaac into giving his blessing. See Goat.

GOB (Gōb) Place-name meaning “back” or “mountain crest.” Site where David and his men fought two battles with the Philistines, killing Philistine giants (2 Sam. 21:18-19). The parallel passage (1 Chron. 20:4) names Gezer as the place. Some Hebrew manuscripts read Benob or “in Nob” as in verse 16. The Greek manuscripts presuppose either in Gath or in Gezer. The location of Gob is not known, though it appears to be a Philistine city.

GOBLET KJV term for a bowl-shaped drinking vessel without handles (Song 7:2). In contemporary English a goblet is a drinking vessel with a foot and stem. Modern translations are divided over the reference in Song of Songs: bowl (RSV, TEV), goblet (NASB, NIV, REB). The underlying Hebrew term is translated “basin” (Exod. 24:6) and bowls (Isa. 22:24) elsewhere. See Vessels and Utensils.

GOD Personal Creator and Lord of the universe, the Redeemer of His people, the ultimate author and principal subject of Scripture, and the object of the church's confession, worship, and service.

Knowledge of God The opening verses of Scripture not only begin with the affirmation of God's existence but also of God's unique action in speaking the universe into being out of nothing (Gen. 1:1; cp. Pss. 33:6; 148:5; John 1:1-2; Heb. 11:3). At the heart of the biblical presentation of God is that God alone is the personal Creator and Lord, and that if He is to be known truly by His creatures, He must take the initiative in making Himself known to us (1 Cor. 2:10-11; Heb. 1:1-2). No doubt His existence and power are disclosed in the created order, even though that order has been deeply scarred by human rebellion and its consequences (Ps. 19:1-2; Rom. 1:19-20; Gen. 3:18; Rom. 8:19-22). It is also true that a dim image of God's moral nature is reflected in the human conscience, even after the fall (Rom. 2:14-16). But Scripture is also very clear that apart from God's own gracious self-disclosure, both in Word and action, we could not know Him in any true sense.

In truth, God is incomprehensible, one that we cannot totally fathom (Pss. 139:6; 145:3; Rom. 11:33-36). But this in no way implies that we cannot know God truly. For in creating us in His image and giving us a Word, revelation of Himself, even though we cannot know God fully, we may know Him truly (Deut. 29:29). That is why any discussion of the Christian doctrine of God must be firmly rooted and grounded in Scripture as God's Word written (Pss. 19:7-14; 119; Prov. 1:7; 2 Tim. 3:14-17). Human speculation about God is never sufficient to lead us to the knowledge of God.

Nature of God Scripture identifies and describes God in many ways across the entire canon of Scripture and our understanding of Him must be based in the total presentation of Himself in all the Scriptures. However, for our purposes, we will attempt to summarize the sweep of biblical data by the words: God, the covenant Lord. First, God is the “Lord” Yahweh; kurios). Even though Yahweh is not the only name of God in Scripture, it is uniquely the name by which God identifies Himself (Exod. 3:13-15; 34:6-7). He does this both at the beginning of His covenant with Israel and also as the name that has been given to Jesus Christ as the head of the new covenant (Exod. 6:1-8; 20; John 8:58; Phil. 2:11). Secondly, God is the “covenant” Lord. He is the God who not only talks the universe into existence but who is also active in it. His action in the world is supremely seen in covenantal relations that find their climatic fulfillment in Jesus Christ the Lord. Hence the expression, “the covenant Lord,” nicely captures much of the biblical data regarding the identity of the God who creates, sustains, rules, and by grace, redeems a people for Himself. See [Names of God.

Three important summary statements can be highlighted from this overall presentation of the God of Scripture. First, as the covenant Lord, God is both transcendent over and immanent in His world. God is presented as the Lord who is exalted above and over His world, that is, transcendent (Pss. 7:17; 9:2; 21:7; 97:9; 1 Kings 8:27; Isa. 6:1; Rev. 4:3). Transcendence is not primarily a spatial concept; rather it speaks of God's distinction and separateness from His creation and thus His complete lordship over it. In biblical thought, God alone is the all-powerful Creator and Lord, and everything else is His creation. He alone is self-existent, self-sufficient, eternal, and in need of nothing outside of Himself (Pss. 50:12-14; 93:2; Acts 17:24-25). That is why the God of Scripture is utterly unique and thus shares His glory with no other created thing (Isa. 42:8). Furthermore, this is why God alone is to be worshiped, trusted, and obeyed. This presentation of God distinguishes Christian theism from all forms of dualism, pantheism, or polytheism.

But we must be careful that we do not misunderstand the biblical understanding of God's transcendence. God's transcendence is not to be viewed in either deistic or “wholly other” terms as has been common in some contemporary thought. For as the “covenant” Lord, Scripture clearly stresses that God is also immanent, that is, involved and present in His world (Ps. 139:1-10; Acts 17:28; Eph. 4:6). This is true not only in God's sustaining the world but also in effectively shaping and governing it towards its eternally planned end (Eph. 1:11). It is at this point that this view stands in direct opposition to process or pantheistic theism, which not only surrenders the transcendence of God but also wrongly views God's immanence as a struggling, evolving, and mutually dependent involvement with the world. Even though God is deeply involved in His world, He is also Lord over it.

Second, as the covenant Lord, God is infinite, sovereign, and personal. By infinite, Scripture presents God as having every attribute or quality to the most perfect degree as well as not being bound by any of the limitations of space or time that apply to us, His creatures. God is eternal spirit (John 4:24; cp. Exod. 3:14; Deut. 33:27; Ps. 90:2-4; 1 Tim. 1:17) and as spirit, He is not limited to any particular place or time nor can He in any way be brought under creaturely control. He is the invisible, transcendent, living God from which all derive their existence. Thus to affirm that God is infinite is to say that God is always present everywhere (omnipresent, Ps. 139:7-10; Acts 17:28) though invisibly and imperceptibly, and is at every moment conscious of all that ever was, is, or shall be (omniscient). Scripture nowhere affirms, as does open theism, that God does not know future free actions of human beings so that the future is to Him uncertain. Rather, God's knowledge is presented as comprehensive, certain, and immediate including things past, present, and future, things possible as well as actual (Ps. 139:1-4,16; Isa. 40:13-14; 41:22-23; 42:8-9; 46:9-11; Acts 2:22-24; 4:27-28; Rom. 11:33-36).

By sovereign, Scripture means that God's power and governance is so extensive that there is nothing whatsoever that takes place apart from His plan and rule, even including the free actions of human beings (Eph. 1:11; Prov. 21:1; Acts 2:22-24). In all things, without violating the nature of things including human free agency, God acts in, with, and through His creatures so as to accomplish everything He desires to do in the way He desires to do it (Isa. 10:5-11; Dan. 4:34-35). God is truly the sovereign-personal Lord. By personal, Scripture identifies God as the one who interacts with other persons as a person. God is never presented as some mere abstract concept or impersonal force or power. Rather He is the all-glorious God who knows, wills, plans, speaks, loves, becomes angry, asks questions, gives commands, listens to praise and prayer, and interacts with His creatures.

Third, God is Triune. Distinctive to biblical theism is the conviction that the covenant Lord is as truly three as He is one. Although the word “trinity” is not found in Scripture, theologians have employed it to do justice to the biblical teaching that God is not only one in nature but also three in person. As one follows the self-revelation of God in redemptive history, we discover not only the oneness of God (Deut. 6:4-5; Isa. 44:6), but also the affirmation that the Father is God (John 20:17), the Son is God (John 1:1,14; Rom. 9:5; Col. 2:9), and the Holy Spirit is God (Gen. 1:2; Acts 5:3-4; 1 Cor. 3:16). This is most clearly seen in the NT in the relationship between the Father, the Son, and the Spirit, and in the pervasive triadic references whereby the NT consistently presents salvation as the joint work of the three persons together (1 Cor. 12:3-6; 2 Cor. 13:14; Eph. 1:3-14; 2 Thess. 2:13-14; Matt. 28:19). Thus, within the complex unity of God's being, three personal centers of consciousness eternally coinhere, interpenetrate, relate to one another, and cooperate in all divine actions. Each person is co-equal and co-eternal in power and glory though each one's role and function distinguishes Him—the Father sends the Son, the Son obeys the Father, and the Holy Spirit brings glory to both (John 5:16-30; 16:12-16; Acts 2:14-36). It is no doubt true that the Trinity is to us a mystery, that is, a matter of incomprehensible fact. But the importance of the doctrine cannot be overstated. What is ultimately at stake in the doctrine is the biblical presentation of God as transcendent and self-sufficient while simultaneously personal and active in human history and redemption as that which is accomplished by a fully divine Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Character of God Throughout Scripture, in God's dealings with human beings, we see God's character fully revealed and displayed. In fact, we uniquely see God's character in action in Jesus Christ, the Lord of Glory, the Word made flesh (John 1:1,14). There are at least two statements that must be affirmed concerning the character of God.

First, God's character is holy love. It is important never to separate the holiness of God from the love of God. God is holy (Lev. 11:44; Isa. 6:3; Rev. 4:8). In the first instance, the word “holy” conveys the meaning of separateness and transcendence. God is the supremely holy one because “He is exalted above all the peoples...He is holy” (Ps. 99:2-3 HCSB). However, it is the secondary meaning of the word that speaks of God's moral purity in the sense of God's separateness from sin. In this latter sense, as the holy one, God is pure, righteous, and just. That is why Scripture repeatedly emphasizes that our sin and God's holiness are incompatible. His eyes are too pure to look on evil and He cannot tolerate wrong (Exod. 34:7; Rom. 1:32; 2:8-16). Thus, our sins effectively separate us from Him, so that His face is hidden from us (Isa. 59:1-2). Closely related to God's holiness is His wrath, that is, His holy reaction to evil (Rom. 1:18-32; John 3:36). The wrath of God, unlike the holiness of God, is not one of the intrinsic perfections of God; rather, it is a function of His holiness against sin. Where there is no sin, there is no wrath, but there will always be holiness. But where God in His holiness confronts His image-bearers in their rebellion, there must be wrath; otherwise God is not the jealous God He claims to be, and His holiness is impugned. Ultimately, the price of diluting God's wrath is to diminish His holiness and moral character.

Nevertheless, God is also love. Often divine holiness and love are set over against one another, but in Scripture this is never the case. This is best seen in the context of the affirmation, “God is love” (1 John 4:8). John, in this context, does not view the love of God as mere sentimentality or a blind overlooking of our sin; rather, He views divine love as that which loves the unlovely and undeserving. In fact, the supreme display of God's love is found in the Father giving His own dear Son as our propitiatory sacrifice that turns back God's holy anger against us and satisfies the demands of justice on our behalf (1 John 4:8-10). Thus, in the cross of Christ we see the greatest demonstration of both the holiness and love of God fully expressed, where justice and grace come together, and God remains both just and the justifier of those who have faith in Christ Jesus (Rom. 3:21-26).

Second, God's character is that of moral perfection. In all of God's dealings with His creation and with His people, God displays the wonder, beauty, and perfection of His own character. In His relation to His people, He shows Himself to be the God of grace and truth, slow to anger, abounding in love and faithfulness, wisdom, and goodness (Exod. 34:6-7; John 1:14-16; Deut. 7:7-8; Pss. 34:8; 100:5; 103:8; Mal. 1:2-3; 2 Cor. 1:3; Eph. 1:3-14; Heb. 4:16). Even in His relation to His rebel world, He displays His generosity, kindness, and patience, as well as His righteous and holy judgment (Pss. 65:9-13; 104:10-30; 136:25; Matt. 5:44-45; Acts 14:16-17; Rom. 2:4). In all of His ways, He is majestically perfect, unchanging (Exod. 3:14; Mal. 3:6; James 1:17), and good. Ultimately the purpose of human existence, and especially of God's redeemed people, the church, is to live before this great and glorious God in adoration, love, and praise and to find in Him alone our all in all (Ps. 73:23-28; Rom. 11:33-36). GOD FEARER The book of Acts is our primary source for understanding the term “God fearer.” In Acts 10:2 Luke describes Cornelius as “a devout man” who “feared God” (HCSB; cp. 10:22). Paul's address to those gathered in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch begins, “Men of Israel, and you who fear God” (Acts 13:16; cp. 10:26). Similarly, there are several examples in Acts of people described as “devout” or as “worshippers of God.” A group of “religious women” in Pisidian Antioch are incited by the Jews against Paul and Barnabas (13:50). Lydia, one of first converts in Philippi, is described as one who “worshiped God” (16:14). Among Paul's converts in Thessalonica were many “Godfearing Greeks” (17:4). In Athens Paul debated Jews and “those who worshiped God” in the synagogue (17:17). During Paul's first visit to Corinth he stayed with Titius Justus, “a worshiper of God” (18:7).

The term “God fearer” is used to describe the Gentiles mentioned in Acts who were drawn to the Jewish religion, perhaps for ethical and moral reasons or because they were attracted to Jewish monotheism and worship practices. “God fearers” took part in Jewish practices such as tithing and regular prayers (Acts 10:2-4) and were apparently welcome to take part in some synagogue services. It has been suggested plausibly that God fearers were given the same rights and held to the same requirements as “resident aliens” in the OT. Given that, it is assumed that God fearers followed such practices as keeping the Sabbath (Exod. 20:10) and participating in sacrificial offerings (Lev. 17:8-9) and were expected not to commit offenses such as blasphemy (Lev. 24:16) or idolatry (Lev. 20:2). Perhaps another indication of the standards kept by the God fearers mentioned in Acts is found in the Sibylline Oracles (4:24-34). A blessing is spoken upon Gentiles who do things such as worship the one God and reject idolatry and who do not murder, steal, or commit sexual sins.

While God fearers attached themselves to many aspects of Judaism and certain Jewish practices, they never became full converts to Judaism. For instance, Luke seems to make a distinction between Gentiles who “feared God,” and “devout proselytes” (Acts 13:16,43). It is likely, at least for Gentile men, that the prospect of circumcision was one of the reasons some “God fearers” never became full converts. Other reasons, such as social or ethnic concerns could also have been factors. “God fearers,” whatever their connection and affection for Judaism, remained fully Gentile.

It must be stressed that “God fearer” is a descriptive, rather than a technical, term. That is, it was probably not the “official” definition for Gentiles who followed nearly every tenet of Judaism short of circumcision. Descriptions like “devout” and “worshiper of God” can be applied to anyone, Jew or Gentile, and should not be thought of as synonymous with “God fearer.” Moreover, one should be careful about drawing too sharp a distinction between “God fearer” and the technical term “proselyte.” As long as these cautions are kept in mind, “God fearer” is a valid way of referring to the people mentioned in the passages cited above.

In Acts the “God fearers” are key figures in the unfolding of God's plan of redemption. One of the first Gentile Christians was Cornelius, a man who “feared God.” Furthermore, as the gospel spread to Pisidian Antioch, to Philippi, to Corinth, to Athens, and beyond, the “God fearers” were among those who formed the earliest Christian congregations as the gospel spread to the Gentiles. See Proselytes.

GODHEAD Word used with reference to God when one speaks of God's divine nature or essence or of the three persons of the Trinity. See Trinity.

GODLESSNESS Attitude and style of life that excludes God from thought and ignores or deliberately violates God's laws. Romans 1:20-32 is a classic characterization of godlessness: the godless refuse to acknowledge God in spite of the evidence of creation (1:20-21), engage in willful idolatry (1:25), and practice a lifestyle unconstrained by divine limits (1:26-31). The godless not only have no fear of God's judgment but also seek to involve others in their wickedness (1:32). “Godless myths and old wives' tales” (NIV) refers to speech that encourages an attitude and lifestyle of godlessness (1 Tim. 4:7; cp. 6:20; 2 Tim. 2:16).

GODLINESS Respect for God that affects the way a person lives. The term “godliness” appears most frequently in the writings of Paul, specifically the Pastoral Epistles. Paul encouraged Timothy to pursue “godliness” in an active manner (1 Tim. 6:11). By so doing, he challenged him to develop a true respect for God and then, in turn, to live his life based on that respect. He emphasized the value of godliness by contrasting it to physical training (1 Tim. 4:8). Whereas physical training has benefit for this life, Paul noted that godliness would benefit the believer in this life and in the life to come. This characteristic was also recognized as being of “great gain” in the life of a Christian (1 Tim. 6:6). Peter likewise encouraged his readers to add to their lives “godliness” as a way of living (2 Pet. 1:6-7).

In addition, Paul used the term to refer to God's actions through Jesus that provided the basis for the Christian's godliness. According to 1 Tim. 3:16, this “mystery of godliness is great” (HCSB). Paul also referred to some who had a “form of godliness” but denied its power. These were ones who appeared to be people of piety, but their understanding and worship of God had little, if any, effect upon their lives (1 Tim. 6:5)

GOD OF THE FATHERS Technical phrase used as a general designation of the God of the patriarchs. Some references to the formula within the biblical narratives speak of the “God of my [your, thy, his, their] father” (Gen. 31:5,29; 43:23; 49:25; 50:17), without mention of a particular father. Other references include the name of a particular patriarch, as “the God of Abraham” (Gen. 31:53; 26:24; 28:13; 32:9), “the God of Isaac” (Gen. 28:13; 32:9; 46:1), or “the God of Nahor” (Gen. 31:53). Given the polytheistic environment of the time, originally the formula could refer to tribal or clan gods (Josh. 24:2, 14-15). Each of the patriarchs apparently had a special name for God: “Fear of Isaac” (Gen. 31:42), “Mighty One of Jacob” (Gen. 49:24).

The “burning bush” story (Exod. 3) identified the “God of the Fathers” with Yahweh. Faced with the prospect of telling the people that “The God of your fathers has sent me to you,” Moses was worried that they would ask him, “What is His name?” (3:13). God commanded him to answer: “Yahweh (the Lord), the God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, has sent me to you” (3:15). Exodus 6:2-3 reveals that the “God of the fathers” was not known by the name of Yahweh, but as “El Shaddai” (God Almighty).

The biblical witness consistently uses the formula to emphasize continuity between the God who is revealed to Moses and the God who guided the patriarchs, even by a different name. Likewise, in the OT, “God of your fathers” or “God of our fathers” functions to link the author's generation to the God of earlier generations, especially with reference to the promises to the patriarchs (Deut. 1:11,21; 4:1; 6:3; 12:1; 26:7; 27:3). In contrast, abandonment of this historic connection is also emphasized (1 Chron. 12:17; 2 Chron. 20:33; 24:24; 29:5; 30:7; 36:15; Ezra 7:27). In the NT the formula is transformed to mark the continuity between historic Israel and Christianity. The God revealed in Jesus Christ is the same as the God revealed to the patriarchs (Matt. 22:32; Mark 12:26; Acts 3:13; 5:30; 7:32; 22:14). See Names of God; Patriarchs; Yahweh.

GODS, PAGAN One of the great distinctives of Judeo-Christian religion is monotheism—the recognition and reverence of only one God. By contrast, pagan religions of the biblical world were polytheistic, worshiping many gods. Although some OT passages are ambiguous regarding whether pagan gods actually existed, other passages are clear. When the Bible speaks of pagan gods, it speaks of either manmade concepts and worthless idols (“[Among the nations] you will serve gods made by human hands, wood and stone, which cannot see, hear, eat or smell,” Deut. 4:28) or demonic spirits (“They sacrificed to demons, not God, to gods they had not known, new gods, recent arrivals, about whom your fathers knew nothing.... They have stirred up My jealousy with non-gods, they have provoked Me with their empty idols,” Deut. 32:17,21; see also 2 Kings 17:29; 19:17-18; 1 Chron. 16:26; 2 Chron. 13:9; 32:19; Isa. 41:23; 42:17; Jer. 2:11; 5:7; 14:22; 16:20; Acts 19:26; 1 Cor. 8:4-6; Gal. 4:8). Old Testament passages that seem to imply a polytheistic worldview (e.g., Pss. 82:1; 86:8; 95:3; 96:4-5) should be understood as mockery or intended to vividly demonstrate the impotence of pagan worship.

Old Testament Most pagan gods began as gods of certain places such as cities or regions. Such gods or a combination of gods became nationalistic symbols as their cities or regions achieved political dominance. A by-product of the connection between gods and certain locales was the belief that a god's power may be limited to certain regions. Thus, officials of the Syrian king advised a battle with Israel on the plains observing, “Their gods are gods of the hill country. That's why they were stronger than we. But let's fight with them on the plain; surely then we'll be stronger than they” (1 Kings 20:23). Israel, against the background of this common belief, struggled with the concept that God was the Lord over all aspects of creation.

Egyptian Gods The names of about 40 deities from ancient Egypt are known, many by more than one name. Each of the 40 or so districts of Egypt had its own cult for its favorite god or gods. Few of the gods are known to have had only one area of involvement or persona, and they often overlapped. For example, creation is credited in various myths to Atum, Aten, Khnum, Thoth, Amun, or Ptah. Many deities were pictured as animals or part animals, such as Hathor as a cow and Horus as a falcon-headed man.

Many were personifications of the enduring natural forces in Egypt. Several gods could be considered sun gods, the most common being Re or Atum. The sky was conceived as Hathor or as Nut bending over the earth god, Geb. Nut reputedly gave birth to the sun every morning and swallowed him every night. The sun was also described as Re traversing the sky in a boat by day and making the journey back through the underworld by night, emerging again after battling the serpent god, Apopis.

Thoth, god of the moon and patron god of scribes, was worshiped at Hermopolis. He was also pictured as the pilot of the sun god's boat and sometimes as the one who slew Apopis. Other gods connected with the moon were Osiris, Min, Shu, and Khnum.

Several gods were associated with the Nile. The main one held responsible for the annual flooding was Hapy, depicted as an obese man. Others were Sobek the crocodile god and Khnum, god of the first cataract.

Ma'at and Seth represented the duality of balance, order, and stability (Ma'at), and chaos, disorder, and death (Seth). Seth, who had slain his brother Osiris, represented the desert, foreign nations, and evil in general, constantly threatening life in Egypt. The Egyptian king or pharaoh whose enthronement was a reenactment of Re's daily victory over Apopis, was the primary weapon against the forces of evil. At his death the king became identified with Osiris, judge and lord of the dead, slain by Seth. The new king became Horus, god of fertility and the afterlife, son of Re. See Egypt.

Politics often played a part in the ascendancy of one god over another or the syncretism or identification of one god with another. The several major religious centers, such as Thebes, Hermopolis, Heliopolis, Abydos, and Memphis, explained the gods and the universe in ways that conflicted at various points.

The gods' names that dominate pharaohs' names in a dynasty show both the dominant city and its dominant god. Thus the god Amun, later called Amun-Re, became the chief god of the empire because of the position of Thebes. Under Amenhotep III, the successes of the empire led to internal power struggles between the powerful priesthood of Amun-Re and the throne. Amenhotep IV changed his name to Akhenaten and embarked on a revolutionary reform that promoted worship of the sun disc Aten above all other gods. The reforms of Akhenaten failed. His second successor made clear his loyalties to Amun-Re by changing his name from Tutankhaten to Tutankhamen and abandoning the new capital in favor of Thebes. The following dynasty, while promoting Amun-Re seems to have favored gods of the north. The names of the gods Seth of Avaris, Re of Heliopolis, and Ptah of Memphis are evident in the 19th Dynasty names Seti, Rameses, and Merneptah.

The daily rituals in the temples of caring for the deities' statues were the means by which the Egyptians contributed to holding the forces of chaos at bay. Personal offerings also accompanied appeals for aid or relief from affliction. Also symbolizing devotion and appeals for help was the wearing of amulets, often devoted to such household deities as Bes, god of love, and his consort Tauert, a hippopotamus goddess of fertility and childbirth.

No Egyptian gods are mentioned in the Bible, and the complex Egyptian religion did not significantly influence the Hebrews. Some have tried to posit a relationship between the reforms of Akhenaten and the monotheism of Moses, but the differences between Atenism and the Mosaic view of God are far greater than the similarities.

Mesopotamian Gods The earliest civilization in Mesopotamia (third millennium B.C.) was that of the Sumerians. Their advanced culture, including their religion, was assimilated by their Semitic successors (Akkadians, then Assyrians and Babylonians), who ruled Mesopotamia for almost 2,000 years until the Persians. Most of the Sumerian deities continued to be worshiped, though usually by different names. More than 3,000 gods could be named, though only about 20 were highly regarded. They varied in rank at different historical periods and in different locations. Military incursions within and outside Mesopotamia usually included plundering the temples of one's enemies and capturing the statues of their gods.

One of the most important gods was An, god of the heavens and patron of Uruk (biblical Erech; Gen. 10:10). Enlil of Nippur, son of An, was the most prominent Sumerian deity. He possessed the “tablets of destiny” and was considered lord of the air and ruler of the earth. He was said to have created the human race by striking the earth with his hoe, but according to one story he also decreed human destruction in a flood because their excessive noise disturbed his sleep.

The god of Eridu, Enki, or Ea, was lord of the underground waters and the cunning god of craftsmen. He was thought to have originated human civilization and assigned gods to govern the various elements of creation and of culture. In one story he created mankind from the blood of the rebellious god Kingu and assigned them the task of serving the gods. In the Mesopotamian flood story, he divulged the plan for the flood to a human hero, who then built a boat and saved humanity.

The feared Nergal of Kutha (also called Erra) was the god of war, plagues, sudden death, and the underworld (cp. Jer. 39:3,13). His consort and coruler was Ereshkigal. The underworld, also called “the Land of No Return” and “the dark house,” was viewed as a city surrounded by seven walls and entered through seven gates. It was a dark, dusty place full of frightening creatures, where the inhabitants ate dust and wore feathers like birds. The walls and gates were to protect the world of the living from the departed spirits, who were also kept from evil by mortuary cults, incantations, and mediums.

With Assyria's rise to power also came the prominence of the god and namesake of the original Assyrian capital, Ashur. Likewise, the political rise of Babylon was celebrated as a victory of their god, Marduk, son of Ea and god of thunderstorms. Many of the old myths were recast with him as the hero, defeating Tiamat, goddess of the sea, representing chaos, then organizing the world and receiving the tablets of destiny. He was referred to as "Lord of the Lands" and as Bel (equivalent to the Canaanite term Baal), meaning "lord" (Isa. 46:1; Jer. 50:2; 51:44). Marduk's son Nabu (Nebo in Isa. 46:1), the god of nearby Borsippa and of scribes, became especially exalted in the neo-Babylonian period as seen in the name Nebuchadnezzar.

Several important gods were associated with heavenly bodies. Shamash was god of the sun and played a prominent role among the Semites. The moon god Nanna or Sin was revered in the cities of Ur and Haran, both associated with Abraham's origins (Gen. 11:31). Thought to be Enlil's firstborn son, he traveled the night sky in a boat. During the moon's monthly disappearance he was believed to be serving as judge in the underworld, and special rites were performed to ensure his reappearance.

Ishtar (the Canaanite Athtart/Ashtart/ Astarte/Ashtoret) was variously associated with the date harvest, spring thundershowers, fertility, war, the morning and evening star (the planet Venus), and harlotry. She was very popular and was often referred to as the "mistress/ queen of heaven" (Jer. 7:18; 44:17-19,25). In one story she tries and fails to usurp power in the underworld from her sister, Ereshkigal, who imprisons her there, spelling barrenness for the earth. Temple prostitution was an important part of her cult and gave Uruk, the city of her older Sumerian equivalent, Inanna, a sordid reputation. The practice was thought to promote fertility in the land. In Babylon where she was worshiped as Marduk's mistress, one of the city's impressive nine gates was named for her. Closely connected with Ishtar was her consort, the spring vegetation god Tammuz, who was remembered with wailing during the hot summer month that bore his name (cp. Ezek. 8:14). The Assyrians and Babylonians celebrated a sacred marriage ritual in which a statue of the god was symbolically brought into Ishtar's temple.

In addition to their cosmic nature, the gods were thought of as present in their image or idol and living in the temple as a king in his palace. The gold-plated wooden images were usually in human form with jewels for eyes (cp. Isa. 44:9-20; Jer. 10:1-16). Each day they were cleaned, dressed, and provided with meals by the priests (similarly in Egypt). The Assyrian king ministered before the image of his patron deity daily, but the Babylonian king only appeared before Marduk once a year at the akitu, the New Year festival.

Canaanite Gods The gods of the Canaanites made the greatest impact on the Israelites. While many of these are related to Mesopotamian gods, Canaanite religion was not well understood until the discovery of religious texts in the 1920s at the Syrian city of Ras Shamra, ancient Ugarit. These texts date from the 14th through the 12th centuries B.C. See Canaan.

At the top of the Canaanite pantheon of gods were two pairs of deities: El and Athirat (or Elat), the high god and his chief wife, and Baal and Anat, king of the gods and his chief consort and sister. El was the generic Semitic word for “god.” Like the Mesopotamian An, however, El was viewed as a grandfatherly, retiring god who did not play an active role.

By far the most prominent Canaanite god was Baal, around whom the Ugaritic myths revolve. These myths represent Baal as the storm god with power over rain, wind, and clouds, and thus over the fertility of the land. The term ba 'al, which meant “lord, husband,” may have been at first a title for the god whose personal name was Hadad, known among eastern and western Semites as god of storm, war, fertility, and divination (searching the future in the entrails of sacrificial animals, etc.). He was the main deity of the Aramaeans (cp. 2 Kings 5:18; Zech. 12:11).

The cycle of the seasons among the Canaanites was represented in the myths by Baal's struggle with Mot (literally, “death”), who represented drought and famine. Baal's death at the hands of Mot caused the dry season (summer), but his recurring return brought forth the rainy season (winter) and restored fertility to the land. In another myth, Baal defeated Yam (literally “sea”), the god of chaos, in much the way that the Babylonian Marduk defeated Tiamat.

In the Ugaritic myths, Baal's consort was his sister Anat, the bloodthirsty warrior goddess who rescued Baal from the underworld by defeating and dismembering Mot. But, apparently among the Canaanites in Palestine, her place was taken by Athirat, known in Ugarit as El's consort and the mother of the gods. In the OT she appears by the name Asherah, the Hebrew equivalent of Athirat (1 Kings 18:19). Her symbol was an “Asherah pole” (known in plural as Asherot/ Asherim; e.g., Exod. 34:13; 2 Kings 17:10), probably representing a tree. Her worship included sacred prostitution, which in Canaan involved male and female prostitutes (Gen. 38:15-22; Deut. 23:17-18; 2 Kings 23:4-7; Jer. 2:20; Ezek. 16:16,31; Hos. 4:13-14). It was often conducted at “high places” that involved Asherah poles representing the goddess and sacred pillars representing the male deity (Lev. 26:30; Num. 33:52; 1 Kings 14:23-24; 2 Kings 18:4; 21:3; Ps. 78:58).

Another of Baal's consort's was Athtart. Although less prominent in Ugarit, she appears frequently in the OT as Ashtoret (probably derogatory, combined with boshet, “shame”) and in Phoenician inscriptions as Ashtart, the Greek equivalent of which was Astarte. She may have played the role in Canaan that Anat played in Ugarit (cp. Judg. 10:6; 1 Sam. 7:4; 12:10; 1 Kings 11:5,33; 2 Kings 23:13). See Asherah.

The fertility aspect of the Canaanite gods was an inviting snare to the Israelites. New to farming and having just settled in Canaan after a generation of nomadic life in the desert, the Israelites were particularly tempted to serve the gods said to control the fertility of that land. Many of the Israelites practiced a syncretistic religion, mixing elements of Baalism with worship of Yahweh. Jeroboam's golden calves at Dan and Bethel may have been an attempt to identify Yahweh with Baal. A jar inscribed with a prayer to “Yahweh of Samaria and his Asherah” suggests a syncretistic belief that Asherah was Yahweh's consort.

Various other deities of Palestine impacted the OT story. The god Dagon of the Philistines (Judg. 16:23) was apparently a Semitic grain god acquired from the Canaanites. At Ugarit he is called Dagan, the father of Baal (although El is also said to be his father).

The national god of the Ammonites was Milcom (Hb. milkom or malkam; 1 Kings 11:5,33; 2 Kings 23:13; Zeph. 1:5), perhaps associated with the Canaanite deity Molek (or Molech), connected to a cult of the dead involving divination and child sacrifice—making one's children “pass through the fire” (Lev. 18:21; 20:2-5; 2 Kings 23:10; Jer. 19:5). In Judah this practice was conducted at Tophet in the Valley of Hinnom on the southwest side of Jerusalem (2 Chron. 28:3; Jer. 7:31; 32:35). The names Milcom and Molek are both related to the Semitic root mlk, “king,” as is also the name of a west Semitic god variously known as Malik, Milku, and Muluk. He also was connected to a cult of the dead and was identified in antiquity with Nergal, the Mesopotamian god of the underworld. Some see an association as well with Chemosh (Hb., kamosh), the national god of the Moabites (Num. 21:29; Jer. 48:7), whose worship also involved child sacrifice (2 Kings 3:26-27) and who may have been identified with Nergal.

Another god identified with Nergal was Resheph (Hb. for “flame” or “pestilence” Hab. 3:5), god of plague and perhaps the same as Rapiu, patron god of the deified dead (Hb. repha'im; Isa. 14:9; 26:14; Prov. 2:18; 9:18). The cult of the dead at Ugarit involved a drunken orgy (perhaps at a family tomb) called a marzih.

New Testament The pagan gods of the NT world were the deities of the Greco-Roman pantheon and certain eastern gods whose myths gave rise to the mystery religions. The conquests of Alexander the Great of Macedon took the Greek culture throughout the Near East.

A few of the Greco-Roman gods are mentioned in the NT. At the head of the Greek pantheon was Zeus, the Roman Jupiter, god of the sky, originally the weather or storm god. With the syncretism of the Hellenistic period following Alexander the Great's conquests, Zeus was equated with the Semitic storm god Hadad. As the supreme Greek deity, however, Zeus was readily identified with the chief god of any region. Thus, when Antiochus IV attempted to force Hellenism on the Jews in 167 B.C., he transformed the Jewish temple into a temple to Zeus. A huge altar to Zeus at Pergamum is probably the “Satan's throne” of Rev. 2:13.

The messenger of the Greek gods was Hermes (Roman, Mercury). When the people of Lystra assumed Barnabas and Paul to be gods (Acts 14:8-18), they called Paul Hermes because he was the spokesman; and they identified Barnabas with Zeus or Jupiter. The oxen and garlands they brought forward were appropriate offerings for Zeus. Hermes was also the god of merchants and travelers.

Artemis was the Greek goddess of the wildwood, of childbirth, and, consequently, of fertility. The great mother goddess of Asia Minor worshiped at Ephesus was identified with Artemis, the Roman Diana. Her temple at Ephesus was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world and an object of pilgrimages. Artemis of the Ephesians was depicted in statues at Ephesus with many breasts, perhaps inspired by a sacred stone (Acts 19:35) kept in the temple. Paul's work in Ephesus resulted in an uproar incited by the silversmiths who sold souvenirs to the pilgrims (Acts 19:23-41).

Other Greco-Roman gods are not mentioned in the NT but formed an important part of Hellenistic culture. The most popular of the gods was Apollo, pictured in Greek art as the epitome of youthful, manly beauty. He served as the god of medicine, law, and shepherds. Aphrodite was the Greek goddess of sexual love and beauty. She was identified with the Semitic goddess Ishtar/ Astarte and with the Roman Venus. Although not mentioned in the NT, a temple to Aphrodite at Corinth was said to employ a thousand cultic prostitutes and contributed to the city's reputation for immorality. The Semitic goddess of Byblos, Ba 'alat, was identified in Greek sources as Aphrodite, who is said to have rescued the fertility god, Adonis (Semitic Adon, “lord”) from Hades each year.

Athena, namesake and patron of the city of Athens, was a virgin goddess connected with arts and crafts, fertility, and war. She was identified with the Roman Minerva. Hera, whose Roman equivalent was Juno, was the wife of Zeus and goddess of marriage, women, and motherhood. Also not mentioned is the important Poseidon, Neptune to the Romans, god of the sea, earthquakes, and—oddly—horses. The war god of Greece was Ares, equated with the Roman god Mars. Hephaistos, the Roman Vulcan, was god of fire and the patron of smiths. Hades, called by the Romans Pluto, was the Greek god of the underworld. His name became the Greek word used in the NT for the abode of the dead (Matt. 11:23; 16:18; Luke 10:15; 16:23; Acts 2:27,31; Rev. 1:18; 20:13-14).

Certain Greek gods became the centers of cults that were quite influential in NT times. Foremost among these is the cult of Demeter or the Eleusinian mysteries. Demeter was the Greek goddess of grain who, according to the myth, ceased to function when her daughter Persephone was abducted into the underworld by Hades. Persephone was eventually released to her mother but forced to spend a third of each year in the underworld, which reflected the annual growth cycle of grain. Secret rites of initiation into the cult took place annually at Eleusis. The Greek god of wine, intoxication, and fertility was Dionysus, the Roman Bacchus. GOG AND MAGOG [Gōg and Mā' gōg] 1. In Ezek. 38-39 Gog of the land of Magog is the leader of the forces of evil in an apocalyptic conflict against Yahweh. In Rev. 20:8 Gog and Magog appear together in parallel construction as forces fighting for Satan after his 1,000-year bondage. The identity of Gog and Magog has been the subject of an extraordinary amount of speculation. In general, however, attempts to relate these figures to modern individuals or states have been unconvincing. Ezekiel's prophecy is apparently built on Jeremiah's sermons against a foe from the north (Jer. 4-6). Ezekiel's historical reference may have been Gyges, king of Lydia, who asked Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria, for help in 676 B.C. but then joined an Egyptian-led rebellion against Assyria about 665 B.C. His name became a symbol for the powerful, feared king of the north. Magog is apparently a Hebrew construction meaning “place of Gog.” 2. Gog is a descendant of the tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:4).

GOIIM (Gōi' ım) Proper name meaning “nations,” particularly “Gentiles, foreign nations.” 1. Land where King Tidal joined the eastern coalition against a coalition from Sodom and Gomorrah. This action led to a war in which Abraham became involved (Gen. 14:1). To which nation the general term “Goiim” applies here is uncertain. Some would suggest the Hittites, since several Hittite kings between 1750 and 1200 B.C. were named Tudhaliya or Tidal. Others point to the Manda people, barbarian invaders who entered Mesopotamia about 2000 B.C. and had some association with Elamites. Goiim may mean a coalition of Hittite, Luvian, and/or other peoples. One Greek manuscript tradition points to Pamphylia, which means “rich in peoples.” 2. Joshua 12:23 lists a king of Goiim in Gilgal as one Joshua conquered. The earliest Greek translation reads “king of Goiim of Galilee,” a reading many Bible students adopt since the immediate context refers to areas near Galilee and the copyist would easily write Gilgal since it plays such an important role in the early narratives of Joshua. Whatever the correct reading, we do not know the precise location or peoples referred to. 3. Isaiah 9:1 also refers to Galilee of the nations. This may represent the Hebrew way of referring to Assyria's governmental district that the Assyrians called Megiddo. Assyria controlled this region after its wars with Israel in 733 and in 722 B.C. 4. In Judg. 4:2 Sisera's residence was in Harosheth of the Gentiles (KJV) or Harosheth-hagoiim (NRSV). See Harosheth.

GOLAN (Gō' lān) Place-name meaning “circle” or “enclosure.” It was a city of refuge for people who unintentionally killed someone and was located in Bashan for the part of the tribe of Manasseh living east of the Jordan River (Deut. 4:43). It was also a city for the Levites (Josh. 21:27). It was located at modern Sahem el-Jolan on the eastern bank of the River el-Allan. See Cities of Refuge; Levitical Cities.

GOLD See Minerals and Metals.

GOLDEN CALF An image of a young bull, probably constructed of wood and overlaid with gold, which the Hebrews worshiped in the wilderness and in the Northern Kingdom of Israel. Living bulls were important in the religion of some regions of ancient Egypt, and bull images appear in the art and religious texts of Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, Phoenicia, and Syria. The primary references to “golden calf” are Exod. 32:1-8 and 1 Kings 12:25-33. The former passage records that the people summoned Aaron to make an image to go before them. The image was apparently intended to represent Yahweh, the Lord of Israel. The latter reference states that Jeroboam I constructed at Bethel and Dan two golden bulls, which were probably meant to represent the pedestals of God's throne. Interestingly, these passages are closely related to each other because they use the same terminology in the dedication of these images (Exod. 32:4; 1 Kings 12:28), and they both explore the sin of idolatry at crucial junctures in Israel's history.

Theological Significance These accounts demonstrate Israel's strong conviction that God cannot be lowered to the level of pictorial representation. God, as sovereign Lord, allows no physical image of Himself, and any human effort to create such an image invites His judgment. GOLDEN RULE Name usually given to the command of Jesus recorded in Matt. 7:12 (cp. Luke 6:31)—“whatever you want others to do for you, do also the same for them” (HCSB). The designation “Golden Rule” does not appear in the Bible, and its origin in English is difficult to trace. The principle of the Golden Rule can be found in many religions, but Jesus' wording of it was original and unique.

GOLDSMITH See Occupations and Professions.

GOLGOTHA (Göl' go tha) Place-name transliterated from Aramaic and/or Hebrew into Greek and then into English meaning “skull.” In Mark 15:22 the Hebrew name for the place where Jesus was crucified. The Latin equivalent is calvaria. Both words mean “skull.” See Calvary; Crucifixion.

Hill of Golgotha or Place of the Skull.

GOLIATH (Gē' bā) In 1 Sam. 17:4 the huge Philistine champion who baited the Israelite army under Saul in the valley of Elah for 40 days. He was slain by the youthful David. See Elhanan.

GOMER (Gē' bāl) Personal name meaning “complete, enough,” or “burning coal.” 1. Daughter of Diblaim and wife of Hosea the prophet (Hos. 1:3). She is described in Hos. 1:2 as “a wife of harlotry” (NASB). Various explanations have been offered for that designation. Some have maintained that she was a common prostitute. Others have maintained that she was a cultic prostitute in the service of Baal. Some have suggested she symbolized Israel's worship of many gods. Still others have believed she was an ordinary woman who became unfaithful after her marriage to Hosea. Her unfaithfulness to her husband became a sort of living parable of Israel's unfaithfulness to Yahweh. See Hosea. 2. Son of Japheth and grandson of Noah in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:2). He is apparently seen as representing the Cimmerians, an Indo-European people from southern Russia who settled in Cappadocia in Asia Minor. Assyrian sources show they threatened Assyria after 700 B.C. He was the father of Ashkenaz or the Scythians of Jer. 51:27 who displaced the Cimmerians from their home in Russia. Gomer was also the father of Riphath (or Diphath in 1 Chron. 1:6) and of Togarmah.

GOMORRAH (Gē' bá lii) See Sodom and Gomorrah.

GONG Loud percussion instrument, perhaps like a type of cymbal used in the temple worship (1 Cor. 13:1; KJV, brass). The Greek is literally “noisy brass,” referring to the metal from which the instrument was made.

GOOD In contrast to the Greek view of “the good” as an ideal, the biblical concept focuses on concrete experiences of what God has done and is doing in the lives of God's people. Scripture affirms that God is and does good (1 Chron. 16:34; Ps. 119:68). The goodness of God is experienced in the goodness of God's creative work (Gen. 1:31) and in God's saving acts (liberation of Israel from Egypt, Exod. 18:9; return of a remnant from captivity, Ezra 7:9; personal deliverance, Ps. 34:8; salvation, Phil. 1:6). God's goodness is extended to God's name (Ps. 52:9), God's promises (Josh. 21:45), God's commands (Ps. 119:39; Rom. 7:12), God's gifts (James 1:17), and God's providential shaping of events (Gen. 50:20; Rom. 8:28). Though God alone is truly good (Ps. 14:1,3; Mark 10:18), Scripture repeatedly speaks of good persons who seek to live their lives in accordance with God's will. Christians have been saved in order to do good (Eph. 2:10; Col. 1:10) with the Holy Spirit's help.

Azekah in the Valley of Elah where young David killed Goliath.

GOODMAN KJV term for a husband or for the head of a household. At Prov. 7:19 “goodman” renders the Hebrew ish, the usual word for man. KJV on occasion translates the Greek term oikodespotes (rendered “goodman” at Matt. 20:11; 24:43; Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11) as master of the house (Matt. 10:25) or householder (Matt. 13:27). Modern translations use equivalents such as landowner or owner of the house.

GOPHER WOOD In Gen. 6:14 the material out of which Noah was instructed to construct the ark. The etymology of the Hebrew word is unknown, and there is no certainty as to the type of wood to which it refers. Even the earliest translators were uncertain. See Ark.

GOSHEN ■ 1. The phrase, “land of Goshen,” appears in the general description of territory occupied by Joshua's forces (Josh. 10:41; 11:16). Apparently it refers to the hill country between Hebron and the Negev. Some believe the phrase refers to a country. 2. The “land of Goshen” may have been named after the city of Goshen located in the district of Debir (Josh. 15:51). Goshen may have been the chief city of the region at one time. The ancient city was either located at Tell el Dhahiriyeh, 12 miles southwest of Hebron or at a location further east. 3. Goshen is primarily recognized as an area in the northeast sector of the Nile Delta. It was occupied by the Hebrews from the time of Joseph until the exodus.

Goshen is significant for biblical studies for four reasons. (1) The pharaoh assigned Goshen to Joseph's family when they entered Egypt (Gen. 47:6,11). The “Hebrew Sojourn” occurred there. (2) The territory lay on a route from Palestine to Egypt. (3) It may be possible to date Joseph's entrance to Egypt with the Hyksos control of the Delta. (4) Both of the cities that the Hebrews built, Rameses and Pithom, and the Hyksos capital at Zoan are key issues for settling on a date for the exodus.

GOSPEL The term “gospel” occurs frequently in the NT in both noun and verb forms, literally meaning “good news” or “proclaiming good news.” The noun form, euangelion, occurs 75 times, and the verb euangelizomai occurs 56 times.

The fertile land of Goshen in the delta country of northern Egypt.

Background There are two views about the background of NT use of euangelion and euangelizomai. One is that these terms are taken from the Jewish context from which the church was established, particularly as they are used in the Septuagint (LXX). The second is that the terms were taken from a Hellenistic (pagan) setting. These have been incorrectly pitted against each other, causing interpreters to miss much the Bible says when using the term “gospel.”

The meaning of these terms might arise from the LXX, but the singular use of euangelion does not occur. Because of this some argue that the primary, perhaps sole, external influence on NT use of euangelion comes from the pagan world. The important role that euangelizomai plays in OT passages (LXX) cited by the NT, however, makes the claim against a Jewish background difficult to sustain. In Isa. 40:9; 52:7-10; 60:6; 61:1, the herald of good news announces that Yahweh, God of Israel, has defeated the pagan enemies, ended the exile of His people, and established His reign. This fits well with the NT contexts.

The noun euangelion originally signified announcement of victory after battle and later the content of that message. The term also came to describe the birth or the rise to power of a new king. An inscription from Priene in Asia Minor, probably written around 9 B.C. describes the enthronement of Augustus as the new Roman emperor. Augustus is lauded as the savior who will bring peace and hails his birthday as “the beginning of the glad tidings (euangelion) that have come to men through him.” This illustrates the religious content of the term in emperor worship.

When one compares pagan use of euangelion and the LXX's use of euangelizomai, a striking parallel arises of a king worshiped by his people. The gospel and its confession that Jesus is Lord confront the claim that Caesar is Lord and declare that in the cross and resurrection Jesus is enthroned as the King of kings. Caesar or any other created thing claiming lordship will bow before the crucified and risen Jesus.

Paul's Use of Gospel The gospel was the center of Paul's preaching and the rule by which he conducted himself to the glory of God. Paul employs euangelion 60 of the 75 times it is used in the NT. The congregations he addressed knew the content of the gospel, seen by the fact that Paul used the term without qualification 28 times. He also qualifies the term: the “gospel of Christ” (9 times), “the gospel of God” (6 times), “the gospel of peace,” “the gospel of our salvation,” and so forth. When Paul uses euangelizomai, it carries the same meaning as kerusso, both describing the act of preaching the gospel. In 1 Cor. 15 and Rom. 1 Paul explains the content of the gospel he preached.

First Corinthians 15 Paul begins discussing the certainty of the resurrection by asserting that the gospel they received from him sustains them and is the means by which they are saved. Paul defines the content of that gospel as the message he received from Jesus Christ. The two central features are that Jesus the Messiah died on the cross and rose from the dead according to the Scriptures. Paul's scriptural basis for his gospel comes from a few selected texts in the OT but also springs from his belief that the death and resurrection of Jesus the Messiah are that to which all Scripture points. By the cross and resurrection God undid the sin of Adam and the curse brought on all creation. In His death, Jesus took our sin and defeated it. Through the resurrection the power of death is destroyed and death no longer possessed any sting. The grave would no longer have the victory.

In 15:3-8 Paul demonstrates that the message he proclaimed had the same content as the message of Peter and the other apostles. He emphasizes the unity of the message because he and the other apostles have the same risen Lord. The encounter Paul had with Christ places him on the same level with these others who have seen the Lord, despite the fact that he was once a persecutor of the church. This description of the gospel opens the following discussion of the resurrection, for if Jesus has been raised, then all who believe in him shall also be raised. If Jesus has not been raised, the gospel has no power, and Jesus can only be described as a failed messianic pretender.

Romans 1:1-17 In the salutation, Paul again sets forth the content of his gospel, which is authored by God the Father and about His Son, Jesus Christ. Paul reminds his readers the gospel was promised beforehand in Scripture. He fortifies this argument through recognition that Jesus was born of the seed of David, as the prophets had declared the Messiah would be. Jesus was designated the Son of God by virtue of His resurrection from the dead. The heart of the gospel is the cross and resurrection. All of history hangs on this, and a disservice to the gospel is done if the centrality of Jesus' death on the cross is minimized. The conclusion is the confession that Jesus the Messiah is Lord. In His death and resurrection, Jesus of Nazareth is vindicated as Yahweh's Messiah and established as the Lord before whom every knee shall bow and every tongue shall swear allegiance to the glory of God the Father (Phil. 2:10-11). This summary in Rom. 1:4-5 is almost identical to what Paul calls "my gospel" in 2 Tim. 2:8. In 2 Cor. 4:3-5 Paul describes the gospel as focusing on the glory of Christ and the confession that Jesus Christ is Lord is equated with the gospel Paul preached. When concluding this section (Rom. 1:16-17), Paul asserts the gospel is not just a body of information but rather the power of God for salvation. Through the cross and resurrection, salvation from sin is made available to all who believe, both Jews and Greeks.

Other Pauline Passages In Rom. 10:8c-13 the faith Paul preaches and the message that must be believed for salvation is that Jesus is Lord and that God has raised Him from the dead. Paul continues in 10:15, the one heralding the victorious return of Yahweh to Zion is closely linked to the suffering servant of Yahweh (Isa. 52:13-53:11). In Rom. 10:8c-13 the messenger proclaiming this word about Jesus is equated with the one heralding the return of Yahweh to Zion. Paul understands the gospel as the proclamation that Yahweh has defeated all enemies and established his kingdom.

The gospel is that Jesus of Nazareth, the Messiah, was crucified for our sins and raised from the dead, and is also the Lord of all creation. This message is the power of God for salvation and brings about all things that are a part of salvation (i.e., faith, regeneration, justification, etc.). Paul's message is the gospel (1 Cor. 9:14-18; Phil. 1:5; 2:22) and the reason for his imprisonment and suffering (Phil. 1:7; 2 Tim. 1:8, 2:8-9). Paul was called to proclaim this good news, and this calling strengthens him to preach the message of salvation to the Gentiles (Rom. 15:16-20; 1 Cor. 9:19-23; 2 Cor. 10:12-18; Gal. 1:15-23; 1 Thess. 2:2,8-9; 2 Tim. 2:11-12). The gospel also makes an ethical claim (Phil. 1:27; 1 Thess. 2:12; 2 Thess. 1:8). Paul links the gospel to the final judgment in that all will be judged by their response to the Savior that the good news proclaims (Rom. 2:16; Col. 1:23; 2 Thess. 1:8; 2 Tim. 4:1).

Gospel in the Gospels and Acts Mark Mark uses euangelion more than the other Gospels (8 times, including 16:15). He begins with the programmatic statement that the book is “the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.” This striking use of euangelion echoes both pagan and OT uses of the term through the arrival of a new king and the OT promise that Yahweh would return to Zion and defeat the enemies of His people. Everything Mark describes about the life and ministry of Jesus shows that Jesus is the Messiah sent by God to bring deliverance. In His miracles, Jesus is shown to be the Messiah, Son of God, who has power over nature, demons, disease, and even death. In His parables, the reader is taught about the kingdom Jesus is establishing. The ultimate purpose of the life of the Messiah was to die as a ransom for many. Through the resurrection, Jesus' messianic claims are vindicated and His status as the Son of God is shown to be unshakable.

Mark also employs euangelion to describe the ministry Jesus began after John the Baptist was jailed (1:14-15). Jesus came preaching the gospel, the proclamation that the time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is near. Through the ministry of Jesus, the God of Israel is acting to restore His people. The corollary to this proclamation is the call to repent and believe in the gospel. Jesus' preaching echoes that of John the Baptist and brings fulfillment to it in that Jesus was the Messiah, the Son of God, who would establish Yahweh's reign. For Mark, the gospel is essentially about the establishment of the kingdom of God. Mark also uses euangelion as the object of kerusso when Jesus announces that the woman who anointed Him for burial would be remembered wherever the gospel is preached (Mark 14:3-9).

The importance of the kingdom is seen also in Mark's use of euangelion in 8:35 and 10:29-30. In 8:35, after his passion prediction, Jesus describes the cost of following Him and explains that one who follows Him must be willing to lose his life for the sake of Jesus and the gospel.

Matthew Matthew uses euangelion four times (4:23; 9:35; 24:14; 26:13) and euangeli-zomaione time (11:5; cp. Luke 7:18-23). Three times Matthew qualifies euangelion as the euangelion tou basileias, the gospel of the kingdom. Matthew summarizes Jesus' Galilean ministry in 4:23, by saying that He was teaching in their synagogues, preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing everyone with disease and sickness. The gospel for Matthew is focused on the kingdom Jesus came to establish through His life and death. This good news of the kingdom fits well with Jewish expectation that Yahweh would restore His people through the work of His Messiah and supports Matthew's argument that Jesus came in fulfillment of the Scriptures.

Luke-Acts Luke does not use euangelion in his Gospel but uses the verb (10 times) of the act of proclaiming the good news. In Acts, Luke uses euangelizomai 15 times and euangelion only twice. In the birth narratives of Jesus and John the Baptist, Luke uses euangelizomai in the proclamation of Gabriel to Zacharias (1:19) and to the shepherds by an angel on the night of Jesus' birth (2:10). When Jesus speaks at the synagogue in Nazareth

(4:16-21), He reads from Isaiah of the restoration of Yahweh's people from their sin and exile (Isa 61:1; 58:6). Messiah will proclaim good news to the poor, declare release to the captives, sight for the blind, liberty to the oppressed, and declare the acceptable year of the Lord. After reading this text, Jesus tells the crowd this is fulfilled in Him. This text outlines the central focus of Luke's account of the life and ministry of Jesus. Luke uses this again, describing the message to John the Baptist when he seeks confirmation that Jesus is the one coming after him (7:22). The proclamation of the good news is focused on the kingdom of God and its fulfillment of the law and the prophets (8:1; 16:16).

In Acts, Luke's use of euangelizomai emphasizes proclamation about the life and ministry of Jesus. Eight times this proclamation is about Jesus the Messiah, who is Lord of all (5:42; 8:4-6,12,35; 10:36-44; 11:20; 13:16-41; 17:18). This good news about Jesus forms the center of the preaching by the missionaries of the early church (8:12,25,40; 14:7,15,21; 15:35; 16:10). The good news they preached was intimately linked to the promises of the OT and focused on the life and ministry of Jesus, particularly the cross and resurrection (8:26-39; 10:36-44; 13:16-41).

John John does not employ the terms euangelion and euangelizomai in his Gospel and prefers terms meaning “witness” and “truth.” He also emphasizes the act of believing that Jesus is the Messiah, Son of God, and the life imparted as a result of this belief (John 20:20-31).

Gospel Elsewhere in the New Testament In 1 Pet. 1:3-12 Peter defines the gospel as the message promised by the prophets and completed in the suffering and glory of Jesus Christ. The resurrection of Jesus has provided a living hope and an eternal inheritance. This gospel is such good news that even the angels long to glimpse it. In 1:23 the gospel is called the living and abiding word of God. In discussing the time of trial and final judgment to come (4:1-19), Peter explains that a terrible outcome awaits those who reject the gospel. The verb form, evangelizomai, is used in Heb. 4:2 and 6 and refers to the message about Jesus the Messiah, similar to that found in 1:1-4. Revelation 14:6 describes the eternal gospel that is used in judgment.

Conclusion The gospel in the NT can be summarized as the message about the kingdom of God established in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus the Messiah, who is enthroned as Lord of all. This good news describes events to which all Scripture points and declares that all principalities and powers are defeated once and for all by Jesus the Messiah. Finally, all of humanity will be judged according to their reception or rejection of this good news.

GOSPEL OF THOMAS See Apocrypha, New Testament; Gnosticism.

GOSPELS, SYNOPTIC The collective name for the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. The term “synoptic” means “with the same eye,” thus “with the same viewpoint.”

In telling the gospel story, Matthew, Mark, and Luke share a common organization of their materials, with Jesus' ministry being oriented geographically, starting with His Galilee ministry, then moving to a transition stage that includes travel outside of Galilee, as well as within and through Galilee, and ending with the events in Jerusalem that conclude with Jesus' death and resurrection. John, on the other hand, has organized his telling of the story of Jesus in a different manner, with Jesus traveling numerous times between Galilee and Judea, due to His attendance at various Jewish festivals. While one organizational pattern is not better than the other, the similarities between the patterns of Matthew, Mark, and Luke are easily noted in a comparison of these Gospels. This common approach to telling the story of Jesus is highlighted especially by the relationship between Matthew and Mark. Of Mark's 661 verses (1:1-16:8), Matthew provides 606 of these in either exact or similar form. In other words, Matthew includes virtually all of Mark within his Gospel. And Luke, who included 320 verses that parallel Mark, is likewise closely related. Between Matthew and Luke, another 250 verses are paralleled that are not found in Mark. In some of these instances, the exact same wording is found in different Gospels, and not simply in the words of Jesus but also in the manner in which the narratives are told. See Luke, Gospel of; Mark, Gospel of; and Matthew, Gospel of.

So many indications of a literary relationship exist that scholars usually assume one or more common written sources were shared among these three Gospels. Various attempts have been generated to explain the nature of this literary relationship. Some scholars posit that Mark used both Matthew and Luke for his composition. But the vast majority of scholars hold that Mark wrote his Gospel first, with Matthew and Luke using Mark as one of their sources. The grammar of Matthew and Luke is generally in the direction of improving on Mark's, not the other way around. This pattern would indicate that Mark was prior to Matthew and Luke, since it would be unlikely that Mark would fail to copy the more sophisticated and often less coarse language of the other two. Mark's lack of inclusion of marvelous teachings from Jesus in Matthew and Luke, such as the Sermon on the Mount/Plain and the parables of Luke 15 would be incomprehensible if Mark had, indeed, used a copy of the others when writing. Mark seems to have written first, without the benefit of the Greek editions of Matthew and Luke that we know as our Gospels. Then, sometime after Mark had written, Matthew and Luke used Mark as an aid in their own writing.

On the other hand, Matthew and Luke also had a common source, which may have been an early form of Matthew (perhaps written in Aramaic), or a separate document, or documents, containing many teachings and sayings of Jesus. This common source material for Matthew and Luke is often designated as Q (Quelle), which is the word for "source" in German. Of course, Luke indicates that he knew of others who had sought to tell the gospel story and that he himself investigated the sources when writing his Gospel (Luke 1:1-4). So the fact that Matthew may have done the same and used several sources is not at all surprising. Since Mark was not an eyewitness, he would also have used various sources, with the preaching of Peter being a primary one according to the early church. The telling of the gospel story was such an important undertaking that the writers likely used as many reliable sources as they could access.

While all three of these Gospels have much in common and approach the telling of the story of Jesus from the same general organizational scheme, each one presents a unique vision of Jesus and the implications of discipleship. Each writer wrote to different groups, located in differing historical places and settings. So the common traits of these three Gospels should not be taken as indicating that they have only one viewpoint to present rather than three. In viewing these three Gospels side-by-side, the differences among the three can highlight the richness of the distinct emphases that each is making. Matthew, Mark, and Luke complement each other in their communication of the gospel story by means of their commonalities, even while presenting the message with a depth seen only by looking at each of them separately. GOUGING THE EYES Cruel and degrading punishment sometimes inflicted on conquered peoples in biblical times. The Philistines put out Samson's eyes (Judg. 16:21). Nahash offered to make peace with the people of Gilead on the condition that he put out the right eye of every man in the city and thus bring disgrace upon all Israel (1 Sam. 11:2). After executing King Zedekiah's sons in his sight, the Babylonians put out his eyes (2 Kings 25:7). Scripture records such events as cruelty, not as examples to follow.

GOURD Inedible fruit with a hard rind of the genera Lagenaria or Cucurbita. Gourd motifs were used in the ornamentation of the interior of the temple (1 Kings 6:18 NASB; KJV, knops) and of the rim of the bronze sea (1 Kings 7:24). The gourd of Jon. 4:6-10 cannot be identified precisely. The KJV followed the earliest Greek translation with its rendering of gourd. The Vulgate or early Latin translation understood the plant as ivy. Many modern translations simply refer to a plant (NASB, RSV, TEV) or bush (NRSV). The NIV renders the term “vine”; REB, “climbing gourd.” Many interpreters think a castor oil plant [Ricinus communis] is meant.

GOVERNMENT Defined in two general ways, either in terms of the officials or the institutions. In reference to officials, government refers to the sovereign authority over a body of people. In reference to institutions, government refers to the customs, mores, laws, and organizations of a people.

Many standard definitions of civilization include the presence of a strong centralized government as a constitutive element. The rise of the first empires at the beginning of the early Bronze Age is related in part to the rise of centralized governments. Centralized government was necessary for the building and maintaining of canals used for irrigation in Mesopotamia. It was also necessary for the development of a standing army. Extensive international trade required more centralized governmental power over the economic institutions.

In understanding the biblical view of government, one must remember that biblical theology presents early Israel as a theocracy, having God as king and ruler (Judg. 8:22-23; 1 Sam. 8:7-9; Pss. 93-99; Rom. 13:1-4). Ultimate authority resides in God and God alone. Human government is, therefore, always limited and always intended to be within the framework of God's will. The best ruler will be the one who best carries out God's design for just rule.

Early Hebrew Patterns of Government An understanding of biblical patterns of government must begin with the patriarchal period. During this time the Hebrews had no centralized government. The major unit was the extended family or, on a larger basis, the tribe. The government was family based. The first unit of authority or government was the household or the father's house.

This unit of society corresponds best to our designation of the extended family and would often involve two or more generations living together. The oldest male was usually the head of the family, the patriarch. As such, he was the chief official of family and government. The next level of social organization was the clan, often designated by the OT as the family (Hb. mishpahah). The clan was composed of several related extended families. One individual might be designated as chief or head of each clan. The next larger social level was the tribe (Hb. shevet), composed of several clans. A tribe might have a chief or even a prince as its leader. Finally, a group of tribes could be known as a people (Hb. 'am). The tribe was the most frequent social unit mentioned apart from the household or extended family. We should not necessarily consider the tribe to be overly large but more as rather small and isolated groups, especially before Saul and David. See Family.

It has been argued recently that the tribal and clan structures were based not on kinship but on grouping for common defense. Thus, two or three villages banding together might form a clan, and a tribe would be formed by two or three of the clan units. This would be true for the period after the conquest of Canaan. Thus, many scholars would argue that in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5) the warriors are related to their tribal territories more than their tribes as a kinship group.

It is usually assumed that the patriarchal society was nomadic or semi-nomadic. Following the pattern of modern nomadic tribes with a patriarchal organization, the Hebrew society was probably democratic. Tribal decisions would be made on the basis of discussion by all the adult men. Not all men had equal authority. The elders held a major source of authority during this period and later periods as well.

The elders for a clan were probably the heads of the households that made up the clan. For a tribe the elders would have been all the household heads or selected elders from each clan. Thus, the elders were the leaders of the local community. They had the responsibility to decide many of the everyday matters, religious and judicial. The elders were representatives of the community as a whole in religious and military matters. They often accompanied the leader. The elders could conclude a covenant (2 Sam. 5:3) or treaty on behalf of the people. The elders regularly dispensed justice at the city gate (Deut. 21:19). The elders continued to function well into the period of the monarchy as a governing body. See Elder.

Beginning with the exodus, the OT presents Israel as a people composed of numerous tribes but with one leader. Joshua, who was succeeded in turn by the judges, succeeded Moses as leader. Although the depiction indicates a central leader, there is no indication of a centralized government. Granted, the leader had great authority, but the leader was not surrounded by the structure of a centralized government. A confederation of tribes was in existence during this period. In addition to the elder, Israel also had, following the period of Moses and Joshua, the office of judge. The judge was not primarily a judicial official but rather a charismatic military leader. Typically, the judge would rally the forces of Israel and defeat an oppressing power. From the time of Moses, the office of judge had included the element of deciding cases (Deut. 1:16; 16:18-20; 17:8-9). Much more frequently the emphasis was upon the military prowess of the judge (Judg. 3:7-30). The book of 1 Samuel brings a change in the emphasis of the judge. The judge became a priestly official, as in the case of Eli and Samuel. Thus the term “judge” seems to have a broader meaning than just a judicial term. Certainly the judge seems to have been the chief official of the confederacy of tribes in that period prior to the monarchy. It may be that the term was not specific as to the type of leader—priestly, military, or judicial—but simply indicated the leader. Although there were some cases where one judge attempted to have his sons succeed him (as did both Eli and Samuel), the office was not regularly hereditary (cp. the problems of Abimelech; Judg. 8:22-9:56). In this respect particularly, the office of judge differed from that of king that came later.

Although the period of judges may have led to the development of the monarchy, the two are quite different. The judge still retained a tribal character. Although several tribes might join together to fight a common enemy under the leadership of a judge, judgeship carried no sense of the permanence, hereditary character, or royal court of the monarchy. The judge was just an extension of the tribal chief or leader carried to a somewhat larger realm of a leader for several combined tribes. In actual function, the judge seldom played a strong role in maintaining the people's religious traditions until Samuel (Judg. 2:10; 17:6; 21:25).

Government during the Monarchy With the rise of the monarchy, a totally new organizational pattern emerged. Not only did the king stand as a single ruler for all the people, as a sort of chief raised to a national level, but the king was also surrounded by a new structure. The king had his royal court to carry out his mandate. Alongside the older tribal and town leaders, the king had a new cadre of officials. His officials included military officers and a professional army alongside the old militia from the tribes. The nation was divided into administrative districts with administrators who stood alongside the old system of elders. A royal court and professional army required revenue, so a taxation system was developed with its attendant officials. Evidence for this taxation system is found in the Samaria ostraca, which record the receipt of taxes paid from various estates to the government. Similarly, the lamelek jar handles (which bear an inscription literally meaning “for the king”) indicate either taxation or produce of royal farms. Building projects required massive labor, and so the corvée or forced-labor contingents were organized. The old system of local government based on the city and the elder still existed, but a burgeoning bureaucracy developed parallel to the old system. The government also entered the international arena at this time, conducting warfare against international as well as local nations. It would negotiate treaties and alliances, trade and commercial agreements, and even arrange royal marriages. Surrounding the royal court were such officials as “the one who is over the house,” a sort of secretary of state or prime minister; the recorder who was a herald, press secretary, and chief of protocol combined; the chief scribe; counselors; priests; and prophets (1 Kings 4). In addition, many attendants would minister to the king. The king embodied the rule of the entire nation. As he and his officials were just and faithful in ruling, the nation prospered. As he and the officials were unjust, the nation suffered. Likewise, the unjust actions of lesser officials ultimately were the responsibility of the king. Thus the prophets accused the king of his actions and of the actions of those under him.

Government under the Foreign Empires If the shift to a monarchy was the most revolutionary change in Israel's government, the collapse of the monarchy then marked the second most significant change. Self-government and independence were lost. In all likelihood this change was felt more on the national level than on the local level. The elders continued to function as local leaders, but the royal officials were replaced by new imperial and military officials of the conquering power—first Assyria, then successively, Babylon, Persia, and Hellenistic and Roman states. Now the tax revenues went to the treasury of that foreign state, and a new legal system had to be obeyed alongside the Hebrew law. This is seen especially in the trial of Jesus that involved hearings before the religious court (at that time the highest Jewish court) and before the Roman authorities. The chief ruler became a local governor appointed by the foreign power, as was Nehemiah, or even a foreigner, as were the Roman procurators. When local kings were allowed to rule, it was only at the pleasure of the foreign power and under the watchful eye of foreign military.

Beginning with the postexilic period, Jewish government fell more and more into priestly hands. The monarchy had ceased. The restructuring of society prevented too much power in political hands. The priesthood was strengthened and gradually assumed more and more of the judicial authority. Even the elders came to have an especially religious role as judicial officers. "Law" became virtually synonymous with the religious covenant, so that obeying the law meant keeping God's covenant. This affected every area of life. Such an arrangement was not necessarily new; it relates to the idea of God as king. The manner in which power was concentrated entirely in the sacred realm, as opposed to the secular, was new to the Postexilic and later periods. Since political power was not possible for the most part, power was consolidated where it could still be exercised, in the religious area. Religion was simply expanded to cover all of life.

In the NT we find Judea governed by a Herodian king appointed by the Roman government. Later direct Roman rule replaced the king. Religious authority still existed. The high priest and the priesthood exercised considerable authority, though it remained in name "religious" authority. The elders belonged to a formal body, the Sanhedrin, as also did certain priests. Just as in the case of the monarchy, two structures of authority existed side by side. Civil government now belonged basically to the foreign overlord, but religious power rested in the hands of the priests and Sanhedrin.

GOVERNOR Generally an appointed civil official charged with the oversight of a designated territory.

The KJV uses “governor” to translate a variety of Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek terms. These terms represent a wide range of meanings that encompass almost every form of leadership or oversight. For example “governor” is used of city and tribal leaders (Judg. 5:9; 1 Kings 22:26), rulers (Ps. 22:28), temple officials (Jer. 20:1), managers of households (John 2:8; Gal. 4:2), and even pilots of ships (James 3:4). Recent versions of the Bible have translated the words more specifically with terms like “ruler,” “leader,” “prince,” “commander,” “officer,” “representative,” “prefect,” “chief servant,” “steward,” and “pilot” (HCSB). This has allowed “governor” to be used to describe those officials serving as regional administrators over assigned territories or projects. Generally the governor exercised both law enforcement and judicial functions as a representative of his superior.

Old Testament The most widely used term for governor in the OT is the Akkadian loan-word pechah. This word occurs in Ezra and Nehemiah as a title for Tattenai (KJV, Tatnai), the Persian administrator of the province Trans-Euphrates or “Beyond the River” (Ezra 5:3). Tattenai's response to Darius's decree (Ezra 6:13) is indicative of the governor's allegiance to the king.

The title also is used of Sheshbazzar (Ezra 5:14) to describe his appointment as “governor of the Jews” (Ezra 6:7). Cyrus had commissioned him to rebuild the temple in Jerusalem at the end of the Babylonian exile. Nehemiah described his appointment by Artaxerxes I as “governor in the land of Judah” (Neh. 5:14). The prophet Haggai addressed his message to Zerubbabel, identifying him as “governor of Judah” (Hag. 1:1). Pechah is used of other leaders in the OT as well (2 Kings 18:24; 1 Kings 20:24; Isa. 36:9).

New Testament The Greek word hegemon and its derivatives predominate in the NT occurrences of “governor.” The term often is used to describe Roman officials who exercised the tax and military authority of the emperor. Quirinius (Luke 2:2), Pontius Pilate (Luke 3:1; Matt. 27:2), Felix (Acts 23:24), and Porcius Festus (Acts 24:27) are specifically named. Joseph's rule in Egypt also is classified as that of a governor (Acts 7:10).

Because governors are sent by the king “to punish those who do evil and to praise those who do good” (1 Pet. 2:13-14 HCSB), believers are to submit to their authority. Sent out by Christ, however, Christians will be brought before governors and kings for judgment. Faithfulness in such situations will bear witness for His sake (Matt. 10:18).

GOZAN ■ Place-name of uncertain meaning, possibly, “quarry.” A Syrian city-state to which the Assyrians exiled many of the people from Israel after they defeated Israel in 732 (1 Chron. 5:26) and 722 (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11). Assyria had previously conquered Gozan (2 Kings 19:12). Gozan is probably located at modern Tel Halaf in northwestern Mesopotamia on the southern bank of the River Khabur. Archaeology shows the city was built after 1000 B.C., though some Stone Age habitation is evidenced. The city included 150 acres with temples and government buildings. Excavators found documents with apparently Hebrew names, perhaps people deported by Assyria.

GRACE Undeserved acceptance and love received from another. Although the biblical words for “grace” are used in a variety of ways, the most characteristic use is to refer to an undeserved favor granted by a superior to an inferior. When used of divine grace toward mankind, it refers to the undeserved favor of God in providing salvation for those deserving condemnation. In the more specific Christian sense it speaks of the saving activity of God which is manifested in the gift of His Son to die in the place of sinners. Old Testament In the OT “grace” is the translation of the Hebrew noun chen and the verb chanan. The verb chanan occurs some 56 times and is translated in the KJV as “be favorable or merciful.” It refers to the kind turning of either God or humans to persons in an act of assistance in time of need (Prov. 14:3; Ps. 4:1). The noun chen occurs 69 times throughout a wide range of OT literature and is usually translated with one of two English words, “grace” or “favor,” without any apparent difference in the two. It appears most often in the idiom, “find grace or favor in someone's eyes or sight” (cp. Gen. 19:19; 32:5; 33:8; 34:11; 47:25). The person from whom grace is sought is almost without exception in a position of superiority or authority over the person seeking the favor. There is no obligation of the superior to show this grace. It is totally dependent on his generosity. The most frequent use of the term in the OT is to refer to human persons seeking or obtaining favor from another human: Joseph from Potiphar (Gen. 39:4), Joseph's brothers from Joseph (Gen. 47:25), Ruth from Boaz (Ruth 2:10), David from Saul (1 Sam. 20:12,28), Joab from David (2 Sam 14:22).

If not the most frequent, the most significant use of “grace” in the OT is to express a divine/ human relationship. Because the Hebrew word expresses an undeserved favor at the hands of a superior, God is never said to seek or obtain “favor in the eyes” of any of His creatures. There are, on the other hand, examples of humans seeking or receiving favor in the eyes of the Lord: Noah (Gen. 6:8), Moses (Gen. 33:12), Gideon (Judg. 6:17), Samuel (1 Sam. 2:26), the exilic remnant (Ezra 9:8; Jer. 31:2). In these examples “grace” denotes mostly God's undeserved gift in election. It is an expression of His sovereign love (Exod. 33:19). Furthermore “grace” forms the basis of all of God's relationship with man and His activity in behalf of man. Grace delivered Noah and his family from the flood (Gen. 6:8) and Lot from the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:19). Grace gave Moses a personal knowledge of God and His ways (Exod. 33:12-13), assured him of God's presence with Israel and forgiveness of their sin (Exod. 33:17; 34:9), and caused him to see the glory of God (Exod. 34:18-23). It was grace that chose Israel for God's inheritance (Exod. 33:16) and preserved the remnant from captivity (Ezra 9:8). It was grace that chose David for kingship (1 Sam. 16:22) and, after a successful rebellion against him, restored him to his throne (2 Sam. 15:25). It is grace that will cause Israel one day to recognize the Messiah (Zech. 12:10). Grace brings mercy (Num. 11:15; Isa. 60:10), and the withholding of it brings judgment (Josh. 11:20).

New Testament The NT word for “grace” is the Greek charis. It is used approximately 150 times in the NT. The word had a long history in secular Greek before NT times. Originally it referred to something delightful or beautiful in a person, thing, or act which brought pleasure to others. From this came the idea of a favor or gift that brought pleasure to another. From the recipient's standpoint it came to mean “thanks” or “thankfulness.” Finally, it came to be used in an ethical sense of a favor done freely without any claim or expectation of something in return. When the OT was translated into Greek, charis was used to translate the Hebrew chen and thus in biblical Greek came to be associated with an objective relation of undeserved favor given by a superior to an inferior. This objective relation of undeserved favor given by God to man forms the background of the distinctively Christian meaning of grace in the NT.

Charis rarely appears in the Gospels. It is totally absent in Matthew and Mark. Luke uses the term eight times, four of which are uses by Jesus, but only in the ordinary sense of “thanks” (Luke 6:32-34; 17:9). Three of the remaining four occurrences are in the OT sense of “favor” (Luke 1:30; 2:40,52). In one reference Luke describes Jesus' words as “words of grace,” which may have the secular meaning of “beautiful” or “attractive,” but may also refer to the content of His message, which would make it synonymous with the gospel. In John's Gospel it appears four times, all in the prologue (1:14,16-17). It is used to describe Christ in His incarnation (v. 14), and as something that those who believe on Him receive as contrasted with the law (vv. 16-17). John's unusual expression, “grace for grace,” has the idea of the continuance and inexhaustible supply of God's grace to believers. It is never interrupted and knows no bounds.

In Acts charis is used in three senses. The most frequent use is to refer to a power that flows from God or the exalted Christ. It gave the apostles success in their mission (4:33; 11:23; 13:43; 14:26), power to unbelievers to believe (18:27), and power to build up believers (20:32). It is used in the sense of human favor, and as such it is usually translated as “favor” or “pleasure” (2:47; 7:10, 46; 24:27; 25:3,9). The rarest, but most theologically significant, use is to refer to God's method of salvation in opposition to the legalism of the Judaizers. It is by “the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ” that both Jews and Gentiles are saved (15:11). The specific reference to the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ rather than to the more general “grace of God” indicates that Peter and the Jewish Christians viewed the saving grace of God as being manifested in the redemptive work of Christ.

Of the approximately 150 occurrences of charis in the NT, the great majority appear in the Pauline letters with a wide range of meanings. There are times when Paul employed it with its more secular meaning of a gift or act that brings pleasure to the recipient. His visit to Corinth was a charis (2 Cor. 1:15; KJV, “benefit”). The collection for the Jerusalem saints is called charis and was motivated by charis (1 Cor. 16:3; 2 Cor. 8:1,4,6-7,19). Often he used charis simply to mean thanks (1 Cor. 10:30; Col. 3:16), frequently employing the set expression “thanks (charis) be to God” (Rom. 6:17; 7:25; 1 Cor. 15:57; 2 Cor. 2:14; 8:16; 9:15; 1 Tim. 1:12; 2 Tim. 1:3).

Paul's most frequent and theologically significant use of charis is to refer to the grace of God. Twenty-five times he uses the expressions “grace of God” or “grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.” There is no intended difference in the expressions. On one occasion he combines the terms with the expression “the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ” (2 Thess. 1:12 HCSB). Commonly he refers to “His grace” which has either God or Christ as its antecedent. For Paul the grace of God is not so much a timeless attribute as an activity of God. It is the redeeming activity of God that manifests itself in the redemptive work of Christ by which sinners are forgiven and accepted by God. In Paul's thought the grace of God is necessary because of man's total inability to do anything to save himself and because of man's unworthiness to be saved. Paul's use of grace to refer to the undeserved nature of God's salvation was particularly illustrated by his own experience. His former life as a persecutor of Christians caused him to have a profound sense of his own unworthiness. It was only because of the grace of God that Christ appeared to him, changed him, and appointed him to be an apostle (1 Cor. 15:9-10; 1 Tim. 1:12-14).

So pervasive was Paul's sense of grace that he refers to it at the beginning and end of every one of his letters. For him the Christian life is summed up in the grace of God. Salvation from beginning to the end is all of grace. There can be no mixture of grace and works, or else it would not be grace (Rom. 11:6-7). Grace is synonymous with the gospel of Christ and to depart from it is to turn to a false gospel (Gal. 1:6). It was the grace of God that planned salvation for sinners in eternity past before the foundation of the world (Eph. 1:4; 2 Tim. 1:9). It was grace that provided salvation in the historical death of Christ (Rom. 3:24). It is grace that enables one to appropriate salvation, for it calls one to salvation, reveals Christ, and even gives the faith which is the condition of salvation (Gal. 1:6,15; Eph. 2:8-9; Phil. 1:29). It is the grace of God that calls and equips one for service in the Christian life (Rom. 15:15-16; 1 Cor. 3:10). Very much like Luke in Acts, Paul speaks of the grace of God as a power, almost as a person. The grace of God was something that was with him, produced labor, humility, godliness, and sustained him in times of difficulty (1 Cor. 15:10; 2 Cor. 1:12; 12:7-10). Everything, therefore, from first to last is of grace.

In the General Epistles and Revelation charis appears 24 times, most of these being found in Hebrews and 1 Peter. It has all the range of meanings found in Paul, the Gospels, and Acts. In Hebrews, grace is related to the atoning death of Christ (2:9). It is grace that allows us to come to God boldly for “help in time of need” (4:16). It is grace that strengthens the heart of the believer by which he is equipped with everything good to do the will of God (13:5). It is used in the secular sense of “thanksgiving” or “gratitude” in Heb. 12:28. In James, grace is used to refer to a power given to the humble to resist the devil and avoid spiritual adultery (4:6-7). In the Petrine letters grace has its source in God (1 Pet. 5:10) and has a manifold nature (1 Pet. 4:10). Peter equates grace with salvation and, like Paul, sees salvation as grace from first to last. It was prophesied by the prophets, accomplished by the sufferings of Christ, applied to people by a sovereign calling (1 Pet. 1:10-11; 5:10), and equips believers to serve (1 Pet. 4:10-11). All believers stand in a grace relationship with God, both men and women (1 Pet. 5:12; 3:7). The way to avoid being led astray by Satan into unfaithfulness is to “grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ” (2 Pet. 3:18). Charis is absent in 1 and 2 John and is found only in the closing verses of Revelation. However, the NT very appropriately closes with a benediction of grace (Rev. 22:21). See Justification; Love; Mercy.

GRAFT To unite a scion (the detached, living portion of a plant that provides the leafy portion of a graft) with a stock (the part of the graft providing the roots). Olives were frequently caused to multiply by removing shoots from the base of a cultivated tree (cp. Ps. 128:3) and grafting them onto the trunks of wild olive trees. Paul's illustration (Rom. 11:17-24) portrays the incomprehensible grace of God who does what no farmer would do—break off cultivated limbs (representing descendants of Israel) to graft in wild limbs (representing Gentile believers). The illustration also serves as a warning to believing Gentiles not to be proud and despise the contribution of Israelites who made their faith possible but to stand firm in faith.

GRAIN General term for the edible seed of cultivated grasses. Common grains in the biblical world included wheat (Gen. 30:14), spelt or emmer (REB vetches) (Exod. 9:32), barley (Exod. 9:31), and millet (Ezek. 4:9). The KJV normally renders grain as corn, which does not mean “maize” (as in American usage), but any grain. See Plants.

GRANARY Storage facility for threshed and winnowed grain. Archeological evidence indicates that granaries varied in size and format. Granary might refer simply to jars or bags of grain (Gen. 42:25), to plastered or unplastered pits, to silos (perhaps Luke 12:18), or even to large structures with numerous rooms (Hezekiah's storehouse, 2 Chron. 32:28, or those used by Joseph to store large amounts of grain, Gen. 41:49). Empty granaries was a sign of God's displeasure (Jer. 50:26; Joel 1:17). Gathering of grain into granaries was a picture of God's gathering of the righteous (Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17). See Garner.

GRASS Herbage suitable for consumption by grazing animals (Job 6:5). English translations use “grass” to translate at least five Hebrew words. 1. Deine' appears to be a comprehensive term for things that sprout and turn green (Gen. 1:11), being translated grass (KJV), vegetation (NASB, NRSV, NIV), all kinds of plants (TEV), or growing things (REB). With rain it forms green pastures (Ps. 23:2; cp. Isa. 66:14; 2 Kings 19:26). 2. Dethe', the Aramaic equivalent of deshe', depicts the vegetation to be grazed in the field (Dan. 4:15,23). 3. Yereq refers to pale yellow, green, or gold plants: the green herbs animals eat (Gen. 1:30; 9:3; Num. 22:4); the green sprouts of trees (Exod. 10:15); God's judgment destroys the green things (Isa. 15:6). Yereq can modify deshe' to emphasize the green color (2 Kings 19:26; Ps. 37:2; Isa. 37:2). The related term yaraq describes garden vegetables (Deut. 11:10; 1 Kings 21:2; Prov. 15:17). 4. Eseb are the annuals the early rains bring forth (Gen. 1:11,29) as contrasted with the perennials; thus they are the herbs of the field (Gen. 1:30; 2:5; 9:3). Humans depend on God to make grass grow (Ps. 104:14; Mic. 5:7; Zech. 10:1). Grass illustrates the brevity of human life (Ps. 102:4,11) but also the rich, flourishing growth (Pss. 72:16; 92:7) and the king's enriching favor (Prov. 19:12). 5. Chatsir is a general term for wild grass growing on roofs (2 Kings 19:26), mountains (Ps. 147:8), and even hanging on by watering places during drought (1 Kings 18:5). Humans in their mortality can be compared to grass in contrast to God's word (Isa. 40:6-8; cp. 51:12; Pss. 90:5; 103:15). The lily (Matt. 6:28) is later referred to as grass (v. 30).

GRAVE Pit or cave in which a dead body is buried. The variety of grave sites used by the Hebrews was determined by several factors: the circumstances of death, the surrounding terrain, and the time available for preparation and burial. The most usual grave was the shaft or trench. While the use of pits for collective burial sites is not mentioned in the Bible, several have been excavated in Palestine. Caves were often chosen as a convenient alternative to the cost and time involved in cutting a rock tomb. Because they offered both an abundance of caves and ideal locations for constructing rock hewn shafts, Palestinian hillsides were a common choice for grave sites.

The tomb cut out of rock was sometimes fashioned to serve as a multiple grave with separate chambers. Ledges were often constructed to hold individual family members; and when the tomb was full, the bones from previous burials were set aside to make more room. The bones were placed in jars or stone boxes called “ossuaries,” which resembled vessels used by the Romans to store ashes after cremation. Ossuaries sometimes held the bones of more than one person and were frequently marked with decorative or identifying designs. The entrances to tombs were secured either by hinged doorways or large flat stones that could be moved by rolling.

The most desirable grave site was the family tomb to which ample reference is made in the patriarchal narratives of Genesis. The Hebrews apparently envisioned a “shade” existence in death and preferred proximity to ancestors over solitude for the placement of their loved ones' remains.

A Roman grave at Pompeii. These were tombs with niches for jars containing cremated remains.

While most graves were left unmarked, some were marked with trees (Gen. 35:8) or stone pillars. Second Samuel 18:18 anticipates the use of pillars, but this practice was never widespread in biblical times. The graves of the infamous dead were often marked with a pile of stones (Achan, Josh. 7:26; Absalom, 2 Sam. 18:17; the king of Ai and the five Canaanite kings, Josh. 8:29; 10:27). In NT times graves were whitewashed each spring so people could see them easily and avoid touching them to prevent ritual defilement during the Passover and Pentecost pilgrimages (Matt. 23:27; cp. Luke 11:44).

Coffins were generally not used in ancient Palestine. The body was placed on a simple bier and transported to the grave site. While Canaanites often placed containers of food and water in their tombs, the Israelites largely avoided this custom.

In Hebrew thought, graves were not simply places to deposit human remains. They were in a sense extensions of Sheol, the place of the dead. Since the realm of Sheol was threatening and since each grave was an individual expression of Sheol, the Israelites avoided burial sites when possible and treated them with circumspection. They performed purification rites when contact was unavoidable. See Death; Eternal Life; Sheol.

GRECIAN Proper adjective referring to things or to people with origins in Greece. In the NT this refers to Jews who had adopted the Greek culture and language. They formed a significant part of the early church and created problems because of prejudice within the church (Acts 6:1; 9:29).

GREECE Located between the Italian Peninsula and Asia Minor, Greece itself is a peninsula with the Adriatic and Ionian Seas on the west and the Aegean Sea on the east. These seas, in turn, are a part of the larger Mediterranean Sea. Greece owes its rough terrain to the fact that it is the southern end of the central European mountain range. Another geographical feature is the numerous islands that lie in close proximity to the Greek mainland. The southernmost area, the Peloponnesus, is itself virtually an island, connected to the mainland by only a narrow neck of land known as the Isthmus of Corinth.

Its mountainous nature has played an important role in the development of the country. First of all, it has an unusually long shoreline for such a small area, resulting from the fact that there are numerous bays and inlets, giving it many natural harbors. Since its mountains were heavily forested in earlier times, shipbuilding and the sea trade developed. Secondly, the rough terrain discouraged a sense of unity among its people since communication between them was not easy. Finally, the land for agriculture, while fertile, was limited so that what was produced could not sustain a large population. Small grains, grapes, and olives were the main agricultural products while the mountains provided pastures for sheep and goats.

Historical Developments About the time of the great prophets in Israel (after 800 B.C.), city-states began to develop in Greece. The limited food supplies had forced Greeks to leave the homeland. As a result, colonies were established on the Mediterranean islands, Asia Minor, Sicily, Italy, and in the Black Sea area. Colonies provided the basis for trade, and trade, in turn, encouraged the growth of cities since the economy was not tied to agriculture.

Terracotta of woman with Grecian dress and hairstyle, dating from the second to first century B. c.

The high-water mark for the city-states was 500-404 B.C. The dominant city-states of the period were Athens and Sparta. About 500-475 B.C. Athens beat off a threat from the Persians. There followed what is known as the Golden Age of Athens. Under its great leader Pericles, art, architecture, and drama flourished. Peloponnesian city-states feared the power of Athens, however, and united under the leadership of Sparta to war against Athens. The defeat of Athens in 404 B.C. began a period of decline for the city-states.

About 350 B.C. Philip II came to the throne of Macedonia, a territory in what is now largely northern Greece. In the years that followed, Philip brought the entire Greek peninsula under his control, only to be assassinated in 336 B.C. He was succeeded by his 20-year-old son, Alexander, whose schoolmaster had been the great philosopher, Aristotle.

Alexander was one of the most outstanding military and organizational geniuses of human history. By the time of his death in 323 B.C., he had conquered an empire that spanned the Middle East from Greece to the western reaches of India, as well as Syria-Palestine and Egypt. Wherever he went, he left colonies that became dispensers of Greek language and culture, known as Hellenism. When the Romans took over much of this territory two centuries later, they imposed their legal and military system. They, in turn, were conquered by Greek culture. Thus we speak of the Greco-Roman culture. When Christianity arose, it had Greek, which many linguists call the most flexible language ever devised, as a vehicle to spread its concepts. Christian theologians in later centuries would wed Christian concepts with Greek philosophical methods and ideas to develop Christian theology.

Greece and the Bible Very few references to Greece appear in the OT with most of them being found in the book of Daniel (Dan. 8:21; 10:20; 11:2; Zech. 9:13). This is not true of the NT, however, especially in regard to Paul's ministry. Some of his most fruitful work was done in Greek cities. Philippi, in Macedonia, was the first church founded by Paul on European soil (Acts 16). It would become Paul's special favorite among his churches and would be the recipient of his most intimate and loving letter, which was to the Philippians. In the district of Thessaly, Paul founded two churches, Thessalonica and Berea (Acts 17:1-14). The Thessalonians also would be the recipients of Pauline letters, two of which are in the NT (1 and 2 Thess.). Just as Paul had problems while at Thessalonica (Acts 17:1-9), so he had problems explaining to the church about the return of the Lord.

The Erechtheum with the Porch of the Maidens on the Acropolis of ancient Athens in Greece.

Bible students have long debated about Paul's success or lack of it at Athens (Acts 17:16-33). While the worship of the Greek gods had declined, Paul's experience in the marketplace at Athens shows that it was not entirely dead. It was, however, the sense of the failure of the older religions that led to the rapid acceptance of the Christian religion throughout the Roman Empire. Paul, however, did not win a large number of converts at Athens, but he did win some.

No city received more attention or provoked more correspondence from Paul than Corinth. Located on the narrow isthmus that connects the Peloponnesus to the rest of Greece, Corinth was a brawling, sinful seaport town, the crossroads of the Mediterranean (Acts 18:1-17). Here Paul met two people who would be among his most valuable helpers, Priscilla and Aquila. He would be brought to trial; he would establish one of his most troublesome and controversial churches, and later he would write at least four letters to that church. Two survived to become a part of the NT.

Relief of the myth of Telephus, son of Hercules, and his encounter with Achilles, who inflicted a wound that would not heal.

The Greek influence on the NT and Christianity is immeasurable. Koine, the Greek of the streets, is the language of the NT. At least five NT books are written to churches in Greek cities (Phil., 1 and 2 Thess., 1 and 2 Cor.). All the other books in the NT are written in the Greek language. As the Christian gospel moved out into the Mediterranean world, it had to communicate its values to people who were steeped in Greek culture and religion. Both gained from the relationship with people being transformed by the gospel and Christianity gaining a vehicle for its spread.

GREED Excessive or reprehensible desire to acquire; covetousness. The greed of Eli's sons for the best part of the sacrifices disqualified them from the priesthood (1 Sam. 2:29). Hosea condemned priests who were greedy for the people's iniquity (4:8 NRSV), that is, greedy for the sin offerings.

Jesus warned against all types of greed (Luke 12:15; KJV, covetousness). The Pauline standard for Christian ministry gave no pretext for greed (1 Thess. 2:5; 1 Tim 3:3,8). Greed marked the Gentile or pagan way of life (Eph. 4:19).

GREEK LANGUAGE Greek was spoken broadly across the Roman Empire. Alexander the Great (336-323 B.C.) conquered the known world and stimulated the spread of Greek culture, including the Greek language. This Hellenization established many characteristics of the Western world. Early Greek independent city states established individual dialects of Greek (Attic, Ionic, Doric). As a result of the conquests of Alexander, however, these dialects mixed together into a common tongue, a “Hellenistic Greek,” that has come to be called “Koine.” This was the common language understood almost anywhere. Historically this language stream flows into Byzantine Greek and then on into modern Greek.

Hellenistic Greek is a better term than Koine to describe the Greek of the first century. Hellenistic Greek represents a multilevel spectrum of Greek. The bottom level was Koine Greek. Koine was the Greek of the street, that is, colloquial daily speech.

A second level was less casual than Koine and more sophisticated. This was the Greek used to publish popular philosophy, such as the writings of Epictetus, and also standard business and legal materials.

A third level was even more formal. This level is an educated, literary Greek much less available to the general person, since only about 20 percent of the population was literate. Elite social classes used this level of Greek.

The fourth level, called Classical Greek, predated Alexander and was the Greek of ancient writers such as Homer. This style was not used in Jesus' day but was imitated. Some Greco-Roman writers of Jesus' day attempted to use Classical Greek. This imitating style is called Atticizing Greek. In normal speech few ever spoke that way.

All of the NT was written in Greek. This itself is an indication of how thoroughly hellenized was the world into which Jesus and his disciples preached. The Greek of the NT overall is like level two, the level of business and popular philosophy. New Testament Greek is generally better than simple Koine Greek but not as good as literary Greek. Some documents, of course, do show a literary flair, such as Hebrews, James, 1 Peter, and elements of Luke-Acts.

New Testament Greek is distinguished from Hellenistic Greek by several factors. One factor is its specialized religious subject matter, which involves a specialized vocabulary and ideas. Further, the distinctive nature of Jewish religion, which is the basic historical context for the Christian faith, is apparent against the broad sweep of other ancient religions. Fundamental monotheism, the Jewish way of life, and other religious elements set apart the Jews from the world around them.

Greek inscription on a sarcophagus at Thyatira containing the word “Thyatira” and verifying the site's identity.

Another factor distinguishing NT Greek in general is the broad use by NT writers of the Greek OT translation, the Septuagint. The Septuagint was necessary for Greek-speaking Jews to read the Scriptures. When many NT writers quoted Scripture, they used the Septuagint. The Septuagint established a Greek style of its own idiom in expressing Hebrew religious thought. This Septuagint language and style sometimes impacted how NT writers expressed themselves.

A third factor is the use of Aramaic, a variant of Hebrew, the mother tongue of Jews in Palestine in the first century. We have some evidence that Jews possibly were trilingual, speaking to lesser or greater degree some form of Greek, Hebrew (Aramaic), and Latin. The inscription recording the accusation against Jesus was in these three languages (John 19:20).

During foreign control, Syria and Palestine had been combined into one political unit, and the language adopted was Aramaic. Jesus probably taught in Aramaic. Mark especially gives hint of this by preserving sayings of Jesus in Aramaic and then translating for his Greek readers (Mark 5:41). The NT documents were written directly in Greek. But a few peculiarities of NT Greek might be explained as the influence of an underlying Hebrew or Aramaic stratum (whether oral or written). These effects on NT Greek are called “Semitisms.”

Thus, while NT Greek in general is Hellenistic Greek of popular philosophy and commercial and legal writings, this Greek also has stylistic peculiarities traceable to the backgrounds of those writing. Unfortunately, the distinctions in Greek style among our NT documents is disguised or lost in translation.

Mark's Greek usually is described as the most Koine of our Gospels. Even so, Mark still has a vivid, direct style. An Aramaic stratum in Jesus' sayings comes more directly to the surface and more often in Mark.

Matthew's Greek is smoother and more cultivated than Mark. This Gospel is more like publication Greek of popular philosophy or commercial, legal documents. Semitisms, however, do show their effects in Matthew, as well as the influence of the Septuagint when Matthew quoted Scripture.

Of the Gospel writers, Luke uses the most cultured and educated Greek. Luke uses techniques of stylistic variety and more intelligent and sophisticated application of complex grammatical structures. Luke used sources (Luke 1:1-4) and was so careful with these sources that, in some cases, he even preserved or imitated the Greek style in them. For example, the prologue (1:1-4), which was Luke's own, is fine Greek of literary quality. On the other hand, the first two chapters about the early childhood of Jesus show a high level of Semitism, or even a Septuagintal style. This material probably represents some of the oldest data about Jesus directly from Palestine. One would expect such sources (whether oral or written) to be more Semitic. When Luke is on his own, such as the travel and narrative portions of Acts, he uses excellent Greek, tending to the literary level.

John's Greek is Koine and simple. The vocabulary is limited. The sentences are simple. John's style also is repetitive, so that translation is one of the easiest in the NT. At the same time, the thought-world of John is deeply theological and devotional. The Greek of the epistles of John is uniform and quite similar to the Gospel.

Paul's Greek is not characterized as educated, but he was a native Greek speaker, and his Greek is natural and forceful. Paul's emotional intensity is often obvious, and his letters were understood even by his opponents as a rhetorical tour de force (2 Cor. 10:10). He is capable of pun (Onesimus means “useful,” and several words in Philemon are composed with this in mind) and poetry (1 Cor. 13 and many other lyric passages).

The General Epistles contain documents that preserve some of the best Greek in the NT. Hebrews probably ranks highest of all. While the author's subject required use of Septuagint material, the Greek style is literary and impressive, educated, and philosophical. The immense vocabulary is challenging and the sentence structure complex.

James and 1 Peter both have impressive Greek style, tending to the literary level. On occasion, though, a Semitic influence surfaces in James particularly.

Both Jude and 2 Peter show an Atticizing effect. The Greek is labored and somewhat forced, not as natural and flowingly beautiful as in Hebrews.

The Greek of Revelation is Koine. The sentence structure is simple, and the vocabulary descriptive, some terms recurring over and over. A Semitizing effect is notable, as well as Septuagint influence. At the same time, the Greek of Revelation has various grammatical irregularities, unusual use and mixing of tenses, and other confusing elements. In some instances, rules of grammar are not followed. Various theories explaining the Greek of Revelation have not achieved any general consensus.

GREETING A salutation on meeting; an expression of good wishes at the opening (or in Hellenistic times, also the close) of a letter.

Among Semitic peoples the usual greeting was and is “peace”: “Peace be to you, and peace be to your house, and peace be to all that you have” (1 Sam. 25:5-6 NASB; cp. Luke 10:5). The usual Greek greeting on meeting is chairein, translated “hail” or “greeting” (Luke 1:28; Matt. 28:9). A kiss was frequently part of such greeting (Gen. 29:13; Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26; 1 Pet. 5:14). The command not to stop to exchange greetings (2 Kings 4:29; Luke 10:4) underlines the urgency of the commission given.

The opening greetings of ancient letters typically took the form: X (sender) to Y (addressee), greeting (Acts 15:23; 23:26; James 1:1). A letter addressed to a social superior took the form: To Y (addressee) from X (sender), greeting (Ezra 4:17). James is the only NT book to begin with the normal Greek greeting chairein.

Paul transformed the customary greeting chairein into an opportunity for sharing the faith, substituting “grace [charis] to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ” (Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3; 2 Cor. 1:2; Gal. 1:3; Eph. 1:2; Phil. 1:2; Titus 1:4). In Paul's opening greeting these terms always occur in this order, witnessing to the truth that peace cannot be experienced apart from the prior experience of God's grace.

The greetings of Hellenistic letters typically contained a prayer for the health of the recipients. Third John 2 provides the best NT example: “Dear friend, I pray that you may prosper in every way and be in good health, just as your soul prospers” (HCSB). Paul greatly expanded his opening prayers. Most of his letters begin with a prayer of thanksgiving, usually for the recipients. Ephesians begins with a benediction rather than a prayer of thanksgiving (1 Pet. 1:3-5; Rev. 1:4-6). In the Pauline corpus only Galatians lacks an opening prayer.

Hellenistic letters frequently included closing greetings. Most often these are “third person” greetings of the form X sends you greetings (by me) (1 Cor. 16:19-20; Col. 4:10-14) or send my greetings to Y (who is not directly addressed; Col. 4:15). Closing greetings often included a prayer or benediction. The simplest is “Grace be with you” (Col. 4:18; 1 Tim. 6:21; Titus 3:15; Heb. 13:25). Elsewhere the benediction is expanded (Rom. 16:25-27; 1 Cor. 16:23-24; Gal. 6:16; Eph. 6:23-24; Phil. 4:23). Some of the most familiar benedictions used in Christian worship come from such closing greetings: “The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit” (2 Cor. 13:13 HCSB); “Now may the God of peace, who brought up from the dead our Lord Jesus—the great Shepherd of the sheep—with the blood of the everlasting covenant, equip you with all that is good to do His will” (Heb. 13:20-21 HCSB); “Now to Him who is able to protect you from stumbling...to the only God our Savior” (Jude 24-25 HCSB).

GREYHOUND (KJV, Prov. 30:31). Modern translations read “strutting cock” or rooster.

GRIDDLE Flat surface on which food is cooked by dry heat (Lev. 2:5; 6:21; 7:9 modern translations; KJV, pan). In earlier days this would have been of stone. Later griddles were made of iron (Ezek. 4:3 where the same Hebrew word is often rendered “plate”).

GRIEF AND MOURNING Practices and emotions associated with the experience of the death of a loved one or of another catastrophe or tragedy. When death is mentioned in the Bible, frequently it relates to the experience of the bereaved, who always respond immediately, outwardly, and without reserve. So we are told of the mourning of Abraham for Sarah (Gen. 23:2). Jacob mourned for Joseph, thinking he was dead: “Then Jacob tore his clothes, put sackcloth around his waist, and mourned for his son many days. All his sons and daughters tried to comfort him, but he refused to be comforted. ‘No,’ he said. ‘I will go down to Sheol to my son, mourning.’ And his father wept for him” (Gen. 37:34-35 HCSB). The Egyptians mourned for Jacob 70 days (Gen. 50:3). Leaders were mourned, often for 30 days: Aaron (Num. 20:29), Moses (Deut. 34:8), and Samuel (1 Sam. 25:1). David led the people as they mourned Abner (2 Sam. 3:31-32).

Mary and Martha wept over their brother Lazarus (John 11:31). After Jesus watched Mary and her friends weeping, we are told, “Jesus wept” (John 11:35). Weeping was then, as now, the primary indication of grief. Tears are repeatedly mentioned (Pss. 42:3; 56:8). The loud lamentation (wail) was also a feature of mourning, as the prophet who cried, “Alas! My brother!” (1 Kings 13:30; cp. Exod. 12:30; Jer. 22:18; Mark 5:38).

Sometimes they tore either their inner or outer garment (Gen. 37:29,34; Job 1:20; 2:12). They might refrain from washing and other normal activities (2 Sam. 14:2), and they often put on sackcloth: “David then instructed...‘Tear your clothes, put on sackcloth, and mourn over Abner.’” (2 Sam. 3:31 HCSB; Isa. 22:12; Matt. 11:21). Sackcloth was a dark material made from camel or goat hair (Rev. 6:12) and used for making grain bags (Gen. 42:25). It might be worn instead of or perhaps under other garments tied around the waist outside the tunic (Gen. 37:34; Jon. 3:6) or in some cases sat or lain upon (2 Sam. 21:10). The women wore black or somber material: “Pretend to be in mourning: dress in mourning clothes, and don't anoint yourself with oil. Act like a woman who has been mourning for the dead for many years” (2 Sam. 14:2 HCSB). Mourners also covered their heads, “[David's] head was covered, and he was walking barefoot. All the people with him, without exception, covered their heads and went up, weeping as they ascended” (2 Sam. 15:30 HCSB). Mourners would typically sit barefoot on the ground with their hands on their heads (Mic. 1:8; 2 Sam. 12:20; 13:19; Ezek. 24:17) and smear their heads or bodies with dust or ashes (Josh. 7:6; Jer. 6:26; Lam. 2:10; Ezek. 27:30; Esther 4:1). They might even cut their hair, beard, or skin (Jer. 16:6; 41:5; Mic. 1:16), though disfiguring the body in this way was forbidden since it was a pagan practice (Lev. 19:27-28; 21:5; Deut. 14:1). Fasting was sometimes involved, usually only during the day (2 Sam. 1:12; 3:35), typically for seven days (Gen. 50:10; 1 Sam. 31:13). Food, however, was brought by friends since it could not be prepared in a house rendered unclean by the presence of the dead (Jer. 16:7).

Not only did the actual relatives mourn, but they might hire professional mourners (Eccles. 12:5; Amos 5:16). Reference to “the mourning women” in Jer. 9:17 suggests that there were certain techniques that these women practiced. Jesus went to Jairus's house to heal his daughter and “saw the flute players and a crowd lamenting loudly” (Matt. 9:23 HCSB).

GRISLED KJV term for dappled (spotted) grey (Gen. 31:10,12).

GROVE In Gen. 21:33 a tree planted in Beersheba by Abraham. More than likely it was a tamarisk. The KJV also uses the word “grove” to translate the term Asherah. See Asherah; Idol.

GUARD Individual or body of troops assigned to protect a person or thing. “Guard” translates numerous Hebrew and Greek terms. Tabbach (literally “butcher” or “slaughterer”) is a Hebrew term used only for officers of foreign kings (of Pharaoh, Gen. 37:36; 39:1; of Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Kings 25:8-20; Jer. 39:9-13). Two of the terms for guards are derived from the root shamar (to hedge about, guard, protect). The KJV often translated these terms by “watch” (Neh. 4:9; 7:3). The most common designation for the guards of the kings of Israel and Judah was “runners” (1 Sam. 22:17; 1 Kings 1:5; 14:27-28) from the use of such guards to escort the king's chariot. Modern translations frequently use the expression “court of the guard” where the KJV used “court of the prison” (Neh. 3:25; Jer. 32:2). Two terms for “guard” are used only one time. The first refers to the large guard gathered to defend the boy-king Joash (2 Chron. 23:10). The second refers to God as the guard of His people (Zech. 9:8).

Three Greek nouns are translated as “guard.” Huperetes is used for those guarding the high priest's quarters (Matt. 26:58; Mark 14:54). Koustodia (Matt. 27:66; 28:11) is a Latin loan-word, suggesting that this guard was indeed a Roman guard. Phulake is used for stations of guards in Acts 12:10.

GUARDIAN Adult responsible for the person and property of a minor (2 Kings 10:1,5). The Greek term epitropos, translated guardian at Gal. 4:2

(KJV, tutor), is a general word for a manager. Modern translations render the term as “steward,” “foreman,” or “manager” when it occurs elsewhere (Matt. 20:8; Luke 8:3). The basic thrust of Paul's message is clear: Before experiencing God's grace in Christ, the believers' lives were lives of slavery (Gal. 4:3,8). The guardian appears to be an image for the “elemental things of the world,” that is, of celestial or demonic powers regarded as gods by pagan Gentiles. Paul earlier pictured the Jews as under the charge of the law (Gal. 3:22-25). See Custodian; Schoolmaster.

GUDGODAH (Gēd' ḡ on) Place-name of uncertain meaning. A stop on the Israelites' wilderness journey (Deut. 10:7). It is apparently the same place as Hor-hagidgad (Num. 33:32). The location is uncertain with some scholars looking at the area near the Wadi Chadachid.

GUEST One invited to a feast (1 Sam. 9:24; 2 Sam. 15:11). Jesus outraged those in Jericho by being a guest at the home of Zacchaeus, a well-known sinner (Luke 19:7). Peter crossed racial barriers by welcoming the Gentile messengers sent by Cornelius as guests in his home (Acts 10:23).

Figurative uses of guest include Zeph. 1:7 where consecrated guests are an image of invading armies the Lord invited to punish Judah. Jesus described His disciples as guests at a wedding feast who cannot mourn as long as He, the bridegroom, is with them (Matt. 9:15). God's salvation is pictured as a wedding hall full of guests who must have proper attire (Matt. 22:10-13).

GUEST ROOM or CHAMBER Single room where travelers could lodge. The guest room of Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11 was a room borrowed for the celebration of the Passover meal. The same Greek term is traditionally translated as “inn” at Luke 2:7.

GUILE Crafty or deceitful cunning; treachery; duplicity; deceit. Jacob dressed in his brother's clothes with the goatskins on his arms and neck is Scripture's best-known illustration of guile (Gen. 27:35; KJV, subtlety; modern translations, deceitfully). Jesus perhaps had this image of Jacob (Israel) in mind when pronouncing Nathanael “a true Israelite in whom is no deceit (guile)” (John 1:47 HCSB; cp. John 1:51 with Gen. 28:12). First Peter 2:22 describes Christ as one without guile in His mouth. Paul encouraged Christians to be “guileless as to what is evil” (Rom. 16:19 NRSV; cp. 1 Pet. 2:1), that is, innocent or naive when it comes to evil.

GUILT Responsibility of an individual or a group for an offense or wrongdoing. The most common Hebrew word for “guilt, be guilty” in the OT is asham and its derivatives (Gen. 26:10; Ezra 9:6,7,13,15; Ps. 69:5; used also of the guilt offering, also called the reparation, compensation, or trespass offering). Although the NT teaching on sin and its consequences is just as clear, explicit references to “guilt” are less frequent. The Greek words used for “guilt” in the NT are enochos, “liable, accountable” (Matt. 13:41; Mark 3:29; 1 Cor. 11:27; James 2:10), opheilo, “debt, obligation” (Matt. 6:12; 18:24,28,30; Luke 7:41; Rom. 4:4), and aitia, “grounds for punishment” (Luke 23:4,14,22; Acts 28:18).

The Bible teaches that the violation of God's moral law (that is, sin; 1 John 3:4), whether in act or attitude, results in an immediate state of culpability before God requiring either punishment or expiation. Sin results in guilt whether or not the sinner is a member of God's redemptive community (cp. Ezek. 25:12; Amos 1:3-2:16; Hab. 1:11).

Whereas this community is further accountable to obey God's written law, all men are accountable to God's moral law (Rom. 2:14-15). The basis for universal culpability is the covenant God made with the human race in Adam that obedience would bring blessing and disobedience would bring punishment (Gen. 2:16-17; 3:17-19,22-24; Hos. 6:7; Rom. 7:7-12; 10:5). Adam's choice of disobedience rendered the human race guilty before God and therefore under His wrath, deserving death (Rom. 5:12-21; Eph. 2:1-3). The principle that the sin of certain individuals can bring guilt on a group is also seen in such passages as Lev. 4:3, “If the anointed priest sins, bringing guilt on the people, he is to present to the LORD a young, unblemished bull as a sin offering for the sin he has committed” (HCSB; see also Gen. 26:10; Josh. 7:1; 1 Chron. 21:3).

Furthermore, everyone commits personal sins for which he is guilty (1 Kings 8:46; Pss. 51:5; 58:3; 143:2; Rom. 3:9-23; 1 John 1:8). Even one violation of God's law brings condemnation (Gal. 3:10; James 2:10-11), and the Bible teaches that no sin goes unnoticed or unrecorded by God (Eccles. 12:14; Matt. 12:36; Luke 12:2-3; Rom. 2:16).

God's righteousness demands that the guilt resulting from sin cannot just be overlooked (Prov. 11:21; Hab. 1:13). The “wages” for sin is death (Rom. 6:23), and God cannot leave the guilty unpunished and still be righteous (Exod. 34:7; Num. 14:18; Deut. 7:10; Nah. 1:3). The only way God can forgive sin in us is to impute that sin to Christ and punish it in Him: “He presented Him to demonstrate His righteousness at the present time, so that He would be righteous and declare righteous the one who has faith in Jesus” (Rom. 3:26; see also Isa. 53:6,12; John 1:29; 2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 3:13; Heb. 9:26-28; 1 Pet. 2:24). The result is that one who is “in Christ” by faith has been freed of his guilt so that there is “no condemnation” (Rom. 8:1).

The presence or absence of the feeling or realization of one's guilt is not a reliable indication of true guilt because the heart is more deceitful than anything else (Jer. 17:9). Some who are “self righteous,” that is, with no sense of guilt, may nevertheless be guilty (Matt. 5:20; 9:10-13), and those plagued by self-doubt may nevertheless be right with God (cp. 1 Cor. 8:7). On the other hand, the Bible gives several examples of the emotional anguish caused by sin (Pss. 32:1-5; 38; 51; Matt. 27:3-5; Luke 22:62). See Atonement; Christ; Expiation, Propitiation; Forgiveness; Reconciliation; Sin.

GUILT OFFERING See Sacrifice and Offering.

GULF Term used by the KJV and REB for the gorge or pit (HCSB, chasm) separating the rich man's place of torment from Lazarus' place of comfort in the presence of Abraham (Luke 16:26).

GULL See Birds.

GUM Yellow to yellowish-brown product formed from the excretions of certain plants. Gum was an item of the Ishmaelites' caravan trade with Egypt (Gen. 37:25; KJV, spicery) and was regarded as one of the choice products of the land (Gen. 43:11). Some English translations focus on the nature of the substance (gum, NRSV; aromatic gum, NASB). Others focus on the use of the material (spices, KJV, NIV, TEV). Ladanum spice (Gen. 37:25 NASB margin) is the soft, dark resin of rock roses used in making perfume. Gum tragacanth (REB) is a resin used in the arts and in pharmacy.

GUN CONTROL Biblical analogy to gun control is recorded in 1 Sam. 13:19-22. The Philistines, who held a monopoly on the manufacture of iron implements, refused to allow the Israelites access to swords or spears. In spite of the Philistine attempt at armament control, the Israelites were able to defeat both the Philistines (1 Sam. 14) and Amalakites (1 Sam. 15) in battle.

More pointedly, David “prevailed over [Goliath] with a sling and with a stone...but there was no sword in David's hand” (1 Sam. 17:50 NASB; cp. vv. 31-40). The theological lesson of David's victory is that trust in God is more powerful than human attempts at armament, a lesson which Isaiah found necessary to repeat to Hezekiah in the face of the Assyrian invasion of 701 B.C. (Isa.22:8b-11).

GUNI (Gē' dēr) Personal name meaning “black-winged partridge.” 1. Son of Naphtali and grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:24), thus head of the Gunitite clan (Num. 26:48). 2. Member of tribe of Gad (1Chron. 5:15).

GUNITITE ■ Descendant of Guni and member of clan originated by Guni. See Guni.

GUR (Gō dē' rā thit) Place-name meaning “foreign sojourner” or “young animal.” An unidentified mountain road near Ibleam where Jehu's men caught up with and mortally wounded Ahaziah, king of Judah (841 B.C.) (2 Kings 9:27).

GUR-BAAL (Gə' də'r it) Place-name meaning “foreign sojourner of Baal” or “young animal of Baal.” An Arabian or Bedouin city where God helped King Uzziah of Judah (792-740 B.C.) attack (2 Chron. 26:7). Greek manuscript evidence does not have Baal in the name. This would mean the city was Gur, also mentioned in the Amarna letters and situated east of Beersheba. Other scholars would identify the town with Jagur (Josh. 15:21).

GUTTER KJV translation of two Hebrew terms. That is rendered in Gen. 30:38,41 (drinking) troughs (NIV, REB, NRSV TEV) or runnels, a small stream (RSV). The term used at 2 Sam. 5:8 is rendered water shaft (NIV, NRSV) or water tunnel (NASB, TEV).

GYMNASIUM Greek educational center. The word comes from a Greek word (gymnos) that means “naked.” In ancient Greece the gymnasium was the center for physical and intellectual education for aristocratic adolescent boys. The gymnasium originated in Athens where the citizens sought the ideals espoused by Pericles that men should have wisdom without the loss of manly vigor. Physical education included wrestling, swimming, running, and use of the bow and sling, all in the nude. Intellectually, the boys were trained in reading, writing, mathematics, politics, philosophy, and music. As time passed, the gymnasiums became open to all citizens and were an integral part of all Greek cities.

During the second century B.C., when the Seleucids under Antiochus Epiphanes tried to convert the Jews to Greek culture, Jason, one of the Jewish high priests, built a gymnasium in Jerusalem (1 Macc. 1:14; 2 Macc. 4:7). Aristocratic Jewish young men began to frequent the gymnasium and to participate in Greek activities. The pious Jews were shocked at both their nudity, prohibited by Jews, and their practice of wearing the broad-brimmed Greek hats, associated with the worship of the Greek god Hermes. In addition some of the young men became ashamed of and tried to hide their circumcision. These practices were one of the causes for the Maccabean rebellion of 175 B.C.

There is no mention of the gymnasium in the NT, but there are references to the activities associated with it. In 1 Tim. 4:8, the expression “bodily exercise” is from the word for gymnasium. Paul also used metaphors from the gymnasium in 1 Cor. 9:24-27; Gal. 2:2; 5:7; Phil. 1:30; 2:16. No bad connotations are associated with the word in these passages.

Herodium, one of Herod's most famous palace-fortresses located three miles southeast of Bethlehem. This is one of eleven fortresses Herod built or rebuilt. It stands on the site where Herod defeated Antigonus in 40 B.C.

HAAHASHTARI (Há á hásh' tá ri) Personal and national name in Persian language meaning “kingdom.” Member of tribe of Judah and clan of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:6), the form of the word indicating, as in many biblical genealogies, a political group as well as the ancestor. Nothing else is known of the person or nation.

HABAI AH (Há bá' ya) Personal name meaning “Yahweh hides, keeps safe.” Clan leader of exiled priests who returned from Babylon to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:61).

HABAKKUK (Há bák' kók) Prophet of the late seventh century B.C., contemporary to Jeremiah. One explanation has his name based on a root meaning “to embrace.” The Greek OT spelling “Hambakoum” suggests a root meaning “plant” or “vegetable.”

The Times Judah had just experienced the exhilaration of the glorious days of Josiah, marked by freedom, prosperity, and a great religious revival. The Assyrians, once the scourge of the Middle East, were only a shadow of their former selves. In their place, however, stood the Babylonians. In the book of Habakkuk, they are called the Chaldeans, so named for the region from which their rulers came. The Babylonian armies were led by the energetic Nebuchadnezzar, who was soon to succeed his father Nabopolassar as king.

Nineveh, Assyria's capital, fell in 612 B.C. The powerful poetry of Nahum celebrates its fall. In 609 B.C. disaster struck. King Josiah, attempting to block the Egyptians as they moved north along the Palestinian coast to aid Assyria, was killed at Megiddo in northern Palestine. In his place the Egyptians set up Josiah's son, Jehoiakim. Unlike his father, Jehoiakim was a petty tyrant. Over the next 10 or 11 years, Jehoiakim tried to pit the Babylonians against the Egyptians until he finally exhausted the patience of Nebuchadnezzar. In 598 he laid siege to Jerusalem. That same year Jehoiakim died, leaving his son, Jehoiachin, to become Nebuchadnezzar's prisoner when Jerusalem fell in 597 B.C. People from the upper classes and skilled workmen were also among those taken to Babylon as captives.

The Man Other than his work as a prophet, nothing for certain of a personal nature is known about Habakkuk. Tradition makes him a priest of the tribe of Levi. The apocryphal work Bel and the Dragon (vv. 33-39) tells a story about Habakkuk being taken to Babylon by an angel to feed Daniel while he was in the lions' den.

HABAKKUK, BOOK OF One of the 12 Minor Prophets. After a brief statement identifying the prophet (1:1), the book falls into three distinct divisions: (1) Prophet's Questions and the Lord's Answers (1:2-2:5); (2) Five Woes against Tyrants (2:6-20); (3) Prayer of Habakkuk (3:1-19).

Of these three parts, only one, the woes (2:6-20) fits the traditional pattern of the prophets. The great prophets of the Lord saw themselves as spokesmen for the Lord to the people. In the first section (1:2-2:5), in what has been called “the beginning of speculation in Israel,” Habakkuk spoke to the Lord for the people. He asked two questions, the responses to which give Habakkuk a unique niche in the prophetic canon. The first question, Why does violence rule where there should be justice? (1:2-5), expressed the prophet's sense of dismay, either about conditions within his own land caused by Jehoiakim or by the oppression of weak countries by stronger powers. In light of what follows, internal injustice seems to have been the object of his concern. In response, the Lord told the prophet that He was at work sending the Chaldeans as the instrument of His judgment (1:5-11).

The prophet shrank from such an idea and posed another question: Lord, how can you use someone more sinful than we are to punish us? (1:12-17). When the answer was not forthcoming immediately, he took his stand in the watchtower to wait for it. It was worth the wait: “Behold, as for the proud one, his soul is not right within him; but the righteous will live by his faith” (2:4 NASB). The term “faith” has more of the sense of faithfulness or conviction that results in action.

The woes (2:6-20), not unlike those of the other prophets, denounce various kinds of tyranny: plunder (2:6-8); becoming rich and famous by unjust means (2:9-11); building towns with blood (2:12-14); degrading one's neighbor (2:15-17); and idol worship (2:18-19). This section ends with a ringing affirmation of the sovereignty of the Lord.

The final section (3:1-19) is, in reality, a psalm, not unlike those found in the book of Psalms. It is a magnificent hymn, extolling the Lord's triumph over His and His people's foes.

Habakkuk in History This book was a favorite of the people of the Dead Sea Scrolls. They interpreted the first two chapters as prophecy of their triumph over the Romans who were the overlords of Palestine at that time. Unfortunately, the Romans prevailed.

More important to us, however, is the influence this book had on the Apostle Paul. Habakkuk's declaration that “the righteous (just) will live by his faith” (2:4) was taken by Paul as a central element in his theology. As he did with many OT passages, he used it with a slightly different emphasis. Through Paul, this passage came alive for an Augustinian monk named Martin Luther, setting off the Protestant Reformation, one of history's greatest religious upheavals. Thus a so-called “Minor” prophet had a major influence on those who followed him.

Outline

- I. A Prophet Perplexed: Why Does God Permit Injustice? (1:1-17).
 - A. Prophet's first protest: A cry for deliverance from violence and iniquity (1:1-4).
 - B. God's first reply: The worst is yet to be (1:5-11).
 - C. Prophet's second protest: How can a holy God use such a cruel instrument as this evil people? (1:12-17).
- II. A Prophet Perceiving: The Righteous Shall Live by Faith (2:1-20).
 - A. God's second reply (2:1-5).
 1. Revelation comes to one prepared to wait (2:1).
 2. Revelation must be easy to understand (2:2).
 3. Revelation will prove true in God's time (2:3).
 4. Persistent faith—not pride, parties, or plunder—is the distinguishing mark of the righteous (2:4-5).
 - B. God taunts His materialistic enemy (2:6-20).

1. First taunt song: Woe because of pride and ambition (2:6-8).
 2. Second taunt song: Woe because of arrogance and greed (2:9-11).
 3. Third taunt song: Woe because of cruelty (2:12-14).
 4. Fourth taunt song: Woe because of drunkenness (2:15-17).
 5. Fifth taunt song: Woe because of idolatry (2:18-19).
 6. Conclusion: A call for universal worship of the holy God (2:20).
- III. A Prophet Praying and Praising: A Psalm of Confidence Is the Proper Response to Revelation (3:1-19).
- A. Prayer asks God to repeat His acts of deliverance (3:1-2).
 - B. Prayer gains confidence by recounting the holy God's redeeming acts (3:3-15).
 - C. Prayer responds in awesome fear and confident joy to God's history with His people (3:16-18).
 - D. Prayer claims God's strength for present crisis (3:19).

HABAZINIAH (Hāb á zī nī' ah) or HABAZZINIAH Personal name meaning “Yahweh inflated or caused to make merry.” Grandfather of Jaazaniah, the Rechabite leader Jeremiah tested with wine (Jer. 35:3). See Jaazaniah.

HABERGEON Short coat of mail covering the neck and shoulder worn as defensive armor. The KJV uses harbergeon to translate three Hebrew words. The first (2 Chron. 26:14; Neh. 4:16) is translated coats of mail or armor, body armor, or breastplate by modern translations. Modern translations agree that the second term (Job 41:26) refers to an offensive weapon, the javelin. There is much uncertainty regarding the meaning of the third term (Exod. 28:32; 39:23). NASB, NRSV follow the KJV in retaining “coat of mail.” Other translations include: collar (NIV); garment (RSV); oversewn edge (REB following the earliest Greek translation). See Arms and Armor.

HABIRU (Hā bē' rū) Appearing in texts from about 2300 through 1200 B.C. throughout the Near Eastern world, this word was used of a class of rootless mercenaries. Some scholars suggest that the Habiru were the Hebrews—ethnic Israel—citing the linguistic similarity of the terms. However, first, the Habiru were mentioned before the time of Abraham and therefore before the birth of the Hebrews as a nation. Second, the Habiru are referred to as nomadic mercenaries, whereas the Hebrews before their sojourn in Egypt were peaceful shepherds, and during the conquest they were not mercenaries fighting on behalf of another nation but an army fighting on their own behalf. Finally, despite the apparent similarity, the terms Habiru and Hebrew do not in fact have a common etymology. The etymology of Habiru/Hapiru/Apiru is unknown, but Hebrew, from Ibri, goes back to Abraham's ancestor Eber; that is, Abraham and his descendants are Eberites (Gen. 10:21; 11:10-26).

Although the terms were technically separate, there may have been some confusion at times. The Amarna letters, written from Palestine shortly after the time of the conquest, probably mistakenly combine the Hebrews of Israel together with the Habiru, both of whom were causing turmoil in the region. The Habiru may have been directly or indirectly involved in the conquest, though much of the activity mentioned in the Amarna letters was outside the area of Joshua's campaigns. Of the cities within Canaan, the letters mostly refer to Shechem and Jerusalem. This agrees with the biblical account, which does not list those cities among the ones conquered in the first part of Joshua's campaigns.

After the conquest, some Habiru may have become proselytes of Israel while others moved on in order to engage in mercenary activity in other regions. One interpretation suggests that Saul employed Habiru mercenaries and referred to them as Hebrews, as opposed to his own ethnic “men of Israel” (1 Sam. 13:3). When hard pressed, the mercenaries deserted, leaving only the ethnic Israelites with Saul (13:6-7; 14:21).

It may be because of the poor reputation of the Habiru along with the occasional confusion of terms that the children of Abraham seldom referred to themselves as Hebrews, although foreigners sometimes used the term as if it were pejorative (Gen. 39:14,17; 1 Sam. 4:6,9).

HABITATION Dwelling place; home; KJV translation of 10 different Hebrew words. Habitation is used for the dwellings of humans (Exod. 35:3; Isa. 27:10) and of birds (Ps. 104:12). Of special interest are references to the habitation of God. God's habitation is designated as heaven (Deut. 26:15; 2 Chron. 30:27), the temple (2 Chron. 29:6), or Jerusalem (Ps. 46:4). Jeremiah 50:7 pictures the Lord as the dwelling place of justice or “their true pasture” (NIV; cp. Pss. 71:3; 91:9). Ephesians 2:22 speaks of believers as “God's dwelling in the Spirit” (HCSB). Revelation 18:2 announces the fall of “Babylon,” which “has become a dwelling for demons.”

HABOR (Hā' bōr) Akkadian river name. A major tributary of the Euphrates River. The Assyrians resettled many exiles from Israel there near Gozan when they captured the Northern Kingdom in 722 B.C. (2 Kings 17:6). See Gozan.

HACALIAH (Hāk ā li' a) or HACHALIAH(KJV) Personal name meaning “wait confidently on Yahweh.” Father of Nehemiah. See Nehemiah.

HACHILAH (Hā ki' la) Hill where David and his men hid from Saul, south of Jeshimon in the Maon Desert. See Jeshimon.

HACHMON (Hāk' mōn) Clan name meaning “wisdom.” Original ancestor of an Israelite clan called the Hachmonites. Most translations transliterate the Hebrew clan name as Hachmoni, including the Hebrew ending “i” that indicates membership in the clan or English “ite.” TEV translates Hachmon (1 Chron. 11:11). Jashobeam, leader of David's army, was either a Hachmonite (1 Chron. 11:11) or a Tachmonite (2 Sam. 23:8), a copyist having either added or subtracted a “t” in transmitting the clan name. Jehiel, another of David's advisors, also belonged to the clan (1 Chron. 27:32). See Jashobeam; Jehiel.

HACHMONI (Hāk' mō ni) or HACHMONITE (Hāk' mō nit) See Hachmon.

HACMONI (Hāk' mō nī) NIV spelling of Hachmoni.

HACMONITE (Häk' mö nit) NIV spelling of Hachmonite.

HADAD (Hä' däd) Personal name meaning “mighty.” 1. An Edomite king (Gen. 36:35). The name Hadad was borne by several members of the royal household of Edom. 2. Hadad was also the name of the chief deity of the Ugaritic pantheon. This deity was identified as a storm-god. See Canaan; Ugarit

HADAD-EZER (Häd äd-ē' zēr) Syrian royal name meaning “Hadad (god) helps.” City-state king of Zobah in Syria whom David defeated to establish his control over Syria (2 Sam. 8:3-13). Apparently, Hadar-ezer (2 Sam. 10:16) represents a copyist's change from Hadad-ezer in transmitting the text. Ammonites saw David was too strong for them and hired Syrian troops, including those of Hadad-ezer, to help them, but Joab, David's general, defeated them (2 Sam. 10:6-19). Hadad-ezer regrouped the Syrians but again met defeat. Some Bible students think the narrative in chapter 8 may be a summary looking forward to the fuller account in chapter 10 of the same event. Others think two separate battles are described.

First Kings 11:23 shows the troubled situation in Syria. Rezon revolted against Hadad-ezer (possibly the son of the one in 1 Sam. 8 or 1 Sam. 10 or even the same king). Rezon then established a kingdom for himself in the Syrian city of Damascus. Syria was thus a group of small city-states fighting among themselves for domination.

HADAD-RIMMON (Hä däd-rim' mön) Names of two Syrian gods combined into one word. Zechariah 12:11 describes the tragedy of the day of the Lord, including weeping and mourning in the Valley of Megiddo for Jerusalem. Such mourning could be compared only to the “mourning of Hadad-rimmon,” apparently a reference to pagan worship ceremonies, perhaps for a dying and rising god. The exact interpretation of the passage is difficult, Hadad-rimmon being mentioned nowhere else.

HADAR (Hä' där) Apparently a copyist's change of the name Hadad, a Syrian god, in Gen. 36:39 and in some manuscripts of Gen. 25:15. Translations differ on their readings, KJV reading Hadar in both cases. NIV, TEV read Hadad in both cases, while NASB, REB, NRSV retain Hadar in 36:39 but Hadad in 25:15. Parallel texts in 1 Chronicles read Hadad for both (1 Chron. 1:30,50-51). A reverent copyist may not have wanted to introduce the name of the pagan god into Genesis. See Hadad.

HADAR-EZER (Hā dār-ē' zēr) Copying change in some manuscripts for Hadad-ezer. See Hadad-ezer.

HADASHAH (Hā dāsh' a) Town name meaning “new.” Town in tribal territory of Judah situated in vicinity of Lachish (Josh. 15:37).

HADASSAH (Hā dās sa) Personal name meaning “myrtle.” In Esther 2:7, another name for Esther. It was either her original Hebrew name or a title that was given to her. In the former case, it would mean “myrtle”; in the latter case, it would mean “bride.” See Esther.

HADATTAH (Hā dāt' ta) Place-name meaning “new.” Part of name Hazor-hadattah (Josh. 15:25). The earliest Greek translations apparently read the Hebrew word for “their villages” that reappears in this section of Joshua instead of Hadattah. Some Bible students think Greek had the original reading. See Hazor-Hadattah.

HADES (Hā' dez) The Greek noun hades is used 61 times in the Greek OT (Septuagint) to translate the Hebrew term she'ol, which refers to the grave or the realm of the dead (Gen. 37:35; 1 Sam. 2:6; Prov. 15:24; cp. Ps 16:10 and Acts 2:27,31). Although the biblical writers were familiar with pagan concepts of a realm of departed spirits ruled by a deity (the meaning of hades in pagan Greek literature), and they occasionally alluded to such ideas, this concept is not taught in Scripture. The picture generally presented by Sheol is the tomb, where the bodies of the dead lie in silence.

Hades in the NT, on the other hand, can represent a place of torment for the wicked. Jesus uses the term in this way in His condemnation of Capernaum in Matt. 11:23 (parallel Luke 10:15) and in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus in Luke 16:23 where the rich man is said to be “in torment in Hades.” When the term hades is used as the equivalent of the Hebrew she'ol, as it is in Acts 2:27,31 where Peter is quoting from Ps. 16:8-11, it refers simply to the grave. This is probably also the case in Rev. 20:13-14 whether the resurrection there includes only the wicked or also the righteous.

Old Testament teaching on the afterlife is less clear than in the NT (see Gen. 5:24; 1 Sam. 2:6; 2 Kings 2:11; Job 19:25-27; Pss. 16:8-11; 17:15; 49:15; 71:20; Eccles. 12:7; Dan. 12:2; Hos. 13:14). However, the NT is clear not only that there is a bodily resurrection (John 11:24-25; Rom. 6:5; 8:11; 1 Cor. 15:20-21) but that the believer who dies goes immediately to the Lord (Luke 23:43; 2 Cor. 5:1-8; Phil. 1:21-23). See Gehenna; Hell; Sheol.

HADID (Hā' dīd) Place-name meaning “fast” or “sharpened.” Home of people returning from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:33). Town is modern el-Hadite about three miles east of Lydda (cp. Neh. 11:34).

HADLAI (Hād' la ı) Personal name meaning “quit” or “fat sack.” Leader in tribe of Ephraim and father of Amasa (2 Chron. 28:12). See Amasa.

HADORAM (Hā dō' rām) Personal and tribal name, perhaps meaning “Hadad (god) is exalted.” 1. Arabic tribe descended from Shem through Eber and thus distantly related to Hebrews according to the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:27). They lived in southern Arabia. 2. Son of Tou, city-state ruler in Hamath of Syria. Hadoram brought tribute to David after David had defeated Hadad-ezer of Zobah (1 Chron. 18:10). See Hadad-ezer. 3. “Taskmaster over the forced labor” (2 Chron. 10:18 NRSV) under Rehoboam, Solomon's son and successor as king of Judah. Rehoboam sent Hadoram to collect tribute from the Northern Kingdom immediately after they rebelled and refused to acknowledge Rehoboam as king. The children of Israel killed Hadoram. Thus they showed their contempt for Rehoboam's forced labor policies and made final the division between Israel and Judah, beginning the period of the divided monarchy.

HADRACH (Hā' drāk) City-state name of uncertain meaning. Zechariah 9:1 claims this Syrian city-state will become a part of God's territory, though the precise meaning of the verse is difficult to interpret. Assyrian inscriptions frequently mention Hatarikka or Hzrk as an opponent that Tiglath-pileser III finally conquered and made part of his empire in 738 B.C. It was apparently the large mound Tell Afis, 28 miles southwest of Aleppo, and served as capital of Luhuti, which was an ally of Hamath from 854 to 773.

HAELEPH (Hā e' lēph) Place-name meaning "the ox." KJV reads the initial "h" as the Hebrew definite article and thus has "Eleph." Some interpreters combine the preceding town name in Josh. 18:28 to read "Zelah Haeleph" as one town, following early Greek manuscript evidence. Town in tribal territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18:28). The location is not known. See Zelah.

HAFT KJV term for the hilt or handle of a dagger (Judg. 3:22).

HAGAB (Hā' gāb) Personal name meaning "grasshopper" or "chamberlain." Clan of temple servants who returned to Jerusalem from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46). The name also occurs on an ostrakon from Lachish.

HAGABA (Hāg' ā bā) Clan of temple servants who returned home from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:45).

HAGAR (Hā' gār) Personal name meaning "stranger." The personal servant of Sarah, who was given as a concubine to Abraham and became the mother of Ishmael (Gen. 16:1-16; 21:8-21; 25:12; Gal. 4:24-25). Genesis 16:1-7 details the events of the initial conflict of Sarah with Hagar and the flight of Hagar. Verses 8-16 detail the visit of the messenger of Yahweh bringing the promise of a son to the mother in distress, encouraging Hagar to return to Sarah. These conflicts were related to the wife's and concubine's positions in the family and community (cp. similar conflicts in Gen. 29-30). Genesis 21:8-21 gives the story of the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael and their miraculous deliverance. Pauline interpretation (Galatians) relates the superiority of a son born according to the Spirit over the son born according to the "flesh." In Gal. 4 Paul used the Hagar story to stand for slavery under the old covenant in contrast to freedom of the new covenant symbolized by Isaac.

HAGARENE (Häg' á ren) (KJV, Ps. 83:6) See Hagarite.

HAGARITE (Häg' ár it) Name of nomadic tribe whom the tribe of Reuben defeated east of the Jordan River (1 Chron. 5:10,19-20). Reuben won because they called on and trusted in God. The tribal name is apparently taken from Hagar, Sarah's maid and mother of Ishmael (Gen. 16). David's chief shepherd was a Hagarite (1 Chron. 27:31). The psalmist asked God not to be silent when the Hagarites joined a coalition against God's people (Ps. 83:6). First Chronicles 11:38 names a Hagarite among David's military heroes, but some interpreters think that 2 Sam. 23:36 is evidence of an original Gadite, which would be written quite similar to Hagarite in Hebrew.

HAGERI (Hà' gèr i) REB transliteration of Hebrew for Hagarite in 1 Chron. 11:38. See Hagarite.

HAGGADAH or HALAKAH In Judaism, rabbinic teaching is divided into two categories: halakah and haggadah (also spelled aggadah). Both of these terms refer to the oral teaching of the rabbis. Halakah refers to the legal teachings that are considered authoritative for religious life. Haggadah refers to the remaining nonlegal teachings.

Halakah, according to the early rabbis, goes back to oral law given to Moses at Sinai along with the written law (Torah) incorporated in the Bible primarily found in the Pentateuch. Therefore, the halakah is considered as binding as the written Torah. Modern scholars recognize that the halakah is the means by which the written Torah is interpreted to each new generation. Halakah extends the Torah of Moses into every aspect of Jewish life including personal, social, national, and international relations. It is essential for the preservation of Jewish life in new historical circumstances because it allows for a range of interpretative flexibility and development in the norms that govern the Jewish community.

Haggadah consists of a variety of amplifications of biblical texts primarily in the form of illustrative stories, parables or allegories, or, frequently, poetry. Many portions of the haggadah may go back to early Jewish synagogue preaching.

Much of early rabbinic halakah was eventually written down in the Mishnah (about A.D. 220) and Talmud (about A.D. 360) although it continues to be referred to as oral law even after these codifications. Likewise, haggadah was written down in various biblical commentaries as well as the Talmud.

These two types of rabbinic teaching are especially important as an aid in understanding Judaism at the time of Jesus and during the formation of the early church since some of these materials have their origin during the first century. Jesus probably referred to Pharisaic halakah (in part a precursor to rabbinic halakah) in Mark 7:1-23 and its parallel (Matt. 15:1-20). See Mishnah; Pharisees; Talmud; Torah.

HAGGAI (Häg' gi) Personal name of one of the “postexilic” (sixth-century) prophets and of the book preserving his preaching. The name probably means that he was born on one of the Jewish feast days. He and the Prophet Zechariah roused the people of Judah to finish the Temple under Zerubbabel's leadership.

HAGGAI, BOOK OF One of the so-called Minor Prophets (also collectively known as “the Twelve”). It consists of four addresses the prophet delivered to the postexilic community of Judah and its leaders, Zerubbabel the governor and Joshua the high priest. The addresses are precisely dated according to the year of the Persian ruler and the month and day of the Jewish calendar.

Chronology of Haggai and Zechariah

August 29, 520 B.C.

Haggai's first message

(Hag. 1:1-11)

September 21, 520	Temple building resumed (Hag. 1:12-15)
October 17, 520	Haggai's second message (Hag. 2:1-9)
October-November 520	Zechariah's ministry begun (Zech. 1:1-6)
December 18, 520	Haggai's third and fourth messages (Hag. 2:10-23)
February 15, 519	Zechariah's night visions (Zech. 1:7-6:8)
March 12, 515	Temple completed (Ezra 6:15-18)

Historical Background The Persian ruler Cyrus had freed the Jews to return from Babylonian exile shortly after he conquered Babylon in October 539 B.C. He had also promised to help them rebuild their temple in Jerusalem that the Babylonians had destroyed in 586 B.C. The first group of about 50,000 exiles to return were led by Sheshbazzar, who was appointed governor of the new province of Judah. Sanballot, governor of Samaria, was not pleased at Judah's new status and took every opportunity to oppose them. The returning Jews also clashed with Jews who had been left in Palestine who thought they were God's remnant and resented the newcomers taking over. Opposition continued and increased through the reigns of Cyrus (539-530 B.C.), Cambyses (530-522 B.C.), and Darius (522-486 B.c.; Ezra 4:4-5).

The temple foundation was laid fairly quickly under Zerubbabel's leadership, who eventually replaced Sheshbazzar as governor. This initial success was met not only with celebration but also with sadness when this temple was compared with Solomon's (Ezra 1-3; Hag. 2:3; Zech. 4:10). This is the first hint that perhaps this restoration would not satisfy entirely the prophetic announcements of Israel's glorious restoration. This discouragement together with the continuing opposition and concerns over personal affairs caused work on the temple to cease until the preaching of Haggai and Zechariah roused the people once more to work in faith (Ezra 4:24-5:2).

Message and Purpose The leaders and people of Judah had allowed external opposition, discouragement, and self-interest to keep them from completing the task of rebuilding the Lord's temple (1:2-4; 2:3). So they and their offerings to the Lord were defiled and displeasing to Him (2:14). The Lord's command through Haggai was to “build the house” for the pleasure and glory of God (1:8). Toward that end the Lord exhorted them not to fear but to “be strong...and work” (2:4-5). Finally, by a parable Haggai instructed them of the need to dedicate themselves and their work to the Lord (2:11-16). The Lord called upon them to recognize His chastisement in the deprivation they had been experiencing (1:5-6,9-11; 2:16-17). He also informed the people that the completion of the temple would bring Him pleasure and glory (1:8). He further assured them of their success because of His presence (1:13-14; 2:4-5). He promised them that He would reward their renewed work and dedication to Him by glorifying the temple and granting them peace (2:6-9) and blessing (2:18-19). Finally, He promised to restore the Davidic throne on the earth through a descendant of Zerubbabel (2:20-23).

Structure Haggai's four sermons (1:1-15; 2:1-9; 2:10-19; 2:20-23) are marked by introductory date formulae. But repetition between messages one and three and between two and four shows that the book has a twofold structure. Both messages one and three refer to “this people” (1:2; 2:14) and include two commands to “think/consider carefully” (1:5,7; 2:15,18). Messages two and four both have the divine promise, “I am going to shake the heavens and the earth” (2:6,21) and have a threefold repetition of “the LORD solemnly declares” (2:4,23). Furthermore, the first and third messages are introduced by complete date formulae, giving year, month, and day, with the order in the third message reversed. The date formulae introducing the second and fourth messages have only the month and day, again with the fourth in reverse order. Finally, at the end of the first and third messages, the date is repeated (1:15; 2:18).

The first two messages both deal with building the temple. The last two messages do not mention the temple explicitly but move beyond it to issues of defilement and restoration.

Contents Message One: Instruction to Build the Temple (1:1-15) The Lord's oracle is given in vv. 3-11 and the response to it in vv. 12-15.

In the context of the Mosaic covenant and Israel's restoration according to divine prophecy, they should have been able to discern God's displeasure with them by the trying circumstances they were experiencing.

The first message ends as it began with a date showing that 23 days after Haggai's message the rebuilding was underway again (the order in the Hebrew text of 1:15—day, month, year—is the mirror image of 1:1, showing the two dates to be part of the same section and stressing the comparison between the days). If God's earlier prophets had received such positive response the temple would never have been destroyed!

Message Two: Promises of God's Presence, Glory, and Peace (2:1-9) The time of the second message was during the Feast of Tabernacles (cf. Lev. 23:33-43), three weeks after the work began. The following day would be the concluding Sabbath on which Solomon had dedicated his newly built temple in 959 B.C. (2 Chron. 7:8-10).

Having motivated them to work by pointing to past events and present realities, the Lord also encouraged the remnant in vv. 6-9 with promises of the future. These verses describe the day of the Lord when the wicked will be removed and the nations shall be made subject to Him and will bring tribute to His temple (cp. Isa. 60:4-14). Thus its glory will exceed that of Solomon's temple, especially because the Lord Himself will be there. It is hard not to see a preliminary fulfillment of these verses in the appearance of Jesus at Herod's temple (cp. Matt. 2:11; 21:12-15; 27:51).

Message Three: Cleansing and Blessing (2:10-19) The Lord announces His determination to change Judah's deprivation to blessing because they have dedicated themselves to Him. The date is three months after the temple work began, just after the fall planting, which explains why there is no seed left in the barn (v. 19). After the introduction is a dialogue with the priests that functions like a parable (vv. 11b-13). The essence of the parable is that unlike holiness, defilement can be transmitted by touch. Then the parable is applied in vv. 14-19. Israel had been set apart for the Lord. Yet they had become defiled by sin and unbelief so that all they did was unacceptable to God, including offerings and temple building. Only God's grace in response to their humble dedication could cleanse them again, which He had done. Thus they are assured that God would turn their curse of deprivation into blessing, and they would have a plentiful harvest.

Message Four: Gentile Overthrow and Davidic Restoration (2:20-23)

The Lord promises that He will destroy the kingdoms of this world and will establish a new kingdom ruled by a Davidic descendant, the Messiah (cp. Ezek. 39:19-23; Dan 2:44). The Messianic servant is named David in Ezek. 34:23-24 and 37:24 because He is the Davidic seed, the fulfillment of the Davidic covenant. Here He is named Zerubbabel as a divine promise that the Messiah will also be a descendant of Zerubbabel (cp. Matt. 1:12-13). The “signet ring” is appropriate as a Messianic metaphor because it was jealously guarded as a symbol of one's authority, used to sign official documents (cp. Esther 8:8). As God had cast off King Jehoiachin, so He had placed his grandson Zerubbabel on His finger (Jer. 22:24).

Theological Significance Several reasons can be given for the significance of the temple rebuilding. First, it was a sign of the people's priorities. Second, it showed that God was with the remnant and that His promises of restoration had begun to be fulfilled. Third, it declared God's glory and thus brought Him pleasure. Fourth, it served to vindicate the Lord since the temple's destruction had disgraced the Lord's name (Ezek. 11:23; 37:26-28.). Fifth, it served as a pledge of the new covenant and the Messianic age (Ezek. 37:26; Isa. 2:2-4; 44:28; 52:1-7; Mic. 4:1-4; Mal. 3:1). The restoration of the temple was a sign that God had not revoked His covenant with Levi or His covenant with David (cp. Jer. 33:17-22; Num. 25:11-13; Mal. 2:4). He will provide cleansing and restoration through a glorious temple and a messianic ruler.

HAGGEDOLIM (Häg gě dö' lim) Personal name meaning “the great ones.” Zabdiel, a leading priest, was the son of Haggedolim (Neh. 11:14; KJV, “the great men”; TEV, “a leading family”). Bible students have suggested that haggedolim is probably not a Hebrew proper name and have interpreted it as a copyist's change of an unfamiliar name for a more familiar word or title, an honorary title for a leading family, or a title for the high priest.

HAGGERI (Häg gě' ri) KJV transliteration of Hebrew for Hagarite in 1 Chron. 11:38. See Hagarite.

HAGGI (Häg' gi) Personal name meaning “my festival,” indicating birth on a holy day. Son of Gad and grandson of Jacob and thus original ancestor of clan of Haggites (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:15).

HAGGIAH (Häg gi' a) Personal name meaning “Yahweh is my festival.” A Levite in the line of Merari (1 Chron. 6:30).

HAGGITE (Häg' git) Member of clan of Haggi. See Haggi.

HAGGITH (Häg' gith) Personal name meaning “festival.” Wife of David and mother of Adonijah, who was born at Hebron (2 Sam. 3:4).

HAGIOGRAPHA Greek term meaning “holy writings,” used as a designation for the third and final major division of the Hebrew Bible. In contrast to the first two divisions (the Law and the Prophets), “the Writings” (Hb. Kethuvim) are a miscellaneous collection. The Hagiographa in their Hebrew order include: Psalms, Proverbs, and Job; the “five scrolls” (Megilloth) read at major festivals, namely, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther; Daniel; and Ezra-Nehemiah and Chronicles. These books were the last portion of the Hebrew Bible to be recognized as canonical. Luke 24:44 uses “psalms” as a designation for these writings.

HAGRI (Häg' rî) Tribal or personal name probably referring to the Hagarites (1 Chron. 11:38) or a miscopying of “the Gaddite” from 2 Sam. 23:36. See Hagarite.

HAGRITE (Häg' rî) Alternate spelling for Hagarite in modern translations. See Hagarite.

HAHIROTH (Hä hi' rōth) Reading of some manuscripts and translations for Pi-hahiroth in Num. 33:8. See Pi-hahiroth.

HAI (Hä' i) (KJV, Gen. 12:8; 13:3) See Ai.

HAIL (salutation) See Greeting.

HAIL (meteorological) Precipitation in the form of small balls consisting of layers of ice and compact snow, regarded as a plague by biblical writers. Hailstones generally have a diameter of half an inch to one inch. Large hailstones can destroy crops (Exod. 9:25,31; Ps. 78:47; Hag. 2:17; Rev. 8:7) and kill livestock and persons caught in the open (Exod. 9:19,25; Josh. 10:11; Ps. 78:48). The Bible speaks of hail to speak of divine presence, action, and punishment.

HAIR Covering of the human head and of animals. Ordinarily human hair is meant in biblical references (Num. 6:5), though animal hair (wool) may be in mind (Matt. 3:4). Beautiful hair has always been desirable for both women and men (Song 5:11). In OT times both men and women wore their hair long. Both Samson and Absalom were greatly admired for their long locks (Judg. 16:13; 2 Sam. 14:25-26). In the NT era, men wore their hair much shorter than women did (1 Cor. 11:14-15).

Jewish men of the orthodox tradition are prohibited from cutting off the hair above their ears.

Silver decorative bucket with scene of a servant combing the hair of her mistress.

Gray hair and white hair were respected signs of age (Prov. 20:29). But baldness could be considered embarrassing or even humiliating (2 Kings 2:23; Ezek. 7:18). In Lev. 13, which gives extensive instruction on the diagnosis of leprosy (probably including other skin diseases), the color of the hairs in an infected area of skin indicated whether the disease was present or had been cured. A cured leper was required to shave his entire body (Lev. 14:8-9).

Hair among the Israelites required good care. Women usually wore their hair loose, but sometimes they braided it (2 Kings 9:30). New Testament writers cautioned against ostentation in women's hairstyles (1 Tim. 2:9; 1 Pet. 3:3). Hair that was anointed with oil symbolized blessing and joy (Ps. 23:5; Heb. 1:9). Some hosts provided oil to anoint honored guests (Luke 7:46). Mourning was indicated by disheveled, unkempt hair (Josh. 7:6; 2 Sam. 14:2). Jesus told His followers not to follow the custom of the Pharisees, who refused to care for their hair while they were fasting (Matt. 6:17).

Israelite men trimmed their hair, but the law prohibited them from cutting off the hair above their ears (Lev. 19:27). This restriction probably was a response to some pagan custom (Deut. 14:1-2), but orthodox Jews still wear long side curls. Those who took a Nazirite vow were forbidden from cutting their hair during the course of their vow, but afterward, their entire head was to be shaved (Num. 6:1-21; Acts 18:18; 21:24).

Because hairs are so many, they may symbolize the concept of being innumerable (Ps. 40:12). Because they seem so unimportant, they can stand for insignificant things (Luke 21:18).

HAKELDAMA (Há kəl' dá má) HCSB, NASB, NRSV spelling for Aceldama or Akeldama (Acts 1:19). See Aceldama

HAKILAH (Há kí' la) (NIV) See Hachilah.

HAKKATAN (Hák' ká tán) Personal name meaning “the small one, the lesser.” Father of the clan leader who accompanied Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem about 458 B.C. (Ezra 8:12).

HAKKORE (Hák' kó rə) TEV reading of Enhakkore (Judg. 15:19), translating En as spring. See En-hakkore.

HAKKOZ (Hák' kōz) Personal and clan name meaning “the thorn.” 1. Clan leader in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8). See Koz. 2. Clan of priests (1 Chron. 24:10; cp. Neh. 3:4,21). In the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, members of this clan could not prove their family roots, so they were not allowed to function as priests (Ezra 2:61). See Koz.

HAKUPHA (Há ku' phá) Personal name meaning “bent.” Original ancestor of clan of temple servants (Ezra 2:51).

HALAH (Ha' la) City-state or region in northern Mesopotamia to which Assyrians exiled some leaders of the Northern Kingdom after capturing Samaria in 722 B.C. (2 Kings 17:6). Some Bible students think the original text of Obad. 20 contained a promise for the captives in Halah. They read the Hebrew word for “host” as Halah. Halah may have been Hallahhu, northeast of Nineveh.

HALAK (Ha' lak) Place-name meaning “barren” or “naked.” Mountain marking southern extent of Joshua's conquests (Josh. 11:17; 12:7). It is identified with Jebel Halak, about 40 miles southwest of the Dead Sea in Edom.

HALF TRIBE Used to designate a segment of the tribe of Manasseh that received territory on both sides of the Jordan River. The term usually refers to that part of Manasseh dwelling to the east of the Jordan along with Reuben and Gad (Num. 32:33; Deut. 3:13; Josh. 1:12; 4:12; 22:1). Those living west of the Jordan are sometimes called “the rest of the tribe of Manasseh” (Josh. 17:2 NRSV) or the “other half” (22:7). See Tribes of Israel.

HALF-SHEKEL TAX Temple tax required annually of every Israelite 20 years of age and upwards (Exod. 30:13,15; 38:26). Such payment brought atonement, but atonement price was equal for all (30:15). At Matt. 17:24 this tax is called the didrachma (“the two drachma”) tax. The coin in the fish's mouth was a stater, a coin worth four drachmas or the temple tax for two (17:27). See Atonement.

HALHUL (Hal' hul) Place-name, perhaps meaning “circles.” Town in hill country of Judah assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:58). It is modern Halhul, four miles north of Hebron.

HALI (Ha' li) Place-name meaning “jewel.” Border town assigned to tribe of Asher (Josh. 19:25). It may be Khirbet Ras Ali, north of Mount Carmel.

HALL Large, usually imposing, building, often used for governmental functions; the chief room in such a structure. NIV uses hall for the main room of the temple (1 Kings 6:3,5,17,33). Other translations have house (KJV), nave (NASB, NRSV), or sanctuary (REB). Modern translations designate several of Solomon's building projects as halls. The Hall of Pillars (KJV, porch of pillars) was part of the palace complex (1 Kings 7:6). It is unclear whether this hall was a separate building or the entrance to the House of the Forest of Lebanon or even the whole palace complex. The Hall of the Throne or Hall of Judgment (1 Kings 7:7; KJV, porch) was the throne room where legal decisions were rendered. The king's hall of Esther 5:1 was, likewise, the audience chamber of the Persian king. Archeological research indicates that Ahasuerus' Hall of Pillars was 193 feet square. The hall's name stemmed from the 36 massive pillars supporting the roof.

Banqueting halls are frequently mentioned. The hall of 1 Sam. 9:22 (KJV, parlour) was a chamber connected with the sanctuary where sacrificial meat was eaten. Belshazzar's banqueting hall (KJV, banquet house) was the scene of the famous handwriting on the wall (Dan. 5:10). This room was likely the large throne room (50 by 160 feet) which has been excavated.

KJV used the term "hall" to translate the Greek term aule (Luke 22:55). Elsewhere KJV translated the term "palace" (Matt. 26:58; Mark 14:54; John 18:15). Modern translations use "courtyard." KJV also used hall for the praetorian or Roman governor's headquarters (Pilate's, Matt. 27:27; Mark 15:16; John 18:28; Herod's, Acts 23:35). See Architecture.

HALLEL Song of praise. The name derives from the Hebrew "Praise Thou." The singing of psalms of praise was a special duty of the Levites (2 Chron. 7:6; Ezra 3:11). The "Egyptian" Hallel (Pss. 113-118) was recited in homes as part of the Passover celebration (cp. Ps. 114:1; Matt. 26:30). The "Great Hallel" was recited in the temple as the Passover lambs were being slain and at Pentecost, Tabernacles, and Dedication. Scholars disagree as to the original extent of the "Great Hallel" with some limiting the Hallel to Ps. 136, some including Ps. 135, and still others including the "Songs of Ascents" (Pss. 120-134).

HALLELUJAH (Häl lö lö' ya) Exclamation of praise that recurs frequently in the book of Psalms meaning "Praise Yahweh!" In particular, Pss. 146-150 sometimes are designated the Hallelujah Psalms. In the Psalms God is praised for His power, His wisdom, His blessings, and the liberation of His people. See Psalms, Book of.

HALLOHESH (Hāl lō' hēsh) Personal name meaning “the exorcist.” Father of Shallum, who helped Nehemiah repair the Jerusalem wall. He is called “the official of half the district of Jerusalem” (Neh. 3:12 NASB), apparently meaning he administered one of the outlying districts near Jerusalem. The same man or a man of the same name sealed his name to Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:24).

HALLOW To make holy; to set apart for holy use; to revere. See Dedicate, Dedication; Holy; Sanctification.

HALT Term that KJV sometimes uses as alternate translation for “lame” (Matt. 18:8; Mark 9:45; Luke 14:21; John 5:3).

HAM (Hām) Personal name meaning “hot.” Second of Noah's three sons (Gen. 5:32). Following the flood, he discovered Noah, his father, naked and drunken and reported it to Shem and Japheth (Gen. 9:20-29). When Noah learned of the incident, he pronounced a curse on Canaan the son of Ham. Ham became the original ancestor of the Cushites, the Egyptians, and the Canaanites (Gen. 10:6). See Noah.

HAMAN (Hā' man) Personal name meaning “magnificent.” The Agagite who became prime minister under the Persian king Ahasuerus (Esther 3:1). He was a fierce enemy of the Jews, and he devised a plot to exterminate them. In particular, he had a gallows erected on which he hoped to hang Mordecai because Mordecai would not bow to him. Through the intervention of Esther, however, his scheme was unmasked, and he was hanged on the gallows he had designed for Mordecai the Jew. See Esther.

HAMATH (Hā' māth) Place-name meaning “fortress” or “citadel.” City-state located in the valley of the Orontes River, roughly 120 miles north of Damascus. Excavation indicates this mound was occupied as early as Neolithic times. Hieroglyphic inscriptions first discovered by J. L. Burckhardt in 1810 attest early Hittite influence in Hamath. Throughout much of its existence, Hamath functioned as the capital of an independent kingdom.

The southern boundary of Hamath served as the northern boundary of Israel during the reigns of Solomon (1 Kings 8:65; 2 Chron. 8:4) and Jeroboam II (2 Kings 14:25,28). The “entrance of Hamath” was treated as the northern border of Israel (Num. 34:8; Josh. 13:5; Ezek. 47:15-17,20; 48:1) and served as an accepted geographical expression (Num. 13:21; Judg. 3:3).

Toi, king of Hamath, sent his son to congratulate David after David defeated King Hadadezer of Zobah. Toi had frequently fought with Hadadezer (2 Sam. 8:9-10; 1 Chron. 18:3,9-10). In 853 B.C. King Irhuleni of Hamath joined a coalition including Ben-hadad II of Damascus and Ahab of Israel which successfully thwarted the advance of Shalmaneser II of Assyria into northern Syria. In about 802 B.C. Adad-nirari III of Assyria crushed Damascus and levied a heavy tax upon it. During the following decades, the king of Hamath, probably named Zakir, waged a successful rivalry with Damascus. Hamath reached the zenith of its power between 800 and 750 B.C. See Toi.

In 738 B.C. Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria exacted tribute from Hamath together with other states including Israel. Following the fall of Samaria in 722-721 B.C., Hamath was devastated in 720 B.C. by Sargon II of Assyria (Amos 6:2). Refugees from Samaria may have been exiled to Hamath by the Assyrians, while refugees from Hamath were brought to Samaria along with their god, Ashima (2 Kings 17:24,30; Isa. 11:11). From this time, Hamath's history seems to merge with that of Damascus (Jer. 49:23).

In the Hellenistic period Antiochus IV changed its name to Epiphania. It was known by this name in the Greco-Roman period, though the natives continued to call it Hamath (modern Hamah). See Lebo-Hamath.

HAMATH-ZOBAB (Hā māth-zō' ba) Place-name meaning “fortress of Zobah.” City that Solomon captured in Syria (2 Chron. 8:3). Both Hamath and Zobah are cities in Syria that David controlled (2 Sam. 8). Some interpreters see the combination here as the result of a damaged text available to the Chronicler. Others think the Chronicler reflects the Babylonian and Persian administrative system of his day including the two cities in one administrative district. Still others think this was simply another name for Zobah. The Chronicler in distinction from 2 Sam. 8 also combines the two cities into “Zobahhamath” (1 Chron. 18:3 REB, reflecting the literal Hebrew text). See Hamath;Zobah.

HAMATHITE (Ha' máth it) Citizen of Hamath and originally descended from Canaan, son of Ham, son of Noah (Gen. 10:18). See Hamath.

HAMITES (Hám' its) NIV designation for descendants of Ham (1 Chron. 4:40-41). See Ham.

HAMMATH (Hám' máth) Place-name meaning “hot spot,” probably due to hot spring, and personal name meaning “hot one.” 1. Fortified city in the tribal territory of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35); probably the same as the Levitical town of Hammothdor (21:32). It may be located at Tell Raqqat, just north of Tiberias. Others have tried to locate it at the famous hot springs of Hammam Tabiriyeh, south of Tiberias, but archaeologists have found no evidence of Iron Age occupation there. First Chronicles 6:76 reads “Hammon,” apparently the same place, in the list of Levitical towns. 2. Original ancestor of Kenites and Rechabites (1 Chron. 2:55; KJV reads “Hamath”; TEV, REB see a verbal construction meaning “intermarried” or “connected by marriage”). The context and grammatical construction of the verse makes certain understanding impossible. Hammath could be the founder of the city Hammath.

HAMMEDATHA (Hám mə dá' thá) Personal name meaning “given by the god.” Father of Haman, the villain of the book of Esther (Esther 3:1).

HAMMELECH (Hám' mə lēk) According to KJV, personal name translated “the king” (Jer. 36:26; 38:6). Modern translations read “son of the king.”

HAMMER A striking tool. The earliest hammers were simply smooth or shaped stones. Beginning in the Bronze Age, stones were hollowed out to give a better grip or to receive a handle. Mallets of bone and wood were used (Judg. 5:26), though these have not normally been preserved. Hammers with metal heads were rare in Palestine, possibly because metal was reserved for tools needing a cutting edge.

Hammers were used in cutting stone (1 Kings 6:7), working common and precious metals (Isa. 41:7; 44:12), and for woodworking (Jer. 10:4). A hammer-like weapon was also used in battle (Jer. 51:20; “shatterer,” NASB margin; Ezek. 9:2 “shattering weapon”). See Arms and Armor.

The hammer was a symbol of power. God's word is pictured as a hammer (Jer. 23:29). Babylon is mocked as a hammer whose strength has failed (Jer. 50:23). See Tools.

HAMMOLECHETH (Hām mōl' ʿē kēth) (TEV, NRSV, NASB) or HAMMOLEKETH (KJV, NIV, REB) Personal name meaning “queen.” Sister of Gilead in genealogy of Manasseh in the unparalleled list of 1 Chron. 7:18.

HAMMON (Hām' mon) Place-name meaning “hot spot,” probably from a hot spring. 1. Town in tribal allotment of Asher (Josh. 19:28). It may be modern Umm el-awamid near the Mediterranean coast in Lebanon about five miles northeast of Rosh ha-niqra. 2. See Hammath.

HAMMOTH-DOR (Hām' moth-dôr) See Hammath.

HAMMUEL (Hām' mü ʿēl) Personal name meaning “El is my father-in-law” or “God is hot with anger.” Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:26).

HAMMURABI [Hām mū ra' bī] (known also as Hammurapi) King of Babylon who reigned 43 years in the first half of the second millennium B.C. His absolute dates are uncertain; his reign began in 1848, 1792, or 1736 B.C. He was the son of Sin-muballit and the father of Samsu-iluna. He is most famous for issuing a famous law collection popularly known as “the code of Hammurabi.”

Kingdom Hammurabi was the sixth in a line of Amorite kings of the First Dynasty of Babylon (about 2000-1600 B.C.). By forming coalitions against his enemies, and then later turning on his former allies, Hammurabi reunified Mesopotamia and founded the so-called Old Babylonian Empire.

Hammurabi spent the middle 20 years of his reign preoccupied with local affairs. Evidently he was consolidating and organizing his kingdom. He built religious shrines, civic buildings, defensive walls, and canals during this period, but there are virtually no remains of Hammurabi's capital. The archives at Mari reveal about 140 letters sent between Babylon and Mari during this era. The last 12 years of his rule were characterized by uninterrupted warfare. Whereas the early years witnessed military and political expansion, the latter years saw the kingdom shrink. Most of it was lost soon after his death, and the Hittites brought an end to the dynasty about 1600 B.C. See Babylon.

Religion With Babylon's rise to power came the rise of Babylon's patron god, Marduk. He was considered the son of Enki/Ea, god of fresh water and of wisdom. Marduk was god of thunderstorms and was worshiped at Babylon at the great temple called Esagila, apparently built during the first dynasty. The Babylonian creation epic Enuma Elish, dating to the second millennium, celebrated Marduk's defeat of evil Tiamat, goddess of the sea. For this feat the high god Enlil rewards him with the "tablets of destiny" and the title "Lord of the Lands."

Lawgiver A French excavation of the ancient Persian city of Susa in A.D. 1901-02 uncovered a seven-foot high diorite stele inscribed with a collection of laws from Hammurabi's reign. The stele was probably set in the great Esagila temple with copies sent to other centers. It had been carried to Susa by the Elamites after a raid in 1160 B.C. At the top of the stele is a relief showing Hammurabi receiving the symbols of justice and order from the sun god Shamash, also god of justice and noted protector of the oppressed.

The stone contains 44 columns of ancient cuneiform writing. A poetic prologue and epilogue enclose 282 separate laws. (Compare the book of Job in which poetic dialogues are enclosed by prose prologue and epilogue.)

Hammurabi's law collection has much in common with the other cuneiform collections of Ur-Nammu (21st century B.C.), Lipit-Ishtar (19th century B.C.), the kingdom of Eshnunna (about 1800 B.C.), the Hittite laws (16th or 15th century B.C.), the Middle Assyrian laws (the 15th or 14th century B.C.), and the Neo-Babylonian laws (7th century B.C.), as well as with the law of Moses.

Much has been written about the purpose and function of these various law collections in the ancient Near East. That they did not function as binding and authoritative law codes in the modern sense is indicated by several factors. (1) In all the vast number of judicial records there is no example of a legal decision being based explicitly on one of these written laws. Legal decisions were based rather on precedent known through legal tradition. Legal decisions in the OT likewise do not cite written law, which has led some scholars to conclude that this shows ignorance of a written law of Moses. Comparison with how the legal systems of surrounding countries operated demonstrates the fallacy of this claim. (2) Another factor is that none of the law collections deal with every aspect of life, and they tend to deal primarily with exceptional cases. The Mosaic law is comparable here as well. Legal practices in the area of marriage, for example, often go beyond what is found explicitly in the law of Moses.

It is commonly held that Hammurabi's law collection contains the king's verdicts that were to serve as legal patterns to guide judges and so to produce political and social uniformity throughout his diverse kingdom. Their purpose, then, was either reform or education or both.

The collection was also intended to demonstrate to the people, to posterity, and especially to the gods that Hammurabi was a faithful and just shepherd of his people. The stele begins by describing the king's divine call to "make justice to shine forth in the land, to destroy the evil and the wicked, that the strong might not oppress the weak...to give light to the land."

In his first year Hammurabi decreed the standard of law that would govern the economic and religious life of all Babylonians. This compares to the “reforms” of the Hebrew kings, who by restating allegiance to the Torah in their first year as king, “did right in the sight of the Lord” (2 Kings 18:3 NASB).

Hammurabi's law collection covers such general offenses as false accusations (cp. Deut. 5:20; 19:16-17), witchcraft (cp. Deut. 18:10; Exod. 22:18), evil judges (Exod. 23:6-9; Lev. 19:15; Deut. 16:18-21), and kidnapping (cp. Exod. 21:16). Many laws cover marital issues such as the rights of both parties, dowry settlements, bridal gifts, marriage offenses, and divorce. Legal marriage required a contract with the girl's parents. A man could divorce his wife if he returned the marriage gift and dowry and paid to educate the children (if any); a wife could divorce her husband if she had not been a “gadabout, thus neglecting her house and humiliating her husband” (cp. Deut. 24:1-4). Adultery with a married woman permitted the death penalty if the husband demanded it, but it was not required (cp. Deut. 22:22). Death was the punishment for rape as in Deut. 22:25. Incest is prohibited by each, but in Hammurabi the punishment is only exile.

Since property was such a great concern, many laws dealt with inheritance. As in Hebrew law (Exod. 13:2; Deut. 21:15-17), the firstborn had special rights. A father could disinherit a son who had done wrong or could adopt a son by oral pronouncement. Children of a slave wife would not inherit unless adopted.

Another category of laws concerned personal injury. The penalty for striking one's parent was loss of one's hand. In Hebrew law this was a capital offense (Exod. 21:15). Hurting pregnant women was severely punished as in Hebrew law but with no indication whether the injury was accidental, and in Hammurabi the woman is another man's daughter rather than wife (Exod. 21:22-25). The principle of “an eye for an eye” (lex talionis) was carried to the extreme that if someone caused the death of another's son or daughter, the penalty was the death of the offender's son or daughter.

Relationship to Biblical Law The law collections of Hammurabi, the Assyrians, Hittites, and others have much in common with Hebrew law. One area of similarity is form. As in other law collections, many of the Hebrew laws take the form of conditions: “When/if this happens, then this shall be the penalty” (e.g., Exod. 21:18-23:5). The first of Hammurabi's laws reads, “If a citizen accuses another citizen of murder but cannot prove it, the accuser shall be put to death.” Similarities of content are of three types. Some laws are almost identical in content, some differ in penalties exacted or in other details, and some are similar only in that they deal with the same general situation. The latter type of similarity is the most common.

There are several critical differences between the Hammurabi law collection and Mosaic law. (1) Hammurabi's laws do not deal with religious affairs. (2) Penalties varied according to the class of the offender. Three classes were recognized: freedman, state dependent, and slave. (3) The immense value of property in Hammurabi's (and other) law collections is contrasted with the immense value placed on human life in the Mosaic laws. Only in biblical law was a clear distinction drawn between property and human life. Only biblical law, for example, required the death of an ox that had gored someone to death and also the owner's death if he had been negligent (Exod. 21:28-32). Conversely, in biblical law monetary compensation was never sufficient penalty for homicide. (4) Biblical law included laws of the absolute (apodictic) form, “Do not steal, etc.” rather than just the more pragmatic emphasis on consequences. Israel was unique in having such laws that gave positive and negative commands directly to individuals, as in the Ten Commandments. (5) This in part may be the result of the divine authorship of Mosaic law, which also meant that not even the king had authority to change a law or even to reduce a penalty. The king also could not add to the laws God had given, a situation unique in the ancient Near East. (6) Finally, biblical law was unique in that it was understood in the context of the covenant God had made with Israel. See Law, Ten Commandments, Torah.

HAMON-GOG (Há' môn-gōg) Place-name meaning “horde of Gog.” Place where Ezekiel predicted burial of defeated army of Gog (Ezek. 39:11,15). Its location is not known. See Ezekiel; Gog and Magog; Hamonah.

HAMONAH (Há' mō' nah) Place-name meaning “horde.” Town in valley of Hamon-gog where Israel would bury the defeated army of Gog (Ezek. 39:16). The exact meaning and location of the city are not clear except that Ezekiel was determined that Israel would keep the land ritually pure in all circumstances. TEV, REB translate Hamonah as “nearby” or “great horde” and thus do not mention the city. See Ezekiel; Gog and Magog; Hamon-gog.

HAMOR (Há' mōr) Personal name meaning “donkey” or “ass.” In Gen. 33:19, the father of Shechem. From the children of Hamor, Jacob purchased a parcel of land on which he erected an altar. Later the remains of Joseph, Jacob's son, were buried on this parcel of land (Josh. 24:32). Hamor and Shechem were killed by Simeon and Levi in an act of revenge for the outrage committed against Dinah (Gen. 34:25-26). Hamor was the original clan ancestor of the city of Shechem (Judg. 9:28).

HAMRAN (Hām' rān) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps, “vineyard.” Member of family of Esau (1 Chron. 1:35,41). KJV spells the name “Amram.” The parallel list has Hemdan (Gen. 36:26); NI V picks up Hemdan in 1 Chronicles along with some Hebrew and Greek manuscripts. Apparently early copyists misread similar Hebrew letters. See Hemdan.

HAMSTRING To cripple by cutting the leg tendons. Horses captured in war were frequently hamstrung (KJV, hough) (Josh. 11:6,9; 2 Sam. 8:4; 1 Chron. 18:4). The hamstringing of oxen (Gen. 49:6 modern translations) is an example of rash anger.

HAMUEL (Hām' u ēl) (KJV) See Hammuel.

HAMUL (Há' mūl) Personal name meaning “pitied, spared” or “El is father-in-law” or “El is hot, angry.” Son of Pharez and grandson of Judah (Gen. 46:12) and thus a clan leader in Judah (Num. 26:21).

HAMULITE (Hā' mūl īt) Member of clan of Hamul (Num. 26:21). See Hamul.

HAMUTAL (Hā mū' tāl) Personal name meaning “father-in-law or kindred of the dew.” Mother of King Jehoahaz (2 Kings 23:31) and King Zedekiah (2 Kings 24:18) of Judah. See Jehoahaz; Zedekiah.

HANAMEEL (Hā nām' ē ēl) Personal name meaning “God is gracious.” Uncle of Jeremiah from whom the prophet bought the field in Anathoth (Jer. 32:7-12). Jeremiah's act symbolized God's long-range plans to restore the people to the land after exile.

HANAMEL (Hān' ā mēl) Modern translation spelling of Hanameel. See Hanameel.

HANAN (Hā' nān) Personal name meaning “gracious.” Personal name probably originally connected to divine name such as El, Yahweh, or Baal. 1. Clan or guild of prophets or priests living in the temple. Jeremiah used their temple chamber for his meeting with the Rechabites (Jer. 35:4). 2. Clan of temple servants who returned to Jerusalem from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:46). 3. Man that Nehemiah appointed as assistant temple treasurer to receive and disperse tithes brought to care for the Levites (Neh. 13:13). 4. One of David's military heroes (1 Chron. 11:43). 5. Levite who instructed the people in the Lord's law while Ezra read it (Neh. 8:7). 6. Levite who sealed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God's law (Neh. 10:10). 7. Another signer of Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:22). 8. Another who signed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:26). 9. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:23). 10. Descendant of Saul in tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:38).

HANANEEL (Hānān' ē ēl) (KJV) or HANANEL (Hān' ā nēl) Place-name meaning “God is gracious.” Tower marking northern wall of Jerusalem. Jeremiah predicted its rebuilding in the day of the Lord to come (Jer. 31:38; cp. Zech. 14:10). Nehemiah led the nation to rebuild the tower along with the rest of the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 3:1; 12:39). It may well have been part of the earliest fortress protecting the temple (Neh. 2:8; 7:2 NASB).

HANANI (Hā nā' nī) Personal name meaning “my grace” or a shortened form of “Yahweh is gracious.” 1. Father of Prophet Jehu (1 Kings 16:1,7; 2 Chron. 19:2). 2. Man who agreed under Ezra's leadership to divorce his foreign wife to protect the Jews from temptation to worship idols (Ezra 10:16-20,44). 3. Nehemiah's brother who reported the poor conditions in Jerusalem to him while Nehemiah was still in Persia (Neh. 1:2). Nehemiah placed him in charge of the military protection of the restored Jerusalem (Neh. 7:2). Some have tried to identify him with the Hunani mentioned in the Elephantine Papyri, but this is far from certain. 4. Priest musician at dedication of Jerusalem walls (Neh. 12:36). 5. Temple musician and descendant of Heman (1 Chron. 25:4). Some would equate him with 4. above. 6. Original leader of one course of temple musicians (1 Chron. 25:25). 7. Prophetic seer who condemned King Asa of Judah (910-869 B.C.) for paying tribute to King Ben-hadad of Damascus rather than relying on God (2 Chron. 16:7). Asa imprisoned Hanani (2 Chron. 16:10).

HANANIAH (Hān ā nī' ā) Personal name with two Hebrew spellings meaning “Yah(weh) is gracious.” 1. Prophet from Gibeon who opposed Jeremiah by promising immediate deliverance from Babylon. Jeremiah could combat this false prophecy only by telling the people to wait until they saw it fulfilled in history (Jer. 28:8-9). Jeremiah could not even oppose Hananiah when he tried to embarrass Jeremiah by breaking the symbolic yoke that Jeremiah was wearing (vv. 10-11). Only later did Jeremiah receive a countering word from God to oppose Hananiah (vv. 12-17). 2. Father of Zedekiah, a court official, in time of Jeremiah (Jer. 36:12). 3. Grandfather of captain of guard who arrested Jeremiah as he left Jerusalem (Jer. 37:13). 4. Jewish name of Daniel's friend Shadrach (Dan. 1:7). See Shadrach. 5. Son of Zerubbabel in the royal line of David (1 Chron. 3:19). See Zerubbabel. 6. Clan head in tribe of Benjamin living in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:24). 7. Son of Heman among the priestly musicians in the temple (1 Chron. 25:4). He may be the same as the head of a course of priests (v. 23), though the latter's name has a slightly variant spelling in Hebrew. 8. Military leader under King Uzziah of Judah (792-740 B.C.) (2 Chron. 26:11). 9. Man who followed Ezra's leadership and divorced his foreign wife to protect Judah from the temptation to worship foreign gods (Ezra 10:16-20,44). 10. A member of the perfumers' guild who helped Nehemiah repair the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 3:8 NASB). 11. Man who helped Nehemiah repair the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 3:30). 12. Ruler of the temple fortress under Nehemiah (Neh. 7:2 NASB). Nehemiah set him up as one of two administrators of Jerusalem because he was trustworthy and revered God more than other men. 13. Man who signed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God's law; perhaps the same as 12. above (Neh. 10:23). 14. A priest immediately after the time of return from Babylonian exile (Neh. 12:12) when Joiakim was high priest. 15. Priest musician who helped Nehemiah celebrate the completion of the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 12:41).

HAND Part of the human body, namely the terminal part of the arm that enables a person to make and use tools and perform functions. The Greek and Hebrew words that are translated by the English word “hand” appear approximately 1,800 times. Of these occurrences to which “hand” is referred, the literal sense is intended some 500 times, and the figurative sense some 1,300 times.

The references to “hand” often encompassed the idea of parts of a hand. Thus, in Gen. 41:42, when Pharaoh took his signet ring “from his hand” and placed it “on Joseph's hand,” “hand” was used in the place of “finger.” Likewise, in Ezek. 23:42, “hand” was used to mean wrists: “they put bracelets on the hands of the women.” The context in which the word appears determines the meaning and usage of the word.

The largest number of figurative uses of “hand” relate to God. The “hand of God” or “in Thy hand” is an idiom referring to the supreme and almighty power and authority of God (1 Chron. 29:12). In Isa. 59:1 God's hand was described as mighty. Exodus 13:3-16 described God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt by His “strong hand.” The creative work of God involved the use of His hands to make the heavens and the earth (Pss. 8:6; 95:5). God uses His hand to uphold and guide the righteous (Pss. 37:24; 139:10). Punishment and affliction come from the hand of God (Exod. 9:3; Deut. 2:15; Judg. 2:15; 1 Sam. 7:13; 12:15; Ruth 1:13). The hand of God can be upon someone in either a good or bad sense. In a good sense, it meant to bring aid, while the negative connotation meant to hinder or distress (Amos 1:8).

The phrase “into someone's hand” was used figuratively to convey the idea of authority involving responsibility, care, or dominion over someone or something (Gen. 9:2). Examples of this concept include: Sarah's authority over Hagar (Gen. 16:6,9); Joseph's administration of Potiphar's house (Gen. 39:3-8); and the role of Moses and Aaron as leaders of Israel (Num. 33:1). Victory and deliverance were portrayed also by the use of this phrase. Victory over someone was conveyed by the phrase delivered “into your hand” (Josh. 6:2; cp. Gen. 49:8), while deliverance was understood as “out of the hand of” (Exod. 3:8 KJV).

Functions of the hand were often used by biblical writers to identify certain uses of the word. Since a person takes possession of objects with the hand, the biblical writers adapted “hand” to mean possession. A literal translation of Gen. 39:1 would include the statement that Potiphar bought Joseph “from the Ishmaelites.” In 1 Kings 11:31 Jeroboam was told that the Lord was about to tear the kingdom “from the hand” of Solomon.

“To give the hand” meant that one had pledged or submitted to another, as in 2 Kings 10:15 and Ezra 10:19. Submission to the Lord is implied in 2 Chron. 30:8, where “yield to” is literally “give hand to.”

“To stretch the hand” was used to convey two thoughts: attacking the enemy in battle (Josh. 8:19,26) and an intense desire for communion with God (Ps. 143:6).

Work or the action in which one is involved is expressed by the words “work of your hand” (Deut. 2:7; 30:9 NASB). In 1 Sam. 23:16 Jonathan's helping David is literally “he strengthened his hand in God,” that is, increased his faith and hope in God's help.

The Hebrew phrase “high hand” indicated willful rebellion against God (Num. 15:30; Deut. 32:27) but also military power (Exod. 14:8; Mic. 5:9). A similar image is projected by the phrase “shaking the hand” (Isa. 10:32 KJV; 11:15). The movement of the hand was interpreted as a sign of contempt and displeasure, or lack of respect. When used in reference to God, it symbolized God's warning and punishment.

Hebrew “to fill the hand” expressed the consecration of a priest (Judg. 17:5) or a congregation's dedication (2 Chron. 29:31).

The word “hand” was used in a number of specialized ways. It came to mean “side,” perhaps because of the location of the hands and arms on the body. A peculiar use was that of hand for “monument” (1 Sam. 15:12). The spreading of the hands denoted a large “space” (Gen. 34:21). See Laying on of Hands; Work; Worship.

HANDBAG See Bag 1.

HANDBREADTH Ancient measurement equal to the width of the hand at the base of the fingers (about three inches). Ezekiel's long cubit was six handbreadths, one more than the common cubit (Ezek. 40:5). In Ps. 39:5 “a few handbreadths” illustrates the shortness of life.

HANDKERCHIEF Greek term soudarion is borrowed from a Latin term used for a table napkin or a handkerchief. The term derives from the Latin root for sweat, suggesting that a soudarion was a cloth for wiping sweat or a sweatband. Such a cloth is likely intended at Acts 19:12. The same Greek term is used for a cloth in which money was buried (Luke 19:20) and for the cloth used to cover the face of the dead (John 11:44; 20:7).

HANDLES Literally “hands.” The thumb pieces or knobs of the bolt or latch of a door (Song 5:5).

HANDSTAVE Wooden staff used as a weapon by foot soldiers. KJV used “handstave” to translate a weapon at Ezek. 39:9. The nature of the weapon is unclear though the weapon was made of wood (39:10). The NRSV renders the term “handpike”; NASB and NIV, “war clubs”; REB, “throwing sticks.” See Arms and Armor.

HANES (Ha' nez) Egypt place-name. City to which Israel sent ambassadors in time of Isaiah to seek military and economic help (Isa. 30:4). Isaiah condemned the government policy of seeking Egyptian help rather than trusting Yahweh. Hanes has often been located at Heracleopolis Magna in southern Egypt just north of the Nile Delta, modern Ahnas. This would be a natural parallel to northern Zoan or Tanis. A more likely identification, however, is Heracleopolis Parva, modern Hanes, almost directly east of Tanis and much more likely to be the goal of Judah's ambassadors than the distant southern Heracleopolis. Ashurbanipal of Egypt also mentions Hanes in listing Egyptian cities. See Zoan.

HANGING A method of ridiculing, shaming, and desecrating an enemy. Hanging was not regarded as a means of capital punishment according to biblical law, although it was practiced by the Egyptians (Gen. 40:19,22) and the Persians (Esther 7:9). The Israelites, after putting an enemy or criminal to death, might hang them on a gibbet or tree for public scorn as added degradation and warning (Gen. 40:19; Deut. 21:22; Josh. 8:29; 2 Sam. 4:12), but biblical law demanded that the corpses be taken down and buried the same day (Deut. 21:22-23). Joshua 8:29; 10:26-27 record that the bodies of the kings of Ai and the kings of the Amorites were taken down and buried at sundown on the same day they were hanged. Contrast the undetermined length of exposure allowed by Pharaoh (Gen. 40:19), the Philistines (1 Sam. 31:10), and the Gibeonites (2 Sam. 21:8-10). A hanged man was considered an insult to God (Gal. 3:13) and therefore defiled the land.

According to the first-century Jewish historian, Josephus, all executed criminals were afterward hanged. The Mishnah prescribes hanging only for those put to death by stoning. Some Bible students think hanging was prescribed only for blasphemers and idolaters.

Hanging oneself is mentioned only once in the OT and once in the NT. Ahithophel, David's counselor, joined the conspiracy of Absalom, David's son (2 Sam. 15:31). Feeling his ploy for personal power evaporate, he set his house in order and hanged himself (2 Sam. 17:23). Judas, one of the 12 disciples of our Lord, in a desperate effort to resolve guilt and atone for the misdeed of betraying Jesus for 30 pieces of silver, went out into the night and hanged himself (Matt. 27:5). Acts 1:18 says he fell headlong and burst asunder, presumably as the rope broke.

HANIEL (Hān' ı̄ ʕl) (KJV, 1 Chron. 7:39) See Hanniel.

HANNAH (Hān' na) Personal name meaning “grace.” One of the wives of Elkanah and mother of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:2). Because she had been barren for many years, she vowed to the Lord that if she should give birth to a son, she would dedicate the child to God (1 Sam. 1:11). Subsequently, she gave birth to the child Samuel. She fulfilled her vow by bringing her son to the sanctuary at Shiloh, where he served the Lord under the direction of Eli. Later on, Hannah had other sons and daughters. See Samuel.

HANNATHON (Hān' ná thōn) Place-name meaning “grace.” Town on northern border of tribal territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:14). The ElAmarna tablets and the annals of Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria also mention it. It is probably present-day Tell el-Badawiye, about six miles north of Nazareth.

HANNIEL (Hān' nı̄ ʕl) Personal name meaning “God is gracious.” 1. Representative of tribe of Manasseh on council that helped Joshua and Eleazar divide the land among the tribes (Num. 34:23). 2. Member of tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:39).

HANOCH (Hā' nōk) Personal name with same Hebrew spelling as Enoch meaning “dedicated” or “vassal.” See Enoch. 1. Son of Reuben and grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:9) and thus a clan leader in Israel (Exod. 6:14; Num. 26:5). 2. Son of Midian and grandson of Abraham and thus one of the Midianites (Gen. 25:4). See Midian.

HANOCHITE (Hā' nōk ı̄t) Member of clan of Hanoch. See Hanoch.

HANUKKAH An eight-day festival that commemorated the cleansing and rededication of the temple following the victories of Judas Maccabeus in 167/165 B.C. It is the only Jewish festival not specified in the Hebrew Bible. Hanukkah, also called the Feast of Dedication, begins on the 25th day of Kislev (December). One candle is lit each day until a total of eight are lit. Jesus was in Jerusalem once during this festival (John 10:22).

The word hanukkah means “consecration,” “dedication.” After Antiochus Epiphanes conducted pagan worship in the temple, Judas Maccabeus cleansed the temple from the pollution of pagan worship. He made a new sacrificial altar and holy vessels, burned incense on the incense altar, lit the lampstands to give light to the temple, placed bread on the table, and hung new curtains. He dedicated the new altar with sacrifices, song, and joyous worship for eight days.

Hanukkah's ongoing significance lies in its commemoration of the victory of the few whose desire for freedom to practice their religion impelled them to battle against great odds. After the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 the feast was observed by the lighting of lamps in private homes, thus, the description, Feast of Lights. See Festivals.

HANUN (Hā' nūn) Personal name meaning “blessed” or “favored.” 1. King of Ammon whom David sought to honor and with whom he sought to renew the peace treaty. Hanun and his advisors misinterpreted David's act and treated David's messengers shamefully. David's military response brought victory over Ammon and Syria (2 Sam. 10). This set the stage for David's sinful relationship with Bathsheba. 2. Man who repaired the Valley Gate of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:13). See Jerusalem. 3. Another man who worked under Nehemiah to repair the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 3:30).

HAPHRAIM (Hāph rā' īm) (KJV) or HAPHARAIM (Hāph á rā' īm) Place-name meaning “two holes” or “two wells.” Town in tribal territory of Issachar (Josh. 19:17-19). It is modern et-Taiyibeh, about nine miles northwest of Beth-shean.

HAPIRU See Habiru.

HAPPIZZEZ (Hăp' pî zēz) Personal name meaning “the shattered one.” Leader of one course of the priests (1 Chron. 24:6-7,15) and thus the original ancestor for that priestly clan. KJV, REB spell the name Apses.

HAR-HERES (Hār-hē' rēs) NRSV reading in Judg. 1:35 for Mount Heres, NRSV transliterating har, Hebrew word for “mountain.” See Heres.

HAR MAGEDON (Hār Mā gēd' ōn) NASB, NRSV transliteration of Greek transliteration from Hebrew in Rev. 16:16 for place-name other English translations transliterate as Armageddon. See Armageddon.

HARA (Hā' rā) Place-name of uncertain meaning. City or region in northern Mesopotamia where, according to 1 Chron. 5:26, the Assyrians under Tiglath-pileser settled some of the exiles from east of the Jordan in the Northern Kingdom in 734 B.C. The name does not occur in the parallel passages (1 Kings 17:6; 18:11). The scribe copying Chronicles may have copied part of the Hebrew word for either Habor or for river a second time in a way that later generations made into the name Hara. The accounts in 1 Kings place the exile to these cities in 722 B.C.

HARADAH (Hā rā' da) Place-name meaning “quaking” or “terror.” Station in Israel's wilderness journey (Num. 33:24-25). It is probably modern el-Harada, over 50 miles south of Aqaba.

HARAN (Hā' rān) Personal and place-name meaning “mountaineer” or “caravan route.” Three men and an important city of northern Mesopotamia located on the Balik River. 1. Terah's son and Lot's father (Gen. 11:26-29,31). 2. Son of Caleb's concubine (1 Chron. 2:46). 3. Son of Shimei and a Levite (1 Chron. 23:9). 4. The city became Abraham's home (Gen. 11:31-32; 12:4-5) and remained home for his relatives like Laban (Gen. 27:43). Jacob went there and married (Gen. 28:10; 29:4). In the eighth century Assyria conquered it (2 Kings 19:12; Isa. 37:12). It was a trade partner of Tyre (Ezek. 27:23). Through excavations begun in the 1950s, the city was determined to have been established by the middle of the third millennium and was occupied through the Assyro-Babylonian period until Islamic times. The city was also a major center of worship for the moon god Sin. Its name is spelled differently from that of the men in Hebrew.

HARAR (Hā' rār) Geographical name perhaps related to Hebrew word for “mountain.” The word appears in slightly difficult forms in its appearances in the Hebrew Bible. Three of David's military heroes are related to Harar (2 Sam. 23:11,33; 1 Chron. 11:34-35). Harar can either be a town, a region, a tribe, or a general reference to mountain country.

HARARITE (Ha' rá rí) Person from Harar. See Harar.

HARBEL (Hār' bēl) TEV reading of place-name in Num. 34:11, usually translated Riblah but spelled in Hebrew with beginning "h," which can be the Hebrew definite article. See Riblah.

HARBONA (Hār bō' nā) Persian personal name, perhaps meaning "barren." A eunuch on the staff of King Ahasuerus of Persia (Esther 1:10; 7:9).

HARBONAH (Hār bō' nā) Alternate spelling of Harbona, based on Hebrew text's alteration between Hebrew and Aramaic spelling. See Harbona.

HARD SAYING Teaching difficult to understand or accept (John 6:60).

HARDNESS OF HEART The action or state of resistance to and rejection of the Word and will of God. Hardness of heart can be a refusal to hear the Word of God, or it can be a refusal to submit and obey the will of God. This rejection can include both the message delivered and the messenger who delivers it.

"Hardening" is a process whereby a person ceases to have a conscience about an evil action that is committed or a sinful attitude that is embodied, such as pride, godlessness, hatred, lust, etc. (Heb. 3:13; 1 Tim. 4:2). Sinful habits can produce or compound this hardened condition. Hardness of heart can eventually destroy one's sense of sin, ruling out the possibility of repentance.

One of the major issues in this topic concerns the agent of the hardening. The Bible pictures both God and individuals as agents of hardening. For example one passage in the book of Exodus states that Pharaoh hardened his own heart (Exod. 8:15). In other places, God is said to be the one who hardened Pharaoh's heart (Exod. 4:21; 10:1). Paul asserts that God will harden whomever He wants and will bestow mercy on whomever He chooses (Rom. 9:18). The Bible also gives strong warnings against hardening the heart, implying that persons are responsible for the condition of their hearts (Ps. 95:8; Heb. 3:8,15; 4:7). Hardening may therefore be considered both the work of God and the individual.

The significance of the passages that speak of hardness of heart is that God uses these destitute conditions as a means of accomplishing His purposes. Because of the hardness of Pharaoh's heart, God liberated the Israelites from Egyptian slavery and eventually led them to the promised land (Josh. 11:20). God used the hardness of Israel to bring salvation to the Gentiles (Rom. 11:7-25). In these passages God's sovereign purposes are manifested. The entrenched hardness of people's hearts may be the occasion through which God manifests His mercy and grace. The brightness of God's redemption is highlighted against the darkness of humanity's sin.

HARE Long-eared member of the rabbit family (Leporidae), especially those born with open eyes and fur. Hares were regarded as unclean (Lev. 11:6; Deut. 14:7) and were forbidden for Israelites to eat.

HAREPH (Hā' rēph) Personal name meaning “clever” or “reproach.” Descendant of Caleb and thus member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:51).

HARETH (Hā' rēth) Place-name meaning “woodland.” Forest where David went at advice of Gad, the prophet, as he hid from Saul (1 Sam. 22:5). It was in Judah, but the exact location is debated. Some students place it at Khirbet Khoreisa two miles south of Ziph and about six miles southeast of Hebron. Others think it is near the village of Kharas near Keilah. See Hereth.

HARHAI AH (Hār hī' a) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of goldsmiths' guild whose son helped Nehemiah repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:8).

HARHAS (Hār hās) Foreign name of uncertain meaning. Grandfather of the husband of Huldah, the prophet (2 Kings 22:14). Second Chronicles 34:22 spells the name “Hasrah” with other manuscript evidence pointing to Hasdah or Harham. Many Bible students think Hasrah is original.

HARHUR (Hār hūr) Personal name meaning “glow, burn,” possibly describing fever of mother at birth. A temple servant who returned from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:51).

HARIM (Hār' rīm) Personal name meaning “dedicated.” 1. Clan leader from Bethlehem whose family returned from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:32). 2. Head of one course of priests appointed under David's leadership (1 Chron. 24:8; cp. Ezra 2:39; Neh. 12:15). Some members of this clan agreed under Ezra's leadership to divorce their foreign wives to protect the people from the temptation of false worship (Ezra 10:21). 3. Another Israelite clan with members having to divorce foreign wives under Ezra (Ezra 10:31). The clan name may have come from an original ancestor but more likely from the town of residence—Charta, eight miles northeast of Joppa. One of these clan members helped Nehemiah build the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 3:11). 4. Priest who signed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God's law (Neh. 10:5). 5. Clan leader who signed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:27).

HARIPH (Hār' ṭph) Personal name meaning “sharp” or “fresh.” 1. Israelite clan whose members accompanied Zerubbabel in returning from Babylonian exile about 537 B.C. (Neh. 7:24). 2. Leader of people who signed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God's law (Neh. 10:19).

HARLOT A prostitute. The most famous harlot in the Bible is Rahab of Jericho, who saved the Israelite spies sent by Joshua to scout out the promised land (Josh. 2). Israel spared her and her family when they conquered and destroyed Jericho. She continued to dwell with the Israelites (Josh. 6:23-25). She is listed in the genealogy of Jesus (Matt. 1:5). Her action on behalf of the Israelite spies won her a place in the roll call of the faithful (Heb. 11:31; cp. James 2:25).

The Bible gives few details of the ways in which harlots like Rahab practiced their trade. Evidently, harlots might solicit along the roadside (Gen. 38:14-15). Brothels, which often served as taverns and inns, were also known in the ancient Near East. Rahab's house may have been one (Josh. 2:1). It is possible that the prostitute had a distinctive mark on her forehead (Jer. 3:3) and breasts (Hos. 2:2). She might attract attention by her clothing, jewelry, and makeup (Jer. 4:30; Ezek. 23:40; Rev. 17:4). Flattering with words (Prov. 2:16) and making sweet music (Isa. 23:16) might be used to lure or soothe a client. Her payment might be in money, or it could be in jewelry (Ezek. 23:42) or other items of value (Gen. 38:15-18; cp. Luke 15:30).

Although harlots were considered socially inferior, they did have legal rights, as is evident from the incident recorded in 1 Kings 3:16-22. See Fornication; Prostitution.

HARMON (Hār' mon) Place-name of uncertain meaning in Amos 4:3 as translated by NRSV, NASB, NIV. KJV reads “palace,” changing the first letter of the Hebrew word to a common Hebrew noun for royal fortresses. TEV does not translate the final Hebrew word, saying it is unclear. REB changes two Hebrew letters slightly to translate, “dunghill.” The earliest Greek translation read “Mount Rimmon.” Some Bible students change the first letter slightly to read “Mount Hermon.” If Harmon, the unchanged Hebrew text, is read, we know nothing of the place meant. Whatever the precise reading of the original, Amos' intention was to describe the drastic fate waiting the sinful women of Samaria, a fate using terminology connected with slaughter of animals and exile.

HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS Arrangement of the Gospels in parallel columns for the purpose of studying their similarities and differences. Andreas Osiander (1498-1552), a German Bible scholar of the Protestant Reformation, was the first person to use the phrase “harmony of the Gospels” for a parallel organization of Gospel texts which he designed. By choosing a musical term as a metaphor for his columnar arrangement, Osiander likened the total picture of Jesus supplied by all four Gospels to the sound of several musical notes being played together in one chord. A harmony of the Gospels may also be called a synopsis or a parallel of the Gospels.

History of Harmonies While the term “harmony of the Gospels” was not used until the sixteenth century, Bible scholars began efforts to compare and harmonize the four accounts of Jesus as early as the second century. At that time, Tatian, a Christian from Syria, compiled the four Gospels into a single paraphrased narrative called the Diatessaron. All we know about Tatian's work is from references to it by other writers.

The Diatessaron represents one approach to harmonizing the Gospels: the weaving together of material from the Gospels to present one continuous narrative of Jesus' life. Several biblical scholars in the past 200 years have attempted similar works.

Few contemporary scholars give credence to attempts to “harmonize” either the texts or the information contained in the Gospels into one, exhaustive record of Jesus. Rather, they recognize the differences and compare the variations between the Gospels and use their findings as an aid for interpretation. The first great work in this second approach to harmonizing the Gospels was done by Ammonius of Alexandria in the third century. Ammonius took the text of Matthew and wrote beside the text in parallel columns any passages from the other three Gospels that corresponded to them. Consequently, Ammonius' work only showed the relationship between Matthew and the other three Gospels. Any parallels that existed independently among the other three were ignored. In the fourth century the church historian Eusebius developed a cross-reference system which provided a way to locate and study a passage which had parallels in any of the other Gospels.

J. J. Griesbach, another German, made one of the most significant contributions to this field when he produced his Synopse, a parallel arrangement of the texts of the first three Gospels, in 1776. Griesbach derived his title from the Greek word that means “to view at the same time,” and consequently gave Matthew, Mark, and Luke the designation “Synoptic Gospels” because of their similar perspective (in contrast to John) on the life of Jesus. Griesbach's work still serves as the basic model for scholars who make comparisons between the Gospels in order to aid their interpretation of a given text.

Need for Comparative Study Even the most casual reading of the NT reveals the need and helpfulness of a comparative study of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Note the following: 1. Some of the material contained in one Gospel is repeated almost word for word in one or both of the other Gospels (the story of Jesus' disciples plucking grain on the Sabbath, Mark 2:23-27, Matt. 12:1-8; Luke 6:1-5). 2. Some material, part of which appears vital to the record of Jesus' teaching, is included in only one Gospel (the parable of the prodigal son, Luke 15:11-32).

The Synoptic Problem As noted above, scholars have long noted the particular similarities that abound between Matthew, Mark, and Luke. In all three Gospels: 1. The appearance of John the Baptist, Jesus' baptism and temptation, and the initiation of Jesus' public ministry are linked together. 2. Jesus' ministry is confined to Galilee until He attended the Passover celebration in Jerusalem where He was crucified. 3. The story ends with His crucifixion and resurrection.

In addition to the rough similarity in their plots and similar points of view, the three Gospels exhibit an undeniable interrelatedness with respect to actual content: Luke contains 50 percent of the substance of Mark's verses, while Matthew contains a full 90 percent of Mark. Yet, for all these similarities, the three Gospels also possess significant differences. Scholars have labeled the issues surrounding this question “the synoptic problem.”

An Early Solution One of the earliest and most influential answers to the synoptic problem was offered by Augustine (A.D. 354-430). He decided that Matthew wrote first and that Mark produced his Gospel by abridging what Matthew had written. Luke was thought to be dependent on both of them. Augustine's position was the orthodox view for over 1,400 years.

Later Solutions During the 1800's advances were made in archaeology and the study of ancient languages. New methods were introduced to biblical studies. These changes produced several fresh solutions to the synoptic problem.

The first “modern” solution focused on the hypothesis of a single, original Gospel which is now lost to us. Some scholars believed it may have been an orally transmitted gospel that had become formalized through constant repetition, while others believed it was an actual document. In either case, those who believed this hypothesis assumed Matthew, Mark, and Luke individually selected material from this Gospel as they wrote their accounts.

Other solutions to the problem centered on the belief that the gospel writers used two documents. Reversing the established view that Matthew was written first, proponents of the two document theory concluded that Mark was actually the first Gospel and that the other two Synoptic Gospels were dependent upon Mark. Because of the similarities between teaching passages contained in both Matthew and Luke, these scholars also theorized that Matthew and Luke both had one other source, a collection of Jesus' teachings.

The Four-Document Hypothesis In the early part of the 20th century, B. H. Streeter, a British scholar, proposed the four-document theory as a solution to the synoptic problem. Streeter agreed with the two-document theory to a point but thought it failed to go far enough in explaining the existence of material that was exclusive to either Matthew or Luke. Therefore, Streeter offered the hypothesis that the writers of the Synoptic Gospels used a total of four documents as sources for their works.

a. The Priority of Mark Like the proponents of the two-document theory, Streeter believed Mark was written first and served as a source for both Matthew and Luke. Several facts led to this belief. First, all three Gospels usually agree on the order in which they arrange their material. However, when they do disagree, Matthew and Mark frequently agree compared to Luke, or Luke and Mark will agree compared to Matthew. Matthew and Luke hardly ever agree compared to Mark. The same is true in word usage and sentence structure. Mark often agrees with Matthew or Luke against the other, but Matthew and Luke rarely agree against Mark. These two facts would indicate that the other writers used Mark. A third piece of evidence indicating the priority of Mark is that statements in Mark which could offend or perplex readers are either omitted or presented in a less provocative form by the other two Synoptics (cp. Mark 4:38 with Matt. 8:25 and Luke 8:24). Streeter believed that when taken together, these three facts could only lead to the conclusion that Mark was written first and used by Matthew and Luke.

b. The Existence of “Q” Streeter also agreed with the proponents of the two-document theory that Matthew and Luke used a common source other than Mark. German scholars gave this source the name “Q” from the German Quelle, which means “source.” Its content can only be deduced by comparing passages common to Matthew and Luke but absent from Mark. Scholars agree that “Q” was primarily a collection of Jesus' teachings with little narrative and no mention of the crucifixion and resurrection. The most significant contribution of “Q” is the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5-7 and Luke 6:20-49).

c. The “M” Source Streeter believed Matthew had access to a body of material unknown to (or at least unused by) Mark and Luke. This source derives its name “M” from the initial for Matthew. Because Matthew's infancy story differs from Luke, it is considered part of the material contained in this source. “M” also contained many OT proof texts related to Jesus' role as Messiah.

d. The “L” Source The fourth and final source in the four-document hypothesis is believed to contain the material exclusive to Luke. This source contained at least an infancy story and many parables. The stories of the good Samaritan and the prodigal son are a part of this “L” source.

The Place of Inspiration Many people believe the discussion of “sources” used by the Gospel writers impinges on the inspiration of the Scriptures. If Matthew, Mark, and Luke used other documents to write their Gospels, does God still have a place in their authorship? Careful thought will reveal that “sources” and inspiration are not mutually exclusive. Old Testament writers clearly show they used written sources (Josh. 10:13; 2 Sam. 1:18; 1 Kings 11:41; 2 Chron. 9:29).

Luke says, “Since many have undertaken to compile a narrative about the events that have been fulfilled among us, just as the original eye-witnesses and servants of the word handed them down to us, it also seemed good to me, having carefully investigated everything from the first, to write to you in orderly sequence” (Luke 1:1-3 HCSB). Luke made an important admission in this statement: he indicated knowledge of other accounts of Jesus' life and message. No known theory of inspiration violates a person's humanity to the point of negating his or her memory. Therefore, the gospel authored by Luke would certainly have had something in common with the sources known to him. Additionally, no theory of inspiration states that the human authors of biblical material used information or words which, until the precise moment of writing, had been entirely unknown to the writer. To assume that inspiration cannot involve the process of helping a human being to recognize divine truth and to shape that truth into the specific message God wants communicated is to limit the abilities of God's Spirit. Inspiration of both Testaments included God's leading writers to proper sources and directing in the use of the sources.

Summary While most contemporary scholars hold to the four-document theory (or a theory very similar to it), one must recognize any solution to the synoptic problem is a theory and not a proven fact. Many Bible students today are returning to the view that Matthew was written first. It must be admitted that many of the answers we desire about the origins of the Gospels are not available to us. Therefore, some modern questioners will find themselves extremely frustrated when they expect scientifically precise answers about documents, the original purpose of which was to be religiously reliable about the exciting good news from God through Jesus Christ. We can trust and obey the gospels without having the answer to every question about their origins and relationships.

HARNEPHER (Hār' nə phēr) Egyptian personal name meaning “Horus (god) is good.” Member of tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36).

HARNESS KJV translation of a term meaning breastplate (1 Kings 22:34; 2 Chron. 18:33) or weapons (2 Chron. 9:24), where RSV translation “myrrh” and REB “perfumes” reflect a different Hebrew text, changed to “weaponry” in NRSV. See Arms and Armor.

HAROD (Há' rōd) Place-name meaning “quake,” “terror,” or “intermittent spring.” Place where God led Gideon to test his troops to reduce their numbers before fighting Midian (Judg. 7:1). It is modern Ain Jalud near Gilboa, halfway between Affulah and Beth-shean. It is about two miles east-southeast of Jezreel. It was home for two of David's heroes (2 Sam. 23:25), though the parallel text in 1 Chron. 11:27 reads “Harorite,” representing a copyist's confusion of two letters similar in appearance. The “fountain” of 1 Sam. 29:1 was probably Harod. Some Bible students see a reference to Judg. 7:1 in Ps. 83:10 and make a slight change in the Hebrew text to read “Harod” instead of “En-dor” (cp. REB).

HARODITE (Há' rōd it) Citizen of Harod. See Harod.

HAROEH (Há rō' ēh) Personal name meaning “the seer.” Descendant of Caleb in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:52). The same person is apparently called Reaiah in 1 Chron. 4:2, an easy change to make in copying Hebrew and probably the original name. As other names in the list, this may represent a place-name as well as a personal name.

HARORITE (Há' rō rīt) Copyist's spelling of Harodite (1 Chron. 11:27). See Harod.

HAROSHETH (Há rō' shēth) Place-name meaning “forest land.” First part of compound Hebrew place-name Harosheth-hagoiim, meaning Harosheth of the Gentiles (KJV, REB, TEV) or nations. Home of Sisera, captain of the army of Jabin of Hazor (Judg. 4:2). He mustered his troops there and marched them to the river Kishon to face Barak and Deborah (v. 13). Barak chased the army back to Harosheth and killed them there (v. 16). It may be the same as Muhrashti of the Amarna letters. Its location is debated, some favoring Tell el-Ama at the foot of Mount Carmel about nine miles south of Haifa near the Arab village of Haritiyeh. Others would see Haroseth as a common noun meaning “woods” and locate it in the woods or forests of Galilee, using some evidence from the earliest Greek translation. This view would read Josh. 12:23 as “king of Goiim in Galilee” (TEV, NRSV), and equate the king with the ruler of the Galilean forests.

HAROSHETH HAGGOYIM (Há rō' shēth Hág gōi' im) (NIV) See Harosheth.

HAROSHETH-HAGOIIM (Há rō' shēth-há gōi' im) Full Hebrew name of Harosheth. See Harosheth.

HAROSHETH-HAGOYIM (Há rō' shēth-hágōi' im) (NASB) See Harosheth.

HARP See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

HARPOON Barbed (KJV) spear or javelin used in hunting large fish or whales, mentioned as an inadequate weapon for catching the sea monster Leviathan (Job. 41:7) and thus showing God's sovereignty over human inadequacy.

HARROW To pulverize and smooth the soil by means of a harrow, a cultivating implement with spikes, spring teeth, or disks. The modern harrow was unknown in ancient Egypt. The biblical references to harrowing or breaking clods (Job 39:10; Isa. 28:24; Hos. 10:11) distinguish this process from plowing. Perhaps the dragging of branches to smooth the soil over seed is what is intended. The NIV replaced harrow with “till” (Job 39:10) and with “break up the ground” (Hos. 10:11). Modern translations replace the harrow of the KJV with iron picks (NIV, NRSV); iron hoes (TEV), or sharp iron instruments (NASB) at 2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Chron. 20:3. See Agriculture; Tools.

HARSHA (Hār' shā) Personal name meaning “unable to talk, silent” or “magician, sorcerer.” Clan of temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylonian exile about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:52). Tel-Harsha (Ezra 2:59 NASB) was one of the places where Jewish exiles lived in Babylon, so that the clan could have taken its name from the Babylonian home or given its name to the Babylonian home.

HART Adult male deer (Ps. 42:1; Isa. 35:6). See Deer.

HARUM (Hā' rūm) Personal name meaning “the exalted.” A member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8).

HARUMAPH (Hā ru' māph) Personal name meaning “split nose.” Father of worker who helped Nehemiah rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10).

HARUPHITE (Hā ru' phit) Clan or place-name meaning “early” or “reproach.” Reading of early Hebrew scribes in 1 Chron. 12:5. Written Hebrew text has Hariphites. Haruph is otherwise unknown. It could be a clan or a town from which Shephatiah came. Hariphite would refer to citizen or descendent of Hariph. See Hariph.

HARUZ (Hā' rūz) Personal name meaning “gold” or “industrious.” Maternal grandfather of Anion, king of Judah (642-640 B.C.). He was from Jotbah (2 Kings 21:19). The home may not be in Judah and thus represent foreign influence on the king. See Jotbah.

HARVEST Festive occasion for gathering the crops, usually marked by important religious festivals. Among the more important crops grown were wheat, grapes, and olives. Other crops included barley, flax, and various vegetables and fruits. Crops that had been planted were harvested at various times. Olives were harvested between mid-September to mid-November by beating the trees with long sticks (Deut. 24:20; Isa. 17:6). Flax was gathered in the spring by cutting it off near the ground and then laying the stalks out to dry (Josh. 2:6). Barley was harvested from April to May; wheat from May to June; and summer fruits from August to September. The average harvesting period was set at a period of seven weeks (Lev. 23:15; Deut. 16:9). All members of the family were expected to work during harvest (Prov. 10:5; 20:4). Significant events were connected with harvest times (Exod. 34:18-20; Deut. 16:13-16; Josh. 3:15; 1 Sam. 16:13). Harvest time became the occasion for joyful festivals (Exod. 34:22; Isa. 9:3).

Several laws governed the harvest. Part of the crop was not harvested (Lev. 19:9) out of concern for the poor. The firstfruits of the harvest were presented as an offering to God (Lev. 23:10).

The OT provides several figurative uses of harvest. A destroyed harvest represented affliction (Job 5:5; Isa. 16:9). The “time of harvest” sometimes represented the day of destruction (Jer. 51:33; Joel 3:13). “Harvest is past” meant the appointed time was gone (Jer. 8:20).

Jesus spoke often of the harvest in connection with the harvesting of souls (Matt. 9:37; Mark 4:29; John 4:35). In the parable of the tares, Jesus related harvest to the end of the world (Matt. 13:30-39). The rhythm of harvest time (sowing and reaping) provided an illustration of a spiritual truth (Gal. 6:7-8). See Agriculture; Festivals.

HASADIAH (Hās á di’ a) Personal name meaning “Yahweh is gracious.” Son of Zerubbabel and descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:20). See Zerubbabel.

HASENUAH (Hās ə nú’ a) (KJV, 1 Chron. 9:7) See Hassenuah.

HASHABIAH (Hāsh á bī' a) Personal name meaning “Yahweh has reckoned or imputed,” appearing in longer and shorter Hebrew spellings. 1. Ancestor of Merari among the Levite leaders (1 Chron. 6:45). 2. Another member of the Merari priesthood (1 Chron. 9:14; Neh. 11:15). 3. Temple musician and Levite under David (1 Chron. 25:1,3,6,19). 4. Family of Levites from Hebron given authority to carry out God's business in the service of the king west of the Jordan (1 Chron. 26:30). This shows the close connection between temple and palace, religious and political activity in Israel. 5. Leader of the tribe of Levi possibly connected with taking the ill-fated census under David (1 Chron. 27:17). He may be identical with 4. above. 6. Levite leader under Josiah who provided animals for the Levites to celebrate Passover (2 Chron. 35:9). 7. Levite leader Ezra conscripted to return to Jerusalem with him from Babylonian exile about 458 B.C. (Ezra 8:19). He shared responsibility for transporting temple treasures on the journey (vv. 24-30; cp. Neh. 12:24). 8. Israelite called to divorce his foreign wife to protect the people from temptation to false worship according to Greek manuscripts of Ezra 10:25 (NRSV). 9. Levite with administrative duties over city of Keilah who joined Nehemiah in repairing wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:17). He is probably the same one as the signer of Nehemiah's covenant to obey God's law (Neh. 10:11) and could be the same as both 7. and 8. above. 10. Ancestor of chief Levite in Jerusalem in Nehemiah's day (Neh. 11:22). 11. Priest one generation after the return from exile (Neh. 12:21).

HASHABNAH (Hā shāb' nah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “reckoning.” Signer of Nehemiah's covenant to obey God's law (Neh. 10:25).

HASHABNEIAH (Hāsh áb nē' a) or HASHABNIAH (Hāsh áb nī' a) (KJV) Personal name meaning “Yahweh has imputed to me.” 1. Father of man who helped Nehemiah repair the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 3:10). 2. Levite who led worship in Nehemiah's covenant ceremony in which people reaffirmed their commitment to obey God (Neh. 9:5).

HASHBADANA (Hāsh bá dā' na) (KJV) or HASHBADDANAH (Hāsh bād' dā na) Personal name of uncertain meaning. A member of the community leaders who stood with Ezra as he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4). Some early translations provide evidence for a copyist having joined two names—Hashub and Baddanah into one. The precise function of these leaders is not stated.

HASHEM (Há' shēm) Personal name meaning “the name.” Father of some of David's heroes (1 Chron. 11:34) and said to be a Gizonite. The parallel passage in 2 Sam. 23:32 may preserve the original spelling: Jashen. See Gizonite; Jashen.

HASHMONAH (Hāsh mō' na) Place-name of uncertain meaning. A station in Israel's wilderness journey (Num. 33:29-30). Some Bible students identify it with Azmon (Num. 34:4). See Azmon.

HASHUB (Hā' shūb) (KJV, Neh. 3:11,23; 10:23; 11:15) See Hasshub.

HASHUBAH (Hā shū' ba) Personal name meaning “highly treasured.” Son of Zerubbabel in the royal line of David (1 Chron. 3:20).

HASHUM (Hā' shūm) 1. Personal name meaning “flat-nosed.” Clan leader of group returning from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. Some clan members divorced their foreign wives under Ezra's leadership to rid the community of religious temptations (Ezra 10:33). 2. Community leader who stood with Ezra while he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4). He also signed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God (Neh. 10:18).

HASHUPHA (KJV) See Hasupha.

HASIDEANS [Hās ə dē' ānz] Militant, religious community active in the Maccabean revolt (begun 168 B.C.). The group's name derived from the OT concept of the Hasidim, the “saints” or “faithful.” The Pharisees and the Essenes likely derived from different streams of the Hasidean movement. See Intertestamental History and Literature; Jewish Parties in the New Testament.

HASMONEAN (Hāz mō nē' an) Name given to the dynasty that ruled ancient Judea for almost a century, from the Maccabean wars (that ended in approximately 145 B.C.) until Roman occupation of ancient Palestine in 63 B.C. See Intertestamental History and Literature.

HASRAH (Hāz' rah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “lack.” See Harhas.

HASSENAAH (Hās sə nā' a) Personal or place-name, perhaps meaning “the hated one.” Apparently the same name without “h,” the Hebrew definite article, appears as Senaah, a clan who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylonian exile about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:35). Members of the clan helped Nehemiah rebuild the Fish Gate of the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 3:3).

HASSENUAH (Hās sə nū' a) Personal name meaning “the hated one.” Leader in tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 9:7). The name without the Hebrew article “h” appears in Neh. 11:9 as father of a leader in postexilic Jerusalem from the tribe of Benjamin.

HASSHUB (Hās' shüb) Personal name meaning “one to whom He has imputed or reckoned.” 1. Man who helped Nehemiah repair the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 3:23). He was apparently a Levite at the temple (1 Chron. 9:14; Neh. 11:15). 2. Man who helped repair the bakers' ovens and apparently two parts of the wall, Neh. 3:23 describing the “other piece” or a “second section” (REB). He may be the one who signed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God (Neh. 10:23).

HASSOPHEREETH (Hās sō' phə rēth) Personal name meaning “the scribe” or “scribal office.” Ezra 2:55 indicates it was either a family name of persons returning from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. or a guild of scribes who returned. The parallel passage (Neh. 7:57) omits “h,” the Hebrew article, from the name, possibly indicating it was a guild.

THE HASMONEAN DYNASTY

HASUPHA (Hā su' phā) Personal name meaning “quick.” A clan returning with Zerubbabel from Babylonian exile about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:43).

HAT Article of clothing for the head (Dan. 3:21). The root word is similar to the Akkadian term for a helmet or cap. The NASB rendered the term “cap” NIV, “turban.” See Cloth, Clothing.

HATACH (Hā' āk) Personal name perhaps of Persian origin meaning “runner.” A eunuch serving King Ahasuerus in the Persian court that the king assigned as Esther's servant (Esther 4:5-6). Esther assigned him to find why Mordecai was troubled, thus initiating Esther's appearances before the king to save her people.

HATE, HATRED Strong negative reaction; a feeling toward someone considered an enemy, possibly indicating volatile hostility.

Hatred of Other People Hatred of other people is a common response in human relations. Conflict, jealousy, and envy often result in animosity, separation, revenge, and even murder (Gen. 26:27; 27:41; Judg. 11:7; 2 Sam. 13:15,22). Some Hebrew laws explicitly deal with hatred or favoritism (Deut. 19:11-13; 21:15-17; 22:13-21).

Hatred of other people is frequently condemned, and love toward enemies is encouraged (Lev. 19:17; Matt. 5:43-44). Hatred characterizes the old age and the sinful life (Gal. 5:19-21; Titus 3:3; 1 John 2:9,11). Although Jesus cited the attitude of hating enemies (Matt. 5:43), the OT does not give an explicit command like this. The Dead Sea Scrolls, however, indicate that the Essenes at Qumran cultivated hatred for enemies, but they discouraged retaliation. Jesus stressed loving our enemies and doing good to those who hate us (Luke 6:27).

Believers can experience or practice hatred in certain contexts. For example, they are to hate whatever opposes God. Not a malicious attitude, this hate reflects agreement with God's opposition to evil (Pss. 97:10; 139:19-22; Prov. 8:13; 13:5; Amos 5:15). Although some of the psalms may sound vindictive, they leave punishment of the wicked to God's prerogative.

Jesus' disciples would have to hate their families to follow him (Luke 14:26). Hate here refers not to emotional hostility but to the conscious establishment of priorities. Hate means to love family less than one loves Jesus (Matt. 10:37). Similarly, one should hate one's personal life to gain eternal life (John 12:26).

Disciples can expect to be hated, just as Jesus was hated by the world (John 15:18-24; 17:14; 1 John 3:13). Hatred and persecution will also occur near the end of time (Matt. 24:9). Jesus encouraged His disciples to rejoice at this opposition (Luke 6:22-23).

Hatred of God People sometimes hate God (Pss. 68:1; 81:15) and His people. They are enemies of God who stubbornly rebel at His will and will be punished.

Divine Hatred Although God is love (1 John 4:8), some texts point to divine hatred. A holy, jealous God is displeased with human sin. For example, God hates pagan idolatry (Deut. 12:31) as well as hypocritical Hebrew worship (Isa. 1:14; Amos 5:21). God hates sin (Prov. 6:16-19; 8:13; Mal. 2:16), but He desires the sinner's repentance (Ezek. 18:32). Some texts imply God's hate is directed primarily to sinful actions rather than to sinful persons (Heb. 1:9; Rev. 2:6).

God's hate is not the vindictive, emotional hate often felt by human beings but is a strong moral reaction against sin. (God's attitude toward Edom in Mal. 1:3-4). In some cases the term “love” when contrasted with “hate” can mean “prefer” (e.g. Gen. 25:28; 29:30-33; Deut. 21:15-16), and “hate” can mean to “slight” or “think less of” (Gen. 29:31,33; Deut. 22:13; 24:3; Luke 14:26; 16:13). The terms “love” and “hate” can also express divine freedom in election (Mal. 1:2-5; Rom. 9:13). See Enemy; Love; Retaliation; Revenge; Wrath.

HATHACH (Há' thák) Modern translations' spelling of Hatach. See Hatach.

HATHATH (Há' tháth) Personal name meaning “weakling.” Son of Othniel in the family line of Caleb and the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:13).

HATIPHA (Há tí' phá) Aramaic personal name meaning “robbed.” Clan who returned from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:54).

HATITA (Há tí' tá) Aramaic personal name meaning “bored a hole” or “soft” or “festival.” Clan of temple gatekeepers who returned from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:42).

HATTIL (Hát' tíl) Personal name meaning “talkative, babbling” or “long eared.” Clan of temple servants who returned from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:57).

HATTUSH (Hát' tūsh) Personal name of uncertain meaning. 1. Man in David's royal line after the return from exile (1 Chron. 3:22). He returned from Babylonian exile with Ezra about 458 B.C. (Ezra 8:2). His high place in the list may indicate that Ezra and his followers still placed hope in a Davidic monarch. 2. Priest who signed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God (Neh.

10:4). It is not impossible that this was the same as 1. above. 3. Priest who returned from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Neh. 12:2). 4. Man who helped Nehemiah repair the Jerusalem walls (Neh. 3:10).

HAURAN (Haw' rān) Geographical name of uncertain meaning. One of four or five provinces through which the Assyrians and their successors administered Syria. Its northern boundary was Damascus; eastern, the Jebel Druze; western, the Golan Heights; and Southern, the Yarmuk River. It was a battleground among Assyria, Syria, Israel, Judah, and Egypt, appearing in Egyptian and Assyrian records. Ezekiel promised it would be in the restored promised land (Ezek. 47:16,18). The Maccabeans did control it for a time. The region was noted for its black basalt rocks, volcanoes, and rich harvests of grain.

HAVEN Place that offers safe anchorage for ships (Gen. 49:13; Ps. 107:30; Isa. 23:10 NRSV, NIV). See Fair Havens.

HAVILAH (Hāv' ı la) Place-name meaning “sandy stretch.” Biblical name for the sand-dominated region to the south covering what we call Arabia without necessarily designating a particular geographical or political area. The river from Eden is described as flowing “around the whole land of Havilah” (Gen. 2:11 NASB), a land noted for gold and other precious stones. The Table of Nations lists Havilah as a son of Cush or Ethiopia, showing Havilah's political ties (Gen. 10:7). Some Bible students think the name is preserved in modern Haulan in southwest Arabia. Havilah is also mentioned in the Table of Nations as a son of Joktan, the grandson of Shem (Gen. 10:29). The descendants of Ishmael, Abraham's son, lived in Havilah (Gen. 25:18). Saul defeated the Amalekites from “Havilah as you go to Shur, which is east of Egypt” (1 Sam. 15:7 NASB), a description whose meaning Bible students continue to debate. Some seek to change the Hebrew text slightly. Others look for a Havilah farther north and west than Havilah is usually located. Others talk of the fluid boundaries of the area. Thus Havilah refers to an area or areas in Arabia, but the precise location is not known.

HAVOTH-JAIR (Hā vōth-Jā'ir) or HAWOTHJAIR Place-name meaning “tents of Jair.” Villages in Gilead east of the Jordan that Jair, son of Manasseh, captured (Num. 32:41). Deuteronomy 3:14 says Jair took the region of Argob and named Bashan after himself—Havvoth-jair. This passage equates land of Rephaim, Argod, Bashan, and Havvoth-jair (cp. Josh. 13:30; 1 Kings 4:13). Judges 10:3-4 concern Jair the Gileadite, a judge in Israel for 22 years. He “had thirty sons that rode on thirty donkeys; and they had thirty cities; which are in the land of Gilead, and are called Havvoth-jair to this day.” First Chronicles 2:18-23 describes the genealogy of Caleb and his father Hezron. In late life Hezron married the daughter of Machir, the father of Gilead. She bore Segub, the father of Jair, who had 23 towns in Gilead. “But Geshur and Aram took from them Havvoth-jair, Kenath and its villages, sixty towns. All these were descendants of Machir, father of Gilead” (1 Chron. 2:23 NRSV). Apparently a group of villages east of the Jordan, perhaps varying in number at different times, were called Havvoth-jair. Israel laid claim to them and connected the name to that of different Israelite heroes at various time periods.

HAWK Bird of prey considered unclean (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15) and not to be eaten. God reminded Job that He created the hawk to soar (Job 39:26). See Birds.

HAZAEEL (Hāz' ā ēl) Personal name meaning “El (a god) is seeing.” A powerful and ruthless king of the Syrian city-state of Damascus during the last half of the eighth century B.C. While an officer of Ben-hadad, king of Syria, Hazael was sent to Elisha the prophet to inquire about the king's health (2 Kings 8:7-15). Elisha prophesied Hazael's future kingship and his cruel treatment of Israel. Hazael returned to his master, murdered him, and became king of Syria in 841 B.C. These events had also been forecast by the Prophet Elijah (1 Kings 19:15-17). Soon after becoming king of Syria, Hazael joined in combat against both Ahaziah, king of Judah, and Joram, king of Israel (2 Kings 8:28-29; 9:14-15). He eventually extended his rule into both the Northern Kingdom of Israel (2 Kings 10:32-33; 13:1-9,22) and the Southern Kingdom of Judah (2 Kings 12:17-18; 2 Chron. 24:23-24). He was prevented from capturing the holy city of Jerusalem only by being allowed to carry off everything that was portable and of value in the city and the temple. The memory of Syria's ruthless power under Hazael was etched in Israel's memory. Half a century later, Amos used his name as a symbol of Syria's oppression that would be judged by God (Amos 1:4). See Damascus; Syria.

HAZAIAH (Hā zī' a) Personal name meaning “Yahweh sees.” Member of tribe of Judah and ancestor of Jerusalem descendants in Nehemiah's day (Neh. 11:5).

HAZAR [Hā' zār] Hebrew term meaning a court or enclosed space. Hazar is a common element in place-names: Hazar-enan (Ezek. 47:17); Hazargaddah (Josh. 15:27); Hazar-shual (Josh. 15:28); Hazar-susah (Josh. 19:5). The place-names perhaps recall the pitching of tents or building of homes in a circle for protection, resulting in an enclosed space. Alternately, settlements bearing the name Hazar were enclosed with walls or other defenses (cp. Num. 13:28; Deut. 1:28). See Cities and Urban Life.

HAZAR-ADDAR (Hā zār-ād' dār) Place-name meaning “threshing floor.” Station on Israel's wilderness journey (Num. 34:4) near Kadesh, possibly Ain Qedesh. See Addar; Kadesh.

HAZAR-ENAN (Hā zār-ē' nan) Place-name meaning “encampment of springs.” Site marking northeastern border of promised land (Num. 34:9-10; Ezek. 47:17). Its exact location is not known, but some locate it at Qaryatein about 70 miles east-northeast of Damascus.

HAZAR-ENON (Hā zār-ē' nōn) Variant Hebrew spelling of Hazar-enan in Ezek. 47:17 and reflected in NRSV. TEV calls the place Enon City. See Hazar-enan.

HAZAR-GADDAH (Hā zār-gād' da) Place-name meaning “village of good luck.” Town in tribal territory of Judah of unknown location near Beersheba (Josh. 15:27).

HAZAR-HATTICON (Hā zār-hāt' tī cōn) Place-name meaning “middle village.” Ezekiel named it as the border of the future Israel (47:16). Some Bible students think the original text read Hazorenan (Ezek. 47:17; 48:1 REB). The location is not known.

HAZAR-MAVETH (Hā zār-mā' vēth) Place-name meaning “encampment of death.” Name in the Table of Nations for son of Joktan in the line of Eber and Shem (Gen. 10:26). It is the region of Hadramaut east of Yemen.

HAZAR-SHUAL (Hā zār shū' āl) Place-name meaning “encampment of the foxes.” Town near Beersheba in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:28) but allotted to tribe of Simeon (Josh. 19:3; 1 Chron. 4:28). Jews returning from exile in Babylon lived there (Neh. 11:27). It may be modern Khirbet el-Watan.

HAZAR-SUSAH (Hā zār-sū' sa) or HAZARSUSIM (Hā zār-sū' sīm) Place-name meaning “encampment of a horse.” Town in tribal allotment of Simeon (Josh. As most towns of Simeon also appear in Judah's allotment (cp. 19:1), many Bible students think this is another name for Sansannah in Josh. 15:31. Instead of the feminine form Susah, 1 Chron. 4:31 has the plural form Susim. It may be located at Sabalat Abu Susein.

HAZAZON-TAMAR (Hāz ā zōn-tā' mār) Place-name meaning “grave dump with palms.” Home of Amorites who fought eastern coalition led by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:7). Edom (NIV; TEV; NRSV; REB following one Hebrew manuscript; most manuscripts and early translations read “Aram,” meaning Syria, as read by NASB; KSV) captured the city and then attacked Jehoshaphat of Judah (873-848 B.C.), the text noting that Hazazon-tamar was another name for Engedi (2 Chron. 20:2). Some Bible students think Hazazon-tamar was actually located six miles north of Engedi at Wadi Hasasa, while others point to Tamar in southern Judah, Kasr Ejuniyeh or Ain Kusb, 20 miles southwest of the Dead Sea. See Engedi.

HAZEL KJV translation of a term meaning “almond” rather than “hazelnut” (Gen. 30:37).

HAZELEPONI (Ház ə ləl pór ni) Personal name meaning “Overshadow my face.” Daughter of Etam in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:3 NASB; NIV, TEV, REB, NRSV). KJV follows Hebrew text, which reads “these the father of Etam.” Many Bible students think a copyist omitted something in Hebrew. They would restore the text to read “these were the sons of Hareph: the father of Etam” Since many of the other names in the list are names of towns (e.g., Penuel, Bethlehem), Hazeleponi may also represent a town name. If so, its location is not known.

HAZER-HATTICON (Há zər-hăt' ũ cōn) NASB, NIV, NRSV spelling of Hazar-hatticon.

HAZERIM (Há zər' rīm) KJV interpretation and transliteration of Hebrew word meaning “villages” or “hamlets” in Deut. 2:23. Modern translations interpret as common noun meaning villages near Gaza. See Gaza.

HAZEROTH (Há zər' rōth) Place-name meaning “villages” or “encampments.” Wilderness station on Israel's journey from Egypt (Num. 11:35). There Aaron and Miriam challenged Moses' sole authority, using his Cushite wife as an excuse (Num. 12). God punished Miriam with a hated skin disease. Deuteronomy 1:1 uses Hazeroth as one focal point to locate Moses' speech to Israel. Some geographers would locate it at modern Ain Khadra, south of Ezion-geber. Some Bible students try to locate all the sites in Deut. 1:1 near Moab. If they are right, the Hazeroth mentioned there is different from the wilderness station.

HAZEZON-TAMAR (Ház ə zōn-tà' mār) (KJV) See Hazazon-tamar.

HAZIEL (Ház zī əl) Personal name meaning “God saw.” A leading Levite in the time of David (1 Chron. 23:9).

HAZO (Ház zō) Abbreviated form of personal name Haziël meaning “God saw.” Son of Abraham's brother Nahor (Gen. 22:22). The 12 sons of Nahor apparently represented a closely associated group of tribes. Some Bible students think Hazo represents the city of Hazu known from an Assyrian source and located at al-Hasa near the Arabian coast by Bahrein.

HAZOR [Hä' zör] Place-name meaning “enclosed settlement.” 1. Hazor was located in upper Galilee on the site now known as Tell el-Qedah, ten miles north of the Sea of Galilee and five miles southwest of Lake Huleh. The site of Hazor is composed of a 30-acre upper tell or mound rising 40 meters above the surrounding plain and a 175-acre lower enclosure which was well fortified. These dimensions make Hazor the largest city in ancient Canaan. Estimates set the population at its height at over 40,000. The upper tell had 21 separate levels of occupation beginning between 2750 and 2500 B.C. and continuing down to the second century B.C. Canaanites occupied Hazor until Joshua destroyed it. The Israelites controlled it until 732 B.C. when the Assyrians captured the city. Hazor then served as a fortress for the various occupying powers until the time of the Maccabees. The lower enclosure had five levels of occupation beginning about 1750 B.C. and continuing until Joshua destroyed it. It was never rebuilt.

Hazor's location was strategic both economically and militarily. It overlooked the Via Maris, the major overland trade route from Egypt to the north and east, and thus became a major trading center. It is mentioned extensively in both Egyptian and Mesopotamian records in conjunction with the other major trading cities of the day. Hazor also overlooked the Huleh Valley, a critical defense point against armies invading from the north. Joshua 11:1-15; 12:19 relate how Jabin, king of Hazor, rallied the forces of the northern cities of Canaan against Joshua. Hazor was “the head of all these kingdoms” (Josh. 11:10 NASB), that is, it was the dominant city-state of the Canaanite kingdoms. Joshua defeated the Canaanite forces, slew the leaders, including Jabin, and burned the city of Hazor. Modern archaeology lends support to this biblical account. The size and location of the city of Hazor, as well as references to it in other ancient literature, would indicate that Hazor probably controlled a vast portion of Canaan. In his initial interpretation of the archaeological evidence, Yadin dated the destruction to ca. 1400 B.C. He later adjusted this date to the mid-13th century B.C., but Bimson has argued that there was no good reason for this adjustment, and the original interpretation is the correct one.

Storehouses dating from the ninth century B.C. at ancient Hazor in Israel.

Hazor is next mentioned in Judg. 4, where another Jabin is king of Canaan ruling from Hazor (Jabin was a dynastic name, much like Pharaoh and Ben-Hadad were used for a succession of rulers). The biblical narrative indicates that Joshua destroyed the city, but it does not say that he rebuilt it and occupied it. It was allotted to Naphtali (Josh. 19:36). The Canaanite dynasty maintained or regained control with one or more kings called Jabin. In the account of Judg. 4, Jabin's troops led by Sisera of Harosheth-hagoyim were routed by Deborah and Barak. First Kings 9:15 mentions that Solomon rebuilt the walls of Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer. Excavations have discovered conclusive evidence to support this short portion of Scripture. Two layers of Israelite occupation of Hazor between the destruction of the Canaanite city by Joshua and the rebuilding of the city by Solomon show merely semi-nomadic Israelite encampments, evidenced by tent or hut foundation rings, cooking pits, and storage pits. Apparently, no formal city or fortifications existed during the time of the judges. The city was clearly rebuilt at the time of Solomon, evidenced by the characteristically Solomonic gate structures, that is, casemate walls and a six-chamber gatehouse (three on each side) with two square towers. Comparing the gates at Hazor with those at Gezer and Megiddo, Yadin found them to be identical in both design and dimension. The Solomonic city was much smaller than the Canaanite city. It only covered half of the upper tell.

Second Kings 15:29 records that Tiglathpileser III, king of Assyria, captured Hazor and carried its people captive to Assyria. The evidence of this destruction is very great. No less than three feet of ashes and rubble cover the ruins left by this destruction. Prior to the Assyrian invasion, Hazor had been greatly enlarged and strengthened by King Ahab of Israel in anticipation of the attack. The city had grown to fill the entire upper tell. Its fortifications had been strengthened and enlarged, and a special water shaft and tunnel 40 meters deep was dug down to the water table to bring the water supply inside the city. See Conquest of Canaan.

Overview of the excavations at Tel el-Qedah (ancient Hazor) north of the Sea of Galilee.

2. Town in tribal inheritance of Judah (Josh. 15:23), probably to be read with earliest Greek translation as Hazor-Tthnan. This may be modern el-Jebariyeh. 3. Town in southern part of tribal inheritance of Judah, probably to be read as Hazor-Hadattah (Josh. 15:25) with most modern translations. This may be modern el-Hudeira near the Dead Sea's southern end. 4. Town identified with Kerioth-hezron (Josh. 15:25). 5. Town where part of tribe of Benjamin lived in time of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:33). This may be modern Khirbet Hazzur four miles north-northwest of Jerusalem. 6. Name of “kingdoms” that Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon threatened (Jer. 49:28-33).

Apparently, small nomadic settlements of Arab tribes are meant. Such settlements would still have rich treasures the Babylonian king coveted.

HAZOR-HADDATTAH (Hā zōr-hā dāt' ta) Place-name meaning “new Hazor.” Town in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:25). Its location is not known.

HAZZEBAIM (Hāz zē bā' im) See Pocherethhazzebaim.

HAZZELELPONI (Hāz zə lel pō' nī) Modern translations' spelling of Hazelelponi.

HAZZOBEBAH (Hā zō bē' bāh) NIV rendering of the name of the son of Coz (or Kos) and grandson of Helah (1 Chron. 4:8). Other English translations use the feminine name Zobebah.

HE Fifth letter of the Hebrew alphabet; it carries the numerical value five. In Judaism he is used as an abbreviation for the divine name Yahweh (Tetragrammaton). In some English versions he appears as a superscript to verses 33-40 of Ps. 119, each of which begins with this letter. See Hebrew Language; Writing.

HE ASS Male donkey. See Ass.

HEAD Literally, the uppermost part of the body, considered to be the seat of life but not of the intellect; and figuratively for first, top, or chief. The Jewish notion was that the heart was the center or seat of the intellect. “Head” meant the physical head of a person (Gen. 48:18; Mark 6:24) or of animals, such as a bull's head (Lev. 1:4). It was often used to represent the whole person (Acts 18:6). Achish made David “keeper of mine head” (KJV), that is, his bodyguard (1 Sam. 28:2).

“Head” was used frequently to refer to inanimate objects such as the summit of a mountain (Exod. 17:9) or the top of a building (Gen. 11:4). The word “head” often has the meaning of “source” or “beginning,” that of rivers (Gen. 2:10), streets (Ezek. 16:25), or of periods of time (Judg. 7:19, translated here as “beginning”).

In Ps. 118:22 “head of the corner”(KJV; HCSB, cornerstone) refers metaphorically to a king delivered by God when others had given him up (cp. Matt. 21:42; Acts 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:7, where it is used in reference to the rejection of Christ). “Head” designated one in authority in the sense of the foremost person. It can mean leader, chief, or prince (Isa. 9:15), and it can have the idea of first in a series (1 Chron. 12:9). Israel was the “head” (translated “chief”) nation, God's firstborn (Jer. 31:7). Damascus was the “head” (capital) of Syria (Isa. 7:8). A husband is the “head of the wife” (Eph. 5:23).

A distinctive theological use of the word “head” was seen in the NT concept of the “headship” of Christ. Christ is the “head” (kephale) of His body the church; the church is His “bride” (Eph. 5:23-33, wife). In His role as “head,” Christ enables the church to grow, knits her into a unity, nourishes her by caring for each member, and gives her strength to build herself up in love (Eph. 4:15-16). Not only is Christ “head” of the church, but also He is “head” of the universe as a whole (Eph. 1:22) and of every might and power (Col. 2:10). The divine influences on the world result in a series: God is the “head” of Christ; Christ is the “head” of man; man is the “head” of the woman, and as such he is to love and care for his wife as Christ does His church (Eph. 5:25-30). This theological use of the word may be an extension of the OT use of the word “head” for the leader of the tribe or community or may be a reaction to early Gnostic tendencies. See Gnosticism.

Because the head was the seat of life, value was placed on it. Injury to it was a chief form of defeating an enemy (Ps. 68:21). As part of contemptuous insult, the soldiers struck Jesus' head with a reed and crowned Him with a crown of thorns (Mark 15:16-19). Decapitation was a further insult after the defeat. Herodias, through treachery and out of spite, had John the Baptist beheaded (Matt. 14:1-11). David cut off Goliath's head and brought it before Saul (1 Sam. 17:51). The Philistines cut off Saul's head (1 Sam. 31:9), and the sons of Rimmon cut off that of Ishbosheth (2 Sam. 4:7). Attested to in many inscriptions and portrayed on several monuments, it was common for the Babylonians, Assyrians, and the Egyptians to cut off the heads of their dead enemies slain in battle.

Conversely, blessing comes upon the head (Gen. 49:26); and, therefore, hands are laid on it (Gen. 48:17). Anointing the head with oil symbolized prosperity and joy (Ps. 23:5; Heb. 1:9). In the service for ordination of priests and dedication to priestly service, the head of the high priest was anointed with oil (Exod. 29:7; Lev. 16:32). Human sins were transferred to the animal of the sin offering by laying on of hands upon the head of the animal (Exod. 29:10,15,19).

Unidentified sculpture of a head from the Roman period in Israel.

The head is involved in several colloquial expressions. The Jew swore by his head (Matt. 5:36). Sadness or grief was shown by putting the hand on the head or putting ashes on it (2 Sam. 13:19). In other instances, grief was shown by shaving the head (Job 1:20). To “heap coals of fire upon his head” was to make one's enemy feel ashamed by returning his evil with good (Prov. 25:21-22; Rom. 12:20). Wagging the head expressed derision (Mark 15:29), but bowing the head was a sign of humility (Isa. 58:5). Finally, “A gray head is a crown of glory; it is found in the way of righteousness” (Prov. 16:31 NASB).

HEAD OF THE CHURCH Title for Christ (Eph. 4:15; Col. 1:18). In Ephesians, the metaphor of Christ as head of His body, the church, is carefully developed. Headship includes the idea of Christ's authority (1:22; 5:23) and of the submission required of the church (5:24). More is in view than a statement of Christ's authority. The focus is on the character of Christ's relationship with the church. Unlike self-seeking human lords (Luke 22:25), Christ exercises His authority for the church (Eph. 1:22 NRSV, NIV), nourishing and caring for the church as one cares for one's own body (5:29). Christ's headship also points to the interrelationship of Christ and the church. The mystery of husband and wife becoming "one flesh" is applied to Christ and the church (5:31), which is "the fullness of the One fills all things in every way" (1:23 HCSB). In Col. 1:18 the idea of Christ as "head" is again complex, including not only the idea of head as authority but of head as source (1:15-20). The church is called to follow its head and to rest secure in its relationship with Him.

HEADBAND, HEADDRESS Headband refers to a head ornament, headdress to an ornamental head covering. Modern translations use "headband" to render an item of finery in Isa. 3:18. KJV rendered the same term as "caul," a loosefitting, netted cap. KJV used "headband" to translate a different Hebrew term at Isa. 3:20. Modern translations render this term "sash." The same term is rendered "attire" (NASB, NRSV), "wedding ribbons" (REB), or "wedding ornaments" (NIV) at Jer. 2:32. Modern translations use "headdress" for a third Hebrew term (Isa. 3:20; KJV, bonnet). Such a headdress was wound around the head like a turban (Ezek. 24:17). The same Hebrew term is used for the bridegroom's "garland" (Isa. 61:10) and for the linen turbans of the priests (Ezek. 44:18). See Cloth, Clothing.

Headdresses and head coverings are still worn by the men and women of the Middle East.

HEADSTONE KJV term for a top stone (NASB) or capstone (NIV) at Zech. 4:7. Zerubbabel's vision of a capstone quarried from the mountaintop was interpreted as an assurance that he would see the temple completed (4:8-9). New Testament writers spoke of Christ as a stone rejected by the builders which has become the head of the corner (Acts 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:7). Here, head of the corner refers either to a capstone (coping), a keystone of an arch, or to a cornerstone. See Cornerstone.

HEALING, DIVINE God's work through instruments and ways He chooses to bring health to persons sick physically, emotionally, and spiritually. The Bible not only tells of people's spiritual status but is also concerned about their physical condition. This concern appears in the emphasis on healing, particularly in the ministry of Jesus and in the early church. Nearly one-fifth of the Gospels report Jesus' miracles and the discussions they occasioned. The Gospels record 14 distinct instances of physical and mental healing. Jesus commissioned His disciples to continue His basic ministry, including healing (Matt. 10:5-10; Mark 6:7-13; Luke 9:1-6). In the book of Acts the healing ministry continued.

“Psychosomatic” is a word which literally means “soul and body,” referring to the close relationship of body and spirit. The soul affects the body, and the health of the soul may be an indication of the health of the body. In the Bible John wished for his friend Gaius to “prosper in every way and be in good health, just as your soul prospers” (3 John 2 HCSB). This was an anticipation of the emphasis of psychosomatic medicine: a person is a unity; body and soul cannot be separated. Christianity and health are inextricably intertwined.

Most Christians believe in healing through faith, but trying to decide what techniques are scriptural, decorous, and psychologically helpful confuses the believer. Jesus used different methods in His healing ministry. They included calling upon the faith of the person or bystanders to be healed, touching the sick person, praying, assuring forgiveness of sin, uttering commands, and using physical media. On several occasions the faith of the individual was an important factor in the healing. Speaking to the woman who was hemorrhaging, Jesus said, “Your faith has made you well” (Mark 5:34 HCSB; cp. Matt. 9:29).

The faith of other people became a factor. Jesus stated to the father of the sick boy that healing was possible if people had faith, and the man responded, “I do believe! Help my unbelief” (Mark 9:23-24 HCSB). When the centurion sought Jesus to ask for healing his servant, the Savior responded, “I have not found anyone in Israel with so great a faith!...And his servant was cured that very moment” (Matt. 8:10,13 HCSB; cp. Mark 2:5).

Christians are often confused about the ministry of healing, but these biblical teachings clearly appear:

(1) The Bible clearly states that Jesus believed in healing of the body.

(2) Jesus spoke of doctors in a positive way as He compared those in good health who have no need of a physician with those who do (Matt. 9:12; Mark 2:17; Luke 5:31). God has often healed by the way He has led dedicated scientists into the discovery of body functions.

(3) The methods of healing Jesus used included prayer, laying on of hands, anointing with oil, and assurance of forgiveness of sins. The church continued to use these methods (James 5:14-16).

(4) Jesus did not use healing as a means of gaining attention but tried to keep the experience private. “Praise the LORD...He heals all your diseases” (Ps. 103:2-3 HCSB).

HEALTH Condition of being sound in body, mind, or spirit; used especially for physical health. Neither Hebrew nor Greek has a direct equivalent for our concept of health. Since a variety of terms is employed, English translations vary considerably in their use of the term “health.” The KJV has the most numerous references to health (17 times). Modern translations frequently replace health with other terms. The substitutions of the NRSV are typical. The most common substitution is healing for health (Prov. 3:8; 4:22; 12:18; 13:17; Isa. 58:8). Elsewhere the NRSV substituted “well” as a broader statement of well-being (Gen. 43:28; 2 Sam. 20:9) or help (Pss. 42:11; 43:5) and saving power (Ps. 67:2) as more specific instances of God's assistance. The NRSV substituted “recovery” for health at Jer. 33:6, though rendering the underlying Hebrew as health elsewhere

(Jer. 8:22; 30:17) as in KJV. At Acts 27:34 the NRSV has “help you survive” in place of “for your health.”

The health wish of 3 John 2 is typical of Hellenistic letters (cp. 2 Macc. 1:10; 3 Macc. 3:12; 7:1). The basic Greek concept of health is what is balanced. Thus the Greeks frequently used the adjective “healthy” (hugies) to mean rational or intelligible. The adjective is frequently translated “sound” in the NT (1 Tim. 1:10; 6:3; 2 Tim. 1:13; 4:3; Titus 1:9; 2:1,8). See Diseases; Healing, Divine.

HEART Center of the physical, mental, and spiritual life of humans. The word “heart” refers to the physical organ and is considered to be the center of the physical life. Eating and drinking are spoken of as strengthening the heart (Gen. 18:5; Judg. 19:5; Acts 14:17). As the center of physical life, the heart came to stand for the person as a whole. It became the focus for all the vital functions of the body, including both intellectual and spiritual life. The heart and the intellect are closely connected, the heart being the seat of intelligence: “For this people's heart has grown callous...otherwise they might...understand with their hearts and turn back” (Matt. 13:15 HCSB). The heart is connected with thinking: As a person “thinketh in his heart, so is he” (Prov. 23:7 KJV). To ponder something in one's heart means to consider it carefully (Luke 1:66; 2:19). “To set one's heart on” is the literal Hebrew that means to give attention to something, to worry about it (1 Sam. 9:20). To call to heart (mind) something means to remember something (Isa. 46:8). All of these are functions of the mind but are connected with the heart in biblical language.

Closely related to the mind are acts of the will, acts resulting from a conscious or even a deliberate decision. Thus, 2 Cor. 9:7 (HCSB), “Each person should do as he has decided in his heart” what he should give. Ananias contrived his deed of lying to the Holy Spirit in his heart (Acts 5:4). The conscious decision is made in the heart (Rom. 6:17). Connected to the will are human wishes and desires. Romans 1:24 describes how “God delivered them over in the cravings of their hearts to sexual impurity, so that their bodies were degraded among themselves” (HCSB).

Not only is the heart associated with the activities of the mind and the will, but it is also closely connected to the feelings and affections of a person. Emotions such as joy originate in the heart (Ps. 4:7; Isa. 65:14). Other emotions are ascribed to the heart, especially in the OT. Nabal's fear is described by the phrase: "his heart died within him" (1 Sam. 25:37; cp. Ps. 143:4). Discouragement or despair is described by the phrase "heaviness in the heart" which makes it stoop (Prov. 12:25 KJV). Again, Eccles. 2:20 (KJV) says, "Therefore I went about to cause my heart to despair of all the labor which I took under the sun." Another emotion connected with the heart is sorrow. John 16:6 says, "Because I have spoken these things to you, sorrow has filled your heart" (HCSB). Proverbs 25:20 describes sorrow as having "a troubled heart" (HCSB). The heart is also the seat of the affection of love and its opposite, hate. In the OT, for example, Israel is commanded: "You shall not hate your brother in your heart, but you shall reason with your neighbor, lest you bear sin because of him" (Lev. 19:17 RSV). A similar attitude, bitter jealousy, is described in James 3:14 as coming from the heart. On the other hand, love is based in the heart. The believer is commanded to love God "with all your heart" (Mark 12:30; cp. Deut. 6:5). Paul taught that the purpose of God's command is love that comes from a "pure heart" (1 Tim. 1:5 HCSB).

The heart is spoken of in Scripture as the center of the moral and spiritual life. The conscience, for instance, is associated with the heart. In fact, the Hebrew language had no word for conscience, so the word "heart" was often used to express this concept: "my heart does not reproach any of my days" (Job 27:6 NASB). The RSV translates the word for "heart" as "conscience" in 1 Sam. 25:31. In the NT the heart is spoken of also as that which condemns us (1 John 3:19-21). All moral conditions from the highest to the lowest are said to center in the heart. Sometimes the heart is used to represent a person's true nature or character. Samson told Delilah "all that was in his heart" (Judg. 16:17 NASB). This true nature is contrasted with the outward appearance: "man looks on the outward appearance, but the Lord looks on the heart" (1 Sam. 16:7 RSV).

On the negative side, depravity is said to issue from the heart: "The heart is more deceitful than all else and is desperately sick; who can understand it?” (Jer. 17:9 NASB). Jesus said that out of the heart comes evil thoughts, murder, adultery, fornication, theft, false witness, slander (Matt. 15:19). In other words, defilement comes from within rather than from without.

Because the heart is at the root of the problem, this is the place where God does His work in the individual. For instance, the work of the law is “written on their hearts,” and conscience is the proof of this (Rom. 2:15 HCSB). The heart is the field where seed (the Word of God) is sown (Matt. 13:19; Luke 8:15). In addition to being the place where the natural laws of God are written, the heart is the place of renewal. Before Saul became king, God gave him a new heart (1 Sam. 10:9). God promised Israel that He would give them a new spirit within, take away their “heart of stone” and give them a “heart of flesh” (Ezek. 11:19 NASB). Paul said that a person must believe in the heart to be saved, “with the heart one believes, resulting in righteousness” (Rom. 10:10 HCSB; cp. Mark 11:23; Heb. 3:12.)

The heart is the dwelling place of God. Two persons of the Trinity are said to reside in the heart of the believer. God has given us the “down payment [of the Spirit] in our hearts” (2 Cor. 1:22 HCSB). Ephesians 3:17 expresses the desire that “the Messiah may dwell in your hearts through faith”. The love of God “has been poured out in our hearts through the Holy Spirit who was given to us” (Rom. 5:5).

HEARTH A depression in a floor, sometimes bricked to retain heat (Jer. 36:23), used for cooking food (Isa. 30:14). KJV used “hearth” to translate four Hebrew terms. Modern translations retain “hearth” at Isa. 30:14. Elsewhere modern translations substituted other terms: “furnace” (NRSV), “oven” (REB), or “glowing embers” (NIV) at Ps. 102:3; “brazier” (REB, NASB, NRSV) or “firepot” (NIV) at Jer. 36:22-23; “blazing pot” (NRSV), “brazier” (REB), or “firepot” (NASB, NIV) at Zech. 12:6. The altar hearth of Ezek. 43:15-16 refers to the upper part of the altar upon which the sacrifice was burnt (cp. Lev. 6:9). See Cooking and Heating.

HEATH Shrubby, evergreen plant of the heather family, used by the KJV (Jer. 17:6; 48:6). Various translations have been offered: juniper (NASB); bush (NIV); shrub (NRSV, 17:6). At Jer. 48:6 the RSV and TEV follow Aquila's Greek translation in substituting "wild ass" for the plant name. The REB takes the Hebrew figuratively for "one destitute." Arabic evidence points to the juniper (Juniperus oxycedrus and Juniperus phoenicea).

HEAVE OFFERING See Sacrifice and Offering.

HEAVEN Part of God's creation above the earth and the waters including "air" and "space" and serving as home for God and His heavenly creatures.

Old Testament The Hebrew word shamayim is plural in form and was easily related by the common people to the word mayim, "waters." Biblical writers joined their contemporaries in describing the universe as it appeared to the human eye: heavens above, earth beneath, and waters around and beneath the earth. Heaven could be described as a partition God made to separate the rain-producing heavenly waters from the rivers, seas, and oceans below (Gen. 1:6-8). The heavenly lights—sun, moon, and stars—were installed into this partition (Gen. 1:14-18). This partition has windows or sluice gates with which God sends rain to irrigate or water the earth (Gen. 7:11). This heavenly partition God "stretched out" (Isa. 42:5; 44:24; Ps. 136:6; cp. Ezek. 1:22-26; 10:1). The clouds serve a similar rain-producing function, so that KJV often translates the Hebrew word for "clouds" as "sky" (Deut. 33:26; Ps. 57:10; Isa. 45:8; Jer. 51:9; cp. Pss. 36:6; 108:4).

Only God has the wisdom to "stretch out the heaven" (Jer. 51:15). "Heaven" thus becomes the curtain of God's tent, separating His dwelling place from that of humanity on earth (Ps. 104:2; Isa. 40:22). Like a human dwelling, heaven can be described as resting on supporting pillars (Job 26:11) or on building foundations (2 Sam. 22:8; though the parallel in Ps. 18:7 applies the foundations to mountains). Just as He built the partition, so God can "rend" it or tear it apart (Isa. 64:1). Thus it does not seal God off from His creation and His people. English translations use “firmament” (KJV), “expanse” (NASB, NIV), “dome” (TEV, NRSV), or “vault” (REB) to translate the special Hebrew word describing what God created and named “Heaven” (Gen. 1:8).

Hebrew does not employ a term for “air” or “space” between heaven and earth. This is all part of heaven. Thus the Bible speaks of “birds of the heavens,” though English translations often use “air” or “sky” (Deut. 4:17; Jer. 8:7; Lam. 4:19). Even Absalom, hanging by his hair from a tree limb, was “between heaven and earth” (2 Sam. 18:9; cp. 1 Chron. 21:16; Ezek. 8:3). The heaven is the source for rain (Deut. 11:11; Ps. 148:4), dew (Gen. 27:28), frost (Job 38:29), snow (Isa. 55:10), fiery lightning (Gen. 19:24), dust (Deut. 28:24), and hail (Josh. 10:11). This is the language of human observation and description, but it is more. It is the language of faith describing God in action, in and for His world (Jer. 14:22). Heaven is God's treasure chest, storing treasures such as the rain (Deut. 28:12), wind and lightning (Jer. 10:13), and snow and hail (Job 38:22). The miraculous manna came from God's heavenly storehouses for Israel in the wilderness (Exod. 16:11-15).

Heaven and earth thus comprehend the entire universe and all its constituents (Jer. 23:24), but God fills all these and more so that no one can hide from Him (cp. 1 Kings 8:27-30; Isa. 66:1). Yet this One also lives in the humble, contrite heart (Isa. 57:15).

As God's dwelling place, heaven is not a divine haven where God can isolate Himself from earth. It is the divine workplace, where He sends blessings to His people (Deut. 26:15; Isa. 63:15) and punishment on His enemies (Pss. 2:4; 11:4-7). Heaven is a channel of communication between God and humans (Gen. 28:12; 2 Sam. 22:10; Neh. 9:13; Ps. 144:5).

As God's creation, the heavens praise Him and display His glory and His creativity (Pss. 19:1; 69:34) and righteousness (Ps. 50:6). Still, heaven remains a part of the created order. Unlike neighboring nations, Israel knew that heaven and the heavenly bodies were not gods and did not deserve worship (Exod. 20:4). It belonged to God (Deut. 10:14). Heaven stands as a symbol of power and unchanging, enduring existence (Ps. 89:29), but heaven is not eternal. The days come when heaven is no more (Job 14:12; Isa. 51:6). As God once spread out the heavenly tent, so He will wrap up the heavens like a scroll (Isa. 34:4). A new heaven and new earth will appear (Isa. 65:17; 66:22).

The OT speaks of heaven to show the sovereignty of the Creator God and yet of the divine desire to communicate with and provide for the human creature. It holds out the tantalizing examples of men who left earth and were taken up to heaven (Gen. 5:24; 2 Kings 2:11).

New Testament In the NT the primary Greek word translated “heaven” describes heaven as being above the earth, although no NT passage gives complete instructions regarding the location or geography of heaven. Other than Paul's reference to the three heavens (2 Cor. 12:2-4), the NT writers spoke of only one heaven.

The NT affirms that God created heaven (Acts 4:24), that heaven and earth stand under God's lordship (Matt. 11:25), and that heaven is the dwelling place of God (Matt. 6:9).

Jesus preached that the kingdom of heaven (God) had dawned through His presence and ministry (Mark 1:15). By using the image of a messianic banquet, Jesus spoke of heavenly life as a time of joy, celebration, and fellowship with God (Matt. 26:29). Jesus taught that there would be no marrying or giving in marriage in heaven (Luke 20:34-36).

Christians should rejoice because their names are written in heaven (Luke 10:20). Jesus promised a heavenly home for His followers (John 14:2-3).

According to Paul, Christ is seated in heaven at the right hand of God (Eph. 1:20). Paul believed heaven is the future home of believers (2 Cor. 5:1-2). Paul referred to the hope of heaven as the hope of glory (Col. 1:27). The Holy Spirit is the pledge of the believer's participation in heaven (2 Cor. 5:5). Peter affirmed that heaven is the place where the believer's inheritance is kept with care until the revelation of the Messiah (1 Pet. 1:4).

The word “heaven” occurs more frequently in Revelation than in any other NT book. The Revelation addresses heaven from the standpoints of the struggle between good and evil and of God's rule from heaven. The most popular passage dealing with heaven is Rev. 21:1-22:5. In this passage, heaven is portrayed in three different images: (1) the tabernacle (21:1-8), (2) the city (21:9-27), and (3) the garden (22:1-5). The image of the tabernacle portrays heavenly life as perfect fellowship with God. The symbolism of the city portrays heavenly life as perfect protection. The image of the garden shows heavenly life as perfect provision.

HEAVEN OF HEAVENS KJV designation rendered “highest heaven” by most modern translations (1 Kings 8:27; 2 Chron. 2:6; 6:18). According to an ancient understanding of the universe, above the canopy of the sky was a further canopy above which God dwelt. TEV understands “heavens of heavens” as “all (the vastness) of heaven.”

HEAVENLY CITY The fulfillment of the hopes of God's people for final salvation. To the ancient world, cities represented ordered life, security from enemies, and material prosperity. Hebrews says the city “has foundations;” its “architect and builder is God” (11:10 NASB); God has prepared it (11:16); and it is “the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem” (12:22). This city is the home to “an innumerable company of angels” (12:22), to the assembly of the firstborn (12:23; an image of believers redeemed by the death of Christ; cp. Exod. 13:13-15), and to the righteous made perfect by God (12:23; perhaps the OT saints). Some interpreters take these descriptions literally. The Christian goal is, however, not something that can be touched and sensed like Israel's Sinai experience (12:18). Indeed, believers have already come (12:22) to the heavenly Jerusalem, at least in part. Some interpreters thus take the Heavenly City as an image of the redeemed people of God whose “foundation” is the apostles and prophets (Eph. 2:20). The experience of the patriarchs whose hope lay beyond their earthly lives (Heb. 11:13-16) points to a final fulfillment of salvation in heaven.

The Heavenly City of Rev. 21:9-22:7 has also been interpreted both literally and figuratively. One interpretation sees the Heavenly City suspended above the earth like a space platform. Others see an earthly city. Still others see a city suspended in the air that later descends to earth. Others, pointing to the equation of the city as the bride of Christ (21:2,9), take the city as a symbol of the church. Whether understood as a literal city or as representing God's redeemed people experiencing their final salvation, the city is a place of fellowship with God (21:3,22), of God-ensured safety (21:4,25), and of God-given provision (22:1-2,5). HEAVENS, NEW Technical, eschatological term referring to the final perfected state of the created universe. It often is connected with the concept of a new earth.

The promise of a re-creation of the heavens and earth arose because of human sin and God's subsequent curse (Gen. 3:17). The biblical hope for mankind is tied to the conviction that persons cannot be completely set free from the power of sin apart from the redemption of the created order—earth as well as the heavens. The idea of a renewed universe is found in many passages of the Bible (Isa. 51:16; Matt. 19:28; 24:29-31; 26:29; Mark 13:24-27,31; Acts 3:20-21; Rom. 8:19-23; 2 Cor. 5:17; Heb. 12:26-28; 2 Pet. 3:10-13). However, the phrase “new heavens” is found in only four passages (Isa. 65:17; 66:22; 2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1).

The nature of the “new heavens and earth” is variously described in the Bible. First, God is the cause of this new creation (Isa. 65:17; 66:22; Rev. 21:22). In Heb. 12:28 the new heaven and earth are described as a “kingdom that cannot be shaken” (HCSB). This new heaven and earth will last forever (Isa. 66:22). In 2 Peter 3:13 the new world is described as one “where righteousness will dwell.”

In Revelation, the nature of the new heaven and earth stands in marked contrast to the old heaven and earth. The Greek word translated “new” designates something that already exists but now appears in a new way: the new world is the old world gloriously transformed. Purity (Rev. 21:27) and freedom from the wrath of God (Rev. 22:3) are marks of the new heaven and earth. Further, the new world is marked by perfect fellowship of the saints with one another and with God. God and His people dwell together in the new age (21:1,3).

Clearly, God will bring the new order into existence at the end of history. But scholars disagree as to when this will occur within the events associated with the end times. Two main views are held. First, the new heavens and earth are created immediately after the second coming of Christ. Even among those within this camp there is disagreement. Some believe that the creation of the new heavens and earth will occur immediately after the “great white throne” judgment. Amillennialists generally hold to this theory. Some premillennialists associate the creation of the new heavens and earth with the beginning of the thousand year millennial reign of Christ. A second viewpoint commonly held by many premillennialists is that the new heaven and new earth are created at the end of the millennial reign of Christ. HEBER (Hē' bēer) Personal name meaning “companion.” 1. Grandson of Asher and great grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:17). He was the original clan ancestor of the Heberites (Num. 26:45). 2. Kenite related to family of Moses' wife (Judg. 4:11). His wife Jael killed Sisera, the Canaanite general, breaking a political alliance between Heber's clan and Jabin, Sisera's king (Judg. 4:17). This completed the great victory of Deborah and Barak over the Canaanites. 3. A member of the tribe of Judah in a Hebrew text (1 Chron. 4:18), which apparently lists two mothers of Heber, one an Egyptian. Commentators generally change the text or consider that some words have fallen out of the text as it was copied. Heber was the father of Socho and thus apparently recognized as founding ancestor of town of Socho. See Socho. 4. A member of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:17). 5. A different Hebrew word lies behind Eber (1 Chron. 5:13; 8:22), which KJV spells Heber. The Heber in Luke 3:35 (KJV) is the Eber of Gen. 11:15. See Eber.

HEBERITE (Hēb' ēri) See Heber.

HEBREW (Hē' brū) A descendant of Eber. It differentiates early Israelites from foreigners. After David founded the monarchy the term “Hebrew” seems to disappear from the Hebrew language. The designation apparently begins with Abraham (Gen. 14:13), showing that he belonged to an ethnic group distinct from the Amorites. It distinguished Joseph from the Egyptians and slaves of other ethnic identity (Gen. 39:14,17; 41:12; 43:32). Abraham's land has become the land of the Hebrews (Gen. 40:15), and his God, the God of the Hebrews (Exod. 5:3). Given the ethnic identity, special laws protected Hebrew slaves (Exod. 21:2; Deut. 15:12; cp. Lev. 25:40-41; Jer. 34:8-22). After the death of Saul (1 Sam. 29), the term “Hebrew” does not appear in the historical books, pointing possibly to a distinction between Hebrew as an ethnic term and Israel and/or Judah as a religious and political term for the people of the covenant and of God's nation. See Eber; Habiru.

HEBREW LANGUAGE The language in which the canonical books of the OT were written, except for the Aramaic sections in Ezra 4:8-6:18; 7:12-26; Dan. 2:4b-7:28; Jer. 10:11, and a few other words and phrases from Aramaic and other languages. The language is not called “Hebrew” in the OT. Rather, it is known as “the language (literally, ‘lip’) of Canaan” (Isa. 19:18) or as “Judean” (NASB), that is, the language of Judah (Neh. 13:24; Isa. 36:11). The word “Hebrew” for the language is first attested in the prologue to Ecclesiasticus in the Apocrypha. In the NT the references to the “Hebrew dialect” seem to be references to Aramaic. See Apocrypha.

Biblical or classical Hebrew belongs to the northwest Semitic branch of Semitic languages, which includes Ugaritic, Phoenician, Moabite, Edomite, and Ammonite. This linguistic group is referred to commonly as Canaanite, although some prefer not to call Ugaritic a Canaanite dialect.

Hebrew has an alphabet of 22 consonants. The texts were written right to left. The script was based on that of the Phoenicians, a circumstance that did not make it possible to represent or to distinguish clearly among all the consonantal sounds in current use in classical Hebrew.

The distinguishing characteristics of Hebrew are for the most part those shared by one or more of the other Semitic languages. Each root for verbs and nouns characteristically had three consonants, even in later periods when the use of four consonant roots was increased. Nouns are either masculine or feminine. They have singular, plural, or even dual forms, the dual being used for items normally found in pairs, such as eyes, ears, lips. While most nouns were derived from a verbal root, some were original nouns that gave rise to verbs (denominatives). The genitive relationship (usually expressed in English by “of”) is expressed by the construct formation in which the word standing before the genitive is altered in form and pronunciation (if possible).

The Hebrew verb forms indicate person, number, and gender. Seven verbal stems serve to indicate types of action: simple action, active or passive; intensive action, active, passive, or reflexive; and causative action, active or passive. In classical Hebrew the isolated verb form did not indicate a tense, but rather complete or incomplete action. Thus verbs are often referred to as perfect or imperfect, there being no past, present, future, past perfect, present perfect, or future perfect. The tense can be determined only in context, and sometimes even that procedure produces uncertain results. Classical Hebrew is a verb-oriented language rather than a noun-oriented or abstract language. The usual word order of a sentence is verb, subject, modifiers, direct object. The language is quite concrete in expression. However, the relatively simple structure and syntax of classical Hebrew did not keep biblical writers from producing countless passages of unparalleled beauty and power.

While historical development took place in classical Hebrew from the eleventh century to the emergence of Mishnaic Hebrew, it does not seem possible to write the history of that development. It is generally agreed that the most archaic texts are poetic, such as Gen. 4:23-24; Exod. 15; Judg. 5, although often it is difficult to decide what is archaic and what may be the result of an archaizing style. Books written toward the close of the OT period, such as Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles, and Ecclesiastes, show the Hebrew language undergoing a number of significant changes due primarily to Aramaic influence. Most of the Hebrew Bible now shows a homogeneous style which was most likely due to scribes in the late preexilic period copying the older texts in the dialect of Jerusalem. Thus, to be able to date an extant text does not necessarily mean that one can date the material contained in the text. There is some evidence of dialectical variations in the Hebrew spoken in biblical times. For example there is the Shibboleth-Sibboleth incident in Judg. 12:5-6. Some Bible students think many of the difficulties of the text of Hosea may be clarified by considering the Hebrew of that book as an example of northern or Israelite idiom.

The growing number of Hebrew inscriptions dating from the preexilic age provides an important supplement to the study of classical Hebrew. These inscriptions were chiseled into stone, written on ostraca (broken pieces of pottery), or cut into seals or inscribed on jar handles and weights. Some of the most important inscriptional evidence includes the Gezer calendar (tenth century), the Hazor ostraca (ninth century), the Samaria ostraca (early eighth century), the Siloam inscription (late eighth century), Yavneh-yam ostrakon (late seventh century), jar handles from Gibeon (late seventh century), the Lachish ostrakon (early sixth century), and the Arad ostraca (late seventh and early sixth centuries). To these may be added the Moabite Stone (Stele of Mesha, ninth century) and the Ammonite stele (ninth century) which contain inscriptions in languages very similar to classical Hebrew. Several benefits may be gained from these and other inscriptions for the study of classical Hebrew. First, we now have available an adequate view of the development of Hebrew script and orthography from the tenth century to NT times. Second, it now appears that literacy was earlier and more widespread in Israel than was thought previously. Third, the addition of new words and personal names and the like have enriched our knowledge of classical Hebrew. And fourth, details of the texts add new data on matters of history, material culture, and religion.

The Gezer Calendar is believed to be the oldest Hebrew inscription found to date. The inscription is on a limestone tablet and dates from 925 B.C.

HEBREWS, LETTER TO THE Language and imagery of the letter to the Hebrews seem distant from our world, but its message needs to be heard today.

Historical Context Both the author of Hebrews and the historical situation that prompted its writing are matters of speculation. Although Paul's name is included in the title in some manuscripts, the author never mentions his name. Nor does the author identify his recipients or their location. A monumental decision faced the audience, but the author never explicitly identified the situation forcing the decision.

We must reconstruct what we can about the historical context from clues in the text and from discussions by ancient church leaders. Authorship has been debated since the second century. Clement of Alexandria and Origen, church leaders in Alexandria, Egypt, at the end of the second century, both recognized that the content of the letter was linked to Paul or someone associated with him. But the vocabulary and style were very different from Paul. Origen said the thoughts were Pauline but that they were written by someone else. His famous statement on authorship was, “God only knows.” In addition to Paul, ancient nominations for the author included Luke, Barnabas, and Clement of Rome. More recently suggestions have included Apollos, Silvanus, Philip the deacon, Jude, and Priscilla, and others (at least 15).

More important than the name of the author is his character. The author had extraordinary knowledge of the OT. The letter contains 31 to 35 direct quotations from the OT plus numerous allusions and indirect references. The author used events, persons, and passages from the OT that he molded into a sustained argument for the superiority of Jesus.

The author was well educated, skillful in the use of language, and methods of argumentation. The Greek of Hebrews ranks with the best in the NT. From vocabulary to sentence construction, the author demonstrates creativity and finesse. One artistically crafted argument runs from beginning to end, using rhetorical techniques and imagery.

The author had a passion for people. Interwoven with biblical exposition is a plea to believers to stand fast in their faith. Poor decisions lead to disastrous spiritual consequences. The author would not rest until his readers realized the necessity of living out faith commitments in turbulent times.

Recipients The only geographical clue to the location of the church is found in Heb. 13:24b. However, the ambiguous phrase is open to two interpretations: Was the author in Italy writing to a church somewhere else (“Those here in Italy with me greet you”) or was the author writing to Italy, especially Rome, from another location (“Those from Italy are here with me and greet you”)?

At least two factors favor the second interpretation. The earliest quotations from and references to the book of Hebrews are found in the Letter of 1 Clement, which was written from Rome near the end of the first century. Also, some of the issues dealt with in The Shepherd of Hermas, written from Rome at about the same time, appear to be responsive to issues raised in Hebrews. This early knowledge of Hebrews in Rome makes sense if that were the original destination of the letter.

The eastern church centered in Alexandria, Egypt, despite the questions of Origen, grouped Hebrews with the Paulines long before the western church centered in Rome did so. If the letter was originally sent to Rome, then the knowledge of the identity of the author may have prompted that hesitancy.

The date of the letter is also uncertain. The author labeled himself and his audience as “second generation” Christians, who heard the word from those who had known Jesus (Heb. 2:3b). This church also had its own history. Members who should have been leaders still needed someone to teach them (5:12). The church's history also included a period of persecution in earlier days when they gladly accepted various hardships (10:32-34; hinted at in 6:10). That persecution does not seem to have involved loss of life (12:4).

Establishing a time frame is difficult. The description in 2:3b could apply to most of the church after Pentecost. The latest possible date for composition is set by quotations found in 1 Clement, giving a date range from about A.D. 35 to 100. The history of the church in Rome during this period is not complete, and conclusions drawn must be tentative. However, if circumstances can be found that fit the evidence in the letter, then we can have a sense of historical concreteness.

Around A.D. 49 the emperor Claudius expelled Jewish leaders from Rome over a religious conflict creating a disturbance within the city. The expulsion included Jewish Christians (Priscilla and Aquilla, Acts 18:2). Such an expulsion would fit the humiliation, imprisonment, and loss of property without loss of life described in the letter (10:32-34).

A good candidate for the coming persecution is Nero's persecution of Christians in Rome during the mid 60s. Extremely intense, this persecution involved painful death for many Christians. If this scenario is accurate, then the author was writing to a house church/churches in Rome between the beginning of Nero's persecution after the great fire of the summer of A.D. 64 and Nero's suicide in A.D. 68.

The expulsion under Claudius was directed at Jews who accepted Jesus as Messiah and some who did not. The purpose of the expulsion appears to have been to restore civil order. Jewish believers in the house churches in Rome potentially would have been affected by the order simply because they were Jews.

The persecution under Nero was an attempt to shift public criticism of Nero's involvement in the fire to a scapegoat, the followers of Jesus. Persecution was based on supposed crimes committed as believers. In the first situation, Jewish Christians could not escape expulsion either in the church or the synagogue for the order was based on their being Jewish. However, in the second situation, leaving the church and retreating to the synagogue would provide Jewish Christians with physical safety since the persecution was limited to Christians, not Jews in general.

Echoes of this concern run throughout the letter. The call to regular attendance in public meetings (10:24-25) may reflect the hesitancy of some to be associated with the church. The constant call throughout the letter was a reminder that everything in Judaism was fulfilled in Jesus. To turn from Jesus, no matter in which direction, was a move away from God. The only proper response to what God did in Jesus was to go outside the place of security (the synagogue) and bear Jesus' abuse with him (13:13).

To summarize, the letter was written by an unnamed author to a group of Christians, probably living in or near Rome, who were well versed in the OT Scriptures and familiar with Jewish history and the sacrificial system. They had faithfully endured hard times in the past but in the near future faced new and potentially more severe suffering. The author used a variety of means to encourage the Christians to stand firm and hold fast to their confession. The conjecture that links this group to Claudius' expulsion in the past and Nero's persecution in the near future must remain tentative, but if these two events do not provide the historical context for the letter, then it must have been events similar in nature.

Literary Context The literary context is just as problematic as the historical context. Hebrews is listed with NT letters. However, the book lacks the normal opening of a letter. The first four verses of Hebrews have been compared with the introduction to the Gospel of John, which serves as a prologue for the gospel. In this regard Hebrews is similar also to 1 John, which also lacks the normal letter opening. Unlike 1 John, which does not end like a letter either, Hebrews exhortations (13:1-18), followed by a benediction (13:20-21), concluding with personal references and greetings (13:22-24).

The incomplete epistolary form of Hebrews highlights its dual nature: it is a sermon or homily intended to be read orally but transmitted in written or letter form. The oral nature of the work is seen in the use of rhetorical devices that are crafted to arouse the emotions aurally as well as move the mind logically. The book begins with one such technique, alliteration: five words in the Greek text of 1:1 begin with the Greek letter pi. Even those NT letters containing all the formal elements of a letter were probably meant to be read orally. The original recipients of NT letters listened to them in public rather than reading them in private

The structure of the letter is also problematic. Hebrews is highly developed and well organized. However, there is little consensus as to how to outline the book. Two basic approaches to outlining have been followed, content based outlines and form based outlines. A limitation of contentbased outlines is that they tend to force Hebrews into the Pauline pattern of doctrinal exposition followed by practical exhortation. However, although Hebrews contains both exposition and exhortation, the two elements are interwoven throughout the book rather than being sequential.

Form based outlines attempt to find keys in the text that can be used to determine the units of the text. Some of these keys are repeated themes, repeated words, and shifts in genre. For example, the theme of Jesus' superiority over the angels in 1:5-14 is indicated, in part, by the frequent repetition of the word "angels" in those verses. Beginning in 2:1 the author shifts from third person (he/they) to first person (we/us) and the word "angels" does not occur, indicating a shift in genre and content, from exposition to exhortation. Then in 2:5 the word "angels" is used again. This technique separates 2:1-4 as a warning or exhortation passage and links the material in 2:5-18 with the exposition of Jesus' superiority begun in chapter one. The most extensive study of the structure of Hebrews using this technique was by G. H. Guthrie in The Structure of Hebrews: A Text-Linguistic Analysis.

The most outstanding feature of the structure of Hebrews is this blending of expositional and exhortative material. The result is that the sermon does not develop in a logical, point-by-point fashion. Instead, the author constantly flashed warnings in the face of his audience. The doctrine expounded had practical implications. The readers were reminded repeatedly that sound decisions needed solid, theological foundations.

Theological Context The main theological theme is found early in chapter one. The God who spoke to the Israelites is the same God who spoke through Jesus (1:1-2). And when God speaks, His people ought to listen, a message reiterated in the climactic warning passage of the letter: "See that you do not reject the One who speaks" (12:25 HCSB). In what may be the climax of the whole letter (13:10-16), the author reintroduced the themes of high priest, altar, and Day of Atonement sacrifice, all of which were central images in chapters 8-10. In this passage these images were used to call the hearers outside their security zone. The synagogue might represent physical security for the audience, but Jesus was outside, suffering for the people. His people needed to be outside with Him.

Other theological themes give support to the call to obedience. One such theme is christological: Jesus is God's ultimate, superior revelation of Himself. He is superior to angels, Moses, the earthly priests, and His sacrifice is superior to anything offered in the temple. Through careful exposition of OT passages the author points out the temporal nature of the priesthood, the temple sacrificial system, and the initial covenant between God and His people. Jesus as the perfect high priest offered a once-for-all sacrifice that initiated the new covenant foretold by Jeremiah.

Another burning theological theme is the issue of apostasy. This issue is present in all the warning passages, but the focal point of discussion usually is 6:4-8. The passage leaves no doubt that those who fall away will be punished for their disobedience. What is often overlooked, however, is that the text is far from explicit about what they are falling away from and what the punishment will be.

The most common assumption is that they have fallen away from salvation and the burning (6:8) refers to eternal destruction. However, Herschel Hobbs' contention that these believers were in danger of falling away from God's world mission, and the punishment will be loss of opportunity is credible [see Herschel Hobbs, Hebrews: Challenges to Bold Discipleship]. The theme of God's mission can be seen in other passages, such as the failed attempt at Kadeshbarnea to enter the promised land to fulfill their calling (chaps. 3 and 4). Another often suggested solution looks at those who fall away as phenomenological believers; in other words, they appeared to be believers but were not. A difficulty with this position is the strong language the author used in 6:4-5 to describe these people.

HEBRON (He' brōn) Place-name and personal name meaning “association” or “league.” A major city in the hill country of Judah about 19 miles south of Jerusalem and 15 miles west of the Dead Sea. The region is over 3,000 feet above sea level. The surrounding area has an abundant water supply, and its rich soil is excellent for agriculture. According to archaeological research the site has been occupied almost continuously since about 3300 B.C.

The mosque of the patriarchs at Hebron built over the traditional site of the Cave of Machpelah.

After his separation from Lot, Abraham moved to Hebron. At that time the area was known as Mamre and was associated with the Amorites (Gen. 13:18; 14:13; 23:19). Abraham apparently remained at Mamre until after the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. When Sarah died, the place was called Kirjath-arba; and the population was predominantly Hittite (Gen. 23:2; Josh. 14:15; 15:54; Judg. 1:10). From them Abraham purchased a field with a burial plot inside a nearby cave. Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, and Jacob and Leah were buried there (Gen. 23:19; 25:9; 35:29; 49:31; 50:13).

Four centuries later, when Moses sent the 12 spies into Canaan, the tribe of Anak lived in Hebron. According to Num. 13:22, Hebron was “built” seven years prior to Zoan, the Egyptian city of Tanis. Archaeological evidence suggests that the reference was to Tanis' establishment as the Hyksos capital around 1725 B.C. and not its beginning. Indeed both cities already were inhabited long before 2000 B.C. Therefore, the date may indicate that it was rebuilt by the Hyksos at that time, or it may specify when Hebron became a Canaanite city. After the Israelite conquest of Canaan, Hebron was given to Caleb (Josh. 14:9-13). It also became a city of refuge (Josh. 20:7). Later, Samson put the gates of Gaza on a hill outside of Hebron (Judg. 16:3).

After the death of Saul, David settled in the city (2 Sam. 2:3) and made it his capital during the seven years he ruled only Judah (1 Kings 2:11). His son, Absalom, launched an abortive revolt against David from Hebron (2 Sam. 15:10). Between 922 and 915 B.C. Rehoboam fortified the city as a part of Judah's defense network (2 Chron. 11:5-10). According to inscriptions found on pottery fragments, royal pottery was made in the city between 800 and 700 B.C.

When the Babylonians destroyed Jerusalem in 587 B.C., the Edomites captured Hebron. It was not recaptured until Judas Maccabeus sacked the city in 164 B.C. Although Herod the Great erected pretentious structures there, no mention of the city is made in the NT. The city was raided by both Jewish revolutionaries and Roman legions in A.D. 68 during the Jewish Revolt.

Two individuals in the OT also were named Hebron. The first was a Levite (Exod. 6:18; Num. 3:19; 1 Chron. 6:2,18; 23:12). The second is listed in the Calebite genealogy (1 Chron. 2:42-43). See City of Refuge; Machpelah; Mamre.

HEBRONITE (Hē' brōn īt) Citizen of Hebron. See Hebron.

HEDGE Boundary formed by a dense row of usually thorny shrubs. In ancient Palestine hedges served to protect vineyards from damage by animals or intruders (Ps. 80:12-13; Isa. 5:5). To put a hedge around someone means to protect (Job 1:10). "To hedge in" means to hem in or obstruct (Job 3:23; Lam. 3:7; Hos. 2:6).

Stone fences on the Island of Patmos with portions covered by thorny briars for added protection.

HEDGEHOG NASB, NRSV translation of the Hebrew qippod, a term of uncertain meaning (Isa. 14:23; 34:11; Zeph. 2:14). The term either refers to the hedgehog (or porcupine) or else to a type of bird. The decision of the NASB and RSV translators was based on the supposed Hebrew root qaphad (meaning to roll up, which is what hedgehogs do when frightened) and on cognate Arabic and Syriac words referring to hedgehogs and porcupines. Other English versions follow the KJV in seeing a reference to a type of bird. Context favors a reference to a bird. Various identities of the bird have been proposed: bittern, a nocturnal heron (KJV); owl, screech owl (NIV); owl (TEV); bustard, a game bird (REB). See Bittern; Porcupine.

HEEL, LIFTED HIS To lift one's heel against someone is to turn one's back and join rank with the enemies. Jesus applied the expression to Judas, who accepted Jesus' hospitality but then plotted His arrest (John 13:18).

HEGAI (He' gi) Persian name of unknown meaning. Eunuch in charge of King Ahasuerus' harem who befriended Esther (Esther 2:8-9,15).

HEGE (He' ge) KJV spelling of Hegai in Esther 2:3 based on variant spelling in Hebrew text.

HEGLAM (Hēg' lam) NRSV interpretation of Hebrew text in 1 Chron. 8:7, taking as a proper name giving a second name to Gera what other translations translate as “who deported them.”

HEIFER Young cow, especially one that has not yet calved. Heifers were used for plowing (Deut. 21:3; Judg. 14:18) and for threshing grain (Hos. 10:11). Heifers were used as sacrificial animals (1 Sam. 16:2). Heifers (or cows) were used in three different rites: to ratify a covenant (Gen. 15:9); to remove the guilt associated with a murder by an unknown person (Deut. 21:1-9); and to remove the uncleanness associated with contact with a corpse (Num. 19:1-10). The Hebrew term for the red “heifer” of Num. 19 is the common term for cow.

Samson characterized scheming with his wife as plowing “with my heifer” (Judg. 14:18). One of David's wives (2 Sam. 3:5) was named Eglah (heifer). The heifer was used as a symbol for the splendor of Egypt (Jer. 46:20) and of Babylon (50:11). Hosea 10:11 pictures obedient Ephraim as a trained heifer. In contrast, disobedient Israel is a stubborn cow.

HELAH (Hē' la) Personal name meaning “jewelry for the neck.” Wife of Ashur in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:5,7).

HELAM (Hē' lam) Place-name meaning “their army.” The earliest Greek translation of Ezek. 47:16 apparently locates it between Damascus and Hamath in Syria. First Maccabees 5:26 seems to indicate a place in the northern part of the territory east of the Jordan. Helam is the region, rather than a city, where David defeated the army of Hadadezer and thus gained control of Syria (2 Sam. 10:15-19).

HELBAH (Hēl' ba) Place-name meaning “forest.” City in tribal territory of Asher which Asher could not drive out (Judg. 1:31). Some have seen this as an inadvertent copying of Ahlab. Most identify Helbah with Mahalib, mentioned in Assyrian monuments. It is four miles northeast of Tyre. See Mahalab.

HELBON (Hēl' bōn) Place-name meaning “forest.” City known for its trade in wine mentioned in Ezekiel's lament over Tyre (Ezek. 27:18). It is modern Halbun about 11 miles north of Damascus.

HELDAI (Hēl' dā ī) Personal name meaning “mole.” 1. Officer in charge of David's army for the twelfth month of the year (1 Chron. 27:15). He is apparently the same as Heled, David's military hero (1 Chron. 11:30), called Heleb in 2 Sam. 23:29. 2. Man who returned from exile in Babylon, apparently with a gift of silver and gold, which God told Zechariah to take and have made into a crown for Joshua, the high priest (Zech. 6:10). Verse 14 calls him Helem, which probably represents a copying change. Some students think Heldai was a nickname and Helem the official name. The earliest Greek translation took the names in this verse as common nouns rather than as proper names, translating Heldai as “the rulers.”

HELEB (Hē' lēb) Personal name meaning “fat” or “the best.” One of David's military heroes (2 Sam. 23:29), probably a copyist's change from Heled in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 11:30), Heled also appearing in many manuscripts of 2 Samuel. See Heldai.

HELECH (Hē' lēk) Transliteration of Hebrew noun in NRSV, NIV which KJV, TEV, NASB interpret as meaning “your army.” REB interprets Helech with many modern Bible students and reference books to refer to Cilicia. The precise meaning in the context is not known. Ezekiel described the good days of Tyre as having its massive city walls protected by foreign soldiers, but the precise home of these soldiers is not certain (Ezek. 27:11). See Cilicia.

HELED (Hē' lēd) Personal name meaning “life.” See Heldai; Heleb; Helem.

HELEK (Hē' lēk) Personal name meaning “portion.” Son of Gilead from the tribe of Manasseh and original clan ancestor of the Helekites (Num. 26:30). The clan received an allotment in the tribe's share of the promised land (Josh. 17:2).

HELEKITE (Hē' lēk ī) Member of clan of Helek. See Helek.

HELEM (Hē' lēm) Personal name meaning “beat, strike.” Member of tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35), probably the same name with a copying change as Hotham (v. 32). The same English spelling is derived from a different Hebrew word meaning “power.” The name appears in Zech. 6:14 as a variant to Heldai in 6:10. See Heldai.

HELEPH (Hē' lēph) Place-name meaning “replacement settlement” or “settlement of reeds.” Border city of the tribal allotment of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33). It is often identified with Khirbet Arbathah just northeast of Mount Tabor, but some Bible students think this location is too far south. Others think Heleph represents the southern border of Naphtali.

HELEZ (Hē' lēz) Personal name, perhaps meaning “ready for battle.” 1. David's military hero (2 Sam. 23:26) in charge of the army for the seventh month (1 Chron. 27:10). 2. Member of the family of Caleb and Jerahmeel in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:39).

HELI (Hē' lī) Hebrew personal name meaning “high.” The son of Matthat and father of Joseph, Jesus' earthly father (Luke 3:23-24). His relationship to Jesus is variously explained by Bible students in light of Matt. 1:16, which makes Joseph's father to be Jacob. He has been seen as the father of Joseph, a more remote ancestor of Joseph, or an ancestor of Mary. Either Jacob and Heli are variant names of the same person (“son of” means “descendant of” as in other genealogies), or Luke preserved the genealogy of Mary rather than of Joseph. A totally satisfactory answer to the question has not been found. The name probably represents a Greek form of the Hebrew Eli (NASB).

HELIOPOLIS (Hē lī ōp' ō līs) 1. Greek name for Egyptian city that meant “city of the sun.” Its name in Egyptian means “pillar town” and was rendered in Akkadian as Ana and in Hebrew as On or Aven (Gen. 41:45; 46:20; Ezek. 30:17). The city was sacred to the sun god Re or Atum and is designated bet-shemesh, “house/temple of the sun” in Jer. 43:13. Kings were crowned there during the new kingdom era. To the two cities of Pithom and Rameses, built in Egypt by the Israelite slaves, the Septuagint adds “and On, which is the city of the sun.” It has been identified as Tell Hisn in Matariyeh, just north of Cairo. See On. 2. Ancient city of Baalbek (“Lord of the Valley”) located in the Beqaa Valley of Lebanon about 50 miles east of Beirut. Although it was a very ancient city, it was renamed Heliopolis in the third or second century B.C. Baalbek was an important city in early times but declined through both the Hellenistic period and the early part of the Roman era. During the days of the later Roman Empire, its influence grew as a center for the cult worship of Juniper, Mercury, and Venus (which was based upon an older cult worship of the Semitic gods Hadad, Atargatis, and Baal). Impressive ruins have been excavated at Baalbek including a temple to Jupiter, a temple to Baachus, and one to Venus.

HELKAI (Hĕl' kā ī) Personal name meaning “my portion.” Priest when Joiakim was high priest one generation after the return from the exile under Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:15).

HELKATH (Hĕl' kāth) Place-name meaning “flat place.” Border town in the tribal allotment of Asher (Josh. 19:25) given to the Levites (Josh. 21:31). It is called Hukok in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 6:75). It is either modern Tell Qassis on the west bank of the Kishon River or Tell telHarbaj just south of Acco.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM (Hĕl' kāth-hāz zū' rīm) Place-name meaning “field of flint stones” or “field of battle.” Site of “play” (2 Sam. 2:14) battle between young warriors of Saul and those of David leading to defeat of Ish-bosheth's army (2 Sam. 2:12-17). The somewhat obscure Hebrew play on words to name the field near Gibeon has led to numerous translation attempts. REB reads “Field of Blades.”

HELL Usually understood as the final abode of the unrighteous dead wherein the ungodly suffer eternal punishment; the term translates one OT word and several NT words.

Old Testament Usage The only Hebrew word translated “hell” in the KJV (though not in modern translations) is Sheol. Sheol itself is a broad term that, depending on the context, may signify the abode of both the righteous dead and the ungodly dead. See Sheol.

New Testament Usage In the NT three words are translated “hell”: Gehenna (Matt. 5:22,29-30; 10:28; 18:19; Mark 9:43,45,47; Luke 12:5; James 3:6), Hades (Matt.11:23; 16:18; Luke 10:15; 16:23; Acts 2:27,31; Rev. 1:18; 20:13-14), and Tartarus (2 Pet. 2:4). It is significant that, contrary to Sheol, none of the NT terms for hell or Gehenna are used simply for the grave. See Gehenna; Hades.

In paganism Hades originally referred to the god of the netherworld but later came to refer to the place of the dead. In Luke 16:23 Hades is definitely depicted as a place of torment (Luke 10:15). Revelation 20:13 depicts Hades as an interim place of habitation for the lost until the final judgment. Gehenna was the name of a valley on the southeast of Jerusalem into which little children were thrown as sacrifices to a god named Moloch.

There is a fundamental difference between Hades and Gehenna that is vital to the understanding of God's punitive justice. From its use in the NT, Hades is viewed as the place that receives the ungodly for the intervening period between death and resurrection. Gehenna may be equated with the everlasting fire that was originally prepared for the devil and his angels (Matt. 25:41), and the lake of fire in Rev. 20:14 into which are cast death and hell. Following the resurrection and the judgment of the lost, Gehenna becomes the final place of punishment by eternal fire.

Tartarus was regarded by the ancient Greeks as that abiding place where rebellious gods and other wicked ones were punished. Its only NT use is in 2 Pet. 2:4 which says that the angels that sinned “were confined in Tartarus” and “kept unto judgment.”

Additional Descriptions of Suffering After final judgment, the lost experience continual and unimaginable suffering and torment. Such phrases as “weeping and gnashing of teeth” and “outer darkness” (Matt. 8:12; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; 13:28) and “their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched” (Mark 9:44,46,48 HCSB) indicate emotional and physical, as well as spiritual, suffering. Degrees of judgment and suffering are also indicated by such texts as Matt. 10:15; 11:22,24; 18:6; Mark 6:11; Luke 10:12,14.

Interpretations There are two broad questions to be answered which are vital to a proper understanding of the biblical teaching concerning hell. First, is the punishment of hell eternal or temporary? Second, does the Bible teach a literal or figurative hell?

Eternal or temporal? The Word of God teaches that the suffering of the lost in hell is eternal (Isa. 66:24; Matt. 25:46; Mark 9:44,46,48; Rev. 14:11). The assertion that God would be unfair to punish eternally a temporal sin underestimates the seriousness of sin, the spiritual nature of sin, and the supreme holiness of God.

Figurative or literal? That the Scriptures teach a literal hell is clear. The story of the rich man and Lazarus is most likely a true historical narrative revealed by Christ rather than a parable (Luke 16). Jesus teaches in Matt. 10:28 that both the soul and body can be cast into hell. This requires that hell be a literal place, for a physical body (the only kind of body there is) cannot be cast into anything metaphorical.

Among evangelicals, the most common difference of opinion is whether hell as a place of suffering is described with figurative language, literal language, or a combination of the two. Some believe the Bible teaches that hell is real, but the language used to describe it is figurative. This is an approach consistent with one taken by many concerning John's descriptions of heaven in Revelation. As heaven is more magnificent than the description in Revelation, also hell is so terrible that human language falls short.

However, there is strong evidence to indicate that literal language is used and that the Bible does in fact teach literal fire and other sufferings. The parable of the tares in Matt. 13, which discusses eternal judgment, is helpful here. The Son of man, the world, children of the kingdom, the children of the wicked one, the devil, the end of the world, the angels, the gatherings—all are literal figures in the parable. It is then natural to conclude that the burning of the tares should also be taken literally.

Few would question that the Bible reveals hell as a place of spiritual and emotional torment for the finally impenitent. Since man is a physical being (body) as well as emotional and spiritual (soul and spirit), it is most consistent with Scripture to conclude that physical suffering is also a part of the destiny of the lost. It is no wonder why “it is a terrifying thing to fall into the hands of the living God” (Heb. 10:31 HCSB), and why the emphasis on evangelism is what makes the Great Commission great. HELLENISM Used to describe any influence of classical Greek thought on Western heritage. It is derived from hellas, Greek for the nation Greece. Hellenism is often associated with the philosophy of Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle but is seen also in Greek philosophies such as Pythagoreanism, Stoicism, and Epicureanism. Hellenism was not merely academic. The various Greek philosophies were essentially religious, providing explanations of the universe and offering salvation through human reason.

While Greek philosophies differed on a number of issues, many shared a dualistic view of reality that drew a sharp distinction between physical and mental reality. Plato's “Allegory of the Cave” illustrates this bifurcation, describing an imaginary cave where prisoners were permanently chained. These prisoners heard people talking and saw their shadows on the wall but never saw the outside world. They believed the shadows were real, not knowing the real world lay beyond the cave. Plato's point is that we are like prisoners, trapped in this physical world of the five senses, believing only what we can see. Plato believed the natural world was really a shadow; the real world was the supernatural world of the soul. For many Greek thinkers, the physical world represented the temporal, transitory, and evil, while the world of the soul was eternal, real, and good. This principle shaped Greek thought that formed the intellectual context in which Christianity was born. This strain of Greek thought saw the human body as being evil but the mind or soul as being immortal and good. The soul was trapped in the body like a person in prison.

History Hellenism dates from early Greek culture but became dominant during the reign of Alexander the Great (336-323 B.C.). Alexander, tutored by Aristotle, believed that Greek philosophy offered the key to enlightenment for the barbarians. As Alexander conquered, his image was planted around the world, evidenced by the numerous cities named after him. He pursued an intentional process of indoctrinating conquered nations in Hellenistic philosophy. When the empire was divided after Alexander's death, the Ptolemaic dynasty (based in Egypt) reigned over the Holy Land (301-198 B.C.). The Ptolemies instituted a gentle policy of Hellenization, primarily through education and language. The Hellenistic culture of Alexandria strongly impacted Jewish and Christian communities. The Koine Greek language became the lingua franca, an influence seen in the Greek terms used to name the Jewish “synagogue” (sunagoge) and the NT “church” (ekklesia). In about 275 B.C. Jewish scholars produced the first translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, the Greek Septuagint (LXX). Philo the Jew (ca. 30 B.C.-A.D. 40) reinterpreted Judaism consistent with Greek philosophy. As the Church emerged from Alexandrian Judaism, early Christian thinkers such as Justin Martyr, Origen, and Clement of Alexandria viewed Christianity as the fulfillment of Greek philosophy, rather than being its rival.

While Jews thrived in Alexandria under the Ptolemies, the Palestinian Jews faced harsher Hellenization by the Seleucid dynasty, Syrian Greeks who dominated Palestine 198-167 B.C., having wrested control of Palestine from the Ptolemies. This forced Hellenization peaked during the reign of Antiochus IV (Antiochus Epiphanes), who sought to destroy Judaism, attacking on the Sabbath day and desecrating the temple in Jerusalem. The account of the Jews' resistance, led by the Maccabee family, is recorded in the extracanonical books of 1-4 Maccabees. The Maccabees gained religious and political freedom for Palestine (167-63 B.C.), until Roman domination began.

Colossal statue of the Roman god Mars (Greek: Ares). Dual Greco-Roman gods was a mark of Hellenism.

Influence The early church experienced tension between hellenized Jewish believers and traditional Palestinian Jews, a dispute which led to the naming of the earliest deacons (Acts 6:1-6). Further, Jewish believers wanted to require Gentile believers to become Jews as a prerequisite to becoming Christian. Gentile believers challenged some Jewish traditions, leading to a conflict resulting in the Jerusalem Council (Acts 14:4-7; 15:1-3), which ruled that the Gentiles did not have to become Jewish to be saved.

The Greek language was crucial in the spread of the gospel. NT authors used and quoted from the Septuagint and the NT was written in Koine Greek. Some passages in the NT seem to reflect Greek thought as well as Greek terminology. Greek influence shows in the use of logos in John 1:1-14, a term Stoic philosophers used to describe the creative order of the universe. The book of Hebrews draws a sharp distinction between the earthly temple and the heavenly temple, utilizing the language of Plato. The earthly tabernacle was a shadow (skia) and type (typos) of the heavenly tabernacle (Heb. 8:2-6; 9:21-24). Paul uses similar language in describing our citizenship in heaven (Phil. 3:20). These similarities do not suggest uncritical application of Greek philosophy to Christian theology, but that the church used existing Greek concepts to explain the unsearchable riches of Christ to a Hellenistic culture.

The Greeks found Christian doctrine scandalous, particularly the incarnation and resurrection, but the NT authors did not compromise the gospel (1 Cor. 1:18-25; 15:12). So while John utilized the philosophical term logos, he also claimed that “the Word became flesh and took up residence among us” (John 1:14 HCSB; 1 John 1:1-2; 2:22; 4:1-3; 5:1). That the immortal logos would take on evil human flesh was inconceivable to Greek thinkers. The resurrection caused a similar problem. The Greeks taught immortality of the soul for centuries, but Paul's proclamation on Mars Hill of bodily resurrection to eternal life was scandalous (Acts 17:30-34).

Bust of Demosthenes (384-322 B.C.), the greatest of Greek orators.

Unfortunately, some Hellenistic Gnostic Christians did compromise the gospel to conform to Greek philosophy. Cerinthian Gnostics taught a docetic Christology that denied the full humanity of Christ, accepting Greek philosophical dualism. For God (spiritual, good) to come into flesh (evil) was incomprehensible. These docetic Gnostics taught that Jesus was wholly divine and was either a spirit adopting a human body or a ghostly apparition who had no real physical body. John directly confronted this heresy, affirming in graphic terms the full corporeal humanity of Christ (John 1:1-14; 1 John 1:1-2; 2:22; 4:1-3; 5:1). The pattern of the early church is a good example to the church in every age, making the gospel relevant to culture without compromising doctrine.

Later scholars proposed that the church borrowed from Greek philosophy and mystery religions. In particular, they asserted a similarity between the resurrection of Jesus and the sun worship in Greek mystery religions, in which the sun is reborn and dies repeatedly. This speculation is wrong. The Gospel writers carefully documented their historical narratives to ensure dramatic differences from mythology about dying and rising gods. These gods were mythological and imaginary; Jesus was historical and His miracles tangible and undeniable. So while the NT was produced in a Hellenistic culture, the Church consistently refused to compromise the Gospel in order to placate Hellenistic cultural expectations.

HELLENISTS Group of early Christians whose language and culture was Greek rather than Hebrew. One of the first conflicts among believers in the early church was between those with a Greek background and those who had grown up in the Hebrew tradition (Acts 6:1; 9:29). See Hellenism.

HELMET See Arms and Armor.

HELON (חֵלֹן) Personal name meaning “powerful.” Father of the leader of the tribe of Zebulun under Moses (Num. 1:9).

HELP, HELPS In addition to the usual sense of assistance, the KJV used “helps” in two technical senses: for equipment used to secure a ship in storm (Acts 27:17) and for a gift of ministry (1 Cor. 12:28). Modern translations understand the “helps” of Acts 27 in various senses: ropes (NIV, TEV); supporting cables (NASB); tackle (REB); or generally as measures to undergird the ship (NRSV). The helps of 1 Corinthians refer to the ability to offer help or assistance. In the Septuagint, God is known as the help of those who lack strength and live in poverty (Sirach 11:12). It has been suggested that Paul refers to the ministry of the deacons who care for the poor and the sick. A general reference to all those who demonstrate love in their dealings with others is possible.

Hellenistic tombs outside the west gate at Hierapolis.

HELPER NASB translation of parakletos, a distinctive title for the Holy Spirit in the Gospel of John (14:16,26; 15:26; 16:7). Other versions translate the term “Comforter” (KJV), “Advocate” (NEB), or “Counselor” (HCSB, RSV, NIV). Because parakletos is difficult to translate with any single word, some interpreters opt for making “Paraclete” an English word and allowing the relevant Johannine passages to provide its meaning.

The Helper, who could not come until Jesus departed (John 16:7), functions as the abiding presence of Jesus among His disciples (John 14:16-18). Nearly everything said of the Helper is also said of Jesus in the Gospel, and the Helper actually comes as “another Counselor (parakletos)” (John 14:16), implying that Jesus had been the first (1 John 2:1).

Jesus described the role of the Helper primarily with verbs of speaking. The Helper would be sent by the Father to “teach” the disciples and to bring to remembrance all Jesus “said” to them (John 14:26; 16:14-15). Like Jesus, the Helper was “sent” to “bear witness” (John 15:26-27). The Helper's function in relation to the world involves “reproving” it concerning sin, righteousness, and judgment (John 16:8). The Helper would also “guide” Jesus' disciples into all truth by “speaking” what He hears and “showing” what is to come (John 16:13). By so doing He would “glorify” Jesus (John 16:14). See Advocate; Comforter; Counselor; Holy Spirit; Paraclete.

HELP MEET KJV term for woman as a helper precisely adapted to man (Gen. 2:18). Modern translations supply various equivalents: helper suitable for him (NASB, NIV); helper as his partner (NRSV); a suitable companion to help him (TEV). The noun translated “helper” or “partner” does not suggest subordination. Elsewhere the term is used of God as Help (1 Chron. 12:18; Pss. 30:10; 54:4; 121:1) or of military allies (Jer. 47:4; Nah. 3:9). The adjective “meet” (translated “suitable,” “comparable,” or “corresponding”) stresses that woman, unlike the animals (Gen. 2:20), can be truly one with man (2:24), that is, enjoy full fellowship and partnership in humanity's God-given task (Gen. 1:27-28) of rule and dominion.

HELVE KJV term used for the handle of an ax (Deut. 19:5).

HEM Border of a cloth article doubled back and stitched down to prevent the cloth from unraveling. Biblical references to the “hem” of a garment refer more generally to its edge or border. The border of Aaron's high priestly robe was decorated with blue, purple, and scarlet pomegranates and gold bells (Exod. 28:31-35; 39:22-26). Sometimes the woof (the vertical filling threads in woven cloth) were left long to prevent unraveling. The result of these long threads was a fringed border. The fringe on the corners of their garments was to remind the Israelites of the law of God (Num. 15:38-39). The fringed “hem” of Jesus' garment conveyed healing power to those who in faith touched it (Matt. 9:20; 14:36; Mark 6:56; Luke 8:44).

HEMAM (Hè' mām) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Descendant of Seir (Gen. 36:22). The parallel passage spells the name Homam (1 Chron. 1:39).

HEMAN (Hè' mǎn) Personal name meaning “faithful.” 1. In Gen. 36:22, one of the sons of Lotan mentioned among the descendants of Esau. KJV renders the name Hemam. 2. In 1 Kings 4:31, a notable sage to whose wisdom that of Solomon is compared. 3. In 1 Chron. 6:33, the son of Joel, a Kohathite. He was one of the temple singers under David and Solomon. In 1 Chron. 25:5, he is called a seer. Elsewhere in that chapter he is said to have prophesied using musical instruments. He may be the same as the Heman mentioned in 1 Kings 4:31. The psalm title attributes Ps. 88 to Heman.

HEMATH (He' mǎth) (KJV) See Hamath; Hammath.

HEMDAN (Hēm' dān) Personal name meaning “beauty, charm.” Descendant of Seir and thus an Edomite (Gen. 36:26). The parallel passage spells the name Hamran (1 Chron. 1:41 NASB).

HEMLOCK KJV translation of two Hebrew terms. Modern translations agree in translating that in Hos. 10:4 as poisonous weed(s). The term at Amos 6:12 is translated as “bitterness” (NASB margins, NIV), “poison” (REB), and “wormwood” (NRSV, NASB). See Gall.

HEMORRHAGE Heavy or uncontrollable bleeding. The KJV translates the underlying Hebrew and Greek terms as “issue of blood” (Lev. 12:7; Matt. 9:20) or “fountain of blood” (Mark 5:29). Modern translations render these terms as hemorrhage, flow, or discharge of blood. Mosaic law said any discharge of blood, whether associated with the birthing process (Lev. 12:7), with menstruation (Lev. 15:19), or continued bleeding (Lev. 15:25; Matt. 9:20) rendered a woman unclean. Those ritually unclean were separated from God (represented by the tabernacle, Lev. 15:31) and from the congregation of Israel (Num. 5:2). The woman suffering from a hemorrhage (Matt. 9:20; Mark 5:29; Luke 8:43-44) was thus a religious and social outcast who only dared approach Jesus from behind. Contrary to expectations, the woman did not give her uncleanness to Jesus. Rather, Jesus' healing power made the woman clean.

HEMORRHOIDS Mass of dilated veins and swollen tissue in the vicinity of the anus. The KJV translators understood the affliction of Deut. 28:27; 1 Sam. 5:6,9,12 as hemorrhoids (or emerods). Modern versions are divided in their understanding of the term in Deuteronomy. Some take a reference to tumors (NASB, NIV, REB). Others find a reference to sores (TEV) or ulcers (NRSV). Modern versions agree that the affliction of 1 Samuel was tumors, probably associated with bubonic plague.

HEN (fowl) Greek word translated “hen” can refer to the female of any bird, not just the domesticated fowl. Only two references to the hen occur in the Scriptures (Matt. 23:37; Luke 13:34). In both instances the term is used figuratively of God's care for His people. The hen stands as a figure of the self-sacrifice and tender motherliness of God revealed in Christ.

HEN (person) Hebrew word for “grace, favor” used as either a proper name or a title (meaning “favored one”) of Josiah son of Zephaniah (Zech. 6:14; cp. 6:10) if the present Hebrew text is original. The Syriac version (followed by the NRSV, REB, TEV) has the name Josiah in place of “hen” in 6:14. The earliest Greek version understood the name as a title.

HENA (Hē' nā) Place-name of uncertain meaning. City Sennacherib, king of Assyria, captured prior to threatening Hezekiah and Jerusalem in 701 B.C. (2 Kings 18:34). Sennacherib used the historical example to brag and to persuade Hezekiah not to rely on God for protection against Sennacherib. Hena may be the same as Ana or Anat at the middle of the course of the Euphrates River.

HENADAD (Hēn' ā dād) Personal name meaning “grace of Hadad (the god).” Clan of Levites who supervised the rebuilding of the temple under Zerubbabel after 537 B.C. (Ezra 3:9). Clan members also helped Nehemiah rebuild Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 3:18,24) and signed Nehemiah's covenant of obedience (Neh. 10:10).

HEPHER (Hē' phēr) Personal name meaning “well” or “shame.” 1. Original family ancestor in clan of Gilead and father of Zelophehad (Num. 26:28-37). He belonged to the tribe of Manasseh (Josh. 17:1-2). 2. A hero in David's wilderness army (1 Chron. 11:36). 3. Member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:6).

HEPHERITE (Hēph' phērīt) Descendant of family of Hopher. See Hopher.

HEPHZIBAH (Hēph' zī bā) Personal name meaning “my delight is in her.” 1. In 2 Kings 21:1 the mother of Manasseh, king of Judah. 2. In Isa. 62:4 it is used as a symbolic name for Jerusalem. When Jerusalem is restored, she will no longer be forsaken and desolate; she will be called Hephzibah, for God's delight will be in her.

HERALD Official messenger. The herald of Dan. 3:4 was responsible for publicizing the king's law and the penalty of disobedience. Noah is described as a herald of righteousness (2 Pet. 2:5), that is, one who announced God's requirements. Paul was appointed as a herald or preacher of the gospel. First Timothy 2:5-7 outlines Paul's message as the uniqueness of God, Christ's unique role as mediator between God and humanity, and Christ's death as ransom. Second Timothy 1:9-11 outlines Paul's gospel as the good news that God has given grace by sending Christ who abolished death and brought life.

HERBS See Plants.

HERBS, BITTER Salad of bitter herbs was eaten as part of the Passover observance (Exod. 12:8; Num. 9:11). Such a meal could be quickly prepared and was appropriate to commemorate Israel's hasty retreat from Egypt (Exod. 12:11). Later the bitter herbs were associated with the bitterness of Egyptian slavery (cp. Exod. 1:14). Bitter herbs possibly included lettuce, chicory, eryngo, horseradish, and sow thistle. See Plants.

HERD Number of animals kept together under human control. In biblical usage “herd” generally refers to cattle in contrast to “flock” which refers to sheep or goats. Herds were a source of meat and dairy products, of agricultural labor (1 Chron. 12:40; Isa. 46:1), and of sacrifices (Num. 7:3; Ps. 69:31; Isa. 66:3). Herds were regarded as a sign of wealth (Gen. 13:5; 32:7; 45:10). Cattle were generally kept in open pasture. Pen-fed beef was a luxury item (Amos 6:4; Hab. 3:17). See Cattle.

HERDSMAN One who cares for cattle in contrast to a shepherd who cares for sheep. Amos served as a herdsman before receiving his prophetic call (Amos 7:14). Herdsmen were sometimes included among high-ranking officials of ancient kings (1 Chron. 27:29; 28:1; cp. Gen. 46:34). Herdsmen were sometimes paid from the products of the herd (1 Cor. 9:7).

HERES (He' rēš) Place-name meaning “sun.” A mountain pass over which Gideon traveled in returning from his battle with the Midianites (Judg. 8:13). It is distinct from the more western Mount Heres in Judg. 1:35, often identified with Beth-shemesh (“house of the sun”). KJV translates 8:13 as “before the sun was up” as compared to NASB, “by the ascent of Heres.” Location of Gideon's pass is not known, though some scholars now locate it as the Ascent of Horus that leads to Tell Deir Alla east of the Jordan. Strong manuscript evidence reads “city of Heres” or Heliopolis in Isa. 19:18 (cp. REB, TEV, NRSV). See Heliopolis.

HERESH (He' rēsh) Personal name meaning “unable to speak.” Levite who lived near Jerusalem after the return from exile about 537 B.C. (1 Chron. 9:15).

HERESY Opinion or doctrine not in line with the accepted teaching of a church; the opposite of orthodoxy. Our English word is derived from a Greek word that has the basic idea of “choice.” In ancient classical Greek it was used predominantly to refer to the philosophical school to which one chose to belong. Later, it came to be associated with the teaching of philosophical schools.

The word had a similar usage in Jewish writings. Josephus, a Jewish historian of the first century from whom we learn much of what we know about the Judaism of NT times, used the word to refer to the various Jewish parties (or schools of thought) such as the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. Jewish rabbis employed the term in a bad sense applying it to groups who had separated from the main stream of Jewish teaching.

The word has several usages in the NT but never has the technical sense of “heresy” as we understand it today. It may be classified as follows:

(1) Most frequently, especially in Acts, it has the same meaning as Josephus. In Acts 5:17; 15:5; and 26:5, where it refers to the Pharisees and Sadducees, it simply means party or sect.

(2) In Acts 24:14 and 28:22 it is used in a slightly derogatory sense, referring to Christians as they were viewed to be separatists or sectarians by the Jews. This usage conforms to that of the rabbis.

(3) Paul used the term to refer to groups that threatened the harmonious relations of the church. In 1 Cor. 11:19, where he was writing about the disgraceful way in which the Corinthians were observing the Lord's Supper, the word has to do with the outward manifestations of the factions he mentioned in verse 18. In Gal. 5:20 it is one of the works of the flesh and is in a grouping including strife, seditions, and envyings. It apparently has to do with people who choose to place their own desires above the fellowship of the church. Titus 3:10 speaks of a man who is a heretic. Since the context of the verse has to do with quarreling and dissension, the idea in this passage seems to be that of a fractious person.

(4) In 2 Pet. 2:1 it comes closest to our meaning of the term. It clearly refers to false prophets who have denied the true teaching about Christ. Since the remainder of 2 Pet. 2 refers to the immoral living of the false prophets, the word also refers to their decadent living. The reference to the heretic in Titus 3:10 may belong to this category since the verse mentions disputes about genealogies, a doctrinal matter.

It is clear that in the NT, the concept of heresy had more to do with fellowship within the church than with doctrinal teachings. While the writers of the NT were certainly concerned about false teachings, they apparently were just as disturbed by improper attitudes.

In the writings of Ignatius, a leader of the church in the early second century, the word takes on the technical meaning of a heresy. Most frequently in the writings of the early church fathers, the heresy about which they were concerned was Gnosticism, a teaching which denied that Jesus was fully human. See Christ, Christology; Gnosticism.

HERETH (Hè' rēth) Modern translation spelling of Hareth; place-name meaning “cut in to.” Forest in which David hid from Saul after settling his parents with the king of Moab (1 Sam. 22:4-5). Some identify it with Horesh (1 Sam. 23:15) located at Khirbet Khoreisa two miles south of Ziph. Others place it at the village of Kharas near Keilah. From Hereth, David attacked the Philistines at Keilah (1 Sam. 23:1-5).

HERITAGE Legacy, inheritance, birthright. The OT frequently refers to the promised land as Israel's heritage from God (Exod. 6:8; Pss. 16:6; 135:12). Children are regarded as a heritage from God (Ps. 127:3). The law and God's protective care are likewise called a heritage (Ps. 119:111; Isa. 54:17). Israel is called God's heritage (Ps. 94:5; Jer. 12:7; Joel 3:2). This image is applied to the church in 1 Pet. 5:3 (cp. NASB margin, “allotment”). Revelation 21:7 speaks of the water of life as the heritage of those martyrs who conquered through their faithfulness. See Inheritance.

HERMAS (Hēr' mās) Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom. 16:14). His name, the variant spelling of the Greek god Hermes, may indicate he was a slave, since many slaves were named for gods. See Apostolic Fathers.

HERMENEUTICS See Bible Hermeneutics.

HERMES (Hēr' mēz) In Acts 14:12 the Greek deity for whom the superstitious people at Lystra took Paul. KJV uses the god's Latin name, Mercurius. Hermes was known as a messenger of the gods and was associated with eloquence. Paul's role as chief speaker made the Lystrans think of Hermes.

HERMETIC LITERATURE Greek writings composed in Egypt between A.D. 100 and 300 associated with the name “Hermes Trimegistos” (Thrice-great Hermes). The Hermetic literature is a diverse collection. Some of the texts are primarily astrological, magical, or alchemical. Others are primarily religious and philosophical texts. Some of the texts are monistic (viewing all reality as a unity) and pantheistic (seeing God present in everything). Others are dualistic (seeing God and the creation as separate).

The best-known Hermetic writing is the tractate titled Poimandres (perhaps from the Coptic for “knowledge of the sun-god”). Poimandres offers to reveal to Hermes the secret nature of creation and God. According to the myth, God created the nous (mind, intelligence) which in turn created (physical) nature. God then created the anthropos, the original man. In the fall this man united with nature to produce the seven androgynous persons who were the source of the human race. Thus each person consists of a body (from nature) which imprisons the soul (from God). Salvation from the body and deliverance from the oppressive fate of the stars was achieved by receiving knowledge of the nature of things. Reception of such knowledge is described as rebirth. By repressing the bodily senses, the faithful Hermetic hoped to ascend past the seven astral spheres and to reunite with God.

The Hermetic doctrine has similarities with gnostic teaching. The Hermetic writings unlike Gnosticism did not regard nature itself as evil or the direct agent of creation (demiurge) as the enemy of God. Some scholars have seen the influence of Hermetic doctrine in the Gospel of John (creation by the logos, rebirth). More likely, both John and the later Hermetics developed earlier Jewish and Greek ideas independently. See Gnosticism; John.

HERMOGENES (Hēr mōg ɔ nēz) Personal name meaning “born of Hermes.” Follower who deserted Paul, apparently while he was in prison in Ephesus (2 Tim. 1:15). Paul's statement indicates acute disappointment in Hermogenes but does not say he became an apostate. Nothing else is known of him.

HERMON, MOUNT (Hēr' mon) Place-name meaning “devoted mountain.” Site of sanctuary of Baal and northern boundary of Israel. The name Hermon was called Sarion (Sirion) by the Sidonians (Phoenicians) (Deut. 3:9; Ps. 29:6) and Sanir (Senir) by the Amorites (Deut. 3:9). Both appellations signify “breastplate,” evidently because of the mountain's rounded snow-covered tip that gleamed and shone in the sunlight. The latter name appears twice in the OT, seemingly as the name of a peak adjacent to Hermon (1 Chron. 5:23; Song 4:8). It is also called Sion (Deut. 4:48), probably on account of its height. Once it is called “Hermons.” KJV mistakenly renders this as “the Hermonites” (Ps. 42:6). This is probably a reference to the triple summits of the mountain.

The Hermon range is the southern spur of the Anti-Lebanon chain of mountains which runs parallel to the Lebanon range being separated from it by the valley of Beqaa. Hermon, being 9,100 feet above sea level, is the highest mountain in Syria. It can be seen from as far away as the Dead Sea—120 miles. The range is approximately 28 miles in length and reaches a width of 15 miles. Its peak is covered with snow two-thirds of the year. Water from its melting snow flows into the rivers of the Hauran and provides the principal source for the Jordan River. Although Hermon receives about 60 inches of precipitation (dew, snow, rain) per year, practically no vegetation grows above the snow line, where there is an almost complete absence of soil. Below it, the mountain slopes are covered with trees and vineyards. Wolves, leopards, and Syrian bears live in its forests. The biblical record praises the dew of Hermon (Ps. 133:3), its lions (Song 4:8), and its cypresses (Ezek. 27:5).

The mount is significant for four reasons. (1) It was the northern border of the Amorite kingdom (Deut. 3:8; 4:48). (2) It marked the northern limits of Joshua's victorious campaigns (Josh. 11:17; 12:1; 13:5). (3) It has always been regarded as a sacred mountain. (4) Some scholars believe the transfiguration of Jesus occurred on Hermon.

Gary Baldwin

HERMONITES KJV translators understood the Hebrew plural “Hermans” (Ps. 42:6) to refer to the inhabitants of the slopes of Mount Hermon. Modern translations take the plural to refer to the three “peaks of Hermon” (NASB).

HEROD (Hēr' od) Name given to the family ruling Palestine immediately before and to some degree during the first half of the first Christian century. Their family history was complex, and what information has come down has been frequently meager, conflicting, and difficult to harmonize. The chief sources are the references in the NT, the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus, and a few obscure references by Roman historians, such as Dio Cassius, Plutarch, and Strabo.

View of Mount Hermon from the ancient city-mound of Hazor in northern Galilee.

The most prominent family member and ruler was Herod, son of Antipater who had been appointed governor of Idumea by Alexandra Salome, the Maccabean queen who ruled Palestine 78-69 B.C. With the permission of the Romans, Antipater left his son Phasael as Prefect of Jerusalem and his second son, Herod, governor of Galilee. See Intertestamental History and Literature.

Other Herods named in the NT include the following:

Agrippa I, the son of Aristobulus and grandson of Herod. He ruled with the title of king from A.D. 41-44. Agrippa I ordered James the son of Zebedee killed with the sword and imprisoned Peter (Acts 12:1-23).

Agrippa II, the son of Agrippa I, heard Paul's defense (Acts 25:13-27; cp. Acts 26:32). With his death the Herodian dynasty came to an end, in title as well as in fact.

Drusilla (Acts 24:24) was the third and youngest daughter of Agrippa I. She had been married briefly at age 14 to Azizus, king of Emessa, probably in the year 52. In 53 or 54 she was married to Felix, the Roman procurator.

Bernice was the sister of Drusilla and Agrippa II and also his wife. Paul appeared before them in Acts 25.

Herod Philip was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem (Luke 3:1). He built Caesarea Philippi and was governor of the northeastern districts of Iturea, Gaulinitis, Trachonitis, and Decapolis. He was married to Salome, the daughter of Herodias.

A Herod Philip is mentioned in Mark 6:17 as the first husband of Herodias. In some places he is mentioned simply as Herod or Herod II. Most scholars do not believe that he was the same person as the governor of the northeastern districts.

Herodias (Matt. 14:3) was the daughter of Aristobulus (son of Herod and Mariamne I) and Bernice, the daughter of Herod's sister, Salome. She was the second wife of Herod Antipas and called for the head of John the Baptist (Matt. 14:3-12; Mark 6:17-29; cp. Luke 3:19-20).

Salome was the daughter of Herodias. She was married to Philip. After his death in 34, she married a relative Aristobulus, prince of Chalcis and had three children (Matt. 14:6-12; Mark 6:22-29).

Herod was a paradox. He was one of the cruelest rulers of all history. His reputation has been largely one of infamy. He seemed fiercely loyal to that which he did believe in. He did not hesitate to murder members of his own family when he deemed that they posed a threat to him. Yet marital unfaithfulness and drunkenness did not seem to be among his vices. Because of his effective administration, he virtually made Palestine what it was in the first Christian century. He has gone down in history as “the Great,” yet that epithet can only be applied to him as his personality and accomplishments are compared to others of his family.

This aqueduct built by Herod the Great brought fresh water to Caesarea Maritima.

HEROD'S PALACE The probable scene of Herod's interrogation and mockery of Jesus (Luke 23:6-12). The palace was located along the western wall of the upper city to the west of the people's assembly hall. The palace was surrounded by a 45-foot wall surmounted by ornamental towers at fixed intervals. The palace was renowned for its circular porticoes, fine gardens, and a banquet hall seating over 100 guests. The palace was destroyed in September of A.D. 70.

HERODIAN (Hə rō' dī ən) Member of an aristocratic Jewish group who favored the policies of Herod Antipas and thus supported the Roman government. Apparently they lived in Galilee, where Antipas ruled, and joined the Jerusalem religious authorities in opposing Jesus. They tried to trap Jesus into denying responsibility for Roman taxes (Matt. 22:15-22; Mark 12:13-17). Their plots began the road to Jesus' crucifixion (Mark 3:6). See Herod.

HERODIAS (Hə rō' dī ás) Wife of Herod Antipas (Mark 6:17). She was the daughter of Aristobulus and Bernice. She was first married to the half brother of her father, identified in Mark 6:17 as Philip. By Philip she bore a daughter named Salome. Antipas, however, who was Philip's brother, divorced his own wife and wooed Herodias away from Philip. It was this gross marital misconduct that was denounced by John the Baptist. See Herod; John the Baptist.

HERODION (Hə rō' dī on) Christian man to whom Paul the apostle sent a greeting (Rom. 16:11). Paul referred to him as a kinsman. This probably means that he was of Jewish birth. His name suggests that he might have been a member of the family of Herod. This possibility is strengthened by the fact that the name immediately preceding his is Aristobulus (Rom. 16:10). Herodion could have been one of those in the household of Aristobulus.

The Herodium against the Israeli sky.

HERODIUM A fortress-palace built by Herod the Great about four miles southeast of Bethlehem. Herod was buried there. The fortress, captured in A.D. 72, was one of the last strongholds of Jewish resistance in the war with Rome. The Herodium served as a supply depot in the unsuccessful revolt of A.D. 132-135.

HERON Any of a family of wading birds with long necks and legs (Areidae), which were regarded as unclean (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18).

HESED (He' sēd) Personal name meaning “grace” or “covenant love.” Father of one of Solomon's district governors (1 Kings 4:10 KJV). Modern translations transliterate ben (Hb., son of). He brought provisions for the royal court one month of the year from his district of Arubboth. See Arubboth.

HESHBON (Hēsh' bōn) Place-name meaning “reckoning.” City in Moab ruled by Sihon and captured by Moses (Num. 21:21-30). Ancient Heshbon, to be identified with present-day Tell Hesban, was one of several ancient cities situated on the rolling and fertile plateau east of the Dead Sea and north of the Arnon River (present-day Wadi Mojib). Two of the other cities nearby, often mentioned by the biblical writers in connection with Heshbon, were Elealeh and Medeba. The agriculturally productive region in which these cities were located was much disputed territory during OT times. Generally it was regarded as part of Moab, as is assumed in Isa.15-16 and Jer. 48. Yet the Israelite tribes of Reuben and Gad ranged with their sheep in this region (Num. 32:3,37). The Israelites laid claim to it on the grounds that Moses had taken all of the territory as far south as the Arnon from Sihon, an Amorite king who ruled from Heshbon (Num. 21:21-31). Certain of the stronger Israelite kings (David, Omri, and Ahab) were able to control all of that area. Apparently the Ammonites claimed the region as well, as implied by the exchange of messages between Jephthah and the Ammonite king related in Judg. 11:12-28.

Heshbon was assigned to the tribe of Gad and designated as a Levitical city according to Josh. 13:27-28; 21:38-39. Song of Songs 7:4, describing a maiden's beauty, proclaims “your eyes like pools in Heshbon” (HCSB). Herod the Great fortified the site, and it became a flourishing city (called Esbus) during late Roman times.

Excavations at Tell Hesban, conducted between 1968 and 1978, produced occupational remains ranging from the beginning of the Iron Age (about 1200 B.C.) through medieval times. No evidence of pre-Iron Age occupation was discovered at the site. That is the period when King Sihon was supposed to have ruled from the city. It is possible that Sihon reigned from another city called Heshbon; there are several near by sites that have evidence of occupation at that time. See Gad; Moab; Reuben; Sihon.

HETH (Hēth) Personal name of unknown meaning. Son of Canaan, great grandson of Noah, and original ancestor of the Hittites, some of the original inhabitants of Palestine (Gen. 10:15). Abraham bought his family burial ground from “sons of” or descendants of Heth (Gen. 23). See Hittites.

HETHLON (Hēth' lōn) Place-name of unknown meaning on the northern border of Israel's promised land, according to Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. 47:15). Some see the word as a scribe's Hebrew abbreviation for mountain of Lebanon. Others see it as another name or a scribal change for Lebohamath (Num. 34:8). Others would identify it as modern Heitela, northeast of Tripoli, two and a half miles south of Nahr el-Kebir. Ezekiel pointed to a road near this place, perhaps the important transportation road otherwise known as Eleutheros.

HEW To cut with blows from a heavy cutting instrument. The references to “hewers of wood” together with “drawers of water” (Josh. 9:21,23,27; Deut. 29:11) probably refer to those who gathered firewood. Such work was a despised task relegated to foreigners and slaves. The “hewers that cut timber” (2 Chron. 2:10 KJV; NASB, woodsmen; cp. Jer. 46:22) were skilled lumberjacks. The “hewers of stone” (1 Kings 5:15 NASB) or “stonecutters” were royal servants mining rock from the mountains for royal building projects. Houses of “hewn stone” rather than rough stone were regarded as an extravagance (Amos 5:11).

HEXATEUCH Modern designation for the first six books of the OT viewed as a literary unity. The term was coined by source critics impressed with the supposed similarity of sources behind Joshua and the Pentateuch as well as the need for fulfillment of the promise of land to Abraham in the conquest of Canaan. More recent scholarship has evidenced a renewed appreciation of the canonical arrangement in which Joshua begins the “former prophets” or history of Israel from its entrance into the promised land until its departure with the exile. Joshua forms something of a bridge linking the promises to the patriarchs and the story of Moses with the later history of Israel.

HEZEKI (חֶזְקִיָּא) (KJV, 1 Chron. 8:17) See Hizki.

HEZEKIAH Son and successor of Ahaz as king of Judah (716/15-687/86 B.C.). Hezekiah began his reign when he was 25 years old. At this time in history, the nation of Assyria had risen to power.

King Hezekiah's tunnel that brought water from the Gihon Spring to the pool of Siloam.

Hezekiah began his reign by bringing religious reform to Judah. Hezekiah was not willing to court the favor of the Assyrian kings. The temple in Jerusalem was reopened. The idols were removed from the temple. Temple vessels that had been desecrated during Ahaz's reign were sanctified for use in the temple. The sacrifices were initiated with singing and the sounds of musical instruments. The tribes in the Northern Kingdom (Israel) had been subjected to Assyrian dominance. Hezekiah invited the Israelites to join in the celebration of the Passover in Jerusalem. Places of idol worship were destroyed. Hezekiah even destroyed the bronze serpent Moses had erected in the wilderness (Num. 21:4-9) so the people would not view the bronze serpent as an object of worship. Hezekiah organized the priests and Levites for the conducting of religious services. The tithe was reinstated. Plans were made to observe the religious feasts called for in the Law.

In 711 B.C., just a few years after Hezekiah had become king, Sargon II of Assyria captured Ashdod. Hezekiah anticipated the time when he would have to confront Assyrian armies. Hezekiah fortified the city of Jerusalem and organized an army. Knowing that a source of water was crucial, Hezekiah constructed a tunnel through solid rock from the spring of Gihon to the Siloam pool. The city wall was extended to enclose this important source of water.

Isaiah warned Hezekiah not to become involved with Assyria (Isa. 20:1-6). The critical time for Hezekiah came in 705 B.C. when Sennacherib became king of Assyria. From Hezekiah, Sennacherib obtained a heavy tribute of silver and gold.

In 701 B.C. Hezekiah became seriously ill (Isa. 38:1-21). Isaiah warned the king to prepare for his approaching death, but Hezekiah prayed that God would intervene. God answered by promising Hezekiah 15 more years of life and deliverance of Jerusalem from Assyria (Isa. 38:4-6).

In the meantime, Sennacherib had besieged Lachish. Aware that Hezekiah had trusted God for deliverance, Sennacherib sent messengers to the Jerusalem wall to urge the people to surrender. Sennacherib boasted of having conquered 46 walled cities and having taken 200,000 captives. Sennacherib's messengers taunted that God would not come to Judah's defense. Hezekiah, dressed in sackcloth and ashes, went to the temple to pray. He also called for Isaiah, the prophet. Isaiah announced that Sennacherib would “hear a rumor” and return to his own land where he would die by the sword (2 Kings 19:7).

Hezekiah's faith and physical recovery brought him recognition from the surrounding nations (2 Chron. 32:33). The Babylonian leader, Merodach-baladan, even congratulated Hezekiah on his recovery. Hezekiah hosted this Babylonian leader at a reception, but Isaiah met this event with a warning that succeeding generations would be subjected to Babylonian captivity (Isa. 39:1-8).

Sennacherib destroyed the city of Babylon in 689 B.C. He then marched toward Egypt. Hoping to ward off any interference from Judah, Sennacherib sent letters to Hezekiah ordering him to surrender (Isa. 37:9-38). Hezekiah took the letters to the temple and prayed for God's help. From Isaiah came the message that Sennacherib would not prevail. In fact, Sennacherib's army was destroyed in a miraculous way (2 Kings 19:35-37). In 681 B.C. Sennacherib was killed by two of his sons as had been predicted by Isaiah in 701 B.C. Hezekiah died in 687/86 B.C. Manasseh, his son, succeeded him, although Manasseh had become co-regent with Hezekiah about 69 B.C.

The Gospel of Matthew lists Hezekiah in the genealogy of Jesus (Matt. 1:9-10).

HEZION (Hē' zī ðn) Personal name meaning “vision.” Grandfather of King Ben-hadad of Damascus (1 Kings 15:18). His relationship to Rezon, founder of the Damascus dynasty, is not certain. Some think Hezion is a scribal change from Rezon in Hebrew. Others think both names have been changed from an original Hezron or Hazael. A more probable opinion is that Hezion is a personal name, while Rezon is a Syrian royal title or throne name. See Rezon.

HEZIR (Hēz' zīr) Personal name meaning “wild pig.” Ugaritic texts apparently show that the name came from the profession of herding swine. 1. Leader of one of the 24 courses of priests (1 Chron. 24:15). 2. Levite who signed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God's law (Neh. 10:20).

HEZRAI (Hēz' rā ī) or HEZRO (Hēz' rō) Personal name meaning “his stalk” or “stem.” KJV reading of name of David's military hero (2 Sam. 23:35) following an early scribal note on the Hebrew text. The written text and modern translations read Hezro with 1 Chron. 11:37, where many early translations read Hezrai.

HEZRON (Hēz' rōn) Personal and place-name meaning “camping place” or “reeds.” 1. Son of Reuben, grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:9), and original clan ancestor of Hezronites (Num. 26:6). 2. Grandson of Judah, great grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:12), original clan ancestor of Hezronites (Num. 26:21) through whom David was born (Ruth 4:19). He was father of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:18) and of Segub (1 Chron. 2:21). The Hebrew text of 1 Chron. 2:24 can be interpreted and translated in different ways. KJV makes Hezron the father of Ashur (cp. NASB, NRSV, NIV). Some Bible students follow the lead of the earliest translations, changing the Hebrew text somewhat so that Caleb is the father of Ashur, Ephratah being Caleb's wife (cp. REB, TEV, RSV). Hezron's first son was Jerahmeel, original ancestor of the Jerahmeelites (1 Chron. 2:25).

HEZRONITE (Hēz' rōn ī) Clan descended from Hezron both in tribe of Reuben and of Judah. See Hezron.

HIDDAI (Hīd' dā ī) Personal name, perhaps a short form for Hodai, meaning “my majesty.” One of David's military heroes (2 Sam. 23:30). The parallel passage in 1 Chron. 11:32 spells the name Hurai. He was from Gaash. See Gaash.

HIDDEKEL (Hid' də kəl) Hebrew name for the third river flowing from the garden of Eden (Gen. 2:14). Most modern translations translate it as Tigris. This shows that the dependence of the important areas of subsequent world history owed their fertility to God's original garden of creation. KJV also retains the transliteration for Tigris in Dan. 10:4. See Tigris.

HIEL (Hi' əl) Personal name meaning “God lives” or, following the Greek translation, a short form of Ahiel, “brother of God.” Man from Bethel who rebuilt Jericho at the price of the life of two of his sons (1 Kings 16:34), fulfilling the divine curse Joshua issued when he destroyed Jericho (Josh. 6:26).

HIERAPOLIS (Hi ər ap' ō līs) Place-name meaning “sacred city.” Site of early church where Epaphras worked (Col. 4:13). Nothing else is known of the church. The city was 12 miles northwest of Colossae and six miles north of Laodicea on the Lycus River a short way above its junction with the Meander River. It is now called Pambuck Kulasi. Its fame rested on textile and cloth-dyeing industries. It began as a center for worship of the Phrygian mother goddess. A large Jewish community is evidenced by grave inscriptions and other literary remains.

Mineral deposits from the hot springs of Hierapolis used as a health spa during the Roman period.

HIEROGLYPHICS Greek term meaning “sacred carvings,” referring to the pictographic symbols used in ancient Egyptian writing. Normally hieroglyphs were carved in stone, though sometimes they were written with pen on papyrus. These picture-symbols consisted in both ideograms (representing an entire word or phrase) and phonograms (representing a consonant). A simplified cursive script (hieratic) was developed early. This was in turn simplified into the demotic script about 700 B.C.

HIGGAION (Hig gá' yón) Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning “whispering” (Lam. 3:62 NASB) or “meditation” (Ps. 19:14) or musical sound a stringed instrument produces (Ps. 92:3). It appears as a worship notation with uncertain meaning in Ps. 9:16. It may mean to play quietly or to pause for meditation.

HIGHEST KJV designation for God (Luke 1:32,35,76; 6:35). Modern translations prefer “Most High” (NASB, NIV, NRSV) or “Most High God” (TEV). In the OT, “Most High” often occurs as a designation for the God of Israel when Gentiles are in view (Gen. 14:18-22; Num. 24:16; and frequently in Daniel). In the intertestamental period, the Highest or Most High became the most common designation for the Jewish God, occurring about 120 times in the Apocrypha.

HIGHEST HEAVEN See Heaven of Heavens.

HIGH GATE, HIGHER GATE KJV designations for a gate of the Jerusalem temple (2 Kings 15:35; 2 Chron. 23:20; 27:3). Most modern translations prefer the designation “Upper Gate.” TEV reads “North Gate” or “Main Gate.” Its location is not clear, possibly being the same as the Benjamin Gate. Parallel to 2 Chron. 23:20, 2 Kings 11:19 uses “guard” or “herald” as the gate's name, probably reflecting a change of names through history. See Gates of Jerusalem and the Temple.

HIGH HEAPS KJV translation of a Hebrew term for “marker” at Jer. 31:21. Modern translations render the term as “guideposts” (NASB, NIV, NRSV) or “signposts” (HCSB, REB).

HIGH PLACE Elevated site, usually found on the top of a mountain or hill; most high places were Canaanite places of pagan worship.

Heathen Worship at the High Place The average high place would have an altar (2 Kings 21:3; 2 Chron. 14:3), a carved wooden pole that depicted the female goddess of fertility (Asherah), a stone pillar symbolizing the male deity (2 Kings 3:2), other idols (2 Kings 17:29; 2 Chron. 33:19), and some type of building (1 Kings 12:31; 13:32; 16:32-33). At these places of worship the people sacrificed animals (at some high places children were sacrificed according to Jer. 7:31), burned incense to their gods, prayed, ate sacrificial meals, and were involved with male or female cultic prostitutes (2 Kings 17:8-12; 21:3-7; Hos. 4:11-14). Although most high places were part of the worship of Baal, the Ammonite god Molech and the Moabite god Chemosh were also worshiped at similar high places (1 Kings 11:5-8; 2 Kings 23:10). Scripture speaks negatively about these heathen places of worship; still they played a central role in the lives of most of the people who lived in Palestine before the land was defeated by Joshua. Archaeologists have discovered the remains of high places at Megiddo, Gezer, and numerous other sites.

God's Hatred of the High Places When the Israelites came into the land of Canaan, they were ordered to destroy the high places of the people who lived in the land (Exod. 23:24; 34:13; Num. 33:52; Deut. 7:5; 12:3) lest the Israelites be tempted to worship the Canaanite false gods and accept their immoral behavior. The Israelites were to worship God at the tabernacle at Shiloh (Josh. 18:1; 1 Sam. 1:3).

An exception to this practice existed in the years between the destruction of Shiloh by the Philistines and the construction of the temple in Jerusalem by Solomon. During this short period Samuel worshiped inside a city (possibly Ramah) at a high place dedicated to the worship of the God of Israel (1 Sam. 9:12-25), and a group of prophets of God worshiped at the “hill of God” (1 Sam. 10:5, probably Gibeah or Gibeon). David and Solomon worshiped the God of Israel at the high place at Gibeon where the tabernacle and the altar of burnt offering were located (1 Chron. 16:1-4,37-40; 21:29; 2 Chron. 1:3-4,13).

Stone fragments of what is probably an altar base at the high place in Lachish.

False Worship at High Places in Judah After the temple was constructed, the people were to worship God at this place which He had chosen (Deut. 12:1-14), but Solomon built high places for the gods of his foreign wives and even worshiped there himself (1 Kings 11:1-8). Because of the seriousness of this sin, God divided the nation by removing 10 tribes from the kingdom of his son Rehoboam (1 Kings 11:9-13,29-38). Following this, each new king that ruled in the Southern Kingdom of Judah and in the Northern Kingdom of Israel was evaluated in the books of Kings and Chronicles according to what they did with the high places where false gods were worshiped.

False Worship at High Places in Israel When Jeroboam created the new kingdom of Israel after the death of Solomon, he put two golden calves at high places at Dan and Bethel (1 Kings 12:28-32). An unnamed man of God came to Bethel and pronounced God's curse on this high place (1 Kings 13:1-3), but the following kings of the Northern Kingdom of Israel followed in the ways of Jeroboam and did not remove the high places where the false gods were worshiped.

The Israelite prophets also condemned the high places of Moab (Isa. 15:2; 16:12), Judah (Jer. 7:30-31; 17:1-3; 19:3-5; 32:35), and Israel (Ezek. 6:3,6; 20:29-31; Hos. 10:8, Amos 7:9) because they were places of sin where false gods were worshiped. HIGH PRIEST One in charge of the temple (or tabernacle) worship. A number of terms are used to refer to the high priest: the priest (Exod. 31:10); the anointed priest (Lev. 4:3); the priest who is chief among his brethren (Lev. 21:10); chief priest (2 Chron. 26:20); and high priest (2 Kings 12:10).

Responsibilities and Privileges The high priesthood was a hereditary office based on descent from Aaron (Exod. 29:29-30; Lev. 16:32). Normally, the high priest served for life (Num. 18:7; 25:11-13; 35:25,28; Neh. 12:10-11), though as early as Solomon's reign a high priest was dismissed for political reasons (1 Kings 2:27).

A special degree of holiness was required of the high priest (Lev. 10:6,9; 21:10-15). This meant he had to avoid defilement by contact with the dead, even in the case of his own parents, and was forbidden to show any outward sign of mourning. He could not leave the sanctuary precincts.

Such legislation identified the high priest as one totally dedicated to the Lord, always ritually pure and ready to serve the Lord.

The rock-cut altars of the high place at Petra in southern Jordan.

If the high priest sinned, he brought guilt upon the whole people (Lev. 4:3). The sin offering for the high priest (Lev. 4:3-12) was identical to that required “if the whole congregation of Israel commits error” (4:13-21 NASB).

The consecration of the high priest was an elaborate seven-day ritual involving special baths, putting on special garments, and anointing with oil and with blood (Exod. 29:1-37; Lev. 6:19-22; 8:5-35). The special garments of the high priest included a blue robe with an ornate hem decorated with gold bells and embroidered pomegranates, an ephod of fine linen with colorful embroidered work and shoulder straps bearing stones engraved with the names of the twelve tribes, a breastplate with twelve precious stones engraved with the names of the 12 tribes, and a linen turban with a gold plate inscribed “Holy to Yahweh” (Exod. 28:4-39; 39:1-31; Lev. 8:7-9). The engraved plate and the stones engraved with the tribal names highlight the role of the high priest as the holy representative of all Israel before the Lord (Exod. 28:12,29). In his “breastpiece of judgment,” the high priest kept the sacred lots, the Urim and Thummim, which were used to inquire of the Lord (Exod. 28:29-30; Num. 27:21). See Breastpiece of the High Priest; Ephod; Lots; Urim and Thummim.

The high priest shared in general priestly duties. Only the high priest, however, was allowed to enter the holy of holies and then only on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:1-25). See Day of Atonement.

The death of the high priest marked the end of an epoch. One guilty of involuntary manslaughter was required to remain in a city of refuge until the death of the high priest (Num. 35:25,28,32; Josh. 20:6). The expiatory death of the high priest removed bloodguilt that would pollute the land (cp. Num. 35:33).

History of the Office Some argue that the developed priesthood characterized by three divisions (high priest, priests, and Levites) was a late, possibly postexilic, development in the history of Israel's worship. Others take the biblical texts at face value and accept Mosaic institution of the fully developed priesthood.

The term "high priest" occurs in only one brief passage in the Pentateuch (Num. 35:25,28,32), once in Joshua (Josh. 20:6 where the legislation of Num. 35 is enacted), and never in the book of Judges. Aaron, Eleazar, and Phinehas are typically called the priest. Neither Eli, Ahimelech, Abiathar, nor Zadok are called high or chief priest, though all four headed priestly families and are mentioned in connection with items usually associated with the high priest (the ark, the ephod, the Urim and Thummim: 1 Sam. 3:3; 4:4-11; 21:6,9; 2 Sam. 15:24-29).

Eleazar was charged with supervision of the Levites (Num. 3:32; cp. 1 Chron. 9:20) and of the sanctuary apparatus (Num. 4:16). He figures in the narrative of Num. 16 where the offering of incense is affirmed as the exclusive prerogative of the priests and in the red heifer ceremony (Num. 19). The account of Eleazar's donning Aaron's priestly robe (Num. 20:25-28; cp. Deut. 10:6) provides Scripture's best report of high priestly succession. As chief priest Eleazar assisted Moses with the census (Num. 26). Eleazar served as an advisor to Moses (Num. 27:1) and to Joshua, consulting the Lord by means of the sacred lots. Such counsel formed the basis for the apportionment of the promised land among the tribes (Num. 34:17; Josh. 14:1; 17:4; 19:51; 21:1). One indication of the significance of Eleazar is that the book of Joshua concludes with the death of this chief priest (24:33).

Phinehas, son of Eleazar, is best known for his zealous opposition to intermarriage with the Moabites and the concomitant idolatry (Num. 25:6-13). For his zeal Phinehas was granted a covenant of perpetual priesthood (Num. 25:13) and was reckoned as righteous (Ps. 106:30). Phinehas accompanied the sanctuary vessels in holy war (Num. 31:6). Part of his ministry before the ark involved consulting the Lord for battle counsel (Judg. 20:27-28). Phinehas served as the major figure in the resolution of the conflict over the “commemorative” altar the tribes east of the Jordan built (Josh. 22:13,31-32).

Aaron, Eleazar, and Phinehas appear in biblical history as distinct personalities. Until Eli's appearance at the end of the period of the judges, a puzzling silence surrounds the high priesthood. First Chronicles 6:1-15 offers a list of seven high priests between Phinehas and Zadok, a contemporary of David and Solomon. Of these nothing is known except their names. Nor is Eli included among this list, though he functioned as the chief priest of the Shiloh sanctuary.

Eli is best known for his rearing of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:25-28; 3) and for his inability to control his own sons (1 Sam. 2:12-17,22-25; 3:13), which, in time, resulted in the forfeiture of the high priesthood by his line (1 Sam. 2:27-35). Following the death of Eli, the Shiloh priesthood apparently relocated to Nob. Saul suspected the priesthood of conspiracy with David and exterminated the priestly family of Ahimelech (1 Sam. 22:9-19). Only Abiathar escaped (22:20). When David moved the ark to Jerusalem, Abiathar and Zadok apparently officiated jointly as chief priests (2 Sam. 8:17; 15:24-29,35; 19:11), though Zadok already appears as the dominant figure in 2 Samuel. Solomon suspected Abiathar of conspiracy with his brother Adonijah and exiled him to his ancestral home (1 Kings 2:26-27). The high priesthood remained in the family of Zadok from the beginning of Solomon's reign (about 964 B.C.) until Menelaus bought the high priesthood (171 B.C.) in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Azariah, the son of Zadok, was the first individual to be explicitly identified as the “high priest” (1 Kings 4:2). At times during the monarchy, individual high priests exercised major roles in the life of Judah. Jehoshabeath, wife of the high priest Jehoiada (2 Chron. 22:11), saved the infant Joash from the murderous Athaliah. Six years later Jehoiada was the mastermind of the coup d'etat in which Joash was crowned king (2 Kings 11:4-17). A second Azariah was known for opposing King Uzziah's attempt to usurp the priests' right to offer incense (2 Chron. 26:17-18). The high priest Hilkiah discovered the “Book of the Law,” perhaps the book of Deuteronomy, which provided the incentive for King Josiah's reforms (2 Kings 22:8). Hilkiah removed all traces of Baal worship from the Jerusalem temple (2 Kings 23:4).

In the early postexilic period, the high priest Joshua is presented as the equal of the Davidic governor Zerubbabel (Hag. 1:1,12,14; 2:2,4). Both high priest and governor shared in the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 3; 6:9-15; Hag. 1-2). Both are recognized as anointed leaders (Zech. 4:14; 6:9-15). A further indication of the heightened importance of the high priesthood in the postexilic period is the interest in succession lists of high priests (1 Chron. 6:1-15,50-53; 9:11; Ezra 7:1-5; Neh. 12:10-11), a new development in biblical literature.

In the period before the Maccabean revolt the high priesthood became increasingly political. Jason, a Hellenistic sympathizer, ousted his more conservative brother Onias III (2 Macc. 4:7-10,18-20). Jason was, in turn, ousted by the more radically Hellenistic Menelaus who offered the Seleucid rulers an even larger bribe to secure the office (2 Macc. 4:23-26). With Menelaus the high priesthood passed out of the legitimate Zadokite line.

The Maccabees combined the office of high priest with that of military commander or political leader. Alexander Balas, a contender for the Seleucid throne, appointed Jonathan Maccabee “high priest” and “king's friend” (1 Macc. 10:20). Simon Maccabee was, likewise, confirmed in his high priesthood and made a “friend” of the Seleucid King Demetrius II (1 Macc. 14:38). Temple and state were combined in the person of Simon who was both high priest and ethnarch (1 Macc. 15:1-2).

The Romans continued the practice of rewarding the high priesthood to political favorites. During the Roman period, Annas (high priest A.D. 6-15) was clearly the most powerful priestly figure. Even when deposed by the Romans, Annas succeeded in having five of his sons and a son-in-law, Joseph Caiaphas (high priest A.D. 18-36/37) appointed high priests. Some confusion has resulted from NT references to the joint high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas (Luke 3:2). The passage is perhaps best understood as an acknowledgment of Annas as the power behind his immediate successors. Another possibility is that Annas retained the title of respect on the grounds that the high priesthood was for life. Ananias, one of Annas' sons, was the high priest to whom Paul was brought in Acts 23:2; 24:1.

High Priest and Chief Priests The ordination rite for the high priest included the consecration of his sons as well (Exod. 29:8-9,20-21). A number of terms refer to leading priests other than the high priest: anointed priests (2 Macc. 1:10); chief priests (Ezra 8:29; 10:5; Neh. 12:7); senior priests (2 Kings 19:2; Isa. 37:2; Jer. 19:1). More specific titles are also found. Zephaniah was described as the “second priest” (2 Kings 25:18; Jer. 52:24). Pashur was the “chief officer in the house of the Lord” (Jer. 20:1).

HIGHWAY A road, especially an elevated road (Isa. 62:10). In addition to literal uses, there are figurative uses, especially in Isaiah. In Prov. 15:19 the highway of the righteous is an image for their way of conduct. The highway of Isa. 11:16 and 35:10 is an assurance that the exiles will have safe and speedy passage home. Isaiah 40:3 speaks of preparing a highway for the Lord. See Palestine; Transportation and Travel.

HILEN (חיל' לֵנ) Place-name, perhaps meaning “power.” City in tribal territory of Judah given to Levites (1 Chron. 6:58). The parallel passage (Josh. 21:15; cp. 15:51) reads “Holon.” The Hebrew text in Chronicles actually reads “Hilez.” Copying changes affected the various manuscript readings of this little-known town. See Holon; Levitical Cities.

HILKIAH (חיל' קי' אה) Personal name meaning “Yah's portion.” 1. Father of Amaziah (1 Chron. 6:45). He was a Levite who lived before the time of David the king. 2. Levite and temple servant who lived during the time of David (1 Chron. 26:11). 3. Father of Eliakim, who was in charge of the household of King Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:18). 4. Father of Jeremiah the prophet (Jer. 1:1). 5. Father of Gemariah, who was an emissary from Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon (Jer. 29:3). 6. High priest who aided in Josiah's reform movement (2 Kings 22:4). 7. Person who stood with Ezra the scribe at the reading of the law (Neh. 8:4). 8. Priest who was among the exiles that returned (Neh. 12:7).

HILL, HILL COUNTRY Elevated land, usually distinguished as lower than a mountain or with a less distinct peak. Hills separating the Mediterranean coastal plain from the Jordan Valley run the length of Palestine. The area to the east of the Jordan and the Dead Sea is likewise hill country. The common Hebrew terms for hill and hill country [gibe 'ah and har] lack precise English equivalents, so a detailed knowledge of geography is required for proper translation. The RSV translated gibe 'ah as “hill” or “hills” 65 times. The RSV translated har, the usual term for mountain, as “hill” 40 times and as “hill country” 92 times. The KJV and REB understood the Hebrew Ophel as a fortress or citadel (2 Kings 5:24; Isa. 32:14; Mic. 4:8). Many English translations such as NASB translated the term as “hill.” KJV uses tower, fort, and stronghold in the three passages.

HILLEL (חִילֵּל) Personal name meaning “praise.” 1. Father of the judge Abdon (Judg. 12:13). 2. Influential rabbi and Talmudic scholar who flourished just prior to the time of the ministry of Jesus. He and his colleague Shammai presided over the two most important rabbinic schools of their time. Hillel was the more liberal of the two, and his emphases have largely determined the direction taken by Judaism since his era.

HILL OF GOD (Hb. Gibe 'at-elohim) Site of a Philistine garrison and of a place of worship. Here Saul met a band of ecstatic prophets and joined them in their frenzy (1 Sam. 10:5).

HILL OF THE FORESKINS(Hb. Gibe 'at-ha 'araloth) Place near Gilgal where Joshua circumcised the Israelites born during the wilderness wandering (Josh. 5:3).

HILT Handle of a sword or dagger (Judg. 3:22 NRSV, REB). Other translations prefer “haft” (KJV) or “handle” (NASB, NIV, TEV).

HIN (חִין) Unit of liquid measure reckoned as one sixth of a bath (Exod. 29:40). It would have been approximately equivalent to a gallon. See Weights and Measures.

HIND Female deer; doe (Prov. 5:19). “To make my feet like hinds' feet” (KJV, NASB) is a common expression (2 Sam. 22:34; Ps. 18:33; Hab. 3:19) of God's care in dangerous situations. See Deer.

HINGE Flexible device on which a door turns. Proverbs 26:14 compares a lazy person turning in bed to a door, turning on its hinges. The meaning of the term translated hinges at 1 Kings 7:50 (KJV, NASB, TEV) is disputed. NIV, NRSV prefer the translation sockets on the grounds that ancient doors swung on doorpins set in sockets rather than on jointed hinges. REB translates “panels.”

HINNOM, VALLEY OF (Hīn' nōm) Place-name of uncertain meaning; also called the valley of the son(s) of Hinnom. The valley lies in close proximity to Jerusalem (2 Kings 23:10), just south of the ancient city (Josh. 15:8). The valley had a somewhat unglamorous history during the OT period. The worshipers of the pagan deities, Baal and Molech, practiced child sacrifice in the valley of Hinnom (2 Kings 23:10). The first specific mention of human sacrifice in Israel is in 2 Kings 16:3 and in Judah is in 2 Kings 17:17. The parallel passage in 2 Chron. 28:3 indicates that the scene of the abomination was the valley of Hinnom. See Baal; Gehenna; Hell; Jerusalem; Molech.

HIP Part of the body where the thigh and torso connect. Jacob's hip came out of socket when he wrestled with God at the Jabbok (Gen. 32:25). The Israelites commemorated this encounter by not eating the thigh muscle on the hip socket (Gen. 32:32). To strike an enemy “hip and thigh” (Judg. 15:8) is to attack him fiercely (TEV) or viciously (NIV). Belshazzar's fear at the handwriting on the wall (Dan. 5:6 NASB) was evidenced by his hip joint going slack.

The Hinnom (or Gehenna) Valley in Jerusalem, just south of the ancient city.

HIPPOPOTAMUS Large, thick-skinned, amphibious, cud-chewing mammal of the family Hippopotamidae. The Hebrew behemoth (Job 40:15-24) is sometimes understood as the hippopotamus (NASB, TEV margins). Others prefer to identify behemoth with the crocodile (REB), elephant (KJV margin), or with a mythical creature (TEV margin). Hippopotamus remains dating between 1200 and 300 B.C. have been found along the coastal plain near Tel Aviv. It is possible that the hippopotamus was also found in the Jordan River at this time, though archeological confirmation is lacking. See Behemoth.

HIRAH (Hi' rā) Personal name of unknown meaning. A friend of Judah, the son of Jacob, whom Judah was visiting when he met Shuah, who bore three of his sons (Gen. 38:1-12). Hirah was from the Canaanite city of Adullam, about nine miles northwest of Hebron.

HIRAM (Hi' rām) Personal name apparently meaning “brother of the lofty one.” 1. King of Tyre, associated with David and Solomon in building the temple. He is called Hiram (Samuel and Kings) and Hiram (Chronicles), but both names refer to the same individual. Other information about him comes from the ancient Jewish historian, Josephus. Hiram was the son of Abibaal (“my father is Baal”) and was 19 years old when he succeeded his father as king of Tyre on the Phoenician coast, just north of Israel. He reigned some 34 years and is said to have died at age 54, although the biblical references to him seem to necessitate a longer reign.

When he became king, he began to improve and to expand his kingdom. He raised banks at the eastern part of Tyre that enlarged the city, and he built a causeway to connect the city with the island temple of Jupiter Olympius in the harbor, after which he modernized the temple. When David became king of Israel, Hiram sent congratulatory gifts to him, including men and materials to build a palace (2 Sam. 5:11). The friendship between the men grew and was evidenced by the commerce that developed between their two nations. The close relationship continued into Solomon's reign, and the two men made an agreement that resulted in the construction of the temple in Jerusalem (1 Kings 5:1-12).

This relationship between Israel and Tyre was mutually beneficial. Jerusalem was inland and had the advantages of the overland trade routes. Tyre, as a major seaport, offered the advantages of sea trade. Hiram controlled the maritime trade during this time and was himself a respected world trader. His friendship with David and Solomon undoubtedly explains, at least in part, the prosperity and success of their reigns. See David; Phoenicia; Solomon; Tyre.

2. Craftsman who did artistic metal work for Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:13-45). He lived in Tyre, his father's hometown but had a widowed Jewish mother from the tribe of Naphtali.

HIRELING Worker who is paid wages; a laborer; a hired hand. The work of hired laborers was generally difficult (Job 7:1-2). Mosaic law required paying workers at the close of the day so that they might provide for their families (Deut. 24:14-15). Workers were frequently exploited (Mal. 3:5; James 5:4). John 10:12-13 contrasts the cowardice of a hired shepherd with an owner's self-sacrificing concern for his sheep.

HISS Sound made by forcing breath between the tongue and teeth in mockery or to ward off demons. In the OT an army or nation hissed at their enemy's city or land that suffered defeat or disaster (Jer. 19:8). Most often the reference is to astonishment at the fate of Israel, Jerusalem, or the temple lying in ruins (1 Kings 9:8; Jer. 18:16, 19:8; Lam. 2:15-16). Other nations and cities were also the objects of hissing: Edom (Jer. 49:17); Babylon (Jer. 50:13); Tyre (Ezek. 27:36); and Nineveh (Zeph. 2:15). Hissing was sometimes accompanied by wagging the head, clapping hands, gnashing teeth (Lam. 2:15-16), and shaking the fist (Zeph. 2:15).

HISTORY Biblical history is the written register of time—past, present, and future—which reveals that God created humanity and the environment, and that He is leading them through a linear progression of events to a meaningful conclusion. There are four primary aspects to the biblical understanding of history, especially when compared to other outlooks on history: providence, linear chronology, meaningfulness, and hope.

Providence: During the biblical period, most pagans viewed history as an unstable realm of conflict between competing deities. In opposition to the pagan view, and because of their encounter with Yahweh, the Hebrews embraced one all-powerful God as the Creator and Lord of history and of all its particular manifestations.

Linear chronology: The Hebrew understanding of time as a linear progression or non-repetitive chronology moving toward a definite goal differed with the pagan understanding of time as a circular repetition of events.

Meaningfulness: Although the Bible contains history understood in a chronological sense, its primary purpose is to convey the meaning of history. This comes out clearly in the lexical distinction between the Greek words chronos, “a span of time,” and kairos, “a fateful and decisive point in time.” The persistent use of kairos in the NT points to the Bible's intent to convey meaningful history.

Hope: The ancient Near East was generally pessimistic about the material world and wanted only to escape from history into a timeless, immaterial reality. The Bible, in stark contrast, pictures God as leading history to a beneficial conclusion for those who are in faithful covenant with Him.

Alternative Views of History Humans have often tried, to assign some meaning to the events they experience, and to discover the direction of history. These human efforts have generated alternative views which conflict with the divine revelation of history recorded in the Bible. The six alternatives are the cyclical, inevitable progress and mechanistic views, as well as the historicist, futurology, and chaos views.

(1) The cyclical view is one of the oldest documented views of history and was held in various forms in the ancient religions and philosophies of Europe, Asia, and Africa. In modern times, the cyclical view has been held by Friedrich Nietzsche who employed it in his attacks on Christianity. According to this view, time is a circle that inevitably and periodically repeats itself. Because history is not moving toward a specific goal, this view is accompanied by a profound sense of pessimism and resignation. Proponents of the cyclical view seek to escape from the historical cycle into an immaterial, impersonal reality. From the Christian perspective, the deficiency of the cyclical view is its lack of linear progression and of hope.

(2) The inevitable progress view has its origins in the 17th century Enlightenment. The inevitable progress view emphasizes the competency of human reason and is eager to discard traditional religious insights. Auguste Comte saw humanity as unavoidably passing through three stages, away from theology and toward scientific positivism. Charles Darwin's theory of biological evolution reinforced this view by stressing the principle of natural selection. Georg Hegel believed that the "Spirit," an absolute idea in which humans participate by knowing, leads history in a dialectical pattern from one advance to the next. History as dialectic means that a particular event, the thesis, encounters its opposite, the antithesis, and merges into a synthesis that becomes a new thesis set to encounter a new antithesis. History ultimately ends in the triumph of science (Comte), the survival of the fittest (Darwin), or the historical realization of the absolute idea (Hegel). From the Christian perspective, the inevitable progress view impinges upon the transcendent providence of God and mistakenly places its hope in something other than the biblical hope of redemption from sin and death.

(3) The mechanistic view is related to the inevitable progress view. Ludwig Feuerbach believed that man makes his own history; moreover, he believed God is a false projection created by man to explain the universe, and that man will find salvation in realizing that he is the only true God. Karl Marx built his mechanistic view on the foundation set by Hegel and Feuerbach. According to Feuerbach and Marx, the only reality is material. Marx believed history is trapped in a dialectical progression of economics. People are essentially economic beings who have developed through various stages that will end with the elimination of economic classes and the common sharing of all material resources. Religions and metaphysical philosophies are merely created by the upper classes to maintain their oppression of the other classes. From the Christian perspective, the mechanistic view has replaced the providence of God with the providence of fallible theories of economics or scientific materialism.

(4) The historicist view is not mechanistic or materialist in focus, but it is no less dismissive of the providence of God. According to historicism, cultural beliefs and customs are the products of a group's historical experience. Unlike the previous two views, historicism does not see history as progressing in a linear fashion toward some goal; moreover, intuition rather than reason allows the historian to make sense of events. Christians will be uncomfortable with the lack of divinely given human freedom which historicism teaches. Moreover, historicism does not believe that God is leading history through a linear progression of events to a definite goal.

(5) The futurology view is relatively recent in origin but is a secular parallel to the efforts of ancient false seers and false prophets. Futurologists like Alvin Toffler seek to discover future out-comes by utilizing sociological and anthropological analyses. The future outcomes can then be manipulated by humans to reach the desired result. Christians should be wary of this attempt to replace divine providence with human providence.

(6) The chaos view finds no purpose or pattern in human existence. According to the chaos view, God does not provide for humanity in history and history is going nowhere in particular. Therefore, history is not meaningful.

An individual's or society's view of history will shape the quality of that person's or society's life. Vestiges of the biblical view of history can be found in some of the alternative views of history. However, where the biblical view of history is lost in it's fullness, first there will be a spiritual decline, later followed by a decline in the individual morality, social cohesiveness, and economic vigor.

The Christian's hope of heaven has significant consequences in time, both for individuals and for the societies of which they are a part. John described the impact of this hope: "We know that when He appears, we will be like Him, because we will see Him as He is. And everyone who has this hope in Him purifies himself just as He is pure" (1 John 3:2-3 HCSB). C. S. Lewis said, "Aim at heaven and you will get earth thrown in. Aim at earth and you get neither."

HITTITES (חִיטִּים) Non-Semitic minority within the population of Canaan who frequently became involved in the affairs of the Israelites. Hittites, along with the Hivites, were people of Indo-European origin, identified within the population of Canaan (as “sons” of Canaan) in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:15,17), seemingly infiltrated from their cultural and political centers in the north and settled throughout Palestine. Although the history and culture of the Hittites is being clarified, a problem exists with the so-called “Hivites,” a name of unknown origin without any extrabiblical references. That they were uncircumcised (Gen. 34:2,14) would suggest an Indo-European rather than Semitic origin. The more acceptable identification therefore would be with the biblical Horites (Hurrians) whose history and character are well known from extrabiblical sources and consistent with role attributed to them in the biblical text. The Septuagint reading “Choraios” (Horite) for the Masoretic “Hivite” in Gen. 34:2 and Josh. 9:7 suggests this identification. See Hivites; Horim or Horites.

Hittites appear among the ethnic groups living in urban enclaves or as individuals in Canaan interacting with the Israelites from patriarchal times to the end of the monarchy (Gen. 15:20; Deut. 7:1; Judg. 3:5). As a significant segment of the Canaan's population, these “children of Heth” permanently became identified as “sons” of Canaan (Gen. 10:15). In patriarchal times, the reference to King Tidal (in Hittite Tudhaliya II) in Gen. 14:1 is a possible link to early imperial Hatti. In Canaan, the Hittites established a claim on the southern hill country, especially the Hebron area. As a result, Abraham lived among this native population as “a stranger and a sojourner” (Gen. 23:4 NASB). He was forced to purchase the Cave of Machpelah from Ephron the Hittite as a family tomb, specifically for the immediate burial of Sarah (Gen. 23). Esau's marriage to two Hittite women (“daughters of Heth...daughters of the land”) greatly grieved and displeased his parents (Gen. 26:34-35; 27:46).

Hittite relief showing the king Tudhaliya IV being protected by the god Sharruma (in the king's hand).

The geographical reference to “all the land of the Hittites” (Josh. 1:4 NASB) on the northern frontier of the promised land may indicate a recognition of the Hittite/Egyptian border treaty established by Rameses II and the Hittites under King Hattusilis III of about 1270 B.C. Moses' listing of the inhabitants of the promised land included the Canaanites, Hittites, Amorites, Hivites, and Jebusites (Exod. 13:5), a situation that was confirmed by the 12 spies sent to explore the land. They reported that Amalekites occupied the Negev; the Hittites, the Jebusites, and Amorites lived in the hill country; and the Canaanites were concentrated along the Mediterranean coast and the Jordan Valley (Num. 13:29; Josh. 11:3). Thus the Hittites were doomed to displacement by the infiltrating and invading Hebrews (Exod. 3:8,17; 23:23; 33:2).

The King's Gate at the Hittite city of Hattusas in Asia Minor (modern Turkey).

Devastation and pressures from the west by the Phrygians and the Sea Peoples brought another Hittite population to Canaan about 1200 B.C. Ezekiel recalled that Jerusalem had Amorite and Hittite origins (Ezek. 16:3,45). David purchased a threshing floor from Araunah the Jebusite (2 Sam. 24:16-25) whose name may suggest a Hittite noble status (arawanis in Hittite, meaning “freeman, noble”). Later, the account of David's illicit love affair with Bathsheba indicates that Uriah and possibly other Hittites were serving as mercenaries in David's army (2 Sam. 11:3,6; 23:39). The Hittite woman among Solomon's foreign wives was probably the result of a foreign alliance with a neo-Hittite king of north Syria (1 Kings 10:29-11:2; 2 Chron. 1:17). Hittites together with other foreign elements appear to have been conscripted to forced labor during Solomon's reign (1 Kings 9:20-21).

HIVITES [Hiv'vitis] A name that occurs 25 times in the Bible though not in texts outside the Bible. Hivites are found in Gibeon (Josh 9:7; 11:19), Shechem (Gen. 34:2), below Hermon in the land of Mizpah (Josh. 11:3), and in the Lebanon mountains (Judg. 3:3). Most frequently the name appears in the list of nations God would drive out of the land during the Israelite conquest (e.g., Deut. 7:1).

Zibeon is identified as a Hivite (Gen. 36:2) but is listed among the Horites in Gen. 36:20,29. In addition, the Septuagint or earliest Greek translation reads "Horite" for "Hivite" in some texts (Gen. 34:2; Josh. 9:7). This may indicate an early linguistic confusion of "Horite" and "Hivite." It is unlikely that the two are identical, although the exact relationship is unclear. See Horim or Horites.

HIZKI (Hiz' ki) Personal name meaning “my strength” or a shortened form of “Yah is my strength.” Modern translation spelling of Hezeki, a Benjaminite (1 Chron. 8:17).

HIZKIAH (Hiz ki' a) Personal name meaning “Yah is my strength.” 1. Abbreviated form in Hebrew for Hezekiah and used as alternate spelling of the king's name (2 Kings 18; Prov. 25:1). The ancestor of Zephaniah, the prophet, may have been the same king (Zeph. 1:1). See Hezekiah; Zephaniah. 2. Apparently the Hebrew name of a clan that returned from Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C., the Babylonian name being Ater (Neh. 7:21; parallel passage Ezra 2:16 in Hebrew has another variant spelling—Jehizkiah). Both Ater and Hizkijah appear, however, in the list of those who signed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God's law (Neh. 10:17). This would apparently represent men of the next generation. 3. A descendant of David living after the return from exile (1 Chron. 3:23).

HIZKIJAH (Hiz ki' ja) KJV spelling of Hizkiah in Neh. 10:17. Modern translations usually use “Hezekiah.” See Hizkiah.

HOARFROST or HOAR FROST KJV terms for frost from “hoar” (white) and “frost” (Exod. 16:14; Job 38:29; Ps. 147:16).

HOBAB (Hó' báb) Personal name meaning “beloved” or “cunning.” Father-in-law of Moses (Num. 10:29; Judg. 4:11). Some uncertainty exists concerning the identity of Moses' father-in-law. Jethro (Exod. 3:1; 18:2) and Reuel (Exod. 2:18) are also given as names for the father-in-law of the great lawgiver. Several explanations have been offered. Some say different groups within Israel handed down the story of Moses in oral tradition with different names for his father-in-law. Others say Reuel and Jethro were different names for the same person, while Hobab was the son of Reuel or Raguel (Num. 10:29) and thus the brother-in-law of Moses. Others say that the Hebrew term for father-in-law really has the more general meaning of “related by marriage.” Moses urged Hobab to accompany the Israelites through the wilderness as a guide. See Moses; Jethro; Reuel.

HOBAB (Hó'ba) Place-name probably meaning “guilt” in Hebrew but “land of reeds” in Akkadian. Town in Syria to which Abraham pursued the coalition of eastern kings, who kidnapped Lot (Gen. 14:15). Attempts to identify Hobab with Apum or Upe in the Amarna letters from Egypt have recently been questioned. The town or region must lie somewhere north of Damascus, but its precise location is not known. It symbolizes Abraham's ability to drive his enemies completely out of the land of promise.

HOBABIAH (Hó bá' ya) Personal name meaning “Yah hides.” Clan of priests in time of Zerubbabel who did not have family records to prove their descent from pure priestly lines and were excluded from the priesthood (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63). Some translations use “Habaiah” in one or both texts.

HOD (Hód) Personal name meaning “majesty.” Member of tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37).

HODABIAH (Hó dá' ya) KJV, REB spelling of Hodaviah (1 Chron. 3:24) based on Hebrew text in which copyist has obviously transposed two letters and early scribes have noted proper reading in margin of text. See Hodaviah.

HODAVIAH (Hó dá vi' á) Personal name meaning “praise Yah.” The longer form Hodaviahu appears in the scribal marginal note correcting the Hebrew text of 1 Chron. 3:24. See Hodaviah. 1. The final generation of the sons of David that the Chronicler listed (1 Chron. 3:24). He appears to have been born about 420 B.C. The listing of seven brothers may be a cryptic note of hope in the Davidic dynasty for the Jewish community after the exile. 2. Original ancestor of clan in half tribe of Manasseh living east of the Jordan (1 Chron. 5:24). The list leads to an explanation of Israel's loss of land east of the Jordan because of sin and idolatry. 3. A member of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 9:7). 4. A clan of Levites who returned to Judah under Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:40). He was kin to the leading priest Joshua or to a Levite with the same name (cp. Ezra 2:2,36). Ezra 3:9 reads Judah instead of Hodaviah, probably a copyists' change from the less familiar to the more familiar word. Similarly, in Hebrew Neh. 7:43 has “Hodevah,” a copyist omitting one letter.

HODESH (Hō' dēsh) Personal name meaning “new moon.” Wife of Shaharaim of the tribe of Benjamin who bore children in Moab (1 Chron. 8:9).

HODEVAH (Hō' də va) Transliteration of Hebrew text in Neh. 7:43 for original “Hodaviah.” See Hodaviah.

HODIAH (Hō di' a) Personal name meaning “Yah is majestic.” 1. Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:19), though Hebrew text has led translators to interpret Hodiah as a wife (REB, KJV), the husband of Naham's sister (TEV), or the father (NASB, NIV, NRSV). Other scholars would assume copyists have changed the text from an original “sons of his wife the Jewess.” 2. A Levite who helped Ezra explain the meaning of the Law to the people (Neh. 8:7; note KJV spelling, Hodijah) and had a leading part in Israel's confession of sin and worship (Neh. 9:5). He signed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God's law (Neh. 10:10). Another Levite and a leader of the people with the same name also signed the covenant (Neh. 10:13,18).

HODIJAH (Hō di' ja) (KJV) See Hodiah.

HOE Tool for loosening the soil and cutting out weeds around cultivated plants (Isa. 7:25; KJV, “mattock”). See Tools.

HOGLEAH (Hōg' lah) Personal name meaning “partridge.” Daughter of Zelophehad in tribe of Manasseh (Num. 26:33). Her marriage to a son of her father's brothers helped ensure the family land inheritance remained within the tribe (Num. 36:11). See Beth-hoglah; Zelophehad.

HOHAM (Hō' hām) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps related to “unlucky.” King of Hebron who joined forces with the king of Jerusalem to punish Gibeon for making an alliance with Joshua (Josh. 10:3). He was one of five kings shut in a cave, used to show Israel's superiority over the kings by the symbol of Israel's captains putting their feet on the kings' necks, and then killed and hung on a tree (Josh.10:15-26). Thus Joshua gained control of the south, destroying Hebron (10:36-37).

HOLD KJV term for a (fortified) place of refuge. Modern translations generally render the underlying Hebrew as “stronghold” (Judg. 9:46,49; 1 Sam. 22:4; 2 Sam. 5:7). Occasionally other terms are used in place of hold: “fortress” (2 Sam. 24:7 NIV, NRSV); “hill” (Mic. 4:8 NRSV, perhaps in the sense of “citadel”); “fortified cities” (Hab. 1:10 NIV); “refuge” (Nah. 1:7 NIV). In Acts 4:3 to be put in the hold means to be put in custody (NRSV) or in jail (NIV). See Fort, Fortification.

HOLM TREE Small, hollylike, evergreen oak (Quercus ilex). The identity of the tree of Isa. 44:14 is disputed: cypress (NASB, NIV); ilex (REB); holm oak or tree (NASB margin, NRSV); oak (TEV).

HOLON (חֹלֹן) Place-name meaning “sandy spot.” 1. Town in the hill country of Judah allotted to tribe of Judah and given as city for Levites (Josh. 15:51; 21:15). It may be modern Khirbet Illin near Beth-zur. The parallel passage (1 Chron. 6:58) has Hilez or Hilen in different manuscripts. 2. City of Moab that Jeremiah condemned (Jer. 48:21). Its location is not known.

HOLY Biblical use of the term “holy” has to do primarily with God's separating from the world that which He chooses to devote to Himself. As God's redemptive plan unfolded through the OT, the “holy” became associated with the character of God's separated people conforming to His revealed law. When the time became ripe for the saving work of Jesus Christ, His redeemed people came to be known as saints (literally, “holy ones”). The cross made this possible by inaugurating the fulfillment of the preparatory OT teachings on the holy, opening the way for God's Holy Spirit to indwell His people.

God's Unique Holiness as Separation God alone is “majestic in holiness” (Exod. 15:11; cp. 1 Sam. 2:2; Rev. 15:4). The uniqueness of His holiness is stressed in the repetition of the seraphic cry: “Holy, holy, holy” (Isa. 6:3; cp. Rev. 4:8). Indeed, the frequent title of choice for God in Isaiah is “the Holy One of Israel” (e.g., 12:6; 17:7; 29:19,23; 41:14,16; 47:4; 60:9). But God's perfect holiness—the complete perfection of His attributes such as power and goodness—is a humbling and even terrifying thing when revealed to weak and sinful men (e.g., Isa. 6:5; Luke 5:8; Rev. 1:17).

Those things that God separates to Himself become holy, too. These objects of the Lord's choosing are set apart from the world. For instance, the holy place in the tabernacle and the temple is hidden from the eyes of the people, and the most holy place (“holy of holies”) is only entered yearly by the high priest with the blood of atonement and a cloud of incense lest he die (Lev. 16). The privilege of being “a holy people to the Lord your God” (Deut. 7:6; 14:2,21; 28:9) is thus seen to carry weighty responsibility. Interestingly, not only can that which is holy be profaned (e.g., Lev. 21:6,12,15) but also contact with the holy transfers holiness to the profane (e.g., Ezek. 44:19; 46:20; cp. Exod. 29:37; 30:29; 1 Cor. 7:14).

The Ethical Mandate of God's Holiness God's chosen people, in separation from the world, are called to an ethical life in conformity to His revealed word. The command to His people is to “be holy; for I am holy” (Lev. 11:44-45; cp. 19:2; 20:26). This demand is not abrogated with the coming of Christ but is to find its fulfillment in the Christian community (1 Cor. 7:34; Eph. 1:4; Col. 1:22; 1 Pet. 1:16). Christians are to perfect “holiness in the fear of God” (2 Cor. 7:1 NASB). If necessary, God will discipline the followers of Christ for their own good so they “can share His holiness” (Heb. 12:10 HCSB).

The Ultimate Fulfillment of God's Holiness David, fearing that his sin would separate him from God, prays, “Do not...take Your Holy Spirit from me” (Ps. 51:11 HCSB). John the Baptist, however, predicts that Jesus would inaugurate a new era for God's people by baptizing them with the Holy Spirit (Matt. 3:11). The atoning death of Jesus, by meeting the just demands of God's righteousness (Rom. 3:21-26), makes possible this intimate relationship of God and His people. Jesus, as the true Holy One, does not see decay in His death as the prophetic Scriptures foretold (Ps. 16:10; Acts 13:35). Thus His resurrection signifies the accomplishment of salvation and the inauguration of the age of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 1:4) in which the followers of Jesus are baptized with the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:4). This enduring promise for believers in every generation (Acts 2:38-39) is the empowerment to make them holy: the Holy Spirit makes them so (Rom. 15:16).

HOLY CITY Designation for Jerusalem (Neh. 11:1,18; Isa. 48:2; 52:1; Dan. 9:24; Matt. 4:5; 27:53; Rev. 11:2) and for the new, heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. 21:2,10; 22:19) because the holy God lived there. See Holy.

HOLY GHOST (KJV) See Holy Spirit.

HOLY OF HOLIES Innermost sanctuary of the temple. Separated from the other parts of the temple by a thick curtain, the holy of holies was specially associated with the presence of Yahweh. In the early years of the existence of the temple the holy of holies contained the ark of the covenant. See Temple.

HOLY ONE OF ISRAEL In Isa. 1:4, a designation for Yahweh. The title stresses God's nature as holy and His unique relationship to Israel. In the OT this designation is used especially in the book of Isaiah. In the NT Jesus is referred to as the Holy One. See God; Holy.

HOLY PLACE Courts, inner room, and outer room of the tabernacle (Exod. 26:33). Later the expression was used in reference to the temple and its environs. It was a holy place in the sense of being a place set apart for Yahweh. See Temple.

HOLY SPIRIT Third person of the Trinity through whom God acts, reveals His will, empowers individuals, and discloses His personal presence in the OT and NT.

Old Testament The term "Holy Spirit" in the OT is found only in Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:10-11. References to the Spirit of God, however, are abundant. In one sense the Spirit of God is depicted as a mighty wind, Hebrew using the same word ruach for wind, breath, and spirit. During the time of the exodus, God deployed this wind to part the sea thus enabling the Israelites to pass through safely and elude Pharaoh and his army (Exod. 14:21). God used this agent in two ways: as a destructive force that dries up the waters (Hos. 13:15) and as the power of God in gathering clouds to bring the refreshing rain (1 Kings 18:45). The spirit exercised control over the chaotic waters at the beginning of creation (Gen. 1:2; 8:1; cp. Ps. 33:6; Job 26:13). Of the 87 times that the Spirit is described as wind, 37 describe the wind as the agent of God, mostly baneful and ever strong and intense. This property of the Spirit clearly reflects the power of God. An additional quality of the Spirit is that of mysteriousness. Psalm 104:3 demonstrates that the Spirit as wind is able to transport God on its wings to the outer limits of the earth. No one can tell where He has been or where He is going. Power and mystery state the nature of God.

God's Spirit can be expressed as an impersonal force, or it can manifest itself in individuals. The OT has numerous examples when God inspired the prophets indirectly by the Spirit. The prime revelation of the Spirit in the OT, in the personal sense, is by means of prophecy. Joseph's dreams are perceived to be divinely inspired (Gen. 41:38); King David, as a mouthpiece for God, proclaimed that "the Spirit of the LORD spoke by me" (2 Sam. 23:2 NASB); and Zechariah announced the word of the Lord to Zerubbabel, "Not by might nor by power, but by My Spirit," says the LORD of hosts" (Zech. 4:6 NASB). Much like the power of the wind, the Spirit equipped the heroes of Israel with extraordinary strength (Judg. 14:6). The judges are described as being Spirit-possessed individuals as in the case of Othniel (Judg. 3:10). Sometimes, the Spirit came upon individuals mightily and altered their normal behavior (1 Sam. 10:16; 19:23-24).

The Spirit is also the ultimate origin of all mental and spiritual gifts, as it is in the underlying inspiration of the men of wisdom (Exod. 31:1-6; Isa. 11:2; Job 4:15; 32:8). Not only did the prophets benefit from the influence of the Spirit, but also the Spirit will be shed upon the people of God (Isa. 44:3) and upon all the people (Joel 2:28). Ezekiel and Isaiah express the idea of the Spirit more than any other OT source. Many of Ezekiel's allusions to the Spirit are in regard to Israel's restoration in the future. The reception of the new Spirit, prophesied in Ezekiel and Jeremiah, is dependent upon repentance (Ezek. 18:31) and is associated with the creation of a new heart (Jer. 31:31-34). This prophetic foreshadowing, in light of the individual, sporadic, and temporary manifestation of the Spirit in the OT, looked forward to a time when the Spirit of God would revitalize

His chosen people, empower the Messiah, and be lavishly poured out on all humankind.

New Testament When John the Baptist burst on the scene proclaiming the advent of the kingdom of God, the Spirit-inspired prophetic voice returned after a 400-year absence. Zechariah and Elizabeth, John's parents, were informed that their son would “be filled with the Holy Spirit while still in his mother's womb” (Luke 1:15 HCSB). Similarly, the angel Gabriel visited Mary with the news that “the Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you. Therefore the holy child to be born will be called the Son of God” (1:35).

A watershed in biblical history occurred at the event of Jesus' baptism when He was anointed by the Spirit of God (3:22). The Holy Spirit was then responsible for thrusting Jesus out into the wilderness to undergo temptation (4:1-13). Luke has many more references to the Holy Spirit than do the other synoptic accounts. This can be accounted for by Luke's theological interests that are extended in the Acts of the Apostles, which has been rightly named “The Acts of the Holy Spirit” because of the prominence given to the Spirit.

All apostolic writers witnessed to the reality of the Spirit in the church; however, the Apostle Paul, who wrote more than any other author, offers the most theological reflection on the subject. The main chapters to consult are Rom. 8; 1 Cor. 2; 12-14; 2 Cor. 3; and Gal. 5.

Johannine theology is rich in its doctrine of the Spirit. In the Gospel of John, the Spirit possesses Christ (1:32-33); is indicative of the new birth (3:1-16); will come upon Jesus' departure (16:7-11); and will endow the believer after the resurrection (20:22). The Christian community is anointed by the Spirit (1 John 2:20), and the Spirit assures the believer of the indwelling presence of Jesus (1 John 3:24). In the prophetic book of Revelation, John, in OT fashion, depicted himself as a prophet inspired by the Spirit. See God; Spirit.

HOLY SPIRIT, SIN AGAINST THE Attributing the work of the Holy Spirit to the devil (Matt. 12:32; Mark 3:29; Luke 12:10). See Unpardonable Sin.

HOLY WAR The Hebrew word for “war” occurs more than 300 times in the OT. The strategic position of Palestine between Mesopotamia and Egypt made war a harsh reality for most of its inhabitants during biblical times. Israel gained a foothold in this land by means of a war of conquest, and thereafter, by frequently defensive actions against intruders and invaders. Unfortunately, the history of war in Israel also included several civil conflicts.

For most of the ancient Near East, war was considered a sacred undertaking in which the honor and power of the national God was at stake. For Israel, however, war intimately involved the transcendent power of the God who created the heavens and the earth. The biblical writers refer to the conflicts Israel faced as the “Wars of the LORD” (Num. 21:14; 1 Sam. 18:17; 25:28). God is described as a “man of war” (Exod. 15:3; Isa. 42:13) and “mighty in battle” (Ps. 24:8). He is “the LORD of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel” (1 Sam. 17:45 NASB). It is God who leads them out and fights for them (Deut. 20:4; Josh. 10:14, 42; Judg. 4:14). God set the code of conduct in war (Deut. 20:10-18), and the spoils belong to Him (Josh. 6:19).

Before the armies of Israel went out to war, they offered a sacrifice to God (1 Sam. 7:9) and sought His guidance (2 Sam. 5:23-24). The warriors who marched into battle had to be pure and consecrated to God (Josh. 3:5). The presence of God in the arena of battle was symbolized by the ark of the covenant (1 Sam. 4:5-7). After the victory, praises were offered to God in a victory celebration (Exod. 15:1-3).

As the final act of battle, Israel was sometimes required to dedicate everything in a “ban” (herem), which meant that the people and possessions of an entire city would be set apart for God and destroyed (Deut. 7:2; 20:17; Josh. 8:2; 1 Sam. 15:3). Only the metal objects were saved (Josh. 6:18-24). Those who transgressed the ban faced dire consequences (Josh. 7).

Why would a loving God order the wholesale extermination of the nations living in the promised land? There is no simple answer to this difficult question. Three points, however, need to be remembered. First, the concept of the ban is also found among the nations surrounding Israel. In war, every living being and every piece of property was to be dedicated to the deity. Second, the rules for placing the spoils of war under the ban appear to apply only to the cities of the nations within the promised land that God had designated as inheritance for Israel (Deut. 20:16-18). In this context, it should be noted that the OT reports the use of the ban primarily at Arad (Num. 21:2-3), the cities of Sihon and Og (Deut. 2:24; 3:6), Jericho (Josh. 6:21), Ai (Josh. 8:26), the cities of southern Canaan (Josh. 10:28-43) and Hazor (Josh. 11:11). Finally, it must be remembered that Israel was only allowed to drive out the nations living in the promised land because of their sinful abominations (Deut. 9:4-5; 18:9-14; 20:16-18). In this sense, Israel served as the instrument of God's judgment against these sinful nations. In like manner, God would later allow another nation to march against Judah in judgment (Hab. 1:6-11).

HOLY WEEK The week prior to Easter Sunday in which the church remembers the death and resurrection of Christ. As the observance of the Easter festival developed over the first few centuries, the week prior to Easter Sunday began to take on special significance for the early church. In the early centuries Easter Sunday celebrations included remembrance of both the crucifixion and the resurrection. By about 500, Good Friday came to be the focus of the remembrance of the crucifixion. (See map on next page.)

In a similar development Christians began to regard Thursday of Holy Week as a special time for participating in the Lord's Supper. The day came to be called "Maundy Thursday," a reference to Christ's giving a "new commandment" (John 13:34) to His disciples. The word "Maundy" comes from the Latin word for "commandment." Usually the early Maundy Thursday observances included a ceremonial foot washing, in imitation of Christ's washing the feet of the disciples (John 13:5-11). See Church Year.

HOMAGE Special honor, respect, or allegiance, such as that shown to a king; obeisance; reverence. Homage is most often paid to the king (1 Chron. 29:20 NASB, 2 Chron. 24:17 NIV) or to a high-ranking official (Gen. 43:28; Esther 3:2,5 NASB). Homage is sometimes paid to holy men (Samuel, 1 Sam. 28:14 NASB; Daniel, Dan. 2:46 NASB, NRSV). Homage is paid to God as the King of Israel (1 Chron. 29:20; Isa. 18:7 NASB). The Roman soldiers paid Christ mock homage before the crucifixion (Mark 15:19).

HOMAM (Hō' mām) Personal name, perhaps meaning “confusion.” Hebrew text name for grandson of Seir (1 Chron. 1:39). The parallel passage reads “Hemam” (Gen. 36:22).

HOMELESSNESS In a sense, all Christians, like Abraham, are “homeless” in that they are but sojourners in this world (Heb. 11:13). This reality, however, must not lessen the impact of the responsibility of Christians who are able to own a house or pay rent on an apartment toward persons who, for a variety of reasons, are unable to do either.

The biblical term “sojourner” includes a variety of persons, native and nonnative, who did not have permanent homes of their own in the land in which they were living. While some sojourners were attached to a household (1 Kings 17:20; Job 19:15), others were transient (e.g., 2 Sam. 4:3; 2 Chron. 15:9), “like a bird wandering from its nest” (Prov. 27:8 HCSB). The rights of all were vulnerable. For this reason, sojourners, like the poor, orphans, and widows, fell under the special protection of God (Deut. 10:17-18; Ps. 146:9; cp. Rom. 8:38-39) and were to be treated as equals under the Mosaic law (Lev. 24:22; Deut. 24:17). Both the OT and NT declare that God's people are to provide for the homeless (Lev. 19:10; Deut. 10:18-19; Job 31:32; Isa. 58:7; Zech. 7:9-10; Matt. 25:31-46).

Other biblical examples of homelessness include Absalom, who fled his home as a fugitive (2 Sam. 14:13-14), various OT saints (Heb. 11:37-38), Jesus (Matt. 8:20), the prodigal son (Luke 15:13-16), and Paul (1 Cor. 4:11). The people of Israel considered themselves homeless when they were uprooted from their land in exile (Jer. 12:7; Lam. 4:14-15; 5:2; Hos. 9:17; Amos 7:17).

HOMER (Hō' mēr) Unit of dry measure (Lev. 27:16). According to Ezek. 45:11, it was equal to 10 ephahs. In liquid measure this was 10 baths. The actual volume represented by the term has been variously estimated between 3.8 and 6.6 bushels. It was the same volume as the cor (Ezek. 45:14). See Weights and Measures.

HOMOSEXUALITY Sexual relations between people of the same sex. When discussing homosexuality, the biblical emphasis is on behavior, and the verdict is always that it is sinful.

Homosexuality is a consequence of rejecting the created order. The prima facie case against homosexuality in the Scripture is found in God's creative plan for human sexuality. God created mankind as male and female, to procreate within the context of marriage (Gen. 1:27-28; 2:18-24). This creation order for human sexuality received the endorsement of both the Lord Jesus Christ (Mark 10:6-9; Matt. 19:4-6) and the Apostle Paul (Eph. 5:31). On the surface, homosexual behavior should be recognized as sinful because it violates God's original plan for heterosexual monogamy.

Against this background of God's creation scheme for human sexual expression, Paul makes a theological argument in Rom. 1:18-32 that homosexuality is one consequence of rejecting God as Creator and His created order. Paul indicates that both male homosexuality and female lesbianism result from a denial of God. He begins by showing that through rejection of the "creation" (1:20) and "the Creator" (1:25) women "exchanged natural sexual intercourse for what is unnatural" (1:26 HCSB). He adds also that the men "left natural sexual intercourse with females and were inflamed in their lust for one another. Males committed shameless acts with males" (1:27 HCSB). Paul's argument: Because these people reject

God, He gives them over to the desires of their own sinful hearts. In the course of this text, Paul uses several other negative terms to describe homosexuality, such as “uncleanness,” “dishonor,” “vile passions,” “error,” “debased mind,” and “not fitting.” In addition, homosexuality is included here in a serious list of vices that are deserving of death, not only for those who practice but also for those who approve (1:32).

As to modern notions of “homosexual orientation,” a scriptural perspective will view any same sex inclinations at least as harmful as proclivities toward any other sin, as negative consequences of fallen human nature that is inclined towards sin. In light of Rom. 1, homosexual predisposition may also be an indication and outworking of earlier and other sin(s).

Homosexuality is a sin that results in judgment. The first mention of homosexuality in the Bible depicts God's judgment upon it as sin. It was the outstanding transgression of Sodom and Gomorrah. The severity of the judgment, which came because of homosexuality, indicates the seriousness of this sin (Gen. 19:1-11). Both cities were destroyed as “the LORD rained on Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire” (19:24 NASB). The NT commentary on this event is that these two cities were turned to ashes as a matter of God's holy wrath, specifically because their inhabitants had given themselves to “sexual immorality and practiced perversions” (2 Pet. 2:6-7; Jude 7).

Some pro-homosexual interpreters have claimed that the sin of Sodom and Gomorrah was not homosexuality per se, but homosexual gang rape. While it is accurate to say that the men of Sodom sought to rape Lot's guests, the text does not indicate that the sex would have been acceptable if only the angelic visitors had consented. Also, the fact that God's judgment came upon two entire cities argues that it was not just the one instance of gang rape in Sodom that was an offense to God. Instead, God's announced plan to destroy Sodom and Gomorrah before the rape incident occurred indicates that the practice of homosexual behavior in both cities was an affront to the holiness of God. When the homosexuals demanded carnally “to know” Lot's guests, they were merely attempting again what they had been doing for some time. Lot protested, “Do not act wickedly” (Gen. 19:7 NASB). But long before this, when Lot initially pitched his tent toward the city, we read “the men of Sodom were wicked exceedingly and sinners against the LORD” (13:13 NASB). Again, before the attempted gang rape, God said, “Their sin is exceedingly grave” (18:20 NASB), and Abraham also said they were “wicked” (18:23,25).

Another pro-homosexual interpretation is that the sin of Sodom and Gomorrah was inhospitality, not homosexuality or homosexual rape. An appeal is made from Ezek. 16:49 that Sodom was judged for violating the hospitality code. From this passage, the claim is made of Gen. 19 that the men of Sodom wanted “to know” (yada') Lot's guests only in the sense of “getting acquainted with them.” However, yada' is used in a sexual way in the OT at least 10 times, and half of these uses occur in Genesis. Added to this, the context of Gen. 19 argues for the sexual meaning of “to know.” It makes no sense to say that yada' means “acquainted with” in verse 8 where Lot says his daughters had not “known” any men. Certainly they were acquainted with men of the city. But they had not sexually “known” any men.

The “inhospitality” interpreters also point to the absence of any mention of homosexuality in other passages that hold up Sodom and Gomorrah as examples of judgment, such as Isa. 1:10; Jer. 23:14; Matt. 10:14-15; and Luke 10:10-12. There are also several problems with this approach. First, these texts do not exclude homosexuality. In the case of Ezek. 16:49, sexual sins should be viewed as a form of selfishness. Besides, the next verse (16:50) shows that the sin was sexual by calling it an “abomination.” In Lev. 18:22 this same word is used to describe homosexual sins. Most of all, the problem with this view is that the 2 Peter and Jude passages do link the judgment of the cities to the sexual sin of homosexuality, and this does not contradict in any way the other judgment passages. For this reason, those who take the authority of Scripture seriously will reject the pro-homosexual/inhospitality view (Judg. 19:16-24).

Violation of Old Testament law The Holiness Code, which conveyed God's demands for ordering the life of His covenant people, contained two clear prohibitions against homosexual activity. In a large section on sexual morality which should be viewed as an extension of the seventh commandment, “The LORD spoke to Moses saying...‘You shall not lie with a male as one lies with a female’” (Lev. 18:1,22 NASB). Then later, repeating with 18:22 that homosexuality is an “abomination,” Lev. 20:13 adds, “If there is a man who lies with a male as those who lie with a woman, both of them...shall surely be put to death.”

Violation of New Testament ethic In 1 Tim. 1:8-10 Paul discusses the value of the OT law in the present era, if used wisely. It is to be used to judge “sinners.” Then he includes “homosexuals” (arsenokoitai) in his vice list, which delineates those who are “the ungodly.” Also in 1 Cor. 6:9-11 “homosexuals” appears in a similar vice list, and Paul comments that anyone who continues in these sins will not inherit the kingdom of God. Arsenokoites refers to the active partner in the homosexual act. However, in addition to “homosexuals” in 1 Cor. 6:9, Paul adds a second word, “effeminate” (malakoi). Malakoi refers to the passive member in the homosexual relationship. The point is that both passive and active kinds of “homosexual” behavior are sinful, ungodly, and disqualify one from entrance into the kingdom of God.

Forgivable and changeable through Jesus Christ However ungodly and undeserving of heaven any homosexual might be, there is the opportunity to be forgiven, changed, and declared righteous through Jesus Christ. Paul continues in 1 Cor. 6:11 (HCSB) to say, “Some of you were like this.” The Corinthian church evidently contained some former homosexuals who had been converted. Furthermore, Paul adds of them, “But you were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the Spirit of our God.” The homosexual who repents and believes receives the same cleansing, sanctification, and justification as every other believer who turns from sin to Christ.

HONESTY Fairness and straightforwardness of conduct. KJV frequently used “honesty” or cognates where modern translations use other words:

“honorable/honorably” (Rom. 13:13; Phil. 4:8; Heb. 13:18; 1 Pet. 2:12); “noble” (Luke 8:15; Rom. 12:17); “dignity” (1 Tim. 2:2); “properly” (1 Thess. 4:12). Men of “honest report” (Acts 6:3) are men of good standing (NRSV).

Someone in the right in a law case may be described as honest (Exod. 23:7 NIV). Isaiah lamented that “no one goes to law honestly” (59:4 NRSV). Honest or just balances, weights, and measures give fair and accurate measure (Lev. 19:36; Deut. 25:15; Prov. 16:11). Job (31:6) prays God's judgment to be weighed in an honest balance so God can know the person's integrity. Scripture often refers to honest or right speech (Job 6:25; Prov. 12:17; 16:13; 24:26). Those working on the temple construction were known for their honest business dealings (2 Kings 12:15; 22:7).

Jacob claimed honesty (Gen. 30:33) but manipulated the breeding of Laban's flocks (30:37-43). Jacob's sons repeatedly assured Joseph of their honesty (Gen. 42:11,19,31,33-34), never guessing that their brother knew their deceptive natures all too well (37:31-33).

HONEY Produced by bees providing a sweet foodstuff for people to eat.

Old Testament During Bible times, honey appeared in three forms: honey deposited from wild bees (Deut. 32:13); honey from domesticated bees (one of the products “of the field” 2 Chron. 31:5); and a syrup made from dates and grape juice (2 Kings 18:32). Honey served as a foodstuff (Gen. 43:11) and as an item of trade (Ezek. 27:17).

Almost all references to honey in the OT are to wild honey. Bees made their honeycombs and deposited their honey in holes in the ground (1 Sam. 14:25), under rocks or in crevices between rocks (Deut. 32:13), or in the carcasses of animals (Judg. 14:8).

Honey was prohibited from being used in burnt offerings because it fermented easily (Lev. 2:11). Honey was rare enough to be considered a luxury item (Gen. 43:11; 1 Kings 14:3). Honey was so ample in Canaan that the land there was described as a land “flowing with milk and honey” (Exod. 3:8).

Beekeeping is not mentioned specifically in the OT. In later times beekeeping was practiced by the Jews. The hives were of straw and wicker. Before removing the combs, the beekeeper stupefied the bees with fumes of charcoal and cow dung burnt in front of the hives.

The Lord's ordinances are “sweeter than honey” (Ps. 19:10). God's goodness to Jerusalem was expressed by the phrase “you ate honey” (Ezek. 16:13).

New Testament Honey is mentioned in three NT passages (Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6; Rev. 10:9-10). In NT times, honey was viewed as a food eaten by those who lived in the wilderness (Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6).

HONOR See Shame and Honor.

HOOD KJV term for one of the items of finery worn by the elite women of Jerusalem (Isa. 3:23). Modern translations render the underlying Hebrew as “scarf” (TEV), “tiara” (NIV), or “turban” (NASB, NRSV, REB). It represented a fine Oriental head covering.

HOOF Curved covering of horn protecting the front of or enclosing the digits of some mammals. According to Mosaic law, ritually clean animals are those that both chew the cud and have cloven (divided) hooves (Deut. 14:6-7).

HOOK Curved or bent device for catching, holding, or pulling. Some biblical uses, for example, hanging curtains (Exod. 26:32; 27:10) or fishing (Isa. 19:8; Job 40:24; Hab. 1:15; Matt. 17:27), are familiar today. (KJV often uses “angle.”) Less familiar is the practice of ancient conquerors who led their captives by means of hooks or thongs put through their noses or jaws (2 Chron. 33:11; Ezek. 38:4; Amos 4:2).

HOOPOE Any of the Old World birds of the family Upupidae, having a plumed head crest and a long, slender, curved bill. The identity of the unclean bird of Lev. 11:19 (Deut. 14:18) is disputed: lapwing (KJV); hoopoe (modern English translations); waterhen (earliest Greek); woodcock (Targum).

HOPE Trustful expectation, particularly with reference to the fulfillment of God's promises. Biblical hope is the anticipation of a favorable outcome under God's guidance. More specifically, hope is the confidence that what God has done for us in the past guarantees our participation in what God will do in the future. This contrasts to the world's definition of hope as “a feeling that what is wanted will happen.”

The Ground and Object of Hope In the OT God alone is the ultimate ground and object of hope. Hope in God was generated by His mighty deeds in history. In fulfilling His promise to Abraham (Gen. 12:1-3), He redeemed the Israelites from bondage in Egypt. He provided for their needs in the wilderness, formed them into a covenant community at Sinai, and led them into the successful occupation of Canaan. These acts provided a firm base for their confidence in God's continuing purpose for them. Even when Israel was unfaithful, hope was not lost. Because of God's faithfulness and mercy, those who returned to Him could count on His help (Mal. 3:6-7). This help included forgiveness (2 Chron. 7:14; Ps. 86:5) as well as deliverance from enemies. Thus, Jeremiah addressed God as the “Hope of Israel, its Savior in time of distress” (Jer. 14:8 NASB; cp. 14:22; 17:13).

A corollary of putting one's hope in God is refusing to place one's final confidence in the created order. All created things are weak, transient, and apt to fail. For this reason it is futile to vest ultimate hope in wealth (Pss. 49:6-12; 52:7; Prov. 11:28), houses (Isa. 32:17-18), princes (Ps. 146:3), empires and armies (Isa. 31:1-3; 2 Kings 18:19-24), or even the Jerusalem temple (Jer. 7:1-7). God, and God only, is a rock that cannot be moved (Deut. 32:4,15,18; Pss. 18:2; 62:2; Isa. 26:4) and a refuge and fortress who provides ultimate security (Pss. 14:6, 61:3; 73:28; 91:9). An accurate summary of the OT emphasis is found in Ps. 119:49-50.

A significant aspect of OT hope was Israel's expectation of a messiah, that is, an anointed ruler from David's line. This expectation grew out of the promise that God would establish the throne of David forever (2 Sam.

7:14). The anointed ruler (messiah) would be God's agent to restore Israel's glory and rule the nations in peace and righteousness. For the most part, however, David's successors were disappointments. The direction of the nation was away from the ideal. Thus, people looked to the future for a son of David who would fulfill the divine promise.

The NT continues to speak of God as the source and object of hope. Paul wrote that it was “God who raises the dead” in whom “we have placed our hope” (2 Cor. 1:9-10 HCSB). Furthermore, “we have put our hope in the living God, who is the Savior of everyone” (1 Tim. 4:10 HCSB). Peter reminded his readers that “your faith and hope are in God” (1 Peter 1:21 HCSB). In the NT, as in the OT, God is the “God of hope” (Rom. 15:13).

For the early Christians, hope is also focused in Christ. He is called “our hope” (1 Tim. 1:1), and the hope of glory is identified with “Christ in you” (Col. 1:27). Images applied to God in the OT are transferred to Christ in the NT. He is the Savior (Luke 2:11; Acts 13:23; Titus 1:4; 3:6), the source of life (John 6:35), the rock on which hope is built (1 Pet. 2:4-7). He is the first and last (Rev. 1:17), the day-spring dispelling darkness and leading His people into eternal day (Rev. 22:5).

New Testament writers spoke of Christ as the object and ground of hope for two reasons: (1) He is the Messiah who has brought salvation by His life, death, and resurrection (Luke 24:46). God's promises are fulfilled in Him. “For every one of God's promises is ‘Yes’ in Him” (2 Cor. 1:20 HCSB). (2) They are aware of the unity between Father and Son. This is a unity of nature (John 1:1; Col. 1:19) as well as a unity in the work of redemption. Because “in Christ, God was reconciling the world to Himself” (2 Cor. 5:19 HCSB), hope in the Son is one with hope in the Father.

The Future of Hope While the NT affirms the sufficiency of Christ's redemptive work in the past, it also looks forward to His return in the future to complete God's purpose. Indeed, the major emphasis on hope in the NT centers on the second coming of Christ. The “blessed hope” of the church is nothing less than “the appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ” (Titus 2:13 HCSB). See Future Hope.

The Assurance of Hope Christians live in hope for two basic reasons. The first reason is because of what God has done in Christ. Especially important is the emphasis the NT places on the resurrection by which Christ has defeated the power of sin and death. “According to His great mercy, He has given us a new birth into a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead” (1 Pet. 1:3 HCSB).

The second reason is the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. “The Spirit Himself testifies together with our spirit that we are God's children” (Rom. 8:16 HCSB).

Given the assurance of hope, Christians live in the present with confidence and face the future with courage. They can also meet trials triumphantly because they know “that affliction produces endurance, endurance produces proven character, and proven character produces hope” (Rom. 5:3-4 HCSB). Such perseverance is not passive resignation; it is the confident endurance in the face of opposition. There is, therefore, certitude in Christian hope that amounts to a qualitative difference from ordinary hope. Christian hope is the gift of God. “We have this hope—like a sure and firm anchor of the soul” (Heb. 6:19 HCSB). See Eschatology.

HOPHNI AND PHINEHAS (Hōph' ni and Phīn' ə hās) Personal names meaning “tadpole” and “dark-skinned one” in Egyptian. In 1 Sam. 1:3, sons of Eli and priests at Shiloh. They were disreputable men who were contemptuous of sacred matters. They were slain in battle against the Philistines (1 Sam. 4:4). The news of their deaths precipitated the death of their father Eli (1 Sam. 4:18). See Eli; Samuel.

HOPHRA (Hōph' rá) Egyptian divine name meaning “the heart of Re endures.” Egyptian pharaoh (589-569 B.C.). At the beginning of his reign he tried to drive the Babylonian army away from its siege of Jerusalem (Jer. 37:5). Apparently at that time Jeremiah mocked the pharaoh, making a pun on his name, calling him a loud-voiced boaster (“King Bombast, the man who missed his opportunity” Jer. 46:17 REB). Jeremiah warned that the pharaoh would be handed over to his enemies, at the same time warning Jews living in Egypt that salvation history was reversed and they would be destroyed (Jer. 44:26-30). Hophra's death would be a sign to the Jews that Jeremiah's words were true. Hophra eventually lost his power in a revolt by his general Amasis in 569 B.C. Condemnation of Hophra showed Jeremiah's consistency in opposing any opposition to Babylon, whom God had chosen to punish His disobedient people. See Egypt.

HOR, MOUNT [Hôr] Place-name, perhaps an ancient variant of Hebrew common noun, har, “mountain.” 1. Place where Aaron, the high priest, died, fulfilling God's word that he would be punished for rebelling at the water of Meribah (Num. 20:22-29; 33:38-39). Moses installed Aaron's son Eleazar as high priest on the mountain. It was apparently a brief journey from Kadesh and lay near the coast of Edom (Num. 20:22-23). The traditional location at Jebel Harun above Petra is too far inside Edom and too far from Kadesh, though high (4,800 feet) and impressive. Recently Bible students have pointed to Jebel Madurah, northeast of Kadesh on Edom's border. Deuteronomy 10:6 places Aaron's death at Mosera, an unknown site which may be under Mount Hor. Israel journeyed from Mount Hor to go around Edom (Num. 21:4; 33:41). 2. Mountain marking northern boundary of promised land (Num. 34:7-8). The location is unknown, though some would see Hor as a variant name for Mount Hermon.

HORAM (Hôr rām) Personal name perhaps meaning “high, exalted.” King of Gezer, whose attempt to deliver Lachish from Joshua resulted in his death and the annihilation of his army (Josh. 10:33), though his city remained a Canaanite stronghold (Josh. 16:10; cp. 1 Kings 9:16).

HOREB [Hôr rēb] Alternative name for Mount Sinai (Exod. 3:1-12; 17:6-7; Deut. 1:19; 5:2; 1 Kings 19:8). See Sinai, Mount.

HOREM (Hôr rēm) Place-name meaning “split rock” but sounding like the word for “war booty under the ban.” City in tribal allotment of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38). Location is unknown.

HORESH (Hō' rēsh) Place-name meaning “forest,” KJV interpreting the term as a common noun. As David hid there from Saul, Jonathan, Saul's son, came out to help him and made a covenant of mutual help (1 Sam. 23:15-18). The people of Ziph revealed David's hideout, but David still escaped. If a proper name, Horesh may be modern Khirbet Khoreisa, two miles south of Ziph and six miles south of Hebron.

HOR-HAGGIDGAD (Hōr-há gīd' gād) or HOR-HAGIDGAD (KJV) Place-name, perhaps meaning “hill of crickets.” Station on Israel's wilderness journey (Num. 33:32-33). It may be in the Wadi Geraphi, though no certain location is known. It appears to be a variant spelling of Gudgodah (Deut. 10:7).

HORI (Hō' ri) Personal name meaning “bleached,” “lesser,” or “Horite.” 1. Edomite descended from Seir (Gen. 36:22). 2. Father of the leader of tribe of Simeon under Moses in the wilderness (Num. 13:5).

HORIM (Hō' rīm) (KJV) or HORITES (Hō rits) Pre-Edomite inhabitants of Mount Seir in the southern Transjordan. Hebrew word for Horites corresponds to the extrabiblical Hurrians, a non-Semitic people who migrated into the Fertile Crescent about 2000 B.C. The Hurrians created the Mitannian Empire in Mesopotamia about 1500 B.C. and later became an important element in the Canaanite population of Palestine. In locations where there is extrabiblical evidence for Hurrians, the Hebrew term Hivites appears (Gen. 34:2; Josh. 9:7; 11:3,19) as a designation for certain elements of the Canaanite population. The Septuagint (Gr. translation of the OT), however, substitutes Horites for Hivites in Gen. 34:2 and Josh. 9:7. Also, Zibeon, son of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:20), is identified as a Hivite in Gen. 36:2. For these reasons, many scholars equate both Horites and Hivites (the names are quite similar in Hebrew) with the extrabiblical Hurrians.

Nevertheless, the Hebrew text only mentions Horites in Mount Seir where there is no record of Hurrians. Therefore, another suggestion holds that the biblical Horites were not Hurrians but simply the original cave-dwelling (Hb. hor means “cave”) population of Edom (Mount Seir). The Hivites, according to this theory, should be identified with the extrabiblical Hurrians. See Seir, Mount.

HORMAH (Hôr' mah) Place-name meaning “split rock” or “cursed for destruction.” City marking the limit of the Canaanite route of the Israelites after the failed Israelite attempt to invade Canaan that followed the report of the 12 spies (Num. 14:45). Though the exact location of Hormah is not known, it was in the territory assigned to the tribe of Simeon (Josh. 19:4). Some identify it with Tell Masos about seven miles east of Beersheba. Excavations have shown settlement in about 1800 B.C. and again just before 1200 B.C. The latter settlement apparently lasted until the time of David (cp. 1 Sam. 30:30). A small fortress was built some time after 700 B.C. and destroyed shortly after 600 B.C.

The site controlled the east-west road in the Beersheba Valley and the north-south road to Hebron. Israel gained brief victory there (Num. 21:3) after their earlier defeat (Num. 14:45; cp. Deut. 1:44). The list of kings Joshua defeated includes Hormah (Josh. 12:14); the battle description says Judah and Simeon combined to take Hormah after Joshua's death (Judg. 1:1,17), the city earlier being called Zephath. See Zephath.

HORN Curved bonelike structures growing from the heads of animals such as deer or goats and vessels or instruments made from or shaped like such horns. In Scripture “horn” refers to trumpets, vessels, topographical features, and figurative symbols.

Old Testament The basic meaning of “horns” relate to animal horns (Gen. 22:13; Deut. 33:17; Dan. 8:5). Elephant tusks were also called horns (Ezek. 27:15). Horns are mentioned as being used as trumpets (Josh. 6:5). Such instruments were perforated horns of the ram or the wild ox used to sound ceremonial or military signals. Priests sounded trumpets to call to worship. Trumpets later were made of silver. Horns also were used as vessels. Being hollow and easy to polish, horns were used to hold liquids for drinking or storage, including ceremonial anointing oil (1 Sam. 16:1). Hornlike projections were built onto the corners of the altar of burnt offerings in the temple and in tabernacles (Exod. 27:2). The horns were smeared with the blood of the sacrifice, served as binding posts for the sacrifice, and were clung to for safety from punishment (1 Kings 2:28). See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

As a topographical feature, the peaks or summits of Palestinian hills were called horns (Isa. 51:1). Metaphorically, horn signified the strength and honor of people and brightness and rays. Such references are used in Scripture as emblems of the power of God (Heb. 3:4) and other physical or spiritual entities. There is an apocalyptic use of the word in Dan. 7:7. Horns budding or sprouting is a figurative language indicating a sign of revival of a nation or power.

New Testament Christ is called “a horn of salvation” (Luke 1:69 HCSB), which is a metaphorical use of the word signifying strength. Other figurative uses include the Lamb with seven horns mentioned in the book of Revelation (Rev. 5:6); the beast with 10 horns rising up out of the sea (Rev. 13:1); and the scarlet beast of the great prostitute also having 10 horns (Rev. 17:3,7). Those references represent anti-Christian powers.

HORNED OWL Species of owl having conspicuous tufts of feathers on the head. NIV reckons the horned owl an unclean bird (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15). The precise identity of the bird is unclear. Other possibilities include: desert owl (REB), owl (KJV), and ostrich (NASB, NRSV). See Owl.

HORNED SNAKE Venomous viper (Cerastes cornutus) of the Near East having a horny protrusion above each eye. Dan is compared to a horned snake (Gen. 49:17 NASB, REB). See Reptiles.

HORNETS See Insects.

HORONAIM (Hôr' ô nā'im) Place-name meaning “twin caves.” Prominent town in Moab upon which Isaiah (15:5) and Jeremiah (48:3,5,34) pronounced laments, warning of coming destruction. It apparently lay in the southwestern part of Moab, but students of biblical geography debate its exact location. Suggestions include Khirbet ad-Dubababout, three miles west northwest of Majra; Khirbet al-Maydan, west of modern Katrabba; and ed-Dayr, about two miles northwest of Rakin.

HORONITE (Hôr' õ nî) Citizen of Beth-horon or of Horonaim. A description of Sanballat, who led opposition to Nehemiah (Neh. 2:10). To which of the two possible places Sanballat belonged, we do not know.

HORSE Four-legged, solid-hoofed animal used for transportation and in war. The horse was probably first domesticated by nomads of Central Asia as long ago as 4,000 years. Babylonians used horses in battle, and military victories such as those of Genghis Khan and Alexander the Great would have been impossible without horses. The Hyksos warriors who invaded Egypt evidently brought these animals to the area from Persia. When the exodus occurred, Pharaoh's army was outfitted with horses and chariots (Exod. 14-15). Herodotus reported the use of horses by the Persians in their postal system 3,000 years ago.

A first century A.D. relief of horses harnessed to and turning a mill.

The horse is mentioned more than 150 times in the Bible, with the earliest reference being found in Gen. 47:17. However, there is no indication that the horse was in common use in Israel until the time of David and Solomon. David captured chariots from the Syrians and destroyed most of them but reserved 100 (2 Sam. 8:3-4). In so doing, he disobeyed God and introduced their use to Israel. David's son, Solomon, multiplied their numbers to strengthen the defense of his country, building chariot cities (1 Kings 9:19). The number of horses owned by Solomon was as many as 12,000. They were used to draw chariots (1 Kings 4:26; 10:26). Since the Mosaic law forbade the breeding of horses, Solomon imported horses from Egypt (Deut. 17:16; 2 Chron. 1:16). Likely, because of the superiority of the horse for warfare, this law was later ignored. The ruins of Solomon's well-known horse stables at ancient Megiddo are today marked as a historical and archeological site.

In Megiddo what appears to be stalls and feeding troughs from King Ahab's time have been discovered. These were sufficient for about 450 horses.

The horse was used for war by the Syrians (1 Kings 20:20), the Philistines (2 Sam. 1:6), the Medes and Persians (Jer. 50:42), and the Romans (Acts 23:23,32). By contrast, and as a sign of the peacefulness of the Messiah's kingdom, Jesus rode into Jerusalem upon an ass, not a horse (John 12:12-15).

Considerable opposition to the horse arose in Israel, seeing horses as symbols of pagan luxury and dependence on physical power for defense. Prophets condemned trusting in horses rather than the Lord for victory (Isa. 31:1; Ezek. 17:15). Yet horses became so common in Jerusalem that a royal palace near the city had a special horse gate (2 Chron. 23:15) and a gate of the city was also called the Horse Gate (Jer. 31:40; Neh. 3:28).

Horses are often used as symbols of swiftness (Jer. 4:13), strength (Job 39:19), and surefootedness (Isa. 63:13). The most detailed description of a horse is found in Job 39:19-25. In prophecy horses also play an important role as in Joel 2:4-5 and Rev. 6:1-8 where four horses of different colors are associated with different tragedies. See Megiddo.

HORSE GATE Gate on east side of city wall of Jerusalem near the temple. Jeremiah promised its rebuilding (Jer. 31:40), and the priests under Nehemiah rebuilt it (Neh. 3:28).

HORSELEACH (KJV) See Leech.

HORSEMAN Rider on a horse. The plural frequently refers to a cavalry (Exod. 14:9-28; Josh. 24:6; 1 Sam. 8:11). This association of horsemen with armed forces perhaps sparked the use of the four riders of Rev. 6:2-8 as symbols of military conquest, war, economic injustice, and death and Hades.

HOSAH [Hó' sa] Personal name, and place-name perhaps meaning “seeker of refuge.” 1. Coastal city in tribal territory of Asher (Josh. 19:29), probably modern Tell Rashidiyeh near Tyre and known in ancient Egyptian and Assyrian texts as Usu. Other biblical geographers would see the fortified city of Tyre as Tell Rashidiyeh (Usu) and locate Hosah further from Tyre and the coast. 2. Gatekeeper of the sanctuary under David (1 Chron. 16:38). He belonged to the priestly clan of Merari (1 Chron. 26:10). He was in charge of the west gate (1 Chron. 26:16).

HOSANNA (Hó zán' ná) Cry with which Jesus was greeted on the occasion of His triumphal entrance into Jerusalem (Mark 11:9). The words with which the Savior was welcomed by the multitude are drawn from Ps. 118:25-26. “Hosanna” is a Hebrew or Aramaic word that is best translated as a prayer: “Save now,” or “Save, we beseech Thee.” When the residents of Jerusalem, carrying palm branches, met Jesus and hailed Him as the One who comes in the name of the Lord, they included in their acclamation a plea for salvation. See Psalms, Book of; Triumphal Entry.

HOSEA (Hó zā' á) Personal name meaning “salvation.” In Hebrew the name is the same as that of Joshua's original name (Num. 13:16; Deut. 32:44) and of the last king of Israel (2 Kings 17:1), who lived at the same time as the prophet. One of David's officers bore the name (1 Chron. 27:20) as did a clan chief in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:23). English translators have often chosen to spell the prophet's name Hosea to distinguish him from the others whose names they spell “Hoshea.”

Hosea's prophetic ministry included the period of Near Eastern history when Assyria emerged as a new world empire under the capable leadership of Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 B.C.). Assyria's rise to power posed a constant threat to Israel's national existence. Hosea's name symbolized the pressing need for national deliverance. His message pointed the nation to the deliverer (Hos. 13:4).

Hosea rebuked efforts at alliance with Assyria and Egypt as the means to national security. He witnessed the political chaos in Israel following the death of Jeroboam II. Four of the last six kings to sit on Israel's throne were assassinated. Hosea had the unenviable task of presiding over the death of his beloved nation, but he held out hope of national revival based on radical repentance (Hos. 14).

Placement of Hosea's ministry in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah indicates that he was a contemporary of Isaiah. The title verse of Isaiah contains the same list of Judean kings. Jeroboam II is the only Israelite king named in the title to Hosea's book, in spite of the fact that internal evidence suggests that Hosea's ministry continued from the last days of Jeroboam II to near the end of the Northern Kingdom (approximately 750-725 B.C.).

HOSEA, BOOK OF Title of the first book in the section of the Hebrew Bible called the Book of the Twelve, named after its prophetic hero. The small prophetic books that make up this section frequently are designated Minor Prophets. This title is not an assessment of worth but a description of size as compared to Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel.

The two broad divisions of the book of Hosea are Hosea's Marriage (Hos. 1-3) and Hosea's Messages (Hos. 4-14). A pattern of judgment followed by hope recurs in each of the first three chapters. A similar pattern is discernible in the oracles of Hosea (Hos. 4-14) though the pattern is not balanced as neatly or revealed as clearly. Certainly the book ends on a hopeful note (Hos. 14), but most of the oracles in chapters 4-13 are judgmental in nature. The dominant theme of the book is love (covenant fidelity), God's unrelenting love for His wayward people and Israel's unreliable love for God.

Hosea is identified in the title verse (1:1) as a genuine prophet to whom “the word of the Lord” came. That phrase designates the source of his authority and describes his credentials. Not only are Hosea's oracles (Hos. 4-14) the word of the Lord to Israel but so also are the materials dealing with his domestic problems (Hos. 1-3). Based on information gleaned from his book, Hosea was from the Northern Kingdom of Israel. His familiarity with place-names, religious practices, and political conditions in Israel suggest that he was a native. In contrast, Amos, who ministered as a prophet in Israel shortly before Hosea's ministry there, was from Tekoa in Judah. Both prophets preached judgment, Amos with a lion's roar and Hosea with a broken heart.

Hosea's marriage and family life dominate chapters 1-3 and surface from time to time in the remainder of the book. References to Hosea's family serve as prophetic symbolism of God and His family Israel. God ordered Hosea to take a wife of harlotry and have children of harlotry “for the land commits flagrant harlotry, forsaking the Lord” (Hos. 1:2 NASB). Primary interest is not in Hosea and his family but in God and His family. How to interpret the prophet's marriage is not a settled issue. A few take the marriage to be an allegory. Some accept it as a literal marriage to a woman who became promiscuous after marriage. Most handle it as an actual marriage to a cult prostitute. Every interpreter must keep in mind the obvious intent of the material to serve as prophetic symbolism of God's relationship to Israel.

At the heart of Hosea's theology was the relationship between God and Israel. Yahweh alone was Israel's God. Israel was Yahweh's elect people. Hosea presented Yahweh as a faithful husband and Israel as an unfaithful wife. Hosea's stress is not upon righteousness and justice, as was the case with Amos, but the knowledge of God and loyal love. God's love for Israel would not permit Him to give up on them in spite of their lack of knowledge and infidelity. Hope for Israel's future lay in their repentance and God's forgiveness and love that made Him willing to restore their relationship.

Outline

- I. God Loves His Unfaithful People (1:1-3:5).

HOSEN KJV term for hose or leggings (Dan. 3:21). The meaning of the underlying Aramaic term is disputed: leggings (NASB margin); robes (TEV); shirts (REB); trousers (NASB, NIV, NRSV); tunics (RSV).

HOSHAIAH (Hō shī' ya) Personal name meaning "Yah saved." 1. Father of Jewish leader who led delegation requesting Jeremiah's prayer support (Jer. 42:1) and then rejected Jeremiah's word from God (Jer. 43:2). 2. Leader of Jewish group in celebration upon the completion of the Jerusalem wall under Nehemiah (Neh. 12:32).

HOSHAMA (Hōsh' á má) Personal name, an abbreviated form of Jehoshama, "Yahweh heard." Descendant of David during the exile (1 Chron. 3:18).

HOSHEA (Hō shā' á) See Hosea.

HOSPITALITY To entertain or receive a stranger (sojourner) into one's home as an honored guest and to provide the guest with food, shelter, and protection. This was not merely an oriental custom or good manners but a sacred duty that everyone was expected to observe. Only the depraved would violate this obligation.

Hospitality probably grew out of the needs of nomadic life. Since public inns were rare, a traveler had to depend on the kindness of others and had a right to expect it. This practice was extended to every sojourner, even a runaway slave (Deut. 23:15-16) or one's archenemy.

The Pentateuch contains specific commands for the Israelites to love the strangers as themselves (Lev. 19:33-34; Deut. 10:18-19) and to look after their welfare (Deut. 24:17-22). The reason for practicing hospitality was that the Israelites themselves were once strangers in the land of Egypt.

Some acts of hospitality were rewarded, the most notable of which was Rahab's (Josh. 6:22-25; Heb. 11:31; James 2:25). Breaches of hospitality were condemned and punished, such as those of Sodom (Gen. 19:1-11) and Gibeah (Judg. 19:10-25). The only exception was Jael who was praised for killing Sisera (Judg. 4:18-24).

Hospitality seemed to form the background of many details in the life of Jesus and the early church (Matt. 8:20; Luke 7:36; 9:2-5; 10:4-11). It was to be a characteristic of bishops and widows (1 Tim. 3:2; 5:10; Titus 1:8) and a duty of Christians (Rom. 12:13; 1 Pet. 4:9). It was a natural expression of brotherly love (Heb. 13:1-2; 1 Pet. 4:8-9) and a necessary tool of evangelism. Furthermore, one might even entertain angels or the Lord unaware (Heb. 13:2; Matt. 25:31-46).

HOST OF HEAVEN Army at God's command, composed of either heavenly bodies (such as sun, moon, and stars) or angels.

“Host” is basically a military term connected with fighting or waging a war. The most frequent use of the word is to designate a group of men organized for war. In this sense, the Hebrew word often refers to a human army (Gen. 21:22,32; Judg. 4:2,7; 9:29; 1 Sam. 12:9; 2 Sam. 3:23; Isa. 34:2; Jer. 51:3). The term can refer to an act of war, as in Num. 1:3,20; Deut. 24:5; and Josh. 22:12. An extended meaning of “hosts” is that it designates a length of time of hard service (Job 7:1; Isa. 40:2, Dan. 10:1). The term is used in the book of Numbers to refer to the service of the Levites in the sanctuary.

The phrase “Host of Heaven” came into use because of the close connection between the realms of earth and heaven in ancient thought. The celestial bodies were thought to be organized in the same way as earthly military bodies. The sun, moon, and stars were regarded as the “host of heaven” (Gen. 2:1). The author of Ps. 33:6 stated that God created this host by His breath. God preserved the existence of the host of heaven (Isa. 40:26).

Old Testament writers warned Israel about the danger of worshipping the heavenly bodies (Deut. 4:19) and prescribed the death penalty for the crime of worshipping the sun, or the moon, or any of the “host of heaven” (Deut. 17:2-7). Unfortunately, Israel and Judah yielded to the temptation to worship the heavenly bodies from time to time, especially during the period of Assyrian and Babylonian influence (2 Kings 17:16-23; 21:3,5).

Manasseh, king of Judah (697-642 B.C.), built altars in Jerusalem for all the “host of heaven” (2 Kings 21:5). He attempted to merge the worship of other gods with the worship of Yahweh. Manasseh's efforts were reversed when Josiah came to the throne (2 Kings 23:7).

Another concept of the “host of heaven” is presented in passages similar to 1 Kings 22:19, in which the prophet Micaiah stated that he saw the Lord sitting on His throne “and all the host of heaven standing by Him” (NASB). The people of Israel drew comparisons between their God and the gods of Canaan and Babylonia. Yahweh came to be understood as a king who presided over a heavenly council, composed of angelic servants, sometimes called “sons of God.” This concept is reflected in the first two chapters of Job. See Angels; Council, Heavenly; Heaven; Sons of God. James Newell

HOTHAM (Hó' thám) Personal name meaning “seal” or “lock.” 1. Member of tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:32). 2. Father of two warriors in David's army (1 Chron. 11:44; KJV, Hothan). Their home was Aroer.

HOTHIR (Hó' thîr) Personal name meaning “he caused to be a remnant.” Priestly musician in the clan of Heman under David (1 Chron. 25:4). He led the twenty-first course of Levites (1 Chron. 25:28).

HOUGH KJV term meaning “hamstring” (Josh. 11:6,9; 2 Sam. 8:4; 1 Chron. 18:4). See Hamstring.

HOUR Appointed time for meeting or for religious festival, a brief moment of time, one twelfth of the day or of the night, and in the Gospel of John the significant period of Jesus' saving mission on earth from His triumphal entry until His death and resurrection.

Biblical Hebrew has no word for “hour,” only an expression for an appointed meeting time (1 Sam. 9:24 RSV). The NT term hora can refer to a general time of day, a “late hour” (Matt. 14:15 NRSV), to a brief moment of time (Rev. 18:17; cp. John 5:35), or to the time of an expected momentous event (Matt. 8:13; Mark 13:11). It also designates a period of time, somewhat flexible in duration, one twelfth of the daylight hours and one-twelfth of the night, a day being divided into the two periods (or watches) of light and darkness beginning at sunrise, making the sixth hour (Matt. 27:45) noon.

Jesus' hour is a central theme in John's Gospel, creating an emotional uncertainty and expectancy and a theological understanding of the central importance of Jesus' death and resurrection. In John's Gospel, “hour” usually refers to the period from the triumphant entry (12:23) until the climactic death and resurrection.

The Johannine theme of Jesus' “hour” makes a significant theological contribution to the Gospel. As the reader encounters this motif repeatedly, a perspective on Jesus' death develops that is quite different from that gained in the other Gospels. Without trivializing the reality of Jesus' suffering and death, the Gospel of John presents that event as the “hour” of Jesus' “glory,” the time of His “exaltation (lifting up).” Jesus' death is the means by which eternal life is provided for the world (3:14-15; 6:51-53). From that hour on, human distinctions no longer apply (4:21-24; 11:51-53; 12:20-23). The glory of Jesus' death is found both in what it enabled him to offer the world (6:51-53; 7:37-39) and in its being the means by which He returned to the Father (13:1). The accounts of the empty tomb and the appearances of the risen Jesus in 20:1-21:23 serve to underscore the glory of His “hour.” See Glory; John, Gospel of; Time.

HOUSE Place where people live, usually in extended family units that can then be called a house. Abraham left Mesopotamia where he lived in houses made of mud brick (cp. Gen. 11:3) and became a tent dweller (Heb. 11:9). Tents were made of goat hair and were suitable to nomadic life. His descendants apparently lived in tents until the time of Joshua, when they captured Canaan and began to build houses like the Canaanites. In the lowlands of the Jordan Valley, the houses were built of mud brick because stone was not readily available. This type of construction may still be seen in the refugee camps of modern Jericho. In the hill country fieldstones were used. Although slight differences existed in house construction over centuries of time, those that have been excavated manifest a similar style. The homes of the poor were small and modest, consisting of one to four rooms, usually, and almost always including a courtyard on the east of the house so that the prevailing westerly winds would blow the smoke away from the house. In this courtyard the family carried on most of its activity. Food was prepared here in an oven built of clay. Storage jars were kept here, and animals were often housed here. However, the house only met the essential needs of family life such as shelter, a place to prepare food, make clothing and pottery, care for animals, and such. Social life was normally conducted at the community well or spring, the city gate, the marketplace, or in the fields at work. Because of the heat in summer and the cold in the winter, houses were built with few, if any, windows. This also provided more protection from intruders, but it meant that the houses were dark and uninviting. The only escape from the dim, cramped interior of the house was the courtyard and especially the flat roof. Here, the women of the house could do many of their daily chores—the washing, weaving, drying of figs and dates, and even the cooking. It was a wonderful place to enjoy the cool breezes in the heat of the day and to sleep in the summer (Acts 10:9; cp. 2 Kings 4:10). The roof was supported by beams laid across the tops of narrow rooms, which were then covered by brush and mud packed to a firm and smooth surface. The paralytic at Capernaum was let down to Jesus through a hole “dug out” of such a roof (Mark 2:4; it was covered with clay tiles—Luke 5:19). In the time of Moses, the Israelites were required to build a banister around the roof to prevent one from falling off (Deut. 22:8).

Cutaway of a first-century A.D. house in Israel.

Reconstruction of an eighth-century B.C. Israelite house showing rooms for sleeping on straw mats and for storage. The outer courtyard was used for food preparation, cooking, and to house small animals. Construction of houses did not change much over the centuries until the NT period. So, this was a typical pattern for the average home of the OT period.

Unlike the poor, wealthy families built larger houses that sometimes utilized cut stone. They furnished them with chairs, tables, and couches that could double as beds. The poor had neither the space or the money for furniture. They ate and slept on floor mats that could be rolled out for that purpose. Most floors consisted of beaten earth, although some were made of mud and lime plaster and occasionally even limestone slabs. The wealthy in the time of the NT were able to cover their floors with beautiful mosaics and adorn their plastered walls with lovely frescoes. By this time, many of the better homes, under Roman influence, included atria, which added to the concept of outdoor living already experienced in the courtyards and on the roofs. There is evidence that two-story houses were built throughout biblical times, the upper floor being reached by outside stairs or ladders. See Architecture.

HOUSE OF THE ROLLS Place mentioned in Ezra 6:1 where records of the king's decrees and actions were kept. The archives were kept sometimes in the royal treasury (Ezra 5:17) or perhaps in the temple. Jeremiah's scroll (Jer. 36:20-26) and the scroll of the law (2 Kings 22:8-9) were probably kept in such an archive. The records pertaining to the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel were probably also kept in archives of this kind. Genealogical records may have been stored in the archives (Ezra 4:15).

HUKKOK (Häk' kök) or HUKOK (Hü' kök) Place-name meaning “hewn out.” 1. Town on border of tribal allotment of Naphtali between Mount Tabor and the border of Zebulun. It has traditionally been located at Yacqu northwest of the sea of Chinnereth, but that may be too far east. Recent proposals look at Khirbet el-Jemeija, two miles west of Sakhmin (Josh. 19:34). 2. The same Hebrew word names a Levitical city in the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 6:75), but the parallel passage (Josh. 21:31) reads “Helkath.” See Helkath.

HUL (Hül) Personal name meaning “ring.” A son of Aram, son of Shem, and grandson of Noah in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:23), thus the original ancestor of an Aramean or Syrian tribe. As often in genealogy lists, 1 Chron. 1:17 omits the father Shem to emphasize the kinship with Aram.

HULDAH (Hül' dah) Personal name meaning “mole.” Prophetess, the wife of Shallum (2 Kings 22:14). She was consulted after Josiah the king of Judah saw a copy of the book of the law that was found as preparations were being made to restore the temple. She prophesied judgment for the nation but a peaceful death for Josiah the king. See Josiah.

HUMAN SACRIFICE Ritual slaying of one or more human beings to please a god. This was widely practiced by many cultures in antiquity. Although the frequency of the practice is difficult to determine, the fact is that such rituals were performed for various reasons. For example, both Egyptians and Sumerians before 2000 B.C. killed servants and possibly family members to bury them with deceased kings to allow those who had served or been near the official in life to accompany him to the realm of the dead. In Mesopotamia, and perhaps elsewhere, the remains of animals and humans offered as sacrifice were deposited within foundations to protect the building from evil powers, a practice possibly reflected in 1 Kings 16:34.

In the OT, Jephthah sacrificed his daughter as a fulfillment of a vow, although the incident is clearly not normative (Judg. 11:30-40). In the ninth century Mesha, king of Moab, offered his own son as a burnt offering presumably to Chemosh, national god of Moab, upon the walls of his capital while under siege by Israel and Judah (2 Kings 3:27). The event was so shocking that the siege was terminated. However, although Israelite law specifically forbade human sacrifice (Lev. 18:21; 20:2-5), persistent references to the practice occur, especially between 800 and 500 B.C. Both Ahaz and Manasseh burned their sons as an offering in times of national peril (2 Kings 16:3; 21:6). The sacrifices were made in the valley of Hinnom that protected Jerusalem from the west and south. A portion of the valley bore the name Topheth, a name derived from the word for fireplace or hearth. Apparently Topheth was an open-air cultic area where Molech sacrifices were offered. The term Molech occurs frequently in connection with human sacrifice. In the Bible and elsewhere Molech apparently was used in two ways: as the name or title of a god to whom sacrifice was made (1 Kings 11:7) and as a specific type of sacrifice which involved the total consummation of a person, usually a child, by fire. Both usages of the term may be reflected in the OT. Both Jeremiah and Ezekiel condemn such offerings as an abomination to God (Jer. 7:31-32; 19:5-6; Ezek. 16:20-21; 20:31). Josiah defiled Topheth as a part of his reformation so that “no one might burn his son or his daughter as an offering to Molech” (2 Kings 23:10 RSV).

These practices, foreign to the worship of Yahweh, must have been adopted by Israel from the surrounding peoples. Direct evidence for human sacrifice during the first millennium B.C. comes from two cultures with which Israel had contact: the Phoenician colony of Carthage and the Arameans. The Carthaginians sacrificed children to Kronos during periods of calamity caused by war, famine, or disease. Pits filled with bones of animals and children have been excavated at Carthage with inscribed stones indicating these were Molech sacrifices. The Arameans of Gozan in northwest Mesopotamia sacrificed humans to the god Hadad. Interestingly, the Sepharvites, a people from an area dominated by Arameans deported to Palestine in 721 B.C. by Sargon II, burned their children as offerings to Adrammelech and Anammelech (2 Kings 17:31). Yet the abomination of human sacrifice, stated Jeremiah, never entered the mind of Yahweh (Jer. 19:5). See Molech.

HUMAN SOUL See Soul.

HUMANITY Collective designation for all creatures who are made in the image of God, by which they are distinguished from all other creatures and from God Himself.

Humanity as Created by God Genesis 1-2 is foundational for understanding humanity as created by God. Humankind was created directly by God (Gen. 1:26) and did not evolve from lower forms of life. Empirical evidence favors the sudden appearance of full humanity, which is consistent with Scripture.

Man was also created in the image of God. The meaning of the image has been debated throughout Christian history. Some have equated it with reason and others with relationships, but neither of these is adequate. The biblical references fall into two groups. First, there are direct references to man's creation in God's image (Gen. 1:26-31; 9:6; James 3:9). God created humanity in His image for man to be God's representative, and He gave man dominion over creation (Ps. 8:3-8). The image of God is the foundation of the sanctity of human life (Gen. 9:6). Because man is God's representative, murder is an attack upon God. The image also means ownership (Mark 12:13-17). Humanity, being “stamped” with God's image, is God's special possession. Second, biblical references to the image relate it to the transformation of character which accompanies salvation (Rom. 8:29; 1 Cor. 15:49; 2 Cor. 3:18; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10). These stress the believer's increasing conformity to the character of Jesus Christ, especially in holiness and righteousness.

God also created humanity male and female. Both bear the image of God (Gen. 1:27) and have equal standing before God. God's creation of humanity as male and female is the foundation of the biblical teaching concerning marriage, divorce, the family, and homosexuality (Gen. 2:18-25; Matt. 19:3-6; Rom. 1:26-27).

Man was also created by God as body and soul (Gen. 2:7). Man has a material part suited to life in this world and an eternal, immaterial part that survives physical death (2 Cor. 5:1-8). Some suggest that man's immaterial part may be further divided into soul and spirit. The Bible emphasizes man as a whole person more than as a composition of individual parts. The terms for “soul” and “spirit” are often used interchangeably in Scripture, and it is difficult to construct a biblical argument for a strong distinction between soul and spirit.

Humanity under Sin The sin of the first couple caused a profound change in humanity and humanity's relationship with God (Rom. 5:12). The image of God remained, but it is marred and distorted. Humanity continued to procreate as male and female, though relationships with others were deeply and immediately affected by sin (Gen. 4). Man remained body and soul, but his inmost being was particularly impacted by sin. Man's heart, the core of his being, is sinful (Gen. 6:5; Jer. 17:9; Mark 7:20-23), and his mind is darkened (Eph. 4:17-19). Man's will is in bondage to sin (Rom. 3:10-11; 2 Tim. 2:25-26), his conscience is defiled (Titus 1:15), and his desires are twisted (Eph. 2:3; Titus 3:3). Simply put, humanity is universally dead in sin (Eph. 2:1), in a state of hostility toward God (Rom. 5:10), and subject to physical death followed by eternal judgment (Rom. 5:12-21; 8:10; Heb. 9:27; Rom. 14:12).

Redeemed Humanity God in His grace did not leave humanity to perish eternally but provided for redemption. Humanity's participation in salvation begins at the individual level, when one places conscious faith in Jesus Christ. Saving faith includes a recognition of who Jesus is (fully divine and human Son of God), trust in the merits of His atoning death, and submission of the will to Him. This is all made possible by God who, according to His eternal and gracious purpose, enables sinful humanity to believe (Eph. 2:4-9; 1 Tim. 1:14; Titus 3:5).

Differences of opinion exist regarding the nature of saved humanity. Some see two natures of totally opposite moral orientation, one utterly sinful, the other perfect (identified by some with the Holy Spirit), at work in the believer. Some who adhere to a strong distinction between soul and spirit identify the sinful nature with the soul and the perfect nature with the spirit. Paul described the believer as a new, though imperfect, creature (2 Cor. 5:17) indwelt by the Spirit of God (Rom. 8:9-17), involved in a gradual process of transformation (Rom. 8:12-13; 2 Cor. 3:18; Col. 3:10), and in conflict with his flesh (sinful nature) and the law of sin (Rom. 7:14-8:8).

Humanity's participation in salvation will be consummated at the end of the age with resurrection and entry into the eternal state (1 Cor. 15:50-57). Scripture emphasizes the perfect conformity of the believer to Christ (1 John 3:2), his eternal fellowship with God (John 14:2-3), and the joyful, worshipful assembly of all the redeemed (Rev. 7:9). This, of course, does not include all of humanity. Those who do not believe in Jesus Christ will spend an eternity suffering the just wrath of God (John 3:36; 2 Thess. 1:9). HUMANITY OF CHRIST See Christ, Christology; Incarnation; Jesus, Life and Ministry.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST See Jesus, Death and Resurrection; Kenosis.

HUMILITY The personal quality of being free from arrogance and pride and having an accurate estimate of one's worth.

Old Testament The OT connects the quality of humility with Israel's lowly experience as slaves in Egypt—a poor, afflicted, and suffering people (Deut. 26:6). The Hebrew word translated as humility is similar to another Hebrew word meaning “to be afflicted.” In OT thought, humility was closely associated with individuals who were poor and afflicted (2 Sam. 22:28).

What God desires most is not outward sacrifices but a humble spirit (Ps. 51:17; Mic. 6:8). Such a humble spirit shows itself in several ways: a recognition of one's sinfulness before a holy God (Isa. 6:5), obedience to God (Deut. 8:2), and submission to God (2 Kings 22:19; 2 Chron. 34:27).

The OT promised blessings to those who were humble: wisdom (Prov. 11:2), good tidings (Isa. 61:1), and honor (Prov. 15:33).

The experience of many kings indicated that those who humble themselves before God will be exalted (1 Kings 21:29; 2 Kings 22:19; 2 Chron. 32:26; 33:12-19). Those who do not humble themselves before God will be afflicted (2 Chron. 33:23; 36:12). The pathway to revival is the way of humility (2 Chron. 7:14).

New Testament Jesus Christ's life provides the best example of what it means to have humility (Matt. 11:29; 1 Cor. 4:21; Phil. 2:1-11). Jesus preached and taught often about the need for humility (Matt. 23:12; Mark 9:35; Luke 14:11; 18:14). He urged those who desired to live by kingdom standards to practice humility (Matt. 18:1; 23:12).

The person with humility does not look down on others (Matt. 18:4; Luke 14:11). Humility in the NT is closely connected with the quality of gentleness (Matt. 5:5). While God resists those who are proud, He provides grace for the humble (James 4:6). Primary in the NT is the conviction that one who has humility will not be overly concerned about his or her prestige (Matt. 18:4; 23:12; Rom. 12:16; 2 Cor 11:7).

Paul believed that quality relationships with other people, especially those who had erred spiritually, hinged on the presence of gentleness or humility (1 Cor. 4:21; Gal. 6:1; 2 Tim. 2:25). The NT affirms, as does the OT, that God will exalt those who are humble and bring low those who are proud (Luke 1:52; James 4:10; 1 Pet. 5:6). The Greek world abhorred the quality of gentleness or humility, but the Christian community believed these qualities were worthy (2 Cor. 10:18; Col. 3:12; Eph. 4:2).

HUMP Fleishy mound on the back of a camel where food is stored in the form of fat. Isaiah 30:6 refers to burdens carried on camels' humps (KJV, bunches). See Camel.

HUMTAH (Hüm' tah) Place-name meaning “lizards.” Town in hill country of Judah in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:54). Its exact location is not known.

HUNCHBACK One with a humped (curved or crooked) back. According to the Holiness Code, a hunchback was excluded from priestly service though allowed to eat the priests' holy food (Lev. 21:20). REB translates the unique Hebrew term, “misshapen brows.”

HUNDRED, TOWER OF THE (KJV “Tower of Meah”) Tower located on the north wall of Jerusalem that was restored by Nehemiah (Neh. 3:1; 12:39). The name perhaps refers to the height of the tower (100 cubits), the number of its steps, or the number of troops in its garrison. It may have been part of the temple fortress (Neh. 2:8).

HUNDREDWEIGHT Unit of weight equal to 100 pounds (Rev. 16:21 REB, RSV). The underlying Greek means “about the weight of a talent” (KJV). Most modern translations equate the talent with 100 pounds (NASB, NIV, NRSV, TEV).

HUNGER Strong need or desire for food. Scripture contains haunting pictures of hunger. Isaiah 29:8 uses the image of a hungry person dreaming of eating only to awake hungry again. In Lam. 4:9 those who fell by the sword are reckoned better off than those pierced by hunger. Hunger frequently takes on a theological significance. Exodus 16:3 recounts Israel's complaint that Moses led them from Egypt to kill them with hunger in the desert. God used this experience of hunger to humble the rebellious people and to teach them to hunger for His word (Deut. 8:3). Hunger was one penalty of disobedience of covenant obligations (Deut. 28:48; 32:24).

The cessation of hunger is frequently associated with God's salvation. Hannah anticipated God's reversing the fortunes of the hungry (1 Sam. 2:5; cp. Luke 6:21,25). Isaiah promised that those returning from exile would not be plagued by hunger (49:10). Ezekiel pictured God as providing for the needs of God's sheep so there would be no hunger (34:29). Part of the blessedness of the redeemed of Rev. 7:16 is the end of their hunger.

In Matt. 5:6 Jesus spoke of those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, that is, those who earnestly desire to see God's will become a reality. In John 6:35 Jesus promised that anyone who came to Him would not hunger but would be satisfied.

HUNT, HUNTER To pursue game for food or pleasure. Hunting was an important supplementary food source, especially in the seminomadic stage of civilization. Genesis mentions several hunters by name, none of whom are Israelite ancestors (Nimrod, 10:9; Ishmael, 21:20; Esau, 25:27), perhaps suggesting that hunting was more characteristic of Israel's neighbors than of Israel. Hunting was, however, regulated by Mosaic law. The blood of captured game was to be poured out on the ground (Lev. 17:13). Deuteronomy 14:3-5 outlines what game was permitted as ritually clean food.

The tools of the hunter include bows and arrows (Gen. 21:20; 27:3), nets (Job 18:8; Ezek. 12:13), snares or pitfalls (Job 18:8), if the term does not refer to part of the net (NASB, NIV, REB); traps, snares, ropes (Job 18:9-10). Terror, the pit, and the trap of Isa. 24:17-18 (Jer. 48:43-44) perhaps allude to the Battue method of hunting whereby a group forms a cordon and beats over the earth, driving game into a confined area, pit, or net. Ancient Egyptian carvings depict such methods of hunting.

Hunting for pleasure was a popular pastime of ancient kings. The hunt is a popular motif in the art of the Assyrians, Egyptians, and Phoenicians. The Assyrian reliefs depicting Ashurbanipal's lion hunt are particularly well-known. The OT does not mention hunting as a pastime of the kings of Israel or Judah. Josephus did note Herod's love of the hunt.

Most often the hunt is used figuratively. A rare positive image is Jeremiah's picture of God's hunting the scattered exiles to return them to Israel (Jer. 16:16). Saul hunted David (1 Sam. 24:11). Matthew described the Pharisees' plotting "to entrap" Jesus (22:15), Luke their "lying in wait" for Him (11:54). The Pastorals speak of the devil's snare (1 Tim. 3:7; 2 Tim. 2:26). Ezekiel 13:17-23 pictures women practicing magical arts as fowlers ensnaring the people. In Mic. 7:2 the unfaithful are portrayed as hunting each other with nets. The warning of Prov. 6:5 is to save oneself (from evil) like the gazelle or roe flees the hunter.

HUPHAM (Hū' phām) Original ancestor of clan of Benjamin in the wilderness (Num. 26:39). Hupham may be the original reading behind Huppim in Gen. 46:21 and 1 Chron. 7:12,15. Comparison of Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38; 1 Chron. 7:6; 8:1-2 shows the difficulty in restoring precisely the names of Benjamin's sons. Similarly, the sons of Bela, Benjamin's son, are difficult to restore (Num. 26:39-40; 1 Chron. 7:7; 8:3-4). Part of the explanation may lie in the use of genealogies to claim membership in an important clan rather than to precisely reproduce family structures.

HUPHAMITE (Hū' phām it) Member of clan of Hupham in tribe of Benjamin.

HUPPAH (Hūp' pah) Personal name meaning “shelter” or “roof” or “bridal chamber.” Leader of thirteenth course of priests under David (1 Chron. 24:13).

HUPPIM (Hūp' pīm) Personal name of unknown meaning. Son of Benjamin and grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:21). See Hupham.

HUR (Hūr) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “white one” or “Horite” or perhaps derived from the name of the Egyptian god “Horus.” 1. Israelite leader who accompanied Moses and Aaron to the top of the mountain in the fight against the Amalekites. Hur helped Aaron hold Moses' hands up so Israel could prevail. In some way not explicitly stated, Moses' hands were the symbol of and instrument for God's power with Israel's army (Exod. 17:10-12). Hur and Aaron also represented Moses and settled any problems among the people while Moses ascended the mountain to receive God's instructions (Exod. 24:14). This same Hur was probably the grandfather of Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah, who was the artisan in charge of making the metal works for the tabernacle in the wilderness (Exod. 31:2). He was Caleb's son (1 Chron. 2:19). A genealogy of Hur appears both in 1 Chron. 2:50 and 4:1. The text is difficult to decipher at times. Apparently, like the Table of Nations in Gen. 10, these texts show geographical and political relationships of the descendants of Caleb. 2. King of Midian whom Israel slew as they moved toward the promised land (Num. 31:8). Joshua 13:21 identifies the kings of Midian as vassals of Sihon (Num. 31). 3. District governor under Solomon over Mount Ephraim in charge of providing the royal table with provisions one month a year (1 Kings 4:8). His name may also be translated Ben-hur. 4. Administrator over half the district of Jerusalem under Nehemiah or father of the administrator (Neh. 3:9).

HURAI (Hû' rā ī) Variant reading in 1 Chron. 11:32 for David's warrior Hiddai in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:30).

HURAM (Hû' rām) Personal name probably shortened from Ahuram meaning “exalted brother.” 1. Chronicler's spelling of Hiram, king of Tyre (2 Chron. 2). Also the Chronicler's form for Hiram, the artisan King Hiram sent to help with the metal work on the temple (2 Chron. 2:13). See Hiram. 2. Descendant of Benjamin, often identified with Hupham of Num. 26:39. See Hupham.

HURAMABI (Hû rām a' bī) Personal name, perhaps meaning “my father is an exalted brother.” NASB, NIV, NRSV name for Hiram/Hiram, the skilled artisan that Hiram, king of Tyre, sent to Solomon to help build the temple (2 Chron. 2:13). See Hiram.

HURI (Hû' rī) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “white one,” “linen maker,” “Horite,” or “my Horus” (Egyptian god). A member of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:14).

HURRIANS See Horim or Horites.

HUSBAND Male partner in a marriage. See Family; Marriage.

HUSBANDMAN KJV term for one who tills the soil; a farmer. Husbandry refers to farming. Modern translations replace husbandman and husbandry with other terms. The substitutions of the RSV are typical: plowman (Isa. 61:5); farmer (2 Chron. 26:10; Jer. 14:4; 31:24; 51:23; Amos 5:16); tiller of the soil (Gen. 9:20; Joel 1:11). The KJV's “ye are God's husbandry” was rendered with “you are God's field.” See Agriculture; Occupations and Professions.

HUSHAH (Hu' sha) Personal name and place-name meaning “hurry.” Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:4) listed along with Bethlehem and thus probably original ancestor of clan who lived in town of Hushah, perhaps modern Husan near Bethlehem. Some Bible students think that in the copying process the name was changed from an original Shuah (1 Chron. 4:11) through transposition of Hebrew letters. Two of David's soldiers came from Hushah: Sibbechai (2 Sam. 21:18) and Mebunnai (2 Sam. 23:27).

HUSHAI (Hu' shi) Personal name meaning “quick,” “from Hushah,” or “gift of brotherhood.” The name could represent copying transposition from an original Shuah. This would designate his family as from Shuhu, the Syrian state in the central Euphrates region or a state in Edom or Arabia. The clan became a part of Israel as a clan of the tribe of Benjamin living in Archi southwest of Bethel (Josh. 16:2). Hushai was “David's friend” (2 Sam. 15:37), probably referring to an official government post as in Egypt, a close personal adviser somewhat like the secretary of state. As David escaped, leaving Jerusalem to his son Absalom, Hushai joined him, mourning (2 Sam. 15:32). David sent him back to deceive Absalom (2 Sam. 15:34; 16:16-19). His counsel to Absalom bought time for David to establish new headquarters and gather forces for new strategy (2 Sam. 17).

Solomon's commissioner in charge of collecting royal provisions in Asher was the son of Hushai, perhaps the same as “David's friend” (1 Kings 4:16). See Hushah.

HUSHAM (Hu' shām) Personal name, perhaps meaning “large-nosed” or “with haste.” One of the early kings of Edom (Gen. 36:34) from Teman.

HUSHATHITE (Hu' shāthīt) Citizen of Hushah. See Hushah.

HUSHIM (Hu' shīm) Personal name meaning “hurried ones.” 1. Son of Dan and grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:23). 2. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:12), though many Bible students think copying has caused omission of tribe of Dan in the list, Hushim here being the same as in Gen.

46:23. Dan's son is named Shuham in Num. 26:42, perhaps resulting from a copying transposition of Hebrew letters. 3. Wife of Shaharaim of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:8) and mother of Abitub and Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:11). Apparently, her husband sent her away either for safety or as part of family problems before he went to Moab.

HUSHITES (Hū' shīts) NIV translation of Hushim (1 Chron. 7:12), interpreting it as the name of a population group rather than as an individual.

HUSK Outer covering of a seed or fruit, usually either dry (as the carob) or membranous (as the grape) (Num. 6:4; 2 Kings 4:42; Luke 15:16). Modern translations replace husk with skins when referring to grapes (Num. 6:4). The term translated "husk" at 2 Kings 4:42 is a hapax legomena, a term used only once in Scripture. NASB, RSV follow the Latin Vulgate in rendering the term "sack." Other modern translations follow other ancient versions in omitting the term. Modern translations give "pods" or "bean pods" for husks at Luke 15:16. The pods of the Carob tree (Ceratonia siliqua) are probably intended (NASB margin). The ripe pods are full of dark, honeylike syrup. These are ground and used as an animal feed.

HUT Modern translations' rendering for a leanto or temporary shelter; shack (Isa. 1:8; 24:20). The image of Isa. 1:8 stresses the isolation of Jerusalem, the sole survivor of the cities of Judah (1:7-9). Isaiah 24:20 illustrates God's power in judgment in the picture of the earth's swaying like an unstable hut before the Lord.

HUZ (Hüz) (KJV, Gen. 22:21). See Uz.

HUZZAB (Hüz' zāb) KJV transliteration of the Hebrew word in the context of Nah. 2:7 is not clear. KJV takes it as a city-state. Other translators take the word as a Hebrew verb meaning "fixed" (NASB) or "decreed" (NRSV, NIV). Others see a feminine noun: "train" of captives (REB), "queen" (TEV), "its mistress" (RSV). The verbal translation is probably correct, pointing to God's established plan announced through the prophet to defeat Assyria and its capital Nineveh. Otherwise, the term is describing Nineveh in figurative language, perhaps referring to deportation of dressed-up idols defeated in war.

HYACINTH Stone regarded as precious in ancient times. The hyacinth is sometimes identified with the sapphire (Rev. 9:17 NRSV, TEV) or turquoise (Exod. 28:19; Rev. 9:17; 21:20 REB; Exod. 28:19; Rev. 21:20 TEV). Others identify the hyacinth with zircon, a brown to grayish gem, or essonite, a yellow to brown garnet.

HYENA Any of a group of stocky built, carnivorous mammals of the genus Hyaena, located zoologically between the felines and canines. It is a striped scavenger looking much like a fox.

Hyenas feed on carrion and are known for their cowardice, cruelty, and disagreeable cry. They appear mainly at night. Because of its scavenger activity of digging up graves, the hyena was a repulsive animal in the ancient world. They were easily tamed, and the Egyptians kept them as pets. All the scriptural references concern judgment on foreign nations (Babylon or Edom) which are left desolate (Isa. 13:22; 34:14; Jer. 50:39). KJV translated the term for hyena as “wild beasts of the islands.” The REB and NASB identify this animal with the jackal (Jer. 50:39). NASB uses wolves in Isa. 34:14.

The Hebrew term for hyena is used as a man's name (Zibeon, Gen. 36:20) and as the name for a town (Zeboim, Neh. 11:34) and valley (1 Sam. 13:18) in the territory of Benjamin.

HYKSOS [Hik' sōs] Racial name from the Greek form of an Egyptian word meaning “rulers of foreign lands” given to kings of the 15th and 16th Dynasties of Egypt. The word, which does not appear in the Bible, was later misinterpreted by Josephus as meaning “shepherd kings.”

With the decline of the Middle Kingdom of Egypt (about 2000-1786 B.C.) large numbers of Asiatics, mostly Semites like the Hebrew patriarchs, migrated into the Nile Delta of northern Egypt from Canaan. These probably came initially for reasons of economic distress, such as famine, as did Abraham (Gen. 12:10). Unlike Abraham, many groups stayed in Egypt as permanent settlers. Under the weak 13th Dynasty, some Asiatics established local independent chiefdoms in the eastern Delta region. Eventually, one of these local rulers managed to consolidate the rule of northern Egypt as pharaoh, thus beginning the 15th Dynasty. The 16th Dynasty, perhaps contemporary with the 15th, consisted of minor Asiatic kings. As these dynasties of pharaohs were not ethnic Egyptians, they were remembered by the native population as “Hyksos.”

While the Hyksos pharaohs ruled northern Egypt from Avaris in the eastern Delta, the native Egyptian 17th Dynasty ruled southern Egypt from Thebes. This period is known as the Second Intermediate or Hyksos Period (about 1786-1540 B.C.). The status quo was maintained until war erupted between the Hyksos and the last two pharaohs of the 17th Dynasty. About 1540 B.C. Ahmose I sacked Avaris and expelled the Hyksos. As the first pharaoh of a reunited Egypt, Ahmose I established the 18th Dynasty and inaugurated the Egyptian New Kingdom or Empire.

Hypostyle Hall in the Temple of Amun-Re at Thebes.

Some have noted that Joseph's rise to power as pharaoh's second-in-command (Gen. 41:39-45) would have been far more likely under a Hyksos king. Like Joseph's family, the Hyksos were Semitic, whereas the native Egyptians regarded Semites with contempt. The biblical account of Joseph's rise to power, however, shows that it was anything but likely. There are also indications of great cultural differences between Joseph's family and that of the Egyptian rulers at the time (cp. Gen. 41:14; 42:23; 43:32; 46:34). The new pharaoh “who had not known Joseph” (Exod. 1:8 HCSB) and began oppressing the Israelites may have been Ahmose I, who drove out the Hyksos. But it would more likely have been one of the new Hyksos rulers, whom Manetho the Egyptian priest later described as “burning towns, razing the temples, and treating the inhabitants with terrible cruelty, cutting men's throats and leading the women and children into captivity.”

HYMENAEUS (Hi' mē nē' ūs) or HYMENEUS (KJV) Personal name of the Greek god of marriage. Name of a fellow worker of Paul whose faith weakened and whose lifestyle changed, leading Paul to deliver him to Satan (1 Tim. 1:20). That probably means Paul led the church to dismiss Hymenaeus from the membership to purify the church, remove further temptation from the church, and to lead Hymenaeus to restored faith, repentance, and renewed church membership. Along with Philetus, Hymenaeus taught that the resurrection had already occurred (2 Tim. 2:17-18; cp. 1 Cor. 5). See Gnosticism.

HYMN A song of praise to God.

Old Testament Ceremonial religious singing is mentioned in the OT in connection with important events, such as the songs in celebration of the Hebrews' passage through the Red Sea (Exod. 15:1-21), Deborah and Barak's triumphal song after the defeat of the forces of Jabin, king of Hazor (Judg. 5:1-31), and the women's song at David's victorious return from battle with the Philistines (1 Sam. 18:6-7). Moses also gave the Israelites some of his last warnings in a great song (Deut. 32:1-43). The book of Psalms is a hymnbook. The hymns in it were written by different authors over a long period of time and used by the people of Israel in their worship. The collection of 150 psalms eventually was included in Hebrew Scripture. Hymn singing in the Jerusalem temple was led by trained choirs, sometimes using instrumental accompaniment (2 Chron. 29:25-28). The people joined the choir in singing hymns in unison, responsively, and antiphonally.

Hymn is also the technical term for a specific literary type of material in Psalms. In this sense a hymn expresses the congregation's praise of God's greatness and majesty, usually addressing members of the congregation and inviting them to praise God. A hymn usually includes a call to the congregation to join in praise (Ps. 33:1-3), a list of reasons to praise God (Ps. 33:4-19), and a concluding call to praise or statement of trust (Ps. 33:20-22).

New Testament Singing of spiritual songs was a part of the early Christian church. Among the songs in the NT are several outstanding songs that have become a part of liturgical Christian worship: Luke 1:46-55, Mary's song—the Magnificat; Luke 1:68-79, Zacharias's prophetic song—the Benedictus; and Luke 2:29-32, Simeon's blessing of the infant Jesus and farewell—the Nunc Dimittis. Numerous doxologies (e.g., Luke 2:14; 1 Tim. 1:17; 6:15-16; Rev. 4:8) doubtless were used in corporate worship. Other passages in the NT give evidence of being quotations of hymns or fragments of hymns (Rom. 8:31-39; 1 Cor. 13; Eph. 1:3-14; Eph. 5:14; Phil. 2:5-11; 1 Tim. 3:16; 2 Tim. 2:11-13; Tit. 3:4-7). As for references to the word itself, the NT states that Jesus and His disciples sang a hymn at the end of the Last Supper (Matt. 26:30; Mark 14:26). Most Bible students think they sang part of Pss. 115-118, hymns known as the “Hallel,” which traditionally were sung after supper on the night of Passover. The division of Christian song into psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs (Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16) should not be taken to mean that there were three distinct types or styles of vocal music in use in those days. The reference indicates that Christian song was used in worship, to instruct in the faith, and to express joy. In another NT reference, Acts 16:25, the mention of singing “praises” to God obviously means that Paul and Silas sang hymns in prison. The author of the book of Hebrews stressed in 2:12 (a quotation of the messianic Ps. 22:22) that Jesus will declare His name to the church, that He will “sing praise,” or hymns.

HYPOCRISY Pretense to being what one really is not, especially the pretense of being a better person than one really is. The word is based on the Greek hupokrisis, originally meaning to give an answer. A hypocrite in classical Greek could be an interpreter of dreams, an orator, a reciter of poetry, or an actor. Originally a neutral term, “hypocrite” gained the negative connotation of pretense, duplicity, or insincerity.

In the Bible the negative meaning prevails. Often hypocrisy refers to evil or sin in general, not pretense in particular. In the OT, “hypocrite” was used by the KJV whereas later translations (e.g., RSV, NIV) often use “godless” or “ungodly” (Job 8:13; 15:34-35; 17:8; Isa. 9:17; 33:14, etc.). This “godless” person was totally opposed to God or forgetful of God. The Hebrew word often translated “hypocrite” referred to pollution or corruption. Although the Hebrews were concerned about pretense or insincerity (Isa. 29:13; Jer. 12:2), there is no one Hebrew word exactly equivalent to “hypocrisy.”

Hypocrisy in the narrower sense of playing a role is highlighted in the NT, especially in the teaching of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels. Jesus criticized hypocrites for being pious in public (Matt. 6:2,5,16). They were more interested in human praise when they gave alms, prayed, and fasted than in God's reward. Hypocrites were also guilty of being judgmental of others' faults and ignoring their own (Matt. 7:1-5). Jesus often called the Pharisees hypocrites because of the conflict between their external actions and internal attitudes (Matt. 15:1-9). Their true attitudes would be revealed (Luke 12:1-3). The hypocrites could interpret the weather but not the signs of the times (Luke 12:56). They were more concerned about the rules for the Sabbath than a woman's physical health (Luke 13:15). Luke noted that the religious leaders pretended to be sincere when they asked Jesus about paying tribute to Caesar (Luke 20:20). Probably the most famous discussion of hypocrisy is Matt. 23. The religious leaders did not practice what they preached (Matt. 23:3). Jesus compared them to dishes that were clean on the outside and dirty on the inside and to whitewashed tombs (Matt. 23:25-28).

Hypocrisy is a concern throughout the NT. Although the term does not occur, it was part of the sin of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1-11). Paul accused Peter of hypocrisy for refusing to eat with Gentile Christians in Antioch (Gal. 2:12-13). Paul warned Timothy about hypocritical false teachers (1 Tim. 4:2). Peter included hypocrisy as one of the attitudes Christians should avoid (1 Pet. 2:1).

Six times NT writers stress that sincerity (without hypocrisy, anupokritos) should characterize the Christian. Christian love (Rom. 12:9; 2 Cor. 6:6; 1 Pet. 1:22), faith (1 Tim. 1:5; 2 Tim. 1:5), and wisdom (James 3:17) should be sincere. See Lie; Pharisees; Sin; Truth.

HYRAX Small mammal making its home in the rock cliffs (Ps. 104:18; Prov. 30:26 NIV, HCSB). See Coney; Rock Badger.

HYSSOP Small (about 27 inches), bushy plant, probably Origanum maru, the Syrian marjoram. Stalks of hyssop bear numerous, small, white flowers in bunches. Hyssop was thus well suited for use as a “brush” to dab the lintels of Israelite homes with the blood of the Passover lambs (Exod. 12:22). The associations of hyssop with the events of the exodus perhaps led to its use in other rites, the cleansing of lepers (Lev. 14:4,6,49,51-52) and the cleansing of those unclean from contact with a corpse (Num. 19:6,18; See Heifer). Psalm 51:7 applies the well-known image of hyssop to spiritual cleansing from sin.

A branch of hyssop bore the sponge used to offer vinegar to Christ at His crucifixion (John 19:29; Matt. 27:48; Mark 15:36 mention a reed). Various attempts to resolve this tension have been offered. Most exegetes have attempted to harmonize the parallel accounts: (1) by suggesting that Christ was offered vinegar twice, once using a reed and once hyssop; (2) by suggesting both a reed and hyssop were simultaneously used to support the sponge; (3) by emending John's text to read “spike” which is more easily harmonized with reed; (4) by taking hyssop to refer to a plant other than marjoram which could be described as a reed, such as Sorghum vulgare. An alternative approach is concerned primarily with the question of why (theological significance) rather than the details of what. These interpreters stress that John intends to link Jesus' death with the exodus event that marked liberation from Egyptian slavery and/or with the OT cleansing rituals involving hyssop. Hebrews 9:19 says the people were sprinkled with hyssop at the reading of the covenant. The account of Exod. 24:6-8 lacks this detail. See Plants.

I

I AM Shortened form of God's response to Moses' request for the name of the God of the patriarchs (Exod. 3:13-14). The fuller form of the name may be rendered "I am who I am," "I will be who I will be," or even "I cause to be what is." God's response is not a "name" that makes God an object of definition or limitation. Rather, it is an affirmation that God is always subject, always free to be and act as God wills. The earliest Greek rendering "I am the one who is" or "I am Being" has been especially significant in the development of theology.

Jesus' "I am" response in several NT passages suggests more than the simple identifying "I am he." The "I am" of Mark 6:50 means "I am Jesus and not a ghost," but suggests the divine "I am" who alone "tramples down the waves of the sea" (Job 9:8; Mark 6:48-49) and made the waves hush (Ps. 107:28-29; cp. Mark 4:39). John 8:24 makes recognition that Jesus is the "I am" a matter of eternal life and death: "If you do not believe that I am He, you will die in your sins" (HCSB). The Jews misunderstood, thinking it was a matter of identity ("Who are You?" 8:25). That the Jews rightly understood Jesus' claim "Before Abraham was, I am" (8:58) as a divine claim is evident from their picking up stones to throw at Him. The "I am" of John 18:5 again suggests more than "I am the man you are looking for." Rather, Jesus is the "I am" whose awesome presence forced the guard back and into a posture of reverence. Here Jesus was not the object of betrayal but the subject who won the release of His disciples (18:8). Though differing in form from the "I am" sayings, the references to the one "who is, who was, and who is coming" (Rev. 1:4,8 HCSB; 4:8; cp. 11:17; 16:5) are similar in thought. In a context of intense hardship that called into question God's sovereignty, the writer of Revelation reaffirmed Israel's faith in the "I am" who is the subject of history and not its victim. IBEX Species of wild goat with large curved horns, native to high mountain areas. The ibex has been identified as the wild goat of the Bible (1 Sam. 24:2; Ps. 104:18). The Nubian ibex is found today in the area of Engedi, an oasis near the Dead Sea. The ibex is included among clean game (Deut. 14:5). KJV's "pygarg" is a white-rumped antelope (cp. "white-rumped deer" REB). The precise identity of the animal (whether goat or antelope) is uncertain. See Goat.

A vase handle in the shape of a beautiful winged ibex.

IBHAR (ib' hār) Personal name meaning "he elected." Son born to David after he moved to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15).

IBLEAM (יְבֵאֵם) Place-name meaning “he swallowed the people.” City in tribal territory of Issachar but given to tribe of Manasseh (Josh. 17:11). Many Bible students think Ibleam was the original reading for the Levite city in Josh. 21:25, where the Hebrew text now reads “Gathrimmon,” also read in verse 24. A copyist may have copied the name from verse 24 into verse 25. Some Greek manuscripts read Iebatha, perhaps a corruption of Ibleam. First Chronicles 6:70 reads Bileam, pointing to Ibleam as original. Other Greek manuscripts read “Beth-shean.” Manasseh could not conquer Ibleam (Judg. 1:27). Jehu, in his coup against Jehoram, king of Israel, also mortally wounded Ahaziah, king of Judah, near Ibleam (2 Kings 9:27). Many Bible students also read “Ibleam” as the place of attack in 2 Kings 15:10 (REB, TEV, RSV, but not NRSV). The Hebrew text either uses an Aramaic pronoun otherwise unknown in Hebrew meaning “before,” or it refers to a place Kabal-am otherwise unknown. Some Greek manuscripts read “Ibleam.” Normal text procedure would see Ibleam as the easier reading adopted in view of 2 Kings 9:27 by a copyist or translator who did not understand the Hebrew text. Ibleam is modern bir Belalmeh about a mile southwest of Jenin.

IBNEIAH (יְבֵנִיָּהּ) Personal name meaning “Yah builds.” Benjaminite who returned from exile and settled in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:8).

IBNIJAH (יְבֵנִיָּהּ) Personal name meaning “Yah builds,” a variant spelling of Ibneiah. Ancestor in tribe of Benjamin of one of persons returning from exile and living in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:8).

IBRI (יְבֵרִי) Personal name meaning “Hebrew.” A Levite under King David (1 Chron. 24:27). See Habiru.

IBSAM (יְבֵסָם) Personal name akin to balsam, meaning “sweet smelling” in modern translations. KJV spelling is Jibsam. Member of tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2).

IBZAN (יְבֵזָן) Personal name, perhaps meaning “quick, agile.” Judge of Israel from Bethlehem who participated in royal practice of marrying children to foreigners (Judg. 12:8-10).

ICE Frozen water. Job's poetry has several references to ice. Ice is described as hard as stone (Job 38:30). In picturesque language, ice is frozen by the “breath of God” (37:10). In an even bolder image, the Lord demanded to know “from whose womb has come the ice? And the frost of heaven, who has given it birth?” (38:29 NASB). Though lacking the knowledge of a meteorologist, the biblical writer saw clearly with wondering eyes that God was the ultimate source of weather phenomena. The Hebrew term translated “ice” is sometimes rendered “cold” or “frost” (Gen. 31:40; Jer. 36:30).

ICHABOD (ĭk' ə bōd) Personal name meaning “where is the glory?” The son of Phinehas, Eli's son (1 Sam. 4:21). His birth seems to have been precipitated by the news of the death of his father and the capture of the ark of the covenant in battle against the Philistines. The mother of Ichabod died immediately after the child's birth. See Eli.

ICONIUM (ĭ cō' nī ūm) City of Asia Minor visited by Barnabas and Paul during the first missionary journey (Acts 13:51). Paul endured sufferings and persecution at Iconium (2 Tim. 3:11). Its location is that of the modern Turkish provincial capital Konya. Iconium was mentioned for the first time in the fourth century B.C. by the historian Xenophon. In NT times it was considered to be a part of the Roman province of Galatia. Evidently it has had a continuous existence since its founding. See Asia Minor, Cities of.

IDALAH (ĭd' ə la) Place-name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “jackal” or “memorial.” Town in tribal territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15), probably modern Khirbet el-Hawarah south of Bethlehem in Zebulun, not to be confused with the more famous Bethlehem in Judah.

IDBASH (ĭd' bāsh) Personal name meaning “sweet as honey.” Son of Etam in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:3), according to modern translations and earliest Greek translation. KJV follows Hebrew text in reading father rather than son of Etam.

IDDO (ĭd' dō) English spelling of four different Hebrew personal names. 1. Name of uncertain meaning. Person with authority in the exilic community during the Persian period to whom Ezra sent messengers to secure Levites to join him in the return to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:17). He apparently sent the needed Levites (vv. 19-20). 2. Personal name, perhaps meaning “his praise.” Leader of the eastern half of the tribe of Manasseh under David (1 Chron. 27:21). The written Hebrew text uses this name in Ezra 10:43 for a man with a foreign wife, but an early scribal note followed by English translations read Jadau. 3. Name, perhaps meaning “Yahweh adorns Himself.” A prophet whose records the chronicler refers to for more information about Solomon and Jeroboam (2 Chron. 9:29), Rehoboam (2 Chron. 12:15), and Abijah (2 Chron. 13:22). The latter indicates he wrote a midrash, which may indicate a Jewish exposition of Scripture. As early as Josephus, Iddo had been identified with the nameless prophet who spoke against the altar of Bethel in 1 Kings 13. The Hebrew texts spell his name in different ways in the different occurrences. 4. Grandfather of Zechariah, the prophet (Zech. 1:1,7 with different Hebrew spellings). Ezra 5:1; 6:14 put Zechariah as Iddo's son, using “son” to mean descendant, as often in Hebrew. He is included among the priestly families in the early postexilic community (Neh. 12:4,16). 5. Father of Solomon's district supervisor who supplied the royal court provisions for one month a year in the area of Mahanaim (1 Kings 4:14). 6. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:21).

IDLE Not engaged in earning a living; depending on the labor and generosity of others for support. Scripture distinguishes between those unwilling to work who should not eat (2 Thess. 3:10) and those unable to earn a living (e.g., “true” widows, 1 Tim. 5:9) for whom the community of faith is responsible. Hebrew wisdom literature frequently condemned idleness as the cause of hunger (Prov. 19:15), poverty (Prov. 10:4; 14:23), and inadequate housing (Eccles. 10:18). According to Hebrew wisdom, the ideal woman “is never idle” (Prov. 31:27 HCSB) but is an industrious, working woman who helps provide for the financial needs of her family (Prov. 31:16,24). In the NT, Paul called attention to his own example as a bivocational minister to encourage the Thessalonian Christians to be hard workers (2 Thess. 3:7-8). Though Scripture consistently condemns “willful” idleness, it is also aware of economic realities in which some who are willing workers stand idle because no one has hired them (Matt. 20:6-7). The biblical witness likewise does not trace all poverty to idleness. Some poverty results from the rich refusing to pay their poor day laborers (Lev. 19:13; Jer. 22:13; James 5:4).

IDOL Physical or material image or form representing a reality or being considered divine and thus an object of worship. In the Bible various terms are used to refer to idols or idolatry: “image,” either graven (carved) or cast, “statue,” “abomination.” Both Testaments condemn idols, but with idols the OT expresses more concern than the NT, probably reflecting the fact that the threat of idolatry was more pronounced for the people of the OT.

The ancient Hebrews lived in a world filled with idols. Egyptians represented their deities in various human-animal forms. Similarly, the various Mesopotamian cultures used idol representations of their deities, as did the Hittites in ancient Asia Minor. More of a threat to Hebrew worship were the Canaanite Baal and Asherah fertility images, some of which are commonly found in excavations. Use of idols in worship continued to be commonplace in Greek and Roman religion.

Allat, the moon goddess of Syria and later of northern Arabia.

One of the prominent distinguishing features of biblical religion is its ideal of “imageless” worship. Clearly expressed in the Decalogue is the command: “You shall not make for yourself an idol...you shall not worship them or serve them” (Exod. 20:4-5 NASB). This is usually interpreted to be a negative statement concerning idols but with positive implications toward the spiritual worship desired by God.

Idols were a problem of long standing. One of the first acts of rebellion of the Hebrews centered around the golden calf made under Aaron's leadership in the wilderness (Exod. 32). The bronze serpent illustrates the Hebrews' propensity for idol worship. Moses set it up in the wilderness to allay a plague of serpents (Num. 21), but Israel retained it and made it an object of worship (2 Kings 18:4). Joshua called on the people to put away the gods their fathers had served in Mesopotamia and in Egypt (Josh. 24:14). Perhaps a misguided King Jeroboam intended to represent Yahweh by the gold calves set up in his temples at Bethel and Dan when he led the northern tribes to secede from the kingdom inherited by Rehoboam (1 Kings 12:28-33).

Biblical writers often denounced idolatry. None is more graphic and devastating than that in Isa. 44:9-20. The idol is made by a workman but is powerless to sustain the workman to complete his task. Further, the idol begins as a leftover piece of a tree from which a person makes a god. He then worships no more than a block of wood.

Many scholars believe that the threat of idolatry was much less in the Jewish community after the Babylonian exile and that it continued to be diminished though still present throughout NT times. The most noted problem in the NT concerns the propriety of eating meat that has previously been offered to an idol (1 Cor. 8-10). Paul seemingly broadened the scope of idolatry for Christianity when he identified covetousness with idolatry (Col. 3:5). See Food Offered to Idols; Gods, Pagan.

IDUMEA (ĭd ŭ mē' ə) In Isa. 34:5 a nation destined for judgment. "Idumea" is the term used in the Greek version of the OT and in the writings of the Jewish historian Josephus for Edom. The region was southeast of the Dead Sea. The Herods came originally from Idumea. Crowds from Idumea followed Jesus early in His ministry (Mark 3:8). See Edom.

IEZER (יֵזֶר) Personal name meaning “where is help” or a short form of “my father is help.” (Hb. Aviezer, Josh. 17:2). Son of Gilead in tribe of Manasseh and original clan ancestor of Iezerites (Num. 26:30). KJV, REB spelling is Jeezer.

IEZERITES (יֵזֶרִיִּים) See Iezer.

IGAL (יגָל) Personal name meaning “he redeems.” 1. Spy representing tribe of Issachar whom Moses sent to investigate the land of Canaan (Num. 13:7). He voted with the majority that the land was too difficult for Israel to conquer. 2. One of David's heroic warriors, apparently a foreigner from Zobah (2 Sam. 23:36), though his name is spelled Joel, and he is the brother, not son, of Nathan in 1 Chron. 11:38. 3. Descendant of David in the postexilic community (about 470 B.C.) and thus bearer of the messianic line and hope (1 Chron. 3:22), though the chronicler does not describe him in messianic terms here.

IGDALIAH (יגְדַלְיָהוּ) Personal name meaning “Yahweh is great.” Ancestor of the prophets whose chamber in the temple Jeremiah used to test the Rechabites loyalty to their oath not to drink wine (Jer. 35:4). This is apparently evidence for professional prophets on the temple staff. See Jeremiah; Rechabites.

IGNORANCE Old Testament law distinguished between sins of ignorance, or sin unintentionally (Lev. 4:2,13-14; Num. 15:24-29), and premeditated sins (“sin presumptuously” or with a high hand, Num. 15:30-31). Sins committed in ignorance incur guilt (Lev. 4:13,22,27); however, the sacrificial system provided atonement for such sin (Lev. 4; 5:5-6). In contrast, “high-handed” or “presumptuous” sin is an affront to the Lord punishable by exclusion from the people of God. The Law provided no ritual cleansing for such sin (Num. 15:30-31). Common images for sins of ignorance include error (Lev. 5:18), straying (Ps. 119:10), and stumbling (Job 4:4). By extension these images can be applied to any sin. Thus Prov. 19:27 warns against willful “erring” from words of divine counsel.

The NT speaks of past ignorance that God excuses. Such was the ignorance of those Jews who participated in crucifying Jesus (Acts 3:17; 13:27), of Paul who persecuted Christians (1 Tim. 1:13), and of Gentiles who did not recognize the true God (Acts 17:30). Though God overlooks such past ignorance, He requires repentance (Acts 3:19; 17:30). Obedience characterizes lives of the converted just as ignorant desires characterize those without Christ (1 Pet. 1:14). The NT speaks of deliberate ignorance as well as “excusable” ignorance. Most often deliberate ignorance involves the stubborn refusal to acknowledge nature's witness to the powerful existence of God (Rom. 1:18-21; Eph. 4:18; 2 Pet. 3:5).

IIM (I' im) Place-name meaning “ruins.” 1. Town on southern border of tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:29). Its location is not known, and it does not appear in parallel lists in Josh. 19:3; 1 Chron. 4:29. Many Bible students think a copyist copied parts of the following Ezem twice. 2. Used in Num. 33:45 (KJV) as abbreviation for Iye-abarim. See Iye-abarim.

IJEABARIM (I ja äb' á rim) (KJV) See Iyeabarim.

IJON (I' jön) Place-name meaning “ruin.” Place in northern Israel captured by King Ben-hadad of Damascus as a result of his agreement with King Asa of Judah (910-869 B.C.) to break the treaty between Damascus and Baasha, king of Israel (1 Kings 15:20). This forced Baasha to defend himself on the northern border and quit intruding on Judah's territory, giving Asa opportunity to strengthen his defenses (1 Kings 15:21-22). Tiglath-pileser conquered the city and carried many Israelites into captivity about 734 B.C. (2 Kings 15:29). Ijon is located near modern Marj Uyun between the rivers Litani and Hesbani at Tell Dibbin.

IKKESH (Ik' kesh) Personal name meaning “perverted, false.” Father of one of David's 30 heroes from Tekoa (2 Sam. 23:26).

ILAI (I' lai) Personal name of uncertain meaning. One of David's military heroes (1 Chron. 11:29), apparently the same as Zalmon (2 Sam. 23:28), the different spelling resulting from a copyist's change.

ILLUSTRATION See Imagery; Parables; Proverb;

ILLYRICUM (Illyr'icūm) Place-name of uncertain meaning. A district in the Roman Empire between the Danube River and the Adriatic Sea. The Romans divided it into Dalmatia and Pannonia. It includes modern Yugoslavia and Albania. Illyricum represented the northeastern limits of Paul's missionary work as he wrote the Romans (Rom. 15:19), though the Bible nowhere mentions his work there. His work in Macedonia was only a few miles away, so he could easily have preached in or sent his associates to Illyricum. This does not mean he had covered all of Illyricum, only that he had introduced the gospel there in the dangerous limits of the empire. Paul had thus completed his missionary ministry of preaching the gospel and planting churches in the eastern end of the empire. Paul was now ready to preach in Rome and the western parts of the Roman Empire (Rom. 15:20-24).

IMAGE OF GOD Biblical designation for the unique nature, status, and worth of all human beings as created by God.

Christian thinkers have tried to locate the image of God (imago Dei) in various dimensions of man's being, including man's spirit, soul, rationality, will, mind, personhood, immortality, and even his physical body. But Scripture is not specific as to exactly what it is about man that constitutes the image of God. The image of God cannot be reduced to one attribute or any combination of attributes of man. The biblical portrait is more holistic. The entire man, as a human being, images God.

Creation The biblical depiction of the image of God begins “in the beginning” when “God said, ‘Let Us make man in Our image, according to Our likeness,’” (Gen. 1:26a NASB). The Hebrew word “image” (selem) refers to a representation, image, or likeness; it often refers to the way that an idol represented a god. “Likeness” (demur) means “similar in appearance,” usually visual appearance, but it can also refer to audible similarity. Taken together, “likeness” complements “image” to mean that man is more than a mere image; he is a likeness of God. Yet, regardless of whether one argues from definition or word order, attempts to distinguish sharply “image” from “likeness” are misguided. For centuries theologians have tried to contrast the “image” (as the physical, natural or rational part of man) over and against the “likeness” (as the spiritual, moral, and volitional part of man). While the terms selem and demut complement one another, three subsequent references to 1:26 all confirm that these two terms are essentially interchangeable ideas in the common Hebrew literary style of parallelism. On the one hand, in 1:27 “image” is used without “likeness.” On the other hand, in 5:1 “likeness” is used without “image.” In 5:3, both terms are used again in tandem but are in transposed order compared to 1:26. In any case, all three passages point back to 1:26 and communicate the big idea of God's image.

In understanding the image of God, it is more important that the immediate scriptural context of the original divine pronouncement in 1:26 is the creation of the animal kingdom. In contrast to the animal creation, humankind is made in the image of God in a separate act of creation. Man originates apart from any connection with the animal creation and certainly not from evolution. Also, for the first time in the creation narrative, the divine “let Us” is used in conjunction with the creation act. Added to this, the immediate scriptural context after this introduction of the “image of God” is the additional charge that man “subdue” the earth and “rule over” all of its other creatures (1:26,28). On the surface, man's earthly authority here sets him apart from the rest of creation. Below the surface, this dominion imago Dei motif stands in contrast to ancient pagan religious belief that only ruling kings enjoyed royal standing before the gods and men, as evidenced by their dominion which they presumed to exercise on behalf of their deities. In contrast the biblical picture of imago Dei means that all human beings, not just kings, possess special royal status as God's appointed stewards over the earth. By virtue of mankind's ruling over the rest of God's creatures and earth, every member of the human race somehow represents and reflects the sovereign Lord of creation.

Procreation Both sexes reflect the image of God as “male and female” (1:27) and were commanded to “be fruitful and multiply” (1:28). This population mandate was inaugurated in Gen. 5:1-3 with the clear implication that the imago Dei was passed from Adam and Eve to their son Seth. This text frames the image of God around the theme of sonship. When Luke references Gen. 5:1-3, he calls Adam the “son of God” (Luke 3:38 HCSB). These two passages together communicate a common idea: from God, Adam received the imago Dei; from Adam, Seth received the imago Dei. Adam's sin and its negative consequences for the entire human race without doubt marred the image of God, as no aspect of man's being was unaffected by the fall. Yet it is presumptive to assume that the image of God was completely lost through sin. To the contrary, Seth and his progeny received and passed down the image.

This multifaceted image of God in man, as represented in the creation-procreation themes of stewardship and sonship, is also present in Ps. 8. Here “man” and “son of man” are made “little less than God” and given glory, honor, and dominion (Ps. 8:3-8). So much does sinful man still bear that image that Paul states that fallen man “is God's image and glory” (1 Cor. 11:7 HCSB). While sin distorted and disfigured the image of God in man, it did not diminish its worth. In fact, post-fall human life is still sacred precisely because of the imago Dei, so sacred that it should not be taken (Gen. 9:6-7) or cursed (James 3:9).

Incarnation However, much of mankind images God by virtue of stewardship and sonship, only one man is the true image of God, with the full authority of the Father, as the only begotten Son of God. Jesus Christ “is the image of God” (2 Cor. 4:4 HCSB); “He is the image of the invisible God” (Col. 1:15 HCSB). This is the great fact of the incarnation (John 1:14,18; Phil. 2:5-8). As the only God-Man, among men Jesus Christ alone mirrors God as “the exact expression of His nature” (Heb. 1:3 HCSB). As such, Jesus Christ is God's ultimate steward and God's true Son (Heb. 2:6-8).

Redemption While the image of God in man was injured as a result of sin, that damage is more than countered by the redemptive work of Jesus Christ, for those who believe. The Christian is to “put on the new man, who is being renewed in knowledge according to the image of his Creator” (Col. 3:10 HCSB; cp. Eph. 4:24). “Reflecting the glory of the Lord,” the believer is progressively sanctified, “being transformed into the same image from glory to glory” (2 Cor. 3:18 HCSB; cp. Rom. 8:28-29).

Glorification Because of the incarnation, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ, believers are promised a final transformation into the likeness of Christ at His return. “As we have borne the image of the man made of dust, we will also bear the image of the heavenly man” (1 Cor. 15:49 HCSB; cp. 42,45-48). While there may be much about the image of God that Christians cannot understand or know in their current state, the revelation of Jesus Christ will change believers for eternity. “We know that when He appears, we will be like Him, because we will see Him as He is” (1 John 3:2 HCSB; cp. Phil. 3:21).

IMAGE, NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S Colossal figure in Nebuchadnezzar's dream (Dan. 2:31-45) that was erected on the plains of Dura (Dan. 3:1-18).

The interpretation of the statue in Nebuchadnezzar's dream is debated. Nebuchadnezzar is clearly the head of gold (2:38). The identification of the other materials (silver, bronze, iron mixed with clay) with historical references is less clear. For convenience, interpreters may be classed broadly as historicists and dispensationalists.

Historicists have proposed various solutions to the enigmatic historical references. According to one interpretation, the various materials refer to the line of Neo-Babylonian kings which came to an end with the conquest of Cyrus who is identified as the divinely ordained rock (Dan. 2:45; cp. Isa. 44:28; 45:1). Others see a succession of kingdoms rather than kings, for example, (1) Babylon, Media, Persia, and Greece, or (2) Babylon, Medo-Persia, Alexander the Great, and Alexander's Hellenistic successors. Interpreters divide over whether to identify the kingdom that rules the world (2:39) with that of Cyrus who made this claim or with Alexander who in fact conquered much of the known world. The fourth “divided” kingdom (2:41) is frequently identified with the division of Alexander's empire by his generals. The mixing of iron and clay is possibly a reference to failed attempts to unite these kingdoms by marriage treaties (2:43). For these interpreters, the God-ordained stone is the Maccabees who secured Jewish independence and reinstated temple worship. Many historicists recognize that the Maccabees only partially fulfilled the hopes of the writer of Daniel and thus find the ultimate fulfillment in the kingdom established by Christ.

Dispensationalist interpreters identify the succession of kingdoms as Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome. Rome is the empire divided into eastern and western halves and finally represented by a 10-nation federation. The Roman period extends until the time of Christ who is the God-ordained Rock that ends the power of the Gentiles (Dan. 7; Luke 21:24; Rev. 16:19).

The charge of not worshiping the gods of Nebuchadnezzar leveled against the Jews (Dan. 3:12,14) suggests a statue of Bel-merodach, the patron deity of Babylon, though the statue was possibly of Nebuchadnezzar himself. Here religion is a political tool to unite various peoples into one empire. Readers in Maccabean and Roman times no doubt understood the statue against contemporary use of the divine ruler cult.

IMAGERY Figurative language. Scripture prefers to convey truths by pictorial representations rather than through abstract language. Scripture abounds in word-pictures for God, God's people, and their experience of salvation.

The challenge of theology (“talk about God”) is to express truths about God in human language. Scripture itself witnesses the difficulty of this task, “To whom would you liken Me, and make Me equal and compare Me, that we would be alike?” (Isa. 46:5 NASB). The living God is not to be equated with any one manageable image. Idolatry is essentially the attempt to reduce God to an image or label. The multiplicity of OT literary images for God serves as a corrective of human attempts to constrict one's view of God. Some images for God are inanimate: stone (Gen. 49:24); fortress (2 Sam. 22:2); fountain of living waters (Jer. 2:13). There is little danger of confusing God with such images. Other images of God are personal: father (Mal. 1:6); husband (Hos. 2:16); shepherd (Ps. 23:1); judge, lawgiver, and king (Isa. 33:22); teacher (Isa. 28:26); healer (Jer. 30:17); warrior (Exod. 15:1,3); farmer (Isa. 5:2-7). With such personal images, the danger of confusing “God is like” with “God is” is real. A challenging corrective is offered by the less familiar feminine images for God, for example, that of a mother bird sheltering her young (Ruth 2:12; Ps. 17:8). Also suggestive of a mother's tenderness are the images of carrying a child from birth (Isa. 46:3), teaching a child to walk (Hos. 11:3), child feeding (Hos. 11:4), and child rearing (Isa. 1:2).

In His parables, Jesus continued the OT practice of using vivid images for God: a shepherd seeking one lost sheep (Luke 15:4-7); a woman seeking one lost coin (Luke 15:8-10); a father waiting patiently for the return of one son and taking the initiative to reconcile the other (Luke 15:11-32). Images are also used to teach who Jesus the Christ is: word (John 1:1); light (John 8:12); bread and wine (Matt. 26:26-29); vine (John 15:1); the way (John 14:6).

Imagery is also used to depict the people of God and their experience of salvation. The OT pictures God's people as: a faithless wife (Jer. 3:20); a wild vine (Jer. 2:21); a wild donkey in heat (Jer. 2:24); God's beloved (Jer. 11:15); God's bride (Jer. 2:2); God's servant (Jer. 30:10); and God's son (Hos. 11:1). New Testament images include: light (Matt. 5:14); salt (Matt. 5:13); vine branches (John 15:5); a new creation (2 Cor. 5:17); God's temple (1 Cor. 3:16); and a royal priesthood (1 Pet. 2:9; cp. Exod. 19:6). Images for salvation are drawn from all walks of life: the law courts (Rom. 7:3; Heb. 9:16-17); slave market (Titus 2:14); marketplace (1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23); and the family (Rom. 8:17,23). The multiplicity of images again witnesses the rich experience of God's people. See Anthropomorphism; Parables.

IMAGERY, CHAMBER OF KJV phrase (Ezek. 8:12) understood as “room of his carved images” (NASB) or “shrine of his own idol” (NIV). The picture of the representatives of Israel worshiping idols within the Jerusalem temple in Ezekiel's vision (8:3,12) symbolizes the people's unfaithfulness to God.

IMAGES See Idol.

IMAGINATION KJV term for thought as the prelude to action, frequently in the sense of plotting or devising evil; can also refer to stubbornness from the Hebrew words meaning “formed” or “twisted.” Imagination means evil plans (Prov. 6:18; Lam. 3:60-61). At Deut. 31:21, and possibly Rom. 1:21, “imagination” refers to the inclination to do evil. God opposes the imaginations of the proud (Luke 1:51; 2 Cor. 10:5). Imagination is also used in a neutral sense (1 Chron. 28:9). Most often, imagination means stubbornness (Deut. 29:19; Jer. 3:17; 7:24; 9:14; 11:8; 13:10; 16:12; 18:12; 23:17). Modern translations use imagination less frequently. For example, the RSV used imagination only four times: for the inclination to do evil (Gen. 6:5; 8:21; NRSV, “inclination”); for the plans of the proud (Luke 1:51; NSRV, “thoughts”); and in connection with the making of idols (Acts 17:29) where imagination may mean creativity or more likely a depraved mind. The NIV also used imagination four times: in reference to fabricating prophecy (Ezek. 13:2,17); and for evil plans (Isa. 65:2; 66:18).

IMITATE To mimic; to do what is seen to be done by another; sometimes it approximates “be obedient.” Paul's uses can be divided into three groups: (1) To call attention to a comparison even when no conscious mimicking is in mind. The Thessalonians shared suffering at the hands of their compatriots comparable to that experienced by the earliest Judean Christians (1 Thess. 2:14). First Thessalonians 1:6 perhaps belongs here. (2) To follow an example (Phil. 3:17; 2 Thess. 3:7,9 where Paul's example of self-support is in view). Obedience may also be in mind as references to tradition (2 Thess. 3:6) and command (3:10) demonstrate. (3) An equivalent to “be obedient.” Paul exhorted the Corinthians to follow him not primarily by following his personal example but by following his “ways in Christ” which he taught “everywhere in every church” (1 Cor. 4:16-17). The Corinthians were to follow Paul's example by heeding his counsel to do all for the glory of God without causing offense (1 Cor. 11:1; cp. 10:23-33). In Eph. 5:1 the command to be imitators is again linked with the previous series of commands, especially that of forgiveness (4:25-32). The image of children obedient to parents is common where the thought of imitation as obedience is primary (1 Cor. 4:14-16; Eph. 5:1).

Hebrews urges imitation of the faithfulness and patient endurance of those who inherited the promises (6:12) and the faithfulness of church leaders (13:7). The command of 3 John 11 is general, though specific examples of good (Demetrius) and bad (Diotrephes) are in view.

IMLA or IMLAH (Im' la) Personal name meaning "he fills," appearing in different spelling in Kings and Chronicles. Father of the prophet Micaiah (1 Kings 22:8). See Micaiah.

IMMANUEL (Im mán' u el) Personal name meaning "God with us." Name of son to be born in Isaiah's prophecy to King Ahaz (Isa. 7:14) and fulfilled in birth of Jesus (Matt. 1:22-23).

When King Ahaz refused to show his faith by asking God for a sign (Isa. 7:10-12), Isaiah gave him a sign of the birth of Immanuel, using the traditional form of a birth announcement (7:14; cp. Gen. 16:11; Judg. 13:3,5). The Hebrew language apparently indicates that the prophet and king expected an immediate fulfillment. Recent study has pointed to Ahaz's wife as the woman expected to bear the child and show that God was still with the Davidic royal dynasty even in the midst of severe threat from Assyria. Such a sign would give hope to a king who trusted God but would be a constant threat to one who followed his own strategy. The double meaning of the Immanuel sign appears again in Isa. 8:8. The Assyrian army would flood the land until Judah was up to its neck in trouble and could only cry out, "O Immanuel" a cry confessing that God is with us in His destructive rage but at the same time a prayer, hoping for divine intervention. Isaiah followed this with a call to the nations to lose in battle because of Immanuel, God with us (8:10).

The Bible says nothing else about the effects of the Immanuel prophecy in the days of Isaiah and Ahaz. It does announce the great fulfillment in Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:22-23). Jesus' birth showed all humanity that God is faithful to fulfill His promises in ways far beyond human expectations, for Jesus was not just a sign of God with us. Jesus was God become flesh, God incarnate, God with us in Person.

IMMATERIALITY Not composed of matter. Acts 17:29 argues that “we shouldn't think that the divine nature is like gold or silver or stone” (HCSB). Rather “God is Spirit: and those who worship Him must worship in spirit and truth” (John 4:24 HCSB).

IMMER (im' mēr) Personal name probably meaning “lamb.” 1. Father of Pashhur, the priest and temple administrator (Jer. 20:1). 2. Priest whose son Zadok helped Nehemiah repair Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 3:29). Ancestor of priests who dwelt in Jerusalem after the return from exile (1 Chron. 9:12). 3. Leader of priestly division under David (1 Chron. 24:14). Son of Immer in other instances could mean, “descendant of Immer” and refer to this original priestly ancestor (cp. Ezra 2:37-38; 10:20; Neh. 7:40; 11:13).

IMMORALITY Any illicit sexual activity outside of marriage. Both in the OT and in the NT the word has a figurative meaning as well, referring to idolatry or unfaithfulness to God.

In the OT zanah regularly refers to wrongful heterosexual intercourse, primarily in regard to women (Judg. 19:2; Jer. 3:1; Hos. 4:13). The noun “harlot” or “whore” is derived from the same stem (Gen. 34:31; Josh. 2:1-3; Prov. 23:27; Hos. 4:13-14). In a figurative sense, zanah refers to Israel's unfaithfulness to God (2 Chron. 21:11; Isa. 1:21; Jer. 3:1-5; Ezek. 16:26-28). In addition, the sinfulness of Tyre (Isa. 23:17) and Nineveh (Nah. 3:4) are portrayed in this manner.

In Paul's letters, porneia and/or related words refer to an incestuous relationship (1 Cor. 5:1), sexual relations with a prostitute (1 Cor. 6:12-20), and various forms of unchastity both heterosexual and homosexual (Rom. 1:29; 1 Cor. 5:9-11; 6:9-11; 7:2; 2 Cor. 12:21; Eph. 5:3; 1 Thess. 4:3). Immorality is a sin against God (1 Cor. 3:16-17; 6:15-20; 1 Thess. 4:3-8). In the Gospels, the term, on occasion, is related to adultery (Matt. 5:32; 19:9) and in Revelation may refer to harlotry or prostitution (Rev. 2:14,20). The word “harlot” or “whore” is derived from the same root (Rev. 19:2). In Acts, the Apostolic Council requires that Gentiles avoid porneia (Acts 15:20,29). Porneia and related words also have a figurative meaning of unfaithfulness to God (Matt. 12:39; John 8:41; Rev. 2:21; 9:21; 14:8; 19:2). See Adultery; Sex, Biblical Teaching on.

IMMORTALITY Quality or state of being exempt from death. In the true sense of the word, only God is immortal (1 Tim. 6:16; 1:17; 2 Tim. 1:10), for only God is living in the true sense of the word. Humans may be considered immortal only insofar as immortality is the gift of God. Paul points us in this direction. In Rom. 2:7 Paul says, “To those who by patiently doing good seek for glory and honor and immortality, he will give eternal life” (NRSV). Paul also explained that the perishable nature of human life will put on the imperishable and that the mortal nature of human life will put on immortality. When that happens, the saying concerning victory over death will have been fulfilled (1 Cor. 15:53-55; Isa. 25:8; Hos. 13:14). As it is, humans in their earthly life are mortal; they are subject to death.

Thus, eternal life is not ours because we have the inherent power to live forever; eternal life and immortality are ours only because God chooses to give them to us. Those who escaped death—Enoch (Gen. 5:24) and Elijah (2 Kings 2:10-11)—did so only by the power of God and not by some inherent power they had to live forever. See Eternal Life; Life.

IMMUTABILITY OF GOD The unchangeability of God. In biblical theology God is described as unchanging in His nature and in His character. This includes God's being (essence), purposes, and promises.

Psalm 102:25-27 contrasts God's unchanging nature with that of the created order. Numbers 23:19 and 1 Sam. 15:29 indicate that God changes neither His plans nor His actions, for these rest on His unchanging nature. James finds assurance of God's future blessings in that there is in God “no variation or shadow cast by turning” (James 1:17 HCSB). After referring to His constant patience, long-suffering, and mercy, God concludes with a general statement of His immutability: “For I, the LORD, do not change” (Mal. 3:6 NASB).

Failure to allow the Bible to define precisely in what sense God changes, results in a distorted view of God. Being influenced more by Greek philosophy than by the Bible, some classical theologians have understood God's immutability to mean that God is unable to act and that He is uncaring and unresponsive to the created order. Overreaction to this error of viewing God as static results in an equally distorted view of God. Some recent thinkers have rejected the biblical teaching concerning God's immutability altogether. Being influenced more by process or existential thought, they understand God to be like the created order—experiencing change, maturing in knowledge and personal development, and having no certain knowledge of the future. Neither a static view of God nor a God in constant flux captures the biblical picture of God. Biblical theology portrays God as immutable, yet as acting, feeling emotions, and responding differently to various situations. In all such actions, feelings, and responses, God is constant and consistent.

On the surface it appears that some biblical passages represent God as changing. For example, He repents (Gen. 6:6; 1 Sam. 15:11; Joel 2:13; Amos 7:3,6; Jon. 3:9; 4:2); changes His purpose (Exod. 32:9-14; Jon. 3:10); becomes angry (Num. 11:1,10; Ps. 106:40; Zech. 10:3); and turns from His anger (Deut. 13:17; 2 Chron. 12:12; Jer. 18:8; 26:3). The apparent problem disappears upon close inspection of each text. These verses portray God changing in His relations and who sometimes appears to mere humans to alter His purposes but who never wavers or changes in His nature, purposes, or promises.

God's immutability is a great source of comfort to the believer. Whereas God is constant in His wrath against sin, He is equally constant in His forgiveness in response to faith and repentance.

God's immutability grants the assurance that “He who started a good work in you will carry it on to completion” (Phil. 1:6 HCSB). In a world that is in constant change, the believer finds peace in a God who does not change, knowing that truth and values are grounded in the nature and character of an unchanging God.

IMNA (im' ná) Personal name meaning “he defends.” A member of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35). See Imnah.

IMNAH (im' ná) Personal name meaning “he allots for” or “on the right hand, good fortune.” 1. Son of Asher and original ancestor of the Imnites (Num. 26:44; KJV, Jimna). 2. Levite in the time of King Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:14).

IMNITE (im' nit) See Imnah.

IMPEDIMENT IN SPEECH Disturbance of the vocal organs resulting in the inability to produce intelligible sounds (Mark 7:32). In Jesus' healing of a man who “had a speech difficulty” (HCSB; NIV, “hardly talk”), the crowds recognized a fulfillment of Isa. 35:5-6.

IMPERISHABLE Not subject to decay; ever enduring. Imperishable (KJV, incorruption) describes the spiritual resurrection body that, unlike the physical body, is not subject to the decay associated with death (1 Cor. 15:42-54). Imperishable describes the everlasting reward of the saints (1 Cor. 9:25; 1 Pet. 1:23). One of the Greek terms translated “imperishable” is also rendered “immortality” (Rom. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:10). The same term is used in reference to “undying” love in Eph. 6:24 (KJV, “in sincerity”).

IMPORTUNITY Troublesome urgency; excessive persistence. In Luke 11:8 importunity results in a favorable response to a midnight request for bread (KJV, RSV). Many modern translations read persistence (HCSB, NASB, NRSV, REB). The literal meaning of the term is shamelessness (NEB; cp. TEV: “not ashamed to keep on asking”).

IMPOSITION OF HANDS See Laying on of Hands.

IMPOTENT Lacking power, strength, or vigor; helpless. Impotence in the KJV never refers to sexual inability. Modern translations replace “impotent” with other terms: “cripple” (Acts 4:9 NIV); “disabled” (John 5:3 NIV); “invalid” (John 5:3 NRSV); “sick” (John 5:3,7; Acts 4:9 NASB). Modern translations describe the man “impotent in his feet” (Acts 14:8) as one who could not use his feet (NRSV), without strength in his feet (HCSB, NASB), or crippled (NIV). See Diseases.

IMPRECATION, IMPRECATORY PSALMS Act of invoking a curse. In the Imprecatory Psalms the author calls for God to bring misfortune and disaster upon the enemies (Pss. 5; 11; 17; 35; 55; 59; 69; 109; 137; 140). These psalms are an embarrassment to many Christians who see them in tension with Jesus' teaching on love of enemies (Matt. 5:43-48). It is important to recall the theological principles that underlie such psalms. These include: (1) the principle that vengeance belongs to God (Deut. 32:35; Ps. 94:1) that excludes personal retaliation and necessitates appeal to God to punish the wicked (cp. Rom. 12:19); (2) the principle that God's righteousness demands judgment on the wicked (Pss. 5:6; 11:5-6); (3) the principle that God's covenant love for the people of God necessitates intervention on their part (Pss. 5:7; 59:10,16-17); and (4) the principle of prayer that believers trust God with all their thoughts and desires. See Blessing and Cursing.

IMPURITY See Clean, Cleanness; Common.

IMPUTE, IMPUTATION Setting to someone's account or reckoning something to another person. God reckoned righteousness to believing Abraham (Gen. 15:6). This means that God credited to Abraham that which he did not have in himself (Rom. 4:3-5). This does not mean that God accepted Abraham's faith instead of righteousness as an accomplishment meriting justification. Rather, it means that God accepted Abraham because he trusted in God rather than trusting in something that he could do.

Similarly, drawing from Ps. 32:1-3, Paul stated that only God can forgive sin. Those who are forgiven are not regarded as wicked since the Lord does not impute to them their iniquity. Instead these are considered or reckoned as children of God (Rom. 4:7-8,11,23-24).

The imputation of righteousness lies at the heart of the biblical doctrine of salvation. This righteousness is seen in Christ who purchased redemption. God grants righteousness to those who have faith in Christ (Rom. 1:17; 3:21-26; 10:3; 2 Cor. 5:21; Phil. 3:9). This righteousness imputed or reckoned to believers is, strictly speaking, an alien righteousness. It is not the believer's own righteousness but God's righteousness imputed to the believer. So, as Luther said, believers are simultaneously righteous and sinful.

Not only is the imputation of God's righteousness to the believer taught in Scripture, but the Bible in some sense implies that Adam's sin was imputed to humankind (Rom. 5:12-21; 1 Cor. 15:21-22). Likewise, it is taught that the sins of humanity were imputed to Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 5:21), although the exact nature of this divine imputation remains a mystery. The matter has been intensely debated in church history since the time of Augustine (A.D. 354-440). Nevertheless, for a consistent biblical witness, it must be maintained that in Adam God judged the whole human race guilty. Yet humankind has not merely been declared guilty; each human has acted out his or her guilt. More importantly, it is impossible for sinners to be righteous in God's sight apart from the gift of righteousness graciously granted to them in Christ through faith.

IMRAH (יִמְרָא) Personal name meaning “he is obstinate.” Member of tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36).

IMRI (יִמְרִי) Short form of personal name “Amariah” meaning “Yah has spoken.” 1. Ancestor of clan from tribe of Judah living in Jerusalem after the return from exile (1 Chron. 9:4). 2. Father of Zaccur, who helped Nehemiah rebuild Jerusalem's wall (Neh. 3:2).

INCANTATIONS Chants used by magicians to control evil spirits and thus heal the sick or afflict enemies. No Palestinian incantations survive from the biblical period. Babylonian incantations had three parts: (1) an invocation of the names of the great gods, (2) identification of the spirit causing the illness, and (3) the call for the demon to leave. Compare Acts 19:13 where Jewish exorcists invoked the superior name of Jesus. Mosaic law prohibited the casting of spells (Deut. 18:10-11). The complaint that the wicked are like a snake, immune to the cunning enchanter perhaps refers to the futility of incantations (Ps. 58:3-5). The Babylonians hoped to gain success and terrorize their enemies by means of incantations (Isa. 47:12). Isaiah warned their incantations would be of no avail (47:9). The tongue muttering wickedness perhaps refers to incantations (Isa. 59:3). The books of magic of Acts 19:19 were likely collections of incantations. See Blessing and Cursing; Imprecation; Divination and Magic.

INCARNATION God's becoming human; the union of divinity and humanity in Jesus of Nazareth.

Definition of Doctrine Incarnation (Lat. incarnatio, being or taking flesh), while a biblical idea, is not a biblical term. Its Christian use derives from the Latin version of John 1:14 and appears repeatedly in Latin Christian authors from about A.D. 300 onward.

As a biblical teaching, incarnation refers to the affirmation that God, in one of the modes of His existence as Trinity and without in any way ceasing to be the one God, has revealed Himself to humanity for its salvation by becoming human. Jesus, the Man from Nazareth, is the incarnate Word or Son of God, the focus of the God-human encounter. As the God-Man, He mediates God to humans; as the Man-God, He represents humans to God. By faith-union with Him, men and women, as adopted children of God, participate in His filial relation to God as Father.

The Humanity of Jesus The angel of the Lord, in a prophecy of Jesus' birth, plainly stated the purpose of the incarnation: “[Mary] will give birth to a son, and you are to name Him Jesus, because He will save His people from their sins” (Matt. 1:21 HCSB; cp. Luke 19:10; John 3:17; 1 Tim.

1:15). The liberation of humanity from everything that would prevent relationship with God as Father requires incarnation. The biblical materials related to incarnation, though not systematically arranged, portray Jesus as the One who accomplished the mission of salvation because He was the One in whom both full divinity and full humanity were present.

Jesus referred to Himself as a man (John 8:40), and the witnesses in the NT recognized Him as fully human. (For example, Peter, in his sermon at Pentecost, declared that Jesus is “a man pointed out to you by God,” Acts 2:22 HCSB). That the Word was made flesh is the crux of the central passage on incarnation in the NT (John 1:14). The respective genealogies of Jesus serve as testimonies to His natural human descent (Matt. 1:1-17; Luke 3:23-37). In addition, Jesus attributed to Himself such normal human elements as body and soul (Matt. 26:26,28,38). He grew and developed along the lines of normal human development (Luke 2:40). During His earthly ministry, Jesus displayed common physiological needs: He experienced fatigue (John 4:6); His body required sleep (Matt. 8:24), food (Matt. 4:2; 21:18), and water (John 19:28). Human emotional characteristics accompanied the physical ones: Jesus expressed joy (John 15:11) and sorrow (Matt. 26:37); He showed compassion (Matt. 9:36) and love (John 11:5); and He was moved to righteous indignation (Mark 3:5).

A proper understanding of the events preceding and including His death requires an affirmation of His full humanity. In the garden, He prayed for emotional and physical strength to face the critical hours that lay ahead. He perspired as one under great physical strain (Luke 22:43-44). He died a real death (Mark 15:37; John 19:30). When a spear was thrust into His side, both blood and water poured from His body (John 19:34). Jesus thought of Himself as human, and those who witnessed His birth, maturation, ministry, and death experienced Him as fully human.

Although Jesus was fully human in every sense of the word, His was a perfect humanity-distinct and unique. His miraculous conception highlights distinctiveness and originality of His humanity. Jesus was supernaturally conceived, being born of a virgin (Luke 1:26-35). To be sure, the Bible records other miraculous births such as those of Isaac (Gen. 21:1-2) and John the Baptist (Luke 1:57), but none attained to the miraculous heights of a human being supernaturally conceived and born of a virgin.

The NT also attests to the sinless character of Jesus. He, Himself, asked the question, “Who among you can convict Me of sin?” (John 8:46 HCSB). Paul declared, God “made the One who did not know sin to be sin for us” (2 Cor. 5:21 HCSB). The writer of Hebrews held that Christ was “without sin” (4:15). The NT presents Jesus as a man, fully human, and as a unique man, the ideal human.

The Deity of Jesus Paul, in a statement on the supremacy of Christ, asserted, “Because all the fullness was pleased to dwell in Him” (Col. 1:19 HCSB; cp. John 20:28; Titus 2:13). Jesus was aware of His divine status (John 10:30; 12:44-45; 14:9). With the “I am” sayings, He equated Himself with the God who appeared to Moses in the burning bush (Exod. 3:14). The assertion of the NT is that Jesus was God (John 6:51; 8:58; 10:7,11; 11:25; 14:6; 15:1).

The Bible affirms the preexistence of Jesus: “In the beginning was the Word; and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was with God in the beginning” (John 1:1-2 HCSB; 1:15; 8:58; 17:5; Phil. 2:5-11). Jesus realized accomplishments and claimed authority ascribed only to divinity. He forgave sins (Matt. 9:6) and sent others to do His bidding, claiming all authority “in heaven and on earth” (Matt. 28:18-20 HCSB). The central proclamation of the gospel is that He is the only way to eternal life, a status held by deity alone (John 3:36; 14:6; cp. Acts 4:12; Rom. 10:9). The NT pictures Him as worthy of honor and worship due only to deity (John 5:23; Heb. 1:6; Phil. 2:10-11; Rev. 5:12). He is the Agent of creation (John 1:3) and the Mediator of providence (Col. 1:17; Heb. 1:3). He raised the dead (John 11:43-44), healed the sick (John 9:6-7), and vanquished demons (Mark 5:13). He will effect the final resurrection of humanity either to judgment or to life (Matt. 25:31-32; John 5:27-29).

The titles ascribed to Jesus provide conclusive evidence for the NT's estimate of His person as God. Jesus is “Lord” (Phil 2:11), “Lord of lords” (1 Tim. 6:15), “the Lord of glory” (1 Cor. 2:8), “the mediator” (Heb. 12:24), and “who is God over all, blessed forever” (Rom. 9:5 HCSB). In addition, the NT repeatedly couples the name “God” with Jesus (John 1:18; 20:28; Acts 20:28; Rom. 9:5; 2 Thess. 1:12; Titus 2:13; Heb. 1:8; 2 Pet. 1:1; 1 John 5:20).

Formulation of the Doctrine The problem of the incarnation begins with John's assertion, “the Word became flesh” (1:14). Clear expression of the relation of the Word to the flesh, of divinity to humanity within the person of Jesus became a matter of major concern during the first five centuries of the Christian era. The unsystematized affirmations of the NT were refined through controversy, a process which culminated in the ecumenical councils of Nicaea (A.D. 325), Constantinople (A.D. 381), Ephesus (A.D. 431), and Chalcedon (A.D. 451).

The Council of Nicaea marked the meeting of church representatives from throughout the Christian world. Its purpose was to settle the dispute over the teachings of Arius, a presbyter in the church of Alexandria. He taught a creature Christology—that is, he denied the Son's eternal divinity. Against Arius, the council asserted that the Son was of one substance with the Father. Jesus was fully divine.

The Council of Constantinople met to clarify and refute the Christology of Apollinarius, Bishop of Laodicea. Apollinarius insisted that Jesus was a heavenly man dissimilar to earthly men. If a human is body, soul, and spirit, the bishop asserted that Jesus was a body, soul, and Logos [lit. “Word”], a man not having a human spirit, or mind. Against this doctrine, the council affirmed the full humanity of Christ.

The Council of Ephesus considered the marriage Christology of Nestorius, Bishop of Constantinople. He held that the union of the human and divine in Jesus was like the marriage of a husband and wife. As a result, the Council accused him of teaching that there were two separate persons in Christ.

The Council of Chalcedon was perhaps the most significant church council for Christianity. It met in debate over the teaching of Eutyches, a monk from Constantinople. He denied that Jesus had two natures. This reaction against the Christology of Nestorius prompted the council to express the incarnation of Jesus in terms of one person with two natures—human and divine.

The mystery of the incarnation continues, and the statements of the first four councils of the Christian church preserve that mystery. Jesus, God incarnate, was one Person in two natures—fully divine and fully human. See Christ.

INCENSE Mixture of aromatic spices prepared to be burned in connection with the offering of sacrifices (Exod. 25:6). The word is also used to refer to the smoke produced by the burning. In the KJV two Hebrew words are translated “incense” however, the two words are practically synonymous. The incense used in worship was to be prepared according to exacting specifications and was to be offered only by the high priest. According to Luke 1:8-20, Zacharias was burning incense in the temple when he was visited by the angel Gabriel. See Sacrifice and Offering.

INCENSE ALTAR See Tabernacle; Temple.

INCEST Sexual intercourse between persons too closely related for normal marriage. The twofold theological rationale for the prohibition of incestuous unions is the divine claim “I am the Lord your God” (Lev. 18:2,4,6) and the note that such behavior characterized the Egyptians and Canaanites whom God judged (Lev. 18:3,24-25). Leviticus 18:6-16 prohibited unions between a man and his mother, stepmother, sister, half sister, daughter-in-law, granddaughter, aunt (by blood or marriage), or sister-in-law. Leviticus 18:17 prohibited a man's involvement with a woman and her daughter or granddaughter. Leviticus 18:18 prohibited taking sisters as rival wives. Penalties for various forms of incest included childlessness (Lev. 20:20-21), exclusion from the covenant people (Lev. 18:29; 20:17-18; cp. 1 Cor. 5:2,5), and death (Lev. 20:11-12,14). In patriarchal times marriage to a half sister (Gen. 20:12) and marriage to rival sisters (Gen.

29:21-30) were permissible, though such marriages proved troublesome to both Abraham and Jacob. Scriptural accounts of incest include Gen. 19:31-35; 35:22; and 2 Sam. 13.

INCH A unit of measure equal to a twelfth of a foot. Eighteen inches (Gen. 6:16 NIV, TEV) is the equivalent of a cubit. See Weights and Measures.

INCLUSIVENESS God chose Abraham from among the families of the earth to be the father of a great nation, which would then convey God's blessing to others (Gen. 12:3; Gal. 3:6-9). God's special relationship with Israel (Exod. 19:5-6) was never intended to be exclusive, however. Numerous non-Israelites (during the OT period) and non-Jews (during the intertestamental and NT periods) participated in the covenantal blessings of Abraham. These include the mixed multitude who left Egypt with Moses (Exod. 12:38), Rahab (Josh. 6:25; Matt. 1:5), Ruth (Ruth 1:4; Matt. 1:5), various Syrophoenician women (1 Kings 17:8-24; Luke 4:25-26), Naaman (2 Kings 5:1-19; Luke 4:27), the Ninevites (Jon. 3:5-10; 4:11), a Roman centurion (Matt. 8:5-13), the Samaritan woman (John 4:1-42), Simon of Cyrene (Mark 15:21), Cornelius (Acts 10:9-48), Timothy (Acts 16:1), and a host of Gentile converts throughout the history of the church. The population of heaven will include persons “from every nation, tribe, people, and language” (Rev. 7:9 HCSB).

With one exception, God shows no partiality in matters of judgment or salvation (Acts 10:34; Rom. 2:9-11; Eph. 2:11-14). The exception is that salvation is found in the work of Jesus Christ alone (John 14:6; Acts 4:12). The language which God used of Israel at Mount Sinai (“you shall be to Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation,” Exod. 19:6 NASB) was adopted by Peter to refer to Gentiles (1 Pet. 2:9) who, because of Christ, became fellow heirs with the believing descendants of Abraham (Gal. 3:29; 4:7). All barriers between people based on gender, ethnicity, or socioeconomic status are removed in Christ (Gal. 3:28-29).

INCONTINENCY, INCONTINENT KJV term for the lack of self-control (1 Cor. 7:5). Incontinent (2 Tim. 3:3) means lacking self-control (NASB), profligate (NRSV), or even violent (TEV).

INCORRUPTIBLE, INCORRUPTION KJV terms meaning imperishable and an imperishable state. See Imperishable.

INCREASE Multiplication or growth. In the OT increase often refers to the reproduction of livestock and to the harvest (Lev. 26:3-4; Deut. 7:12-13). The promise of increase is contingent on Israel's fulfilling its covenant commitments. Increase is used figuratively for Israel as the firstfruits of God's increase (KJV) or harvest. Isaiah 9:7 promises the increase of the government and peace of the coming Messiah. Isaiah 29:19 promises an increase in joy (KJV; "fresh joy," NRSV; cp. 9:3). Isaiah 40:29 promises increased strength to the powerless.

The increase of the word of God (Acts 6:7) refers to the spread of the gospel message. Increase is used both for the numerical growth of the church (Acts 16:5) and for maturation (Eph. 4:16; Col. 2:19). Christian maturity is evidenced by an increase in love (1 Thess. 3:12; 4:10) and knowledge of God (Col. 1:10). Boasting in the results of one's work for God is without a basis since God gives the increase (1 Cor. 3:6, Col. 2:19).

INDEPENDENCE OF GOD Doctrine that God does not depend on another for His existence or for the free exercise of His divine prerogatives. See Divine Freedom; I Am; Sovereignty of God.

INDIA Eastern boundary of the Persian Empire of Ahasuerus (Xerxes) (Esther 1:1; 8:9). Biblical references to India refer to the Punjab, the area of Pakistan and northwest India drained by the Indus River and its tributaries. India was possibly a port of call for Solomon's fleet (1 Kings 10:22). Trade between India and the biblical lands began before 2000 B.C.

INFANT BAPTISM Rite of initiation performed on infants born into Christian families, also called “paedobaptism.” While there is no explicit record of infant baptism in the NT, it was an established practice in the church by the third century.

The significance of infant baptism is varied among the several Christian traditions in which the rite is observed. In some traditions, such as Roman Catholicism and Eastern Orthodoxy, it is held that baptism provides cleansing from sin. Many Protestant Reformers maintained the practice of infant baptism but developed a baptismal theology centered more on the covenantal significance of the rite.

There are a few arguments offered by paedobaptists in defense of the practice. First, household baptisms (Acts 16:15,33; 18:8; 1 Cor. 1:16) may have included the infant children of believing parents. Second, during His ministry Jesus welcomed children to Himself (Matt. 19:13-15; 21:16; Mark 10:14; Luke 10:21). Third, just as circumcision was a sign of the covenant promise of God in the OT, so baptism is seen as a sign of the covenant in the NT (Col. 2:11-12). Since infants (male) underwent circumcision in Judaism, so infants should undergo baptism in Christianity. Peter's statement in his Pentecost sermon that “the promise is for you and your children” (Acts 2:39 HCSB) is also seen by some as support for infant baptism. Further, the idea that God extends salvation to families or larger communities is evidenced in OT examples where Noah's family is delivered through the flood (cp. 1 Pet. 3:20-21) and the entire nation of Israel is delivered through the waters of the Red Sea (cp. 1 Cor. 10:1-2).

Adherents of believer's baptism argue against paedobaptism on the basis that: (1) the clear pattern in the NT is that baptism is preceded by repentance and faith (e.g., Acts 2:38; 8:12; 18:8); (2) it is not clear that household baptisms included infants; and (3) the NT parallel to circumcision is not baptism but circumcision of the heart (Rom. 2:29; Col. 2:11), which points to an inward spiritual reality based upon a confession of faith that is impossible for infants.

INFANT SALVATION See Accountability, Age of; Salvation.

INFINITE Unlimited in extent of space, duration, and quantity. Though Scripture does not use the term “infinite” to describe God, theologians have found the term a suitable summary of several attributes of God. God is not limited by space (Ps. 139:7-8); God is not limited by time; God existed before the creation (Gen. 1:1); the ordering of time is part of God's creative activity (Gen. 1:5). Because God is spirit (John 4:24), God cannot be quantified like a material object. God is regarded as infinite in many other qualities: God's steadfast love endures forever (Ps. 100:5); God's knowledge extends to the fall of a single sparrow and the number of hairs on our heads (Matt. 10:29-30; cp. Ps. 139:1-6); God is “the Almighty” (Gen. 17:1; Exod. 6:3).

INFIRMITY Disease, suffering, or sorrow. The KJV often used “infirmity” where modern translations have another term (e.g., weakness, diseases, sickness, menstruation, grief). Matthew saw in Jesus' healings the fulfillment of the servant of the Lord who took our diseases (Matt. 8:17; Isa. 53:4). Romans 15:1 calls upon the strong (in conscience) to bear with the weaknesses (KJV, infirmity) of those without strength. See Diseases.

INFLAMMATION Response to cellular injury characterized by redness, infiltration of white blood cells, heat, and frequently pain. Inflammation was one of the curses upon those disobedient to the covenant (Deut. 28:22; cp. Lev. 13:28).

INGATHERING, FEAST OF Alternate name for the Feast of Tabernacles (Booths) (Exod. 23:16; 34:22). See Festivals.

INHERITANCE Legal transmission of property after death. The Hebrew Bible has no exclusive term for “inheritance.” The words often translated “inherit” mean more generally “take possession.” Only in context can they be taken to mean “inheritance.” The Greek word in the NT does refer to the disposition of property after death, but its use in the NT often reflects the OT background more than normal Greek usage.

In ancient Israel possessions were passed on to the living sons of a father, but the eldest son received a double portion (Deut. 21:17). Reuben lost preeminence because of incest with Bilhah (Gen. 35:22; 49:4; 1 Chron. 5:1), and Esau surrendered his birthright to Jacob (Gen. 25:29-34). These examples show that possession of this double portion was not absolute. Sons of concubines did not inherit unless adopted. Jacob's sons by the maidservants Bilhah and Zilpah (Gen. 30:3-13) inherited (Gen. 49) because those offspring were adopted by Rachel and Leah. Sarai promised to adopt the offspring of her maid Hagar when she gave Hagar to Abram (Gen. 16:2) but went back on that promise after Isaac's birth (Gen. 21:10).

Women were not to inherit from their fathers except in the absence of a son (Num. 27:1-11). Before this ruling from the Lord, if a man had no offspring, the inheritance went to his brothers, to his father's brothers, or to his next kinsman.

Because the Hebrew words did not necessarily presuppose a death, they could be used in reference to God's granting of the land to Israel (Josh. 1:15; Num. 36:2-4). Levites had no share of the land, and the Lord Himself was their "inheritance" (Num. 18:20-24; Deut. 10:9; 18:2; Josh. 13:33). Jeremiah used the concept of "inheritance" to refer to the restoration of Israel to the land from "the north" after the time of punishment (Jer. 3:18-19).

Israel is the "inheritance" of the Lord (Jer. 10:16). Psalm 79:1 speaks of Jerusalem and the temple as God's "inheritance." In a broader sense, however, God can be said to "inherit" all nations (Ps. 82:8).

Anything given by God can be called an "inheritance." In Ps. 16:5 the pleasant conditions of the psalmist's life were his "inheritance" because he had chosen the Lord as his lot. In Ps. 119:111 God's testimonies are an "inheritance." In Job 27:13 "heritage" refers to God's punishment of the wicked. Proverbs 3:35 compares the honor the wise "inherit" with the disgrace of the fool.

In the NT “inheritance” can refer to property (Luke 12:13), but it most often refers to the rewards of discipleship: eternal life (Matt. 5:5; 19:29; Mark 10:29-30 and parallels; Titus 3:7), the kingdom (Matt. 25:34; James 2:5; negatively 1 Cor. 6:9-10; 15:50), generally (Acts 20:32; Eph. 1:14,18; Rev. 21:7). Christ is the Heir par excellence (Matt. 21:38 and parallels; Heb. 1:2). Through Christ Christians can be heirs of God and “co-heirs with Christ” (Rom. 8:17 HCSB; cp. Eph. 3:6). Only the book of Hebrews makes explicit use of the idea of “inheritance” as requiring the death of the testator, Christ. A “will” requires a death to come into effect, so the death of Christ brings the new “covenant” or “will” into effect (Heb. 9:16-17). See Covenant; Land; Promise.

INIQUITY See Sin.

INJURY Act that hurts, damages, or causes loss; the result of such an act. Old Testament law provided two responses to injuries; retaliation in kind (“eye for eye, tooth for tooth,” Exod. 21:24) and compensation. For example, if the victim of an assault was confined to bed, the assailant was to pay the injured party for time lost from work as well as “health care” expenses to ensure recovery (Exod. 21:22). If an owner caused a slave to lose an eye or a tooth, the slave was to be freed as compensation for the loss (Exod. 21:26). Physical injuries excluded priests from service at the altar (Lev. 21:16-23). As part of the Hasmonean intrigue, Aristobulus had the ears of his uncle Hyrcanus II mutilated to disqualify him from priestly service (40 B.C.).

The extended use of the term is evidenced by Prov. 8:36 where those who miss wisdom injure themselves and Rom. 14:15 where Paul warned the Roman Christians not to injure other Christians for the sake of food (cp. Gal. 4:12).

INK Writing fluid. Ink for writing on papyrus (a plant product) was made of soot or lampblack mixed with gum arabic (Jer. 36:18; 2 Cor. 3:3; 2 John 12; 3 John 13). Red ink was made by replacing lampblack with red iron oxide. Because such ink did not stick well to parchment (a leather product), another ink was made from nutgalls mixed with iron sulfate.

Pen cases from ancient Egypt with containers in the tops for ink.

INKHORN KJV term for a case in which ingredients for making ink were kept (Ezek. 9:2-3,11). A scribe customarily carried his inkhorn in his belt.

INLET Bay or recess in the shore of a sea or lake. When Deborah and Barak went to battle against Sisera, the tribe of Asher stayed at home “by his inlets” (“landings,” NRSV, Judg. 5:17).

INN Different kinds of shelters or dwellings. In the OT the Hebrew word translated “inn” or “lodging place” might refer to a camping place for an individual (Jer. 9:2), a family on a journey (Exod. 4:24), an entire caravan (Gen. 42:27; 43:21), or an army (Josh. 4:3,8). In these passages (with the possible exception of the reference in Jeremiah) the presence of a building is not implied. Often the reference is only to a convenient piece of ground near a spring. It is doubtful that inns in the sense of public inns with a building existed in OT times.

By the time of Christ, the situation is quite different. Public inns existed in Greek times and throughout the Roman period. The Greek word for “inn” in the NT implies some type of stopping place for travelers. At times it refers to a public inn. Such an inn of the first century consisted primarily of a walled-in area with a well. A larger inn might have small rooms surrounding the court. People and animals stayed together.

Inns generally had a bad reputation. Travelers were subjected to discomfort and at times robbery or even death. The primary services that could be depended upon were water for the family and animals and a place to spread a pallet.

In addition to referring to a public inn, the same Greek word for “inn” at times refers simply to a guest room in a private home (Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11).

In Bethlehem, Joseph and Mary could find no room at the inn (Luke 2:7). This may have been a guestroom in a home or some kind of public inn. The reference in Luke 10:34 is clearly to a public place where the wounded could be fed and cared for by the innkeeper. See Hospitality; House.

INNER MAN, INWARD MAN Component of human personality responsive to the requirements of the law. According to Paul's understanding (Rom. 7:22-23), human personality has three components: (1) the inmost self where the law dwells; Paul equated this with reason (nous, vs. 23); the inmost self approximates the rabbinic yetser hatov (inclination to good); (2) the members or the flesh that is responsive to desire; the flesh approximates the rabbinic yetser hara' (inclination to evil); and (3) the conscious “I” which is aware of both reason and desire. In rabbinic thought, the law served to tip the balance in favor of the good inclination. Paul, however, rejected this optimistic view of the law. Only the Spirit dwelling in the inner self can free the individual from the power of sin (Rom. 8:2; Eph. 3:16). The Pauline division of personality is reflected in Freud's threefold division—superego, id, and ego.

INNKEEPER One who serves as the host or hostess at an inn. The innkeeper of Luke 10:35 was responsible for providing food and medical care. A Targum (early Aramaic Free translation) on Josh. 2:1 identifies Rahab as an innkeeper.

INNOCENCE, INNOCENCY Condition of not offending God; freedom from sin and guilt. In the OT the adjective “innocence” is more common than the noun. Two roots are commonly translated “innocent.” The basic idea of the first is clean or free from (Exod. 23:7; 2 Kings 24:4) and that of the second is righteousness (Gen. 20:4; Deut. 25:1; Job 9:15). Though the innocent are frequently mentioned, the biblical writers were well aware that only God can create a right heart and remove sin (Ps. 51:10; Jer. 24:7; 31:33-34).

In the NT four terms are used for innocent. The first means unmixed or pure (Matt. 10:16; Phil. 2:15); the second, free from (Matt. 27:4,24); the third, just, righteous, or upright (Matt. 23:35; Luke 23:47); and the fourth, clean or pure (Acts 18:6; 20:26). Innocence is always relative to some standard. Paul declared his innocence with respect to the demands of the law (Phil. 3:6). Only Christ, however, is absolutely pure (Rom. 3:9-18; 2 Cor. 5:21). Christ presents believers as holy and blameless before God (Col. 1:22; Eph. 5:27; 1 Cor. 1:8; 1 Thess. 5:23).

INNOCENTS, SLAUGHTER OF THE Herod's murder of all boys under two years of age as he attempted to destroy the baby Jesus (Matt. 2:16-18). The magi or wise men searched for the One born king of the Jews. Herod the Great saw a claimant to his throne. When the magi failed to report back their finding of the Christ child, Herod ordered the slaughter of all male children in Bethlehem two years of age or less. The Gospel writer cites this as fulfillment of the prophecy of Jer. 31:15. This incident is not mentioned elsewhere in the NT. However, it can be found in ancient nonbiblical documents, such as the Protoevangelium of James, Infancy Gospel of Thomas, and Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew. These sources no doubt relied on the biblical Gospel for the record.

Flavius Josephus, our chief ancient source on Herod, is surprisingly silent on this episode. Nonetheless, an act of such ruthlessness on Herod's part is entirely in keeping with his character as reported by Josephus. For example, when lying near death Herod ordered that all the Jewish leaders be captured and slaughtered upon his death, thus assuring grief at his passing. Fortunately, that order was not carried out. See Apocrypha, New Testament; Herod; Josephus; Magi.

INQUIRE OF GOD Seek divine guidance, most often before battle (1 Sam. 23:2,4; 2 Sam. 5:19,23; 2 Kings 3:11; 2 Chron. 18:4,6-7), but in other situations as well. A variety of methods were employed to seek God's counsel: dreams (1 Sam. 28:6); priests with the ephod (1 Sam. 22:10; 23:9-13); prophets (2 Kings 3:11); and direct consultation. In the early history of Israel, priests were consulted for divine counsel (Judg. 18:14,17; 1 Sam. 22:10). The priests discerned God's will by the sacred lots, the Urim and Thummim (Num. 27:21; 1 Sam. 14:36-42). Since these lots apparently were kept in a pouch in the priest's ephod (Exod. 28:30), references to inquiring of the ephod likely refer to the lots (1 Sam. 23:9-13; 30:8). Prophets sometimes used music as an aid to achieve an ecstatic state in which God's will could be discerned (2 Kings 3:15; 1 Sam. 10:5-6). Prophets frequently took the initiative to announce God's will when no consultation was requested. With the rise of the synagogue, direct inquiring by prayer became the primary means of ascertaining the divine will.

Not all methods of inquiring of God were looked upon with favor. The Danites consulted a Levite in charge of Micah's sanctuary (Judg. 18:5-6,14). The method used by the Levite to ascertain the divine will is not clear. The sanctuary contained an ephod, a cast idol, and teraphim (household gods), any of which might have been consulted. Such shrines were regarded as one example of the evil that resulted when there was no king and "every man did what was right in his own eyes" (Judg. 17:6 NASB). Other methods of discerning God's will rejected by the biblical writers include: consulting mediums (Deut. 18:10-11; 1 Sam. 28:3,7; Isa. 8:19), consulting teraphim (Judg. 17:5; 18:13-20; Hos. 3:4; Zech. 10:2), and consulting pagan deities (Baal-zebub, 2 Kings 1:2-3,16; Malcham or Milcom, Zeph. 1:5). INSCRIPTION Words or letters carved, engraved, or printed on a surface (Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38; superscription, KJV). Pilate likely intended the inscription above the cross in a derogatory sense: "See the defeated King of the Jews." According to John 19:21, the Jewish leadership found the inscription offensive. The Gospel writers saw in Pilate's mockery the truth about Jesus who in His suffering and death fulfilled His messianic role.

INSECTS Air-breathing arthropods which make up the class Hexapoda. Representatives are found on land and in water. They have three distinct body parts (head, thorax, and abdomen) as well as three pair of legs, one pair of antennae, and usually one or two pairs of wings. Fossil studies have shown that insects are among the most ancient of the animals. Their persistence demonstrates their ability to survive under the most difficult conditions. Today insects are the most widely distributed of all the animals. Though their numbers are limited in the Polar Regions, insects abound in the tropics and temperate regions. Their primary food is green plants, and they are found almost everywhere that a food source is available.

Insects are characterized by their ability to move about. Stimuli such as food, temperature, humidity, and change of season may initiate movement. Not only are insects mobile, but they are also migratory. Migration is usually a seasonal phenomenon. Many insects, such as the monarch butterfly, have an annual migration similar to some birds.

Insects comprise the largest number of species in the animal kingdom, numbering in the millions. They are abundant in population, as well as in species. This is due, in part, to the fact that insects lay enormous numbers of eggs. The average number of eggs laid by an insect is from 100 to 150, though the queen termite can lay 60 eggs per second until several million are produced. The short life cycle of insects also contributes to their great numbers. Most mature within a year. Others such as the red mite may have several generations in one season.

Some insects are characterized by specialized methods of reproducing. Polyembryony is a process by which hundreds of offspring can be produced from a single egg. Some species are able to reproduce with no mate, a function known as parthenogenesis.

Insects are among the most injurious of the classes of the animal kingdom. Most everything that man grows or manufactures is susceptible to the ravages of insects. Most insects feed on plants, causing much damage to agricultural products. Many attack man and other animals, as well as woodwork, wool, and clothing. Insects also transmit diseases such as malaria, the plague, and typhoid. However, some insects are beneficial, producing honey, wax, silk, pigments, and tannins. They are also a substantial food source for other animals, including man. Other insects are scavengers, helping to dispose of decaying flesh. The pollination of plants is another benefit provided by insects.

Insects occupy a prominent place among the animals named in the Bible. At least six orders are mentioned.

Hymenoptera These creatures generally have four wings. The female usually has a stinger as well as an ovipositor, or egg-laying organ, at the tip of the abdomen. Many of the species are social creatures.

Ants live in communities, sometimes as large as one-half million individuals. The nest is a maze of tunnels, showing much less planning than the nests of the wasps and bees. Young ants do not develop inside individual cells but are carried about in the nest. The workers are female, having neither wings nor the ability to reproduce. The queen and males have wings. Females are produced from fertilized eggs while males are born of unfertilized eggs. Ants are known to domesticate and enslave other insects, such as aphids and other ants. They also practice agriculture and conduct war on other ants.

The ant (Hb. nemalah) appears only in the book of Proverbs. Prov. 6:6-8 praises her as the supreme example of industry. The ant's wisdom and ability to provide food though "not a strong people" (HCSB) is noted in Prov. 30:25.

Bees have been domesticated for centuries. Herodotus, a Greek historian, wrote of how Egyptian beekeepers moved their hives according to the change of seasons. A beehive may contain 50,000 or more bees. Bees eat pollen and produce a wax that is used to build their combs and nests. A peculiar characteristic of bees and many of their relatives is their ability to determine the sex of their offspring. To do this, the queen bee stores in her body sperm received soon after she hatched. When she lays eggs, she releases one sperm cell for each egg she lays if females are needed. Males develop from eggs that have not been fertilized.

Bees (devorah) are mentioned several times in the OT. They were noted for their antagonism, and armies were compared to swarms of bees (Deut. 1:44). The bee gained fame in the story of Samson, for he ate honey from the carcass of a lion and later tested the Philistines with a riddle concerning the incident (Judg. 14:5-18). The bee also is referred to in Ps. 118:12 and Isa. 7:18.

Wasps and hornets (tsir'ah) are generally social creatures but to a lesser extent than bees and ants. They construct nests by scraping dead wood and making a pulp that is used to form paper. The nest, like that of the bee, is made up of individual cells in the shape of a hexagon. Hornets are found in the OT. The Hebrew word may refer also to wasps and yellow jackets, but the precise Hebrew meaning is not known. "Hornet" comes from the earliest Greek translation. Some think the Hebrew word is a more general term for "terror" or "destruction." These insects are encountered in Exod. 23:28; Deut. 7:20; and Josh. 24:12. They were recognized for their venomous stings and were God's instruments for driving Israel's enemies out of Canaan. The reference could be to the hornet as traditional symbol of Egypt or as a symbol of God's terrifying Israel's enemies. The emphasis is on God's powerful action to give Israel the land.

Lepidoptera: Butterflies and Moths This order is divided into two groups: moths that generally fly at night and butterflies that are day fliers. Moths usually have feathery antennae while butterflies have hairlike or "clubbed" ones. The adults feed primarily on nectar. Larvae are called caterpillars and are plant feeders. Both butterflies and moths are characterized by wings that are covered with powderlike, overlapping scales. They have a proboscis or tongue, which may be more than twice the length of the rest of the body. Some moths have mouth parts specialized for piercing fruit and even other animals. While butterfly pupae have no covering, moths spin cocoons.

Hieroglyphic inscriptions on a temple wall at Karnak in Egypt.

Moths and their larvae (Hb. ash, ses; Gk., ses) were known for their destructive ability (Job 4:19; 13:28; 27:18; Ps. 39:11; Isa. 50:9; 51:8; Hos. 5:12; Matt. 6:19-20; Luke 12:33; James 5:2). For people who had few possessions and no safe places for storage, moth infestation could be devastating.

Diptera The majority of these insects have one pair of wings. The adults feed upon plant and animal juices. Many species are considered injurious, to both animals and plants. Some of these creatures suck blood, transmitting diseases in the process. However, many species of this order are beneficial.

Flies are household pests, but they are primarily associated with livestock stables. Breeding in manure, the female may lay 75-150 eggs in the course of a single laying. This process is repeated several times during her 20-day productive period. A fly may lay a total of 2,000 eggs. The eggs hatch in 24 hours, producing larvae known as maggots. The maggots are active for two to three weeks, feeding on decaying matter. Then follows a resting stage in which the transformation into an adult occurs. The life cycle of the fly is relatively short. An egg becomes an adult within 12 to 14 days. Adults may live one or two months during the summer and longer in the winter.

The Hebrew word for fly, zebub, includes the common housefly as well as other species. As in modern times, flies were great pests for ancient peoples. When combined with poor sanitation and inadequate medical knowledge, flies could be a serious threat to health. The only clear references to this nuisance are found in Eccles. 10:1 and Isa. 7:18. The “swarms” of Exod. 8:21-31 may have been flies. The text is not clear, since a different word is used. The KJV translators added “of flies” for clarification, indicated by italics. The same is true in Pss. 78:45; 105:31. Second Kings 1 names the god of Ekron Baal-zebub. Some interpret this name to mean “lord of the flies.” If this interpretation is correct, flies may have been feared to the extent that the people worshiped a “fly-god,” hoping to prevent infestation by the insects.

A cattle-biting fly, perhaps the gadfly (RSV, NIV) is found in Jer. 46:20. Due to the uncertain translation of the word, it also has been called a mosquito, as well as “destruction.”

Gnats are another airborne nuisance. These insects are scarcely visible to the naked eye and leave bites that sting and burn. Some species fly at night, while others fly in the day, mainly in shaded woods. Others attack in bright sunlight. Some gnats do not bite but swarm in dense clouds numbering perhaps a million. The larvae of some species live in water and provide a source of food for aquatic life. The OT writers knew the gnat as kinnam or kinnim. As well as being pests, they also were known to be fragile creatures, as appears to be reflected in Isa. 51:6 (RSV). Jesus used the figure of the gnat (konops) to teach the scribes and Pharisees a lesson (Matt. 23:24). The use here simply highlights the small size of the gnat. Ancient people would strain liquids in order to remove gnats that had fallen into the open container. Jesus charged the “hypocrites” with giving attention to such details as tithing their herb gardens while neglecting more important matters.

The Egyptian plague of Exod. 8:16-18 perhaps should be understood as a plague of gnats or mosquitoes rather than lice. The Hebrew word used to describe the plague is identified by many scholars as pointing to the gnat. The same is true of the usage of the word in Ps. 105:31. Despite the uncertainty of the exact identification of the insect, the worth of the verses in question remains unaffected.

Siphonaptera Fleas are parasites that are particularly fond of birds and mammals as hosts. These insects are quite small and wingless, having a body that is tall and thin. This body shape allows the flea to pass easily between hairs and feathers. The adult female lays eggs on the host or in its nest or bed. Adults suck blood, while the larvae live on decaying animal and vegetable material. Adults usually feed at least once per day if a source of food is nearby, though they have been known to live more than four months without food.

The flea (par'osh) was a plague for people and animals during the time of the early history of Israel. Fleas were recognized both for their bite and for their size. Their small and insignificant nature even led to the formulation of proverbs of jest. Two such comparisons are found in 1 Sam. 24:14 and 26:20. In both instances David stressed the difference in stature between Saul and himself, avoiding a confrontation with the king. Some scholars interpret the plague that fell upon the Assyrians as one caused by fleas, similar to the Bubonic plague (Isa. 37:36-37).

Anoplura Lice are found in at least two varieties: chewing and sucking lice. The lice of the Bible are almost certainly sucking lice. Small, wingless insects, they are noted for short legs and antennae, laterally flattened body, and specialized mouthparts. They have claws and are parasitic upon mammals. Both adults and larvae feed upon blood. They attach themselves to clothing, body hair, and bedding. Thus, they are passed easily from one person to another. Lice are also acknowledged as carriers of some serious diseases, such as typhus and trench fever.

Lice (kinnim) are mentioned in the KJV in two places. The Egyptian plague of Exod. 8:16-18 is one of dust becoming lice. Psalm 105:31 reminds the reader of the plagues upon Egypt. As stated above, both these occurrences of lice also could be understood as gnats or another biting insect.

Orthoptera Grasshoppers and Locusts The flying members of this order normally have two pairs of wings. This group contains grasshoppers, locusts, katydids, crickets, roaches, and mantids. Grasshoppers are powerful fliers with narrow wings and slender bodies. They are known to fly 15 miles per hour and have been found some 1,200 miles at sea. Locusts and grasshoppers are perhaps the best-known insects of the Bible. This group was so prolific that the Bible contains approximately a dozen words that describe them. The numerous words may indicate different species or even different stages of development. Disagreement exists as to the translation of many instances of the words. Thus, the different species cannot be identified positively from the Hebrew words.

One form of the locust (Hb. arbeh) has been called the migratory locust, or desert locust. It is remembered as the locust of the plague (Exod. 10:4-5). This type of locust invaded agricultural areas in immense numbers, so that they were said to “cover the surface of the land, so that no one will be able to see the land” (Exod. 10:5 NASB). The Egyptians had already suffered a hailstorm, only to have an infestation of insects that would “eat the rest of what has escaped—what is left to you from the hail” (Exod. 10:5 NASB). The destructive nature of this locust is highlighted again in Deut. 28:38; 1 Kings 8:37; 2 Chron. 6:28; Pss. 78:46; 105:34; Joel 1:4; 2:25. Many references point to the great numbers in which the swarms would come (Judg. 6:5; 7:12; Jer. 46:23; Nah. 3:15). Though the locust was a formidable enemy, it was not mighty in strength. This truth is reflected in Job 39:20; Ps. 109:23; Nah. 3:17. The locust is praised in Prov. 30:27 for its ability to work in orderly fashion while having no leader. Not only was the arbeh destructive, it was also edible. Permission is given for its consumption in Lev. 11:22.

The gazam is known as the palmerworm, certainly the caterpillar stage of one of the locust species (Joel 1:4; 2:25; Amos 4:9). Each of these citations recalls the destructive nature of the insect.

The chagab generally is translated “grasshopper” but is called a locust in 2 Chron. 7:13. This locust also was edible as can be seen in Lev. 11:22. It is mentioned in Eccles. 12:5 as being a “burden.” Two OT verses recall the animal's small stature (Num. 13:33; Isa. 40:22).

The chasil is called a caterpillar and generally is mentioned in conjunction with “the locust.” It has been suggested that the chasil was the second stage after the hatching of the locust egg. Others propose that it is the cockroach. Its voracious appetite is the subject of its biblical occurrences (1 Kings 8:37; 2 Chron. 6:28; Ps. 78:46; Isa. 33:4; Joel 1:4; 2:25).

The chargol is mentioned only in Lev. 11:22 and is called a beetle in the KJV. It also was one of the edible varieties. Most scholars propose that it be understood as some species of locust, perhaps a katydid.

The sol'am is called “the bald locust” in Lev. 11:22 and was also allowed for food.

The tselatsal has been called a katydid, cricket, mole cricket, and even a cicada. The KJV translates it “locust” in Deut. 28:42, where it is one of the curses for disobedience. The great numbers of an infestation of this insect may be reflected in Isa. 18:1. In that verse the land “shadowing with wings” reflects a group of Ethiopian ambassadors arriving in Jerusalem to enlist Judah's support in an anti-Assyrian alliance.

The yeleq is called the “cankerworm” in Joel 1:4; 2:25; Nah. 3:15-16. It is called the caterpillar (Ps. 105:34; Jer. 51:14) and the rough caterpillar (Jer. 51:27). It evidently was some form of locust larvae and was known to plague crops.

Akris is the NT word for locust. This insect was food for John the Baptist (Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6). The locust also is used in Rev. 9:3,7 as an instrument of judgment. See Locust

Miscellaneous Insects Worms Three Hebrew words and one Greek word are used to describe worms familiar to the biblical writers. The terms are rather vague and do not offer much help in identifying positively the insect in question. Tola'im is used to describe maggotlike worms (Exod. 16:20; Isa. 14:11). However, the same word is used to describe worms which probably were moth larvae (Deut. 28:39; Jon. 4:7). A scarlet dye was obtained from the insect, or perhaps its eggs (Exod. 25:4; Lev. 14:4). Other occurrences of this word include Job 25:6; Ps. 22:6; Isa. 41:14; 66:24. Rimmah describes maggots in Exod. 16:24; Job 7:5; 17:14; 21:26; 24:20; Isa. 14:11. It is also used in a more general sense in Job 25:6. These two Hebrew words are used together in Exod. 16; Job 25:6; Isa. 14:11. Such usage demonstrates that the meanings of the words overlapped. This is understandable, for the exact identification of species was not the intent of the writers of the biblical materials. Zochel was viewed as a worm by the KJV translators in Mic. 7:17, but in Deut. 32:24 is translated “serpent,” a translation that modern translators use in both passages. In the NT only skolex is used to describe a worm. In Mark 9:44,46,48 reference is made to Isa. 66:24. A derivative of skolex vividly describes the fate of Herod (Acts 12:23).

Scale Insects appear only in connection with the crimson dye extracted from them or from their eggs. In addition to the scarlet dye made from the worm named above, a coloring material was manufactured from a member of the order Rhynchota known for its red scales. These insects, of the genus Kermes, are pea sized and of various colors. They generally are found on oak trees. At death, eggs are gathered from the females for the extraction of dye. The biblical references to these insects include 2 Chron. 2:7,14; 3:14. Some scholars identify the manna of Exod. 16; Num. 11 as an excretion of scale insects miraculously provided by God.

Insects are found often in the story of God's dealings with His people. These occurrences help the reader to understand the life of an ancient people. Insects are a part of the Bible because they were a part of life. Yet the references to these small creatures do more than give information. From them the reader can learn much about God.

God's sovereignty is reflected in His use of hornets to accomplish His divine purpose of driving Israel's enemies out of Canaan. He also could chasten the chosen people with a locust if they should disobey. The absence of advanced methods of insect control reminds us of Israel's utter dependence upon God. The Lord would inspire His servants to use the lowly ant and locust as examples for mankind to follow. The wisdom writers would use even the disgusting fly larva to remind humanity of its mortal nature.

INSPECTION GATE Jerusalem city gate (Neh. 3:31 NASB, NIV). The KJV refers to the gate as the Miphkad Gate. The Hebrew word is related to that of Jer. 52:11, so some interpreters read, “prison tower” here. Others translate it as Muster Gate (NRSV, REB) and see it as a place where people drafted or conscripted into military service gathered. Some identify it with the Benjamin Gate. See Benjamin Gate.

, translated “inspired by God,” misleadingly borrows from the Vulgate (Lat., INSPIRATION OF SCRIPTURE “ All Scripture is inspired by God” (2 Tim. 3:16 HCSB). B. B. Warfield argued that the compound word (theopneustos)divinitus inspirata). Instead of an inspiration (i.e., a breathing into by God), Paul's Greek suggests that Scripture is a divine “spiration” (that which God has breathed out, the product of His creative breath). Paul's point, then, is not that Scripture is inspiring to read (it is that), or that the authors were inspired (they were), but that Scripture's origin means it is the very Word of God.

Moreover, the verse is sometimes incorrectly translated as “every Scripture which is inspired,” perhaps implying that Paul did not believe all Scripture is inspired. But in the preceding verse, he alludes not to just a portion but to the entire OT as the “sacred Scriptures.”

For Paul and the writers of the Bible, the Scriptures are “the spoken words of God” (Rom. 3:2 HCSB). When Scripture speaks, God speaks (1 Cor. 6:16; Heb. 3:7; 10:15).

Theories of Inspiration Historically, biblical inspiration has been reckoned in four ways. (1) The Bible is only inspired like other good books with human authors. This is neither what Scripture says nor what the church has believed. (2) The Bible is only partially inspired by God. Proponents hold that only the theological (not the scientific or historical) portions of Scripture are inspired, or that Scripture is just a record of God's saving historical acts, or that the Bible contains the word of God rather than being that word. But inspiration ensures that Scripture itself is the revealed word of God, not only testifying of God's redemptive work but also interpreting it. (3) The Bible is divinely inspired without use of human authors. Mechanical dictation theory renders Scripture analogous to myths regarding the origins of the Koran or Book of Mormon, and runs contrary to what the Bible says of its origins. (4) The Bible is divinely inspired because God concurrently worked with human authors to produce the very written message He desired. This classical view teaches the Holy Spirit superintended more than 40 authors from widely divergent backgrounds (shepherds, kings, prophets, fishermen, etc.), spanning a period of approximately a millennium and a half, to produce with supernatural congruity not just the thoughts but the very words of God to mankind.

Mode of Inspiration The Chicago Statement on Biblical Inerrancy (1978) confesses that the “mode of divine inspiration remains largely a mystery to us.” But certain inferences can be drawn. For instance, the authors were divinely prepared to write God's word in much the same way as the prophets were made ready to speak His word. “Now the word of the LORD came to me saying, 'Before I formed you in the womb I knew you, and before you were born I consecrated you...all that I command you, you shall speak....Behold, I have put My words in your mouth” (Jer. 1:4-9 NASB; cp. Exod. 4:11-16; 1 Sam. 3; Isa. 6:1-9; Ezek. 2:3-3:11; Amos 7:14-15; Gal. 1:15; Rev. 1:10-11,19). New Testament apostles were received as authoritative by the early church in the same way as OT prophets under inspiration (1 Cor. 2:9-13; 14:37; Col. 4:16; 1 Thess. 2:13; 5:27; 2 Thess. 3:6; 2 Pet. 3:2). Peter referred to the writings of Paul as Scripture (2 Pet. 3:15-16; inferred also in Jude 17-18).

God Himself wrote the Decalogue (Exod. 24:12; 31:18; 32:16), and the writers of Scripture occasionally wrote what God dictated (Exod. 34:27-28; Rev. 1:10-11). But normally God used His chosen writers' personalities, theological meditations, and literary styles. Inspiration was not always continuous in the writers' minds (Jer. 1:2; 14:1; 25:1; 26:1). The divine inscripturated message often surpassed the author's understanding (Dan. 12:8-9; Luke 10:23-24; 1 Pet. 1:10-12). Biblical authors were not always aware that divine inspiration was at work in them (Luke 1:3, Luke's historical research). The apostles could write divinely inspired letters in responding to questions and by stating their opinions (1 Cor. 7:1,25). The Holy Spirit saw to it that each biblical book actually has two authors, one human and one divine. Thus the divine superintendence of Scripture guarantees its inerrancy.

Inerrancy P. D. Feinberg defined inerrancy as “the view that when all the facts become known, they will demonstrate that the Bible in its original manuscripts and correctly interpreted is entirely true and never false in all it affirms, whether that relates to doctrine or ethics or to the social, physical, or life sciences” (Evangelical Dictionary of Theology).

Inerrancy extends only to the original biblical writings, the autographa (Chicago Statement: “Copies and translations of Scripture are the Word of God to the extent that they faithfully represent the original”). Though this stress by conservatives upon the autographa is often ridiculed, the emphasis is critical and sensible. Compared to a later copyist or translator, the author of the original text had a supernatural task for which the total superintendence of the Holy Spirit was needed. Only once for all time the text was written. Should the autograph be corrupted by errors, the following copies and translations of it would never be able to arrive at God's revealed truth. Therefore, the evangelical who emphasizes the inerrancy of the original manuscript does not undermine copies or translations, rather the undermining is done by those who deny the inerrancy of the autographa. The obvious order of transmission is from the original to copy to translation. Biblical faith, then, must not admit of error in the autographa but must be diligently aware of the possibility for error in copy or translation. This awareness has led to careful study of the textual transmission process and the original languages.

Thankfully, divine providence has overseen the transmission of scriptural copies for 3,000 years. The remarkable conserving work of the OT accomplished by Masoretic scribes is well documented, and NT copies abound more than any other work of antiquity, lending great confidence that we have what the apostles wrote. (It is simply not true that use of modern critical texts as opposed to the Textus Receptus will obscure or corrupt biblical doctrine. The widespread consensus among conservative textual scholars is that variants in the copies are insignificant regarding doctrine.) English readers are especially well served by an abundance of translations that faithfully make available the Word of God in the vernacular.

Inerrancy is a matter of faith and is not demonstrable by scholarship. But many attacks upon the veracity of Scripture are wrongheaded from the outset by those who insist upon arbitrary criteria for inerrancy. As the Chicago Statement notes, inerrancy is not undermined “by Biblical phenomena such as a lack of modern technical precision, irregularities of grammar or spelling, observational descriptions of nature, the reporting of falsehoods, the use of hyperbole and round numbers, the topical arrangement of material, variant selections of material in parallel accounts, or the use of free citations.” Claims regarding other types of alleged errors are often greatly exaggerated. Indeed most Bible difficulties have yielded to the patient work of scholars that can be accessed in quality conservative commentaries.

So attempted harmonization of apparently discrepant texts is the appropriate first response, not the assumption of error. Some difficulties may not yield to investigation unless more archaeological or historical facts come to light. And if problems regarding some texts are not solved, evangelical confidence assumes that were all the pertinent facts known, no error would be found in the Bible. In the final analysis, the follower of Jesus exercises this kind of trust in the Word of God because it is mandated by the example of the Lord Himself.

Jesus' Attitude Toward Scripture Some today attempt to pit Christ as God's supreme revelation against scriptural revelation. Jesus reproved those in His day who searched the Scriptures but did not recognize that they bear witness to Him (John 5:39). But He did not reprove them for searching the Scriptures; after all, the Scriptures alone testify of Christ. There is no other way to know Him. Christ is the center of the Christian faith, and the way to Him is by that which the Spirit of God employs for this purpose, the God-breathed Bible.

The disciple's attitude should not be other than his Master's toward Scripture: Scripture is final and authoritative (Matt. 4:4,7,10; John 10:35) because it is the inspired Word of God. His reverence for and confidence in the OT was stunning (Matt. 5:17-19; 26:54; Luke 16:17; 18:31). See Revelation of God.

INSTANT Brief moment of time (Isa. 29:5; 30:13; Jer. 18:7-9); KJV uses it in the sense of insistent, pressing, or urgent. For example, “they were instant” (Luke 23:23, KJV) means “they kept urgently demanding” (NRSV); “continuing instant in prayer” (Rom. 12:12, KJV) means “persevere in prayer” (NRSV) or “faithful in prayer” (NIV); “be instant” (2 Tim. 4:2, KJV) means “be persistent” (NRSV) or “be prepared” (NIV).

INSTRUCTION Teaching or exhortation on aspects of Christian life and thought directed to persons who have already made a faith commitment. Instruction (didache) is frequently distinguished from missionary preaching (kerugma). Matthew's Gospel says of Jesus, “He was teaching them like one who had authority” (Matt. 7:29 HCSB). The Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5-7) in particular is the rock-solid foundational teaching for Christian life (Matt. 7:24-27). Jesus Himself admonished His disciples to make disciples, baptizing them in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, “teaching them to observe everything I have commanded you” (Matt. 28:20).

Teaching Ministry The church of Jesus Christ, therefore, is a teacher, instructing men and women in Christian faith and discipleship. The faith that the church proclaims must be strengthened by the teaching of the gospel. Paul reminded the early Christians that one of the offices of the church was the pastor/teacher who worked “to equip God's people for work in his service, for the building up of the body of Christ” (Eph. 4:12 REB). The church's teaching ministry has numerous dimensions.

The church teaches about Jesus. The church presents the basic details of Jesus' life and ministry: His death, burial, and resurrection. It helps members understand the meaning of these events for all times. In the early church, the catechumens or learners were those given instruction in Christian faith prior to receiving baptism and full membership in the community of faith. Later church leaders such as Martin Luther and John Calvin wrote catechisms, books for instructing persons in faith and doctrine. The church is called to retell the story of Jesus in every generation. See Gospel; Kerygma; Jesus, Life and Ministry of.

The church teaches Christian spirituality. New Christians are not to remain “babies in Christ” but to “grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ” (1 Cor. 3:1-3; Heb. 5:13; 2 Pet. 3:18). Christian spirituality is the process of growing in faith. In its teaching ministry, the church guides Christians in the life of faith through prayer, Bible study, meditation, and spiritual reflection.

The church teaches Christian ethics. Those who follow Christ must be conformed to His image. The church instructs its members in faithfulness, morality, honesty, and integrity. Ethical instruction is not a new law but a way of life according to Christ's new commandment to love one another (John 13:34-35). Jesus is the ultimate moral teacher and example for the people of God. See Ethics.

The church instructs in Christian doctrine. The church teaches the basic truths of the Christian faith. It guides Christians in understanding significant beliefs. It opens the Scriptures to determine those doctrinal ideals upon which the church is founded. It guides faithful Christians to maturity so that its members may not be “tossed by the waves and blown around by every wind of teaching, by human cunning with cleverness in the techniques of deceit” (Eph. 4:14 HCSB). All doctrinal instruction leads to Christ who is the final source of the Christian's faith. See Doctrine; Theology, Biblical.

A Teaching Evangel As the church teaches, it also evangelizes. The teaching ministry of the church is another way in which the people of God declare their faith that others may know Christ and grow up in him. See Evangelism.

INSTRUMENT KJV term for a tool, utensil (1 Chron. 28:14), weapon (Gen. 49:5; 1 Chron. 12:33,37), or musical instrument (1 Chron. 15:16; 16:42; 23:5). Modern translations generally reserve the term “instrument” for musical instrument. See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

INSULT To treat with insolence, indignity, or contempt. The term does not appear in the KJV but becomes increasingly frequent in more recent translations, such as the NIV, where it replaces such terms as abuse, mock, revile, reproach, or ridicule. According to Hebrew wisdom, the wise person ignores insults (Prov. 12:16). Proverbs 14:31 warns that oppression of the poor is an insult to God. God's prophets were sometimes the objects of insults (Jer. 20:7-8; 2 Kings 2:23). As God's ultimate representative, Jesus anticipated insults as part of His passion (Luke 18:32). The Synoptic Gospels relate these insults (Matt. 26:68; 27:29,40-44; Mark 14:65; 15:16-20,29-32; Luke 22:63-65; 23:11,35-39). By suffering insult, Christ became the model for Christians who experience insult (Rom. 15:3, quoting Ps. 69:9; 1 Pet. 3:9). Jesus blessed those who suffered insult for His sake (Matt. 5:11). Paul was content with insults which are a natural consequence of mission involvement (2 Cor. 12:10). Jesus warned that one insulting a brother was in danger of standing before the Sanhedrin, the Jewish supreme court (Matt. 5:22).

INSURRECTION Rebellion against an established government. By the time of Artaxerxes (464-423 B.C.), Jerusalem had a well-established reputation for insurrection (Ezra 4:19). Barabbas was charged with insurrection (Mark 15:7; Luke 23:19,25). The tribune in charge of temple security confused Paul with an Egyptian insurrectionist (Acts 21:38). The insurrection of Acts 18:12 (KJV) is better rendered “united attack” (NRSV).

INTEGRITY Faithful support of a standard of values. Terms which occur in parallel with integrity (Hb. tom, tomim) suggest its shades of meaning: righteousness (Ps. 7:8); uprightness (Ps. 25:21); without wavering (Ps. 26:1 NRSV, NASB, NIV); blameless (Ps. 101:2 NRSV, Hebrew uses tom twice in this verse, otherwise translated “integrity”). Several OT characters are designated persons of integrity: Noah (Gen. 6:9); Abraham (Gen. 17:1); Jacob (Gen. 25:27); Job (Job 1:1,8; 2:3); and David (1 Kings 9:4). English translations frequently render the underlying Hebrew as perfect or blameless. Inclusion of Jacob is surprising since he is better known for his deceit (Gen. 27:5-27; 30:37-43; 33:13-17). English translators describe Jacob as a plain (KJV), peaceful (NASB), or quiet man (NRSV, NIV, REB).

In the NT integrity occurs only at Titus 2:7 (NRSV, NIV, REB) in reference to teaching. The idea of singleness of heart or mind is frequent (Matt. 5:8; 6:22; James 1:7-8; 4:8).

INTERCESSION Act of intervening or mediating between differing parties, particularly the act of praying to God on behalf of another person. In the OT the Hebrew verb paga^c is used of such pleading or interceding (Gen. 23:8; Isa. 53:12; 59:16; Jer. 7:16; 15:11; 27:18; 36:25). More general terms such as palal, “pray,” or chalah, “appease,” are also sometimes translated “intercede” (1 Sam. 7:5; 1 Kings 13:6). In the NT the Greek term is entungkano and its derivatives (Rom. 8:26-27,34; 1 Tim. 2:1; Heb. 7:25).

Old Testament Many OT characters noted for their faith are also noted for their intercessory prayer. Abraham asked God not to destroy Sodom in order to save his nephew Lot. He called on the righteous character of God, asking if God would “kill the righteous with the wicked” (Gen. 18:25). In so doing, Abraham acknowledged that he was not worthy to lay such claims before the holy God (v. 27). Abraham also interceded for Abimelech, fulfilling a prophetic function and bringing healing (Gen. 20:7,17).

Moses intervened between God and Pharaoh as he tried to get permission for the people to leave Egypt (for example, Exod. 8:8). At Sinai the people asked Moses to represent them before God since they feared to approach the awesome God (Exod. 20:19). After the people built the golden calf, Moses prayed for God's mercy, calling on God to remember His reputation among the nations and His promises to the patriarchs. As a result, God relented (Exod. 32:11-14). Through intercessory prayer Moses sought to make an atonement for sin, identifying himself so completely with the people that he asked to be blotted out of God's book if God would not forgive the people's sin (Exod. 32:30-34; cp. Deut. 9:25).

The priests had intercession as part of their job description (Joel 2:17; cp. 1 Sam. 2:25). The high priest's task was to make atonement for the people (Lev. 16). In face of the people's idolatry, Samuel asked God to forgive them (1 Sam. 7:5). Even when he did not agree with the people, Samuel took their plea for a king to God (1 Sam. 8; cp. chap. 12). When God rejected Saul, Samuel prayed in grief (1 Sam. 15:11). David interceded all night on behalf of his newborn baby, even knowing God had decreed the child's death because of David's sin (2 Sam. 12:14-18). After taking a census without God's direction, David asked God to punish him and not the innocent people (2 Sam. 24:17).

In dedicating the temple, Solomon asked God to hear the prayers of the sinful people and forgive them (1 Kings 8; cp. 3:3-14). Elijah accused God of bringing “tragedy upon the widow with whom I am staying by killing her son” (1 Kings 17:20) and prayed successfully that the child would live again (cp. 2 Kings 4:32-34). Hezekiah took Sennacherib's letter to the temple and opened it before God, praying for deliverance from the Assyrians (Isa. 37:14-20).

Intercession formed an important part of the prophet's task. Amos prayed that God's Word would not come to pass (Amos 7:5-6). Jeremiah responded to God's Word of judgment on the nation with a plea for God not to be a stranger among those who could not save themselves (Jer. 14:7-9). Lamentations is filled with prayers for the nation.

The Prophet Isaiah looked to a day when people from all nations could come to the temple and make intercession (Isa. 56:7). The prophetic hope centered in the Suffering Servant who would bear the sin of all people, making intercession for transgressors (Isa. 53:6,12).

Intercession was not always effective. God told Jeremiah to forsake the prophetic duty of intercession: “Do not pray for these people. Do not lift up a cry or a prayer on their behalf, and do not beg Me, for I will not listen to you” (Jer. 7:16). Even the great heroes of intercession would not succeed in such situations (Jer. 15:1; cp. Ezek. 14:14). In the final analysis, even the most righteous of people need an intercessor with God (Job 9:32-35; 19:25; 23:1-17).

New Testament The NT teaches that intercession is expected of all believers (1 Tim. 2:1-3). Intercession for the sick is particularly important (James 5:14). Paul in his letters constantly referred to his prayers for the readers, and Jesus set forth the supreme example of intercession (Luke 22:32; 23:34; John 17).

The Bible reveals that the Holy Spirit, Christ, and Christians intercede for mankind. Romans 8:26-27 shows that the Holy Spirit works to sustain the burdened believer, to intercede, to carry even inexpressible prayers to God. Romans 8:34 offers the truth that the risen Christ will maintain His intercession for the believer, being the Mediator between God and man. God accepts a believer's prayers and praises through Christ's intercession. His death secured removal of sin; His resurrection bestowed life on those who believe in Him; His ascension brought exaltation to power in heaven and on earth. Now He intercedes for us at God's throne of grace. Hebrews 7:25 proclaims the complete deliverance that comes through salvation accomplished through Christ and notes that He is ever present in heaven to intercede for those who come to Him. See Prayer.

INTEREST Sum of money a borrower pays for use of loaned capital. Mosaic law prohibited the charging of interest to fellow Israelites (Exod. 22:25; Lev. 25:36-37; Deut. 23:19). Interest could be charged to foreigners (Deut. 23:20). The motive in loaning without interest to fellow Israelites was to prevent the formation of a permanent underclass in Israel. Ezekiel regarded the charging of interest as a watershed act separating the righteous from those practicing abominations (Ezek. 18:8,13,17; 22:12). Nehemiah challenged neglect of the Mosaic prohibition that had resulted in dire poverty for some of the returned exiles (Neh. 5:6-13).

The “harsh” master who expects interest and reaps what he did not sow (Matt. 25:24,26-27; Luke 19:21-23) is hardly to be taken as a model for Christian business practice. Luke's parable in particular contains reminiscences of the hated Archelaus (Luke 19:12,14; cp. Matt. 2:22). Jesus stood firmly in the OT tradition when He commanded His disciples to give freely to the needy who asked (Matt. 5:42; 10:8).

Many commentators feel compelled to defend the common, contemporary practice of charging interest. Any moral decision on the matter must carefully weigh rival claims: that capital loaned at interest provides an opportunity for persons to escape poverty and that the inability of both individuals and nations to pay interest on borrowed capital contributes to continued poverty. See Archelaus; Banking; Loan.

INTERTESTAMENTAL HISTORY AND LITERATURE Events and writings originating after the final prophet mentioned in the OT (Malachi, about 450 B.C.) and before the birth of Christ (about 4 B.C.).

Shortly after 600 B.C. the Babylonians captured Jerusalem, destroyed the temple and took away many of the people as captives. After Cyrus overcame the Babylonian Empire, the Jews who desired were allowed to return. The temple was rebuilt. Under the leadership of Nehemiah and Ezra, the Jewish religious community established itself, and the worship and life of the people continued. Here OT history ends, and the Intertestamental Period begins.

The history of the Intertestamental Period can be divided into three sections: The Greek Period, 323 B.C. to 167 B.C.; the Period of Independence, 167 to 63 B.C.; and the Roman Period, 63 B.C. through the time of the NT.

The Greek Period, 323 to 167 B.C. Philip of Macedon sought to consolidate Greece so as to resist attack by the Persian Empire. When he was murdered in 336 B.C., his young son Alexander took up the task. He was only 19 years of age, but he was highly gifted and educated. Within two years he set out to destroy Persia. In a series of battles over the next two years he gained control of the territory from Asia Minor to Egypt. This included Palestine and the Jews. Josephus, a Jewish historian who lived about A.D. 37-100, tells of Alexander going to Jerusalem and offering sacrifice in the temple. Many elements of this story are undoubtedly false, but Alexander did treat the Jews well. When he founded the new city of Alexandria in Egypt, he moved many Jews from Palestine to populate one part of that city. In 331 B.C. Alexander gained full control over the Persian Empire.

Alexander's conquest had three major results. First, he sought to introduce Greek ideas and culture into the conquered territory. This is called Hellenization. He believed that the way to consolidate his empire was for the people to have a common way of life. However, he did not seek to change the religious practices of the Jews. Second, he founded Greek cities and colonies throughout the conquered territory. Third, he spread the Greek language into that entire region so that it became a universal language during the following centuries.

When Alexander died in 323 B.C., chaos resulted in his empire. Five of his prominent generals established themselves over different parts of his empire. Ptolemy chose the land of Egypt. Seleucus took control of Babylonia. Antigonus became ruler of Asia Minor and northern Syria. The other two ruled in Europe and did not have direct influence over events in Palestine.

From the beginning, Ptolemy and Antigonus struggled over the control of Palestine. The battle of Ipsus in 301 B.C. settled the matter for a century. In this battle the other four generals fought against and killed Antigonus. Seleucus was given the territory of Antigonus, including Palestine. However, Ptolemy did not take part in the battle. Instead he took over control of Palestine. The result was that Palestine continued to be a point of contention between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids.

The Jews fared well under the Ptolemies. They had much self-rule. Their religious practices were not hampered. Greek customs gradually became more common among the people. During this period the translation of the OT into Greek began during the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 285-246 B.C. This translation is known as the Septuagint, often abbreviated LXX. The early Christians used the Septuagint and NT writers often quoted it.

Antiochus III (the Great), 223-187 B.C., attempted to take Palestine from the Ptolemies in 217 B.C. without success. At the battle of Panium, 198 B.C., however, he defeated Ptolemy IV, and he and his successors ruled Palestine until 167 B.C. The situation of the Jews changed after Antiochus was defeated by the Romans in the battle of Magnesia, 190 B.C. Antiochus had supported Hannibal of North Africa, Rome's hated enemy. As a result, Antiochus had to give up all of his territory except the province of Cilicia. He had to pay a large sum of money to the Romans for a period of years, and he had to surrender his navy and elephants. To guarantee his compliance, one of his sons was kept as hostage in Rome. So the tax burden of the Jews increased, as did pressure to Hellenize, that is, to adopt Greek practices.

Antiochus was succeeded by his son Seleucus IV, 187-175 B.C. When he was murdered, his younger brother became ruler. Antiochus IV, 175-163 B.C., was called Epiphanes (“manifest” or “splendid”), although some called him Epimenes (“mad”). He was the son who had been a hostage in Rome. During the early years of his reign, the situation of the Jews became worse. Part of it was due to their being divided. Some of their leaders, especially the priests, encouraged Hellenism.

Up to the time of Antiochus IV, the office of high priest had been hereditary and held for life. However, Jason, the brother of the high priest, offered the king a large sum of money to be appointed high priest. Antiochus needed the money and made the appointment. Jason also offered an additional sum to receive permission to build a gymnasium near the temple. This shows the pressure toward Hellenism. Within a few years, Menelaus, a priest but not of the high priestly line, offered the king more money to be named high priest in place of Jason. He stole vessels from the temple to pay what he had promised.

Antiochus sought to add Egypt to his territory. He was proclaimed king of Egypt, but when he returned the following year to take control of the land, the Romans confronted him and told him to leave Egypt. Knowing the power of Rome, he returned home. When he reached Jerusalem, he found that Jason had driven Menelaus out of the city. He saw this as full revolt. He allowed his troops to kill many of the Jews and determined to put an end to the Jewish religion. He sacrificed a pig on the altar of the temple. Parents were forbidden to circumcise their children, the Sabbath was not to be observed, and all copies of the law were to be burned. It was a capital offense to be found with a copy of the law. The zeal of Antiochus to destroy Judaism was a major factor in its salvation.

Jewish Independence, 167 to 63 B.C. Resistance was passive at first; but when the Seleucids sent officers throughout the land to compel leading citizens to offer sacrifice to Zeus, open conflict flared. It broke out first at the village of Modein, about halfway between Jerusalem and Joppa. An aged priest named Mattathias was chosen to offer the sacrifice. He refused, but a young Jew volunteered to do it. This angered Mattathias, and he killed both the Jew and the officer. Then he fled to the hills with his five sons and others who supported his action. The revolt had begun.

Leadership fell to Judas, the third son of Mattathias. He was nicknamed Maccabeus, the hammerer. He probably received this title because of his success in battle. He was the ideal guerrilla leader. He fought successful battles against much larger forces. A group called the Hasidim made up the major part of his army. These men were devoutly committed to religious freedom. They were dedicated to obedience to the law and to the worship of God.

Antiochus IV was more concerned with affairs in the eastern part of his empire than with what was taking place in Palestine. Therefore, he did not commit many troops to the revolt at first. Judas was able to gain control of Jerusalem within three years. The temple was cleansed and rededicated exactly three years after it had been polluted by the king, 164 B.C. (Dates through this period are uncertain and may be a year earlier than indicated.) This is still commemorated by the Jewish feast of Hanukkah. The Hasidim had gained what they were seeking and left the army. Judas had larger goals in mind. He wanted political freedom. He rescued mistreated Jews from Galilee and Gilead and made a treaty of friendship and mutual support with Rome. In 160 B.C. at Elasa, with a force of 800 men, he fought a vastly superior Seleucid army and was killed.

Jonathan, another son of Mattathias, took the lead in the quest for independence. He was weak militarily. He was driven out of the cities and only gradually established himself in the countryside. Constant struggle engaged those seeking the Seleucid throne. The rivals offered him gifts to gain his support. In 152 B.C. he gave his support to Alexander Balas, who claimed to be the son of Antiochus IV. In return Jonathan was appointed high priest. For the first time, Jewish religious and civil rule were centered in one person. Jonathan was taken prisoner and killed in 143 B.C.

Simon, the last surviving son of Mattathias, ruled until he was murdered by his son-in-law in 134 B.C. He secured freedom from taxation for the Jews by 141 B.C. At last they had achieved political freedom. Simon was acclaimed by the people as their leader and high priest forever. The high priesthood was made hereditary with him and his descendants. The Hasmonean dynasty, named after an ancestor of Mattathias, had its beginning.

When Simon was murdered, his son John Hyrcanus became the high priest and civil ruler (134-104 B.C.). For a brief time the Seleucids exercised some power over the Jews, but Hyrcanus broke free and began to expand the territory of the Jews. In the north he destroyed the temple of the Samaritans on Mount Gerizim. He moved southeast and conquered the land of the Idumeans, the ancient kingdom of Edom. The residents were forced to emigrate or convert to Judaism. This had great significance for the Jews, for it was from this people that Herod the Great was to come.

The oldest son of Hyrcanus, Aristobulus I (104-103 B.C.), succeeded him. He had his mother and three brothers put in prison. One brother was allowed to remain free, but he was later murdered. He allowed his mother to starve to death in prison. He extended his rule to include part of the territory of Iturea, north of Galilee. He was the first to take the title of king.

Salome Alexandra was the wife of Aristobulus. When he died, she released his brothers from prison and married the oldest of them, Alexander Jannaeus. He became high priest and king (103-76 B.C.). He made many enemies by marrying the widow of his brother. The OT stated that a high priest must marry a virgin (Lev. 21:14). He was an ambitious warrior and conducted campaigns by which he enlarged his kingdom to about the size of the kingdom of David. He used foreign soldiers because he could not trust Jews in his army. As high priest, he did not always follow prescribed ritual. On one occasion, the people reacted to his improper actions by throwing citrons at him. He allowed his soldiers to kill 6,000 of them. At another time he had 800 of his enemies crucified. As they hung on the crosses, he had their wives and children brought out and slain before their eyes.

Alexandra succeeded her husband as ruler (76-67 B.C.). Of course, she could not serve as high priest, so the two functions were separated. Her oldest son, Hyrcanus II, became high priest. He was not ambitious. Her younger son, Aristobulus II, was just the opposite. He was waiting for his mother to die so he could become king and high priest.

When Salome died, civil war broke out and lasted until 63 B.C. Aristobulus easily defeated Hyrcanus, who was content to retire. This might have been the end of the story were it not for Antipater, an Idumean. He persuaded Hyrcanus to seek the help of the king of Nabatea to regain his position. Aristobulus was driven back to Jerusalem. At this point Rome arrived on the scene. Both Aristobulus and Hyrcanus appealed to Scaurus, the Roman general charged with the administration of Palestine. He sided with Aristobulus. When the Roman commander Pompey arrived later, both appealed to him. Aristobulus ended up trying to fight against the Romans. He was defeated and taken as a prisoner to Rome. The Romans took control over Palestine.

The Roman Period, 63 B.C. to A.D. 70 Under the Romans, the Jews paid heavy taxes, but their religious practices were not changed. Roman power was exercised through Antipater, who was named governor of Palestine. Hyrcanus was made high priest. The situation in Palestine was confused due to the efforts of Aristobulus and his sons to lead revolts against Rome. While Palestine was successively under the control of various Roman officials, Antipater was the stabilizing force. He had one son, Phasael, named governor of Judea, and a second son, Herod, made governor of Galilee. Herod sought to bring order to his area. He arrested Hezekiah, a Jewish robber or rebel, and had him executed. The Sanhedrin in Jerusalem summoned Herod to give an account of his action. He went, dressed in royal purple and with a bodyguard. The Sanhedrin could do nothing.

Antipater was murdered in 43 B.C. Antony became the Roman commander in the East in 42 B.C. In 40 B.C. the Parthians invaded Palestine and made Antigonus, the last surviving son of Aristobulus, king of Palestine. Hyrcanus was mutilated by having his ears cut or bitten off so he could not serve as high priest again. Phasaël was captured and committed suicide in prison. Herod barely escaped with his family. He went to Rome to have his future brother-in-law, Aristobulus, made king, hoping to rule through him as his father had ruled through Antipater. However, the Roman Senate, at the urging of Antony and Octavian (Augustus), made Herod king (40 B.C.). It took him three years to drive the Parthians out of the country and establish his rule. He was king until his death in 4 B.C.

The years of Herod's rule were a time of turmoil for the Jewish people. He was an Idumean. Of course, his ancestors had been forced to convert to Judaism, but the people never accepted him. He was the representative of a foreign power. No matter how well he served Rome, he could never satisfy the Jews. Even his marriage to Mariamne, the granddaughter of Aristobulus II, gave no legitimacy to his rule in their sight. The most spectacular of his building achievements, the rebuilding of the Jerusalem temple, did not win the loyalty of the Jews.

Herod had many problems that grew out of his jealousy and fears. He had Aristobulus, his brother-in-law, executed. Later Mariamne, her mother, and her two sons were killed. Just five days before his own death, Herod had his oldest son Antipater put to death. His relations with Rome were sometimes troubled due to the unsettled conditions in the empire. Herod was a strong supporter of Antony even though he could not tolerate Cleopatra with whom Antony had become enamored. When Antony was defeated by Octavian in 31 B.C., Herod went to Octavian and pledged his full support. This support was accepted. Herod proved himself an efficient administrator on behalf of Rome. He kept the peace among a people who were hard to rule. To be sure, he was a cruel and merciless man. Yet he was generous, using his own funds to feed the people during a time of famine. He never got over the execution of Mariamne, the wife he loved above all others. His grief led to mental and emotional problems.

During the reign of Herod, Jesus was born (Matt. 2:1-18; Luke 1:5). Herod was the king who ordered the execution of the male babies in Bethlehem (Matt. 2:16-18).

At his death Herod left a will leaving his kingdom to three of his sons. Antipas was to be tetrarch (“ruler of a fourth”) of Galilee and Perea (4 B.C.-A.D. 39). Philip was to be tetrarch of Gentile regions to the northeast of the Sea of Galilee (4 B.C.-A.D. 34). Archelaus was to be king of Judea and Samaria. Rome honored the will except that Archelaus was not given the title of king. He was ethnarch (“ruler of the people”) of these two territories. He proved to be a poor ruler and was deposed in A.D. 6. His territories were placed under the direct rule of Roman procurators who were under the control of the governor of Syria.

Literature The Jews produced many writings during the Intertestamental Period. These writings can be divided into three groups. The Apocrypha are writings that were included, for the most part, in the Greek translation of the OT, the Septuagint. They were translated into Latin and became a part of the Latin Vulgate, the authoritative Latin Bible. Some are historical books. First Maccabees is our chief source for the history of the period from Antiochus Epiphanes to John Hyrcanus. Other books are Wisdom Literature. Others can be classified as historical romances. One is apocalyptic, giving attention to the end of time and God's intervention in history. One writing is devotional in nature. A second group of writings is the Pseudepigrapha. It is a larger collection than the Apocrypha, but there is no final agreement as to which writings should be included in it. Fifty-two writings are included in the two volumes, The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, edited by James H. Charlesworth. These cover the range of Jewish thought from apocalyptic to wisdom to devotional. Their title indicates that they are attributed to noted people of ancient times, such as Adam, Abraham, Enoch, Ezra, and Baruch. For the most part they were written in the last centuries before the birth of Jesus, although some of them are from the first century A.D.

The final group of writings from this period is the Qumran scrolls, popularly known as the Dead Sea Scrolls. The first knowledge of these came with the discovery of manuscripts in a cave above the Dead Sea in 1947. During subsequent years, fragments of manuscripts have been found in at least 11 caves in the area. These writings include OT manuscripts, writings of the Qumran sect, and writings copied and used by the sect that came from other sources. These writings show us something of the life and beliefs of one group of Jews in the last two centuries before Jesus. IOB (I'ob) Personal name of uncertain meaning but of different Hebrew spelling than the biblical sufferer Job, a difference not made in KJV. Son of Issachar, according to Gen. 46:13; but a copyist apparently omitted one Hebrew letter, the name appearing as Jashub in Samaritan Pentateuch and some Greek manuscripts of Genesis (followed by NRSV, NIV, TEV) and in Num. 26:24; 1 Chron. 7:1. See Jashub.

IOTA See Dot.

IPHDEIAH or IPHEDEIAH (Iph (ə) də' ya) Personal name meaning “Yah redeems.” Member of tribe of Benjamin who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:25).

IPHTAH (Iph' ta) Place-name meaning “he opened.” Town in tribal territory of Judah in the Shephelah (Josh. 15:43). It may be located at modern Terqumiyeh, halfway between Hebron and Beit Jibrin.

IPHTAHEL (Iph' ta əl) Place-name meaning “God opens.” Valley separating tribal territories of Zebulun and Asher (Josh. 19:14,27). It is modern Wadi el-Melek.

IR (Ir) Personal name meaning “city” or “donkey's calf.” Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:12). Some Bible students refer to Gen. 46:23 and think a copyist misread the name, writing Ir rather than an original Dan, which looks much like Ir in Hebrew (REB).

IRA (I' rā) Personal name meaning “city” or “donkey's colt.” 1. Priest under David (2 Sam. 20:26). KJV and a few Bible students see “priest” here as a civil office rather than a religious one. Ira was apparently from Havoth-jair in Gilead (Num. 32:41), though some Bible students think he was from Kiriath-jearim (1 Sam. 7:1). Ira is not identified as a Levite, and his function is not related to those of Abiathar and Zadok, the official priests. Thus some have concluded that he served on David's private staff as a personal priest to the king. Similarly, David's sons served as priests (2 Sam. 8:18 NRSV, REB, TEV). 2. Two of David's military heroes were named Ira (2 Sam. 23:26,38). Ira from Tekoa was also an officer in charge of the sixth month's “national guard” army (1 Chron. 27:9).

IRAD (I' rād) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Enoch (Gen. 4:18).

IRAM (I' rām) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Tribal leader in Edom (Gen. 36:43).

IRI (I' ri) Personal name meaning “my city” or “my donkey's colt.” Leader in tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7).

IRIJAH (I ri' ja) Personal name meaning “Yah sees.” Army captain who accused Jeremiah of treason and turned him over to the authorities for punishment (Jer. 37:13) about 586 B.C. Apparently Jeremiah was going to inspect the field he had bought in Anathoth (Jer. 32:9). Since he had been preaching about ultimate victory for Babylon over Jerusalem, Irijah thought Jeremiah was trying to escape Jerusalem and join the Babylonian army, then retreat from Jerusalem. The prophet's mission included suffering. Loyalty to God did not always mean loyalty to the government or protection from the government. Both Irijah and Jeremiah thought they were serving God. History proved Jeremiah correct.

IRNAHASH (ir nā' hāsh) Place-name meaning “city of the snake” or “city of bronze.” Modern Deir Nahhas about five and one half miles north of Lydda or Khirbet Nahash on the northern end of the Arabah. First Chronicles 4:12 lists it as a personal name in the descendants of Judah, using the Table of Nations (Gen. 10) and other passages of listing cities by original ancestors in the form of a genealogy.

IRON Metal that was a basic material for weapons and tools in the biblical period. The Iron Age began in Israel about 1200 B.C., though introduction of this metal into daily life occurred slowly. The Bible mentions iron in conjunction with Moses and with the Canaanite conquest, but at this time iron was rare and used mainly for jewelry. The availability of iron was a sign of the richness of the promised land (Deut. 8:9), and articles of iron were indications of wealth (Deut. 3:11; Josh. 6:19). Excavations of Israelite sites dating from the eleventh and twelfth centuries have uncovered rings, bracelets, and decorative daggers made of iron.

In early forging techniques iron was not much harder than other known metals and, unlike bronze and copper, it had to be worked while hot. As improved metalworking techniques became known, however, iron gradually became the preferred metal for tools such as plows, axes, and picks as well as for weapons such as spears and daggers. Iron chariots were a sign of great power in warfare (Josh. 17:18; Judg. 1:19; 4:3).

Older scholars taught that the Philistines held an iron monopoly over Israel. Increased availability of iron corresponds to the period of Philistia's collapse, and 1 Samuel records that the Philistines prevented smiths from working in Israel (1 Sam. 13:19-21). However, excavations in Philistia have uncovered no more iron implements than in Israelite cities. This suggests that the prohibition of smiths in Israel may refer to workers in bronze rather than iron or that for a period of history the Philistines had an economic and perhaps technological advantage, being able to control the iron industry.

Most likely, iron became common throughout the region due to disruption of sources of other metals and to increased trading to the north and over the sea. After 1000 B.C. iron became widely used. David emphasized the importance of taking metals as spoils of war, and he later used stockpiles of iron and bronze in preparation for building the temple (1 Chron. 22:3).

Iron is frequently used symbolically in the Bible. Related to the hardness of iron, it is used as a threat of judgment (Ps. 2:9; Rev. 2:27) or as a sign of strength (Isa. 48:4; Dan. 2:40). The imagery includes other aspects of ironworking: the furnace was a symbol of oppression (1 Kings 8:51), and the cauterizing effect of hot iron was used by Paul to describe those with no conscience (1 Tim. 4:2). IRON (ʾr rōn) Place-name meaning “fearful.” Town in tribal territory of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38), sometimes spelled Yiron (RSV, TEV, NASB). It is modern Yarun in modern Lebanon a mile and a half north-northwest of Baram, nine miles southwest of Lake Huleh, on the modern border between Israel and Lebanon.

IRONSMITH One who works with iron, either one who smelts ore or one who works cast pieces. Barzillai (2 Sam. 17:27-29; 19:31-39), whose name means “man of iron,” perhaps served as David's ironsmith. Solomon appealed to Hiram, the king of Tyre, for a skilled ironsmith (2 Chron. 2:7). Ironsmiths were among those assisting with Jehoiada's temple renovation (2 Chron. 24:12). The importance of smiths is highlighted by their inclusion in the classes singled out for deportation at the destruction of Jerusalem (2 Kings 24:14). Isaiah 44:12; 54:16 provide concise accounts of the ironsmith's work. See Iron; Occupations and Professions.

IRONY There are two basic meanings to the word “irony.” First, irony is a use of words to communicate something different from, and often opposite to, the literal meaning of the words. A famous instance of irony in this sense is when Job told his conceited know-it-all companions, “Truly then you are the people, and with you wisdom will die!” (Job 12:2 NASB). Of course, Job meant the exact opposite of what he said, and this is made plain by the context. The above reference to Job's companions as “know-it-all” is an example of irony. In speech, irony is usually discerned through the speaker's expressions and tone of voice. In writing, however, irony is discerned only through context. For example, in John 5:31 Jesus says, “If I testify about Myself, My testimony is not valid” (HCSB). Later, in John 8:14, he says the exact opposite: “Even if I testify about Myself,...My testimony is valid” (HCSB). How may these two seemingly contradictory statements be reconciled? It is likely that in the first instance, John 5:31, Jesus is using irony, and His meaning is, “Although I am Truth, and can speak nothing but truth, your minds are so prejudiced against Me that you will not believe Me if I testify about Myself.” The ironic meaning of His words would easily have been conveyed to His hearers with His tone of voice and gestures. Another example of ironic language is Paul's rebuking the Corinthians for their arrogance and complacency by saying, “Already you are full! Already you are rich! You have begun to reign as kings without us” (1 Cor. 4:8 HCSB).

Second, irony refers to a turn of events that is different from, and often opposite to, what was expected. For example, when Joseph's brothers sold him into Egypt, they thought they were getting rid of their boastful brother. Joseph had told them about his dreams of one day ruling over them, and they hated him for it. It is “ironic” that they one day willingly bowed down to Joseph when he had been made ruler of Egypt. Again, the book of Esther records how wicked Haman built a gallows intending to hang the godly Mordecai on it. It is “ironic” that Haman himself was hanged on his own gallows. It is “ironic” that when Saul of Tarsus was on his way to Damascus to persecute the Christians, he became a Christian himself. In each of these examples there is an incongruity between what was expected to happen and what actually happened, and that is “irony” in the second sense of the word.

IRPEEL (ir' pe el) Place-name meaning “God heals.” Town in tribal territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18:27). Location is not known.

IRRIGATION Transportation of water by man-made means such as canals, dams, aqueducts, and cisterns.

Old Testament The dry climate of the ancient Near East made the transportation of water, often across long distances, a necessity. Large canal systems crossed the lands of Egypt and Mesopotamia, providing the vast amounts of water necessary to support crops during the dry months of March to October. In Egypt, the second highest official, the vizier, oversaw the maintenance of canals and the allocation of water to the provinces. Joseph may have fulfilled this role during his service for Pharaoh. Water was drawn from the Nile River and offshoot irrigation canals by means of a hinged pole with a hanging bucket on the end. Egypt's canal system allowed agricultural use of the highly fertile desert lands that the annual flooding of the Nile did not cover. During the exile of Judah in Babylon, canals as large as 25 yards wide and several miles long carried the waters of the Tigris and Euphrates to field and city. Commercial ships used these waterways to transport produce between outlying farms and major cities.

At the second cataract of the Nile River a scene of primitive irrigation with the use of manpower.

The irrigation of fields was not widely practiced in ancient Israel. Instead, farmers relied upon the winter rains to provide all the water necessary for crops during the coming year. Fields and gardens close to water sources may have used small irrigation channels, and some fields may have been watered by hand in particularly dry years. Runoff from the rains was collected and diverted through conduits to both communal and private cisterns for drinking water. In larger cities such as Gezer, Megiddo, Hazor, and Jerusalem, engineers and workmen produced huge underground tunnel systems to provide the citizens with ample supplies of water. These tunnels maintained the cities needs in times of siege.

New Testament During Intertestamental and NT times massive Roman aqueducts were built to provide fresh water for the growing cities. A two-channeled canal ran 15 miles from its source to the coastal city of Caesarea. Water for Jerusalem was carried northward through an elaborate series of canals and pools from the Bethlehem area. Along the Dead Sea, where rain seldom fell, communities with elaborate canals and catch ponds thrived by capturing the runoff of rains that fell in the hill country and drained towards the Jordan Valley. Cities in the Negev developed an extensive network of dams to collect infrequent rains, allowing them to turn the desert into thriving orchards and wheat fields.

IRSEMESH (Ir shē' mēsh) Place-name meaning “city of the sun.” Town in tribal territory of Dan (Josh. 19:41) on the border of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:10, called Beth-shemesh or house of the sun). See Beth-shemesh.

IRU (I' ru) Personal name meaning “donkey's colt” or “they protect.” Son of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:15). Many Bible students think the original text read Ir, a copyist joining the final u to the name when it should have been the first letter of the following word, meaning, “and.”

ISAAC (I' zək) Personal name meaning “laughter.” Only son of Abraham by Sarah and a patriarch of the nation of Israel.

Old Testament Isaac was the child of a promise from God, born when Abraham was 100 years old and Sarah was 90 (Gen. 17:17; 21:5). Isaac means “he laughs” and reflects his parents' unbelieving laughter regarding the promise (Gen. 17:17-19; 18:11-15) as well as their joy in its fulfillment (Gen. 21:1-7). Sarah wanted Hagar and Ishmael banished. God directed Abraham to comply, saying that it would be through Isaac that his descendants would be reckoned (Gen. 21:8-13; cp. Rom. 9:7). Abraham's test of faith was God's command to sacrifice Isaac (Gen. 22:1-19).

Isaac married Rebekah (Gen. 24), who bore him twin sons, Esau and Jacob (Gen. 25:21-28). Isaac passed her off as a sister at Gerar (as Abraham had done). He became quite prosperous, later moving to Beersheba (Gen. 26). Isaac was deceived into giving Jacob his blessing and priority over Esau (Gen. 27). Isaac died at Mamre near Hebron at the age of 180 and was buried by his sons (Gen. 35:27-29).

Though less significant than Abraham and Jacob, Isaac was revered as one of the Israelite patriarchs (Exod. 3:6; 1 Kings 18:36; Jer. 33:26). Amos used the name Isaac as a poetic expression for the nation of Israel (Amos 7:9,16).

New Testament In the NT Isaac appears in the genealogies of Jesus (Matt. 1:2; Luke 3:34), as one of the three great patriarchs (Matt. 8:11; Luke 13:28; Acts 3:13), and an example of faith (Heb. 11:20). Isaac's sacrifice by Abraham (Heb. 11:17-18; James 2:21), in which he was obedient to the point of death, serves as a type looking forward to Christ and as an example for Christians. Paul reminded believers that “you, brothers, like Isaac, are children of promise” (Gal. 4:28 HCSB).

ISAIAH (Izā' a) Personal name meaning “Yahweh saves.” Isaiah ministered primarily to the Southern Kingdom of Judah, although he was interested in the affairs of the Northern Kingdom of Israel during its time of demise and ultimate fall in 722/21 B.C. According to Isa. 1:1, the prophet ministered under the Judahite kings of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. Neither the beginning nor closing dates of Isaiah's prophesying can be discerned with certainty.

Isaiah 6 dates the temple vision of Isaiah to the year of Uzziah's death in 740 B.C. Often the temple vision is assumed to be Isaiah's “call,” but the experience is never stated specifically in those terms. Isaiah's temple vision took place in the year that Uzziah died. The assertion of 1:1 that the prophet served during the days of Uzziah is a strong indication he prophesied prior to Uzziah's death. Possibly, the prophet ministered earlier during Uzziah's reign with chapter 6 recounting a particularly momentous event in the life of the prophet but not the call experience itself. Similarly, the close of Isaiah's ministry cannot be dated with certainty. The last datable prophecy records the Sennacherib crisis of 701 B.C. (chaps. 36-37), although the prophet may have continued to minister beyond this point. The Assumption of Isaiah, an apocryphal book, preserves the tradition that the prophet was sawn in half at the command of Manasseh, who began to reign around 689 B.C.

Relatively little is known about the prophet in spite of the large book associated with him. He was the son of Amoz (1:1). Jewish tradition mentions Amoz as the brother of King Amaziah of Judah. If this assumption is correct, Isaiah and Uzziah were cousins, thus making Isaiah a member of the nobility. This family connection would explain the impact of Uzziah's death (chap. 6) on the prophet as well as the apparent ready access Isaiah had to the kings to whom he ministered.

Isaiah was married to "the prophetess" (8:3) and had at least two sons, Shear-jashub, "A Remnant will Return" (7:3) and Maher-shalal-hashbaz, "Speed the Spoil; Hasten the Prey" (8:3). The sons' names were symbolic and served as warnings to Isaiah's generation of God's coming judgment against Judah's rebellion.

ISAIAH, BOOK OF The book of Isaiah stands at the head of the classical prophetic books both in the order of the English canon as well as the Hebrew canon. The English division of Scripture into the "Major Prophets" and the "Minor Prophets" places Isaiah first among the Major Prophets. In the Hebrew canon Isaiah appears first among the "Latter Prophets," the section including also the books of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and "The Twelve" (that is, the "Minor Prophets").

Division of the Book Of particular scholarly interest is the question of the division of the book and the related issues of authorship. In the late 18th century, different theories regarding the authorship of Isaiah began to emerge. The issue of authorship is directly related to the division of the book into sections. Different sections of Isaiah do contain different emphases, issues, vocabulary, style, and even historical perspectives. However, whether these differences demand different authors for the book is debated.

Isaiah 1-39 The issues and events found in Isa. 1-39 clearly relate to the times of Isaiah as an eighth-century prophet. In fact, in some of the oracles, Isaiah relates the story in first person (chaps. 6 and 8). Other oracles, although told in third person, refer to incidents in Isaiah's lifetime (chaps. 20; 36-39). The historical background of Isa. 1-39 involves Assyrian aggression and attempts on the part of Assyria to expand control into the areas of Israel and Judah. Isaiah 7 and 8 clearly have Assyrian interference in the region as their historical basis. Assyria is mentioned specifically in chapter 10, as well as chapters 20 and 36-37. Assyria is the major international power in the region in chapters 1-39.

Another indication that Isa. 1-39 comes from the time of the Prophet Isaiah is the frequent occurrence of the prophet's name (occurs 16 times in 1-39). Isaiah interacts with various people on several occasions in these chapters. The clear intent of the text is to show Isaiah acting and prophesying during the first 39 chapters.

A major emphasis in this section of the book is the prediction of exile because of the nation's rebellion against God. The clearest statement of this is Isa. 39:5-7. In the early chapters of Isaiah, judgment has not yet come upon the people, but it is predicted.

Isaiah 40-66 The situation changes in Isa. 40-66. The prophet's name does not appear at all nor is any indication given that the prophet is acting or speaking. Of greater importance is the change in the major world power. Assyria is no longer the emphasis; Babylon is now the power. Babylon and Babylon's gods receive attention (Isa. 46-48). The mention of Cyrus (45:1), the Persian king who conquered Babylon, presumes a Babylonian background.

The judgment upon God's people for their sin that was prophesied in Isa. 1-39 is depicted as having already happened in Isa. 40-66. Jerusalem had received God's judgment (40:2) and was in ruins (44:26,28). God had given Judah into Babylon's hand (47:5-6). Jerusalem had drunk the cup of God's wrath (51:17). The temple had been destroyed (63:18; 64:10-11). The historical perspective of chapters 40-66 seems clearly different from the perspective found in 1-39. The explanation for this, some argue, is that Isaiah prophesied extensively about these future events; others, that someone(s) later appended what befell Judah as the consummation of what the prophet had earlier predicted. Clearly, the latter chapters need to be interpreted in the light of the events of the sixth-century exile to Babylon and return while the earlier chapters need to be interpreted based on events in the eighth century.

Authorship Issues Multiple Authorship View Scholars disagree on whether the difference in historical perspectives in the two sections of Isaiah demand different authors for those sections. Many modern scholars hold to multiple authorship. That is, Isaiah was responsible for the first 39 chapters, while “Deutero-Isaiah” (Second Isaiah), a prophet living during the exile, was responsible for the later chapters. Still other scholars would divide further the later chapters into “Deutero-Isaiah” (chaps. 40-55) and “Trito-Isaiah,” or “Third Isaiah” (chaps. 56-66). The perspective of 56-66 focuses more on worship issues, thus some hold to a different author and setting for those chapters. Still further divisions are advocated by some scholars based upon the various genre and/or repetition in the text, e.g., apocalyptic material (24-27), history (36-39), “woe” statements (28-33), servant passages, and so on.

Discussion of the authorship of Isaiah emerged in the late 18th century with J. C. Döderlein (1775), who separated 40-66 from 1-39. In the 19th century, Bernard Duhm (1892) separated the book further by attributing 56-66 to “Trito-Isaiah.” Among the reasons for the division of the book were internal evidence, stylistic concerns, and different theological emphases, though recent studies have shown that none of these actually require multiple settings or authors. Still a lingering, major concern for many scholars is the issue of the basic prophetic function, that is, the prophet primarily addressing his contemporary audience. However, in the latter portion of Isaiah, the focus is not on Isaiah's eighth-century setting but on the situation of the exile, an event that occurred over 100 years later. Not infrequently the prophets did address issues beyond their time frame, but for a prophet to devote such a large portion of material to a generation not yet born is indeed unusual though not beyond the scope of God's sovereignty. Likewise, numerous scholars have a problem with the specific mention of Cyrus since he would have been unknown to Isaiah (apart from divine revelation). So, this too causes some scholars to attribute the later chapters of Isaiah to a later prophet who knew of the rise of the Persian king.

Single Authorship View Although many scholars would divide the book of Isaiah among two or more authors, other scholars hold to single authorship of the book. The designation as “single author” may be misleading. Few would argue that Isaiah personally penned every word. Rather, this view holds that the messages themselves derive from the Prophet Isaiah, leaving open the possibility that Isaiah's disciples later organized or put the prophet's oracles in writing. Several reasons exist for the single author view.

One of the arguments for division of the book has to do with stylistic issues. Proponents for division argue that the style and vocabulary are different between the sections. These stylistic differences do exist; however, the importance of these differences has been overstated. Considering the differences in historical perspective, subject matter, and themes between the sections, one would expect stylistic alterations, especially if the sections were from different periods in Isaiah's life. Over the prophet's 40-plus years of ministry, events and perceptions could easily create changes in literary style.

Although differences are present, many similarities also exist between the sections of the book. Several images are used consistently throughout the book: light and dark (5:20,30; 9:2; 42:16; 50:10; 59:9; 60:1-3); blindness and deafness (6:10; 29:10,18; 32:3; 42:7,16-19; 43:8; 44:18; 56:10); human beings as fading flowers (1:30; 40:6-7; 64:6); God as potter and mankind as a vessel (29:16; 45:9; 64:8). Also, the distinctive name for God in Isaiah is “the Holy One of Israel.” This epithet occurs 31 times in Scripture, with 25 of them appearing in the book of Isaiah. (The occurrence in 2 Kings 19:22 was also spoken by Isaiah.) In Isaiah, the name occurs 12 times in chapters 1-39 and 13 times in 40-66, thus indicating a continuity of thought across the entire book.

The NT includes quotations and allusions from Isaiah on several occasions. In each instance, no indication is given that the book should be divided. For example, John 12:38-40 alludes to both Isa. 53:1 and Isa. 6:10, indicating both were spoken by Isaiah. Likewise, the Dead Sea Scrolls sheds light on the unity of the book. Among the discoveries at Qumran was a complete copy of Isaiah. The particular placement of Isa. 40 is interesting. Chapter 39 ends on the next to the last line on the page. Chapter 40 begins on the last line. If a break ever existed between chapters 39 and 40, the copyists at Qumran did not indicate it. However, a break of three blank lines does exist after chapter 33, with chapter 34 beginning on the following page. The Dead Sea Scrolls thus do not solve the problem of the division of Isaiah. Rather, they complicate the issue.

Theology of Isaiah Holiness of God In the temple vision Isaiah saw God as holy. The cry of the seraphim depicted God as “Holy, Holy, Holy.” The holiness of God indicates the separateness of God from all other entities. God is transcendent, morally pure, and separated from sin. This attribute of God brings into contrast the attitude of the nation of Judah in Isaiah's day. The name, “the Holy One of Israel,” contrasts the holiness of God with the sinfulness of God's people. The holy God seeks a relationship with human beings, and in that relationship, God demands holiness from His people.

Sin and Resulting Judgment God demands obedience and holiness from His people. The nations of Israel and Judah, however, constantly rebelled. Isa. 1:2-4 depicts the people as rebellious children who refused to listen and obey. These actions prompted God's judgment in 1:24-25. God neither overlooks nor excuses sin. Instead, God seeks repentance on the part of human beings (1:16-20). If the offer for repentance is refused, judgment for sin is administered. Even judgment, however, has a redeeming purpose, with God seeking to restore people through the discipline of judgment (1:24-25). The themes of sin and judgment are echoed throughout the book. The judgment of exile presupposed by chapters 40-66 is the exile prophesied because of sin in chapters 1-39. The judgment in the exile, however, was not designed to destroy the people but rather to purify them.

The recurring theme of “remnant” is associated with the theology of sin and judgment. The idea of remnant occurs often, even appearing in the name of Isaiah's son, Shearjashub, “A Remnant will Return.” After the promised judgment in the form of exile fell upon God's people, a remnant would return to possess the land again. The remnant was both a positive and negative reminder to the nation. Although God would preserve and cause a remnant to return after the exile, many who entered the judgment would not return. The severe consequences of sin brought judgment, but God's grace promised a remnant.

God as the Sovereign Lord of History Although Assyria, and later Babylon and Persia, were the international powers who seemed to work at will among the nations, Isaiah pictured Israel's God as the controlling hand behind all powers. In Isa. 10:5-19, Assyria was nothing more than a rod in God's hand used to discipline Israel and Judah. Similarly, God controlled and used Babylon in Isa. 47. Babylon's boasting and arrogance was brought low by the hand of God. Assyria and Babylon thought of themselves as powerful. In reality, God controlled history, using sometimes Assyria, sometimes Babylon, sometimes Persia to accomplish His plan for history.

Faith in God Is True Security Judah and Israel tended to depend on themselves for security. Isaiah's words called for something much more secure. Isaiah 7 illustrates the need for trust in God. Ahaz, the newly installed king of Judah, was threatened by the combined armies of Syria and Israel. God through Isaiah counseled faith. Ahaz, however, refused to trust God, choosing instead to trust the power of Assyria. As a result of Ahaz's lack of faith, Assyrian influence entered Jerusalem. Rather than enjoying the blessings of obedience to God, the nation suffered the consequences of refusing to trust God. The opposing choices of trusting God or trusting other nations occur throughout the book of Isaiah. True security and safety does not lie in military armaments nor alliances with other nations. Faith in the Sovereign Lord of history provides the only true security (7:9; 28:16; 30:15).

Messiah and Suffering Servant The word “messiah” simply means “anointed.” Cyrus is the “messiah” or “anointed” in 45:1. The anointing of an individual indicated the empowering of God for a particular task. Thus, even the pagan king Cyrus could be “messiah” because God was empowering him for service to return the exiles to the land. The messiah concept later developed into a designation for the promised king from David's line.

The messiah of Isaiah is an enigmatic figure. Sometimes this image is a branch (11:1), other times a kingly figure (9:6-7), and other times a suffering servant (50:6; 53:3-6). Isaiah, however, never made a distinct connection between the messianic passages dealing with kingship and those having the suffering servant motif. The messiah and the suffering servant themes seem contradictory, at least initially. The messiah would rule while the servant suffered and died for the nation. From the NT perspective, one can easily see how Jesus fulfilled both images in His ministry. The church, knowing how Jesus suffered, yet believing He would also return to rule, combined the concepts into the ministry of the ultimate Messiah, the Christ.

ISAIAH, MARTYRDOM OF Jewish narrative elaborating the sins of Manasseh (2 Kings 21:16). The original was probably written in Hebrew or Aramaic and then translated into Greek in the pre-Christian era or perhaps in the first or early second century A.D. The narrative concerns Isaiah who makes predictions concerning the evil deeds of Manasseh. An evil priest offers Isaiah freedom if he will retract his prophecies of judgment. Empowered by God's Spirit, Isaiah resists and suffers martyrdom by being sawn in two. Hebrews 11:37 is a likely allusion to such a tradition of the faithfulness and martyrdom of Isaiah. Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and the Talmud are similarly aware of such a tradition. The familiarity of Origen (about A.D. 225) and IV Baruch (about A.D. 200) with details of the tradition suggests their dependence on the Martyrdom of Isaiah. See Pseudepigrapha.

ISCAH (Is' cá) Personal name, perhaps meaning "they look." Daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah (Nahor's wife) and Lot. Thus she was an intimate part of the ancestral family of Abraham (Gen. 11:29). Tradition has tried to make Iscah another name for Sarah or to say she was Lot's wife. No biblical information gives foundation for such late interpretations.

ISCARIOT (Is' cár' i ot) Personal name transliterated from Hebrew into Greek and meaning "man of Kerioth," or perhaps a name derived from Latin and meaning "assassin" or "bandit." Surname of both the disciple Judas who betrayed Jesus (Mark 3:19) and of his father Simon (John 6:71). If "bandit" is the meaning of the name, Judas and his father may have been members of a patriotic party, the Zealots. "Man of Kerioth" is probably the meaning of the surname, referring to town of Kerioth. See Judas; Kerioth.

ISHBAH (ĭsh' bá) Personal name meaning “he soothes.” Member of tribe of Judah known as father of town of Eshtemoa (1 Chron. 4:17).

ISHBAK (ĭsh' bák) Personal name meaning “come before, excel.” Son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2). May be the same as Yasbuq in Assyrian sources and refers to a tribal ancestor of a tribe in northern Syria.

ISHBIBENOB (ĭsh bí bè' nób) Personal name meaning “inhabitant of Nob.” Philistine who tried to kill David in battle (2 Sam. 21:16-17). He is described literally as “who (was) among the children of the Raphah.” Traditionally, this has been connected with the Rephaim and translated “giant” (KJV, TEV, NASB, NRSV). NIV translates literally, “the descendants of Rapha.” Some Bible students interpret this as being an elite group of warriors under a vow to the god Rapha, or it may mean “the men of the scimitar” or sword. Other Bible students use Greek manuscript evidence to replace the unusual name Ishbibenob with another—Dodo son of Joash—but this is a drastic solution. Another solution changes the text to read the name as a verb meaning “they camped in Nob,” leaving the soldier unnamed. The soldier Ishbibenob was killed by David's faithful soldier Abishai. See Nob.

ISH-BOSHETH (ĭsh-bó' shèth) Personal name meaning “man of shame.” Son of Saul and his successor as king of Israel (2 Sam. 2:8). After Saul's death, Abner the commander of Saul's army proclaimed Ish-bosheth king. He reigned for two years. His own captains finally murdered him (2 Sam. 4:1-7). The name Ish-bosheth means “man of shame.” Originally his name was Ishbaal (1 Chron. 8:33), which means “man of Baal.” The repugnance with which Baal worship was regarded by the faithful in Israel frequently led to the substitution of the word for shame in the place of the name of the Canaanite deity. See Saul.

ISHHOD (ĭsh' hód) Personal name meaning “man of vigor and vitality.” Member of tribe of Manasseh, east of the Jordan (1 Chron. 7:18).

ISHI (ĭsh' í) Personal name meaning “my deliverer or salvation.” 1. Descendant of Jerahmeel in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:31). 2. Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20). 3. Father of military leaders of tribe of Simeon who successfully fought the Amalekites (1 Chron. 4:42). 4. Clan leader in tribe of Manasseh, east of the Jordan (1 Chron. 5:24). 5. Transliteration of Hosea's wordplay between “my man” or “my husband” (Hb. ishi) and “my master” or “my lord” (Hb. ba 'ali) (Hos. 2:16 KJV, NASB). Hosea looked to the day when Israel would quit worshiping or even pronouncing the name of Baal and would be totally faithful to Yahweh as “her man” and “her master.”

ISHIAH (ʾish i a) (1 Chron. 7:3 KJV) See Isshiah.

ISHIJAH (ʾish i' ja) (KJV, NIV) See Isshijah.

ISHMA (ʾish' má) Short form of Ishmael meaning “God hears.” Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:3).

ISHMAEL (ʾish' má el) Personal name meaning “God hears.” Son of Abraham by the Egyptian concubine Hagar (Gen. 16:11). He became the progenitor of the Ishmaelite peoples. The description in Gen. 16:12 points to an unruly and misanthropic disposition. Ishmael and his mother were expelled from the camp of Abraham at the insistence of Sarah following the birth of Sarah's son Isaac. The boy was near death in the wilderness when the angel of God directed Hagar to a well. Genesis 21:20 explains that God was with Ishmael and that he became an archer. See Abraham; Midian, Midianites; Patriarchs.

ISHMAELITE (ʾish' má el it) Tribal name for descendants of Ishmael. According to Gen. 25:12-16, Ishmael was the father of 12 sons. The Ishmaelites were regarded as an ethnic group, generally referring to the nomadic tribes of northern Arabia. The Ishmaelites were not, however, exclusively associated with any geographic area. References to them in the OT are relatively few. The people to whom Joseph was sold by his brothers are called Ishmaelites in Gen. 37:25. See Abraham; Ishmael.

ISHMAIAH (ʾish mi' a) Long and short form of personal name meaning “Yah(weh) hears.” 1. Military hero from Gibeon in charge of David's select “30” warriors (1 Chron. 12:4), though he is not listed among the “30” in 2

Sam. 23 or 1 Chron. 11. He does illustrate early support for David from Saul's tribe of Benjamin. 2. Head of tribe of Zebulun under David (1 Chron. 27:19).

ISHMERAI (ĭsh' mə rī) Short form of personal name meaning "Yah protects." Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:18).

ISHOD (ĭ' shōd) (KJV) See Ishhod.

ISHPAH (ĭsh' pā) Personal name, perhaps meaning "baldhead." Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:16).

ISHPAN (ĭsh' pān) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:22).

ISHTAR [ĭsh' tār] Mesopotamian goddess of fertility and war. In her role as goddess of fertility, Ishtar was associated with Tammuz, the god of vegetation. Ishtar was sometimes identified with the planet Venus and was designated "Mistress of Heaven" in the Amarna tablets. The goddess is perhaps the "Queen of heaven" of Jer. 7:18; 44:17-19,25; Ezek. 8:14. See Ashtaroth; Babylon; Fertility Cult; Tammuz.

ISHTOB (ĭsh' tōb) Personal name meaning "man of good" or "man of Tob." KJV follows early translations in interpreting this as a proper name (2 Sam. 10:6,8). The standard Hebrew manuscript apparently has two words, indicating a common noun phrase. Thus most modern translations read "men of Tob." A manuscript from the Dead Sea Scrolls has Ishtob as one word and thus as a proper name, but modern Bible students still generally follow the standard manuscript rather than the older Dead Sea Scroll. "Man of Tob" could also refer to the ruler of Tob. See Tob.

ISHUAH (ĭsh' ū ā) (Gen. 46:17 KJV) See Ishvah.

ISHUAI (ĭsh' ū ī) (1 Chron. 7:30 KJV) See Ishvi.

ISHUI (ĭsh' ū ī) (1 Sam. 14:49 KJV) See Ishvi.

ISHVAH (ʾish' va) Personal name meaning “he is equal” or “he satisfies.” Son of Asher (Gen. 46:17). He is not named in Num. 26:44, leading some scholars to think that a copyist duplicated the following name Ishvi with a minor variation. KJV read the text with different vowel points than the standard Hebrew manuscript, spelling the name Ishuah.

ISHVI (ʾish' vi) Personal name meaning “he is equal,” “he satisfies,” or “he rules.” 1. Son of Asher (Gen. 46:17) and original clan ancestor of Ishvites (Num. 26:44). 2. Son of Saul (1 Sam. 14:49).

ISHVITE (ʾish' vit) See Ishvi.

ISHYO (1 Sam. 14:49 REB) See Ishvi.

ISLAND Tract of land surrounded by water. Modern translations sometimes replace the island or isle of the KJV with the terms coast, coastline, or coastland (cp. Gen. 10:5; Esther 10:1; Ps. 97:1; Isa. 11:11; Jer. 2:10). “Islands” frequently appears in parallel to people or nations (Isa. 41:1; 51:5; 66:19; Jer. 31:10) and to the earth (Isa. 42:4). Often the idea of distant people and places is stressed by the parallelism (Isa. 41:5; 49:1). The Hebrews were not a seafaring people and so easily equated the Mediterranean islands with the ends of the earth.

Scripture mentions many islands by name. Arvad (Ezek. 27:8,11) is an island two miles offshore from northern Phoenicia. Clauda or Cauda (NRSV) is a small island off Crete (Acts 27:16). Chios (Acts 20:15) is an island off the coast of Ionia. Coos or Cos (Acts 21:1 NIV) is an island 50 miles northwest of Rhodes. Crete (the OT Caphtor, Jer. 47:4; Amos 9:7) is an island 152 miles long located to the southeast of Greece (Titus 1:5,12). Cyprus (home of the OT Chittim, Jer. 2:10; Ezek. 27:6) is an island 75 miles long located toward the eastern end of the Mediterranean (Acts 4:36; 11:19-20 among others). Melita or Malta (NASB) is an island located 50 miles southwest of Sicily (Acts 27:39-28:10). Patmos is an island off the coast of Ionia west of Samos (Rev. 1:9). Rhodes is an island southwest of Asia Minor (Acts 21:1). Samos is an island located off the Ionian coast 12 miles southwest of Ephesus (Acts 20:15). Sardinia is a western Mediterranean island south of Corsica. Tyre (Ezek. 26:2) was a famous Phoenician island city.

ISMACHIAH (Īs má kí' a) Personal name meaning “Yahweh supports.” Priest and administrator in the temple under Conaniah and Shimei when Hezekiah was king of Judah (2 Chron. 31:13).

ISMAIAH (Īs má' ya) (KJV) See Ishmaiah.

ISMAKIAH (Īs má kí' a) (NIV) See Ismachiah.

ISPAH (Īs' pa) (KJV) See Ishpah.

ISRAEL (Īz' rá ēl) 1. Name of Northern Kingdom after Jeroboam led the northern tribes to separate from the southern tribes and form a separate kingdom (1 Kings 12). 2. Personal name meaning “God strives,” “God rules,” “God heals,” or “he strives against God.” Name that God gave Jacob after he wrestled with the divine messenger (Gen. 32:28). Afterwards Jacob was a changed person, limping on a damaged thigh, with new food regulations and a new experience with God that influenced the way he lived. His 12 sons became known as the “sons of Israel,” and the resulting nation became the nation of Israel. Thus Jacob's experience at the Jabbok became the foundation for the nation of God's chosen people. See Jacob.

ISRAEL, LAND OF The most common name in the OT for the land where the history of Israel takes place is Canaan. It occupies about 9,500 square miles, an area about the size of the state of Vermont, the upstate of South Carolina, or the country of Belgium. Canaan, or Palestine, reaches from the Mediterranean Sea on the west, to the Great Arabian Desert on the east, to the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon Mountains on the north, and the Sinai Desert on the south. It is about 150 miles from north to south and 75 miles from east to west. The very location of Israel profoundly affected what was to happen to her over the centuries, for she sat uncomfortably in the middle of the “Fertile Crescent” (including Egypt, Palestine, Mesopotamia, Anatolia, and Armenia, or to use modern names: Egypt, Lebanon, Syria, Turkey, Jordan, Iraq, and Iran). This area was the very matrix of humankind, a veritable cradle for civilization.

Due to its strategic location, it served as a land bridge between Asia and Africa, a meeting place, and a contested battlefield for many ancient powers, including Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome. To this day it remains one of the most geopolitically sensitive and important areas of the world.

From west to east the topographical features are the coastal plain, Galilee and the central hill country, flowing in a southerly direction from the Lebanon range; the Jordan Rift Valley, continuous with the Bekaa Valley, continuing south to the Dead Sea in the Arabah; and the Transjordanian highlands as the southern continuation of the Anti-Lebanon Mountains in Phoenicia/ Lebanon on into the Moab-Edom plateau. It is an arid and exotic land of great variety. Mountains in the north are in stark contrast to the Arabah and the lowest point on the earth, the Dead Sea, some 1,300 feet below sea level.

The Preexilic Period The Patriarchal Period Biblical interest in Canaan begins with the call of Abram (Gen. 12). His journey to Canaan occurred about 2092 B.C. He left his home of Ur of the Chaldeans in Mesopotamia earlier with his family but lingered in Haran where his father Terah died. With Sarai, his wife, and Lot, his nephew, he came at last to Canaan. Abram was not a nomadic shepherd tending sheep and goats but rather a merchant prince who traded with monarchs and commanded a security force of 318 men to guard his family and his assets. The names of people and places and events described have a ring of authenticity, and we may be confident that the Abraham cycle is a reliable historical record. Abraham received a promise from God that the land of Canaan would be given to his descendants forever, but the only land he ever owned in the land of promise was a burial plot for Sarah and himself. Initiating a pattern, the younger of Abram's son, Isaac, was the child of the promise. Isaac had twin sons, Jacob and Esau. Continuing the pattern, the younger of the twins, Jacob, became the child of the promise. His 12 sons became the namesakes for the 12 tribes of Israel, but the child of the promise, Judah, was not the hero of his generation, rather Joseph became the savior of his family.

There is no reason to doubt that Joseph really existed. His story (Gen. 37-50) accurately reflects the history of Egypt in the 19th century B.C. Joseph's story falls into three parts: Joseph and his brothers in Canaan, Joseph alone in Egypt, and Joseph in Egypt with his father Jacob (by this time renamed Israel), his brothers, and their families.

One of the younger sons but favored by his father, Joseph was resented deeply by his brothers who sold him into slavery and told his father he was dead. In Egypt he repeatedly overcame great obstacles until he rose to the right hand of Pharaoh. Famine sent his brothers to Egypt for food where they came before Joseph who, after testing them, brought his father's family to live in safety in Egypt about 1875 B.C. The Joseph stories exhibit an overwhelmingly Egyptian context that fits well what is known of this period. Joseph's story provides the explanation for why Jacob's family and the tribes of Israel found themselves in Egypt for the next 430 years.

The Egyptian Period Several hundred years of relative silence separate the end of the story of Joseph (Gen. 37-50) from the beginning of the story told in the Book of Exodus. Joseph's story indicates that Israel probably entered Egypt in the middle of the illustrious Twelfth Dynasty (ca. 1875-1850 B.C.). The Hyksos (Egyptian for "rulers of foreign lands") were an Asiatic people who seized control of Egypt during a time of political instability, overthrowing native Egyptian dynasties around 1730-1710 B.C. The Hyksos established their capital in the Nile River Delta at Avaris and controlled northern Egypt for about 250-260 years. The Hyksos were the people of the king who "knew not Joseph." The Hyksos did not control all Egypt for much of their sojourn but were leaders of a federation of rulers over various parts of Egypt. With their accession the lot of the Israelites worsened. No longer favored by the pharaohs, they instead were reduced to servitude. The Hyksos were expelled from Egypt about 1570 B.C.

Moses appeared early in the new kingdom era, born about 1526 B.C. His parents Amram and Jochebed sought to save his life from Pharaoh's decree, that all male Hebrew infants be killed, by setting him adrift on the Nile in a basket. His basket came to rest at the place where a daughter of Pharaoh bathed. She took the child in and raised him as the grandson of Pharaoh. Educated in the palace of Egypt, Moses received one of the finest educations in the world. Learning a spectrum of languages and a wide variety of subject matter that prepared him well to lead and govern the Israelites after they left Egypt. Likely the Pharaoh of Moses' infancy was Amenhotep I, and the successor who especially oppressed the Israelites was Thutmose I who reigned 1526-1512 B.C. Thutmose II reigned 1512-1504 B.C. and Thutmose III 1504-1450 B.C. Moses' foster mother likely was a powerful woman named Hatshepsut, who effectively controlled Egypt while Thutmose III was still a minor after his accession to the throne. Thutmose III fits best the pharaoh who sought Moses' life when he had killed a prominent Egyptian (at about age 40), and his successor Amenhotep II (reigned 1450-1425 B.C.) was probably the pharaoh of the exodus, which most likely occurred in 1447 or 1446 B.C.

The Exodus from Egypt—ca. 1447 B.C. The exodus from Egypt was to Israel what the Odyssey was to the Greeks and what the pilgrim fathers are to Americans. Israel's national identity was intimately tied to their deliverance from Egypt in the great exodus. This is graphically confirmed by the fact that some variation of the formula that Yahweh “brought you (Israel) up out of Egypt and the house of bondage” occurs 125 times in the OT.

Israel arrived at Mount Sinai around 1447 B.C. Though various locations have been suggested, the best option for the location of Mount Sinai is the traditional site Jebel Musa in the southern end of the Sinai Peninsula. At Sinai Israel entered into covenant with Yahweh, received the Ten Commandments, and began her first experience in self-governance.

The Wilderness Period—ca. 1447-1407 B.C. About a year later they started for the land of promise but were deterred from entry, first by disobedience and then by God, and did not arrive in Canaan for another 40 years. A remarkable sense of identity and mission emerged during the years in the Sinai wilderness. Also during these years Israel received all the legislation necessary for an orderly society. Good times and bad characterized Israel's wilderness experience. God supernaturally protected and preserved Israel, but the generation that refused to enter the land at God's command died out except for the two faithful spies, Joshua and Caleb.

Conquest of Canaan—ca. 1407-1400 B.C. One of the most dramatic stories ever told about the origin of a nation unfolded as Israel moved into the land of promise. A journey that could be made in eleven days stretched out for a total of 40 years. Near the end of this period Moses died and was buried by the Lord Himself and Joshua, an Ephraimite, assumed leadership of the nation. Joshua occupies comparatively little space in the record. He is introduced as Moses' successor and as the conqueror of Canaan (Deut. 1:38; 3:21,28; Josh. 1). Outside the book bearing his name, he is mentioned only in Exod. 17:8-16; Judg. 1:1, 2:6-9; 1 Kings 16:34; 1 Chron. 7:27; and Neh. 8:17.

Joshua did a remarkable job of organizing and executing the plan for the conquest of the land. Miraculously Israel crossed Jordan on dry ground during flood season. Israel renewed the covenant at Gilgal where all those males were circumcised who had not been in the wilderness. The conquests were impressive, beginning with the miraculous collapse of the walls of Jericho, yet some of the existing people in the land were not completely driven out and remained a source of difficulty for Israel throughout her existence.

Joshua apportioned the land to the 12 tribes according to the instructions God gave Moses, and the occupation of Canaan began. Things went well during the lifetime of those who served with Joshua, but then a dark period of serious spiritual decline began.

Period of the Judges—ca. 1360-1084 B.C. Judges 1:1-29 forms a literary transition from the life of Joshua to the period of the judges. The downward spiral lasted about 280 years. The judges, shophetim, were more like leaders or rulers than legal functionaries. The period was characterized by a recurring cycle of decline, oppression, repentance, and deliverance. The reforms never lasted, and oppression came again repeatedly. The reports of the work of the various judges are not strictly chronological and overlapped frequently, explaining how the elapsed time of 280 years is so much shorter than the aggregate total of 410 years for the 15 judges mentioned. Progressive spiritual decline is seen in progressively declining character of the successive judges, until they and their people are much more like the surrounding peoples than they are like a people belonging to the one true and living God.

Toward the end of this period, hope emerged in the heroic saga of Naomi, Ruth, and Boaz, who demonstrate that faithful Israelites remained loyal to their covenant Lord. From this family would come the great King David.

The last of the judges was the greatest: Samuel, a Benjaminite whose mother dedicated him to the service of the Lord. Raised by the priest Eli, Samuel became priest and judge when God excised the family of Eli for its unfaithfulness. Samuel administered the nation wisely and fairly, and stability prevailed during the time of his stewardship. However, the people longed to be like the other nations and asked for a king.

The United Monarchy—ca. 1051-931 B.C. Samuel was provoked, but God commanded him to give the people what they asked for, a king of their desire, Saul, son of Kish, a wealthy Benjaminite. A tall, handsome, and humble man, Saul did not seek power and accepted it reluctantly. But, once in command, Saul demonstrated poor judgment and an ultimately fatal lack of spiritual discernment.

Saul made a good beginning by defeating the Philistines with the intervention of young David who killed the Philistine champion Goliath foreshadowing things to come. Almost immediately Saul became suspicious and resentful of David and kept him close by giving David his daughter Michal in marriage and by making David a commander of troops who reported to Saul (1 Sam. 18). Saul was determined to pass the throne to his son Jonathan and neglected the kingdom to pursue David for years, his reign lasting about 40 years.

David was the youngest son of Jesse of Bethlehem. He served his father as a shepherd. Samuel anointed David years before his accession to the throne, and David consistently honored the king and repeatedly passed up opportunities to kill Saul. Rather than attack Saul, David ran from him for years. As Saul's kingdom disintegrated, David grew stronger and gained a significant following.

Ultimately Saul and Jonathan were slain in battle, and David reigned over his tribe of Judah for seven years in Hebron, while the remaining tribes were led by Saul's son, Ish-Bosheth. After Ish-Bosheth's brutal assassination, David acceded to the throne of all Israel for an additional 33 years, establishing his capital in Jerusalem. He defeated Israel's enemies and established peace for his people. David was Israel's greatest king, described by God as “a man after My heart” (Acts 13:22 HCSB; 1 Sam. 13:14), but failed morally and spent years in personal and family turmoil as a result. David not only had an affair with the wife of one of his most loyal subordinates, but when threatened with exposure, he engineered Uriah's death. His household never knew peace again, ultimately costing the lives of some of his children. David developed the plans for the temple and gathered the resources, but because of his own sins God did not allow him to complete the project.

At the end of David's life, the accession of his son Solomon to the throne was a bloody interfamily struggle. Solomon made a marvelous beginning, building and dedicating a magnificent temple. Genuinely humble, God prospered him beyond his fondest hopes. Solomon was revered for his wisdom and maintained a kingdom expanded to five times the size of the land God promised to Abraham, extending south to the Sinai and north to the Euphrates River. Solomon became one of the most significant monarchs of his era. By the end of his 40-year reign, his kingdom was strong, but his commitment to the Lord had waned, and his latter years were troubled by internal problems. Soon after his death, the united monarchy ended.

The Divided Monarchy—ca. 931-586 B.C. The united kingdom of the 12 tribes suddenly divided in 931/930 B.C. The 10 tribes in the north would henceforth be known as Israel or Ephraim (its most influential tribe). The two southern tribes, Judah and Benjamin, remained loyal to the house of David and were known as Judah. Even before the united kingdom was founded, the unity of Israel was fragile. Petty rivalries and jealousies were common during the period of the judges. The division between Judah and Israel was apparent even during Samuel's lifetime, but David achieved a high degree of national unity. The heavy taxes of Solomon and the forced periods of labor imposed on the people under Solomon and Rehoboam brought the matter to a head.

Sedition boiled toward the surface late in the reign of Solomon. Jeroboam, son of Nebat, was a successful supervisor of civilian labor in Ephraim for Solomon (1 Kings 11:27-28). The Prophet Ahijah from Shiloh met Jeroboam one day and tore his (Ahijah's) garment into 12 pieces, handed Jeroboam 10 of them, and announced that Jeroboam would become ruler over Israel (1 Kings 11:31). The rumor of this prophecy spread quickly and Jeroboam fled to Egypt where he found refuge with Pharaoh Shishak, a political opportunist. Peace was preserved until the death of Solomon, but then trouble arose quickly and Rehoboam was not wise enough to salvage the tenuous situation.

Rather than easing the onerous governmental burdens on the people, Rehoboam threatened to increase them, and 10 tribes rebelled, leaving the Southern Kingdom of Rehoboam containing only the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. Jeroboam, son of Nebat, became the first king of the Northern Kingdom and immediately led the people into idolatry. In order to make up for the loss of religious ties to Jerusalem, Jeroboam had two golden calves fashioned for the two sites of Dan and Bethel. Because of his apostasy Jeroboam's family forfeited the kingship. His name became a refrain and a stereotype for the evil in the reigns of the rulers of the Northern Kingdom.

Rehoboam was attacked by Jeroboam's ally, Pharaoh Shishak (Shosensq I, ca. 945-924 B.C.), who looted the temple and then moved further into the territory of Israel, Gilead, and Edom. An inscription left by Shishak at Karnak claimed the defeat of 150 cities in the region. Oddly Shishak did not consolidate his gains of territory but returned to Egypt where he soon died. Rehoboam secured his kingdom and turned over a stable nation to his son Abijah, who reigned only two years. He failed in an attempt to reunite the tribes. Abijah's son Asa reigned 41 years in Judah. He partially, but not entirely, reversed the religious deterioration of Judah.

In the entire subsequent history of the two nations, there were nine overlapping reigns or co-regencies, which makes the chronology in Kings and Chronicles hard to establish. The north also was divided once into two factions, which further confuses the issue. During the divided kingdom era each nation had 19 kings. The kings of the north came from nine dynasties (families) while all the kings of Judah were descended from David. The 19 kings of the north ruled from 930-722 B.C.; the average length of each reign was relatively brief. The kings of the south served from 930 to 586 B.C., demonstrating the greater stability and continuity of life in Judah. All the kings of the north are evaluated in Kings and Chronicles as bad, while the kings of Judah were partly bad and partly good kings. Ironically, the worst of the kings was from Judah: Manasseh, who sacrificed one of his own children as a pagan sacrifice.

During the Israelite monarchies, great nations came across the biblical stage as their affairs intersected those of Judah and Israel. Because the focus of the biblical record is on God's people, only vignettes and brief glimpses are provided of the larger history of the era. The details provided in the Bible are confirmed repeatedly by the archives and artifacts of various kinds left by other ancient kingdoms.

The relationship between Israel and Judah fluctuated from hostile to civil to fraternal over the life of the Northern Kingdom. Sometimes they were allied and at other times involved in competing alliances. Overall both kingdoms enjoyed periods of peace and prosperity. An ominous development was the emergence of Syria as a major power about the time of the division of the Israelite kingdom (ca. 930 B.C.). By about 850 B.C. Damascus was the capital of the most powerful state in the region. Assyria was in a time of domestic turmoil, which allowed more autonomy for other nations. After about a century of weakness, however, an Assyrian resurgence (ca. 745 B.C.) changed the geopolitical balance and foreshadowed future trouble for the Israelite kingdoms.

Syria became isolated and surrounded by territory under Assyrian control. With Syria thus preoccupied with problems of her own, Judah prospered most notably under the long reign of the good king Hezekiah. However, the end of Israel was just around the corner.

The last century of the Northern Kingdom (eighth century B.C.) was marked by the ministry of four great prophets: Amos, Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah, as well as Jonah. With perfect clarity they saw the demise of Israel and eventually Judah. Yet both nations believed themselves to be invincible because of their relationship with Yahweh. Most of the people ignored the prophets and clung to delusions of grandeur and safety.

Tragically the Assyrians swept Israel away after the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. Twice, perhaps, Assyria came against Judah (701 and 688 B.C.) but was unable to conquer her because of divine intervention. Judah continued for another 135 years, often as a vassal state of Assyria. Jerusalem ultimately fell in 587-586 B.C. to the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar, who displaced Assyria as the dominant world power late in the seventh century B.C. (ca. 612-609).

The Babylonian Exile The Babylonians deported most of the people of Judah. The Neo-Babylonian ascendancy was short lived. Babylon fell to her former ally, the Medo-Persian Empire in 539 B.C.

The Postexilic Period Shortly after the fall of Babylon, Cyrus the Great, the Persian king, allowed conquered peoples to relocate to their native lands (Ezra 1:2-4). The Jews began returning to Judah about 537 B.C. Under the leadership of Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, Jerusalem was resettled and a second temple was built. A measure of autonomy existed throughout this period. The OT era ended about 400 B.C. with the ministry of the Prophet Malachi.

The Intertestamental Period The period of Persian domination ended with the conquests of Alexander the Great, beginning in 332 B.C. Palestine changed hands several times between the Seleucid and Ptolemaic successors of Alexander. Greek domination of Palestine continued until the Jews succeeded in establishing an independent kingdom in a war that began in 167 B.C. under the leadership of an aged priest Mattathias and his sons, who became known as the Maccabees. In 63 B.C. Roman control of Palestine was established by the Roman General Pompey. The region was subdivided for purposes of governance by the Romans who sanctioned local rulers but also maintained control through the presence of the Roman military.

The New Testament Period and Beyond Roman control of Palestine continued beyond the NT era, culminating in the first Jewish War with Rome, ca. A.D. 66-72, in which the temple and Jerusalem were decimated (A.D. 70). Finally, after another war in the second century A.D. (ca. 135), the Jews were scattered throughout the Roman Empire. Palestine remained in Roman hands until about A.D. 400. See Chronology of the Biblical Period.

ISRAEL, SPIRITUAL The phrase “spiritual Israel” is often used as a description of the church in contrast to national or ethnic Israel. It refers to all believers in all times regardless of ethnic identity. Some interpreters see Paul's language of “Israel according to the flesh” (1 Cor. 10:18) as necessarily implying its antithesis, “Israel according to the Spirit,” and thus, “spiritual Israel.” While Paul's phrase may be suggestive, it is not conclusive. The idea of a “spiritual Israel” must rest on the basis of evidence drawn from texts viewed together.

In the NT believers are referred to in language that is drawn from OT quotes and concepts that in their original context explicitly refer to Israel. For instance, Peter addresses his readers as “a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for His possession” (1 Peter 2:9 HCSB), a clear reference to Exod. 19:5-6. Other terms, such as “chosen” (1 Thess. 1:4 NIV), “sons of God” (Rom. 8:14), and “heirs” (Gal. 3:29), are all descriptions of believers, both Jew and Gentile, in terms the OT writers used in reference to Israel.

Other texts make it clear that ethnic boundaries have no bearing on salvation. Paul is particularly concerned to show that there is no difference between Jew and Gentile as far as the saving grace of God in Christ is concerned (Rom. 1:16; 3:29-30; 10:12; Gal. 3:28). In Ephesians Paul asserts that Gentiles, once “without the Messiah, excluded from the citizenship of Israel, and foreigners to the covenants of the promise” (Eph. 2:12 HCSB), are now “fellow citizens with the saints, and members of God's household” (Eph. 2:19).

Perhaps the most important text, and certainly the most debated, is Galatians 6:16. In this text Paul uses the phrase “the Israel of God.” On one hand, Paul could be addressing Jewish Christians who are friendly to his ministry, as opposed to his Judaizing opponents. Thus the blessing, “May peace be on all those who follow this standard and mercy also be on the Israel of God” (HCSB) is extended to all believers, but Paul made the distinction in order to recognize ethnic Jews who are faithful to the gospel. On the other hand, in Galatians, Paul went to great lengths to de-emphasize the importance of ethnic boundaries since his opponents were adding Jewish customs and legal observances as requirements for Gentile believers. Therefore, to end his letter by making a distinction between believers along ethnic lines seems to work against the argument of the entire epistle. In Gal. 3:26 Paul stated that “you are all sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus,” and then went on to add that “There is no Jew or Greek...for you are all one in Christ Jesus. And if you are Christ's, then you are Abraham's seed, heirs according to the promise.” Paul again refers to his readers as God's “sons” and “heirs” (Gal. 4:5-7), emphasizing the unity Jews and Gentiles have in Christ. Later Paul contrasts Hagar and Sarah as metaphors for two covenants (Gal. 4:21-31). The first, Hagar, stands for the covenant given from Mount Sinai which “corresponds to the present Jerusalem, for she is in slavery with her children” (Gal. 4:25). The second, Sarah, “the free woman” (Gal. 4:23) represents the covenant of promise and corresponds not to earthly but heavenly Jerusalem which is “free, and she is our mother” (Gal. 4:26). Paul's readers are “like Isaac...children of promise.” The references to readers as “heirs” and “Abraham's offspring,” and “children of promise,” strongly favor the view that Paul does have a “spiritual Israel” in view. Paul's summary statement could hardly be clearer: “For both circumcision and uncircumcision mean nothing; what matters instead is a new creation” (Gal. 6:15; cp. 5:6). Given the context of Galatians, Paul uses the term “Israel of God” in 6:16 to refer to all believers, all God's people apart from ethnic distinctions. This does not deny that elsewhere Paul speaks of Israel and the Jews in explicitly ethnic terms, the clearest example being Rom. 9-11. However, a word need not mean the same thing every time it is used. “Spiritual Israel” is a fair interpretation of Paul's meaning in Gal. 6:16, especially as a synthesis including the other NT texts cited above.

As a final note, the term “spiritual Israel” need not be equated with a term such as “new Israel” or as an assertion in favor of “replacement theology,” which holds (since Tertullian and Justin Martyr) that the church has taken the place of ethnic Israel to the extent that every promise to Israel is now directed solely to the church. Nor does it mean that language about ethnic Israel must be “spiritualized” so as always to refer to the church.

ISRAELITE (יִזְרְאֵלִי) Citizen of nation of Israel.

ISSACHAR (ĭs' sá kár) Personal name meaning “man for hire” or “hireling.” Ninth son of Jacob, the fifth borne by Leah (Gen. 30:18). He became the progenitor of the tribe of Issachar. Almost nothing is known about his personal history. The tribe of Issachar occupied territory in the northern part of Palestine, just southwest of the Sea of Galilee (Josh. 19:17-23). The tribe was not prominent in Israel's history. Tola, one of the socalled “minor” judges, was of the tribe of Issachar (Judg. 10:1-2). So was Baasha, the successor of Nadab as king of Israel (1 Kings 15:27). The city of Jezreel, which was an Israelite royal residence, was located in the territory of Issachar. See Chronology of the Biblical Period; Tribes of Israel.

ISSARON Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning “a tenth.” A dry measure equal to one tenth of an ephah (Exod. 29:40; Lev. 14:10,21; 23:13,17; 24:5; Num. 15:4) or about two quarts. KJV translates a tenth deal. See Ephah; Weights and Measures.

ISSHIAH (ĭs shí' á) Personal name meaning “let Yahweh forget.” In Hebrew the name appears in a longer form in 1 Chron. 12:6.1. Leader in the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3).2. Soldier from Saul's tribe of Benjamin who joined David at Ziklag while he hid from Saul (1 Chron. 12:6). 3. Member of the Kohath branch of Levites (1 Chron. 23:20; 24:24-25). 4. Descendant of Moses among the Levites (1 Chron. 24:21; cp. 23:13-17).

ISSHIJAH (ĭs shí' já) Personal name meaning “let Yahweh forget.” Same Hebrew name as Isshiah. Israelite who had married a foreign wife, threatening Israel's total allegiance to Yahweh in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:31).

ISSUE KJV term referring to offspring (Gen. 48:6; Isa. 22:24; Matt. 22:25; cp. 2 Kings 20:18; Isa. 39:7) or to a bodily discharge. The KJV applied “issue” to male pathological discharges such as that associated with gonorrhoea (Lev. 15:2-15), to normal menstruation (Lev. 15:19-24), and to female pathological discharges (Lev. 15:25-30; Matt. 9:20). Normal discharges resulted in ritual uncleanness for one day that was removed by simple washing. Pathological discharges resulted in uncleanness until seven days after the return to full health and required an atoning sacrifice. In Ezek. 23:20 the seminal emission of stallions is one element in a graphic depiction of Judah's idolatry. See Discharge.

ISSUE OF BLOOD (Matt. 9:20 KJV) See Hemorrhage.

ISUAH (יִשׁוּאָה) (1 Chron. 7:30 KJV) See Ishvah.

ISUI (יִשׁוּי) (Gen. 46:17 KJV) See Ishvi.

ITALIAN COHORT Name of the archery unit of the Roman army to which the Gentile centurion Cornelius belonged (Acts. 10:1). KJV calls it the Italian band. Probably 1,000 men who had been mustered in Italy composed the unit. Little is known about this Italian Cohort. Extrabiblical evidence exists for the presence in Caesarea of a unit called Cohors II Italica after A.D. 69. That date, however, is too late for the events recorded in Acts 10. Perhaps the Cohors II actually was in Caesarea prior to A.D. 69, or perhaps the Italian Cohort to which Cornelius belonged was a different unit. See Cornelius.

ITALY Boot-shaped peninsula between Greece and Spain which extends from the Alps on the north to the Mediterranean Sea on the south. Its long narrow shape contributed to its ethnic diversity, with so many Greeks occupying the southern part that the citizens of Rome called it “Great Greece.” Through the Punic Wars with Carthage (264-146 B.C.), the city of Rome extended its control over the whole country and eventually conquered the entire Mediterranean. The Roman Empire was created when Octavian became Augustus Caesar (27 B.C.) after the murder of Julius Caesar and of the demise of the Republic (44 B.C.). Italy is named in the NT in Acts 18:2; 27:1,6 and Hebrews 13:24.

ITCH Skin disorder characterized by an irritating sensation in the upper surface of the skin. The itch included among the curses on those unfaithful to the covenant (Deut. 28:27) was possibly eczema or prurigo. NIV, NRSV use “itch” to distinguish a minor skin disorder from leprosy (Lev. 13:30-37). The KJV termed this disorder “scall,” a malady characterized by dry scales or scabs. Other translations rendered this disorder “infection” (NASB), “scale” (REB), or “sore” (TEV). It has been suggested that alopecia areata, which produces patches of baldness (cp. Lev. 13:40-41) or ringworm is the cause of this disorder. Animals suffering from a skin disorder were unsuitable for sacrifice (Lev. 22:22). English translators divide over the nature of this disorder: eczema (NASB), itch (NRSV), scab (REB), scurvy (KJV), skin eruption (TEV). See Diseases.

ITHAI (ith' thā i) Personal name, perhaps meaning “with me.” A member of David's elite “30” military heroes (2 Sam. 23:29 NIV; NASB, Ittai).

ITHAMAR (ith' ā mār) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “island of palms,” or “where is Tamar,” or shortened form of “father of Tamar (palms).” Fourth son of Aaron the priest (Exod. 6:23). After the death of Nadab and Abihu, Ithamar and his surviving brother Eleazar rose to prominence. During the wilderness years Ithamar apparently was in charge of all the Levites (Exod. 38:21). Moses became angry when Ithamar and his brother did not eat part of an offering as commanded (Lev. 10:16). In addition, the house of Eli evidently was descended from Ithamar. See Aaron; Priests and Levites.

ITHIEL (ith' i-el) Personal name meaning “with me is God.” 1. Member of the tribe of Benjamin in the time of Nehemiah after the return from exile (Neh. 11:7). 2. Person to whom Prov. 30 is addressed, following standard Hebrew text (KJV, NASB, NIV, HCSB). Many Bible students put spaces between different letters of the Hebrew text assuming an early copying change. Then the text would read, “God is not with me, God is not with me, and I am helpless” (TEV), or “I am weary, O God, I am weary, O God. How can I prevail?” (NRSV; cp. REB, HCSB).

ITHLAH (ith' la) Place-name, perhaps meaning “he hangs.” Town in tribal territory of Dan (Josh. 19:42). Its location is not known, but some students of Bible lands geography follow some Greek manuscripts identifying Ithlah with Shithlah or Shilta, about four miles northwest of Bethhoron.

ITHMAH (ith' ma) Personal name meaning “orphan.” Moabite soldier in David's army (1 Chron. 11:46).

ITHNAN (ith' nan) Place-name meaning “flowing constantly.” Town on southern border of tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:23). Its location is not known unless some Bible lands geographers are correct in combining Hazor-ithnan into one town, which may have been located at modern el-Jebariyeh on the Wadi Umm Ethnan.

ITHRA (ith' ra) Personal name meaning “remnant” or “abundance.” He was the father of Amasa, and the general that Absalom appointed to replace David's general Joab when he revolted against his father (2 Sam. 17:25). Ithra's wife, Abigail, was Joab's aunt. Ithra is called Jether in some Greek and old Latin manuscripts as well as in 1 Kings 2:5,32; 1 Chron. 2:17. Some modern translations thus read Jether in 2 Sam. 17:25 (TEV, NIV). One early Greek manuscript and 1 Chron. 2:17 identify Ithra as an Ishmaelite rather than an Israelite, as the standard Hebrew text of 2 Sam. 17:25 reads. Many Bible students think Ishmaelite was the original reading in 2 Samuel, since it would be unusual and unnecessary to identify an Israelite (REB, TEV, NRSV).

ITHRAN (ĭth' rān) Personal name meaning “remnant” or “abundance.” 1. A Horite leader who lived in Edom (Gen. 36:26). 2. Leader in the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37). He may be the same as the similarly spelled Jether (1 Chron. 7:38).

ITHREAM (ĭth' rō ām) Personal name meaning “remnant of the people.” David's son born in Hebron to Eglah, David's wife (2 Sam. 3:5).

ITHRITE (ĭth' rīt) Clan name meaning “of Jether.” Descendants of Jether or Jethro (Exod. 4:18) or a clan whose home was Kiriath-jearim (1 Chron. 2:53). The latter may have been Hivites (cp. Josh. 9:7,17). Two of David's valiant “30” warriors were Ithrites (2 Sam. 23:38).

ITTAH-KAZIN (ĭt tāh-kā' zān) (KJV) See Ethkazin.

ITTAI (ĭt' tā' ī) Personal name meaning “with God.” 1. Gittite (from Gath) soldier who demonstrated loyalty to David by accompanying the latter in flight from Jerusalem after the outbreak of a rebellion led by David's son Absalom (2 Sam. 15:19-22). Gittite means a resident of Gath. Thus, this man was a Philistine who had cast his lot with the Israelite David. Later, Ittai shared command of David's army with Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. 18:2). See David. 2. One of the “30” of David's army (2 Sam. 23:29) and son of Ribai of Gibeah from the tribe of Benjamin. The Hebrew text of 1 Chron. 11:31 spells the name Ithai.

ITURAEA (ĭt ū rē' ā) or ITUREA Place-name meaning “related to Jetur.” Region over which Herod Philip was governor when John the Baptist began his public ministry (Luke 3:1). It was located northeast of Galilee between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon mountains, though its precise boundaries are almost impossible to determine. Racially, the Ituraeans were of Ishmaelite stock; their origin probably should be traced to Jetur the son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15). The earliest extant reference to the Ituraeans as a people dates from the second century B.C. Pompey conquered the territory for Rome about 50 B.C. Ituraea was eventually absorbed into other political districts, losing its distinct identity by the end of the first century A.D. See Herod.

Ivory toilet articles and hair ornaments.

IVAH (י' va) (KJV) See Avva.

IVORY English translation of the Hebrew word that means “tooth.” Ivory was used for decoration on thrones, beds, houses, and the decks of ships (1 Kings 10:18; 22:39; 2 Chron. 9:17; Ps. 45:8; Ezek. 27:6,15; Amos 3:15; 6:4). Archaeologists in Palestine have unearthed numerous articles made of ivory: boxes, gaming boards, figurines, spoons, and combs.

First Kings 10:22 is cited by scholars as a possible explanation for the source of ivory in Palestine. Apparently, Solomon's ships returned with ivory as a part of their cargo. Sources outside the OT indicate that elephants existed in northern Syria during the second millennium B.C. Elephants were hunted into extinction in northern Syria by 800 B.C.

The Prophet Amos mentioned ivory as a token of luxury and wealth (Amos 3:15; 6:4). Lists of booty taken by victorious armies included ivory objects. Hezekiah was credited with giving Sennacherib tribute in 701 B.C.

Sennacherib's account of the tribute included couches and chairs inlaid with ivory. Ivories have been found at Samaria that are thought to be from the time of Ahab, who reigned in Israel from about 869 to 850 B.C.

IYE-ABARIM (i ya-áb' á rím) Place-name meaning “ruins of the crossings.” Station in the wilderness wanderings (Num. 21:11) near Moab. It is apparently near Mount Abarim. It is apparently abbreviated as Iim in Num. 33:45 (KJV). Some Bible geographers locate it at Khirbet Aii, southwest of Kerak or modern Mahay, but this is far from certain. See Abarim.

IZHAR (iz' hār) Personal name meaning “olive oil” or “he sparkles.” 1. Son of Kohath and grandson of Levi, thus original ancestor of a priestly clan (Exod. 6:18). He was father of Korah (Num. 16:1; cp. 1 Chron. 23:18). See Korah. 2. Written Hebrew text of 1 Chron. 4:7 names Izhar as a member of the tribe of Judah but uses a different letter for “h,” sometimes rendered “ch” in English. The resulting name is of uncertain meaning. An early Hebrew scribal note followed by the early Syriac and Latin translations makes the name Jezoar (KJV, REB) or Zohar (NIV).

IZLIAH (iz li' ah) Personal name meaning “long-lived” or “Yahweh delivers.” Leader in tribe of Benjamin living in Jerusalem after the return from exile (1 Chron. 8:18).

IZRAHIAH (ĭz rā hī' á) Personal name meaning “Yahweh shines forth.” Member of tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3). The same Hebrew name appears in Neh. 12:42 but is usually transliterated into English as Jezrahiah. See Jezrahiah.

IZRAHITE (ĭz' rá hit) Clan name in 1 Chron. 27:8 for which the text tradition gives several variants: Harorite (1 Chron. 11:27 KJV); Harodite (2 Sam. 23:25 KJV). Other Hebrew manuscripts read “Zerahites.” See Harodite.

IZRI (ĭz' ri) Clan leader of fourth course of temple musicians (1 Chron. 25:11). He is probably the same as Zeri (25:3), the name change occurring in copying the text.

IZZIAH (ĭz zī' á) Personal name meaning “Yah sprinkled.” Priest who repented of marrying a foreign woman and thus tempting Israel with foreign gods in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:25).

Courtyard of Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem.

J Sign for one of the principal sources that critical scholars propose for the Pentateuch. The name derives from the personal name for God, Yahweh (German, Jahweh), that characterizes this source. The source is thought to have originated in Judah earlier than the E source (about 900 B.C.). Recent research has raised radical questions about this source and theory even among critical scholars. See Bible Hermeneutics; Pentateuch.

JAAKAN (Jā' á-kán) Personal name meaning “to be fast.” Descendant of Esau and thus tribal ancestor of Edomites (1 Chron. 1:42; cp. Gen. 36:27; Num. 33:31-32; Deut. 10:6). Different translations transliterate the name differently—Akan, Jakan. The Hebrew text of Gen. 36:27 omits the first letter of the name. See Bene-jaakan.

JAAKANITES (Jā' á-ká-nīts) (Deut. 10:6 NIV) See Bene-jaakan.

JAAKOBAB (Jā á-kó' bah) Personal name meaning “may He protect.” Leader in the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:36).

JAALA (Jā' á-lá) or JAALAH Personal name meaning “female ibex.” A member of Solomon's staff whose descendants joined Zerubbabel in returning from Babylonian exile about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58, which has an Aramaic ending rather than the Hebrew ending of the Ezra passage).

JAALAM (Jā' á-lám) (KJV, REB) See Jalam.

JAANAI (Jā' á-nī) (KJV, REB) See Janai

JAAR (Jā' ár) Place-name meaning “forest.” Modern versions' transliteration of Hebrew in Ps. 132:6 (TEV, “Jearim,” a plural form; KJV, “wood”). “Jaar” is probably a poetic abbreviation for Kiriath-jearim. The psalm celebrates David's returning the ark to Jerusalem from its Philistine captivity (cp. 1 Sam. 7:2; 2 Sam. 6; 1 Chron. 13:5). See Kiriath-jearim.

JAARE-OREGIM (Jā á-rá-ór' ə gīm) Personal name meaning “forests of the weavers.” Father of El-hanan from Bethlehem, who killed the brother of Goliath. Many modern Bible scholars follow early Greek translations and 1 Chron. 20:5 and omit Oregim (REB). Others interpret Oregim as a common noun, identifying Jair as a weaver (NIV translation note). This is partly based on 2 Sam. 23:24, where an El-hanan of Bethlehem is identified as the son of Dodo. Jaare may be an abbreviated form of Kiriath-jearim. See El-hanan; Kiriath-jearim.

JAARESHIAH (Jā' ā-rə-shī' ah) Personal name meaning "Yahweh plants." Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:27).

JAASAU (Jā' ā-sa) (KJV, REB) or JAASU (Jā' ā-sū) Personal name meaning "His product," a variant spelling of Jaasiel, which the earliest Hebrew copyists noted should be pronounced differently from the printed Hebrew text. An Israelite who agreed under Ezra's leadership to divorce his foreign wife to ensure the religious purity of the nation (Ezra 10:37).

JAASIEL (Jā ās' 1-šl) Personal name meaning "God makes or acts." 1. Leader of tribe of Benjamin under David, apparently in charge of census in his tribe when David numbered the people (1 Chron. 27:21). His father Abner may be Saul's general who became David's general. 2. Army hero under David whose hometown was Zobah (1 Chron. 11:47). KJV transliterates his name Jasiel. See Mesobaite.

JAAZANIAH (Jā-āz ā-nī' ah) Personal name meaning "Yahweh hears." 1. Member of party led by Ishmael who opposed Gedaliah after the Babylonians made him governor over Judah following their destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. Jaazaniah may also have been in Ishmael's party that assassinated Gedaliah (2 Kings 25:23-25). A signet seal found at Tell en-Nasbeh dates from the same period and contains a depiction of a fighting cock. The seal inscription shows the seal belonged to Jaazaniah, the servant of the king. This is probably the same person and indicates he was on the king's staff, probably as an army captain. His name has a slightly different spelling in Jer. 40:8. See Jezaniah. 2. One of the elders of Israel that Ezekiel found worshipping idols in the temple (Ezek. 8:11). His father Shaphan may have been the counselor of Josiah (2 Kings 22). If so, the son did not imitate the faithful father. 3. A government official whom Ezekiel accused with his associates of giving wicked advice. His name in Hebrew is an abbreviated form of Jaazaniah. 4. The same abbreviated Hebrew name belonged to a Rechabite whom Jeremiah used as an example of faithful obedience to God (Jer. 35:3). See Rechabite.

JAAZER (Jā´ā-zēr) (KJV) See Jazer.

JAAZIAH (Jā-ā-zī´ah) Levitical priest in the time of David (1 Chron. 24:26). His name means “Yahweh nourishes.”

JAAZIEL (Jā-ā´zī-ēl) Variant form of Jaaziah meaning “God nourishes.” Levite and temple musician (1 Chron. 15:18), apparently appearing in a variant Hebrew spelling in 15:20 as one who played the psaltery (1 Chron. 15:20), harp (NRSV, NASB, TEV), lute (REB), or lyre (NIV). See Azriel.

JABAL (Jā´bāl) Personal name meaning “stream.” Son of Lamech by Adah (Gen. 4:20). A descendant of Cain, he was the first nomad, the progenitor of tent dwellers and herdsman.

JABBOK (Jāb´bōk) Place-name meaning “flowing.” River near which Jacob wrestled through the night with God (Gen. 32:22). Its modern name is Nahr ez-Zerqa. It is a tributary of the Jordan, joining the larger river from the east about 15 miles north of the Dead Sea. In biblical times various sections of its approximately 50-mile course served as the western boundary of Ammon, the boundary between the kingdoms of Sihon and Og, and a division in the territory of Gilead. The existence of numerous tells points to a dense population in the Jabbok Valley in ancient times. See Jacob.

JABESH or JABESH-GILEAD (Jā´bēsh-gīl´ēād) Place-name meaning “dry, rugged” or “dry place of Gilead.” City whose residents, with the exception of 400 virgins, were put to death by an army of Israelites (Judg. 21:8-12). The 400 women who were spared became wives for the Benjaminites. While certainty is elusive, the area in which Jabesh-gilead probably was located is east of the Jordan River about 20 miles south of the Sea of Galilee. The story illustrates the drastic steps taken to preserve the unity of the 12 tribes of Israel.

Jabesh-gilead figured prominently in the history of Saul. His rescue of the people of Jabeshgilead from Nahash the Ammonite marked the effective beginning of the Israelite monarchy (1 Sam. 11:1-11). Later, the men of Jabesh-gilead demonstrated the high regard in which they held Saul by retrieving the bodies of the slain king and his sons from the walls of Bethshean (1 Sam. 31:11-13). David expressed thanks for the brave deed (2 Sam. 2:4-7) and eventually removed Saul's bones from Jabesh-gilead (2 Sam. 21:12).

JABEZ (Já' bēz) Personal and place-name with a connotation of pain, hurt, and sorrow. 1. Home of scribes whose location is not known (1 Chron. 2:55). 2. Israelite who asked God for blessing and received it (1 Chron. 4:9-10). He illustrates the power of prayer.

JABIN (Já' bīn) Personal name meaning "he understands." 1. Leader of northern coalition of kings who attacked Joshua at the water of Merom and met their death (Josh. 11:1-11). The king of Hazor who controlled the Israelites when they turned away from God at Ehud's death (Judg. 4:1-2). The biblical writer referred to him as "King of Canaan," a title representing his strong power in the northern part of the country, but a title that kings of the other Canaanite city-states probably would have strongly contested, since Canaan lacked political unity in that period. Jabin does not act in the story of Judg. 4; Sisera, his general, represents him and is killed, leading to Jabin's loss of power. 2. Many scholars believe that a dynasty of kings in Hazor carried the name Jabin. Some have gone so far as to identify him with Ibni-Adad, who appears in Near Eastern documents from Mari.

JABNEEL (Jāb' nō ēl) or JABNEH (Jāb' nēh) Place-name meaning “God builds.”
1. Town marking northwestern boundary of tribal territory of Judah in land of Philistines (Josh. 15:11); modern Yibna. Uzziah took the town, called by the shortened form Jabneh, from the Philistines (2 Chron. 26:6). Later the city was called Jamnia and became a center of scribal activity for the Jews. See Bible Formation and Canon. 2. Town in Naphtali's tribal territory (Josh. 19:33); modern Tell en-Naam or Khirbet Yemma, west-southwest of the Sea of Galilee and northeast of Mount Tabor.

JACAN (Já' kán) or JACHAN (KJV) Personal name of unknown meaning. A member of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:13).

JACHIN (Já' kîn) Personal name meaning “Yah established.” Son of Simeon and original ancestor of a clan in the tribe (Gen. 46:10; spelled “Jarib” in 1 Chron. 4:24). A priest who lived in Jerusalem in Nehemiah's day (Neh. 11:10; cp. 1 Chron. 9:10). This represented a priestly family connected to David's organization of the priesthood (1 Chron. 24:17).

JACHIN AND BOAZ (Já' kîn and Bô' áz) Proper names meaning “he establishes” and “agile.” In 1 Kings 7:21 the names of two bronze pillars that stood on either side of the entrance to Solomon's temple. They may have been 27 feet high and 6 feet in diameter with a 10-foot capital on top. Perhaps each word was the beginning of an inscription that was engraved on the respective pillars. Analogous pillars have been found in front of temples at Khorsabad, Tyre, Paphos, and other places. Their function appears to have been primarily ornamental, though some have suggested they may have been giant incense stands. It is possible that they took on some symbolic religious significance with the passage of time. See Temple.

JACHINITE (Já' kîn-ít) Family in tribe of Simeon descended from Jachin (Num. 26:12). See Jachin.

JACINTH Semiprecious stone more nearly orange in color than the hyacinth. Some English translations give “jacinth” as a gem in the high priest's breastplate (Exod. 28:19 NASB, NIV, NRSV), the color of one of the riders' breastplates (Rev. 9:17 KJV), and the eleventh foundation stone of the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:20 HCSB, KJV, NASB, NIV, NRSV). See Hyacinth; Minerals and Metals.

JACKAL Golden jackal (Canis aureus), a yellow-coated, carnivorous mammal resembling the wolf but considerably smaller (34-37 inches, including tail of about one foot) with a shorter tail and ears. The same Hebrew word is translated both “jackal” and “fox” (Judg. 15:4, REB has “jackals” NIV has “foxes”). KJV translated the term for “jackal” as either “dragon” (Isa. 13:22; Neh. 2:13) or “sea monster” (Lam. 4:3). Jackals are nocturnal. They hunt either alone, in pairs, or in packs. By hunting in packs, jackals have taken down large antelopes. This reputation accounts for the horror of one abandoned to jackals (Ps. 44:19). Jackals eat small mammals, birds, fruits, vegetables, and carrion (Ps. 63:10). They are scavengers, infamous for their distinctive nighttime wailing (Job 30:28-31; Mic. 1:8). Most biblical references associate jackals with desert ruins. For a city or nation to be made the haunt or lair of jackals is for it to be utterly destroyed (Isa. 13:22; 34:13; Jer. 9:11; 10:22; 49:33; 50:39; 51:37; Lam. 5:18; Mal. 1:3). See Dragon.

JACKAL'S WELL Water source outside Jerusalem, accessible from the Valley Gate (Neh. 2:13 NIV, RSV). Other English translations designate this water source as the Dragon('s) fountain (TEV), spring (NRSV, REB), or well (KJV, NASB). The spring is possibly En-rogel or more likely a water source in the upper part of the Hinnom Valley. See Jackal; Jerusalem.

JACOB (Ja' cōb) Personal name built on the Hebrew noun for “heel” meaning “he grasps the heel” or “he cheats, supplants” (Gen. 25:26; 27:36). Original ancestor of the nation of Israel and father of the 12 ancestors of the 12 tribes of Israel (Gen. 25:1-Exod. 1:5). He was the son of Isaac and Rebekah, younger twin brother of Esau, and husband of Leah and Rachel (Gen. 25:21-26; 29:21-30). God changed his name to “Israel” (Gen. 32:28; 49:2).

Texts from Ugarit and Assyria have persons named Jacob, but these are not Israelites. Their name is often connected with one of their gods, becoming Jacob-el or Jacob-baal. In such a form, it probably means “may El protect.” The OT knows only one Jacob. No one else received the patriarch's name.

Between the Testaments other Jews received the name Jacob; the one NT example is the father of Joseph and thus the earthly grandfather of Jesus (Matt. 1:16). Jacob stands as a strong witness that the God who made all the people of the earth also worked in Israel's history, calling the patriarchs to a destiny He would fulfill even when they least deserved it.

Jacob in Genesis Jacob's story occupies half the book of Genesis. Living up to his name, Jacob bargained for Esau's birthright. Parental partiality fostered continuing hostility between Esau, the hunter loved by his father, and Jacob, the quiet, settled, integrated person favored by his mother. The tensions between brothers seemed to threaten the fulfillment of the divine promise.

Esau's thoughtlessness lost him his birthright and allowed Jacob to have material superiority. Nevertheless, Isaac intended to bestow the blessing of the firstborn upon Esau. The oracle Rebekah received (Gen. 25:23) probably encouraged her to counter Isaac's will and to gain the blessing for her favorite son by fraud. The blessing apparently conveyed the status of head of family apart from the status of heir. To his crass lies and deception, Jacob even approached blasphemy, using God's name to bolster his cause: "Because the LORD your God worked it out for me" (27:20 HCSB). The father's blindness deepened the pathos. The blind father pronounced the blessing he could never recall. Jacob became the bearer of God's promises and the inheritor of Canaan. Esau, too, received a blessing but a lesser one. He must serve Jacob and live in the less fertile land of Edom, but his day would come (27:40). The split between brothers became permanent. Rebekah had to arrange for Jacob to flee to her home in Paddan-aram to escape Esau's wrath (27:41-28:5). See Birthright.

At age 40 Jacob fled his home to begin his life as an individual. Suddenly, a lonely night in Bethel, interrupted by a vision from God, brought reality home. Life had to include wrestling with God and assuming responsibility as the heir of God's promises to Abraham (28:10-22). Jacob made an oath, binding himself to God. Here is the center of Jacob's story; all else must be read in light of the Bethel experience.

In Aram with his mother's family, the deceiver Jacob met deception. Laban tricked him into marrying poor Leah, the elder daughter, before he got his beloved Rachel, the younger. Fourteen years he labored for his wives (29:1-30). Six more years of labor let Jacob return the deception and gain wealth at the expense of his father-in-law, who continued his deception, changing Jacob's wages 10 times (31:7,41). Amid the family infighting, both men prospered financially, and Jacob's family grew. Eventually he had 12 children from four women (29:31-30:24).

Intense bargaining ensued when Jacob told Laban he wanted to follow God's call and return to the land of his birth. Supported by his wives, who claimed their father had cheated them of their dowry (31:15), Jacob departed while Laban and his sons were away in the hills shearing sheep. Starting two days later, Laban and his sons could not overtake Jacob until they reached Gilead, 400 miles from Haran.

Laban complained that he had not had an opportunity to bid farewell to his daughters with the accustomed feast. More importantly, he wanted to recover his stolen gods (31:30,32). These gods were small metal or terra-cotta figures of deities (See Teraphim). Without the images, his family lost the magical protection that he thought the gods provided from demons and disasters. Since no fault could be found in Jacob's conduct in Haran, all Laban could do was to suggest a covenant of friendship. Laban proposed the terms as (1) never ill-treating his daughters, (2) never marrying any other women, and (3) establishing the site of the covenant as a boundary neither would cross with evil intent. Jacob was now head of his own household. He was ready to climb to a higher plane of spiritual experience.

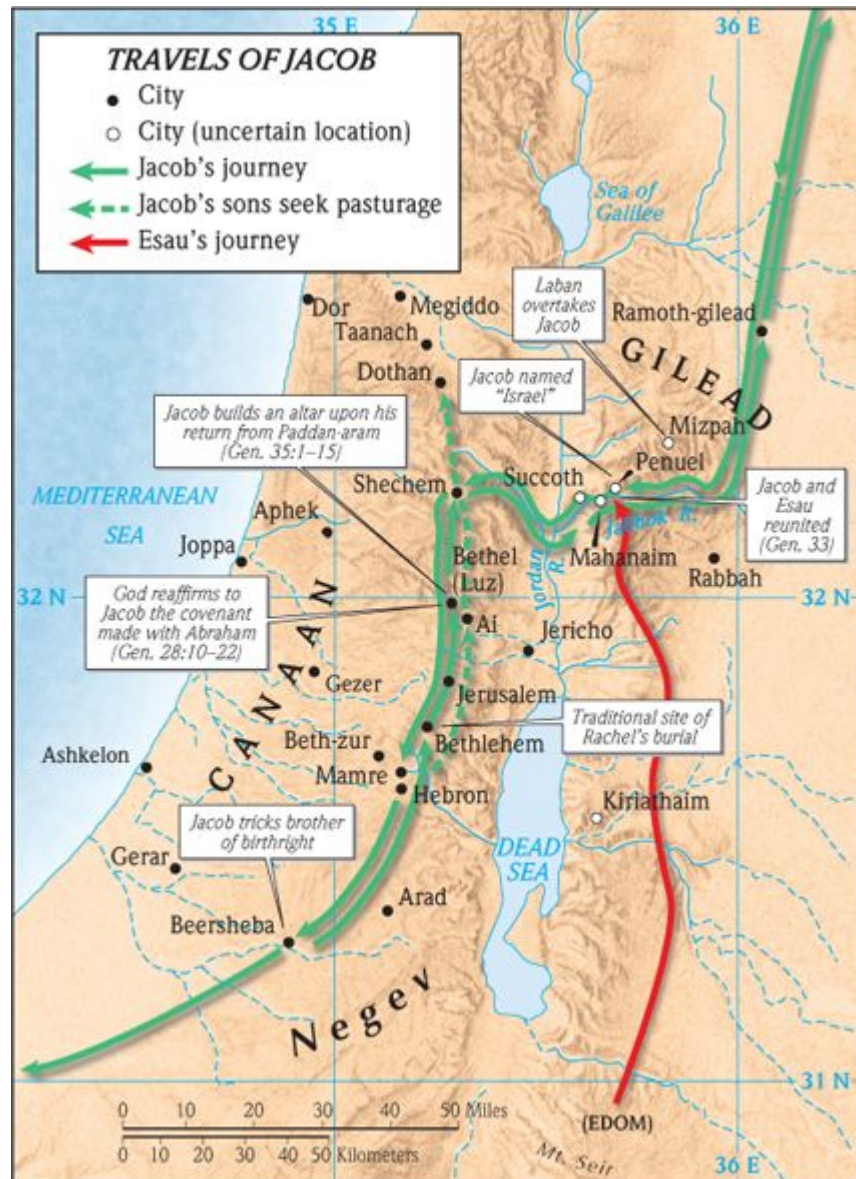

As Jacob approached the promised land, a band of angels met him at Mahanaim (32:1-2). They probably symbolized God's protection and encouragement as he headed southward to meet Esau for the first time in 20 years. Esau's seemingly hostile advance prompted a call for clear evidence of God's guarding. Shrewdly, Jacob sent an enormous gift to his brother and divided his retinue into two groups. Each group was large enough to defend itself or to escape if the other was attacked. To his scheme Jacob added prayer. He realized that it was ultimately God with whom he must deal. When all had crossed the Jabbok River, Jacob met One who wrestled with him until daybreak (chap. 32). The two struggled without one gaining advantage, until the Opponent dislocated Jacob's hip. Jacob refused to release his Antagonist. Clinging to Him, he demanded a blessing. This would not be given until Jacob said his name. By telling it, Jacob acknowledged his defeat and admitted his character. The Opponent emphasized His superiority by renaming the patriarch. He became Israel, the one on whose behalf God strives. He named the place Peniel (face of God) because he had seen God face to face and his life had been spared (32:30).

Jacob's fear of meeting Esau proved groundless. Seemingly, Esau was content to forget the wrongs of the past and to share his life. As two contrary natures are unlikely to live long in harmony, Jacob chose the better course turning westward to the promised land. Esau headed to Seir to become the father of the Edomites. The twins did not meet again until their father's death (35:27-29).

From Succoth Jacob traveled to Shechem, where he built an altar to God. The son of the city ruler raped Jacob's daughter, Dinah. Jacob's sons demanded that the Shechemites be circumcised before any intermarriages were permitted. The leading citizens followed the king in the request. They hoped to absorb the Hebrews' wealth and property into their own. While the men of Shechem were recovering from surgery and unable to defend themselves, Simeon and Levi killed them to avenge their sister. Jacob condemned their actions but had to leave Shechem.

From Shechem he returned to Bethel. Once again he received the patriarchal promises. Losses and grief characterized this period. The death of his mother's nurse (35:8; 24:59) was followed by the death of his beloved wife Rachel while giving birth to Benjamin at Ephrath (35:19; 48:7). About the same time Reuben forfeited the honor of being the eldest son by sexual misconduct (35:22). Finally, the death of Jacob's father, who had been robbed of companionship with both sons, brought Jacob and Esau together again at the family burial site in Hebron.

Although chapters 37-50 revolve around Joseph, Jacob is still the central figure. The selfwilled older sons come and go at his bidding.

Descent to Egypt When severe famine gripped Canaan, Jacob and his sons set out for Egypt. At Beer-sheba Jacob received further assurance of God's favor (46:1-4). Jacob dwelt in the land of Goshen until his death. Jacob bestowed the blessing not only upon his favorite son Joseph, but also upon Joseph's two oldest sons, Ephraim and Manasseh. He was finally laid to rest at Hebron in the cave Abraham had purchased (50:12-14).

Four NT passages recall events in his life. The woman at the well in Sychar declared to Jesus that Jacob provided the well (John 4:12). Stephen mentioned the famine and Jacob's journey to Egypt in the course of his defense before the Sanhedrin (Acts 7:8-16). Paul presented Jacob as an example of the sovereign choice of God and of the predestination of the elect (Rom.9:10-13). The writer of Hebrews held up Jacob as one of the examples of active faith (Heb. 11:9,20-22).

Jacob's Character Throughout the narrative a persistent faith in the God of the fathers shines through. Jacob's life was a story of conflict. He always seemed to be running from someone or something—from Esau, from Laban, or from famine in Canaan. His life, like that of all Israelites, was a checkered history of rebellion and flight.

Jacob is no ideal. Jacob's better nature struggled with his sinful self. What raised Jacob above himself was his reverent, indestructible longing for the salvation of his God.

Jacob's Religion As the religion of Israel and thus the roots of Christianity claim to derive from the patriarchs, it is necessary to attempt to understand Jacob's spiritual life. See God of the Fathers.

Jacob's religion was consistent with the beliefs and practices of his fathers. He received instruction from Isaac concerning the history of Abraham, covenant, and the great promises. Jacob encountered God at Bethel at the moment of greatest need in his life. He was fleeing from home to distant unknown relatives. A secondhand religion would not do. Jacob's dream was his firsthand encounter with God. The threefold promise of land, descendants, and a blessing to all nations was personalized for him. Jacob saw in the vision the majesty and glory of God. At Bethel Jacob worshiped God and vowed to take Yahweh as his God.

The traditional site of Jacob's Well in the city of Sychar.

At Peniel, Jacob wrestled face to face with God. He saw how weak he was before God. It taught him the value of continued prayer from one who is helpless. Jacob emerged from Peniel willing to let his life fall into God's control. He was wounded but victorious. God gave him a crippled body but a strengthened faith. It was a new Jacob—Israel—who hobbled off to meet Esau. He had learned obedience through suffering.

Theological Significance God did not choose Jacob because of what he was but because of what he could become. His life is a long history of discipline, chastisement, and purification by affliction. Not one of his misdeeds went unpunished. He sowed deception and reaped the same, first from Laban and then from his own sons.

Jacob's story is a story of conflict. The note of conflict is even heard before his birth (Gen. 25:22-23). However, in the midst of the all-too-human quarrels over family and fortune, God was at work protecting and prospering His blessed.

With the other patriarchs God acted directly, but with Jacob God seemed to be withdrawn at times. Yet, God was no less at work. He worked through unsavory situations and unworthy persons. Even in Jacob's web of conflict and tragedy, God's hand guided, though half hidden.

JACOB'S WELL Place in Samaria where Jesus stopped to rest as He traveled from Judea to Galilee (John 4:6). There He met and conversed with a Samaritan woman on the subject of living water. The OT contains no reference to it. It was located near the Samaritan city of Sychar. The well currently shown as the scene of the encounter of Jesus with the Samaritan woman certainly is an ancient well and is generally accepted to be the place referred to in the Gospel. See Jacob; Sychar.

JADA (Jā' dā) Personal name meaning “he knew.” Grandson of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:28,32).

JADAH (Jā' dah) Abbreviated form of personal name Jehoaddah meaning “Yah adorned.” NIV translation based on early Greek and Hebrew manuscripts for Jarah. See Jarah.

JDAU (Jā' daw) KJV form of the name of a returned exile with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:43). Modern translations render the name Jaddai.

JADDAI (Jād' dā) Modern translations' spelling of Jadau based on textual notes by earliest Hebrew scribes. See Jadau.

JADDUA (Jād' du ā) Personal name meaning “well-known.” 1. Levite who placed his seal on Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:21). 2. A high priest, probably at the end of the Persian period when Alexander the Great approached Jerusalem about 333 B.C. (Neh. 12:11,22).

JADE See Jewels; Jewelry; Minerals and Metals.

JADON (Jā' dōn) Short form of personal name meaning “Yah rules” or “to be frail.” Man from Meronoth near Gibeon who helped Nehemiah repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:7).

JAEL (Ja' əl) Personal name meaning “mountain goat.” Wife of Heber the Kenite (Judg. 4:17). She received the Canaanite leader Sisera as he fled following his defeat by the Israelites under Deborah and Barak. Jael assassinated Sisera. Her action is celebrated in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:24-27). See Deborah.

JAGUR (Ja' gūr) Place-name meaning “pile of stones.” Village on southeastern border of tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:21). Its precise location is not known.

JAH (Jah) Short form of divine name Yahweh in Ps. 68:4 (KJV) and in many proper names. See God; YHWH.

JAHATH (Ja' hāth) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “God will grab up.” 1. Member of clan of Zorathites in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:2). 2. Great grandson of Levi (1 Chron. 6:20; cp. v. 43). 3. Leader of the Levites in time of David (1 Chron. 23:10-11). 4. Levite in the line of Eliezer in clan of Izhar (1 Chron. 24:22). 5. Levite overseer of temple repair under King Josiah (2 Chron. 34:12).

JAHAZ (Ja' hāz), JAHAZA (Ja' hā' zā), or JAHAZAH (KJV, Josh. 21:36; Jer. 48:21) Moabite place-name, perhaps meaning “landsite.” As they journeyed from the wilderness to the promised land, Israel defeated King Sihon there (Num. 21:23-24; Deut. 2:32-33; Judg. 11:20-21). Isaiah's oracle against Moab described the isolated city of Jahaz as hearing the mourning of Heshbon and Elealeh (Isa. 15:4). Jeremiah issued a similar warning (48:34; cp. v. 21). The name also appears with the Hebrew locative ah ending, thus being spelled Jahaza or Jahazah. Jahzah is also a variant spelling. It became part of the tribal territory of Reuben (Josh. 13:18) and a city of the Levites (Josh. 21:36; cp. 1 Chron. 6:78). On the Moabite stone King Mesha of Moab claims an Israelite king (perhaps Jehu) built Jahaz and used it as a base in his unsuccessful fight against Mesha, Chemosh, the Moabite god driving the Israelites out. Mesha then annexed the city to Dibon. It has been variously located at Libb, six miles north of Dibon; Aleiyan; Khirbet el-Medeiyineh; and Khirbet Iskander, four miles north of Dibon, being the most popular suggestions.

JHAZIAH (Jā hā zī' ah) (KJV) Personal name meaning “Yahweh looked.” Person who opposed Ezra's plan to call for divorce in the mixed marriages (Ezra 10:15; cp. alternative interpretation of a difficult Hebrew text by KJV).

JHAZIEL (Jā-hā' zī-ēl) Personal name meaning “Yah looks.” 1. Benjaminite military hero who supported David against Saul, also of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 12:4). 2. Priest whom David appointed to blow the trumpet before the ark (1 Chron. 16:6). 3. Levite of the clan of Hebron (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23). 4. Levite and a son of Asaph who received the Spirit of the Lord and prophesied, promising victory for Jehoshaphat and his people (2 Chron. 20:14-19). 5. Clan leader who led 300 men among the exiles returning to Jerusalem with Ezra (Ezra 8:5).

JHDAI (Jah' dā ī) Personal name meaning “Yah leads.” A descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:47).

JHDIEL (Jah' dī ēl) Personal name meaning “God rejoices.” Military hero and leader in the East Manasseh tribe (1 Chron. 5:24).

JHDO (Jah' dō) Personal name meaning “his rejoicing.” A member of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:14).

JHLEEL (Jah' lē ēl) Personal name meaning “God shows Himself to be friendly” or “he waits for God.” A son of Zebulun and grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:14) who became a clan leader in tribe of Zebulun (Num. 26:26).

JHLEELITE (Jah' lē ēl īt) Clan in tribe of Zebulun (Num. 26:26).

JHMAI (Jah' mā ī) Personal name meaning “He protects me.” Grandson of Issachar, great grandson of Jacob, and clan leader in tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2).

JAHZEEL (Jah' zə ɛl) Personal name meaning “God apportions.” Son of Naphtali, grandson of Jacob, and clan leader in tribe of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:48). Jahziel (1 Chron. 7:13) represents a variant spelling.

JAHZEELITE (Jah' zə ɛl it) Clan in tribe of Naphtali. See Jahzeel

JAHZEIAH (Jah zə' yá) Modern translation spelling of Jahaziah (Ezra 10:15). See Jahaziah.

JAHZERAH (Jah' zə rah) Personal name of uncertain meaning, possibly “careful” “crafty” or “let him turn back.” A priest (1 Chron. 9:12). A similar list in Neh. 11:13 (KJV) lists Ahasai instead of Jahzerah.

JAHZIEL [Ja' zɪ ɛl] (NIV, Gen. 46:24; 1 Chron. 7:13) See Jahzeel

JAILER Keeper of a prison (Acts 16:23). See Prison, Prisoners.

JAIR (Ja' ɪr) Abbreviated place-name meaning “Jah shines forth.” 1. Son of Manasseh who took possession of a number of villages in Gilead (Num. 32:41). See Manasseh. 2. A Gileadite who judged Israel for 22 years (Judg. 10:3-5). He was one of the so-called minor judges. His function probably was primarily judicial rather than military. He is described as having had 30 sons and 30 cities. At his death, he was buried in Camon. See Judges. 3. Father of El-hanan (1 Chron. 20:5), whose name comes from a different Hebrew word, possibly meaning “Jah protects.” His name is Jaare-oregim in 2 Sam. 21:19, though some translators would read the text “Jair of Bethlehem” (REB). 4. Benjaminite who was the ancestor of Mordecai, Esther's guardian (Esther 2:5).

JAIRITE (Ja' ɪr it) Member of clan of Jair probably from Havvoth-jair, though possibly from Kiriath-jearim (2 Sam. 20:26). See Jair.

JAIRUS (Ji' rüs) Greek form of Hebrew personal name “Jair” meaning “Jah will enlighten.” Synagogue official who came to Jesus seeking healing for his 12-year-old daughter (Mark 5:22). Before Jesus arrived at Jairus' house, however, the little girl died. Jesus reassured Jairus and entered the house with Peter, James, and John. Taking the girl by the hand, Jesus restored her to life, showing His power over death.

JAKAN (Jä' kan) Personal name, perhaps meaning "he was fast." Descendant of or clan inhabiting territory of Seir (1 Chron. 1:42 according to KJV and Hebrew spelling). The Chronicles list repeats that of Gen. 36:27. Modern translations spell the name Akan or Jaakan here (cp. Deut. 10:6; Num. 33:31-32). See Akan; Jaakan.

JAKEH [Jä' kē] Personal name meaning "prudent." Jakeh was the father or ancestor of Agur (Prov.30:1).

JAKIM (Jä' kīm) Personal name meaning "He caused to stand." 1. Member of tribe of Benjamin living in Ajalon (1 Chron. 8:19). 2. Head of the 12th division of priests (1 Chron. 24:12).

JAKIN (Jä' kīn) (NIV) See Jachin.

JAKINITES (Jä' kī nīts) (NIV) See Jachinite.

JALAM (Jä' lam) Personal name meaning "their ibex or mountain goat" or "he is hidden or dark." Son of Esau and grandson of Isaac (Gen. 36:5), a clan leader among the Edomites (Gen. 36:18). KJV, REB spell the name Jaalam.

JALON (Jä' lōn) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of tribe of Judah and son of otherwise unknown Ezra (1 Chron. 4:17).

JAMBRES (Jäm' brēs) See Jannes.

JAMES English form of Jacob, and the name of three men of the NT. See Jacob. 1. James, the son of Zebedee and brother of John (Matt. 4:21; 10:2; Mark 1:19; 3:17; Luke 5:10). As one of the 12 disciples (Acts 1:13), he, with Peter and John, formed Jesus' innermost circle of associates. These three were present when Jesus raised Jairus' daughter (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51), witnessed the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28), and were summoned by Christ for support during His agony in Gethsemane (Matt. 26:36-37; Mark 14:32-34).

Perhaps because of James' and John's fiery fanaticism, evidenced as they sought to call down fire from heaven on the Samaritan village refusing to receive Jesus and the disciples (Luke 9:52-54), Jesus called the brothers “Boanerges” or “sons of thunder” (Mark 3:17). James' zeal was revealed in a more selfish manner as he and John (their mother, on their behalf, in Matt. 20:20-21) sought special positions of honor for the time of Christ's glory (Mark 10:35-40). They were promised, however, only a share in His suffering. James was the first of the 12 to be martyred (Acts 12:2). His execution (about A.D. 44), by order of King Herod Agrippa I of Judea, was part of a larger persecution in which Peter was arrested (Acts 12:1-3).

2. James, the son of Alphaeus, one of the 12 disciples (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). He is not distinguished by name in any occasion reported in the Gospels or Acts. He may be “James the younger,” whose mother, Mary, was among the women at Jesus' crucifixion and tomb (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40; 16:1; Luke 24:10). In John 19:25, this Mary is called the wife of Cleophas, perhaps to be identified with Alphaeus. See Cleophas; Mary.

3. James, the brother of Jesus. Bible students debate the precise meaning of “the Lord's brother” (Gal. 1:19). Possibilities are the literal brother or stepbrother, a cousin, or intimate friend and associate. The literal meaning is to be preferred.

During the Lord's ministry, the brothers of Jesus (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3; 1 Cor. 9:5) were not believers (John 7:3-5; cp. Matt. 12:46-50; Mark 3:31-35; Luke 8:19-21). Paul specifically mentioned a resurrection appearance by Jesus to James (1 Cor. 15:7). After the resurrection and ascension, the brothers are said to have been with the Twelve and the other believers in Jerusalem (Acts 1:14).

Paul, seeking out Peter in Jerusalem after his conversion, reported, “I didn't see any of the other apostles except James, the Lord's brother” (Gal. 1:19 HCSB). In time, James assumed the leadership of the Jerusalem church, originally held by Peter. Evidently, such was achieved not through a power struggle but by James' constancy with the church while Peter and other apostles traveled. In a Jerusalem conference called regarding Paul's Gentile mission, James presided as spokesman for the Jerusalem church (Acts 15). See Apostolic Council.

James perceived that his calling was to the “circumcised,” that is, the Jews (Gal. 2:9), and he is portrayed as loyal to Jewish tradition. He was, however, unwilling to make the law normative for all responding to God's new action in Christ. The death of James reportedly was at the order of the high priest Ananus and was either by stoning (according to Flavius Josephus, first-century historian of the Jews) or by being cast down from the temple tower (after Hegesippus, early Christian writer, quoted by the third-century Christian historian Eusebius). These accounts of James's death (about A.D. 66), are not confirmed in the NT.

JAMES, LETTER FROM Letter from James belongs to the section of the NT usually described as the “General Epistles.” The letter is one of exhortation for practical Christianity. The author stated principles of conduct and then frequently provided poignant illustrations. The author's concerns were clearly more practical and less abstract than those of any other NT writer. No other NT book has received criticism to the extent encountered by this epistle.

Author Verse one of the letter identifies James as the “servant of God” (NIV, NRSV, KJV) and the author of the letter. Several possibilities for proper identification of this “James” include James the brother of John and the son of Zebedee, James the son of Alphaeus, one of the 12 apostles, or James the half brother of Jesus, a younger son of Mary and of Joseph. Of the three, James the brother of the Lord is the most likely choice. Tradition of the early church fathers universally ascribes the letter to James, the pastor of the church in Jerusalem. See James 3.

The general content of the letter is a call to holiness of life. This accords well with what is known of the life of James. Church tradition noted his exceptional piety, reporting that the knees of the saintly James were like those of a camel due to the unusual amounts of time spent on his knees before God. The author of the epistle was also steeped in the OT outlook in general and in Judaism in particular.

On the other hand, James the brother of John, the son of Zebedee, cannot be the author since he became an early martyr (Acts 12:1-2), his death almost certainly predating the writing of this letter from James. Little is known of James the son of Alphaeus—too little to conjecture that he was involved in the writing of the epistle. Recipients Although some passages appear to address unbelievers (James 5:1-6), the letter is addressed to “the 12 tribes in the Dispersion” (1:1 HCSB). Reference to the “12 tribes” suggests that the recipients were Jews. Specifically, reference is made to the Jews of the Dispersion. This phrase recalled the scattering of the Jewish nation first in 722 B.C. when the Northern Kingdom of Israel fell to the Assyrian Empire and finally in 586 B.C. when the Southern Kingdom of Judah fell to the marauding Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar.

However, James clearly had a still more narrow focus. Apparently, James had in mind the “Christian” Jews of dispersion. This may be conjectured from James' identification of himself (1:1) as a servant of Jesus Christ as well as from references like having “faith in our glorious Lord Jesus Christ” (2:1 HCSB).

Date Supposing an early date of writing may account for the peculiarity of the address. James' martyrdom by A.D. 66 provides us with the latest possible date of writing. Evidences of a very early date, such as the mention of those coming into the “assembly” (Gr. sunagoge), point to a time very early in Christian history, perhaps prior to the Jerusalem Conference in A.D. 49-50.

Though some Bible students date James after A.D. 60, many scholars are convinced that James is the first book of the NT to be written, some dating it as early as A.D. 48. As such, it provides the reader with a rather remarkable insight into the developing concerns of the church in its earliest era.

Occasion The letter was evidently the product of concerns on the part of early pastoral leadership about the ethical standards of early Christians. Therefore, the subject matter includes an analysis in chapter 1 of how to respond to temptation and trial (1:1-18). The necessity of “doing” the word as well as “hearing” the word is the focus of James 1:19-27. Treatment of the poor and the appropriate management of wealth are topics of concern in James 2:1-13 and 5:1-6. The waywardness of the tongue and the necessity of its taming are discussed in chapter 3. Conflicts and attitudes to other Christians are the subjects of chapter 4. Appropriate responses to life's demands and pressures are suggested in chapter 5.

James' Contributions Some scholars have compared James to the OT book of Proverbs. In many respects the two are quite different. However, the comparison is valid from the perspective of ethical instruction. The theme of the book is that practical religion must manifest itself in works that are superior to those of the world. The essence of such works covers the areas of personal holiness and service to others, such as visiting “orphans and widows,” and keeping oneself “unstained by the world” (1:27 HCSB). These “works” further demand active resistance to the devil (4:7), submission to God (4:7), and even brokenhearted repentance for sins (4:9).

Patience in the wake of trials and temptations is the subject both of the introduction and of the conclusion of the epistle. Readers are to “consider it a great joy” when trials come (1:2 HCSB) and expect reward for endurance of those trials (1:12). In James 5:7-11 James returns to the subject, citing both Job and the prophets as appropriate examples of patience in the midst of tribulation.

Questions and Challenges of James Two difficult and widely debated passages in James challenge Bible students. In 2:14-26, James argued that “faith, if it doesn't have works, is dead by itself” (2:17 HCSB). This apparent contradiction to the teaching of the Apostle Paul has caused much consternation among some theologians. For example, Martin Luther referred to the book as “an epistle of straw” when compared with Paul's writings.

More careful exegesis has shown that the contradiction is apparent rather than real. James argued that a faith that is only a “confessing faith,” such as that of the demons (2:19), is not a saving faith at all. The demons believed in God in the sense of “intellectual assent,” but they were void of belief in the sense of “commitment.” Orthodoxy of doctrine that does not produce a sanctified lifestyle is, in the final analysis, worthless.

In 5:13-16 James spoke of healing and its means. Actually, this passage only treats the subject of healing incidentally. The actual purpose of the discussion is to stress the effectiveness of the earnest prayer of a righteous man (5:15-16). This is illustrated by a reference to Elijah, whose prayers were sufficient alternately to shut up the heavens and then to open them (5:17-18).

Whatever else may be intended, clearly the prayer of faith “will save the sick person” (HCSB). The anointing oil, whether medicinal, as some have argued, or symbolic, as others have held, is not the healing agent. God heals when He chooses to heal (5:14), as a response to the fervent prayers of righteous men.

The letter from James remains of lasting value and consequence to the Christian confronted by an increasingly secular world. Christ ought to make a difference in one's life. That is the theme and mandate of James.

Outline

- I. Salutation (1:1)
- II. True Religion Is Developed by Trials and Testing (1:2-15).
 - A. Joy is the correct response to times of testing (1:2).
 - B. Testing of faith can result in steadfastness that, when mature, enables us to be perfect, complete, and lacking in nothing (1:3-4).
 - C. True wisdom comes from God and is available to those who ask in faith, not doubting (1:5-8).
 - D. Wealth may be a test of faith, not a proof of faith (1:9-11).
 - E. Perseverance under trial leads to blessing (1:12).
 - F. Temptation comes from within, not from God, and is to be resisted (1:13-15).

III. True Religion Is Initiated by Faith (1:16-2:26).

- A. Salvation by faith is a gift from God, as are all good gifts (1:16-17).
- B. Salvation as an expression of God's will is related to God's Word (1:18-27).
 - 1. We are to receive God's Word (1:18-21).
 - 2. We are to do God's Word, not just hear it (1:22-25).
 - 3. We must control our speech and practice true religion (1:26-27).
- C. Saving faith does not show favoritism but shows love to all (2:1-13).
- D. Saving faith issues in godly attitudes and actions (2:14-26).

IV. True Religion Is Guided by Wisdom (3:1-18).

- A. The wise person controls the tongue (3:1-12).
- B. Earthly wisdom is characterized by evil attitudes and actions (3:13-16).
- C. The wise person's life is characterized by moral behavior (3:17-18).

V. True Religion Is Demonstrated by Works (4:1-5:12).

- A. Avoid acting selfishly instead of asking God (4:1-3).
- B. Avoid being friendly with the world (4:4-5).
- C. Possess the proper attitude toward self—being humble, not proud or presumptuous (4:6-10).
- D. Avoid speaking against or judging other Christians (4:11-12).
- E. Avoid presuming on God's time (4:13-16).
- F. Do not fail to do what you know is right (4:17).
- G. Avoid depending on wealth (5:1-3).
- H. Avoid treating persons unjustly (5:4-6).
- I. Do not be impatient, for the Lord is coming (5:7-11).
- J. Do not take oaths (5:12).

VI. True Religion Is Expressed in Prayer (5:13-20).

- A. Prayer, including intercession, is a significant part of true religion (5:13-16a).
 - 1. Prayer is a proper response to suffering and illness (5:13-14).
 - 2. Prayers are to be offered in faith, with right motives (5:15).
 - 3. Prayer includes confession of sins (5:16a).

- B. The righteousness of the person praying is related to the effectiveness of the prayer (5:16b).
- C. All humans can pray and be heard (5:17-18).
- D. Intercession for sinners is an important Christian responsibility (5:19-20).

JAMIN (Já' mĭn) Personal name meaning “on the right” or “good luck.” 1. Son of Simeon and grandson of Jacob, a clan leader in tribe of Simeon (Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:12). 2. Grandson of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:27). 3. Levite who interpreted the law for the people as Ezra read it (Neh. 8:7). 4. Component of name “Benjamin” meaning “right hand.”

JAMINITE (Já' mĭn īt) Member of clan headed by Jamin. See Jamin.

JAMLECH (Jám' lēk) Personal name meaning “May He cause to be king.” Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:34).

JANAI (Já' nā ī) Personal name meaning “may He answer me.” Member of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:12).

JANGLING, VAIN KJV expression for idle talk (1 Tim. 1:6). Translation alternatives include foolish (TEV), fruitless (HCSB, NASB) or vain (RSV) discussion, meaningless talk (NIV, NRSV), and a wilderness of words (REB).

JANIM (Já' nĭm) Modern translation spelling of Janum following written Hebrew text (Josh. 15:53). See Janum.

JANNA (Jǎn' nǎ) or JANNAI (Jǎn' nī) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Ancestor of Jesus and head of final list of seven names before Jesus (Luke 3:24). Modern translations spell Jannai.

JANNES AND JAMBRES (Jǎn' nēs and Jám'brēs) Two opposers of Moses and Aaron (2 Tim. 3:8). Though the names do not appear in the OT, rabbinic tradition identified Jannes and Jambres as being among those Egyptian magicians who sought to duplicate for Pharaoh the miracles performed by Moses (Exod. 7:11). The Damascus Document from the Qumran Sect describes the two as brothers raised up by Belial, the evil one. Eusebius of Caesarea described them as sacred scribes of Egypt. The Jewish tradition makes several mentions of them, but in the end they could not match God's power displayed through Moses.

JANOAH (Já nō' ah) or JANOHAH (Já nō' hah) Place-name meaning "he rests." 1. Town in tribal territory of Ephraim (Josh. 16:6-7). It is probably modern Khirbet Janun about seven miles south of Nablus. KJV transliterates the Hebrew ah meaning "towards" and so spells Janohah here. 2. City in northern Israel that Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria (744-727 B.C.), captured from Pekah, king of Israel (752-732 B.C.), about 733 B.C. Its location is uncertain, suggestions including Khirbet Janun; Janua, six miles south of Megiddo, and Janoah, nine miles east of Acco. Recently, interpreters have sought to establish a military pattern in the report and locate Janoah at Khirbet Niha just south of Kefar Giladi on the road south from Abel-beth-maacah.

JANUM (Já' nūm) Place-name of uncertain meaning, perhaps "slumbering." Town in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:53) near Hebron. The location is not known. KJV, NASB spelling follows vocalization by early Hebrew scribes. See Janim.

JAPHETH (Já' phēth) Personal name meaning "may he have space." One of Noah's three sons, either the youngest or next to youngest (Gen. 5:32). Genesis 10:2 identifies Japheth's sons as Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras. One of the titans of Greek mythology had a similar name. These names point to Japheth as having been the progenitor of the Indo-European peoples who lived to the north and west of Israel, farthest from Israel. Genesis 9:27 pronounces God's blessing on Japheth and his descendants, including living with Shem, thus getting to dwell in the land of promise, and being served by the Canaanites, thus sharing the position as God's people. Here is an early indication of non-Israelites having a share with God's people. See Noah; Table of Nations.

JAPHIA (Já·phi´ 4) Place and personal name meaning “place situated high above” or “may He bring shining light.” 1. Border town of tribal territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:12). In the Amarna Letters, the Egyptian pharaoh required the town to supply forced laborers after Labayu of Shechem destroyed Shunem. It is modern Yafa, southwest of Nazareth. 2. King of Lachish who joined southern coalition against Joshua and met death by cave of Makkedah (Josh. 10:1-27,31-32). 3. Son born to David in Jerusalem by unnamed wife (2 Sam. 5:15).

JAPHLET (Jáph´ lèṭ) Personal name meaning “He rescues.” Member of tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:32-33).

JAPHLETI (Jáph´ let í) or JAPHLETITE (Jáph´ le ut) Place-name according to KJV but name of tribal group—Japhletites—according to modern translations (Josh. 16:3). The clan's territory lay on border between Ephraim and Benjamin, though the clan apparently belonged to Asher. See Japhlet

JAPHO (Já´ phò) (KJV) See Joppa.

JAR See Pottery; Vessels and Utensils.

JARAH (Já´ rah) Personal name meaning “goat.” Descendant of King Saul (1 Chron. 9:42), apparently the same as Jehoadah in 8:36, the words being spelled the same except for one similarly written letter in Hebrew (cp. 1 Chron. 10:6).

JAREB (Já´ rëb) Personal name meaning “the great one” or “he contends” (in court). Modern translations see the term as part of a Near Eastern expression, “the great king,” often applied to the king of Assyria, as in the Aramaic treaty inscriptions from Sefire and in the Assyrian equivalent in 2 Kings 18:19. Hosea accused Israel and Judah of turning to the “great king” of Assyria, probably Tiglath-pileser III (at least for Judah), to cure their ills rather than going to Yahweh, the great King of the universe and the Great Physician (Hos. 5:13). Hosea pronounced just punishment for Israel, their “calf-god” (REB) would be carried to Assyria as tribute to “the Great King” (10:5-6).

JARED (Jār' ăd) Personal name meaning "slave." 1. Father of Enoch (Gen. 5:15-20). 2. Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:18; English translations usually spell the same Hebrew word "Jered" here rather than Jared).

JARESIAH (Jār-ă-sī' ah) (KJV) See Jaareshiah.

JARHA (Jār' há) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Egyptian slave used by his master Sheshan to maintain the family line in clan of Jerahmeel and tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:34-35).

JARIB (Jā' rīb) Personal name meaning "He contends against" or "He is legal opponent of" (Ps. 35:1; Isa. 49:25). 1. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:24) but called Jachin in Num. 26:12. See Jachin. 2. Levite who served as messenger for Ezra in his search for Levites to accompany him back to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16). 3. Priest who pledged under Ezra's leadership to divorce his foreign wife to remove the temptation to worship the foreigners' gods (Ezra 10:18).

JARMUTH (Jār' mūth) Place-name meaning "height" or "swelling in the ground." 1. City whose king joined southern coalition against Joshua and Gibeon (Josh. 10). Joshua "stored" the king in the cave of Makkedah before shaming him and slaying him (cp. 12:11). It lay in the western "lowlands" (NASB, NRSV), the "foothills" (NIV), or Shephelah (REB) of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:33,35). It is identified with modern Tell Jarmuth three miles southwest of Bethshemesh and 15 miles southwest of Jerusalem. An Amarna letter from Tell el-Hesi mentions it. Brief excavations have shown early Bronze and Stone Age remains but as yet nothing from the late Bronze or early Iron Ages. In Nehemiah's time Jewish settlers lived there (Neh. 11:29). 2. City of the Levites in the tribal territory of Issachar (Josh. 21:29; cp. 19:21; 1 Chron. 6:73, both spelled differently and differing from 1. above; thus spelling of Remeth, Ramoth). This city may be located at modern Kaukab el-Hawa.

JAROAH (Jā rō' ah) Personal name meaning "smooth, gentle" or "shown mercy." Member of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:14).

JASHAR, BOOK OF (Jāsh'ār) An ancient written collection of poetry quoted by Bible authors. See Books.

JASHEN (Jā' shēn) Personal name meaning “sleepy.” Member of David's elite military corps, the “30” or groups of threes perhaps (2 Sam. 23:32). First Chronicles 11:34 apparently spells the same name Hashem and calls him the Gizonite. See Gizonite.

JASHER (Jā' shēr) (KJV) See Jashar.

JASHOBEAM (Jā shō' bə ām) Personal name meaning “the uncle (or people) will return.” Warrior of Saul's tribe of Benjamin who supported David at Ziklag as he fled from Saul (1 Chron. 12:6). He is listed first as “the chief of the thirty” (1 Chron. 11:11 NASB). Some interpreters would say the text listed him as a Hachmonite, while others would see “Hachmonite” as reference to a different individual. Second Samuel 23:8 spells the name Josheb-basshebeth (see modern translations), the last part of which represents the Hebrew word for “shame,” at times used by scribes instead of an original name containing the Canaanite god's name Baal, leading some interpreters to see the original name here as Yishbaal. Some Greek manuscripts actually read Ishbaal. In 2 Sam. 23:8 REB reads Ishbosheth. KJV simply translates there: “that sat in the seat.” Jashobeam commanded David's first course or division administering the kingdom for the first month of each year (1 Chron. 27:2). Here Jashobeam is the son of Zabdiel, a descendant of Perez who belonged to the tribe of Judah. Elsewhere Jashobeam is a member of the clan of Hachmon. See Hachmonites.

JASHUB (Jā' shūb) Personal name meaning “He turns to” or “He returns.” The name is found in several Near Eastern cultures. 1. Clan leader in tribe of Issachar (Num. 26:24). Genesis 46:13 (KJV) names him Job. 2. Man with foreign wife condemned by Ezra as bringing temptation to foreign worship into the community (Ezra 10:29). 3. Part of name of Isaiah's son (Isa. 7:3). See Shear-jashub. 4. Some interpreters see a town named Jashub in Josh. 17:7, a border town of the tribe of Manasseh (REB). This would be modern Jasuf, eight miles south of Shechem.

JASHUBI-LEHEM (Já shū bí-le' hēm) Personal name meaning “Jashubites of bread” or “she returns for bread.” Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:22 NASB, KJV, NIV). Hebrew text has two words which modern interpreters read in different ways: but returned to Lehem (NRSV); then settled in Bethlehem (TEV).

JASHUBITE (Já shūb í) Member of clan founded by Jashub. See Jashub.

JASIEL (Jās' í ēl) (KJV) See jaasiel.

JASON (Já' son) Personal name often used by Jews as a substitute for Hebrew Joshua or Joseph and also used by Gentiles. 1. In Acts 17:5 Paul's host in Thessalonica. He was brought up on charges before the city officials when the angry Jewish mob was unable to find Paul (Acts 17:6-7). The Jason mentioned in Rom. 16:21 may have been the same person. He is identified as a Jew who joined Paul and others in greeting the Romans. 2. Jewish high priest during the final years of Seleucid control of Palestine. His Greek name reflects the Hellenistic influence that increasingly permeated Jewish life during the period before the Maccabean revolt. See Intertestamental History and Literature.

JASPER Green chalcedony. Jasper commonly translates two Hebrew terms and one Greek term. The first term is used for the sixth stone in the headdress of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13). The second term is used for a stone in the high priest's breastplate (Exod. 28:20; 39:13). This second term is rendered onyx at Ezek. 28:13. The third term describes the face of the One seated on the throne (Rev. 4:3) and the glory of the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:11,18-19). The NIV used “jasper” to translate an obscure Hebrew term at Job 28:18. Other translation options include alabaster (REB), crystal (NASB, NRSV, TEV), and pearls (KJV). See Minerals and Metals.

JATHNIEL (Jāth' nī ēl) Personal name meaning “God gives.” A Levite gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:2).

JATTIR (Jāt' ūr) Place-name meaning “the remainder.” Town in the hills of the tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:48). David gave some of war booty from victory over Amalekites to Jattir (1 Sam. 30:27). Joshua reserved it for the Levites (Josh. 21:14). It was located near modern Khirbet Attir about 13 miles south-southwest of Hebron and 14 miles northeast of Beersheba.

JAVAN (Já' vǎn) Personal name meaning "Greece." Son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2) and father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim (Gen. 10:4), thus the original ancestor of Greek peoples. Elsewhere in the OT, the name Javan is used to denote Greece. See Greece; Table of Nations.

JAVELIN Light spear thrown as a weapon. See Arms and Armor; Weapons.

JAW Either of two bony structures that border the mouth and bear the teeth. The taking of captives in war is sometimes pictured using the images of animals led with bridles in their jaws (Isa. 30:28) or fish carried away with hooks in theirs (Ezek. 29:4; 38:4). According to one understanding of Hos. 11:4, God, pictured as a farmer, "lifts the yoke from their jaws" (NASB), that is, looses the yoke so that the oxen might feed better.

Statuette of Near Eastern warrior holding a spear or javelin from around 1500 B.C.

JAZER (Já' zēr) Place-name meaning “May He help.” Amorite city-state that Israel conquered while marching across the land east of the Jordan towards the promised land (Num. 21:32). The tribe of Gad rebuilt and settled Jazer (Num. 32:35; cp. Josh. 13:25). Joshua assigned it to the Levites (Josh. 21:39). Isaiah pronounced judgment on Jazer while preaching against Moab (Isa. 16:8-9). Jeremiah echoed him (Jer. 48:32). David found outstanding leaders there (1 Chron. 26:31-32). It was also an important city in the period between the Testaments (1 Macc. 5:8). Interpreters debate Jazer's exact location. German archaeologists appear to favor Tell el-Areme, while Israelis point to Khirbet es-Sar about eight miles west of Amman. Others point to Khirbet Jazzir about two miles south of es-Salt.

JAZIZ (Jā' zīz) Personal name meaning "he goads." Chief shepherd under David. He was probably a foreigner. See Hagrite.

JEALOUSY Used in three senses in Scripture: (1) as intolerance of rivalry or unfaithfulness; (2) as a disposition suspicious of rivalry or unfaithfulness; and (3) as hostility towards a rival or one believed to enjoy an advantage, a sense of envy. God is jealous for His people Israel in sense (1), that is, God is intolerant of rival gods (Exod. 20:5; 34:14; Deut. 4:24; 5:9) One expression of God's jealousy for Israel is God's protection of His people from enemies. Thus God's jealousy includes avenging Israel (Ezek. 36:6; 39:25; Nah. 1:2; Zech. 1:14; 8:2). Phinehas is described as jealous with God's jealousy (Num. 25:11, 13, sometimes translated zealous for God). Elijah is similarly characterized as jealous (or zealous) for God (1 Kings 19:10,14). In the NT Paul speaks of his divine jealousy for the Christians at Corinth (2 Cor. 11:2).

Numbers 5:11-30 concerns the process by which a husband suspicious of his wife's unfaithfulness might test her. Most often human jealousy involves hostility towards a rival. Joseph's brothers were jealous (Gen. 37:11) and thus sold their brother into slavery (Acts 7:9). In Acts 17:5 a jealous group among the Jews incited the crowd against Paul. Jealousy, like envy, is common in vice lists (Rom. 13:13; 2 Cor. 12:20; Gal. 5:20-21). Jealousy is regarded as worse than wrath or anger (Prov. 27:4). James regarded jealousy (or bitter envy) as characteristic of earthy, demonic wisdom (3:14) and as the source of all disorder and wickedness (3:16). See Envy.

JEALOUSY, CEREAL OFFERING OF See Jealousy, Ordeal of.

JEALOUSY, IMAGE OF Term for an idol in Ezek. 8:3,5 (NRSV, KJV). The meaning is either that the idol evokes God's jealousy or that the idol is identified with Asherah, the goddess of passionate love (cp. 2 Kings 21:7; 2 Chron. 33:7). See Jealousy.

JEALOUSY, ORDEAL OF Test to determine guilt or innocence of a wife suspected of adultery but who had not been caught in the act (Num. 5:11-31). The ordeal consisted of two parts: “a grain offering of memorial, a reminder of iniquity” (5:15 NASB) and “the water of bitterness that brings a curse” (5:18). See Bitter Water.

JEALOUSY, WATER OF See Bitter Water.

JEARIM (Jē' ā-rīm) Place-name meaning “forests” or “parks.” Component of several OT placenames including Kiriath-jearim, Mount Jearim, Fields of Jearim, and the wood of 1 Sam. 14:26. See Chesalon; Kiriath-jearim.

JEATERAI (Jə āt' ə-rī) or JEATHERAI (Jə āth' ə-rī) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Levite (1 Chron. 6:21) perhaps to be identified with Ethni (1 Chron. 6:41).

JEBERECHIAH (Jə bēr ə-kī' ah) or JEBEREKIAH (NIV) Personal name meaning “Yahweh blesses.” Father of Zechariah who served as witness for Isaiah (Isa. 8:2; cp. 2 Kings 18:2).

JEBUS (Jē' būs) Place-name meaning “trodden under foot.” Name of tribe originally occupying Jerusalem and then of city (Judg. 19:10; cp. Josh. 18:28; 1 Chron. 11:4). The name “Jebus” does not occur outside the Bible. See Jebusi or Jebusites; Jerusalem.

JEBUSI (Jēb' ū sī) (KJV, Josh. 18:16,28) or JEBUSITES (Jēb' ū sīts) Clan who originally controlled Jerusalem before David conquered the city. In the list of the descendants of Noah (Gen. 10) the Jebusites are traced through the line of Ham and Canaan and are listed alongside other clans such as the Amorites and Girgashites. In Josh. 10 the king of Jerusalem, Adonizedek, is considered one of the five Amorite kings who fought against Joshua. In the time of the judges, Jerusalem was attacked and burned by the men of Judah (Judg. 1:8), but the Jebusites were not expelled. Centuries later David captured the city and made it his capital. David purchased a stone threshing floor from a Jebusite named Araunah (2 Sam. 24:16-24), and this later became the site of Solomon's temple. The remnants of the Jebusites became bondservants during Solomon's reign (1 Kings 9:20-21). Jebusite names appear to be Human rather than Semitic. See Jerusalem. M. Stephen Davis

JECAMIAH (Jĕc á mí' ah) (KJV) Personal name meaning “Yah causes to stand.” 1. Member of clan of Jerahmeel in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:41). 2. Son of King Jeconiah (Jehoiachin), the Judean king exiled by Babylon (1 Chron. 3:18). English translations sometimes spell these two names differently though they are the same Hebrew name.

JECHILIAH (Jĕk ı li' ah) NASB spelling (2 Chron. 26:3) following written Hebrew text. Other English translations follow early scribal note, versions, and 2 Kings 15:2, reading Jecoliah.

JECHOLIAH (Jĕk ô li' ah) (KJV, 2 Kings 15:2) See Jechiliah.

JECHONIAH (Jĕk ô ní' ah) Personal name meaning “Jah establishes.” Shortened form of Jehoiachin. Alternative spellings are Jeconiah and Jechonias. See Jehoiachin.

JECOLIAH (Jĕc ô li' ah) Mother of Uzziah, king of Judah (2 Kings 15:2; 2 Chron. 26:3). See Jechiliah; Jechoiiah.

JEDAIAH (Jĕ dí' ah) 1. Personal name meaning “praise Yah” or “Yah has performed a merciful deed.” Man who helped Nehemiah repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10) and a descendant of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:37). 2. Personal name meaning “Yah knows.” A priest or priests heading the second course or division of priests (1 Chron. 24:7), returned from Babylonian exile (1 Chron. 9:10; cp. Ezra 2:36; Neh. 7:39; 11:10; 12:6-7,19,21). The returning exile may be same as one from whom the prophet Zechariah received gold and silver (Zech. 6:10,14). English translations usually spell the names the same though they represent two distinct Hebrew names.

JEDIAEL (Jĕ dí' a ăl) Personal name meaning “the one whom God knows.” 1. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:6,10-11). 2. Military leader under David (1 Chron. 11:45). The same or a different warrior from the tribe of Manasseh joined David when he moved to Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:20). 3. Levite and gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:2).

JEDIDAH (Jə dī' dah) Personal name meaning “darling” or “beloved.” Mother of Josiah king of Judah (2 Kings 22:1).

JEDIDIAH (Jē dī dī' ah) Personal name or nickname meaning “Yah's darling.” A similar name meaning “El's darling” appears in the Ugaritic materials. A name God told David to give to his son Solomon (2 Sam. 12:25). Despite David's sin with Bathsheba and the death of the child of their sinful relationship, God showed His love to their child Solomon, thus underlining God's forgiving nature and His continued commitment to David and his royal house.

JEDUTHUN (Jə dū' thūn) Personal name meaning “praise.” Prophetic musician and Levite in the service of King David (1 Chron. 25:1). The names Asaph and Heman appear along with that of Jeduthun as original ancestors of temple musicians. In 1 Chron. 15:17, however, Asaph and Heman are associated with Ethan, suggesting that Ethan and Jeduthun may be different names for the same person. If that is the case, Jeduthun would have been the son of Kushaiah and a member of the clan of Merari. Otherwise, nothing is known about Jeduthun's ancestry. In 1 Chron. 25:1,3 he is said to have prophesied using musical instruments; and in 2 Chron. 35:15 he is referred to as the king's seer, apparently working with Zadok at Gibeon (1 Chron. 16:37-42). Three psalms (39; 62; 77) include his name in their titles. The exact nature of Jeduthun's relationship to these psalms is uncertain. See Music, Instruments, Dancing; Priests and Levites; Psalms, Book of.

JEEZER (Jə ē' zēr) Personal name meaning “where is help?” or a shortened form of “my brother helps” or “my father helps.” Original head of a clan in tribe of Gilead (Num. 26:30 KJV). Apparently, the same name is intended in Josh. 17:2 where Abiezer occurs, quite probably the original name. Modern translations often use spelling Iezer. See Abiezer.

JEEZERITE (Jə ē' zēr-it) Member of clan of Jeezer. See Jeezer.

JEGAR-SAHADUTHA (Jē gār-sā há du' thá) Aramaic place-name meaning “stone marker.” Aramaic equivalent of Galeed. See Galeed.

JEHALELEEL (Jə há lē' lə ēl) or JEHALELEL or JEHALLELEL Personal name meaning “he praises God” or “God shines forth.” 1. Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16). 2. Levite whose son helped King Hezekiah purify the temple (2 Chron. 29:12). English translations are not always consistent in transliterating this Hebrew name in its two occurrences.

JEHATH (Jē' hāth) (NIV, 1 Chron. 6:20) See Jahath.

JEHAZIEL (Jə hāz' ī ēl) See Jahaziel.

JEHDEIAH (Jēh dē' yá) Personal name meaning “Yahweh rejoices.” 1. Levite listed outside the 24 courses of Levites (1 Chron. 24:20). 2. Keeper of the royal donkeys under David (1 Chron. 27:30). His home was Meronoth.

JEHEZEKEL (Jə hē' zə kēl) or JEHEZKEL (Jə hēz' kēl) (NASB, NIV, TEV, REB, NRSV) Personal name meaning “God strengthens.” Same Hebrew spelling as Prophet Ezekiel. Head of 20th course of priests (1 Chron. 24:16).

JEHIAH (Jə hī' ah) Personal name meaning “may he live, O Yah.” Guard of the ark when David brought it up from Philistine territory (1 Chron. 15:24).

JEHIEL (Jə hī' ēl) Personal name meaning “Let him live, O God.” 1. Apparently a variant name for Jehiah (1 Chron. 15:18; cp. v.24). See Jehiah. 2. Levite musician who played the lute before the ark (1 Chron. 15:20; 16:5). 3. Leading Levite (1 Chron. 23:8). 4. Levite in charge of treasury for God's house under David (1 Chron. 29:8; cp. 26:20-22). 5. Guardian of the royal sons under David (1 Chron. 27:32). 6. Son of King Jehoshaphat slain by his brother King Jehoram when the latter ascended to the throne (2 Chron. 21:1-4). 7. Levite who helped purify the temple under King Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:14) according to ancient Bible translations and scribal note; the written Hebrew text has “Jehuel.” Later, under Hezekiah possibly the same Jehiel served as an overseer in the temple (2 Chron. 31:13). 8. Leading priest under Josiah who distributed large offerings to the priests for their Passover offerings (2 Chron. 35:8). 9. Father of man who returned with Ezra to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 8:9). 10. Father of man who proposed that men with foreign wives divorce them in order not to tempt others to worship foreign gods under Ezra (Ezra 10:1-4). 11. Priest who agreed to divorce his foreign wife under Ezra (Ezra 10:21). 12. Layman who agreed to divorce his foreign wife under Ezra (Ezra 10:26).

JEHIELI (Jə hi' ɛ li) or JEHIELITE (Jə hi' ɛ' li) (NASB) Member of clan founded by Jehiel (1 Chron. 26:21-22). See Jehiel.

JEHIZKIAH (Jə hīz ki' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh strengthens.” 1. Variant Hebrew spelling of Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:10; Isa. 1:1; 1 Chron. 4:41; 2 Chron. 28:27-33:3). 2. Man of tribe of Ephraim who prevented people of Israel from bringing war prisoners from Judah into the city after Pekah of Israel defeated Ahaz of Judah about 733 B.C. (2 Chron. 28:12).

JEHOADAH (Jə hō' á dah) or JEHOADDAH (Jə hō' ád dah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “Yahweh is ornamentation.” Descendant of Saul in tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:36), the list showing a continued interest in lineage of Saul long after his death.

JEHOADDAN (Jə hō ád' dán) Personal name meaning “Yahweh is bliss.” Mother of King Amaziah of Judah (2 Kings 14:2).

JEHOADDIN (Jə hō ád' dīn) Variant spelling of Jehoaddan in written Hebrew text of 2 Kings 14:2, where early Hebrew scribal note has Jehoaddan in agreement with 2 Chron. 25:1. See Jehoaddan.

JEHOAHAZ (Jə hō á ház) Personal name meaning “Yahweh grasps hold.” Two kings of Judah and one king of Israel bore this name. 1. In 2 Chron. 21:17 the son and successor of Jehoram as king of Judah (841 B.C.). He is more frequently referred to as Ahaziah. 2. In 2 Kings 10:35 the son and successor of Jehu as king of Israel (814-798 B.C.). His reign is summarized in 2 Kings 13. Although 2 Kings 13:1 states that he reigned for 17 years, a comparison of verse 1 with verse 10 seems to point to a reign of 14 years or a co-regency with his son for about three years. 3. In 2 Kings 23:30 the son and successor of Josiah as king of Judah (609 B.C.). He is also known as Shallum. See Chronology of the Biblical Period; Israel, Land of.

JEHOASH (Jə hō' āsh) Personal name meaning "Yahweh gave." Variant spelling of Joash. See Joash.

JEHOHANAN (Jə hō' hā nān) Personal name meaning "Yahweh is gracious." 1. Priest in whose temple quarters Ezra refreshed himself and mourned for the sin of the people in taking foreign wives (Ezra 10:6). This Jehohanan is sometimes equated with the high priest of Neh. 12:22-23 who is considered then to be a grandson of the high priest Eliashib and also to be the high priest mentioned in the Elephantine Papyri as serving about 411 B.C. Such evidence is then used to date the ministry of Ezra to about 398 B.C. rather than being in the time of Nehemiah. The relationships between the priestly Eliashibs and Jehohanans of Scripture are too unclear to make dating decisions on them. This Jehohanan may have been related to the Eliashib of Neh. 13:4 who was not a high priest but was closely connected to temple chambers. See Ezra. 2. Layman with a foreign wife under Ezra (Ezra 10:28). 3. Son of Tobiah, who opposed Nehemiah's work in Jerusalem (Neh. 6:18). Jehohanan's marriage to a prominent Jerusalem family gave Tobiah an information system concerning Jerusalem happenings. See Meshullam; Tobiah. 4. Head of a priestly family about 450 B.C. (Neh. 12:13). 5. Priest who helped Nehemiah celebrate completion of Jerusalem wall (Neh. 12:42). 6. Levite and gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:3). 7. Military commander under King Jehoshaphat of Judah (2 Chron. 17:15). 8. Father of a military commander under Jehoiada, the high priest, in the assassination of Queen Athaliah and the installation of Joash as king of Judah about 835 B.C. 9. Father of military captain under King Pekah of Israel (2 Chron. 28:12).

JEHOIACHIN (Jə hoi' á kin) Personal name meaning "Yahweh establishes." In 2 Kings 24:6 the son and successor of Jehoiakim as king of Judah. He was 18 years old when he came to the throne late in 598 B.C., and he reigned for three months in Jerusalem before being taken into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon. The prominence in the account of his reign of his mother Nehushta suggests that she may have wielded considerable influence during the time that her son was in office. Jehoiachin evidently was a throne name taken at the time of accession to the kingship. Jehoiachin's original name seems to have been Jeconiah or Coniah. He retained the title “king of Judah” even in exile, but he never returned to Judah to exercise rule there. Nevertheless, he was ultimately released from prison by Evil-merodach of Babylon and accorded some honor in the land of his captivity (2 Kings 25:27-30). See Chronology of the Biblical Period; Israel, Land of.

JEHOIADA (Jə hoɪ' á dá) Personal name meaning “Yahweh knows” or “Yahweh concerns Himself for.” 1. Priest who led the coup in which Queen Athaliah, who had usurped the throne of Judah, was slain and Joash (Jehoash), the legitimate heir to the monarchy, was enthroned (2 Kings 11:4). At the time, Joash was a child of eight, and Jehoiada evidently acted as regent for a number of years. Jehoiada's role was positive and beneficial; he influenced the young king to restore the temple. The death of Jehoiada marked a precipitous decline in the king's goodness and faithfulness to the Lord (2 Chron. 22-24). See Athaliah; Joash; Priests and Levites. 2. Father of Benaiah, David's military leader (2 Sam. 8:18) apparently from Kabzeel (2 Sam. 23:20). This Jehoiada was apparently a Levite and military leader for David at Hebron (1 Chron. 12:27). 3. Leading priest in the time of Jeremiah preceding Zephaniah (Jer. 29:25-26).

JEHOIAKIM (Jə hoɪ' á kím) Personal name meaning “Yahweh has caused to stand.” Son of Josiah who succeeded Jehoahaz as king of Judah (609-597). Jehoiakim was a throne name given to him by Pharaoh Neco of Egypt, who deposed his brother Jehoahaz. His original name had been Eliakim (2 Kings 23:34). He and his predecessor on the throne were brothers, sons of Josiah. He reigned for 11 years. At the beginning of his reign, Judah was subject to Egypt. Probably in 605 B.C., however, Babylon defeated Egypt. Jehoiakim, who apparently had been content to be a vassal of Egypt, transferred his allegiance to Babylon, but rebelled after three years. At his death he was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin. See Chronology of the Biblical Period; Israel, land of.

JEHOIARIB (Jə hoɪ' á ríb) Personal name meaning “Yahweh creates justice.” 1. Priest who was one of first settlers to return to Jerusalem from Babylonian exile about 538 B.C. (1 Chron. 9:10; cp. Neh. 12:6). 2. Head of first course or division of priests (1 Chron. 24:7; cp. Neh. 12:19). This listing follows Hebrew text. English translations are not always consistent in transliterating this name and its shortened form Joiarib. See Joiarib.

JEHONADAB (Jə hōn' á dāb) Personal name meaning “Yahweh incites” or “Yahweh offers Himself freely.” Son of Rechab who supported Jehu in the latter's bloody purge of the house of Ahab (2 Kings 10:15). He was representative of a group of austere ultraconservatives known as the Rechabites. Jeremiah 35 relates a meeting between the prophet and Rechabites, who cited the teaching of their ancestor Jehonadab (who in Jeremiah is called Jonadab). In the context of that meeting, some of the precepts of the Rechabites are articulated. They are reminiscent of the regulations that governed the Nazirites. The Hebrew word rechav means “chariot,” so some scholars think Jehonadab belonged to Israel's chariot forces. See Jehu; Rechabites.

JEHONATHAN (Jə hōn' á thán) Personal name meaning “Yahweh gave.” 1. Longer form of Jonathan often used in Hebrew text for Jonathan as in 1 Sam. 14:6,8. 2. Son of Abiathar, the priest (2 Sam. 15:27,36; 17:17,20). He helped King David learn Absalom's plans when Absalom drove his father from Jerusalem. 3. King David's nephew who slew a giant from Gath (2 Sam. 21:21-22). 4. Uncle of King David who served as royal counselor and scribe (1 Chron. 27:32). 5. Military leader under David (2 Sam. 23:32). 6. Supervisor of royal storehouses under David (1 Chron. 27:25). 7. Scribe whose house King Zedekiah transformed into prison where he jailed Jeremiah (Jer. 37:15), a place Jeremiah did not like (37:20; 38:26). 8. Levite King Jehoshaphat sent to teach God's law in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8). 9. Head of a priestly family about 450 B.C. (Neh. 12:18). 10. Founder of priesthood at worship place in Dan (Judg. 18:30). Earliest Hebrew scribes noted that Jonathan was a descendant of Moses, but the present Hebrew text says “Manasseh.” The Hebrew text is at times inconsistent in using the longer or shorter form of the name, and modern translators are as equally inconsistent. This article follows the Hebrew text. See Jonathan.

JEHORAM (Jə hó' rām) Personal name meaning “Yahweh is exalted.” Alternate form of Joram. See Joram.

JEHOSHABEATH (Jē hō shā' bə āth) Variant form of Jehosheba. See Jehosheba.

JEHOSHAPHAT (Jə hōsh' ā phāt) Personal name meaning “Yahweh judged” or “Yahweh established the right.” 1. Son and successor of Asa as king of Judah (1 Kings 15:24). He occupied the throne for 25 years (873-848 B.C.). The biblical record of his reign is contained in the final chapters of 1 Kings and in 2 Chron. 17-20. He was an able ruler and a faithful worshiper of Yahweh (1 Kings 22:42-43). Nevertheless, he did one thing that ultimately proved to be disastrous: he made an alliance with Ahab, king of Israel. The immediate result was beneficial to both kingdoms. Years of conflict between them came to an end, and both kingdoms were strengthened. However, the alliance involved a marriage between Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram and Ahab's daughter Athaliah. Athaliah's influence in Judah finally proved to be horrific. See Athaliah; Chronology of the Biblical Period; Israel, Land of; Micaiah. 2. Father of Jehu (2 Kings 9:2,14). 3. Official at David's court (2 Sam. 8:16), called the “recorder” or “secretary of state” (REB). The Hebrew term's root meaning is “remember.” Some Bible students compare the office to the Egyptian court herald who reported events to the king and made public announcements. Others think the office maintained public records, while others speak of a foreign minister. As with many Hebrew offices, certainty is not possible. Jehoshaphat retained the office under Solomon (1 Kings 4:3). 4. Solomon's official in tribal territory of Issachar in charge of providing provisions for the royal court one month a year (1 Kings 4:17).

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF Place-name meaning “valley where Yahweh judged.” Place to which the Lord summons the nations for judgment (Joel 3:2). No evidence exists that any valley actually bore this name in Joel's time. Since the fourth century A.D. the Kidron Valley has been known as the Valley of Jehoshaphat; but there is no reason for believing Joel was referring to the Kidron Valley. The reference in Joel probably is meant to be symbolic. Through Joel, God promised all nations would ultimately be called to God's place of judgment. See Joel.

JEHOSHEBA (Jə hōsh' ə bā) Personal name meaning “Yahweh is fullness or fortune.” Sister of King Ahaziah who, after his death, took young Joash and protected him from Queen Athaliah so Athaliah could not have him killed as she did the other royal children (2 Kings 11:2). Her name is spelled Jehoshabeath in 2 Chron. 22:11.

JEHOSHUA (Jə hōsh' ū á) (KJV, Num. 13:16) See Joshua.

JEHOVAH (Jē hō' vah) English transliteration of Hebrew text's current reading of divine name Yahweh. Hebrew text, however, represents scribe's efforts to prevent people from pronouncing the divine name by combining consonants of Yahweh and vowels of Hebrew word 'adonai (“Lord”) so readers would pronounce 'adonai rather than risk blasphemy by improperly pronouncing the divine name. See God; Lord; Names of God; YHWH.

JEHOVAH-JIREH (Jē hō vah-jī' rēh) Place-name meaning “Yahweh will provide” (Gen. 22:14). The name Abraham gave to the place where the Lord provided a sacrifice in place of Isaac. Modern translations translate the placename whereas KJV transliterates it. See Jehovah.

JEHOVAH-NISSI (Jē hō vah-nīs' si) Transliteration of place-name meaning “Yahweh is my banner.” Name Moses gave to the altar he built after defeating the Amalekites (Exod. 17:15). Modern versions translate the name instead of following KJV in transliterating it. See Jehovah.

Valley of Jehoshaphat (Kidron Valley) in Jerusalem showing the Church of All Nations.

JEHOVAH-SHALOM (Jě hō vah-shā lōm')

Place-name meaning “Yahweh is peace.” Name Gideon gave to the altar he built at Ophrah (Judg. 6:24). Modern versions translate the name while KJV transliterated it. See Jehovah.

JEHOVAH-SHAMMA (Jě hō vah-shām' mā)

Transliteration of a Hebrew name (Ezek. 48:35, margin) meaning “The LORD is there” which is better transliterated YHWH-shammah (NASB margin). The Jerusalem of Ezekiel's vision was known by this name (cp. Isa. 60:19-20; Rev. 21:3). See YHWH.

JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU (Jě hō vah-tsid kěn' ū)

Hebrew name meaning “The LORD [is] our righteousness” (Jer. 23:6; 33:16, margin). The name is applied to a future Davidic king who would lead his people to do what is right and thus bring peace (23:6) and to the restored city of Jerusalem (33:16). The name is possibly a play on the name of Zedekiah (“Righteous [is] the Lord”) who reigned from 597 to 587 B.C. See YHWH.

JEHOZABAD (Jə hōz' á bād) Personal name meaning “Yahweh bestowed.” 1. One of conspirators who killed King Joash of Judah (2 Kings 12:21). 2. Porter or doorkeeper under King David (1 Chron. 26:4). 3. Military commander under King Jehoshaphat of Judah about 860 B.C. (2 Chron. 17:18). See Jozabad.

JEHOZADAK (Jə hōz' á dāk) Personal name meaning “Yahweh deals righteously.” High priest at the time Nebuchadnezzar carried Judah into Babylonian exile about 587 B.C. (1 Chron. 6:14-15). He was the father of Joshua, the high priest who returned from exile with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Hag. 1:1; Zech. 6:11). An abbreviated Hebrew form Jozadak also appears, and English translations are inconsistent in spelling the name. See Josedech; Jozadak.

JEHU (Jə hū) Personal name meaning “Yah is He.” 1. Son of Jehoshaphat and king of Israel (841-814 B.C.). He was a commander of the army when Elisha the prophet sent one of the sons of the prophets to Ramoth-gilead to anoint him as king (2 Kings 9:1-10). Jehu embarked on a violent and bloody course that finally led him to the throne. Along the way he was responsible for the deaths of Joram, king of Israel; Ahaziah, king of Judah; Jezebel, still powerful former queen of Israel, and some 70 surviving members of the household of Israel's late King Ahab. He used trickery to gather and destroy worshipers of Baal, so that Jehu destroyed Baal out of Israel (2 Kings 10:28). Jehu established a strong dynasty in Israel. He and his descendants held the throne for approximately a century. See Chronology of the Biblical Period; Elijah; Israel, Land of. 2. Prophet who proclaimed God's judgment on King Baasha of Israel (1 Kings 16:1-12). He warned King Jehoshaphat of Judah (2 Chron. 19:2) and recorded the acts of Jehoshaphat in a record to which the chronicler referred his readers (2 Chron. 20:34). 3. Member of David's army at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3). His home was Anathoth, in the tribal territory of David's opponent Saul. 4. Leader of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:35).

JEHUBBAH (Jə hūb' bah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “He has hidden.” Member of tribe of Asher(1 Chron. 7:34).

JEHUCAL (Jə hū' cāl) Personal name meaning “Yahweh proves to be mighty.” Messenger King Zedekiah sent to ask Jeremiah to pray for him as he began to rule. Apparently, Zedekiah wanted blessing on his efforts to cooperate with Egypt against Babylon about 587 B.C. (Jer. 37:3). Jucal in 38:1 is probably a shortened form of the same name.

JEHUD (Jə hūd) Place-name meaning “praise.” Town in tribal territory of Dan (Josh. 19:45). It is located at modern Yehud about three miles south of Petah Tikvah and eight miles north of Joppa.

JEHUDI (Jə hū' di) Personal name meaning “Judean or Jewish.” Messenger for Jewish leaders calling Baruch to read Jeremiah's preaching to them and then messenger of the king to get the scroll so the king could read it. Jehudi read the scroll to King Jehoiakim who then cut it up and threw it into the fire about 604 B.C. Still, God preserved His prophetic word (Jer. 36:11-32).

JEHUDIAH (Je hu di' jah) Personal name or proper adjective meaning "Jewess or Judean woman." KJV transliteration from Hebrew which modern translations read as adjective, "Judean" or "Jewish." TEV reads "from the tribe of Judah" (1 Chron. 4:18).

JEHUEL (Je hu' el) Personal name meaning "God proves Himself active and alive." Written Hebrew text of 2 Chron. 29:14 followed by NRSV, TEV. Other translations read "Jehiel," following early Hebrew scribes. Levite who helped cleanse the temple under Hezekiah.

JEHUSH (Je' hush) Variant spelling of Jeush. See Jeush.

JEIEL (Je i' el) Personal name, possibly meaning "God is strong" or "God heals." The early Hebrew scribes often used Hebrew vowel points in the text to indicate the name should be read as Jeiel where the written text indicated Jeuel (1 Chron. 9:35; 11:44; 2 Chron. 26:11; 29:13). The early translations point to similar early confusion at 1 Chron. 9:6. This article will deal with both Jeiel and Jeuel, since all occurrences of Jeuel show early textual evidence of being read Jeiel. 1. Leader in the tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:7). 2. One of early members of tribe of Judah to return from Babylonian exile (1 Chron. 9:6). 3. Leader of the tribe of Benjamin as they settled in Gibeon. He may have married a foreign woman (1 Chron. 9:35; cp. 8:29). See Maacah. 4. Leader in David's army (1 Chron. 11:44). 5. Levite and porter or gatekeeper under David (1 Chron. 15:18). 6. Levite and harp player under David (1 Chron. 15:21). 7. Levite who served as worship leader at the ark of the covenant under David (1 Chron. 16:5). The Hebrew text includes two Jeiels in this verse, and interpreters since the earliest translations have changed one or the other to a slightly different spelling. 8. Ancestor of Levite who prophesied under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 20:14). 9. Royal scribe or secretary under King Uzziah (792-740 B.C.). He maintained the numbers of military personnel (2 Chron. 26:11). 10. Levite who helped Hezekiah purify the temple (2 Chron. 29:13). 11. Officer among the Levites who provided them offerings to sacrifice at the Passover under Josiah about 622 B.C. (2 Chron. 35:9). 12. Man who went with Ezra from Babylon to Judah about 458 B.C. (Ezra 8:13). 13. Man condemned for having foreign wife and thus tempting Israel to worship foreign gods under Ezra (Ezra 10:43).

JEKABZEEL (Jə kăb' zē əl) Place-name meaning "God assembled." A city in southern Judah settled by members of the tribe of Judah after the exile (Neh. 11:25). Jekabzeel was apparently south of the boundary of the Persian province of Judah, possibly at modern Khirbet Gharreh or Tell Ira. It is probably the same as Kabzeel, originally assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:21) about halfway between Tell Beersheba and Tell Arad. See Kabzeel.

JEKAMEAM (Jĕk á mĕ' âm) Personal name meaning "the people deliver" or "the Kinsman saves." A priest set aside to work in God's house (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23).

JEKAMIAH (Jĕk á mī' ah) Personal name meaning "Yah delivers." 1. Member of clan of Jerahmeel in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:41). 2. Son of King Jeconiah, also called Jehoiachin, of Judah about 597 B.C. (1 Chron. 3:18).

JEKUTHIEL (Jə kú' thī əl) Personal name meaning "God nourishes." Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:18).

JEMIMA (Jĕ mī' má) or JEMIMAH Personal name meaning "turtledove." Job's first daughter after God restored his fortunes (Job 42:14).

JEMUEL (Jə mú' əl) Personal name meaning "day of God" or "sea of God." Son of Simeon, grandson of Jacob, and head of clan in Israel (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15). Also called Nemuel (Num. 26:12; 1 Chron. 4:24).

JEPHTHAE (Jĕph' thē) KJV transliteration of Greek for Jephthah (Heb. 11:32). See Jephthah.

JEPHTHAH (Jĕph' thah) Personal name meaning "he will open." One of Israel's judges about 1100 B.C. (Judg. 11:1-12:7). A Gileadite, he was driven from his home because he was “the son of a harlot” (Judg. 11:1). He lived and raided in the land of Tob with a band of outlaws, becoming known as a “mighty warrior.” When the Ammonites moved against Israel, Jephthah's people asked him to return and lead them. His victory over the Ammonites came about after a vow he made to offer as a burnt offering the first living thing he saw upon his return from the battle. Although it was his daughter who greeted him, Jephthah did fulfill his vow. Considered as one of Yahweh's “chief” deliverers of His people (1 Sam. 12:11), Jephthah is hailed by the author of Hebrews as a hero of faith (Heb. 11:32). See Ammon, Ammonites; Human Sacrifices; Judges, Book of.

JEPHUNNEH (Jə phūn' nēh) Personal name meaning “he will be turned” or “appeased.” 1. Father of Caleb (Num. 13:6). See Caleb. 2. In 1 Chron. 7:38, one of the sons of Jether in tribe of Asher.

JERAH (Jə' rah) Personal name meaning “moon” or “month.” A descendant of Shem, son of Noah, in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:26). The moon was the chief god in South Arabia. Since the surrounding names in the list represent Arabian tribes, this probably indicates the relationship of Semitic tribes in Arabia to the Hebrews.

JERAHMEEL (Jə rah' mē ēl) Personal name meaning “God shows compassion.” 1. Son of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:9), brother of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:42), and original clan ancestor of Jerahmeelites (1 Sam. 27:10). See Jerahmeelite. 2. Son of Hammelech (Hebrew, “the king” and so translated by modern versions), who was one of a group whom King Jehoiakim sent to arrest Baruch and Jeremiah (Jer. 36:26). Yet, the Lord showed He has more power than human rulers by hiding His faithful servants from the king. 3. Levite in time of David (1 Chron. 24:29).

JERAHMEELITE (Jə rah' mē ēl īt) Member of clan of Jerahmeel which apparently lived south of Beersheba in the Negev. While dwelling with the Philistines, David told them he was fighting in the territory of the Jerahmeelites (1 Sam. 27:10), making Achish, the Philistine king, think he was fighting against parts of Judah, while he actually fought the other groups in the south who opposed Judah—Geshurites, Gezrites, Amalekites (1 Sam. 27:8). He divided the spoils of war with the Jerahmeelites (1 Sam. 30:29).

JERASH (Jēr' āsh) Modern Arabic name of Gerasa. See Gerasa.

JERBOA (Jēr' bō ā) Any of several species of leaping rodents having long hind legs and long tails of the family Dipodidae. The REB includes the jerboa among the unclean animals of Lev. 11:29.

Sunset at Jerash (ancient Gerasa).

JERED (Jēr' ɛd) Alternate spelling used by English translations for Jared. See Jared.

JEREMAI (Jēr' ə mī) Personal name, abbreviated form of Jeremoth or Jeremiah. Israelite condemned for foreign wife which Ezra said would lead Israel to worship foreign gods (Ezra 10:33).

JEREMIAH (Jēr ə mī' ah) Personal name that may mean “may Yahweh lift up,” “throw,” or “establish.” 1. Head of a clan of the tribe of Manasseh in East Jordan (1 Chron. 5:24). 2. Three soldiers of David's army at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4,10,13). 3. Father-in-law of King Josiah of Judah (640-609 B.C.) and grandfather of the Kings Jehoahaz (609 B.C.) (2 Kings 23:31) and Zedekiah (597-586 B.C.) (2 Kings 24:18; Jer. 52:1). 4. Representative of the sect of the Rechabites (Jer. 35:3). 5. Three priests or heads of priestly families in the times of Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Neh. 12:1,12) and Nehemiah about 455 B.C. (Neh. 10:2; 12:34).

Other persons by the name of Jeremiah are referred to in Hebrew inscriptions from Lachish and Arad about 700 B.C. and in a number of ancient Jewish seals. The Bible has a short form of the name 17 times and a long form 121 times. Both forms are applied to the prophet. Inscriptions use the longer form.

JEREMIAH, THE PROPHET The Bible tells us more about personal experiences of Jeremiah than of any other prophet. We read that his father's name was Hilkiah, a priest from Anathoth (Jer. 1:1). He was called to be a prophet in the 13th year of King Josiah (627/6 B.C.) (Jer. 1:2). He was active under the Kings Jehoahaz/ Shallum (609 B.C.) (22:11), Jehoiakim (609-597 B.c.) (Jer. 1:3; 22:18; 26:1; 35:1; 36:1,9), Jehoiachin/Jeconiah/Coniah (597 B.C.) (22:24; 24:1; 27:20; 28:4; 29:2; 37:1), and Zedekiah (597-586 B.c.) (1:3; 21:1; 27:1-12; 28:1; 32:1; 34:2; 37-38; 39:4; 52:8). When Jerusalem was destroyed by the Babylonians in 587 B.C., Jeremiah moved to Mizpah, the capital of Gedaliah, the newly appointed Jewish governor of the Babylonian province of Judah (40:5). When Gedaliah was assassinated (41:1-2), Jeremiah was deported to Egypt against his will by Jewish officers who had survived the catastrophes (42:1-43:7). In Egypt he continued to preach oracles against the Egyptians (43:8-13) and against his compatriots (44:1-30).

Jeremiah is depicted as living in constant friction with the authorities of his people, religious (priests, 20:1-6; prophets, 28:1; or both 26:8), political (kings, chaps. 21-22; 36-38), or all of them together (1:18-19; 2:26; 8:1), including Jewish leaders after the Babylonian invasion (42:1-43:13). Still his preaching emphasized a high respect for prophets whose warning words could have saved the people if they had listened (7:25; 26:4; 29:17-19; 35:13). He trusted in the promise of ideal future kings (23:5; 33:14-17). He recommended national surrender to the rule of the Babylonian Empire and called Nebuchadnezzar, Babylon's emperor and Judah's most hated enemy, the "servant of the Lord" (25:9; 27:6). He even incited his compatriots to desert to the enemy (21:8-9). He was accused of treason and convicted (37:12-13; 38:1-6), and yet the most aggressive oracles against Babylon are attributed to him (50-51). Enemies challenged his prophetic honesty and the inspiration of his message (43:1-3; 29:24), and yet kings and nobles sought his advice (21:1-2; 37:3; 38:14; 42:1-2).

He constantly proclaimed God's judgment upon Judah and Jerusalem, and yet he was also a prophet of hope, proclaiming oracles of salvation, conditioned (3:22-4:2) or unconditioned (30-31; 32:36-38; 33:6; 34:4). God forbade him to intercede for his people (7:16; 11:14; 14:11; cp. 15:1); yet he interceded (14:7-9,19-22). God ordered him to live without marriage and family (16:2). He had to stay away from the company of merrymakers (15:17) and from houses of feasting (16:8). He complained to and argued with God (12:1-17), complaining about the misery of his office (20:7-18). At the same time he sang hymns of praise to his God (20:13).

Although Jeremiah's call came in the 13th year of King Josiah, Josiah remains the only Jewish king contemporary with Jeremiah to and about whom no word is spoken in the whole book (but cp. 25:3). No concrete reference appears to any of the dramatic changes of national liberation and religious reformation within the last 18 years of Josiah's reign (2 Kings 22:1-23:30). The words of the call narrative: "Before I formed you in the womb I knew you, . . . I have appointed you a prophet to the nations" (Jer. 1:5 NASB), have caused some to think that the date of Jeremiah's call and birth is one and the same. However, this is not likely the case.

JEREMIAH, BOOK OF The second longest book of the Bible, next to the Psalms, is the only one of the OT that tells us some details of its origin. According to Jer. 36:1-26, Baruch had written a first version at the dictation of Jeremiah. The scroll was read first in public and then again for the state officials and for the king. King Jehoiakim burnt it piece by piece. Jeremiah therefore dictated a second and enlarged edition of the first book to Baruch (Jer. 36:32). Additional references to Jeremiah's own writing activity (Jer. 30:2; 51:60; cp. 25:13) suggest that the scroll of Jer. 36:32 is not identical to the present form of the biblical book. Third person references to Jeremiah after chap. 25 suggest that perhaps the scroll of 36:32 may be confined to chaps. 1-25.

Structure and Content Biblical scholars have struggled to explain the arrangement of Jeremiah's prophecies. The complex nature of the structure is complicated by evidence from the earliest Greek translation. There the oracles against foreign nations are in a different order and appear immediately after 25:13 rather than at 46:1. This and other evidence suggest a complicated process of collection of the Jeremiah materials into a book. Traditional scholarly theories have tried to attribute poetic oracles to Jeremiah, stories about the prophet to Baruch, and prose sermons to a later editor who used the book of Jeremiah to exemplify and teach the theology of the book of Deuteronomy. Such theories are much too imaginative and must be discarded. Aside from the stories of the scroll's destruction, expansion, and recopying (chap. 36), we do not know the process through which the book of Jeremiah was produced, but the view that the overall product came from the Prophet Jeremiah's mature reflection makes the most sense of the text.

The book is not arranged chronologically as a whole, although some chronological arrangement is apparent. No theory has achieved a consensus, but various devices (such as theme, style, audience, and rhetoric) are summoned to explain certain connections. The book is often considered an anthology of prophetic units that were collected and combined at various times with little intentionality.

A useful proposal recently made by Richard Patterson is that the prophecies were arranged according to the prophet's divine call to be a prophet to the nations (1:4-19) and to Judah in particular (1:13-19). He identifies a twofold structure to the book that reverses those emphases: chaps. 2-24 focus on Jeremiah and his people, and chaps. 25-51 focus on Jeremiah and the nations. On either end are the description of the prophetic call and commission in chap. 1 and the historical appendix in chap. 52. The two main sections each begin with a subsection that sets forth the theme (2:1-3:5 and 25:1-38), followed by a subsection that develops the theme (3:6-23:40 and 26:1-51:58), and concluding with a sign (24:1-10 and 51:59-64).

The so-called confessions of Jeremiah (11:18-23; 12:1-4; 15:10-21; 17:14-18; 18:19-23; 20:7-18) are scattered through chapters 11-20. Oracles of hope (chaps. 30-31) interrupt the stories about Jeremiah (chaps. 26-45). Words against kings (21:11-22:30) and against prophets (23:9-40) appear to be independent collections.

Text of the Book The earliest Greek version of Jeremiah, dating back to pre-Christian centuries, is more than 12.5 percent shorter than the Hebrew text (although it adds about a hundred verses not found in the Hebrew). Only a few longer sections are missing (33:14-26; 39:4-13). The Greek text rather uses less titles and epithets, and single words and verses are missing throughout the book. More than 2,700 words of the Hebrew text do not have Greek equivalents. Fragments of Hebrew manuscripts from Qumran show that a longer and a shorter Hebrew text existed side by side in the time of Jesus.

The Message Theologically, the book of Jeremiah stimulates the search for the will of God in moments when all the institutions and religious representatives normally in charge of administering His will are discredited. Neither the Davidic monarchy (Jer. 21:1-22:30), nor prophets and priests (Jer. 23:9-40), nor the cultic institutions of the temple (Jer. 7:1-34; 26:1-9) could help the people to prevent impending calamities. Neither could they detect that inconspicuous apostasy that mixes up the little aims of personal egoism (Jer. 2:29-37; 7:21-26; 28:1-17) with God's commission (Jer. 4:3). God's justice and righteousness cannot be usurped by His people. He can be a stumbling block even for His prophet (Jer. 12:1-6; 20:7-12). Execution of judgment and destruction is not God's delight. God Himself suffers pain because of the alienation between Himself and His people (2:1-37). Better than the prophet was able to admit, the apostate members of God's people remembered a correct notion of the nature of God. He continued to be their Father, and His anger would not last forever (3:4,12-13). Conversion is possible (3:14,22; 4:1-2), but this is no consolation for the apostate generation. Contrary to the expectations of the religious and political authorities, Judah and Jerusalem would meet the cruel catastrophe. This was not God's last word. His faithfulness prevails and creates new hope where all hope is lost (chaps. 30-33).

JEREMIAS (Jēr ə mī' əs) KJV transliteration of Greek for Jeremiah (Matt. 16:14). See Jeremiah, the Prophet

JEREMOTH (Jēr ə mōth) Personal name meaning “swellings.” 1. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:14), perhaps to be identified with Jeroham (8:27). 2. Two Israelites with foreign wives condemned by Ezra (Ezra 10:26-27). 3. Name written in Hebrew text of Israelite with foreign wife under Ezra (Ezra 10:29). Early Hebrew scribes and earliest translators read “and Ramoth.” 4. Descendant of Benjamin and leader in that tribe (1 Chron. 7:8). 5. Priest in days of David and Solomon (1 Chron. 23:23; spelled Jerimoth in 24:30). 6. Temple musician (1 Chron. 25:4, Jerimoth), possibly the same person as head of fifteenth division of priests (25:22). See Jerimoth.

JEREMY (Jēr ě mī) KJV transliteration for Greek spelling of Jeremiah, the prophet (Matt. 2:17; 27:9). See Jeremiah, the Prophet.

JERIAH (Jə rī' əh) Personal name meaning “Yahweh saw.” Priest under David and Solomon (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23).

JERIBAI (Jēr' ī bā ī) Personal name meaning “he defended my case.” Military leader under David (1 Chron. 11:46).

JERICHO (Jēr' ī kō) Place-name meaning “moon.” Apparently the oldest city in the world and the first city Israel conquered under Joshua. Jericho is situated in the lower Jordan Valley, which, according to Gen. 13:10, “was wellwatered everywhere...like the LORD'S garden” (HCSB). The OT town lies beneath Tell es-Sultan near one of Palestine's strongest springs.

New Testament Jericho, founded by Herod the Great, was about one and one-half miles southward in the magnificent Wadi Qelt. The spring, Ain es-Sultan, issues some 30,000 cubic feet of water daily which falls about 160 feet in the first mile of its course down many channels to the Jordan River six miles away, irrigating about 2,500 acres.

The combination of rich alluvial soil, the perennial spring, and constant sunshine made Jericho an attractive place for settlement. Jericho could be called “city of palms” (Deut. 34:3; Judg. 1:16; 3:13; 2 Chron. 28:15) and has plenty of palm trees today. Only about 6.4 inches of rain fall there per year (mostly between November and February), and the average temperature in January is 59°F, while it is 88°F in August. Jericho is about 740 feet below sea level (accounting for its warm climate) but well above the Dead Sea, eight miles southward, which at 1,300 feet below sea level marks the earth's lowest point.

Jericho was an oasis situated in a hot plain, living in its own world with no major settlement in sight and lying between the two focal points of Jerusalem and Amman in the mountains to the west and east. It is mentioned in the Bible usually in association with some movement from one side of the Jordan to another—the Israelite invasion when Ehud takes tribute to the Moabite king, when David sends envoys to the king of Ammon, when Elijah and Elisha cross the Jordan, or when Zedekiah attempts to escape the Babylonians.

In NT times Jericho was famous for its balm (an aromatic gum known for its medicinal qualities). This, along with its being the winter capital, made it a wealthy city. When Jesus was hosted by Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1-10), it was probably in one of Jericho's finest houses. Its sycamore trees were quite valuable. Such a city could expect to have its share of beggars, as the Gospels tell us (Matt. 20:29-34; Mark 10:46-52; Luke 18:35-43).

The archaeology of Jericho is closely associated with the names of John Garstang (1876-1956), who excavated there from 1930 to 1936, and especially Kathleen Kenyon, an Oxford University scholar who excavated there between 1952 and 1959. The earliest recognizable building on the site dates apparently (based on radiocarbon dating) from about 9250 B.C., a time marking the change from the Paleolithic to the Mesolithic period in Palestine. By 8000 B.C. a walled town (the world's earliest) of about 10 acres had been built. About 6000 B.C. pottery appeared in Jericho. About 4000 B.C. a period of abandonment began, but by 3300 B.C. Jericho was coming into her own again into what Kenyon calls the “Proto-Urban” age.

Jericho came to have solid defense ramparts and walls. From about 2200 to 2000 B.C. the mound of Jericho was a campsite rather than a town, when some 346 excavated tombs show its occupants to be from various tribal units.

John Garstang's original excavation determined that Jericho was destroyed by fire around 1400 B.C. (corresponding to the biblical dating of the conquest). However, Kenyon's findings disagreed with Garstang, and she dated the destruction and city wall to a much earlier time. More recently archaeologist Bryant Wood's survey of both Garstang and Kenyon's work revealed that Kenyon was mistaken and Garstang's analysis of the lower city had been correct. While denying that the evidence affirms the biblical account, Lorenzo Nigro and Nicolo Marchetti's recent excavations at Jericho have found the stone revetment wall at the base of the tell, with part of the mud-brick wall built on top of it, still intact as well as evidence of collapsed walls. Again, this evidence affirms the biblical account. However, even today, Kenyon's view has held sway. While critical scholars underline the conflict between archaeological data and the biblical conquest narrative in reality there is no conflict here. See Archaeology; Conquest of Canaan; Joshua. JERIEL (Jēr'ī ēl) Personal name meaning “God sees.” Member of tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2).

JERIJAH (Jē rī' jah) Personal name meaning “Yah sees,” a short form of Jeriah. Military hero of the Hebronite clan (1 Chron. 26:31), possibly identical with Jeriah. See Jeriah.

JERIMOTH (Jēr'ī mōth) Personal name, possibly meaning “fat belly.” The name closely resembles Jeremoth, so that English translations are not consistent in following the Hebrew in spelling. The following represent spellings of the Hebrew text. See Jeremoth. 1. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7). 2. Warrior of Saul's tribe Benjamin who joined David as he fled from Saul at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5). 3. Levite of the house of Mushi (1 Chron. 24:30; cp. 23:23). 4. Temple musician under David and Solomon (1 Chron. 25:4; cp. v. 22). 5. Leader of tribe of Naphtali under David (1 Chron. 27:19). 6. Son of David, whose daughter married King Rehoboam (931-913 B.C.), according to 2 Chron. 11:18. Jerimoth does not appear in any other list of David's sons. 7. An overseer of temple treasury under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:13).

JERIOTH (Jēr'ī ōth) Personal name meaning “fearsome.” Person related to Caleb, but the grammatical construction of Hebrew makes understanding of exact relationship difficult (1 Chron. 2:18): a second wife (KJV, NIV, NASB, NRSV); daughter (REB, TEV with many commentators).

JEROBOAM (Jēr o bō' ām) Personal name possibly meaning "he who contends for justice for the people" or "may the people multiply." 1. First king of the Northern Kingdom Israel about 926-909 B.C. Jeroboam had an interesting rise to power. He managed the laborers Solomon had conscripted for his huge building projects (1 Kings 11:28). During Solomon's reign Ahijah, a prophet from Shiloh, confronted Jeroboam, tore his own coat into 12 pieces, and gave 10 of them to Jeroboam (1 Kings 11:29-39). Ahijah interpreted this as God's pledge that Jeroboam would become king over 10 of the 12 tribes. Upon Solomon's death Jeroboam learned that the tribes would assemble at Shechem to make Solomon's son Rehoboam their king. Seizing upon the people's resentment toward Solomon's high-handed policies, Jeroboam led the 10 tribes to revolt against the house of David. They then crowned Jeroboam king.

The inspired biblical writers did not consider Jeroboam a good king. Rather he became the example of evil kings in Israel because he built temples in Dan and Bethel with golden calves representing God's presence. What appeared to be good politics diverted people from worshipping at Jerusalem, God's chosen place. All the following northern kings suffered the biblical writers' condemnation because they walked in the ways of Jeroboam, encouraging worship at Dan and Bethel (1 Kings 15:25-26,33-34; 16:18-19,30-31). Jeroboam also instituted new worship practices at his temples (1 Kings 12:25-33), intentionally making Israelite worship different from that in Jerusalem, though claiming to worship the same God with the same worship traditions. Prophetic warnings failed to move Jeroboam (1 Kings 13:1-14:20).

2. Powerful king of Israel in the dynasty of Jehu about 793-753 B.C. (2 Kings 14:23-29). He managed to restore prosperity and territory to a weak nation but continued the religious practices of Jeroboam I and thus met condemnation from the biblical writers. Jonah, Amos, and Hosea prophesied during his reign. Jeroboam basically restored the boundaries of David's empire, reaching even into Syria.

JEROHAM (Jə rō' hām) Personal name meaning “he found mercy.” 1. Father of Elkanah and grandfather of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1; cp. 1 Chron. 6:27,34). 2. Priest after the exile (Neh. 11:12). 3. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:27, if proper reading is not Jeremoth as in v. 14; See Jeremoth). 4. Father of one of first men to return to Jerusalem after Babylonian exile (1 Chron. 9:8). 5. Priest whose son was one of first to return to Jerusalem from Babylonian exile (1 Chron. 9:12). 6. Father of two of David's military leaders from Saul's tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 12:7). 7. Father of leader of tribe of Dan under David (1 Chron. 27:22). 8. Father of captain who helped Jehoiada, the high priest, overthrow Queen Athaliah and install Joash as king about 835 B.C. (2 Chron. 23:1).

JERUBBAAL (Jēr ūb bā' āl) Personal name meaning “Baal judges.” Another name for Gideon (Judg. 6:32). See Gideon.

JERUBBESHETH (Jə rüb' bə shèth) Personal name meaning “may shame judge” or “shame increases.” A deliberate scribal corruption of the name Jerubbaal (2 Sam. 11:21), replacing the name of the Canaanite deity Baal with a form of the Hebrew word for “shame.”

JERUEL (Jə rü' ēl) Place-name meaning “foundation of God.” Place where Jahaziel, the prophet, predicted King Jehoshaphat and his army would find the Ammonite and Moabite army. The exact location is not known. It was on the rugged descent southeast of Tekoa going to En-Gedi.

JERUSALEM [Jə rü' sá ləm] Jerusalem is a city set high on a plateau in the hills of Judah, considered sacred by Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. Its biblical-theological significance lies in its status as Yahweh's chosen center of His divine kingship and of the human kingship of David and his sons, Yahweh's vice-regents. Besides the name “Jerusalem,” the city is also called “the City of David” and “Zion” (originally referring to a part of the city, the “stronghold of Zion” that David captured from the Jebusites; see 2 Sam. 5:6-10).

In the Pentateuch, the city of Jerusalem is not directly mentioned. Moriah (Gen. 22:2; associated with the site of Solomon's temple in 2 Chron.

3:1) and Salem (Gen. 14:18; associated with Zion in Ps. 76:2) apparently refer to the same site and establish a link between the city and the patriarch Abraham. The city (known earlier as Jebus; see Judg. 19:10-11) was captured in Joshua's time (Judg. 1:8), but the Jebusites were not driven out (Josh. 15:63; Judg. 1:21). After David captured it and made it Israel's capital (2 Sam. 5:6-10, 1 Chron. 11:4-9), David brought the ark of the covenant into Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:17) and made it the seat not only of his own but also of God's monarchy (cp. 1 Kings 11:36; 14:21; and Ps. 132; which emphasize that it is Yahweh's own chosen/desired habitation). Jerusalem came to be "the city of our God," "the city of the great King," "the city of Yahweh of hosts" (Ps. 48). Under Solomon, the temple was constructed (2 Chron. 3-7) and the nation reached its political and economic zenith with Jerusalem at the center (2 Chron. 9).

In the Prophets, besides literal references to the city, "Jerusalem" appears as a corporate representative of the entire community in speeches of judgment and of future salvation. The theological centrality of Jerusalem and events such as God's historical deliverance of the city from the hands of Sennacherib (2 Kings 19) led the people to a mistaken belief in the city's invincibility. This view is denounced by prophets such as Jeremiah (Jer. 7:1-15) and Micah (Mic. 3:11-12) as it abetted the people's apostasy from Yahweh. Since the people had abandoned Yahweh, Yahweh eventually abandoned His chosen city to the Babylonians in 586 B.C. (2 Kings 23:26-27).

Model of first-century Jerusalem shows the three towers built by Herod to protect his palace.

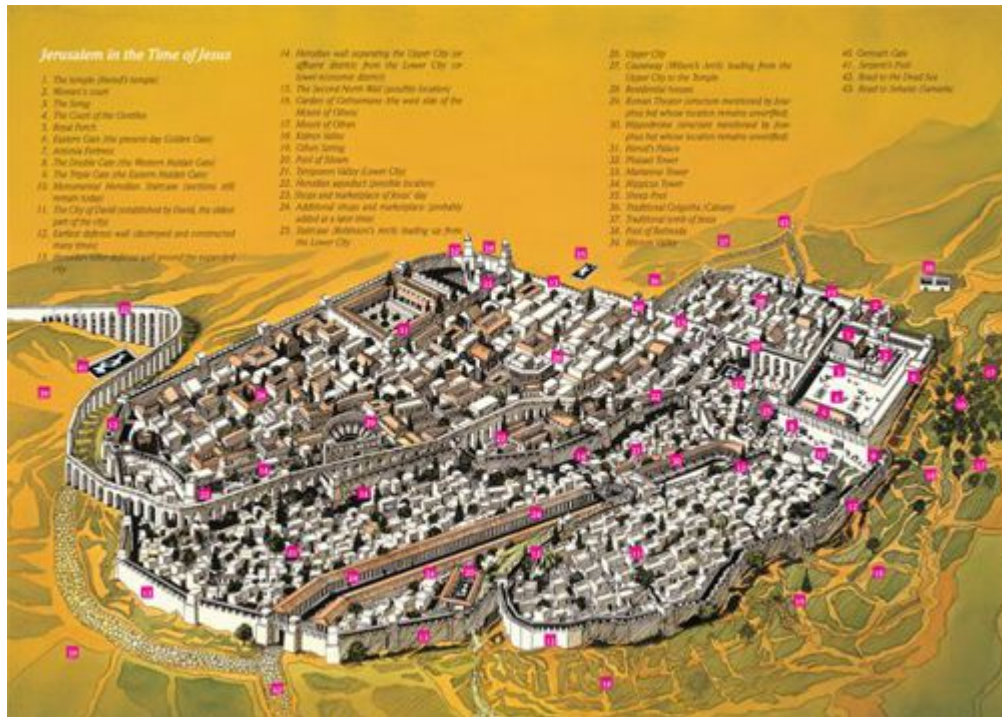

Yet judgment was not Yahweh's final word. The Persian king Cyrus (decree in 538 B.C.) was Yahweh's servant in facilitating the return of many exiles and the rebuilding of the city and the temple (Isa. 44:26-28; 45:13; Ezra 6; Neh. 1-6). Moreover, the future salvation of Jerusalem would exceed the temporal restoration of the postexilic community. All peoples would come to it (Isa. 2:2-4; Jer. 3:17). God's new work for Jerusalem would usher in nothing less than a new age (Isa. 65:18-25; Zech. 14:8-21).

A tomb, possibly dating from as early as the first century A.D., in the city of Jerusalem.

The NT portrays the various Jerusalem related prophecies as fulfilled in and through Jesus, Israel's Messiah. In the Gospels, Jerusalem takes on ironic, contrasting roles. On one hand, it is “the city of the great King” (Matt. 5:35) and “the holy city” (Matt. 4:5; 27:53). On the other hand, it is the city “who kills the prophets and stones those who are sent to her” (Luke 13:34 HCSB). While there were those who longed for “the redemption of Jerusalem” (Luke 2:38), the city and its inhabitants will face awful judgment because they did not recognize the time of divine visitation by Jesus (Luke 19:41-44). Indeed Jesus' mission ended in His rejection by Jerusalem's rulers and His death outside the city walls (Mark 8:31; 10:32-34; chaps. 14-15).

David and his men may have captured Jerusalem through Warren's Shaft that runs from the Gihon Spring up to the old city of Jerusalem.

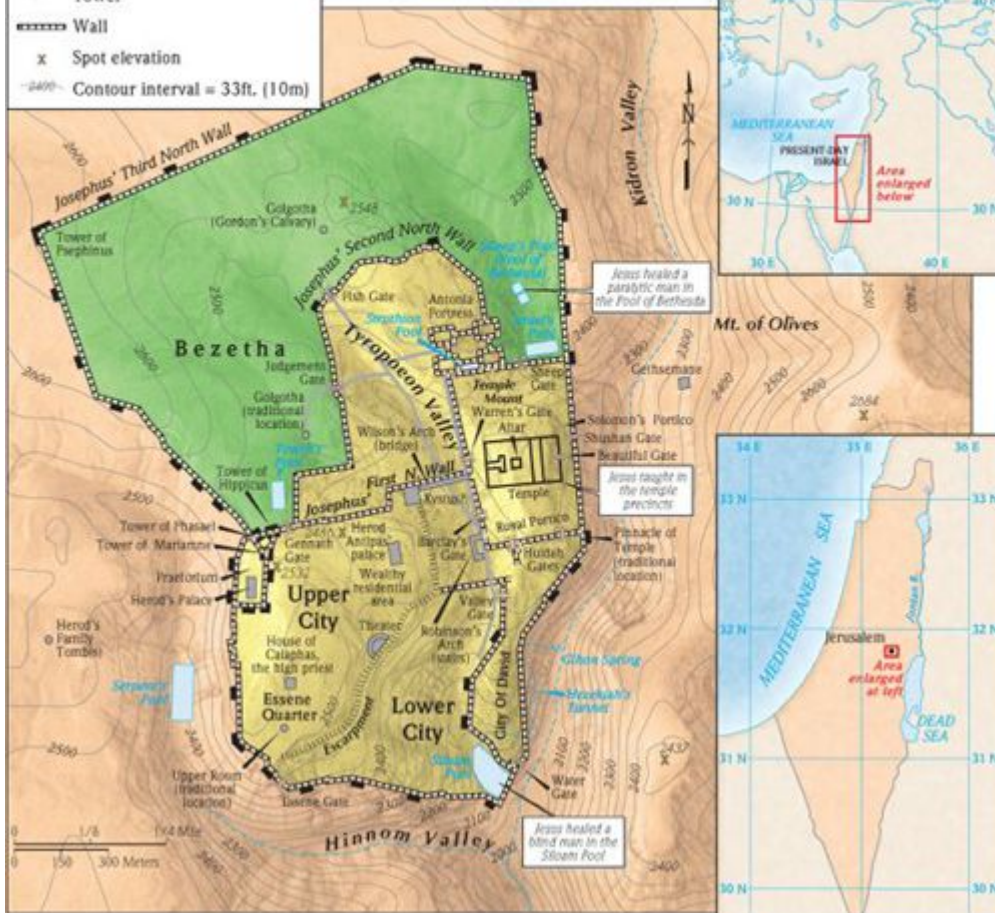

The Wailing Wall, revered by Jews for centuries as the only remaining wall of the ancient temple area.

While repentance for the forgiveness of sins is to be preached to all the nations “beginning at Jerusalem” (Luke 24:47), in the aftermath of Jesus' death and resurrection, biblical hope is centered on “the heavenly Jerusalem” (Heb. 12:22; cp. 11:10,16; 13:13-14). The true worshipers need not “worship the Father in Jerusalem...but...worship the Father in spirit and truth” (John 4:21,23 HCSB). The “Jerusalem above” (the mother of the free, who are children of the promise) stands in contrast to “the present Jerusalem,” which is the mother of unbelieving slaves (Gal. 4:25-26). The city where the Lord Jesus was crucified was called “prophetically, Sodom and Egypt” (Rev. 11:8), but the “new Jerusalem” will come down from heaven with the coming of the new heaven and new earth (Rev. 3:12; 21:1-2).

The promises of Yahweh's reign (“the kingdom of God”) and of the salvation of His people, both Jews and Gentiles, find their fulfillment in Jesus' death and resurrection and in the dawning of the new heaven and new earth. Biblical hope is now focused on “the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem” (Heb. 12:22).

JERUSALEM COUNCIL See Apostolic Council.

JERUSHA (Jə rū' shá) Personal name meaning “one taken in possession.” Mother of Jotham, king of Judah (2 Kings 15:33). She was the daughter of Zadok, possibly of the priestly line. In 2 Chron. 27:1 her name appears in the form Jerushah. The name of her father suggests that she may have been from a Levitical family.

JERUSAH (Jə rū' shá) Form of Jerusha in 2 Chron. 27:1, a variant spelling with different final “silent” consonant in Hebrew. See Jerusha.

JESAJAH (Jə si' ah) Variant form of Isaiah meaning “Yah has saved.” Descendant of David in postexilic period (1 Chron. 3:21) and thus part of keeping messianic hope alive in Israel.

JESARELAH (Jēs á rē' lah) NIV, NRSV spelling of Jesharelah (1 Chron. 25:14), a variant spelling of Asharelah (25:2). See Asharelah; Jesharelah.

JESHAIAH (Jə shi' ah) Variant English transliteration of Hebrew name Isaiah meaning “Yahweh delivered.” 1. Priest who used music to prophesy under David (1 Chron. 25:3). Apparently, they proclaimed God's will to the worshiping congregation. Leader of eighth course or division of priests (25:15). 2. Member of family of Levites with responsibility for treasury of God's house under David (1 Chron. 26:25).

JESHANAH (Jə shá' nah) Place-name meaning “old city.” City that King Abijah of Judah captured from Jeroboam of Israel about 910 B.C. (2 Chron. 13:19). It was located at modern Burj el-Isane four miles south of Shiloh and eight miles northeast of Mizpah. Some interpreters follow early translations and read Jeshanah in 1 Sam. 7:12.

JESHARELAH (Jēsh á rē' lah) KJV, NASB, RSV transliteration of Hebrew name of leader of seventh division of Levites (1 Chron. 25:14). The Hebrew is more precisely transliterated Jesarelah and represents a variant Hebrew spelling or textual change from Asarelah (1 Chron. 25:2). Jesarelah in Hebrew is spelled like Israel with an additional final letter. See Asarelah; Jesarelah.

JESHEBEAB (Jə shē' bə āb) Personal name meaning “the father remains alive” or “He brings the father back.” Head of 14th division of priests (1 Chron. 24:13).

JESHER (Jē' shēr) Personal name meaning “he sets right, establishes justice.” Son of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:18).

JESHIMON (Jə shi' mōn) Place-name meaning “desert” or “wilderness.” 1. Wilderness site near where David hid from Saul. It apparently belonged to the Ziphites, who reported David's location to Saul (1 Sam. 23:19; 26:1). It lay somewhere between Hebron and the Dead Sea. 2. Wilderness site east of the Jordan near Pisgah and Peor used to mark the places Israel passed under Moses on the way to conquer the promised land (Num. 21:20; 23:28). It may be another way to refer to the lower Jordan Valley. 3. The Hebrew word also appears as a common noun meaning “desert” (Deut. 32:10; Pss. 68:7; 78:40; 106:14; 107:4; Isa. 43:19-20). Some interpreters take all occurrences of the word as the common noun. See Beth-jeshimoth.

JESHISHAI (Jə shīsh' ī) Personal name meaning “advanced in years.” Member of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:14).

JESHOAIAH (Jē shō hī' ah) Personal name of unknown meaning. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:36).

JESHUA (Jē shū' ā) or JESHUAH Personal name spelled in Hebrew the same as Joshua and meaning “Yahweh is salvation.” 1. Leader of the ninth course of priests under David (1 Chron. 24:11, sometimes transliterated as Jeshuah). 2. Priest under Hezekiah (715-686 B.C.) who helped distribute food collected in tithes and offerings to the priests living in the Levitical cities outside Jerusalem (2 Chron. 31:15). 3. High priest taken into the exile by King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon in 586 B.C. He returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:2). Descendants of his family or of 1. (above) also returned (Ezra 2:36; cp. 2:40). He led in rebuilding the altar and restoring sacrifice in Jerusalem (Ezra 3:2-6). They also began building the temple but quit when strong opposition arose and appealed to King Artaxerxes (Ezra 3:8-4:24). Later correspondence led King Darius to recover Cyrus' proclamation authorizing the rebuilding of the temple. This came after Jeshua followed the prophetic preaching of Zechariah and Haggai and renewed efforts to rebuild the temple (Ezra 5:2-6:15; Hag. 1:1,12-14; 2:4), finally finishing in 515 B.C. Still, some of his sons married foreign women and had to follow Ezra's teaching and divorce them (Ezra 10:18-19). Zechariah had a vision featuring Jeshua in which God announced the full cleansing of the high priest, preparing him to lead in the atonement rites for the people and pointing to the day when Messiah would come and provide complete and eternal atonement for God's people (Zech. 3). Jeshua was apparently one of the two anointed ones of Zechariah's vision (4:14; cp. 6:11-13). 4. Clan related to the Pahath-moab or governor of Moab, some of whose members returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:6). 5. Father of Exer, the Jewish governor of the district of Mizpah under Persian rule (Neh. 3:19). 6. Levite who signed Nehemiah's covenant to obey God's law (Neh. 10:9). 7. Clan of Levites in the postexilic community, probably having some connection with the clan of 1.8. Name for conquest hero Joshua, son of Nun (Neh. 8:17). See Joshua. 9. Village in Judah where some Jews lived after returning from exile (Neh. 11:26). It may be modern Tell es-Sawi, northeast of Beersheba.

JESHURUN (Jə shū' rŭn) Proper name meaning "upright" or "straight." Poetic name for Israel (Deut. 32:15; 33:5,26; Isa. 44:2). It may represent a play on Jacob, the original Israel, known for deception. Jeshurun would show Israel had quit deceiving and become upright or straight in actions.

JESIAH (Jə sī' ah) Personal name meaning "Yahweh forgets." Member of Saul's tribe of Benjamin who joined David at Ziklag as David fled before Saul (1 Chron. 12:6). Modern translations read "Isshiah." A shortened form in Hebrew appears at 1 Chron. 23:20, a Levite; 7:3, leader in tribe of Issachar; 24:21, a Levite; 24:25, another Levite; Ezra 10:31, a man with a foreign wife. See Ishiah; Isshiah; Ishijah.

JESIMIEL (Jə sīm' i ēl) Personal name meaning "Yahweh places." Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:36).

JESSE (Jēs' sē) Personal name meaning "man" or "manly." Father of David the king (1 Sam. 16:1). He was a Judahite who lived in Bethlehem, the son of Obed and the grandson of Boaz and Ruth (1 Sam. 16:1; Ruth 4:17). He had eight sons, of whom David was the youngest, and two daughters. He is mentioned in the genealogies of Jesus in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. See David.

JEST Act intended to provoke laughter; an utterance intended as mockery or humor. Thinking Lot was jesting about Sodom's imminent destruction, his sons-in-law remained in the city (Gen. 19:14). The jesters of Ps. 35:16 (NASB) are mockers. Isaiah 57:4 describes idolatry as making God the object of a jest (KJV “sport”). Ephesians 5:4 characterizes jesting or mocking speech as part of a pagan life-style.

JESUI (Jēs' ū ī) KJV spelling of descendant of Asher (Num. 26:44), the same as Isui in Gen. 46:17. Modern translations spell both Ishvi. A son of Saul bears the same Hebrew name (1 Sam. 14:49), transliterated into English as Ishui (KJV), Ishvi (NASB, NRSV, NIV), or Ishyo (REB). See Ishvi.

JESUITE (Jēs' ū ī) Member of clan founded by Jesui (Num. 26:44 KJV). See jesui

JESURUN (Jə sū' rŭn) (KJV, Isa. 44:2) See Jeshurun.

JESUS CHRIST The absolute fundamental to the Christian faith. The person Buddha is not essential to the teaching of Buddhism nor is the person Mohammed essential to the Islamic faith. Yet everything about Christianity rises or falls in the person of Jesus Christ. Liberal theologians have thought it possible to separate Christ from Christianity by suggesting that Jesus' teachings form the basis of the Christian faith. They want to assert that one may accept Christ's teachings without coming to a decision about Christ Himself.

To the contrary, biblical teaching affirms that a Christ-less Christianity is a contradiction of terms. This article, along with the one titled “Jesus, Life and Ministry,” seeks to summarize the biblical information on the uniqueness of Jesus. The names and titles applied to Him, His humanity, His deity, and His teaching and mighty works provide the framework for this discussion.

Names and Titles Jesus' proper name derives from the Hebrew “Joshua,” meaning “Yahweh saves” or “salvation is from Yahweh” (Matt. 1:21). Christ is the Greek term for “anointed,” equivalent to the Hebrew Messiah. This anointed Savior is also Immanuel, “God is with us” (Matt. 1:23; Isa. 7:14). Paul's favorite term for Jesus was kurios, “Lord,” and the earliest Christian confession was that “Jesus is Lord.” The sublime introduction of Jesus in the prologue to John's Gospel presents Him as the logos, the “Word” who created all things (1:3) and who became flesh and dwelt among us (1:14). He is the Life (1:4) and the Light of mankind (1:4); the Glory of God (1:14); the only begotten God who makes the Father known (1:18). The Gospels record Jesus' own self designation as Son of Man, the title He frequently used to speak of His humiliation, His identification with sinful mankind, His death on behalf of sinners, and His glorious return. While Jesus was the Son of Man in respect to His ministry and passion, He is also Son of God, the uniquely begotten one sent from God Himself (Mark 1:1; John 3:16). The book of Hebrews shows Jesus as God's great high priest (3:1; 4:14) who both makes sacrifice for His people and who is Himself the sacrifice (10:10-14). Hebrews also presents Jesus as the creator of all things (1:2), the perfect representation of God (1:3), and the apostle of our confession (3:1). The metaphors used of Jesus, particularly in John's Gospel, speak poignantly to the indispensable need for a person to know Jesus. He is the water of life (John 4:14), the bread of life (6:41), the light (8:12), the door (10:7), the way, the truth, and the life (14:6).

Humanity Jesus was fully human. He was not partially human nor did He function at times as a human and at times as God nor did He merely appear to be human. He was at once both man and God. The Baptist Faith and Message emphasizes this truth when it says, "Christ took upon Himself the demands and necessities of human nature, identifying Himself completely with mankind" (Art. II, B). The evidence for Jesus' humanity in Scripture is abundant. He displayed physical symptoms that all humans experience: fatigue (John 4:6), sleep (Matt. 8:24), hunger (Matt. 21:18), and suffering (Luke 22:43-44). Jesus also experienced the emotional reactions of mankind: compassion (Luke 7:13), weeping (Luke 19:41), anger and indignation (Mark 3:5), grief (Matt. 26:37), and joy (John 15:11). These physical and emotional traits, along with others mentioned in the Gospels, demonstrate that the NT everywhere assumes Jesus' real and full humanity. Yet Jesus was not just a real man; He was also a unique person. Though really human, Jesus differed from all other people in two ways. First, He was born to a virgin; He had no human father. He was conceived by the Holy Spirit in Mary's womb (Matt. 1:18-25). Second, unlike any other person, Jesus was without sin. He claimed to be sinless (John 8:46) and there is never a record of His confessing sin, though He told us to confess ours (Matt. 6:12). Other biblical writers ascribe sinlessness to Jesus. Paul said that Jesus became sin for us but that He personally knew no sin (2 Cor. 5:21). The writer of Hebrews says that Jesus never sinned (Heb. 4:15) and Peter affirmed that Jesus the righteous died for the unrighteous (1 Pet. 3:18).

Deity Throughout the centuries few people have denied the existence of the man Jesus. A fierce battle has always raged, however, concerning the supernatural nature of Jesus. If Jesus was virgin born and sinless, as noted above, then a supernatural element is already introduced into His nature that sets Him apart from all other people. Further, His resurrection denotes that this is a person who transcends time and space. The Gospel accounts record many eyewitnesses to the resurrected Christ (Matt. 28:1-10; Luke 24:13-35; John 20:19-31), and all attempts to refute such accounts fall short of credibility. However, the NT goes beyond these implicit references to deity and clearly states that Christ is divine. The demands of unabashed loyalty from His followers (Luke 9:57-62) and the claims that He will judge the world (John 5:27) sound strange if they come from a mere man. He also claimed that He could forgive sins (Mark 2:5), and He averred that in the judgment people will be condemned or approved according to their attitude toward the people who represent Him (Matt. 25:31-46). Scripture says that Jesus created (John 1:3) and now sustains all things (Col. 1:17). He even has the power to raise the dead (John 5:25). Angels and people worship Him (Heb. 1:6; Matt. 2:2). He possesses equality with the persons of the Trinity (John 14:23; 2 Cor. 13:14). Beyond these assertions, the NT provides even clearer evidence regarding the deity of Christ. He is called God in Heb. 1:8. John's prologue (1:1-18) affirms that Jesus is from the beginning, that He is "with" (literally "face to face") God, and that He is God. John's intricate Greek declares Jesus to be equal in nature with God the Father but distinct in person! Another important passage is John 5:16-29. During a controversy with the Jews about healing a man on the Sabbath the Jews sought to kill Him because He blasphemed in making Himself equal with God. Rather than correcting them for mistaking His identity, Jesus went on to make even further claims regarding His deity: He has power to give life to people (v. 21), all judgment is handed over to Him (v. 22), and all should honor the Son with the same honor they bestow upon the Father (v. 23). Jesus' preexistence as God is demonstrated in John 8:58 where He affirmed that He transcends time. Romans 9:5 reveals that Paul called Jesus God, and there is no doubt that in Phil. 2:5-11 Paul understood Jesus to be the One who existed eternally in the form of God and on an equal nature with God. The outstanding christological passage in Col. 1:15-23 says that Christ is the image of the invisible God; that is, He is such a reproduction or likeness of the God who is invisible to mortal man that to look at Christ was to see God. Clearly, the Christ of the NT is not a man who was deified by His disciples (the view of classic liberalism), but He is the eternal Son of God who voluntarily became a man to redeem lost humanity.

Teaching and Mighty Works Jesus was a master teacher. Crowds that claimed no loyalty to Him were forced to admit, “No man ever spoke like this” (John 7:46 HCSB). At the close of His compelling Sermon on the Mount, the multitudes were amazed at how He taught (Matt. 7:29). He taught mainly about His Father and the kingdom that He had ushered in. He explained what that kingdom is like and the absolute obedience and love His followers are to have as citizens of the kingdom. His teaching often enraged the religious leaders of His day because they did not understand that He was the promised Messiah who appeared to usher in the kingdom through His death, resurrection, and second coming. He stressed that the kingdom, though inaugurated at His first appearing, will find its consummation in His second coming (Matt. 24-25). Until then, His disciples were to conduct themselves as salt and light in a dark, sinful world (Matt. 5-7). Often He spoke in parables, helping people to understand by using common things to illustrate spiritual truths.

Jesus' mighty works validated His unique and divine nature. He backed up His claims to deity by demonstrating His power over sickness and disease, over nature, and over life and death itself. One great miracle that demonstrates conclusively His claim to deity is His resurrection from the dead. Death could not hold Him. He rose from the dead and showed Himself alive by many “convincing proofs” (Acts 1:3). Despite rigorous attempts by liberalism to expunge the miracles from the Gospels, it is impossible to eliminate these supernatural elements from Jesus' life without consequently damaging the credibility of the Gospel records about Him.

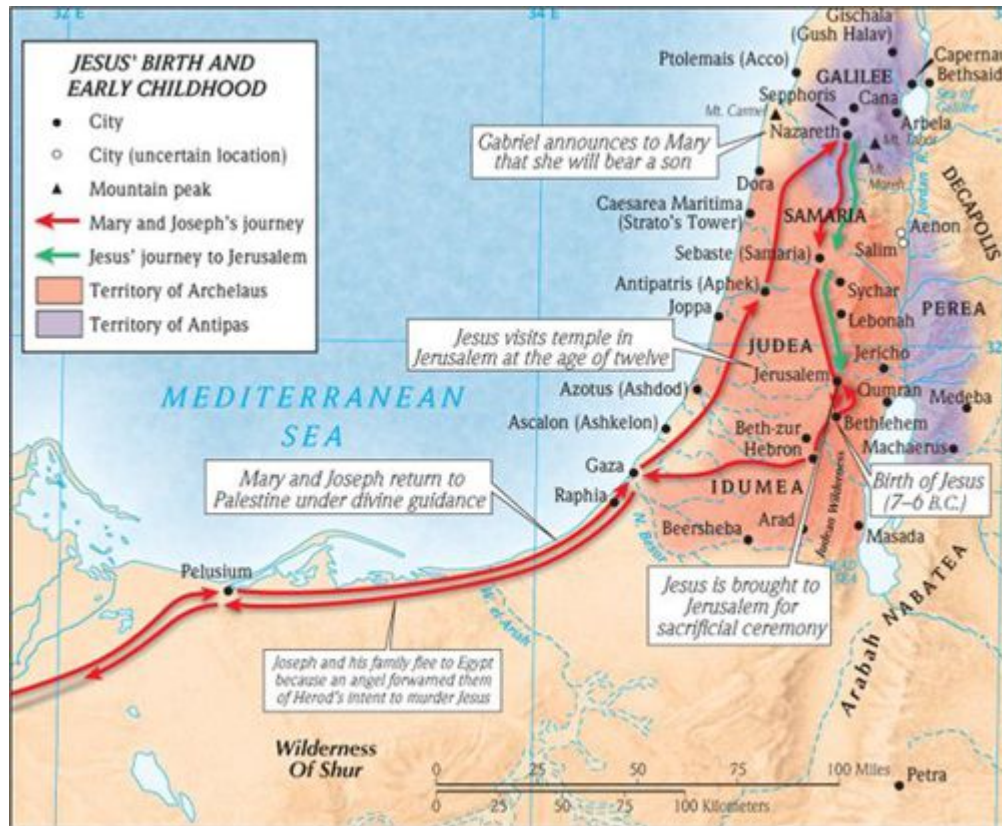

Christianity affirms that Jesus is the only way to God (John 14:6; Acts 4:12). This view seems intolerant in light of our pluralistic, relativistic age. Yet, given the evidence presented above, one must deal with Jesus Christ either as the Lord God whom He claimed to be or as an imposter who somehow was deceived as to His own identity.

JESUS, LIFE AND MINISTRY The story of Jesus begins abruptly in the Gospel of Mark when He presented Himself at the Jordan River to the desert Prophet John the Baptist as a candidate for baptism. All that is said about His origin is that He came to the river “from Nazareth” (Mark 1:9). “Jesus of Nazareth” was a designation that followed Him to the day of His death (John 19:19).

His Origins Matthew's Gospel demonstrates that although Nazareth was Jesus' home when He came to John for baptism, He was not born there. Rather, He was born (as the Jewish messiah must be) in Bethlehem, the “city of David,” as a descendant of David's royal line (Matt. 1: 1-17; 2:1-6). This child born in Bethlehem ended up as an adult in Nazareth, described sarcastically by His enemies as a “Nazarene” (literally, “Nazarite” 2:23). The play on words seems intended to poke fun simultaneously at Jesus' obscure origins and at the stark contrast (in the eyes of many) between His supposed holiness (like the Nazirites of the OT) and His practice of keeping company with sinners, prostitutes, and tax collectors (Mark 2:17). The Gospel of Luke supplies background information on John the Baptist, showing how the families of John and Jesus were related both by kinship and by circumstances (Luke 1:5-80). Luke added that Nazareth was the family home of Jesus' parents all along (Luke 1:26-27). Yet he confirmed Matthew's testimony that the family was of the line of David. Luke introduced the Roman census as the reason for their return to the ancestral city of Bethlehem just before Jesus' birth (Luke 2:1-7). More of a biographer than either Mark or Matthew, Luke provided glimpses of Jesus as an eight-day-old infant (2:21-39), a boy of 12 years (2:40-52), and a man of 30 beginning His ministry (3:21-23). Only when this brief biographical sketch was complete did Luke append His genealogy (Luke 3:23-38), which confirms in passing Jesus' Davidic ancestry (Luke 3:31; cp. 1:32-33), while emphasizing above all His solidarity with the entire human race in its descent from "Adam, son of God" (Luke 3:38 HCSB). The reflection on Jesus' baptism in the Gospel of John centers on John the Baptist's acknowledgement that Jesus "surpassed me, because He existed before me" (John 1:30; cp. v. 15). This pronouncement allowed the Gospel writer to turn the story of Jesus' origins into a theological confession by tracing Jesus' existence back to the creation of the world and before (John 1:1-5). Despite His royal ancestry and despite His heavenly preexistence as the eternal Word and Son of God, Jesus was of humble origins humanly speaking and was viewed as such by the people of His day. When He taught in Nazareth, the townspeople asked, "Isn't this the carpenter, the son of Mary, and the brother of James, Joses, Judas, and Simon? And aren't His sisters here with us?" (Mark 6:3; cp. Luke 4:22). When He taught in Capernaum, they asked, "Isn't this Jesus the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? How can He now say, 'I have come down from heaven'?" (John 6:42). Though two Gospels, Matthew and Luke, tell of His mother Mary's miraculous conception and of Jesus' virgin birth, these matters were not public knowledge during His time on earth, for "Mary was treasuring up all these things in her heart and meditating on them" (Luke 2:19; cp. v. 51).

Jesus and the God of Israel Even after the momentous events associated with Jesus' baptism in the Jordan River—the descent of God's Spirit on Him like a dove and the voice from heaven announcing “You are My beloved Son; in You I take delight!” (Mark 1:10-11 HCSB)—His identity as Son of God remained hidden from those around Him. We have no evidence that anyone except Jesus, and possibly John the Baptist, either heard the voice or saw the dove. Ironically, the first intimation after the baptism that He was more than simply “Jesus of Nazareth” came not from His family or friends or from the religious leaders of Israel, but from the devil!

Twice the devil challenged Him: “If You are the Son of God, tell this stone to become bread” (Luke 4:3), and (on the pinnacle of the temple in Jerusalem), “If You are the Son of God, throw Yourself down from here” (Luke 4:9). Jesus made no attempt to defend or make use of His divine sonship but appealed instead to an authority to which any devout Jew of His day might have appealed—the holy Scriptures—and through them to the God of Israel. Citing three passages from Deuteronomy, Jesus called attention not to Himself, but to “the Lord your God” (Luke 4:8; cp. Mark 10:18; 12:29-30). Jesus apparently used this story out of His personal experience to teach His disciples that they, too, must “live...on every word that comes from the mouth of God,” (Matt. 4:4), must “not tempt the Lord your God” (Luke 4:12), and must “worship the Lord your God, and Him alone you shall serve” (Luke 4:8).

Two things about this temptation story have a special bearing on the ministry of Jesus as a whole. First, the God-centered character of His message continued in the proclamation He began in Galilee when He returned home from the desert: “The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has come near. Repent and believe in the good news!” (Mark 1:15 HCSB; cp. Matt. 4:17). Mark called this proclamation “the good news of God” (Mark 1:14). John's Gospel presented Jesus as reminding His hearers again and again that He had come not to glorify or proclaim Himself, but solely to make known “the Father,” or “Him who sent me” (John 4:34; 5:19,30; 6:38; 7:16-18,28; 8:28,42,50; 14:10,28). Second, the issue of Jesus' own identity continued to be raised first by the powers of evil. Just as the devil challenged Jesus in the desert as “Son of God,” so in the course of His ministry the demons (or the demon-possessed) confronted Him with such words as “What do You have to do with us, Jesus—Nazarene?...I know who You are—the Holy One of God” (Mark 1:24), or “What do You have to do with me, Jesus, Son of the Most High God?” (Mark 5:7).

The mystery of Jesus' person emerged in pronouncements of this kind, but Jesus seemed not to want the question of His identity raised prematurely. He silenced the demons (Mark 1:25,34; 3:12); and when He healed the sick, He frequently told the people who were cured not to speak of it to anyone (Mark 1:43-44; 7:36a). The more He urged silence, however, the faster the word of His healing power spread (Mark 1:45; 7:36b). The crowds appear to have concluded that He must be the Messiah, the anointed King of David's line expected to come and deliver the Jews from Roman rule. If Jesus was playing out the role of Messiah, the Gospels present Him as a strangely reluctant Messiah. At one point, when the crowds tried to “take Him by force to make Him king, He withdrew again to the mountain by Himself” (John 6:15 HCSB). Seldom, if ever, did He apply to Himself the customary terms “Messiah” or “Son of God.” He had instead a way of using the emphatic “I” when it was not grammatically necessary and a habit sometimes of referring to Himself indirectly and mysteriously as “Son of Man.” In the Aramaic language Jesus spoke, “Son of man” meant simply “a certain man,” or “someone.” Though He made no explicit messianic claims and avoided the ready-made titles of honor that the Jews customarily applied to the Messiah, Jesus spoke and acted with the authority of God Himself. He gave sight to the blind and hearing to the deaf; He enabled the lame to walk. When He touched the unclean, He made them clean. He even raised the dead to life. In teaching the crowds that gathered around Him, He did not hesitate to say boldly, “You have heard that it was said...but I tell you” (Matt. 5:21-22,27-28,31-34,38-39,43-44). So radical was He toward the accepted traditions that He found it necessary to state at the outset: “Don't assume that I came to destroy the Law or the Prophets. I did not come to destroy but to fulfill” (Matt. 5:17).

Such speech and behavior inevitably raised questions about Jesus' identity. The crowds who heard Him “were astonished at His teaching. For He was teaching them like one who had authority, and not like their scribes” (Matt. 7:28-29 HCSB). Despite His reluctance (or perhaps because of it), His following in the early days of His ministry was enormous. He had to get up before daylight to find time and a place for private prayer (Mark 1:35). So pressed was He by the crowds that He taught them on one occasion while sitting in a boat offshore on the lake of Galilee (Mark 4:1). Once when a group of people desired healing for a paralyzed man, the huge mob around the house where Jesus was staying forced them to lower the man through a hole in the roof (Mark 2:4). Everyone needed what he or she knew Jesus had to give. There was no way He could meet all their needs at once.

Jesus' Mission Jesus' primary mission was to reach the lost sheep of Israel. Through their carelessness about the law, the religious leaders had become the enemies of God; but God loved His enemies. Jesus' conviction was that both He and His disciples must love them, too (Matt. 5:38-48). Jesus was challenged on one occasion for enjoying table fellowship with social outcasts (known to the religious Jews as “sinners”) in the house of Levi, the tax collector in Capernaum. He replied to criticism: “Those who are well don't need a doctor, but the sick do need one. I didn't come to call the righteous, but sinners” (Mark 2:17 HCSB). Another time, when the religious authorities murmured that “this man welcomes sinners and eats with them” (Luke 15:2), Jesus told three parables of God's inexhaustible love for those who are “lost” and of God's unbridled joy when the lost are found (the parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son; Luke 15:3-32). He claimed that God's joy at the recovery of all such sinners (tax collectors, prostitutes, shepherds, soldiers, and others despised by the pious in Israel) was greater than any joy “over 99 righteous people who don't need repentance” (Luke 15:7; cp. vv. 25-32). Such an exuberant celebration of divine mercy, whether expressed in Jesus' actions or in the stories He told, must have seemed to religious leaders both in Galilee and Jerusalem a serious lowering of ancient ethical standards and a damaging compromise of the holiness of God.

The traditional site on the Jordan River where Jesus was baptized.

We have little evidence that Jesus included non-Jews among the “sinners” to whom He was sent. Despite the reference in Luke 4:25-27 to Elijah and Elisha and their ministry to foreigners, Jesus explicitly denied that He was sent to Gentiles or Samaritans (Matt. 15:24; 10:5-6). Yet the principle, “not to the righteous, but to sinners,” made the extension of the good news of the kingdom of God to the Gentiles after Jesus' resurrection a natural one. Even during Jesus' lifetime, He responded to the initiatives of Gentiles seeking His help (Matt. 8:5-13; Luke 7:1-10; Mark 7:24-30; Matt. 15:21-28), sometimes in such a way as to put Israel to shame (Matt. 8:10). Twice He traveled through Samaria (Luke 9:51-56; John 4:4): once He stayed in a Samaritan village for two days, calling a Samaritan woman and a number of other townspeople to faith (John 4:5-42); and once He made a Samaritan the hero of one of His parables (Luke 10:29-37).

None of this was calculated to win Him friends among the priests in Jerusalem or the Pharisees throughout Israel. He described visions that many would “come from east and west, and recline at the table with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. But the sons of the kingdom will be thrown into the outer darkness” (Matt. 8:11-12 HCSB). He predicted that 12 uneducated Galileans would one day “sit on 12 thrones, judging the 12 tribes of Israel” (Matt. 19:28; cp. Luke 22:28-29).

He warned the religious leaders sternly that they were in danger of “blasphemy against the Spirit” by attributing the Spirit's ministry through Him to the power of the devil (Matt. 12:31). The whole affair was complicated by the concern of Jesus' relatives over his safety and sanity (Mark 3:21) and by His consequent affirmation of His disciples as a new family based on obedience to the will of God (Mark 3:31-35).

The so-called “Beel-zebub controversy,” triggered by his healing and saving activity, set a grim precedent for Jesus' relationship with the Jerusalem authorities and made His eventual arrest, trial, and execution almost inevitable (Mark 3:20-30). From that time Jesus began to speak in parables to make the truth about God's kingdom clear to His followers while hiding it from those blind to its beauty and deaf to its call (Mark 4:10-12; notice that Jesus is first said to have spoken in parables in Mark 3:23, in immediate response to the charge of demon possession). He also began to intimate, sometimes in analogy or parable (Mark 10:38; Luke 12:49-50; John 3:14; 12:24,32) and sometimes in explicit language (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33-34), that He would be arrested and tried by the religious leadership in Jerusalem, die on the cross, and rise from the dead after three days. From the start He had defined His mission, at least in part, as that of the “Servant of the Lord” (see, for example the citation of Isa. 61:1-2 in Luke 4:18-19). As His ministry moved toward its completion, the vicarious suffering of the Servant (Isa. 52:13-53:12) came into sharper and sharper focus for Jesus (Mark 10:45; 12:1-11). He also saw Himself as the stricken Shepherd of Zech. 13:7 (Mark 14:27) and, at the very end, in the role of the righteous Sufferer of the biblical psalms (e.g., Mark 15:34; Luke 23:46; John 19:28). Before His arrest He dramatized for the disciples His impending death by sharing with them in the bread and the cup of the Passover with the explanation that the bread was His body to be broken for them and that the cup of wine was His blood to be shed for their salvation. Only His death could guarantee the coming of the kingdom He had proclaimed (Matt. 26:26-29; Mark 14:22-25; Luke 22:14-20; cp. 1 Cor. 11:23-26).

His Death and Resurrection The Gospel accounts of Jesus' last days in Jerusalem correspond in broad outline to the predictions attributed to Him earlier. He seems to have come to Jerusalem for the last time in the knowledge that He would die there. Though He received a royal welcome from crowds who looked to Him as the long-expected Messiah (Matt. 21:9-11; Mark 11:9-10; John 12:13), no evidence points to this as the reason for His arrest. Rather His action in driving the money changers out of the Jerusalem temple (Matt. 21:12-16; Mark 11:15-17; cp. John 2:13-22), as well as certain of His pronouncements about the temple aroused the authorities to act decisively against Him.

During His last week in Jerusalem, Jesus had predicted the temple's destruction (Matt. 24:1-2; Mark 13:1-2; Luke 21:5-6) and claimed that "I will demolish this sanctuary made by hands, and in three days I will build another not made by hands" (Mark 14:58 HCSB; cp. Matt. 26:61). Jesus' intention to establish a new community as a "temple," or dwelling place of God (see Matt. 16:18; John 2:19; 1 Cor. 3:16-17), was perceived as a very real threat to the old community of Judaism and to the temple that stood as its embodiment. On this basis He was arrested and charged as a deceiver of the people.

During a hearing before the Sanhedrin, or Jewish ruling council, Jesus spoke of Himself as "Son of Man seated at the right hand of the Power and coming with the clouds of heaven" (Mark 14:62 HCSB; cp. Matt. 26:64, Luke 22:69). Though the high priest called this blasphemy and the Sanhedrin agreed that such behavior deserved death, the results of the hearing seem to have been inconclusive. If Jesus had been formally tried and convicted by the Sanhedrin, He would have been stoned to death like Stephen in Acts 7, or like the attempted stoning of the woman caught in adultery in a story reported in some manuscripts of John 8:1-11. For whatever reason, the high priest and his cohorts apparently found no formal charges they could make stick. If Jesus were stoned to death without a formal conviction, it would be murder, a sin the Ten Commandments forbid. (John 18:31 refers to what was forbidden to the Jews by their own law, not to what was forbidden by the Romans.) The Sanhedrin decided, therefore, to send Jesus to Pontius Pilate, the Roman governor, with charges against Him that the Romans would take seriously: "We found this man subverting our nation, opposing payment of taxes to Caesar, and saying that He Himself is the Messiah, a King" (Luke 23:2 HCSB). Jesus' execution is therefore attributable neither to the Jewish people as a whole, nor to the Sanhedrin, but rather to a small group of priests who manipulated the Romans into doing what they were not able to accomplish within the framework of their law. Though Pilate pronounced Jesus innocent three times (Luke 23:4,14,22; cp. John 18:38; 19:4,6), he was maneuvered into sentencing Jesus with the thinly veiled threat, “If you release this man, you are not Caesar's friend. Anyone who makes himself a king opposes Caesar!” (John 19:12 HCSB). Consequently, Jesus was crucified between two thieves, fulfilling His own prediction that “as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so the Son of Man must be lifted up” (John 3:14). Most of His disciples fled at His arrest; only a group of women and one disciple, called the disciple whom He loved, were present at the cross when He died (John 19:25-27; cp. Matt. 27:55-56; Mark 15:40; Luke 23:49).

The story did not end with the death of Jesus. His body was placed in a new tomb that belonged to a secret disciple named Joseph of Arimathea (Luke 23:50-56; John 19:38-42). The Gospels agree that two days later, the morning after the Sabbath, some of the women who had remained faithful to Jesus came to the tomb. They discovered the stone over the entrance to the tomb rolled away and the body of Jesus gone. According to Mark, a young man was there (16:5; tradition calls him an angel) who told the women to send word to the rest of the disciples to go and meet Jesus in Galilee, just as He had promised them (Mark 16:7; 14:28). The most reliable manuscripts of Mark's Gospel end the story there, leaving the rest to the reader's imagination. According to Matthew, the young man's word was confirmed to the women by the risen Jesus Himself. When they brought word to the 11 disciples (the Twelve minus Judas, the betrayer), the disciples went to a mountain in Galilee, where the risen Jesus appeared to them as a group. He commanded them to make more disciples, teaching and baptizing among the Gentiles (Matt. 28:16-20). According to Luke, the risen Jesus appeared to the gathered disciples already in Jerusalem on the same day He was raised and before that to two disciples walking to the neighboring town of Emmaus. According to John, there was an appearance in Jerusalem on Easter day to one of the women, Mary Magdalene, another on the same day to the gathered disciples, another a week later (still in Jerusalem) to the same group plus Thomas, and a fourth appearance, at an unstated time, by the lake of Galilee, in which Jesus reenacted the initial call of the disciples by providing them miraculously with an enormous catch of fish. Luke adds in the book of Acts that the appearances of the risen Jesus went on over a period of 40 days in which He continued to instruct them about the kingdom of God. Whatever the precise order of the facts, the disciples' experience of the living Jesus transformed them from a scattered and cowardly band of disillusioned visionaries into the nucleus of a coherent movement able to challenge and change forever the Roman Empire within a few short decades.

Painting from the 15th or 16th century showing the burial of Jesus, seen at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem.

Though the physical resurrection of Jesus cannot be proven, alternate “naturalistic” explanations of the disciples' experience and of the empty tomb require without exception more credulity than the traditional confession of the Christian church that on the third day He rose from the dead. The unanimous witness of the Gospels is that the story goes on. Mark does it with the promise that Jesus will bring together His scattered flock and lead them into Galilee (Mark 16:7). Matthew does it more explicitly with Jesus' concluding words, "And remember, I am with you always, to the end of the age" (Matt. 28:20 HCSB). Luke does it with the entire book of Acts, which traces the spread of the message of the kingdom of God and the risen Jesus from Jerusalem all the way to Rome. John does it with his vivid picture of the Holy Spirit being given to the disciples directly from the mouth of Jesus Himself (John 20:21-22). Each Gospel makes the point differently, but the point is always the same. The story of Jesus is not over; He continues to fulfill His mission wherever His name is confessed and His teaching is obeyed, and the faith of Christians is that He will do so until He comes again.

JETHER (Jē' thēr) Personal name meaning "remnant." 1. Son of the judge Gideon who refused his father's command to kill enemy military leaders (Judg. 8:20). 2. Father of Amasa, army leader under Judah (1 Kings 2:5,32), and descended from Ishmael (1 Chron. 2:17; cp. 2 Sam. 17:25). See Ithra. 3. Member of clan of Jerahmeel in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:32). 4. Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:17). 5. Member of tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:38, called Ithran in 7:37). See Ithran.

JETHETH (Jē' thēth) Clan name in Edom of unknown meaning (Gen. 36:40).

JETHLAH (Jēth' lah) Place-name meaning "he or it hangs." Border town of tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:42). See Ithlah.

JETHRO (Jēth' rō) Personal name meaning "excess" or "superiority." In Exod. 3:1 a priest of Midian and the father-in-law of Moses. Some variation exists regarding the name of Moses' father-in-law. In Exod. 2:18 his name is Reuel; in Num. 10:29 it is Hobab. The nature of the relationship of these names to one another is uncertain. Of particular interest is that Jethro was a Midianite priest. The deity whom he served is not explicitly identified; in Exod. 18:11, however, he declared Yahweh to be greater than all gods. One school of thought has discovered the origin of Israel's Yahwism in the ancient Midianite religion represented by Jethro. Such an origin is unlikely.

Yahwistic faith probably is traceable at least as far back as Abraham. See Moses; YHWH.

JETUR (Jē' ūr) Personal name, perhaps meaning "he set in courses or layers." A son of Ishmael and thus original ancestor of Arabian tribe or clan (Gen. 25:15). The clan was a part of the Hagerites, probably descendants of Hagar (1 Chron. 5:19), who fought the East Jordan tribes. Israel's victory illustrated the conviction that trust in God brought victory in war. See Hagarite; Ituraea.

JEUEL (Jū' ēl) Personal name meaning "God is strong" or "God heals." See Jeiel.

JEUSH (Jē' ūsh) Personal name meaning "He helps." Hebrew is sometimes transliterated into English in different ways. 1. Son of Esau and thus head of tribe in Edom (Gen. 36:5,18). 2. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:10; cp. 8:39). 3. Levite under David (1 Chron. 23:10-11). 4. Son of King Rehoboam and grandson of Solomon (2 Chron. 11:19).

JEUZ (Jē' ūz) Personal name meaning "He brought to safety." Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:10).

JEWELS, JEWELRY Jewels are stones valued for their beauty or scarcity. Most often they are cut and polished to enhance their appearance. Jewels have been more rare in archaeological finds in Palestine than in Egyptian, Greek, or Phoenician archaeological remains. There are two reasons for this. First, the land of Israel had no natural deposits of precious stones. Jewels (sometimes in the form of jewelry) were taken as booty during war (Num. 31:50), brought as gifts to the king (2 Chron. 9:1,9), or purchased from merchants (1 Kings 10:11; cp. Rev. 18:11-12). Secondly, Israel and Judah were pawns in power struggles between its neighbors. The wealth accumulated by the king and temple was carried off by conquerors (1 Kings 14:25-28). Jewels functioned as a medium of exchange in the ancient Near East before the invention of money. In Israel jewels were used primarily in relation to worship and the monarchy.

Worship First, jewels were a fitting contribution for a special offering (Exod. 35:22). Second, the high priest was garbed in fine clothing decorated with jewels (Exod. 28; 39). The ephod worn by the high priest had an onyx stone set in gold filigree and engraved with the names of the tribes of Israel on each shoulder. The breastpiece of the high priest (also called the “breastpiece of judgment,” Exod. 28:15,29) was made of the finest cloth interwoven with gold, into which were set 12 precious stones in four rows of three each. On each stone was engraved the name of one of the 12 tribes. Thus the 12 tribes were symbolically present whenever the high priest ministered before the Lord. The Hebrew words for some of these jewels can be translated with some degree of assurance; in other cases translators must guess what stone is intended. Since the ancients had no way to cut diamonds, they were not yet precious stones. The word translated “diamond” in Exod. 28:18; 39:11 probably does refer to a very hard stone since it is based on a root word meaning “hammer, smite.” Thus it is probably not what we call a diamond (NIV, “emerald”; REB, “jade”; NRSV, “moonstone”). The high priest would have looked quite elegant when presiding in worship.

The Monarchy Jewels were considered a fitting gift for kings. The Queen of Sheba brought them to Solomon (1 Kings 10:2,10). Jewels were used in royal crowns (2 Sam. 12:30) and probably royal garments (Ezek. 28:13). Jewels were a form of wealth that could be accumulated and easily kept in the royal treasury. The writer of Ecclesiastes considered such accumulation of royal wealth a matter of great vanity (Eccles. 2:4-11).

Unlike precious jewels, jewelry was widely used by ordinary people in the ancient Near East. Archaeologists have demonstrated that men and women have adorned themselves with various kinds of jewelry almost from the earliest known times. Jewelry was known in the patriarchal period. Abraham's servant, when sent to find a bride for Isaac, put a nose ring and bracelets on Rebekah (Gen. 24:47) and gave her other gold and silver jewelry. The Israelites are said to have “despoiled” the Egyptians by begging gold and silver jewelry of their neighbors in preparation for the exodus from Egypt (Exod. 3:22; 11:2-3). More Egyptian jewelry undoubtedly came into Israel through trade as well as with the daughter of Pharaoh who married Solomon (1 Kings 3:1). At least 15 precious stones were mined in ancient Egypt. Egyptian metalworkers were especially skilled in the art of making gold jewelry. The opulence of royal Egyptian jewelry has been demonstrated from archaeological finds, especially the tomb of Tutankhamen.

During the period of the monarchy, an ordinary man or woman might have had a few pieces of jewelry, something made of bronze or, if they could afford it, gold. Gold, which was used as a medium of exchange, was relatively plentiful and could be made into a necklace, bracelet, or ring by a local craftsman. Royalty, of course, could wear more expensive jewelry set with precious stones.

Many kinds of jewelry are mentioned in the OT Not only women wore bracelets (Gen. 24:47); King Saul was wearing one when he died in battle (2 Sam. 1:10). Ankle bracelets might be worn (Isa. 3:16,18). Such bracelets have been found on the leg bones of women buried in ancient Israel. See Anklet.

Necklaces and pendants were popular (Song 1:10). A certain kind of gold necklace probably functioned as a symbol of authority. When Pharaoh appointed Joseph to high office, he put a gold chain around his neck (Gen. 41:42). Likewise, in the book of Daniel, King Belshazzar proclaimed that whoever could interpret the mysterious writing on the wall should have a gold chain put around his neck and be made “the third ruler in the kingdom” (Dan. 5:7,29). The crescents mentioned in Isa. 3:18, like those of Judg. 8:21,26, which were worn by the kings of Midian, were probably moon-shaped pendants worn on chains. Gold crescent jewelry has been discovered by archaeologists. The crescent may have functioned as a royal insignia. The items referred to as chains, collars, or pendants (Isa. 3:19 NRSV; Judg. 8:26) were probably also worn around the neck, perhaps on cords.

Earrings were known in the patriarchal period. They may have had some religious significance (Gen. 35:4). Nose rings are mentioned in Gen. 24:22,30,47 (NIV) and Isa. 3:21 (NIV). The same term, nezem, is used for both, so the references are often ambiguous (Num. 31:50; Prov. 25:12).

Good-luck charms called “amulets” are not mentioned often in the Bible but have been widely found throughout Palestine in archaeological sites from all periods. Some represented gods and goddesses. Isaiah 3:20 may include a reference to amulets (see NRSV, NASB), though the translation is not sure. The earrings buried by Jacob under the oak near Shechem may have been amulets (Gen. 35:4). Such amulets were violations of the commandment not to make graven images (Exod. 20:4).

The most important item of jewelry mentioned in the OT is the signet ring. The signet was used to make an impression on clay or wax and thus to seal and authenticate documents. Generally the signet was a finely engraved semiprecious stone. A hole could be bored through the signet and it could be hung from a cord around the neck (Gen. 38:18), or it could be used as a setting for a ring or more elaborate necklace. Pharaoh gave Joseph his signet ring as a symbol of authority (Gen. 41:42). King Ahasuerus gave his signet ring first to Haman (Esther 3:10) and then to Mordecai (Esther 8:2).

Jewelry was also used to decorate animals, at least by the wealthy. The camels of the Midianite kings slain by Gideon wore crescents and decorated collars around their necks (Judg. 8:21,26). The reference in Prov. 11:22 to a ring in a swine's snout is metaphoric; one cannot draw conclusions from it concerning the use of decorative nose rings for animals. Amulets were sometimes worn by animals to ensure good fortune on a trip.

Isaiah 3:18-23 is sometimes interpreted as an attack on women's fashions and a denunciation of the uses of jewelry. The Hebrew terms used in the passage appear to refer rather to official insignia. Thus the passage is a condemnation of the misuse of wealth and power at the expense of the poor. In Ezek. 16:8-13 the Lord is portrayed as a bridegroom adorning his bride, Jerusalem, with fine clothing and jewelry including a nose ring, earrings, and a crown.

The NT does not often mention jewels and jewelry. Pearls were highly valued in NT time and thus a fitting metaphor for the kingdom of God (Matt. 13:45-46). James warned his readers not to discriminate on the basis of wealth as indicated by the wearing of gold rings and fine clothing (James 2:1-7). In 1 Tim. 2:9-10 women are reminded that the best adornment is not braids, gold, or pearls but good deeds.

In Rev. 21:2, which echoes the imagery of Ezek. 16:8-13, God is pictured as a bridegroom whose bride, the new Jerusalem, is adorned with jewels. The walls of the new Jerusalem are pictured as built of jasper, adorned with 12 kinds of jewels. Each of the 12 gates is made of a single pearl. The gems of the holy city, like those in so much jewelry, are to be put in a setting of gold. The idea of rebuilding Jerusalem with jewels as building material reflects Isa. 54:11-12. Unlike the old Jerusalem, the new Jerusalem—associated with the completion of the kingdom of God—will not be unfaithful. See Minerals and Metals.

JEWESS (Jū' ès) Female Jew (KJV, NASB, NIV, RSV). Timothy's mother was Jewish, but his father was not (Acts 16:1). Drusilla, the wife of Felix the Roman governor, was a Jewess (Acts 24:24).

JEWISH PARTIES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT Judaism in NT times was diverse. We read of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians. One man is called a Zealot. From other sources we learn of Essenes and the Sicarii.

Pharisees The Pharisees constituted the largest and most important group, Josephus stating that they numbered about 6,000. They appear in the Gospels as opponents of Jesus. Paul was a Pharisee (Phil. 3:5). They controlled the synagogues and exercised great control over much of the population.

No surviving writing gives us information about the origin of the Pharisees. The earliest reference to them is in the time of Jonathan (160-143 B.C.) when Josephus refers to Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. Their good relations with the rulers ended in the time of John Hyrcanus (134-104 B.C.). They came to power again when Salome Alexandra became Queen (76 B.C.).

The term “Pharisee” means “separated ones.” Perhaps it means that they separated themselves from the masses or that they separated themselves to the study and interpretation of the law. A common assumption is that they developed from the Hasidim, the ultra-orthodox loyal freedom fighters in the time of Judas Maccabeus. They apparently were responsible for the transformation of Judaism from a religion of sacrifice to one of law. They were the developers of the oral tradition, the teachers of the two-fold law: written and oral. They saw the way to God as being through obedience to the law. They were the progressives of the day, willing to adopt new ideas and adapt the law to new situations.

The Pharisees were strongly monotheistic. They accepted all the OT as authoritative. They affirmed the reality of angels and demons. They had a firm belief in life beyond the grave and a resurrection of the body. They were missionary, seeking the conversion of Gentiles (Matt. 23:15). They saw God as concerned with the life of a person without denying that the individual was responsible for how he or she lived. They had little interest in politics. The Pharisees opposed Jesus because He refused to accept their interpretations of the oral law.

Sadducees The Sadducees were aristocrats. They were the party of the wealthy and of the high priestly families. They were in charge of the temple, its services, and concessions. They claimed to be descendants of Zadok, high priest of Solomon. True derivation of the term is unknown. In all our literature they stand in opposition to the Pharisees. They were social conservatives, seeking to preserve the practices of the past. They opposed the oral law, accepting the Pentateuch as the ultimate authority. The Sadducees were materialistic in their outlook. They did not believe in life after death or rewards or punishment beyond this life. They denied the existence of angels and demons. They did not believe that God was concerned with what people did. Rather, people were totally free. They were politically oriented, supporters of ruling powers, whether Seleucids or Romans. They tolerated no threats to their position and wealth, so they strongly opposed Jesus.

Herodians The Herodians are mentioned only three times in the NT (Matt. 22:16; Mark 3:6; 12:13). In Mark they joined the Pharisees in a plot to kill Jesus. The other references are to Pharisees and Herodians together asking Jesus about paying taxes to Caesar. They were Jews who supported Herod Antipas or sought to have a descendant of Herod the Great given authority over Palestine. At this time Judea and Samaria were under Roman governors.

Zealots The Zealots are mentioned rarely in the NT. Simon, one of the disciples, is called Zealot (Luke 6:15). John 18:40 uses a word for Barabbas that Josephus used for Zealot. Josephus said the Zealots began with Judas the Galilean seeking to lead a revolt over a taxation census (A.D. 6). He did not use the name Zealot until referring to events in A.D. 66, the first Jewish revolt against Rome. The Zealots were the extreme wing of the Pharisees. In contrast with other Pharisees they believed only God had the right to rule over the Jews. They were willing to fight and die for that belief. For them nationalistic patriotism and religion were inseparable.

Sicarii Literally meaning “dagger men,” the Sicarii were the most extreme revolutionaries among the Jews of the first century. Committed to the overthrow of Roman power over Palestine, they used small concealed daggers to assassinate their enemies, principally Roman officials. They were willing to die in killing their targets and did whatever they could to disrupt Roman political and military policy.

Essenes We know of the Essenes through the writings of Josephus and Philo, a Jewish philosopher in Alexandria, Egypt. They are not mentioned in the NT. More information about the Essenes is known since the 1947 discovery of manuscripts from caves above the Dead Sea called the Dead Sea Scrolls. The common assumption is that the people of the Scrolls were either Essenes or associated with them. They may have begun at about the same time as the Pharisees and Sadducees. The Essenes were an ascetic group, many of whom lived in the desert region of Qumran near the Dead Sea. We now know that an active Essene community was located in Jerusalem as well. They took vows of celibacy and perpetuated their community by adopting male children. However, some Essenes did marry. When one joined the Essenes, he gave all his possessions to the community. A three period of probation was required before full membership was granted. The Essenes devoted themselves to the study of the law. They went beyond the Pharisees in their rigid understanding of it. There is no hard evidence that either Jesus or John the Baptist had any relation to Qumran. Jesus would have strongly opposed their understanding of the law.

Dates of Existence	Name	Origin	Segments of Society	Beliefs	Selected Biblical References	Activities
PHARISEES
Existed under Jonathan (160–143 B.C.) Declined to power under John Hyrcanus (134–104 B.C.) Began resurgence under Shimon Alexander (70 B.C.)	Pharisees = "the Separated Ones" with three possible meanings: (1) to their separating themselves from people (2) to their separating themselves to the study of the law ("Dabar" or "speak") (3) to their separating themselves from pagan practices	Probably spiritual descendants of the Hasmonean (Hasmonean) high priests (high priests) of the time of Judas Maccabean	Most numerous of the Jewish parties (or sects) Probably descendants of the Hasmonean scribes and lawyers Members of the middle class—mostly businessmen (traders)	Monotheistic Viewed reality of the Old Testament (Tora, Prophets, and Writings) as authoritative Believed that the study of the law was true worship Accepted both the written and oral law More liberal in interpreting the law than were the Sadducees One in agreement with the prayer keeping of the Sabbath, tithing, and purification of the body (with divine retention and reward) Sawed humanity and human equality Militarist-minded regarding the conquest of Gentiles Believed that individuals were responsible for how they lived	Matthew 3:7-10; 5:20; 9:14; 16:12-13; 22:15-22, 34-46; 23:2-30 Mark 3:6; 7:1-5; 8:15; 12:13-17 Luke 6:7; 7:36-39; 11:37-41; 16:9-14 John 1:19; 8:13; 10:16 Acts 23:6-10 Philippians 3:4b-6	Developers of oral tradition Taught that the way to God was through obedience to the law Charged Judaism from a religion of sacrifice to a religion of law Progressive thinkers regarding the adaptation of the law to a new situation Opposed Jesus because He would not accept the teachings of the oral law as binding Established and controlled synagogues Exercised great control over general population Spurred in religious authorities for more than 200 years Took several remnants from the Temple to the home Emphasized ethical as opposed to theological action Legislative and socially exclusive attitudes Tended to have a self-sufficient and haughty attitude
SADDUCEES
Probably began about 200 B.C. Diverse occurred in 70 B.C. (with the destruction of the Temple)	Sadducees = Three possible translations: (1) "the Righteous Ones"—based on the Hebrew consonants for the word righteous (2) "sons who separate" with Zaddik, "righteousness"—based on their position in the Bible (3) "judges," "judges," "considers"—based on the Greek word synthetel	Unknown origin Claimed to be descendants of Zadok—high priests under David (see 2 Samuel 8:17; 15:24) and Solomon (see 1 Kings 1:34-35; 2:35) Had a possible link to Aaron Were probably formed into a group about 200 B.C. as the high priest's party	Aristocracy—the rich descendants of the high-priestly line (However, not all priests were Sadducees) Probably descendants of the Hasmonean aristocracy Probably not as refined as their ecclesiastical position in the world might	Accepted only the Torah (Genesis through Deuteronomy)—the written law of Moses as authoritative Practiced literal interpretation of the law Rigidly conservative towards the law Stressed strict observance of the law Observed strict beliefs and tradition Opposed oral law as obligatory or binding Believed in the absolute freedom of the human will—that people could do as they wished without attention from God Denied divine providence Denied the concept of life after death and the resurrection of the body Insisted on the concept of reward and punishment after death Denied the existence of angels and demons Materialistic	2 Samuel 8:17; 15:24 1 Kings 1:34 1 Chronicles 12:26-28 Ezekiel 40:45-46; 43:19; 44:15-20 Matthew 3:7-10; 16:11-12; 23:23-34 Mark 12:18-27 Luke 20:27-40 John 1:14 Acts 4:1-5; 5:17-18; 23:6-10	In charge of the Temple and its services Politically active Exercised great political control through the Sadducees of which many were members Supported the ruling power and the status quo Lined toward Hellenism (the spreading of Greek influence)—and were thus despised by the Jewish populace Opposed both the Pharisees and Jesus because those tried by a larger culture (the Pharisees and Jesus) had come through the same process as they had through Deuteronomy's authorities Opposed Jesus specifically for fear their words/positions would be trampled if they supported him.

ZEALOTS
These possibilities for their beginning: (1) during the reign of Herod the Great (about 37 B.C.) (2) during the revolt against Rome (A.D. 6) (3) traced back to the Hasidim or the Maccabees (about 168 B.C.) Their origin date occurred around A.D. 70-75 with Herod's ousting of Jerusalem.	Belong to their religious zeal. Josephus used the term in referring to those who revolted against Rome in A.D. 6—led by Judas of Galilee.	(According to Josephus) The Zealots began with Judas (the Galilean), son of Eleazar, who led a revolt in A.D. 6 because of a census done for tax purposes.	The extreme wing of the Pharisees	Matthew 10:4 Mark 3:18 Luke 6:15 Acts 1:13	Extremely opposed to Roman rule over Palestine Extremely opposed to peace with Rome Refused to pay taxes Demonstrated against the use of the Greek language in Palestine Engaged in terrorism against Rome and others with whom they disagreed politically (Sicarii or Assassins) were an extreme Zealot group who carried out acts of terrorism against Rome.)
HERODIANS
Existed during the time of the Herodian dynasty (which began with Herod the Great in 37 B.C.)	Based on their support of the Herodian rulers (Herod the Great or his dynasty)	Exact origin uncertain	Worshiping politically influential Jews who supported Herod Antipas (or any descendant of Herod the Great) as ruler (Judas and Samaria were under Roman governance at this time)	Matthew 23:22 Mark 3:6; 8:15; 12:13/17	Supported Herod and the Herodian dynasty Accepted Hellenization Accepted foreign rule
ESSENES
Probably began during Maccabean times (about 168 B.C.)—around the same time as the Pharisees and the Sadducees began to form Urban center—probably in A.D. 68-70 with the collapse of Jerusalem	Unknown origin	Probably developed as a reaction to the corrupt Sadducean priesthood Have been identified with various groups: Essenes, Zealots, Greek influence, or Palestinian influence	Scattered throughout the villages of Judaea (possibly including the community of Qumran) (According to Philo and Josephus) About 4,000 in Palestine-Syria	None	Devoted to the copying and teaching of the manuscript of the law Lived in a community sense with communal property Required a long preparatory period and trial baptisms of those wishing to join Were highly virtuous and rigorous Were extremely self-disciplined Were diligent manual laborers Care great importance to daily worship Used light-colored robes Maintained a non-lexical priesthood Reposed variety of plants as well as flowers Reposed maternity—but did not breed other women

The vast majority of the people were not members of any of these parties, although they probably were most influenced by the Pharisees. See Dead Sea Scrolls; Intertestamental History and Literature; Synagogue; Temple.

JEWES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT The word “Jew” is derived ultimately from the tribe of Judah through Middle English Iewe, Old French

Ieu, Latin Iudaeus, and Greek Ioudaios (cp. the woman's name Judith that originally meant “Jewess”).

Old Testament Background Originally the Hebrew yehudim meant descendants of the tribe of Judah and then those who inhabited the territories claimed by them (2 Kings 16:6; 25:25; Jer. 32:12). With the deportation and subsequent assimilation of the “Ten Lost Tribes” of the Northern Kingdom by the Assyrians after 722 B.C., the only Israelites to survive into the exilic period (with a few from the tribe of Benjamin, such as Mordecai, who is called a “Jew” in Esther 2:5) were those from Judah, hence the name Jews (Neh. 1:2). The corresponding Aramaic word is used in Dan. 3:8,12.

The Intertestamental Period The Greek name Ioudaios (plural Ioudaioi) was used for the Israelites in the Greek and Roman world. This is the name used in the treaty between Judas Maccabeus and the Romans, described in 1 Macc. 8:23-32: “May all go well with the Romans and with the nation of the Jews” (v. 23).

Matthew, Mark, Luke The term Ioudaios occurs relatively rarely in the Synoptic Gospels, the first three Gospels which are closely parallel to each other. The word occurs only five times in Matthew, seven times in Mark, and five times in Luke, usually in the expression “King of the Jews” (12 of the total of 17). Of the remaining occurrences only Matt. 28:15 designates Jews as contrasted to Christian believers.

John By contrast, the word Ioudaios occurs 70 times in the Gospel of John. Some of these references are quite positive, especially in the dialogue between Jesus and the woman of Samaria (chap. 4). In verse 9 the woman says to Jesus, “You, a Jew” (HCSB), and in verse 22 Jesus says, “Salvation is from the Jews.” Many of the Jews believed in Jesus (8:31; 11:45; 12:11). Other references are neutral as in John 3:1 where Nicodemus is described as a ruler of the Jews.

The description of Jesus' opponents reveals a striking difference between the Synoptic Gospels and John. Whereas the former names Jesus' enemies as scribes and Pharisees, high priests, and Sadducees, the Gospel of John simply uses the general term “Jews.” The term often implies Jewish authorities as in 7:13; 9:22; 19:38; 20:19.

The Jews impugned Jesus' birth and His sanity (8:48) and even alleged that He was demon possessed (8:52). The Jews questioned His statements about the temple (2:20) and were scandalized at His claim to be the bread from heaven (6:41). They regarded His affirmations of equality with the Father as blasphemous and picked up stones to kill Him (5:18; 7:1; 10:31,33; 11:8).

The heightened use of the term “Jews” in John to serve as a general designation for those who denied that Jesus was the Christ may be explained by the fact that John's Gospel was composed at a later date than the Synoptics—after such events as the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and the insertion of a curse upon the minim (“heretics,” especially Christians) into the daily synagogue prayer in A.D. 80 had increased mutual hostilities between Jews and Christians. Acts Paul was a Jew from Tarsus (Acts 21:39; 22:3). After his dramatic conversion on the road to Damascus, his fellow Jews sought to kill him (9:23). King Herod Agrippa I arrested Peter and killed the Apostle James, believing this would please the Jews (12:1-3).

From OT times faithful Jews have worn phylacteries on both forehead and arm as they pray.

Following his conviction that the gospel should be preached first to the Jews (Rom. 1:16), Paul on his missionary journeys began his preaching in the Jewish synagogues—at Salamis on Cyprus (Acts 13:5), at Iconium (14:1), at Thessalonica (17:1), at Athens (17:15-17), and at Corinth (18:1). Though he made some converts among the Jews, even converting the synagogue ruler at Corinth (18:8), and no doubt had success among the “God fearers” or proselytes who were interested in converting to Judaism (13:43; 17:4), the majority of the Jews reacted violently against Paul's message (13:50; 14:2; 17:5; 18:12). Paul therefore turned his efforts increasingly toward the Gentiles, the non-Jews.

Pauline Letters As the “apostle to the Gentiles,” Paul argued against “Judaizers” that Gentile converts did not have to be circumcised, that is, become Jews first before they became Christians (Acts 15:1-5). His arguments were accepted by James and the church council at Jerusalem held about A.D. 49. Paul, who had been “a Hebrew born of Hebrews; as to the law, a Pharisee” (Phil. 3:5 HCSB) and had been more zealous in his pursuit of Judaism than his peers (Gal. 1:13-14), came to the radical conclusion that a true Jew is not one who was physically descended from Abraham (cp. John 8:31-41), adhered to the Torah or law of Moses (Rom. 2:17,28), and was circumcised. For Paul a true Jew is one who believes that Jesus is the Messiah or Christ (Gal. 3:26-29), relies on God's grace and not works of the law (Eph. 2:8-9), and has been circumcised in his heart by the Holy Spirit (Gal. 2:2-9; 5:6). In spite of his grief that most of his fellow Jews did not accept his message, Paul did not teach that God had abandoned the Jews but believed that God still has a plan for them (Rom. 9-11). (Note: the word Ioudaios is not found in any of the non-Pauline letters of the NT.)

Revelation The two references in the book of Revelation are to the church at Smyrna (2:9) and the church at Philadelphia (3:9), where there were those who claimed to be Jews but who were denounced as the “synagogue of Satan” because they opposed Christians. JEZANIAH (Jě zá nī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh gave ear.” Army captain loyal to Gedaliah, the governor that Babylon appointed over Judah immediately after Babylon destroyed Jerusalem and took the Jewish leaders into exile about 586 B.C. (Jer. 40:8). Jezaniah was one of the captains who refused to believe Jeremiah's prophecy calling the people to remain in Judah. Rather, he helped carry Jeremiah into Egypt (Jer. 42-43). In 43:2 the name is Azariah, which may be the correct reading in 42:1 rather than Jezaniah. See Azariah.

JEZEBEL (Jěz' ə bēl) Personal name meaning “Where is the prince?” perhaps derived from Phoenician name meaning “Baal is the prince.” Wife of King Ahab of Israel (874-853 B.C.), who brought the worship of Baal from Sidon where her father Ethbaal was king (1 Kings 16:31). Jezebel tried to destroy all God's prophets in Israel (1 Kings 18:4) while installing prophets of Baal and Asherah (1 Kings 18:19, modern translations) as part of the royal household. Elijah proved these prophets to be false on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18), bringing Jezebel's threat to kill Elijah (1 Kings 19:2). Elijah ran for his life to Beer-sheba.

When Ahab wanted Naboth's vineyard, Jezebel connived with the leaders of the city who falsely accused and convicted Naboth, stoning him to death. Elijah then prophesied Jezebel's death, she being the one who had “stirred up” Ahab to wickedness (1 Kings 21). She continued her evil influence as her son Joram ruled (2 Kings 9:22). Elisha anointed Jehu to replace Joram. Jehu assassinated Joram and then went to Jezreel after Jezebel. She tried to adorn herself and entice him, but her servants obeyed Jehu's call to throw her from the window to the street where horses trod her in the ground (2 Kings 9:30-37).

Jezebel's name became so associated with wickedness that the false prophetess in the church at Thyatira was labeled “Jezebel” (Rev. 2:20).

JEZER (Jè' zēr) Personal name meaning “He formed.” Son of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24) and founding ancestor of clan in that tribe (Num. 26:49). The name “Izri” (1 Chron. 25:11) means member of clan of Jezer, and Zeri (1 Chron. 25:3) is probably an abbreviated form of Izri.

JEZERITE (Jè' zēr it) Member of clan of Jezer. See Jezer.

JEZIAH (Jè zī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah sprinkled.” Israelite with foreign wife condemned by Ezra (Ezra 10:25). Modern translations transliterate the Hebrew as Izziah.

JEZIEL (Jè' zī' ēl) Personal name meaning “God sprinkled.” Military leader from tribe of Benjamin, Saul's tribe, who joined David at Ziklag as he fled from Saul (1 Chron. 12:3). The written Hebrew text has the name Jezuel, while the early Hebrew scribes noted the reading Jeziel.

JEZLIAH (Jèz lī' ah) Personal name meaning “long-lived.” Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:18). Modern translations transliterate the name Izliah.

JEZOAR (Jə zō' ár) Personal name, perhaps meaning “he was light-colored.” Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:7). The name in the Hebrew text is Jizhar or Izhar as read by modern translations. Early Hebrew scribes read it as “and Zohar” (NIV).

JEZRAHIAH (Jèz rà hī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah shines forth.” 1. Leader in tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3; English transliteration is usually Izrahiah). 2. Leader of Levite singers at Nehemiah's celebration of finishing the rebuilding of Jerusalem's wall (Neh. 12:42). REB transliterates Izrahiah.

JEZREEL (Jēz' rēl) Name, meaning "God sows," refers to a major valley, a northern city, a southern city, and the son of Hosea. 1. Old Testament uses the name to refer to the entire Valley of Jezreel that separates Galilee from Samaria, including the valley of Esdraelon. The valley was important militarily as a battle site for Deborah (Judg. 4-5), Gideon (Judg. 6-7), Saul (2 Sam. 4), Jehu (2 Kings 9-10), and Josiah (2 Kings 22). The geography of Palestine made Jezreel a major route for travel from north to south and from east to west. See Esdraelon. 2. Northern city of Jezreel, which guarded the corridor to Beth-shan, was the site of the royal residence of Omri and Ahab where the incident of Naboth's vineyard occurred (1 Kings 21). 3. David's wife Ahinoam was from the southern city of Jezreel that is located in the vicinity of Ziph (1 Sam. 25:43). 4. Prophet Hosea named his son Jezreel as a symbol to indicate the evil nature of the dynasty of Jehu, which began with much bloodshed in Jezreel. The name also symbolized that God will sow seeds of prosperity after the destruction (Hos. 1:4-5; 1:10-2:1).

JEZREELITE (Jēz' rēl īt) A citizen of or from the hometown of Jezreel. See Jezreel.

JIBSAM (Jīb' sām) Personal name meaning “he smells sweet.” Early leader in tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2). Modern translations often read Ibsam.

JIDLAPH (Jīd' lāph) Personal name meaning “he cries or is sleepless.” Son of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. 22:22).

JIMNA (Jīm' nā) or JIMNAH Proper name meaning “he allotted.” 1. Son of Asher, grandson of Jacob, and original ancestor of clan in tribe of Asher (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:44). KJV spells the name “Imnah” in 1 Chron. 7:30, as do modern translations in all occurrences. 2. Levite under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:14, spelled “Imnah” by English translations).

JIMNITE (Jīm' nīt) Member of clan of Jimnah. See Jimna or Jimnah.

JIPHTAH (Jīph' tah) Place-name meaning “he opened or broke up.” City in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:43). It may have been located at modern Terqumiyeh, halfway between Hebron and Beit Jibrin. Most modern translations transliterate as “Iphtah.” The personal name Jephthah has the same Hebrew spelling. See Jephthah.

JIPHTAH-EL (Jiph' thá-èl) Place-name meaning "God opened." A valley marking the border of the tribal territories of Asher and Zebulun (Josh. 19:14,27). The modern name is Wadi elMelek. Modern translations transliterate Iphtahel.

JOAB (Jo' áb) Personal name meaning "Yahweh is father." Military commander during most of David's reign. He was the oldest son of Zeruah, the sister of David (2 Sam. 2:13; 1 Chron. 2:16). He was loyal to David and ruthless in achieving his objectives. After Saul's death David was negotiating with Abner, Saul's military commander. Joab, whose brother had been slain in battle by Abner, deceived Abner and murdered him. David publicly lamented this assassination (2 Sam. 2-3).

Joab's exploits in the capture of Jerusalem led David to name him commander (1 Chron. 11:4-8). Joab successfully led David's armies against the Ammonites (2 Sam. 10). During this campaign David sent his infamous order to have Uriah, the husband of Bathsheba, killed (2 Sam. 11).

Joab was instrumental in the reconciliation of David and Absalom (2 Sam. 14). When Absalom led a rebellion, Joab remained loyal to David. Joab killed Absalom against the clear orders of David (2 Sam. 18:14). He also convinced David to end his obsessive grieving for Absalom (2 Sam. 19:4-8). Joab murdered Amasa, whom David had named commander (2 Sam. 20:10). He opposed David's plan for a census but carried it out when ordered to do so (2 Sam. 24:1-9).

When David was dying, Joab supported Adonijah's claim to the throne (1 Kings 1). David named Solomon king and told him to avenge Abner and Amasa by killing Joab. Although Joab fled to the tabernacle for sanctuary, Solomon ordered Benaiah to kill Joab (1 Kings 2).

JOAH (Jo' áh) Personal name meaning "Jah is brother." 1. Scribe under King Hezekiah about 715-686 B.C. (2 Kings 18:18). He was one of the king's messengers to listen to the Assyrian Rabshakeh and bring the message to the king. They did so in mourning (2 Kings 18:37). 2. Son of royal scribe under King Josiah (640-609 B.C.). He helped repair the temple (2 Chron. 34:8). 3. Levite (1 Chron. 6:21). 4. Member of family of Levites who were porters or gatekeepers (1 Chron. 26:4). 5. Levite who helped cleanse the temple under King Hezekiah about 715 B.C. (2 Chron. 29:12).

JOAHAZ (Jō' á ház) Father of Joah (2 Chron. 34:8). See Joah 2.

JOANAN (Jō á' nan) Greek transliteration of Hebrew name "Johanan." Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:27). KJV reads Joanna. Some interpreters think his father Rhesa does not represent a personal name but is a transliteration of the Aramaic word for prince, a title for Zerubbabel. Joanan would then be the Hananiah of 1 Chron. 3:19. See Johanan.

JOANNA (Jō án' ná) Personal name meaning "Yahweh's gift." 1. In Luke 8:3 one of the women whom Jesus had healed and who ministered to Him out of their own private means. She was the wife of Herod's steward Chuza. Luke's Gospel, that gives particular prominence to women, also mentions her in 24:10. She was one of the women who came to Jesus' tomb on the Sunday following the crucifixion and reported to the eleven the message that He had risen. 2. In Luke 3:27 (KJV) the son of Rhesa mentioned in the genealogy of Jesus. See Joanan.

JOASH (Jō' ásh) Personal name meaning "Yahweh gives." 1. In Judg. 6:11 the father of Gideon. He was a member of the tribe of Manasseh who lived at Ophrah. 2. In 1 Chron. 4:21-22 one of the sons of Shelah. 3. In 1 Chron. 7:8 one of the sons of Becher. 4. In 1 Chron. 12:3 one of David's warriors. He was a son of Shemaah the Gibeathite. 5. In 1 Chron. 27:28 one of David's officers who was in charge of the stores of oil. 6. In 1 Kings 22:26 a son of Ahab, the king of Israel, and one of those to whom Micaiah the prophet was handed over. 7. In 2 Kings 11:2 the infant son of King Ahaziah of Judah who survived the bloodbath carried out by Athaliah, the queen mother, following the murder of Ahaziah. Joash was hidden by Jehosheba his aunt for six years, at the end of which time he was popularly proclaimed as the legitimate ruler of Judah in a move instigated by Jehoiada. Athaliah was executed, and Joash took the throne at the age of seven. During the king's minority, Jehoiada, the priest, exercised a strong positive influence in both the civil and religious life of the nation. The death of Jehoiada, however, marked a notable decline in the quality of the rule of Joash. Finally the king was assassinated as the result of a palace conspiracy. See Athaliah; Chronology of Biblical Period; Israel, Land of; Jehoiada. 8. In 2 Kings 13:10 the son and successor of Jehoahaz as king of Israel. He ruled for 16 years during the early part of the eighth century B.C. His visit to the dying prophet Elisha is described in 2 Kings 13:14-19. During the course of that visit, the prophet promised the king three victories over Syria. Subsequently, Joash enjoyed military success not only against Syria but also against neighboring Judah. He defeated Amaziah of Judah in battle at Bethshemesh and actually entered Jerusalem and plundered the temple. At his death his son Jeroboam II succeeded him on the throne. JOATHAM (Jō' á thám) KJV transliteration of Greek for Jotham (Matt. 1:9). See Jotham.

JOB, BOOK OF (Job) Job apparently lived in the patriarchal or prepatriarchal days, for not only does he not mention the Law or the exodus, but he is pictured as a wealthy nomad (Job 1:3; 42:12) who is still offering sacrifices himself (Job 1:5; 42:8). Undoubtedly Job was a most respected man, for not only did the Prophet Ezekiel refer to him as one of the greatest of Israel's ancestors (Ezek. 14:14), but even James used him as an excellent example of patient and persistent faith (James 5:11).

The book of Job presents many problems concerning the person, time, and nature of its composition. First, the text does not indicate in any way its author. The text never speaks of Job as its author, just its subject. Thus, many have concluded that Job was written by Elihu, one of the three friends, or simply some anonymous writer of that or some other age. Second, though most will agree that the character Job lived in patriarchal times, many believe that the book was written many years later. The dates of such a composition will vary from the time of Abraham to that of the Greek Empire. Third, to further complicate the issue, many believe that Job is a compilation of several different stories coming from several different ages. As one can readily see, the question of date and authorship is a very complex issue that cannot yet be settled with certainty. However, the fact that one cannot identify the human agent in no way means that the book is not inspired, for it is God's Word and is a unit as it now stands.

Job Is a Perfect Illustration of True Faith Through the years, many purposes have been suggested for the book. Perhaps the one that has been mentioned more often than any other is that of answering the question of why the righteous suffer. Certainly this question was prominent in Job's day, for ancient society believed that human suffering was the result of one's sin or at least a god's displeasure. Even the meaning of the name Job (the persecuted one) seems to support this suggestion, but that may not be all that is involved in the book. Another popular suggestion is that the book has been preserved to illustrate for us the nature of true faith both from the point of view of people and of God. For humans, it is trusting in God as the Creator and Sustainer of life even when all is not going well and when He is not visibly present to help us. From God's point of view the story proves His faithfulness to His creatures despite their weaknesses and inability to understand what is happening. Another, and much less frequently suggested purpose, is that of a parable concerning the nation of Israel. In this case, Job becomes the nation Israel. Though this approach is possible, it seems unlikely since most parables have some type of interpretation close by which helps to explain them. Thus, perhaps it is best just to take the book as an illustration of the nature of God and His justice in dealing with humankind, a justice people often cannot recognize and never fully understand.

Job Is Unique in World Literature Though Job shows many similarities with other ancient Near Eastern texts, none come near to Job's beauty and message. Because the three friends have Edomite backgrounds, some have speculated that Job may have been an Edomite and that the setting for the book may have been Edom. However, there is not enough Edomite material available at this point to make any conclusions. Others have seen similarities between Job and the Egyptian poems concerning "The Protest of the Eloquent Peasant" and "A Dispute Over Suicide" or the Babylonian poems of “The Babylonian Theodicy” and “I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom.” In each of these cases, what similarities exist seem minor, indeed, and deal more with the topic than its content or form. Still others have suggested that Job is written in the form of a courtroom trial. No doubt many legal terms appear in the book, yet we still know too little about ancient legal procedure to make any such conclusions. Thus, it is best to simply take the book as a unique work depicting the life of one man and his efforts to understand his God and his own situation in life.

Job's Encounter with Life Brought Him Face to Face with God The book of Job is most frequently pictured as a drama with a prologue (chaps. 1-2) and an epilogue (42:7-17) enclosing three cycles of poetic speeches between Job and his three friends (3-27), a beautiful wisdom poem from Job (28), Job's concluding remarks (29-31), the mysterious Elihu speeches (32-37), and God's whirlwind speeches (38:1-41:34), and Job's response (42:1-6).

The prologue describes the setting for the ensuing drama. Job was a very wealthy and religious man who seemed to have life under control (1:1-5). However, unknown to him, Satan challenged his righteousness. God allowed the challenge but limited Satan's power to Job's possessions (1:6-12). In quick succession Satan destroyed all of Job's possessions including even his children. However, Job did not blame God or question His integrity (1:13-22). Satan then challenged God to let him attack Job's personal health. God agreed but warned him not to kill Job (2:1-6). Without warning, a loathsome disease fell upon Job, yet he still refused to blame God (2:7-10). Job's friends were shocked and dismayed but nevertheless came to encourage him and offer their help (2:11-13). To this point Job displayed a traditional faith accepting suffering as inevitable and patiently enduring it.

After the traditional time of mourning had passed, Job cried out wondering why he was ever born or allowed to reach maturity (3:1-26). Job's faith turned to a challenging, seeking faith, confronting God, demanding escape and explanation. In all the bitter questioning, faith lived, for Job turned only and always to God for answers. At this point Job's friends could remain silent no longer and thus began to speak. The first to speak was Eliphaz who told Job that he must have sinned for God was surely punishing him. However, there was still hope if he would confess his sin and turn to God (4:1-5:27). Suffering did not have to endure always. Job was stunned and assured his friends that he was ready to meet God and work out any problem that he might have (6:1-7:21). Bildad added that if Job had not sinned it must have been his children, for obviously God was punishing him for some wrong. However, he too held out hope if Job would just confess (8:1-22). Job was deeply hurt and wondered aloud whether or not he could get a hearing before God (9:1-10:22). Zophar, the most brash of the friends, called upon God to meet with Job, for he was sure that when the two met, Job would see the error of his ways and repent (11:1-20). Job held to his integrity but continued to seek an audience with God so that he could come to understand what was happening and why (12:1-14:22).

Job's friends were not satisfied, so Eliphaz spoke again and reminded him that all people (including Job) had sinned and needed to repent. Thus, if he would just repent, God would forgive him (15:1-35). Job realized that he was getting nowhere with his friends, so he called upon the rest of creation to witness to his integrity (16:1-17:16). Bildad reminded Job of the many proverbs that spoke of the fate of the wicked. In so doing, he was implying that what had happened to Job was the result of his sin (18:1-21). Job was becoming increasingly frustrated, for his friends and family seemed to have abandoned him. Yet he was unwilling to give up on God. Thus, in a most beautiful way he affirmed that he would be vindicated, if not in this world, then in the world to come (19:1-29). Zophar was hurt, for he and his friends were being ignored, if not totally disagreed with. Thus he declared that the wicked would suffer great pain and anguish and that all the forces of nature would turn against them. No doubt Zophar included Job in this group (20:1-29). Job turned to Zophar and harshly said, "No"; for as he observed, sometimes the wicked did prosper. However that did not mean that God was not in control or that He would not one day bring about real justice (21:1-34).

Though they listened to him patiently, Job's friends were also becoming increasingly frustrated. Thus Eliphaz intensified his charge that Job's suffering was the result of his own sinfulness by listing the various sins of which he thought Job was guilty. Then he called upon Job to repent (22:1-30). By this time Job was in such pain that he all but ignored Elipaz's comments and cried out for relief (23:1-24:25). Bildad, not to be outdone, reminded Job again to consider the nature and character of God, for since He was not unjust, Job surely must have sinned (25:1-6). Job, in sarcastic tones, asked the friends where they got their wisdom and then pleaded with them to look to God for real understanding and faith (26:1-27:23). Apparently, at this point, the three friends, having exhausted their arguments, once again became silent.

Job then turned and reflected both upon the true nature of wisdom and his own place in existence. In one of the most beautiful descriptions of wisdom found in the entire Bible, Job concluded that real wisdom (or meaning to life) can only be found in a proper faith relationship with God (“the fear of the Lord”) (28:1-28). Though Job knew this was true and though he sought to live a righteous life, he was still hurting and did not understand why. Thus, in a beautiful soliloquy he cried out to God, reminding God of how he had lived faithfully in the past and had been respected for it (29:1-25), but now when he was suffering everyone had turned against him, and death seemed very near (30:1-31). Thus Job issued a final plea for God to vindicate him (31:1-40). With this, Job's case was made. He paused to await an answer from God.

At this point a young man named Elihu rose to speak. Though most of what he had to say had already been said, he gave four speeches, each of which sought to justify God's actions. First, Elihu contended that God speaks to all people, and thus, even though he was a young man, he had every right to speak and even had the understanding to do so (32:1-33:33). Second, he reiterated the view that God was just and thus what had happened to Job was well deserved (34:1-37). Third, he sought to show that God honored the righteous and condemned the prideful, just like He had Job (35:1-16). Fourth, he then pleaded with Job to accept what had happened to him as an expression of God's discipline and to humbly repent and seek His forgiveness (36:1-37:24). Finally, Elihu realized that Job really was not listening, so he stopped speaking.

Suddenly, out of the midst of a whirlwind, God began to speak. Basically, God said two things. First, He described the marvels of creation and then asked Job if he could have done any better (38:1-40:2). Job quickly responded that he could not for he, too, was just a creature (40:3-5). Second, God described how He controlled the world and everything in it and then asked Job if he could do a better job (40:6-41:34). Job admitted that he could not and that he did not need to for now he had seen God and clearly realized that God had everything well under control (42:1-6).

God was apparently very pleased with Job and his responses. However, He rebuked the three friends and commanded that they ask Job to seek intercession for them (42:7-9). Then God restored all Job's fortunes and even gave him more children (42:10-17). In the end Job found meaningful life, not in intellectual pursuits or even in himself, but in experiencing God and his faith relationship to Him.

Job's Message Is Still Relevant for Us Today The book of Job thus wrestles with issues that all people eventually face. Such issues are not easily addressed. The different speakers in Job confront the issues from different perspectives, forcing us to admit the complexity of the issue before we accept simple answers. Two important issues are the cause and effect of suffering and the justice and care of God. Job begins by accepting suffering as a part of human life to be endured through trust in God in good and bad times. He begins to question, facing the theological issues head on. He illustrates human frustration with problems for which we cannot find answers. Yet he refuses to accept his wife's perspective of giving up on God and life. Rather, he constantly confronts God with cries for help and for answers. He shows faith can be more than simple acceptance. Faith can be struggling in the dark for answers but struggling with God, not with other people. Eliphaz notes that suffering will not last forever, especially for the innocent. Bildad notes that Job's punishment is not as bad as it could have been; after all, his children died. Being alive means Job's sin is not unforgivable and his suffering can be endured.

Zophar emphasizes Job's sin but notes that he could suffer even more. He should give God credit for mercy in not making him endure all the pain his sin deserves. Elihu pleaded for Job to listen to God's word in the experience, for his suffering should become a means of seeing God's will and God's way in the situation. This should lead Job to confess his sin and praise God. Job's complaint is that he cannot find God. He wants to present his case to God but cannot do so, for he is unequal to God. He cannot present his claims of innocence and get his name cleared and his body healed.

God's appearance shows that God cares, that He still controls the world, even a world with unexplainable suffering, and that His creative acts and the mysterious creatures He has created only prove that humans must live under God's control. The human mind cannot control all knowledge or understand all situations. People must be content with a God who speaks to them. They cannot demand that God give all the answers we might want. God can be trusted in the worst of circumstances as well as in the best. See Faith; Suffering; Wisdom.

- I. Prologue: A Righteous Man Can Endure Injustice without Sinning (1:1-2:10).
- II. First Round: Will a Just God Answer a Righteous Sufferer's Questions? (2:11-14:22).
 - A. Job: Why must a person be born to a life of suffering? (2:11-3:26).
 - B. Eliphaz: Do not claim to be just but seek the disciplining God, who is just (4:1-5:27).
 - C. Job: Death is the only respite for a just person persecuted by God (6:1-7:21).
 - D. Bildad: A just God does not punish the innocent (8:1-22).
 - E. Job: Humans cannot win an argument in court against the Creator (9:1-10:22).
 - F. Zophar: Feeble, ignorant humans must confess sins (11:1-20).
 - G. Job: An intelligent person demands an answer from the all-powerful, all-knowing God, not from other humans (12:1-14:22).

III. Second Round: Does the Fate of the Wicked Prove the Mercy and Justice of God? (15:1-21:34).

A. Eliphaz: Be quiet, admit your guilt, and accept your punishment (15:1-35).

B. Job: Oh that an innocent person might plead my case with the merciless God (16:1-17:16).

C. Bildad: Wise up and admit you are suffering the just fate of the wicked (18:1-21).

D. Job: In a world without justice or friends, a just person must wait for a Redeemer to win his case (19:1-29).

E. Zophar: Your short-lived prosperity shows you are a wicked oppressor (20:1-29).

F. Job: Lying comforters do not help my struggle against the injustice of God (21:1-34).

IV. Third Round: Can the Innocent Sufferer Ever Know God's Ways and Will? (22:1-28:28).

A. Eliphaz: You wicked sinner, return to Almighty God and be restored (22:1-30).

B. Job: I cannot find God, but evidence shows He pays undue attention to me but gives no attention to the wicked (23:1-24:25).

C. Bildad: No person can be righteous before the awesome God (25:1-6).

D. Job: Neither your meaningless counsel nor God's faint word helps the innocent sufferer (26:1-27:23).

E. Job: Humans cannot know wisdom; only God reveals its content: Fear the Lord (28:1-28).

V. Job's Summary: Let God Restore the Good Old Days or Answer My Complaint (29:1-31:40).

A. In the good old days I had respect and integrity (29:1-25).

B. Now men and God are cruel to me (30:1-31).

C. In my innocence, I cry out for a hearing before God (31:1-40).

1. I have not looked with lust on a maiden (31:1-4).

2. I am not guilty of lying or deceit (31:5-8).

3. I have not committed adultery (31:9-12).

4. I have treated my servants fairly (31:13-15).

5. I have been generous and kind to the poor and the disadvantaged (31:16-23).
6. I have neither worshiped gold nor celestial bodies (31:24-28).
7. I have not rejoiced in others' ruin (31:29-30).
8. I have not refused hospitality to anyone (31:31-32).
9. I have nothing to hide, but I wish God would give me a written statement of charges (31:33-37).
10. I have not withheld payment for the laborers on my land (31:38-40).

VI. Elihu: An Angry Young Man Defends God (32:1-37:24).

- A. Elihu is angry with Job and with the friends (32:1-22).
- B. Elihu speaks to Job as a man; God speaks through dreams, visions, pain, and deliverance (33:1-33).
- C. God is just; Job speaks without knowledge (34:1-37).
- D. Is there any advantage in serving God? Human sin is no threat to God; human righteousness is no gift to Him (35:1-16).
- E. God is just, all wise, mysterious, and sovereign over humans and nature (36:1-37:24).

VII. Dialogue: Prove Your Wisdom Is Sufficient to Contend with the Eternal Creator (38:1-42:6).

- A. God: Can you control the inanimate and animate creation? (38:1-39:30).
- B. Job: I am overwhelmed and powerless to answer (40:1-5).
- C. God: Will you condemn God to justify yourself? (40:6-9).
- D. God: Take charge of the universe. (40:10-14).
- E. Two inexplicable creatures illustrate God's unfathomable ways (40:15-41:34).
- F. Job: Seeing God, I confess His power and repent of sin (42:1-6).

VIII. Epilogue: Prayer Brings Reconciliation, Forgiveness, and Restoration (42:7-17).

JOBAB (Jo' bab) Personal name, perhaps meaning "wilderness" or "arm oneself for battle." 1. Son of Joktan in Table of Nations lineage of Noah's son Shem (Gen. 10:29). He was thus the original ancestor of a Semite tribe, probably in southern Arabia. 2. Early king of Edom centered in Bozrah (Gen. 36:33). 3. King of city-state of Madon who joined Jabin of Hazor in northern coalition against Joshua (Josh. 11:1). 4. Two members of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:9,18).

JOCHEBED (Jōk' ə bēd) Personal name meaning "Yahweh's glory." In Exod. 6:20 the wife of Amram and the mother of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses. She was a member of the tribe of Levi. Her name includes the divine name Yahweh, evidence that the name Yahweh was known before the time of Moses. See Moses.

JODA (Jō' də) Greek transliteration of either Jehuda (KJV "Juda") or Joyada. An ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:26).

JOED (Jō' ēd) Personal name meaning "Yah is witness." Member of tribe of Benjamin (Neh. 11:7).

JOEL (Jō' ēl) Personal name meaning "Yah is God." 1. Son of Samuel who became an evil judge, leading Israel's leaders to ask Samuel to give them a king, thus introducing kingship as a form of government for Israel. Samuel argued strongly against this but to no avail (1 Sam. 8; cp. 1 Chron. 6:33). 2. Levite (1 Chron. 6:36). 3. Member(s) of tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:4,8). 4. Leader among the Levites under David (1 Chron. 15:7,11,17), who brought the ark of the covenant up to Jerusalem (cp. 1 Chron. 23:8; 26:22 for Levites named Joel). 5. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:35). 6. Leader of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:12). 7. Leader of tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3). 8. Military hero under David (1 Chron. 11:38; cp. Igal in 2 Sam. 23:36). 9. Leader of the western half of the tribe of Manasseh under David (1 Chron. 27:20). 10. Levite who helped King Hezekiah cleanse the temple about 715 B.C. (2 Chron. 29:12). 11. Israelite Ezra condemned for having a foreign wife who might lead the nation to worship other gods (Ezra 10:43). 12. Leader of the people from tribe of Benjamin living in Jerusalem in time of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:9). 13. Prophet whose preaching ministry produced the book of Joel. Personal information concerning the prophet is minimal, only that he was the son of Pethuel, about whom we know nothing. That the prophet lived in Jerusalem is probable because of his avid interest in the city, his repeated references to Zion, his call to the people to assemble for worship, and his interest in the temple rituals and sacrifices.

His use of the popular formula, "The word of the Lord came," demonstrates his devotion as God's prophet. Distinguishing himself from the priests, he respectfully urged them to lead the people in repentance. As many as 20 references to and quotations from other prophets attest to his position in the prophetic ministry.

JOEL, BOOK OF Containing only 73 verses, the book of Joel is one of the shortest in the OT, comprising only three chapters in our English translations. The first of two natural divisions, the earlier section (1:1-2:17) describes a terrible locust plague concluding with a plea for confession of sins. The second section (2:18-3:21), written in the form of a first-person response from God, proclaims hope for the repentant people coupled with judgment upon their enemies.

An unprecedented locust plague was symbolic of the coming Day of the Lord. The insects, depicted in their four stages of development, moved through the land in successive swarms, utterly destroying everything in their path. Farmers were denied a harvest. Animals desperately roamed the wasteland groaning and perishing for lack of food. Drunkards cried out for a little taste of wine. Because priests could not find enough offerings for sacrifice, altars were empty. Drought and famine followed the locust infiltration. Vegetation was stripped; the weather was hot; water was scarce. All God's creation suffered because of the sinfulness of His people.

Priests were urged to call for fasting and prayer (2:15-17). Only God's grace could avert annihilation. Then, on the basis of their repentance, God answered that He would show pity and remove their plague (2:18-27).

As a result of their return to God, His people were promised the presence of God's Spirit among them. Locusts were used to tell about a greater Day of the Lord in the future. Judgment was pronounced against Phoenicia and Philistia (3:4) and eventually upon all nations as they were judged by God in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, which literally means “The Lord judges” (3:2,12). Judah faced unparalleled prosperity, but Egypt and Edom (traditional enemies) could look for terrible punishment (3:18-19). The Lord triumphed over his enemies in order that all shall “know that I am the LORD your God” (3:17 NASB; cp. 2:27).

Opinions differ regarding the date of the book. Internal evidence makes it clear that the priests were in a position of strong authority; the temple was standing; sacrifices were considered important; and certain foreign nations stood condemned. No mention was made of the world empires of Assyria or Babylonia. No reference was made to the Northern Kingdom of Israel; neither is the name of a king mentioned.

Two approximate dates generally are given as the possible times of the authorship of the book, either before the exile around the time of the boy-king Joash (about 836-796 B.C.) or after the return from exile (about 500-400 B.C.). The position of the book among the early prophets in the Hebrew canon is considered evidence for an early date. Also the omission of a king's name would be appropriate if a young boy such as Joash had not achieved maturity.

In favor of the late date, strong arguments are given. The returning exiles, comprising a small group in Jerusalem, centered their worship in the temple. Sacrifices were important. Emphasis on ethical living, so characteristic of preexilic prophets such as Amos and Micah, was lacking. Idolatry and the high places were not mentioned, suggesting that they were no longer a serious problem. After the exile there would be no need for announcing the coming destruction of Assyria and Babylon. There would be no need to mention a king. Citation of the Grecian slave traffic (3:4-6) fits a late period. References to the scattering of the Israelites (3:2-6) would apply to an exilic period, and the use of the term “Israel” to refer to Judah (2:27; 3:2) would have been appropriate in postexilic times. In addition, the style and language reflects the period after the exile when the prophetic emphasis was beginning to give way to the apocalyptic.

Some early theologians viewed the entire book as an allegory with the locusts representing four heathen nations that opposed God's people. Few scholars hold to such an interpretation today. Other biblical students have seen in the book primarily a prediction of future events and have related it to certain apocalyptic literature of the NT (Rev. 9:3-11). Most scholars, however, accept the description of the locust plague as a literal invasion which the prophet used as a point of reference to speak to the people of his own day about the coming Day of the Lord, at the same time incorporating predictive elements concerning the messianic age.

Primary teachings of the book of Joel are , numerous. (1) The Creator and Redeemer God of all the universe is in complete control of nature and can use calamities to bring His people to repentance. (2) All of God's creation is interdependent. People, animals, and vegetation all suffer when people sin. (3) Whereas the Jews considered the Day of the Lord as a time of punishment upon their enemies, Joel made it clear that although God controls the destinies of other nations, His people, with a responsibility to live in accordance with their relationship with Him, are not exempt from His vengeance. (4) The God of judgment also is a God of mercy who stands ready to redeem and restore when His people come before Him in repentance. (5) Of special significance is the forward look to a time when the Spirit of God would be present upon all people. All could become prophets, with no exclusions, no go-betweens, and all could know His salvation. On the day of Pentecost, Peter proclaimed that the new day of Spirit-filled people had arrived as it had been announced earlier by the Prophet Joel (Acts 2:17-21).

Outline

- I. The Day of the Lord Calls for God's People to Respond (1:1-2:17).
 - A. Witness to future generations (1:1-4).
 - B. Mourn and grieve over the destruction (1:5-20).
 - C. Sound the alarm because the Day of the Lord is dreadful (2:1-11).
 - D. Repent inwardly because your gracious, patient God may have pity (2:12-14).
 - E. Assemble the congregation for mourning and repentance (2:15-17).

- II. God Will Respond to His People's Mourning and Repentance (2:18-27).
 - A. God will have pity (2:18).
 - B. God will provide food needs and remove shame from His people (2:19).
 - C. God will defeat the enemy (2:20).
 - D. God will replace fear and shame with joy and praise (2:21-26).
 - E. God will cause His people to know and worship Him and Him alone (2:27).
- III. God Is Preparing a Great Day of Salvation (2:28-3:21).
 - A. God will pour out His Spirit to bring salvation to the remnant (2:28-32).
 - B. God will judge all nations (3:1-17).
 - C. God will bless His people (3:18-21).

JOELAH (Jō ē' lah) Personal name meaning “female mountain goat.” Warrior from Saul's tribe of Benjamin who joined David at Ziklag as he fled from Saul (1 Chron. 12:7). Early manuscripts and translations give various forms of the name such as Jaalah and Azriel.

JOEZER (Jō ē' zēr) Personal name meaning “Yah is help.” Warrior from Saul's tribe of Benjamin who joined David at Ziklag as he fled from Saul (1 Chron. 12:6).

JOGBEHAH (Jōg' bə hāh) Place-name meaning “height, little hill.” City east of the Jordan where Gideon defeated Zeba and Zalmunna, kings of Midian (Judg. 8:11). Its location is modern Khirbet el-Jubeihat 20 miles southeast of the Jordan and seven miles northwest of Amman. The tribe of Gad rebuilt it and settled it (Num. 32:35).

JOGLI (Jōg' li) Personal name meaning “He reveals.” Father of Bukki, who represented tribe of Dan in distributing the promised land (Num. 34:22).

JOHA (Jō' hā) Apparently a short form of the personal name Johanan meaning “Yahweh is merciful.” 1. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron.

8:16). 2. Military hero in David's army (1 Chron. 11:45).

JOHANAN (Jō hā' nān) Short form of personal name Jehohanan meaning "Yahweh is merciful." 1. Military leader among Jews who remained in Judah immediately after the exile began in 586 B.C. (2 Kings 25:23). He led the effort against Ishmael, who had assassinated Gedaliah, the governor Babylon appointed over Judah. Johanan led the people into Egypt to escape Babylonian retaliation. He forced Jeremiah to go with them, refusing to follow Jeremiah's word from God (Jer. 40-43). 2. High priest about 411 B.C. known in the Elephantine papyri as Jehohanan but in Neh. 12:22-23 as Johanan. He was high priest at the time that Nehemiah's list of priests was compiled. Some interpreters would say that Jonathan (Neh. 12:11) is a copyist's error for Johanan, but this is not likely. Others would equate this Johanan with Jehohanan of Ezra 10:6 (note the KJV equation of names despite difference in Hebrew spelling), but Ezra does not indicate Jehohanan was high priest. See Jehohanan. 3. High priest whom Josephus, the early Jewish historian, says murdered his brother named Jesus, perhaps under Artaxerxes III Ochus (358-338 B.C.). 4. Eldest son of Josiah (1 Chron. 3:15). We know nothing else of this royal son who for some reason did not become king. 5. Descendant of David in the postexilic period about 445 B.C. (1 Chron. 3:24). 6. High priest in the early period of Israel's monarchy (1 Chron. 6:9-10). His son Azariah was high priest under Solomon (cp. 1 Kings 4:2). 7. Member of Saul's tribe of Benjamin who joined David at Ziklag when he fled from Saul (1 Chron. 12:4). 8. Member of tribe of Gad who joined David at Ziklag, demonstrating that the people east of the Jordan supported him (1 Chron. 12:12). 9. Man who led a group going with Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem about 458 B.C. (Ezra 8:12).

JOHN Greek form of Hebrew name Yohanan.

John the apostle Son of Zebedee, the brother of James. Harmonizing Matt. 27:56 with Mark 15:40 suggests that John's mother was Salome. If she was also the sister of Jesus' mother (John 19:25), then John was Jesus' first cousin. This string of associations is so conjectural, though, that we cannot be sure of it. Because James is usually mentioned first when the two brothers are identified, some have also conjectured that John was the younger of the two.

The sons of Zebedee were among the first disciples called (Matt. 4:21-22; Mark 1:19-20). They were fishermen on the Sea of Galilee and probably lived in Capernaum. Their father was sufficiently prosperous to have “hired men” (Mark 1:20), and Luke 5:10 states that James and John were “Simon's partners.”

John is always mentioned in the first four in the lists of the Twelve (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:17; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). John is also among the “inner three” who were with Jesus on special occasions in the Synoptic Gospels: the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark 5:37), the transfiguration (Mark 9:2), and the garden of Gethsemane (Mark 14:32-33). Andrew joined these three when they asked Jesus about the signs of the coming destruction of Jerusalem (Mark 13:3).

The sons of Zebedee were given the surname Boanerges, “sons of thunder” (Mark 3:17). When a Samaritan village refused to receive Jesus, they asked, “Lord, do You want us to call down fire from heaven to consume them?” (Luke 9:54 HCSB). The only words in the Synoptic Gospels attributed specifically to John are: “Teacher, we saw someone driving out demons in Your name and we tried to stop him because he wasn't following us” (Mark 9:38 HCSB; Luke 9:49). On another occasion the two brothers asked to sit in places of honor, on Jesus' left and right in His glory (Mark 10:35-41; cp. Matt. 20:20-24). On each of these occasions Jesus challenged or rebuked John. Luke 22:8 identifies Peter and John as the two disciples who were sent to prepare the Passover meal for Jesus and the disciples.

The Apostle John appears four times in the book of Acts, and each time he is with Peter (1:13; 3:1-11; 4:13-20; 8:14). After Peter healed the man, they were arrested, imprisoned, and then released. They were “uneducated and untrained men” (Acts 4:13 HCSB), but they answered their accusers boldly: “we are unable to stop speaking about what we have seen and heard” (Acts 4:20). Later, John and Peter were sent to Samaria to confirm the conversion of Samaritans (8:14).

Paul mentioned John only once: “James, Cephas [Simon Peter], and John, recognized as pillars” of the church agreed that Paul and Barnabas would go to the Gentiles, while they would work among the Jews (Gal. 2:9).

The Gospel of John does not mention James or John by name, and it contains only one reference to the sons of Zebedee (21:2). An unnamed disciple who with Andrew had been one of John the Baptist's disciples is mentioned in John 1:35, and an unnamed disciple helped Peter gain access to the house of the high priest in John 18:15-16. The disciple in these verses may have been the beloved disciple, who reclined with Jesus during the Last Supper (13:23-26), stood at the cross with Jesus' mother (19:25-27), ran with Peter to the empty tomb (20:2-10), and recognized the risen Lord after the great catch of fish (21:7). The need to clarify what Jesus had said about the death of the beloved disciple (21:20-23) probably indicates that the beloved disciple had died by the time the Gospel of John was put in final form by the editor who speaks in John 21:24-25 and attributes the Gospel to this beloved disciple.

Five books of the NT have been attributed to John the apostle: the Gospel, three letters, and Revelation. In each case, the traditional view that the apostle was the author of these books can be traced to writers in the second century. Neither the Gospel nor the letters identify their author by name. The author of Revelation identifies himself as “John” (1:1,4,9; 22:8) but does not further identify himself. Much of the weight of the traditional view of the authorship of the Gospel rests on the testimony of Irenaeus, bishop of Lugdunum in Gaul (A.D. 130-200). This tradition fits the details of the Gospel, however. It also has historical credibility in that Irenaeus was from Asia Minor when he is said to have encountered Polycarp of Smyrna, who claimed to have been taught by the Apostle John.

Legends about the apostle continued to develop long after his death. According to tradition, John lived to an old age in Ephesus, where he preached love and fought heresy, especially the teachings of Cerinthus. The tomb of John was the site of a fourth-century church over which Justinian built the splendid basilica of St. John. The ruins of this basilica are still visible in Ephesus today.

The Apocryphon of John is an early gnostic work that purports to contain a vision of the Apostle John. Copies were found among the codices at Nag Hammadi. The work itself must go back at least to the second century because Irenaeus quoted from it.

The Acts of John is a third-century apocryphal writing which records miraculous events, John's journey to Rome, his exile on Patmos, accounts of several journeys, and a detailed account of John's death. In theology this work is Docetic, and it was eventually condemned by the Second Nicene Council in 787.

The Apostle John also has a place in the martyrologies of the medieval church. A fifth-century writer, Philip of Side, and George the Sinner, of the ninth century, report that Papias (second century) wrote that James and John were killed by the Jews (Acts 12:2), but these reports are generally dismissed as fabrications based on interpretations of Mark 10:39. See John, Gospel of; John, Letters from; Revelation, Book of.

John the Baptist Prophet from a priestly family, who preached a message of repentance, announced the coming of the Messiah, baptized Jesus, and was beheaded by Herod Antipas.

Luke 1:5-80 records the birth of John the Baptist in terms similar to the birth of Isaac. Zechariah, John's father, was a priest from the division of Abijah. Elizabeth, his mother, was a descendant of Aaron. The angel Gabriel announced John's birth, while Zechariah was burning incense in the temple. John would not drink wine or strong drink. He would be filled with the Holy Spirit, and as a prophet he would have the spirit and power of Elijah. His role would be to prepare the Lord's people for the coming of the Messiah.

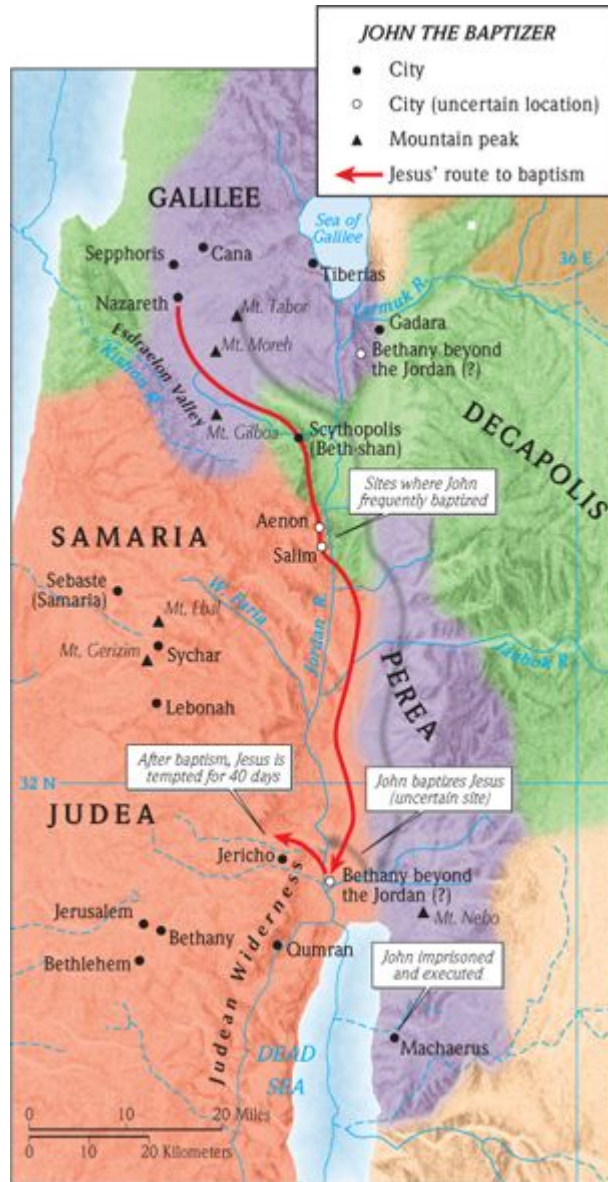

Mark 1:3-4 records that John was in the wilderness until the time of his public ministry. There he ate locusts and wild honey. He wore the dress of a prophet, camel's hair and a leather girdle (Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6; cp. 2 Kings 1:8). Because of his life in the wilderness, his priestly background, his preaching of repentance to Israel, and his practice of baptism, it is often suggested that John grew up among the Essenes at Qumran. This theory is attractive, but it cannot be confirmed. Neither can the origin of John's practice of baptizing be traced with certainty. Washings had long been part of Jewish piety, and by the time of John, Gentile converts to Judaism washed themselves as a form of ceremonial cleansing. The Essenes at Qumran practiced ritual washings and had an elaborate procedure for admission to the community. John's baptism may owe something to the Essene practices, but we cannot determine the extent of this influence.

According to Luke, John began his ministry around the Jordan River in the 15th year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar (Luke 3:1-3), which must have been A.D. 26 or 27 (according to the most common NT chronology). John's preaching emphasized the coming judgment, the need for repentance, and the coming of the Messiah. Luke also emphasizes the ethical teachings of John: he called the multitudes a "brood of vipers" (Luke 3:7); one who had two coats should give one to a person who had none; tax collectors were warned to collect no more than their due; and soldiers were instructed to rob no one and "be satisfied with your wages" (Luke 3:10-14 HCSB).

Jesus was baptized by John, a fact that all the evangelists except Mark attempted to explain. Matthew 3:15 explains that it was "to fulfill all righteousness." Luke recorded that John was thrown in prison before recording that Jesus also was baptized (3:20-21), and John told of the baptism of Jesus but only through the testimony of John the Baptist himself. Thus, the witness of John the Baptist to Jesus is featured, deflecting any possibility that later followers of the Baptist might argue that John was superior to Jesus (Matt. 3:11-12; Mark 1:7-8; Luke 3:15-17; John 1:15,19-36).

Various sayings give us glimpses of John's ministry. His disciples practiced fasting (Mark 2:18), and he taught them to pray (Luke 11:1). John was vigorous in his attacks on Herod. In contrast to Herod's household he lived an austere existence (Matt. 11:7-9). Some criticized John for his ascetic lifestyle (Matt. 11:16-19), but Jesus praised John as the greatest of the prophets (Matt. 11:11). John's popularity with the people is reflected in Matt. 21:31-32; Mark 11:27-32; Luke 7:29-30; John 10:41.

In an account that parallels the NT closely, Josephus stated that Herod Antipas arrested John and subsequently executed him at Machaerus because he feared that John's extensive influence over the people might lead to an uprising. Many believed that the defeat of Herod's armies by the Nabateans was God's judgment on Herod for the death of John the Baptist. While John was in prison, he sent two of his disciples to inquire whether Jesus was the coming One (Matt. 11:2-3; Luke 7:18-23). John's death is recorded in detail in Mark 6:14-29.

According to the Gospel of John, the ministry of Jesus overlapped with that of John (3:22-24; cp. Mark 1:14), and some of Jesus' first disciples had also been disciples of John the Baptist (John 1:35-37). Jesus even identified John with the eschatological role of Elijah (Matt. 17:12-13; Mark 9:12-13).

John's movement did not stop with his death. Indeed, some believed that Jesus was John, raised from the dead (Mark 6:14-16; 8:27-28). Years later a group of John's followers were found around Ephesus, among them the eloquent Apollos (Acts 18:24-19:7), and for centuries John's influence survived among the Mandeans who claimed to perpetuate his teachings. See Baptism.

Others A relative of Annas, the high priest, was also called John (unless manuscripts reading Jonathan are right) as well as John Mark who wrote the second Gospel. See Annas; Mark, John. R. Alan Culpepper

JOHN, GOSPEL OF Fourth Gospel account of the NT, distinct from the Synoptic Gospels, Matthew, Mark, and Luke.

Author Early Christian tradition indicates this Gospel was written by John, the disciple and son of Zebedee. The Gospel claims to have been written by the beloved disciple, an unnamed figure so designated only in this Gospel (21:20-24). John, son of Zebedee, is almost certainly the beloved disciple and author of this Gospel, but some doubts remain since John is not mentioned by name.

Distinct from Synoptics The Gospel of John is different from the three Synoptic Gospels. First, John omits events and references that are extremely important in the others. John does not describe the baptism of Jesus or the breaking of the bread and giving of the cup at the Last Supper. Jesus refers to the kingdom of God only in one conversation in John (3:3-6), whereas the kingdom was a central topic of Jesus' preaching in the Synoptics. Jesus performs no exorcisms in John or healing of lepers. Whereas Jesus performs many miracles, usually in front of crowds in the Synoptics, John records seven “signs” which point to Jesus' identity. John records none of the parables that are a mainstay of Jesus' preaching in the Synoptics. Second, Jesus' ministry in John features conversations with individuals such as Nicodemus (John 3), the Samaritan woman (John 4), and the disciples in the upper room (John 13-17). John does not record much of Jesus' public preaching.

John has much information that the Synoptics leave out. Over 90 percent of John is unique. Jesus makes at least four visits to Jerusalem (2:13; 5:1; 7:10; 12:12). The Synoptics record only one. The raising of Lazarus is recorded only in John. While John omits references to the bread and cup at the supper, he records the washing of the disciples' feet. Jesus is called the “Lamb of God” only in John, a reference that recurs only in Revelation.

The most significant additions John makes concern Jesus' identity and the nature of proper response to him. First, John emphasizes the deity of Jesus from the beginning of his Gospel. The prologue affirms that He is the eternal Word (logos) who was both with God and was God. Jesus is the Word incarnate (1:14). Jesus uses the significant phrase “I am” seven times in John, claiming the personal name of God as His own. In John, Jesus is always in charge and knows what will happen in advance. For example, John states that Jesus knew what Judas would do all along (6:71). Jesus informed Pilate that he would have no power over Him “if it hadn't been given you from above” (19:11 HCSB).

Second, Jesus' teaching focuses on life, eternal and abundant, which is the present possession of those who believe (3:16; 10:10). Eternal life is knowing God and Jesus Christ (17:3). Further knowledge of God comes from believing and knowing Jesus. Knowing and believing are key terms for John. Both occur over 90 times in this Gospel and are always used as verbs. Jesus' teaching in John reminds us that knowing God and believing in Jesus are expressed in action. Furthermore, while belief in Jesus may be based on the signs, Jesus' followers are to move to a deeper kind of faith. He wants them to believe in His Word (8:31 ;cp. 2:23-25).

Context Many scholars think a community following the teachings of the beloved disciple experienced two significant movements by the time John was written. First was a significant interest in persons expelled from synagogues for belief in Jesus while He ministered on earth (9:22; cp. 12:42; 16:2). Most scholars believe this interest indicates these later believers had similar experiences, perhaps while living in Judea or adjacent areas. These Jewish believers found comfort in knowing they were not the first to be expelled for their trust in Jesus. Second, the philosophical overtones of portions of John indicate that some recent challenges to the community came from those who, for philosophical reasons, either rejected the incarnation or the significance of the incarnation. This threat, sometimes referred to as “Docetism,” seems to have become a problem by the time 1 John was written. John affirms that Jesus was both the eternal Word, which existed from the beginning, and that He really was flesh. The Gospel of John provides support for the doctrine that Jesus was both fully God and fully human.

Content John is divided into two main parts. In the first section (2-11) the focus is on both Jesus' ministry to “the world” and the signs He performed. Jesus performs seven signs that meet with varying responses. The disciples see the signs and believe (2:11). Some see the signs and still reject Jesus, as is illustrated by those who knew of the raising of Lazarus and yet did not believe (11:47). Moreover, there are some like Nicodemus who seem to be “secret believers” (3:1-2; 7:50-51).

The second major section (12-21) reveals Jesus' teaching to His disciples and the triumphant “hour” of His passion. Jesus instructs His followers that they will experience the presence of another Comforter (or “Paraclete”), the Holy Spirit. The disciples must live out their love for Him in obedience to Him. They must live as He lived. He is the good shepherd, and they are His flock. His flock will hear His voice and follow Him. True believers are those who obey Jesus. He is the vine and they are the branches. Their life and unity is found in Him. Further, they must be known for their love for one another, sacrificial love, and even laying down of one's life for others.

John's record of the passion focuses on Jesus' control of the events. He has to instruct His adversaries on how to arrest Him (18:4-8). Pilate struggles with his decision, but Jesus knows what will happen. Jesus dies as the Lamb and is sacrificed at the very time lambs were being sacrificed for Passover (19:14).

John originally may have ended with 20:30-31. In the “epilogue” (21) we are told of the restoration of Peter and the prediction of his death. The rumor that John was not to die before the second coming is also refuted.

Purpose John wrote to assure fearful believers that they must believe Jesus and the words that He spoke. Further, he calls on others who sense a spiritual thirst to come to the One who gives the life-giving water. In Him one finds light, life, and love. JOHN, LETTERS FROM Three letters in the “General Epistles” section that, though technically anonymous, are attributed to John, the apostle.

Authorship Tradition has ascribed authorship of these three letters to the Apostle John, son of Zebedee and the brother of James (cp. Mark 1:19-20). He is credited by many to have penned five books of the NT (also the Gospel of John and Revelation), though some doubts were raised in the early church concerning John's authorship of 2 and 3 John and Revelation. Strong similarities between the first letter from John and the Gospel of John argue for common authorship of these books. This same conclusion is reached when a comparison is made between 1 John and the latter two letters. It should be noted that no other person than John the apostle was ever suggested by the early church as the author of the first epistle. This is not so with 2 and 3 John, though he was still the overwhelming choice.

Internal Evidence The author of 1 John claims to be an eyewitness of Christ (1 John 1:1-3). Throughout the book, he writes with an authoritative tone that is virtually apostolic. In 2 and 3 John the author identifies himself as “the elder,” a title that would also convey a note of authority.

A comparison of 1 John and the Fourth Gospel reveals numerous similarities in theology, vocabulary, and syntax. There are contrasts such as: life and death; truth and falsehood; light and darkness; children of God and children of the devil; love and hate.

The term parakletos occurs only five times in Scripture and all are in the Johannine material (John 14:16,26; 15:26; 16:7; 1 John 2:1). The word monogenes as an expression of the Son's unique relationship to the Father occurs in John 1:14,18; 3:16,18; and 1 John 4:9.

External Evidence The early church was consistent in ascribing the authorship of the Fourth Gospel and 1 John to the Apostle John. Papias, who knew John (and was born ca. A.D. 60), is the first person to make a specific reference to a Johannine letter as the work of the Apostle John. Irenaeus (ca. A.D. 180) specifically makes reference to 1 and 2 John, and he clearly attributes both, as well as the Fourth Gospel, to the Apostle John. Indeed, the early Christian tradition is unanimous in ascribing 1 John to John, the disciple and apostle of the Lord.

External evidence for 2 and 3 John is not as early or strong as 1 John. This is probably because of their brevity and resulting limited circulation. A statement by Papias seems to imply the possibility of two Johns at Ephesus, the Apostle John and the elder John. However, the statement by Papias need not be interpreted as implying two Johns, and it seems that the better understanding is to see them as one and the same person. The Apostle John is the elder John. Both were appropriate designations for the last surviving member of Jesus' disciples.

Aside from the “elder John hypothesis,” however, no one ever attributed 2 and 3 John to anyone other than the Apostle John. In spite of the questions occasionally raised in the early church, the obvious similarities in vocabulary, theme, and language argue for common authorship of all three letters.

Evidence both internal and external favors the view that the Apostle John is the author of the three letters that Christian tradition has attributed to him.

Date and Place of Writing Tradition is strong that John spent his latter years in the city of Ephesus ministering to the churches of Asia Minor. It would seem reasonable to see the place of writing for the three letters also as Ephesus. Internal evidence would indicate that John was an aged man when he wrote the letters. Church tradition says John was at Ephesus, “remaining among them permanently until the time of Trajan.” Trajan reigned as Roman emperor from A.D. 98-117. This would indicate that John died toward the end of the first century, setting a terminus for his writings. A date of ca. A.D. 85-100 is reasonable.

The Occasion of 1 John First John was written to a church or group of churches in crisis—churches which were being attacked by false teaching (cp. 2:18-28; 4:1-6; 5:6-7). Some individuals who had once been associated with the Christian community had adopted heretical doctrine, particularly as it related to Christology, and had left the church (2:19). After their departure they continued to spread their teachings to those who remained within the Johannine churches. They went so far as to organize and send out itinerant teachers/missionaries who worked among the churches with the goal of converting those in the churches to their beliefs (cp. 2:26; 4:1-3; 2 John 7). This theological assault created confusion and crisis within the believing community. In response to this situation, the author penned 1 John, which has two primary objectives:

To combat the propaganda of the false teachers and to reassure the believers. To achieve the first objective John argues that these individuals are not genuine believers; they lack the marks of authentic Christianity in at least three areas.

(1) Doctrinally they have compromised the person and work of Jesus Christ. They did not confess Jesus of Nazareth as the Christ (2:22) and denied that Jesus had come in the flesh (4:2-3). Most likely, these false teachers were influenced by early gnostic ideas, a heresy that emphasized the essential goodness of spirit and the inherent evil or inferiority of all matter. These false teachers may have viewed Christ as some type of spirit, perhaps a spirit who had come upon the man Jesus during part of His ministry (from His baptism until His crucifixion, cp. 5:6-8). However, they refused to directly associate “the Christ” with the human Jesus; this refusal led to a rejection of Jesus of Nazareth as the Christ, the unique God-man. Combined with this faulty view of the person of Christ was a deficient view of His death. First John contains specific statements that emphasize the atoning results of Christ's death (2:2; 4:10). John highlights the importance of the incarnation, and he also stresses the distinctive nature of Christ's work of atonement.

(2) Morally, the false teachers minimized the seriousness of sin (1:6-10). They claimed that it was possible to have fellowship with God regardless of one's behavior (1:6). In contrast John insists that one's relationship to God has serious ethical implications (cp. 2:3-4). A genuine knowledge of and love for God demands obedience (2:3-6; 5:3).

(3) Socially, these heretics failed because their spiritual pride resulted in a lack of brotherly love (2:9,11). John will argue that love for other believers is a manifestation of genuine Christianity (3:14; 4:7-21).

John's second objective was to fortify believers in the assurance of their salvation. With the attacks of these false teachings, doubt and confusion developed among believers. What (who) were they to believe—“the traditional teachings of the apostle” or the doctrines of these false leaders? John reminds his churches of the truthfulness of Christianity that they had received in the beginning. He wants them to understand the reality of their faith so that they might know that they have eternal life (5:13). John provides his readers with tests or criteria by which they can evaluate the claims of those who have left the fellowship and with which they could reassure themselves that they were in the truth (1 John 1:5-2:2; 2:3-11; 3:7-10,14-15; 4:4-6,7-8,13-15; 5:13,18-20).

Though 1 John deals with specific problems caused by the secessionists who now evangelize for their cause, it does not indicate a specific destination (unlike 2 and 3 John). It is very probable that it was intended as a circular letter for the churches in the vicinity of Ephesus, the province of Asia Minor.

The Purpose of 1 John First John provides several keys that allow us to unlock the specific purpose(s) of this epistle. Four times in the letter John tells us why he writes:

(1) “We are writing these things so that our joy may be complete” (1:4 HCSB). (To promote in the child of God true joy.)

(2) “I am writing you these things so that you may not sin” (2:1 HCSB). (To prevent the child of God from committing sin.)

(3) “I have written these things to you about those who are trying to deceive you” (2:26 HCSB). (To protect the child of God from false teachers.)

(4) “I have written these things to you who believe in the name of the Son of God, so that you may know that you have eternal life” (5:13 HCSB). (To provide assurance of salvation for the child of God).

Theology of the Epistles The Doctrine of God John highlights two important characteristics of God. First, God is light (1 John 1:5). Second, God is love (1 John 4:8). Both of these qualities are essential attributes of God. To walk in the light is to walk in the life of God. To practice love is to demonstrate the character of God.

The Doctrine of Sin First John 3:8 states that the devil is the source of sin, for he “sinned from the beginning.” Sin in the individual is the result of the devil's hold upon a person, and victory over sin is in reality victory over the devil himself. John describes sin as darkness (1 John 1:5-7), lawlessness or rebellion (1 John 3:4), and unrighteousness (1 John 5:17). Sin is universal and comprehensive. Therefore every person is a sinner and commits sins (1 John 1:8,10).

The Doctrine of Christology Jesus is presented as the Son of God, and the reality of the incarnation of the preexistent Word is stressed. Twenty-one times Jesus is called the Son in 1 John and twice in 2 John. John states that the Son “was with the Father” and is Himself the “life” of God (1 John 1:1-3, cp. John 1:1-5). Jesus is the “true God and eternal life” (1 John 5:20), a direct affirmation of the Son's deity. He was sinless (1 John 3:5), and He made atonement for the sins of the whole world (1 John 2:2, 4:10). He destroyed the devil's work (1 John 3:8), accomplishing all of this by His death (1 John 5:6). His death was a demonstration of the Father's love (1 John 4:9-11) for sinful humanity. He could do all of this because He took on tangible, real human flesh (1 John 1:1-3). The incarnation was a true and genuine wedding of perfect deity and sinless humanity.

The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit The Spirit witnesses to the believer concerning the true teaching about Jesus the Christ (1 John 2:27; 5:7-8). The Spirit Himself is a gift of anointing. He has been given to the believer (3:24) and enables him to overcome the world (4:4). As the Spirit of truth (4:6), He helps the believer to recognize the false prophets who speak and teach wrongly concerning Jesus.

The Doctrine of Salvation The redemptive work of Jesus Christ has made possible our salvation (1 John 2:2; 3:16; 4:10). By believing and receiving the Son (1 John 5:10-13) one is born again (1 John 5:1), becomes a child of God (1 John 3:1-2), and receives the gift of eternal life. Through the new birth we are enabled to do “what is right” (2:29). We may commit individual acts of sin (1:8,10; 2:1), but we will not habitually live in sin (3:6-9). In salvation God has come to live (abide) in us and we in God (4:15-16).

The Doctrine of Eschatology John lived in the expectancy that the parousia was imminent. He said, “It is the last hour” (2:18 HCSB). The evidence included the presence of “many antichrists.” John also looked to the eschatological coming of Antichrist as well (2:18; 4:3). John sees the world as already passing away (2:17), indicating that the victory of Christ won at the cross is already underway, yet it awaits a final and climactic consummation. The day of judgment is coming (4:17). Those who live in God and He in them will have confidence in that day and no fear (4:18). When He comes, our transformation will be made complete for “we know that when He appears, we will be like Him, because we will see Him as He is” (3:2 HCSB). Assured of a right standing before God through faith in His Son who provided atonement for sin, we love God and others, and with this hope in us, we purify ourselves, just as He is pure (3:3).

Canonicity The canonicity of 1 John was never questioned. Second and Third John were viewed as antilegomena or disputed. It is likely the books were not widely circulated due to their private nature and brevity, and as a result, they were not well-known among the churches. Athanasius included them in his 39th Paschal Letter (A.D. 367), and the Council of Carthage (A.D. 397) accepted them as canonical.

Structure and Form of 1 John The genre of 1 John is something of an enigma. It is the least letterlike in the absence of the identification of the sender or an address to any recipients except the non-specific “little children.” It is more like a tract or treatise intended to address a particular situation. Its dominant themes are reoccurring, and no definitive analysis of its structure and form has been offered. The twin themes of “light” and “love” are central. The book itself is exhortative as John challenges his readers to follow his instruction.

Outline of 1 John

- I. Prologue: The Word of Life (1:1-4)
- II. God Is Light (1:5-3:10)
 - A. Walk in the Light (1:5-2:2)
 - 1. God is Light (1:5-7)
 - 2. Resist sin (1:8-2:2)
 - B. Obey the command to love (2:3-11)
 - 1. Know God and keep His commands (2:3-6)
 - 2. Learn the new command and love others (2:7-11)

- C. Know your spiritual status (2:12-14)
- D. Be warned of enemies of the faith (2:15-27)
 - 1. Beware of the world (2:15-17)
 - 2. Beware of the antichrists (2:18-27)
- E. Live like children of God (2:28-3:10)
 - 1. Be confident and ready for His coming (2:28-3:3)
 - 2. Be righteous and do not sin (3:4-10)
- III. God Is Love (3:11-5:12)
 - A. Love one another: part one (3:11-24)
 - 1. Love in action (3:11-18)
 - 2. Live in confidence (3:19-24)
 - B. Test the spirits (4:1-6)
 - C. Love one another: part two (4:7-21)
 - 1. Love others because God loves you (4:7-10)
 - 2. Love others because God lives in you (4:11-21)
 - D. Obey God and experience the victory of faith (5:1-5)
 - E. Believe in the Son and enjoy eternal life (5:6-12)
- IV. Conclusion: The Confidence and Characteristics of the Child of God (5:13-21)
 - A. Know you have eternal life (5:13)
 - B. Be confident in prayer (5:14-17)
 - C. Do not continue in sin (5:18-20)
 - D. Keep yourself from idols (5:21)

Second John Second John is the second shortest book in the NT. It is only 245 words in the Greek text, and it would easily fit on a single piece of papyrus. Today we might call it (and 3 John) a “postcard epistle.” It is an excellent example of hortatory (or exhortation) discourse. The elect lady, most likely a reference to a local church, must continue to walk in the truth, love one another, and be on guard against false teachers (the deceiver and the antichrist of v. 7). They must not extend hospitality to those who deny “the coming of Jesus Christ in the flesh” (v. 7 HCSB).

The letter follows the normal epistolary pattern of the NT period with opening (salutation), body, and closing. There are only two imperatives in the epistle: “watch yourselves” (blepete) in verse 8 and “do not receive”

(lambanete) in verse 10. However, “love one another” in verse 5 virtually bears an imperatival force.

John builds this epistle around key words that tie the letter together. In this short letter of 13 verses, John repeatedly uses “truth” (five times), “love” (four times), “commandment” (four times), “walk” (three times), “teaching” (three times), and “children” (three times). He also utilizes a very rare word, “antichrist,” which appears in Scripture only in 1 and 2 John (1 John 2:18,22; 4:3; 2 John 7), as a term describing false teachers.

John tells his children to (1) walk in the truth, (2) obey the commandments, (3) love one another, and (4) guard the teachings of Christ and they will not be deceived by the antichrist (v. 7). The spiritual safety of the believing community is confidently affirmed, as John begins and ends his letter with a reference to their chosen position (vv. 1,13).

Outline of 2 John

- I. Love the Truth (1-3)
 - A. Embrace the truth (1-2)
 - B. Enjoy the truth (3)
- II. Live the Truth (4-6)
 - A. Be concerned with what you believe (creed) (4)
 - B. Be concerned with how you behave (conduct) (5-6)
- III. Look for the Truth (7-11)
 - A. Recognize the deceptive (7)
 - B. Resist the destructive (8)
 - C. Reprove the destitute (9)
 - D. Reject the dangerous (10-11)
- IV. Long for the Truth (12-13)
 - A. Experience the fullness of joy (12)
 - B. Experience the fellowship of the family (13)

Third John Third John is the shortest book in both the NT and the Bible. It is only 219 words in the Greek text. It and 2 John are rightly described as “twin epistles,” though they are rightly viewed as fraternal and not identical. There are some significant similarities worth noting:

- (1) The author describes himself as “the elder” (2 John 1; 3 John 1).
- (2) The recipients are those whom he loves “in truth”(2 John 1; 3 John 1).
- (3) The recipients are the occasion of great rejoicing “I was very glad” (2 John 4; 3 John 3).
- (4) The recipients are “walking in the truth” (2 John 4; 3 John 3).
- (5) The elder has received good reports about both (2 John 4; 3 John 3,5).
- (6) Both letters contain a warning (2 John 8; 3 John 9-11).
- (7) The elder desires to see both face to face (2 John 12; 3 John 14).
- (8) Others sent their greetings (2 John 13; 3 John 14).

Third John is a personal letter that revolves around three individuals: Gaius (the recipient), Diotrephes (the troubler), and Demetrius (probably the bearer of the letter). Like 2 John it follows closely the ancient epistolary form. It contains a word of exhortation to Gaius encouraging him not to imitate the bad example of Diotrephes but to continue the good work he is doing of receiving and supporting the traveling teachers/missionaries. The letter follows the basic epistolary pattern with an introduction (vv. 1-4), body (vv. 5-12), and a conclusion (vv. 13-14).

Though verses 1-4 clearly function as the salutation, it is possible to outline the letter for teaching purposes around the four (counting the elder) personalities of the book. Verses 1-8 contain a multifold commendation of Gaius. Verses 9-10 condemn the highhanded and malicious autocracy of Diotrephes. Verses 11-12, taken as a unit, praise the godly Demetrius. Verses 13-14 close with a glimpse into the heart of the elder. Four men and their reputations (growing out of their behavior) is the sum and substance of 3 John. John again constructs this letter with the building blocks of key word repetition: “beloved” (4; vv. 1,2,5,11; “dear” HCSB); “truth” or “true”

(7; vv. 1,3 [twice]; 4,8,12 [twice]). The elder is understandably concerned that his authority is being challenged. He fears the power play of Diotrephes may succeed and that others might be influenced by him. He will come if necessary for a face-to-face meeting where he will personally deal with the situation. In the meantime John seeks to enlist the support of Gaius. He praises him for his past performance and encourages him to keep it up. Demetrius comes to Gaius both as the bearer of the letter and a reinforcement in the crisis. Third John provides insight into a personality conflict that arose at the end of the first century and the strategy adopted by the elder to resolve it.

Outline of 3 John

- I. Gaius Is a Commendable Christian (1-8)
 - A. Live spiritually (1-2)
 - B. Walk truthfully (3-4)
 - C. Serve faithfully (5-6)
 - D. Minister generously (7-8)
- II. Diotrephes Is a Conceited Christian (9-10)
 - A. Do not be driven by prideful ambition (9a)
 - B. Do not display pompous arrogance (9b)
 - C. Do not deliver perverse accusations (10a)
 - D. Do not dominate with profane activity (10b)
- III. Demetrius Is a Consistent Christian (11-12)
 - A. Pursue a godly example (11)
 - B. Possess a good testimony (12)
- IV. John Is a Caring Christian (13-14)
 - A. Desire the presence of fellow believers (13)
 - B. Desires peace for fellow believers (14)

JOIADA [Joi á da] Short form of personal name Jehoiada meaning “Yah knows.” 1. Man who helped repair the old gate of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:6; KJV, Jehoiada). 2. High priest about 425 B.C. (Neh. 12:10-11,22). Ezra suspected one of his sons, who married Sanballat's daughter, of being a traitor (Neh. 13:28). Such marriage of a high priest's family with a foreigner violated Jewish law (Lev. 21:14). See Sanballat

JOIAKIM (Jōi' á kím) Short form of Jehoiakim meaning “Yah has established, set up, delivered.” Son of Jeshua and high priest of Israel about 510 B.c. (Neh. 12:10,12,26).

JOIARIB (Jōi á rīb) Short form of Jehoiarib meaning “Yah establishes justice.” See Jehoiarib. 1. Member of group that Ezra sent to get Levites to accompany him on return from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16). Many interpreters think Joiarib is a copyist's duplication of Jarib earlier in the verse. See Jarib. 2. Ancestor of member of tribe of Judah who lived in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 11:5). 3. Father of priest who lived in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 11:10). 4. Priest who returned to Jerusalem from Babylonian exile about 537 B.C. with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:6). 5. Leading priestly family after return from exile (Neh. 12:19).

JOKDEAM (Jōk' dā ām) Place-name meaning “the people burned.” City in tribal territory of Judah, possibly modern Khirbet Raqqa near Ziph (Josh. 15:56).

JOKIM (Jō' kím) Short form of personal name Jehoiakim meaning “Yah has established or delivered.” An early member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron.4:22).

JOKMEAM (Jōk' mā ām) or JOKNEAM (Jōk' nā ām) Place-name meaning “He establishes the people” or “the Kinsman establishes or delivers.” 1. Border city of fifth district of Solomon's kingdom (1 Kings 4:12; KJV, Jokneam). Its location was probably Tell Qaimun about 18 miles south of Haifa on the northwestern corner of the Jezreel Valley. A fortress city, it protected the pass into the Plain of Sharon. It lay on the border, perhaps outside of the tribal territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:11) and was assigned the Levites (Josh. 21:34). Joshua defeated its king whose kingdom was near Mount Carmel (Josh. 12:22). Egyptian records of Thutmose III, Egyptian Pharaoh about 1504-1450 B.C., mentioned Jokmeam. 2. City of the Levites from tribe of Ephraim (1 Chron. 6:68), either omitted in list in Josh. 21:22 or to be equated with Kibzaim there. It may be located at Tell es-Simadi or Qusen west of Shechem. See Kibzaim.

JOKSHAN (Jōk' shān) Personal name meaning “trap, snare.” Son of Abraham by Keturah and ancestor of Arabian tribes in wilderness east of Jordan (Gen. 25:2-3). He links the Jews and Arabs together as belonging to a common ancestor—Abraham.

JOKTAN (Jōk' tān) Personal name meaning “watchful” or “he is small.” Son of Eber in line from Shem in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:25-26). He was original ancestor of several tribes in the Arabian Desert, particularly in Jemin. See Mesha; Sephar.

JOKTHEEL (Jōk' thə ēl) Place-name meaning “God nourishes” or “destroys.”
1. Town in Shephelah or valley of tribal allotment of Judah (Josh. 15:38). 2. King Amaziah captured Selah from Edom and renamed it Joktheel (2 Kings 14:7). It may be modern es-Sela northwest of Bozrah. See Sela.

JONA (Jō' nā) Greek transliteration of Hebrew personal name “Jonah” meaning “dove.” Father of Simon Peter (John 1:42; cp. 21:15-17).

JONADAB (Jōn' ā dāb) Short form of personal name Jehonadab meaning “Yah proves himself to be generous.” 1. David's nephew who counseled Ammon how to take advantage of Tamar (2 Sam. 13). Jonadab also advised the sorrowing David that of his sons only Ammon was dead (vv. 32-33). 2. Form used at times for Jehonadab in Jer. 35. See Jehonadab.

JONAH (Jō' nah) Personal name meaning “dove.” Jonah ben Amittai was a prophet of Israel from Gath Hopher, a village near Nazareth. He prophesied during the time of Jeroboam II (793-753 B.C.). God had earlier given Jonah the privilege of delivering the good news that Israel would experience a time of safety and prosperity (2 Kings 14:25). According to the book of Jonah God also used him against his will to deliver a warning to the pagans in Nineveh.

JONAH, BOOK OF The book of Jonah is unique among the prophets in that it is almost entirely narrative. It recounts how Jonah learned that God was much bigger than he had thought, especially in the extent of His power and His compassion.

The major power in the Middle East during Jonah's time in the early eighth century B.C. was Assyria, of which Nineveh was a major city. Since the ninth century the Assyrians had been sending savage military expeditions west into Syria-Palestine. When Jonah prophesied, however, Assyria was in a weakened state, making possible the expansion of Jeroboam II in Samaria and Uzziah in Judah. Jonah and all Israel would have been glad if Assyria had continued to disintegrate. However, Assyria regained power in the later eighth century, conquered Syria-Palestine again, and in 722 B.C. destroyed Samaria and deported its citizens.

Jonah was not pleased when God commanded him to go to Nineveh and preach repentance. The Assyrians worshipped the vicious god Ashur and a multitude of other gods and goddesses. Assyrian brutality and cruelty were legendary. The Assyrians were known to impale their enemies on stakes in front of their towns and hang their heads from trees in the king's gardens. They also tortured their captives—men, women, or children—by hacking off noses, ears, or fingers, gouging out their eyes, or tearing off their lips and hands. They reportedly covered the city wall with the skins of their victims. Rebellious subjects would be massacred by the hundreds, sometimes burned at the stake. Then their skulls would be placed in great piles by the roadside as a warning to others. Jonah decided that he would rather quit the prophetic ministry than preach to such people. Nineveh was about 500 miles to the east, so he headed for Tarshish, probably what is now Spain, the farthest western location he knew, about 2,000 miles.

Many since the 19th century A.D. have regarded Jonah as a parable or didactic fiction, as if factual history were ruled out by literary artistry or the recounting of miraculous events. If this narrative, however, whose form bears at every point the mark of a historical account, was judged unhistorical on either of these bases, then most of the Bible would follow easily along. It is pointless to ask whether Jonah really could have been swallowed by a great fish without also asking whether God really could communicate with a prophet. Every aspect of man's encounter with God is miraculous. Jonah is clearly didactic, but it is not presented as fiction or interpreted as such by Jesus (cp. Matt 12:40-41). Also, as F. Page has pointed out (New American Commentary), "If one of the lessons of Jonah, as most would admit, is that God is sovereign over and responsive to human actions, how can we employ a method in its explication that denies that message by ruling out the possibility of miracles?" We might also question the likelihood of ancient Israel's having produced and accepted as Scripture a fictional account in which the two main characters were a historical prophet and Yahweh Himself.

The book has been called "a masterpiece of rhetoric" and a "model of literary artistry, marked by symmetry and balance." Its four chapters divide into two halves, as indicated by commands from the Lord in 1:1-2 and 3:1-2 to go preach in Nineveh. The first time Jonah fled (1:3), and the second time he obeyed (3:3). Each half begins with an introduction (1:1-3; 3:1-4) and has two episodes. In the first episode of each half, Jonah encounters a group of pagans, the sailors (1:4-16) and the Ninevites (3:5-10). Each group surpasses Jonah in sensitivity to the Lord's will. The second and climactic episode of each half finds Jonah talking with God (2:1-11; 4:1-11).

No indication of the book's author is given, only that it gives an account of an incident in the life of a prophet of Yahweh. On the other hand, there is no indication that Jonah was not or could not have been the book's author. Many scholars believe Jonah was written no earlier than the sixth century, which would rule out authorship by the prophet. Evidence of such a late date for the book's origin, however, is considered unpersuasive by many. Some have pointed to alleged historical inaccuracies in the book as evidence of a late date of origin and lack of factual concern. One example is that 3:3 describes Nineveh as larger than we know it to have been. It is described literally as "a great city to God, a walk of three days." Although this is often said to mean that a three-day journey would be required to circumscribe it, however, the point is probably that a three-day visit was required for Jonah to spread his God-given message. This would especially be the case if "the great city of Nineveh" referred to "greater Nineveh," that is, Nineveh and the surrounding towns. A second example is that the designation “king of Nineveh” (3:6) was not the normal way the Assyrians would refer to their king. This is true but irrelevant, since we have no reason to suppose that the book of Jonah was written by the Assyrians but by the Jews, who did sometimes refer to their kings in this way (1 Kings 21:1; 2 Kings 1:3). Besides, Assyria was at this time such a weakened state that it comprised little besides Nineveh.

Jonah is the story of how God teaches a lesson to a narrow-minded, sinful prophet, who represents all God's people who think we have a monopoly on God's grace. When Jonah refuses to go preach in Nineveh and God retrieves him and mercifully delivers him, Jonah is thankful. Yet when Jonah preaches in Nineveh and the people repent and are mercifully spared, Jonah is angry. The book of Jonah ends with an unanswered divine question regarding compassion, suggesting to the reader that Jonah repented, and inviting the reader to do the same. This must be regarded as the key to Jonah's overall purpose, to stir up compassion in God's people. The message of the book is that whether God's people like it or not, God desires all nations to worship Him. God has shown mercy to His people, who did not deserve it; they should desire that mercy be extended to all who repent, and they should rejoice when God shows His grace (cp. Acts 10:34-35). God is concerned for all human beings (John 1:7; 1 Tim. 2:1-6; 2 Pet. 3:9) and has the right to show mercy to whomever He wills (Exod. 33:19; Rom. 9:15).

JONAM (Jō' nám) or JONAN (Jō' năn) Greek spelling of Hebrew personal name Jehohanan, meaning “Yahweh is gracious” (cp. 1 Chron. 26:3). Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:30). Greek uses the “m” ending, while Hebrew has the “n.”

JONAS (Jō' nās) (KJV, NT) See Jonah; Jona.

JONATH-ELEM-RECHOKIM (Jō năth-ē lēm-rə kō' kīm) Transliteration of word in title of Ps. 56 (NASB, KJV). NIV reads “to the tune of ? Dove on Distant Oaks” (cp. REB, NRSV with Terebinths for oaks). HCSB reads “For the choir director: according to A Silent Dove Far Away.” This was probably the name of a tune to which the psalm was sung. See Dove on Far-Off Terebinths.

JONATHAN (Jōn' á thán) Personal name meaning “Yahweh gave.” 1. Levite who served as priest of Micah in Ephraim and later with tribe of Dan (Judg. 17-18). 2. Eldest son of King Saul; mother: Ahinoam; brothers: Abinadab, Malchishua and Ish-baal; sisters: Merab and Michal; son: Mephibosheth (Meribbaal).

Jonathan possessed courage, fidelity, and friendship. He led 1,000 soldiers to defeat the Philistines at Geba (Gibeah) (1 Sam. 13:2-3). Then Jonathan took only his armor-bearer to the rocky crags at Michmash and brought panic to the Philistines by killing 20 of them (1 Sam. 14:1-16). Saul discovered that Jonathan was missing, called for the ark of God, went to battle, and defeated the Philistines. Jonathan ate honey, unaware that Saul had forbidden the people to eat that day. Saul would have had Jonathan put to death, but the people spoke in praise of Jonathan and ransomed him from death (1 Sam. 14:27-46).

The next four accounts about Jonathan focus on his friendship with David. First, Jonathan formed a close friendship with David by giving him his robe, armor, sword, bow, and girdle (18:1-4). Second, Jonathan pleaded successfully with Saul to reinstate David (19:1-7). Third, Jonathan left Saul's table angrily to inform David that the king would never receive David again (20:1-42). Fourth, Jonathan held a final meeting with David at Horesh. They made covenant with one another as Jonathan acknowledged David as the next king (23:16-18).

The end of 1 Samuel reports the end of Saul and three of his sons, Jonathan, Abinadab, and Malchishua, at Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. 31:1-13). Their bodies were first hung on the wall of Beth-shan and later brought to Jabesh. Eventually David had the bones buried in the land of Benjamin, in Zela in the tomb of Kish, Jonathan's grandfather (2 Sam. 21:12-14). See David; Mephibosheth; Saul.

3. Son of Abiathar the priest in service to David (2 Sam. 15:24; 17:17,20; 1 Kings 1:42-43). 4. An uncle of David who functioned as counselor and scribe in the royal court (1 Chron. 27:32). 5. Son of Shimei or Shimeah, David's brother; slew a Philistine giant (2 Sam. 21:21; 1 Chron. 20:7). 6. Son of Shammah; one of David's 30 mighty men (2 Sam. 23:32-33; 1 Chron. 11:34). 7. Son of Uzziah, a royal treasurer in reign of David; called Jehonathan (KJV) in 1 Chron. 27:25. 8. House of a scribe or secretary where Jeremiah was imprisoned (Jer. 37:15,20; 38:26). 9. Son of Kareah, "Johanah"; possibly same as 8. (Jer. 40:8). 10. Father of Ebed, a returned exile (Ezra 8:6; 1 Esdras 8:32). 11. Priest during high priesthood of Joiakim (Neh. 12:14). 12. Priest, son of Joiada (Neh. 12:11). 13. Priest, son of Shemaiah and father of Zechariah, in a group who played musical instruments (Neh. 12:35). 14. Son of Asahel who supported foreign marriages in time of Ezra (Ezra 10:15; 1 Esdras 9:14). 15. Descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:32-33).

JOPPA (Jōp' pā) Place-name meaning "beautiful." Situated on the Mediterranean coast, Joppa is located some 35 miles northwest of Jerusalem. Excavations have revealed that the city dates back at least to 1650 B.C. Originally Joppa was situated on a rocky hill just over 100 feet high, a hill that was just slightly beyond the coastline, forming a small cape. To the north stretches the Plain of Sharon, to the south the Plain of Philistia.

The ancient seaport of Joppa (Jaffa).

The OT name for Joppa was Japho (or Jaffe or Yafo), the name the Israeli nation has chosen as the modern designation for the city. The Phoenician form of the term comes from the name Jafe, the daughter of Aeolus, god of the winds.

Joppa is the only natural harbor on the Mediterranean between ancient Ptolemais and Egypt, and its facilities in biblical days were far less than outstanding. Reefs forming a roughly semicircular breakwater approximately 300 feet offshore made entrance from the south impossible. Entrance from the north was shallow and treacherous, but small vessels could navigate it.

The earliest historical reference to Joppa is found in inscriptions on the walls of the temple of Karnak at Thebes (Luxor). Thutmose III, who ruled Egypt from 1490 to 1436 B.C., boasted of his conquest of the cities of Palestine; Joppa is one of those named. The Amarna Letters mention Joppa twice with observations about the beauty of her gardens and the skill of her workmen in leather, wood, and metal.

When Canaan was conquered, the tribe of Dan received Joppa, but it never came firmly into Hebrew hands. The Philistines took the city, but David recaptured it. Solomon developed it into the major port serving Jerusalem. To Joppa rafts of cedar logs were floated to be transported to Jerusalem for Solomon's splendid temple (2 Chron.2:16).

Phoenicia gained control of Joppa by the time of Jonah. As the prophet fled from God's call, he caught a ship at Joppa for his well-remembered voyage toward Tarshish (Jon. 1:3). In 701 B.C. Sennacherib occupied the city, then, in turn, the Babylonians and the Persians. As it had been in Solomon's day, Joppa became the port that received cedar logs from Lebanon, now for the rebuilding of the temple under the leadership of Zerubbabel.

In 164 B.C. more than 200 Jewish citizens of Joppa were treacherously drowned by angry non-Jews. In retaliation Judas Maccabeus raided the city, burned the harbor installations, torching the anchored ships as well (2 Macc. 12:3-9). Joppa's history is linked with several notable names during the years of Roman control. Pompey conquered it in 63 B.C., joining it to the province of Syria. Antony later gave the city to Cleopatra of Egypt. Augustus Caesar added it to the kingdom of Herod the Great.

The NT records that Joppa was the home of Dorcas, a Christian woman known for her gracious and generous deeds. At her death the Christians of Joppa called for Simon Peter, who with the command “Tabitha, get up” (HCSB), restored her to life (Acts 9:36-41).

Simon Peter remained in Joppa at the home of Simon the Tanner. At noon, while Simon Peter waited for a meal to be prepared, he prayed on the flat roof of the tanner's house. In a trance Peter saw what seemed to be “a large sheet being lowered to the earth by its four corners” (HCSB) and learned that the Gentile world was a fit audience for the gospel (Acts 10:9-16).

Joppa is now annexed to the modern city of Tel Aviv, forming a part of the southern section of the largest city of Israel. Industrial, shipping, and residential complexes have been developed on this ancient site.

JORAH (Jō' rah) Personal name meaning “early or autumn rain.” Group leader of Babylonian exiles returning to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:18). The parallel list (Neh. 7:24) has “Hariph” instead of Jorah (cp. Neh. 10:19). Many interpreters believe Hariph to be the original reading, though it is difficult to explain the change. See Hariph.

JORAI (Jō' rā ī) Personal name, perhaps meaning “Yah has seen” or a short form of Joiarim, “Yah has exalted.” Member of tribe of Gad (1 Chron.5:13).

JORAM (Jō' rām) Personal name meaning “Yahweh is exalted.” Name of a king of Israel (849-843 B.C.) and a king of Judah (850-843 B.C.). The possibility of confusion between them is aggravated by several factors. For one thing, both are also called Jehoram. For another, they were contemporary with one another. Finally, each reigned in proximity to a person named Ahaziah: Joram of Judah was succeeded on the throne by his son, whose name was Ahaziah; Joram of Israel came to the throne at the death of his brother, who was also named Ahaziah. The account of the reign of Joram (Jehoram) of Israel is found in 2 Kings 3. He led a coalition with Judah and Edom, advised by Elisha, to defeat Moab. The reign of Joram of Judah is treated in 2 Kings 8. He married the daughter of Ahab of Israel and brought Baal worship to Judah. Edom and Libnah gained independence from Judah in his reign. JORDAN RIVER (Jōr' dān) Place-name meaning “the descender.” River forming geographical division separating eastern and western tribes of Israel. It is the longest and most important river of Palestine. It rises from the foot of Mount Hermon and flows into the Dead Sea. The Jordan Valley proper is a strip approximately 70 miles long between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. The valley is divided by various rivers and wadis (small streams) into a number of geographically distinguishable sections. Due to the twists and turns of its course, the full length of the river is more than 200 miles. Its headwaters lie more than 1,000 feet above sea level, and its mouth nearly 1,300 feet below sea level. Along its descending course the river passes through a variety of climatic zones, as well as different types of terrain.

Four sources come together to form the Jordan River: Baniyas, el-Leddān, Hasbani, and Bareighth Rivers. They all arise at the foothills of Mount Hermon. The Jordan then flows south through what can be described as three stages: (1) From the sources to Lake Huleh. The Jordan flows almost seven miles before it enters Lake Huleh. Within this distance, the river makes its way through areas of marsh consisting of reeds, bulrushes, and papyrus—the chief writing material for centuries. In this area lions were seen in biblical times (Jer. 49:19). (2) Between Lake Huleh and the Sea of Galilee. On leaving Lake Huleh, the Jordan flows for about 10 miles to the Sea of Galilee. In this short stretch, it descends to 696 feet below sea level. The river has carved a deep and winding course for itself through the center of the valley. Much of its course is characterized by rocky gorges. (3) From the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea. After leaving the Sea of Galilee the river passes through an especially fertile region. The length of this stretch is around 65 miles, but the river curves and twists for three times this distance. The breadth of the valley is from three to 14 miles. The river drops 590 feet during this stretch.

The Jordan River flows south from Mount Hermon through Israel, finally emptying into the Dead Sea.

The green waters of the Jordan River as It meanders through Israel.

Several major tributaries (e.g., Yarmuk, Jabbok) flow into the Jordan, emptying almost as great an amount of water as the Jordan itself. The deltas of these streams are always fertile areas that widen the extent of land that can be cultivated in the valley. Many cities of antiquity were built close to the point of juncture of the tributaries and the main river.

The Jordan River and Jordan Valley played an important role in a number of memorable events from both the OT and the NT. The first mention of the Jordan in the Bible occurs in the story of Abram and Lot. Lot, upon his separation from Abram, chose for himself “all the valley of the Jordan” (Gen. 13:11 NASB). Jacob wrestled with his adversary at the ford of the Jabbok (Gen. 32:22-26). Under the leadership of Joshua, Israel crossed the Jordan “on dry ground” (Josh. 3:15-17). During the period of the judges and the early monarchy, the possession of the fords of the Jordan more than once meant the difference between defeat and victory. The Jordan was a strong line of defense, not to be easily forded. The Jordan River is also featured in the miracles of Elijah and Elisha.

The essential story of the Gospels begins at the Jordan River. It was there that John the Baptist came preaching the coming kingdom of heaven. The most important NT event relating to the Jordan is the baptism of Jesus, which was performed by John the Baptizer (Mark 1:9). The first part of Jesus' ministry was centered in and around the Sea of Galilee. The second part of His ministry followed as he pursued His course down the east side of the Jordan Valley. There He performed new miracles and spoke to the multitudes in parables, especially those of the collection in Luke 12-18. See Dead Sea; Hermon, Mount; Sea of Galilee.

JORIM (Jō' rīm) Personal name of unknown meaning. Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:29).

JORKEAM (Jōr' kə ām) Personal name meaning “the people is golden.” Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:44). This, like other names in the list, may represent a city as well as a person. Many interpreters read Jokdeam here, equating the city with the tribal city of Judah. The location of the city is not known. See Jokdeam.

JOSE (Jō' sə) KJV spelling of otherwise unknown ancestor of Jesus, representing Joshua in Hebrew and Jesus in Greek. Modern translations read Joshua (Luke 3:29).

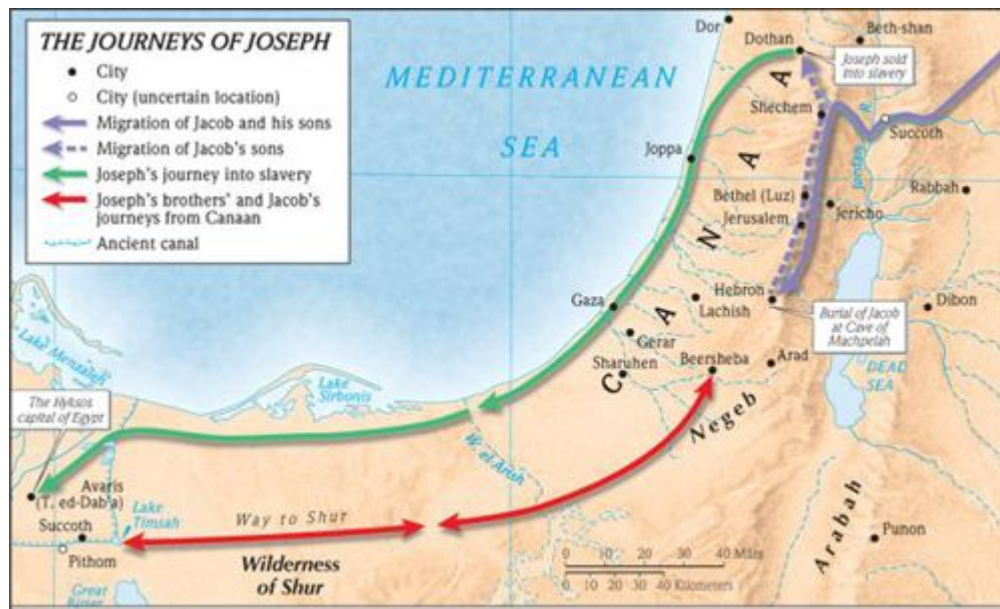

JOSECH (Jō' sək) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:26). KJV reads Joseph.

JOSEDECH (Jōs' ě dək) Personal name meaning, “Yahweh acts in righteousness.” KJV spelling of short form of Jehozadak. See Jehozadak.

JOSEPH (Jō' səph) Personal name meaning “adding.” Name of several men in the Bible, most importantly a patriarch of the nation Israel and the foster father of Jesus.

Old Testament Joseph in the OT primarily refers to the patriarch, one of the sons of Israel. Joseph was the 11th of 12 sons, the first by Jacob's favorite wife, Rachel. His name, “may he [the Lord] add,” was a part of Rachel's prayer at his birth (Gen. 30:24).

As the child of Jacob's old age and Rachel's son, Joseph became the favorite and was given the famous “coat of many colours” (Gen. 37:3 KJV; “long robe with sleeves,” NRSV, REB; “richly ornamented robe” NIV) by his father. This and dreams which showed his rule over his family inspired the envy of his brothers, who sold Joseph to a caravan of Ishmaelites (Gen. 37).

Joseph was taken to Egypt where he became a trusted slave in the house of Potiphar, an official of the pharaoh. On false accusations of Potiphar's wife, Joseph was thrown in the royal prison, where he interpreted the dreams of two officials who had offended the pharaoh (Gen. 39-40). Eventually Joseph was brought to interpret some worrisome dreams for the pharaoh. Joseph predicted seven years of plenty followed by seven years of famine and recommended a program of preparation by storing grain. Pharaoh responded by making Joseph his second in command (Gen. 41:39-45).

With the famine persons from other countries came to Egypt to buy food, including Joseph's brothers. They did not recognize him, but Joseph saw the fulfillment of his earlier dreams in which his brothers bowed down to him. After testing their character in various ways, Joseph revealed himself to them on their second visit (Gen. 42-45). Under Joseph's patronage Jacob moved into Egypt (Gen. 46:1-47:12). Joseph died in Egypt but was embalmed and later buried in Shechem (Gen. 50:26; Exod. 13:19; Josh. 24:32).

While in Egypt, Joseph became the father of two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen. 41:50-52), who were counted as sons of Jacob (48:5-6) and whose tribes dominated the northern nation of Israel. The name Joseph is used later in the OT as a reference to the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (Num. 1:32; 36:1,5; 1 Kings 11:28) or as a designation for the whole Northern Kingdom (Ps. 78:67; Ezek. 37:16,19; Amos 5:6,15; 6:6; Obad. 18; Zech. 10:6). See Hyksos.

Four other men named Joseph are mentioned in the OT: the spy of the tribe of Issachar (Num. 13:7); a Levite of the sons of Asaph (1 Chron. 25:2); a contemporary of Ezra with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:42); and a priest in the days of high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:14).

New Testament Several Josephs are mentioned in the NT. The most important is the husband of Mary, mother of Jesus. He was a descendant of David, a carpenter by trade (Matt. 13:55), and regarded as the legal or foster father of Jesus (Matt. 1:16,20; Luke 2:4; 3:23; 4:22; John 1:45; 6:42). Upon learning of Mary's pregnancy, Joseph, being a righteous man, sought to put her away without public disgrace. His response to God's assurances in a dream further demonstrated his piety and character (Matt. 1:18-25). Joseph took Mary to his ancestral home, Bethlehem, was with her at Jesus' birth, and shared in the naming, circumcision, and dedication of the child (Luke 2:8-33). Directed through dreams, Joseph took his family to Egypt until it was safe to return to Nazareth (Matt. 2:13-23). As a dedicated father, he was anxious with Mary at the disappearance of Jesus (Luke 2:41-48). Joseph does not appear later in the Gospels, and it is likely that he died prior to Jesus' public ministry.

Also important in the NT is Joseph of Arimathea, a rich member of the Sanhedrin and a righteous man who sought the kingdom of God (Matt. 27:57; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:50). After the crucifixion, Joseph, a secret disciple of Jesus, requested the body from Pilate and laid it in his own unused tomb (Matt. 27:57-60; Mark 15:43-46; Luke 23:50-53; John 19:38-42). Arimathea is probably the same as Ramathaimzophim (1 Sam. 1:1) northwest of Jerusalem.

Two Josephs are mentioned in the genealogy of Jesus (Luke 3:24,30). Another was a brother of Jesus, apparently named after his father (Matt. 13:55; KJV “Joses” as in Mark 6:3). It is likely but uncertain that the brother of James (Matt. 27:56; Joses in Mark 15:40,47) is a different person. Joseph was also another name of both Barsabbas (Acts 1:23) and Barnabas (Acts 4:36).

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS (Jō se' phūs, Fla' vē ūs) Early historian of Jewish life and our most important source for the history of the Jews in the Roman period. His four surviving works are The Jewish War (composed about A.D. 73), The Antiquities of the Jews (about A.D. 93), Life (an autobiographical appendix to The Antiquities), and Against Apion, penned shortly after The Antiquities. The date of Josephus' death is unknown but was probably after A.D. 100.

Following the conflict between Rome and the Jews of Palestine (A.D. 66-73), Flavius Josephus gave an account of the struggle in his seven books of The Jewish War, which include a prehistory reaching back to the second century B.C. Josephus came to Rome in 73 and lived in a house provided by Vespasian, who also gave him a yearly pension. The Antiquities, Life, and Against Apion were all written in Rome. In The Antiquities Josephus paraphrased the Septuagint (earliest Greek translation of the Bible) to tell the story of the Hebrews through the time of Cyrus and then employed other sources to complete the account through the first century. The account of the revolt against Rome is in many respects quite different in The Antiquities than it is in the earlier War. Against Apion defends the Jews against charges of the grammarian Apion as well as against other common assaults on the antiquity and moral virtue of the Jews. Josephus' Life focuses primarily upon the six-month period in which he was commander of Jewish forces in the Galilee and refutes the charge made by Justus of Tiberias that Josephus had organized the revolt in the Galilee.

JOSES (Jō' sēz) Personal name in Mark 6:3, one of the brothers of Jesus. In Matt. 13:55 KJV follows some Greek manuscripts in reading Joses for a brother of Jesus, but modern translations follow the earliest manuscripts in reading Joseph. Some Bible students see Joses as a dialectical pronunciation or a Greek substitute for the Hebrew Joseph (cp. Matt. 27:56). Mark 15:40 mentions another Joses, the brother of James the Less, whose mother's name was Mary. This latter Joses is mentioned as if he were a disciple of Jesus. Barnabas' original name was Joseph in the Greek of Acts 4:36. KJV reads this as Joses.

JOSHAAH (Jō' shah) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:34).

JOSHAPHAT (Jōsh' á phāt) Short form of personal name Jehoshaphat meaning "Yah judges." 1. Military hero under David (1 Chron. 11:43). 2. Priest who sounded the trumpet before the ark of the covenant as David brought it to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24; KJV, Jehoshaphat).

JOSHAVIAH (Jō shá ví' ah) Personal name meaning "Yah lets inhabit," probably a short form of Joshibiah. Military hero under David (1 Chron. 11:46). See Joshibiah.

JOSHBKASHAH (Jōsh bə ká' shah) Personal name meaning "to live in misfortune." A Levite musician from clan of Heman, the seer, under David (1 Chron. 25:4). He headed the seventeenth course or division of temple musicians (1 Chron. 25:24).

JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH (Jō shēb-bās shē' bēth) Personal name meaning "dweller of shame" (2 Sam. 23:8). See Jashobeam.

JOSHIBIAH (Jō shə bi' ah) Personal name meaning "Yah lets inhabit." Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:35).

JOSHUA (Jōsh' u ā) Personal name meaning "Yahweh delivered." 1. Leader of Israelites who first took control of promised land of Canaan. Joshua is one of the unsung heroes of the OT. He, not Moses, led the people into the promised land. He was a person of such stature that he could succeed the incomparable Moses and compile a record of notable success (Josh. 24:31). The Hebrew variations of Joshua are Oshea (Num. 13:16); Hosea (Hos. 1:1). English versions differ in their transliteration of the Hebrew names. Its NT equivalent is Jesus.

Joshua was born in Egypt during the period of slavery. He was a member of Ephraim, the important tribe that later formed the heart of the Northern Kingdom of Israel. He first appeared during the battle with the Amalekites during the desert travels. He was Moses' general, who led the troops in the actual fighting while Aaron and Hur held up Moses' hands (Exod. 17:8-13).

Joshua was Moses' servant (Exod. 24:13). He was on the mountain when Moses received the Law (Exod. 32:17). He was also one of the 12 spies Moses sent to investigate Canaan (Num. 13:8). He and Caleb returned with a positive, minority report. Of all the adults alive at that time, only the two of them were allowed to live to enter the land of Canaan (Num. 14:28-30, 38).

The Lord selected Joshua to be Moses' successor long before Moses' death (Num. 27:15-23; Deut. 31:14-15,23; 34:9). Joshua was a military leader, a political leader, and a spiritual leader. He was quiet and unassuming, but he was not intimidated by his responsibilities or the task that lay before him. He was a battlefield genius, particularly in the areas of careful planning, strategy, and execution. He was a capable administrator for the nation, effective in maintaining harmony among people and groups. He was a spokesman to the people for the Lord. Though he did not receive the Law as Moses had, he communicated the Lord's will and the Lord's message much like Moses.

Joshua was at the helm of the nation during the conquest and the distribution and settlement of Canaan. He led in the covenant renewal at Mount Ebal and Shechem (Josh. 8:30-35; 24:1-28). He was able to challenge his people by both word and example. His pattern is a hard one to better. See Joshua, Book of; Moses.

JOSHUA, BOOK OF As the sixth book of the OT, the book of Joshua occupies a pivotal position between the Pentateuch and the Historical Books. It points backward to the exodus as well as forward to the time of the judges and the monarchy. The book is named after the successor to Moses and one of the greatest military leaders of the OT, Joshua the son of Nun.

However, the central character of the book is not Joshua but God. God fights for Israel and drives out the enemy before them. He is a faithful God who desires a true covenant relationship with His chosen people. God promised that He would give Israel the land that He had pledged to their fathers (Exod. 3:8; Gen. 12:1-3; 15:18-21). The book of Joshua documents how God fulfilled this promise.

The book of Joshua is also about Israel's response to God's covenant promise. Israel's lack of faith and rebellion prevented them from truly receiving God's promised rest (Heb. 3:11). Joshua challenges us to consider what a faithful promise-keeping God can do, and will do, in and through a people who are completely yielded to him.

Authorship and Date Jewish tradition in the Talmud states that Joshua wrote his own book. The book of Joshua itself notes that Joshua did some limited writing (8:32; 24:26), but Joshua is not credited with writing the entire text. Someone other than Joshua probably penned the account of Joshua's death (24:29-31). In addition, other material appears to be dated after his death (15:13-19,63; 19:47).

The author of Joshua may have been among the circle of officers mentioned in Josh. 1:10; 3:2; 8:33; 23:2; and 24:1. The Hebrew word for “officer” is related to an Akkadian verb that means to “write” or “record.” These “officers” were contemporaries of Joshua, and eyewitnesses to many of the events recorded in the book. One of them may have been responsible for taking down the official record of Joshua's ministry. In any case, the author of the book was led by the Holy Spirit to render a faithful and trustworthy account of the conquest and settlement of Canaan.

The book of Joshua appears to have been completed after the death of Joshua (24:29) and Eleazar the son of Aaron (24:33). The repeated phrase “to this day” (4:9; 5:9; 6:25; 7:26; 8:28-29; 9:27; 10:27; 13:13; 15:63; 16:10; 23:9; cp. 22:3,17) also suggests a time of composition later than the recorded events. However, this elapsed time span may not have been very long. Joshua 6:25 states that Rahab “lived in the midst of Israel to this day” (NASB). This may mean that Rahab herself was still living at the time of the writing of the book.

The date of the events recorded in the book of Joshua depends on the date of the exodus. Many evangelical scholars favor dating the exodus in 1446 B.C. This date would place Joshua and the Israelites in Canaan around 1400 B.C. Other scholars favor a later dating for the exodus, between 1250 and 1200 B.C.

Contents The book of Joshua documents the conquest and settlement of the land of Canaan. The book naturally divides itself into four main divisions with each section built around a particular Hebrew concept: “Going over” (1:1-5:15); “Taking” (6:1-12:24); “Dividing” (13:1-21:45); “Worshiping” (22:1-24:33). The first five chapters focus on the preparations made by Joshua and Israel to cross over the Jordan and invade the land. Highlights include God's charge to Joshua (chap. 1), the encounter of the spies with Rahab (chap. 2), the miraculous crossing of the Jordan River at flood stage (chaps. 3-4), and the celebration of the Passover (chap. 5).

Chapters 6-12 record the three-part campaign of Joshua and the Israelites to claim the promised land as their inheritance. The military strategy of the conquest is rather simple, and it reflects the political circumstances of the region during the Amarna period at the end of the late Bronze Age (1400 B.C.). Canaan at the time contained a mixture of powerful fortified city-states and coalitions of smaller city-states. Egypt held nominal control, but no one unified political power existed.

First, the victories at Jericho, Ai, and Bethel secured the central corridor of Canaan (chaps. 6-8). Next, a southern coalition of Amorites led by Adoni-zedek of Jerusalem was defeated at Gibeon and pursued through Beth-horon and the Valley of Aijalon (chaps. 9-10). Finally a powerful northern coalition led by Jabin the king of Hazor encamped together at the waters of Merom to fight against Israel (chap. 11). A list of conquered kings rounds out the record of the conquest (chap. 12).

When Joshua and the Israelites defeated this northern coalition, there was no power left in Canaan strong enough to pose a large-scale threat to Israel. The book of Joshua indicates that only Jericho, Ai, and Hazor were destroyed by fire. Many of the fortified cities were left standing, and the task of completing the conquest fell to the individual tribes who would inherit select portions of the land. As can be seen in the book of Judges, many of the tribes were not able to secure their own territory.

Chapters 13-21 document the inheritance and distribution of the promised land to Israel. God is the great “land giver.” The detailed boundary descriptions and lists emphasize the fact that God is the owner of this land and has the authority to distribute it as He chooses. Emphasis is placed on the inheritance of Judah (chaps. 14-15) and of Joseph (chaps. 16-17). Provision is also made for the Cities of Refuge (chap. 20) and the Levitical Cities (chap. 21).

The final section of the book focuses on the farewell speeches of Joshua and the consecration of the land through the great covenant renewal ceremony at Shechem (chap. 24). Joshua blesses the people, calls on them to follow the Lord, warns them of the consequences of disobedience, and challenges them to reaffirm their covenant with God. Here Joshua expresses his personal commitment to the covenant Lord (24:15). After Joshua dies, he is given the title “the servant of the LORD” just like Moses (24:29).

Theological Themes Six major theological themes run throughout the book of Joshua.

The Divine Warrior In the book of Joshua God engages in combat as a divine warrior on behalf of Israel. Just as God fought against the Egyptians at the Red Sea (Exod. 14:14), He now fights for them in Canaan (Josh. 10:14).

Holy War In battle, every living being and every piece of property is to be dedicated to the deity. Why would a loving God order the wholesale extermination of the nations living in the promised land? There is no simple answer to this difficult question. But it must be remembered that Israel was allowed to drive out the nations living in the promised land because of their sinful abominations (Deut. 9:4-5; 18:9-14; 20:16-18).

The Promised Land God had promised to give Israel “a land flowing with milk and honey” (Exod. 3:8; Deut. 8:7-9; 11:8-12). The promise of land was conditional. God gave the land to Israel in its entirety, but Israel had to trust God and follow Him to occupy the gift. Israel's tenure on the land was also based on faithful worship of God (Deut. 7:12-15). The penalty for worshiping other gods was to be driven from the land (Deut. 6:14-15; 8:19-20; 11:8-9,17; 28:63).

The Covenant The covenant renewal ceremony of Josh. 24 has many similarities with the vassal-treaties formulated by the ancient Hittites. Both types of documents contain an introduction, a historical prologue, a set of stipulations, provisions for keeping the documents and for their public reading, a list of divine witnesses, and finally, curses for disobedience and blessings for obedience. Israel was to be faithful in keeping the covenant. Disobedience eventually brought about the exile.

The Holy and Redeeming God In the book of Joshua, a holy and redeeming God is graciously at work on behalf of Joshua and Israel. God's mercy is offered to non-Israelites as well. Both Rahab (6:17-25) and the Gibeonites (9:1-27) are brought within the covenant community.

A Rest for the People of God Joshua was to lead Israel into their inheritance, into their “rest” (1:13,15; 11:23; 14:15; 21:44; 22:4; 23:1). A faithful covenant relationship with God would secure a peaceful tenure on the land. Nevertheless, the rest provided by Joshua was temporary (Heb. 3:7-4:11). Soon after the death of Joshua, Israel would begin to serve the Canaanite gods and break the covenant relationship. See Conquest; Joshua; Holy War.

JOSIAH (Jō si' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh heals.” Judah's king from about 640-609 B.C. He succeeded his father Amon, an idolatrous king, who ruled for only two years before being murdered by his servants (2 Kings 21:19-23; 2 Chron. 33:21-24). Josiah became king at the age of eight due to wishes of “the people of the land” who put his father's assassins to death (2 Kings 21:24). Josiah's reign lasted for 31 years (2 Kings 22:1; 2 Chron. 34:1).

The book of 2 Chronicles reveals much about the early years of Josiah. In his eighth year as king he began to seek the God of David (34:3). Josiah initiated a religious purge of Jerusalem, Judah, and surrounding areas during his 12th year on the throne (34:3-7). This purge included tearing down the high places, the Asherah, and the altars to Baal. The high places were essentially Canaanite worship centers that had been taken over by Israel. The Asherah were cult objects associated with the worship of Baal, the fertility god of Canaan. See Asherah.

In his 18th year as king, an unexpected event turned his energies in new directions. A “book of the Law” was discovered while repairs were being made on the temple. Hilkiah, the high priest, found the book and gave it to Shaphan, the scribe, who in turn read it to King Josiah. Upon hearing the message of the book, Josiah tore his clothes, a sign of repentance, and humbled himself before God. Josiah was assured that the promised destruction would not come in his time (2 Kings 22:8-20; 2 Chron. 34:15-28). The reading of this book prompted Josiah to instigate the most far-reaching religious reforms in Israel's history.

What was this “book of the Law” and when was it written? Most scholars believe that this book included at least the core of our present book of Deuteronomy, either chapters 5-26 or 12-26. A major thrust of the book of Deuteronomy was to call the nation Israel to exclusive loyalty to Yahweh. Perhaps a thrust such as this inspired the Josianic revival.

The Bible is silent about the remaining years of Josiah until his death. On the international scene during those years Assyria's power was waning, and Babylon's was on the rise. Assyria had aligned itself with Egypt against Babylon. Pharaoh Neco's troops were passing through territory north of Judah en route to join forces with Assyria. Josiah's army blocked the movement of Egyptian troops at Megiddo. In the battle that followed Josiah was mortally wounded (2 Kings 23:29). His body was taken to Jerusalem where he was buried. There was great mourning for him throughout the land (2 Chron. 35:24-25). Though only 39 when he died, Josiah was remembered as Judah's greatest king (2 Kings 23:25): "Before him there was no king like him who turned to the LORD with all his heart and with all his soul and with all his might, according to all the law of Moses" (NASB). JOSIBIAH (Jō sī bī' ah) (KJV) See Joshiah.

JOSIPHIAH (Jō sī phī' ah) Personal name meaning "Yah adds to." A longer form of Joseph. Leader of group of Babylonian exiles who returned to Jerusalem with Ezra (Ezra 8:10).

JOT See Dot.

JOTBAH (Jōt' bah) Place-name meaning "it is good." Home of Meshullemeth, the queen mother of King Amon of Judah about 642-640 B.C. (2 Kings 21:19). It was located at Khirbet Gefat about nine miles north of Nazareth. Others would identify it with the closely related Hebrew name Jotbathah (Num. 33:34) and locate it at et-Taba 20 miles north of Akaba. See Jotbathah; Meshullemeth.

JOTBATHAH (Jōt' bá tha) Place-name meaning “good.” Wilderness camping station, the second stop before Ezion-geber for Israel in the wilderness (Num. 33:33). The context of Deut. 10:7 indicates that at Jotbathah God set apart the Levites to carry the ark of the covenant and to do priestly service, though many interpreters would connect the address of verses 8-9 to 10:1, seeing the travel report in verses 6-7 as a historical parenthesis and not as the precise setting for verses 8-11. See Ezion-geber; Jotbah.

JOTHAM (Jō' thám) Personal name meaning “Yahweh has shown Himself to be perfect.” 1. In Judg. 9:5 the youngest of Gideon's 70 sons. He survived the mass killing of Gideon's sons by Abimelech, their half brother, because he hid himself. Afterwards, when Abimelech had been hailed as king at Shechem, Jotham addressed a fable to the people of Shechem designed to mock the idea of Abimelech acting as a king. After he had told the fable and given its interpretation, Jotham fled for his life. See Judges, Book of. 2. In 2 Kings 15:32 the son and successor of Uzziah as king of Judah (750-732 B.C.). He was 25 years old when he began to reign, and he reigned for 16 years. His mother's name was Jerusha. The 16-year period given for his reign may include the time that he acted as regent for his father Uzziah. Uzziah contracted leprosy during the final years of his reign and thus could not perform the functions required of royalty. Jotham evidently was an effective ruler. His reign was marked by building projects, material prosperity, and military successes. See Chronology of the Biblical Period.

JOY State of delight and well being that results from knowing and serving God. A number of Greek and Hebrew words are used to convey the ideas of joy and rejoicing. We have the same situation in English with such nearly synonymous words as joy, happiness, pleasure, delight, gladness, merriment, felicity, and enjoyment. The words “joy” and “rejoice” are the words used most often to translate the Hebrew and Greek words into English. Joy is found over 150 times in the Bible. If such words as “joyous” and “joyful” are included, the number comes to over 200. The verb “rejoice” appears well over 200 times.

Joy is the fruit of a right relation with God. It is not something people can create by their own efforts. The Bible distinguishes joy from pleasure.

The Greek word for pleasure is the word from which we get our word “hedonism,” the philosophy of self-centered pleasure seeking. Paul referred to false teachers as “lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God” (2 Tim. 3:4 HCSB).

The Bible warns that self-indulgent pleasure seeking does not lead to happiness and fulfillment. Ecclesiastes 2:1-11 records the sad testimony of one who sought to build his life on pleasure seeking. The search left him empty and disillusioned. Proverbs 14:13 offers insight into this way of life, “Even in laughter a heart may be sad” (HCSB). Cares, riches, and pleasures rob people of the possibility of fruitful living (Luke 8:14). Pleasure seeking often enslaves people in a vicious cycle of addiction (Titus 3:3). The self-indulgent person, according to 1 Tim. 5:6, is dead while seeming still to be alive.

Many people think that God is the great killjoy. Nothing could be a bigger lie. God Himself knows joy, and He wants His people to know joy. Psalm 104:31 speaks of God Himself rejoicing in His creative works. Isaiah 65:18 speaks of God rejoicing over His redeemed people who will be to Him “a joy.”

Luke 15 is the most famous biblical reference to God's joy. The Pharisees and scribes had criticized Jesus for receiving sinners and eating with them. Then Jesus told three parables—the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son. The explicit theme of each parable is joy over one sinner who repents.

The joy of God came to focus in human history in Jesus Christ. The note of joy and exultation runs through the entire biblical account of the coming of Christ (Luke 1:14,44; Matt. 2:10). The most familiar passage is the angel's announcement of “good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people” (Luke 2:10 KJV). Jesus spoke of His own joy and of the full joy He had come to bring to others (John 15:11; 17:13). He illustrated the kingdom of heaven by telling of the joy of a man who found treasure (Matt. 13:44). Zacchaeus was in a tree when Jesus called him, but he quickly climbed down and received Jesus joyfully (Luke 19:6). He had found life's ultimate treasure in Christ.

As Jesus' death approached, He told His followers that soon they would be like a woman in labor, whose sorrow would be turned into joy (John 16:20-22). Later they understood when the dark sorrow of the cross gave way to the joy of the resurrection (Luke 24:41). Viewed from this perspective, eventually they came to see that the cross itself was necessary for the joy to become real (Heb. 12:2). Because of His victory and the promise of His abiding presence, the disciples could rejoice even after the Lord's ascension (Luke 24:52).

The book of Acts tells how joy continued to characterize those who followed Jesus. After Philip preached in Samaria, the people believed and “there was great joy in that city” (Acts 8:8). After the work of Paul and Barnabas in Antioch of Pisidia, “the disciples were filled with joy and the Holy Spirit” (Acts 13:52 HCSB). Paul and Barnabas reported such conversions to other believers, “and they created great joy among all the brothers” (Acts 15:3). After the conversion of the Philippian jailer, he “rejoiced because he had believed God with his entire household” (Acts 16:34).

Joy in the Christian life is in direct proportion as believers walk with the Lord. They can rejoice because they are in the Lord (Phil. 4:4). Joy is a fruit of a Spirit-led life (Gal. 5:22). Sin in a believer's life robs the person of joy (Ps. 51:7-8,12).

When a person walks with the Lord, the person can continue to rejoice even when troubles come. Jesus spoke of those who could rejoice even when persecuted and killed (Matt. 5:12). Paul wrote of rejoicing in suffering because of the final fruit that would result (Rom. 5:3-5). Both Peter and James also echoed the Lord's teachings about rejoicing in troubles (1 Pet. 1:6-8; James 1:2).

Joy in the Lord enables people to enjoy all that God has given. They rejoice in family (Prov. 5:18), food (1 Tim. 4:3-5), celebrations (Deut.

16:13-15), fellowship (Phil. 4:1). They share with other believers the joys and sorrows of life: “Rejoice with those who rejoice; weep with those who weep” (Rom. 12:15 HCSB).

JOZABAD (Jōz' á bād) Short form of personal name Jehozabad meaning “Yah gave.” 1. Person involved in assassination of King Joash about 782 B.C. (2 Kings 12:21, where Hebrew text says Jozabad, son of Shimeath and Jehozabad, son of Amaziah, but many Hebrew manuscripts read the first name of Jozachar). Second Chronicles 24:26 reads “Zabad son of Shimeath” and “Jehozabad son of Shimrith.” Copying changes have made it impossible to determine precisely the original names. Chronicles shows that because Joash killed the sons of Jehoiada the priest, his own servants paid him back. They even refused to give him royal burial in the kings' tombs. See Jehozabad; Joash. 2. Man from Gederah in tribe of Benjamin who joined David as he fled from King Saul (1 Chron. 12:4). 3. Two men of tribe of Manasseh who joined David at Ziklag as he fled from Saul (1 Chron. 12:20). 4. Priest who promised Ezra he would divorce his foreign wife to prevent temptation of foreign worship from invading Israel (Ezra 10:22). 5. Priest who witnessed transfer of gold that Ezra's party brought from Babylon to the temple in Jerusalem (Ezra 8:33), though a Hebrew manuscript reads Jonadab here. 6. Levite with foreign wife Ezra condemned (Ezra 10:23). 7. Levite who helped the people understand God's law as Ezra read it (Neh. 8:7). 8. Levite in charge of external affairs of the temple (Neh. 11:16). 9. Supervisor of temple treasures under Hezekiah about 715 B.C. (2 Chron. 31:13). He helped give the Levites animals to sacrifice at Passover (2 Chron. 35:9).

JOZACAR (Jō' zá cār) (NASB, NRSV, TEV) or JOZACHAR Personal name meaning “Yah thought of.” KJV, REB reading of conspirator who helped kill King Joash about 782 B.C. (2 Kings 12:21) based on Hebrew manuscripts differing from the base manuscript normally used for the Hebrew text. See Jehozabad; Jozabad.

JOZADAK (Jōz' a dāk) Short form of personal name Jehozadak meaning “Yah acts in righteousness.” Father of high priest Joshua (Ezra 3:2,8; 5:2; 10:18; Neh. 12:26). See jehozadat JUBAL (Ju' bāl) Personal name meaning “a ram,” as a “ram's horn” used as a musical instrument. In Gen. 4:19-21 the son of Lamech and full brother of Jabal. He is associated with the invention of musical instruments.

JUBILEE See Year of Jubilee.

JUCAL (Ju' cāl) Short form of Jehucal. See Jehucal.

JUDA (Ju' dā) (KJV, NT) See Judah.

JUDAEA Alternate form of Judea used by the KJV (except in Ezra 5:8). See Judea.

JUDAH (Ju' dah) Personal, tribal, and territorial name meaning “Praise Yahweh” but may have originally been related to the mountain of Jehud. 1. In Gen. 29:35, the fourth son of Jacob and the progenitor of the tribe of Judah. His mother was Leah. Though Judah is prominent in the Genesis narratives, he seldom occupies center stage. Genesis 38 is an exception. It relates the seduction of Judah by his daughter-in-law Tamar. Their union resulted in the birth of Pharez and Zarah. Genesis 49:8-12 preserves the blessing of Judah by Jacob. Through Judah ran the genealogical line that led to Jesus. 2. The tribe of Judah occupied the strategically important territory just to the west of the Dead Sea. The city of Jerusalem was on the border between Judah and Benjamin. David was from the tribe of Judah. 3. When the kingdom was divided following the death of Solomon, the Southern Kingdom took the name Judah. See Geography; Israel; Judas; Patriarchs; Israel, Land of; Tribes of Israel. 4. The province set up by the Persian government to rule a conquered Judean kingdom (Neh. 5:14; Hag. 1:1). Judah formed one small province alongside Samaria, Galilee, and Idumea. All these reported to the satrap of the Persian satrapy of Abarnaharah that encompassed the land west of the Euphrates River with its center in Damascus (Ezra 5:3,6; 6:6,13). The satrap reported to a higher official over Babylon and Abarnaharah with headquarters in Babylon. When Judah's exiles returned from Babylon, Zerubbabel was governor of Judah; Tattenai, satrap of Abarnaharah or Beyond the River; and Ushtannu, satrap of Babylon and Abarnaharah. 5. Priest whose sons helped Zerubbabel and Joshua begin work on restoring the temple after 537 B.C. (Ezra 3:9; cp. Neh. 12:8). 6. Levite whom Ezra condemned for having foreign wife who might tempt Israel to worship other gods (Ezra 10:23). 7. Member of tribe of Benjamin who lived in Jerusalem after the return from exile and was second in command over the city (Neh. 11:9). He may be the official who joined Nehemiah in leading the celebration of the completion of the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 12:34). 8. Priestly musician who helped in Nehemiah's celebration (Neh. 12:36). 9. An obscure geographical reference in the description of the tribal borders of Naphtali (Josh. 19:34). The earliest Greek translators could not understand the reference and so did not translate it (cp. TEV, NIV). Naphtali's territory does not touch that of the tribe of Judah. Some try to define Judah here as the 60 towns of Jair east of the Jordan (Josh. 13:30). Others translate Judah as "low-lying land" (REB). Some scholars try to make another placename such as Jehuda out of the reference. It may be that a copyist confused Jordan and Judah, which resemble one another in appearance in Hebrew writing, and miscopied Jordan as Judah and then copied Jordan. No sure solution exists to explain Judah in this text. 10. City of Judah (2 Chron. 25:28) is Jerusalem.

JUDAISM (Jū' dā Yzm) Religion and way of life of the people of Judah, the Jews. Paul contrasted his Christian calling from his previous life in Judaism (Gal. 1:13-14). See Jewish Parties in the New Testament; Proselytes.

JUDAS (Jū' dās) Greek transliteration of Hebrew personal name Judah meaning "Praise Yahweh." The proper name Judas was very common in the time of Christ because it was not only the Greek form of one of the 12 patriarchs, but it was also made popular by the Jewish hero Judas Maccabeus who led the nation in their fight for independence from Syria in 166 B.C. The NT mentions six men named Judas. Most of them are only mentioned in passing. 1. Brother of the Lord (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3). 2. Judas of Galilee was one of those who led a revolt against the Romans and died as a result. The exact year of this revolt is uncertain, perhaps A.D. 6 (Acts 5:37). 3. After his experience on the road to Damascus Paul went to the house of a man named Judas who lived on Straight Street. Ananias found him there three days later (Acts 9:7-12). 4. Judas, surnamed Barsabbas, was one of those chosen by the church of Jerusalem to go with Paul and Barnabas to deliver the letter from James to the church at Antioch concerning the important matter of Gentile salvation (Acts 15:22). 5. Jesus' 12 disciples include two named Judas. The first is always listed after James the son of Alphaeus and is called the son of James (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13). He appears to have been known also by the name Lebbeaus Thaddaeus (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18). His only recorded words are found in John 14:22. 6. The last of these was Judas Iscariot. All of the Gospels place him at the end of the list of disciples because of his role as betrayer. Iscariot is an Aramaic word meaning "man of Kerioth," a town near Hebron. He was the only disciple from Judea. He acted as treasurer for the disciples but was known as a miser and a thief (John 12:4-6). He was present at the Last Supper, during which Jesus predicted his betrayal (Luke 22:21; Matt. 26:20-21). The price of the betrayal was 30 pieces of silver, which Judas returned to Jewish leaders, then he went out and hanged himself. He died in sorrow but without repentance. The money, which could not be returned to the treasury because it was blood money, was used to buy a potter's field in Judas' name (Matt. 27:3-10; cp. Acts 1:18-19).

JUDAIZERS A term often used to describe a group Paul criticized in his letter to the Galatians (1:7). These Jewish Christians insisted that Gentiles not only had to have faith in Christ but be circumcised and become Jews in order to be saved. See Acts 15:1; 21:20, 21; Phil. 3:2-3.

JUDE, LETTER FROM The letter of Jude is often overlooked because of its brevity. Some are also troubled because Jude quoted 1 Enoch and alludes to the Assumption of Moses, but the latter is not a problem for citations from a source do not necessarily indicate that the document quoted is canonical. The message of Jude is alien to many in today's world, for Jude emphasized that the Lord will certainly judge evil intruders who are attempting to corrupt the churches addressed. The message of judgment strikes many in our world as intolerant, unloving, and contrary to the message of love proclaimed elsewhere in the NT. Nevertheless, this short letter should not be ignored. Some of the most beautiful statements about God's sustaining grace are found in Jude (w. 1,24-25), and they shine with a greater brilliance when contrasted with the false teachers who have departed from the true Christian faith.

We can also say that the message of judgment is especially relevant to people today, for our churches are prone to sentimentality, suffer from moral breakdown, and too often fail to pronounce a definitive word of judgment because of an inadequate definition of love. Jude's letter reminds us that errant teaching and dissolute living have dire consequences. Hence, we should not relegate his words to a crabby temperament that threatens with judgment those he dislikes, but as a warning to beloved believers (vv. 3,17) to escape a deadly peril. Jude was written so that believers would contend for the faith that was transmitted to them (v. 3) and so that they would not abandon God's love at a crucial time in the life of their church. Such a message must still be proclaimed today, for moral degradation is the pathway to destruction.

Author The author is identified in the first verse as “Jude, a slave of Jesus Christ, and a brother of James” (HCSB). The James mentioned is almost certainly James, the brother of the Lord Jesus Christ and the author of the letter from James (cp. also Acts 15:13-21; 1 Cor. 15:7; Gal. 2:9). We can conclude from this that Jude was well-known by his association with his famous brother who played a significant role in the apostolic church. Hence, Jude was also the half-brother of Jesus Christ (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3). External evidence from the early church also supports the view that Jude, the brother of Jesus, wrote the letter.

Some scholars have argued that another Jude wrote the letter. Calvin identified the author as the Apostle “Judas of James” (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13). But if this were correct, the author would call himself an apostle. Others have speculated that the writer is “Judas Barsabbas” (Acts 15:22,27,32), but there is no evidence that the latter was James's brother. Even more unlikely is the theory that the author was the Apostle Thomas. Still others maintain that the letter is pseudonymous, but support for psuedonymity in canonical writings is lacking. To sum up, there are good reasons to accept the view that Jude, the brother of Jesus, is the author of the letter.

Recipients and Date It is extremely difficult to identify the recipients or narrow down the date of the letter. Most scholars today argue that 2 Peter borrows from Jude, and if this is the case, then Jude preceded 2 Peter, and the latter was written in the 60s. Presumably Jude was written in the same general time frame, but it is impossible to be certain. Suggestions for a destination include Palestine, Syria, Asia Minor, and Egypt. We must admit that we have no way of knowing with any certainty the recipients of the letter. Many think the readers were Jewish since Jude cites 1 Enoch and alludes to The Assumption of Moses.

Opponents The opponents of Jude have often been identified as gnostics, but this theory is less common today since NT scholars are recognizing that the second century phenomenon of Gnosticism cannot be read back into the first century. Nor do the opponents betray many of the common features of Gnosticism. A precise label for the opponents eludes us. Verse 4 suggests that the opponents came from outside the church. It is clear from the letter that the opponents were libertines, perhaps abusing the Pauline doctrine of grace. They may have also appealed to personal revelation to support their libertinism (v. 8).

Structure The letter is vigorous, pointed, and well structured. Jude is particularly fond of triads in his writing.

JUDEA (Ju də' ə) Place-name meaning "Jewish." In Ezra 5:8 the Aramaic designation of a province that varied in size with changing political circumstances, but always included the city of Jerusalem and the territory immediately surrounding it. The area, formerly called Judah, was first given the name Judea following the Babylonian exile. During the Persian period, Judea occupied a very small area. Under the Maccabees, however, the territory was expanded in size and enjoyed a period of political independence. Herod the Great, appointed over roughly the same territory by Rome, had the title king of Judea. Judea, Samaria, and Galilee were generally considered, in Roman times, to be the three main geographical divisions of Palestine. See Geography; Rome and the Roman Empire.

JUDEAN (Jū də' ən) Resident or citizen of Judah in one of its several national and geographical meanings. See Judah.

JUDGE (OFFICE) 1. An official with authority to administer justice by trying cases. 2. One who usurps the prerogative of a judge. 3. A military deliverer in the period between Joshua and David (for this sense, See Judges, Book of).

Moses served as the judge of Israel, both deciding between persons and teaching Israel God's statutes (Exod. 18:15-16). At Jethro's suggestion Moses himself served as the people's advocate before God and their instructor in the law (18:19-20) and appointed subordinate judges to decide minor cases (18:21-23; Num. 11:16-17; Deut. 1:12-17; 16:18-20). Elders of a community frequently served as judges at the city gate (Deut. 22:15; 25:7; Ruth 4:1-9; Job 29:7-8). Difficult cases were referred to the priests or to the supreme judge (Deut. 17:8-13; cp. Num. 5:12-31, a case involving no witnesses). During the monarchy the king served as the supreme judge (2 Sam. 15:2-3) and appointed local judges (1 Chron. 23:4; 2 Chron. 19:5), along with an appeals process (2 Chron. 19:8-11). Following the exile Artaxerxes gave the priest Ezra the authority to appoint judges in Judea (Ezra 7:25).

Complaints against judges are frequent in the OT literature. Absalom took advantage of discontent with the legal system to instigate revolt (2 Sam. 15:4). Judges are accused of showing partiality (Prov. 24:23), of taking bribes (Isa. 61:8; Mic. 7:3; cp. Exod. 23:2-9), and of failing to defend the interest of the powerless (Isa. 10:2; Jer. 5:28). Zephaniah described the judges of Jerusalem as wolves on the prowl (3:3).

God is the ultimate Judge of all the earth (Gen. 18:25; Isa. 33:22; James 4:12). As God's representative Christ functions as Judge as well (John 8:16; James 5:9; 1 Pet. 4:5). See Judging

JUDGES, BOOK OF In English Bibles the book of Judges is the second of the historical books of the OT (Joshua-Esther). Some scholars refer to Joshua-2 Kings as the Deuteronomistic History, so-called because the theology and style of these writings are heavily influenced by Deuteronomy. However, it is better to follow the Hebrew Bible and interpret these books as the Former Prophets. In all of them theological and spiritual concerns, common to Moses and the prophets, take precedence over the recording of historical facts and political agendas.

Sunset over the Judean hills.

The book derives its name from the designation of the principal characters, shophetim (2:18), “governors.” But they functioned as Israel's deliverers (moshi'im) from outside enemies. In most cases in the OT the term shophet denotes an official who decides legal cases in a court of law. However, the root bears a broader meaning, “to govern,” which can involve internal issues such as disputes among citizens but may also involve external problems; settling national and tribal disputes with outsiders. This sense is reflected in both the name of the book and in the roles played by the major human characters.

Scholars and lay readers tend to read Judges differently. Many scholars interpret the book as a political document, demonstrating the need for a king to resolve the problems of Israel during the transitional period between the conquest of Canaan under Joshua and the establishment of the monarchy, and specifically to support the cause of David in opposition to the household of Saul. Taking their cue from Heb. 11:32, most lay people read Judges as a book of heroes who demonstrate strength of character in achieving great feats for God.

However, a close reading of Judges suggests that both interpretations miss the author's point. If we read Judges as a prophetic book, we discover that the focus is not on the judges but on God, on whose behalf they served as the nation's deliverers. Specifically, the book describes the Lord's response to the Canaanization of Israelite society during the period of settlement. As 2:6-10 declares, within a generation after the death of Joshua and those who had participated in the conquest, Israel's spiritual problems surfaced. This nation entered the land of promise triumphantly as the redeemed people of the Lord but became more and more like the people they were charged to displace.

More than most of the historical books, Judges has a tightly knit plot. The author shows awareness of other judges (Shamgar [3:31], Tola and Jair [10:1-5], Ibzan, Elon and Abdon [12:8-15]), but the events described in detail were carefully selected and deliberately crafted according to an intentional literary scheme. By doing so, the author presented a convincing case of the fundamental degeneration of Israel during the period of the judges. Each part of the book makes a vital contribution to the development of this theme.

The author sets the stage by summarizing the fortunes of the respective tribes as they claimed the land that the Lord had allotted them (1:1-36). He reported the results in a deliberate order, beginning with the successes of Judah and ending with the utter failure of Dan. This pattern anticipated the structure of the narratives that followed, as the portrait of the nation begins rather positively with Othniel (3:7-11), but with each cycle the picture became ever bleaker.

This historical introduction is followed by a heavily theological preamble (2:1-3:6). The fundamental problem is Israel's loss of the memory of the Lord's redemptive work on their behalf (2:1-10). This resulted in the sorry truth expressed in a refrain that is repeated seven times in the book: The Israelites did evil (literally "the evil") in the sight of the Lord; they served the Baals and abandoned the Lord their Redeemer (2:11-12; cp. 3:7,12; 4:1; 6:1; 10:6; 13:1). The following narratives of the individual judges, which take up the bulk of the book (3:7-16:31), describe the consequences of this apostasy. This preamble (2:1-3:6) invites the reader to interpret these accounts not merely as cyclical recurrences of the same problem but as illustrative of an intensification of the evil in Israel (2:17-19), offering the reader the key to understanding both the people of Israel and the judges who led them.

Because of the theological nature of the narrative and the author's selective use of data, it is difficult to reconstruct the history of Israel during the period of the judges from the accounts in the heart of the book (3:7-16:31). The events are deliberately arranged so that each judge is presented in a worse light than the previous, beginning with Othniel, an exemplary character (3:7-11), and ending with Samson, who embodies all that is wrong with Israel. Each cycle is structured after a literary pattern signaled by a series of recurring formulas:

(1) "The Israelites did evil in the eyes of the Lord" (2:11 NIV; 3:7,12; 4:1; 6:1; 10:6; 13:1).

(2) “The Lord gave/sold the Israelites into the hands of the enemy” (2:14; 6:1; 13:1).

(3) “The Israelites cried out to the Lord” (3:9,15; 4:3; 6:6; 10:10).

(4) “The Lord raised up a deliverer for Israel to save them” (2:16,18; 3:9,15).

(5) “And X [the oppressing nation] was made subject to Israel” (8:28; cp. 3:30; 4:23).

(6) “Then the land was undisturbed for X years” (3:11,30; 5:31; 8:28).

(7) “Then X [the judge] died” (2:19; 3:11; 4:1b; 8:32; 12:7).

From these formulas it is evident that the Lord is the most important character in the book, and the author's attention is fixed on His response to the Canaanization of His people. In judgment He sends in foreign enemies (as Lev. 26 and Deut. 28 predicted); then in mercy He hears their cry, raises up a deliverer, and provides victory over the enemy. But the Israelites do not learn the lesson; on the contrary the spiritual rot goes deeper and deeper into the very soul of the nation so that in the end Gideon acts like an oriental despot (8:18-32). Like the pagans around him, Jephthah tried to win the good will of God by sacrificing his daughter (11:30-40), and Samson's life and death looked more like that of a Philistine than one of the people of the Lord (chaps. 14-16).

Many interpret Judges 17-21 as more or less independent appendices. However, once we realize that the overall concern of the book is Israel's spiritual degeneration and God's response to it, we discover that, far from being an awkward add-on, these chapters represent the climax of the composition. The tone is set by variations of the four-fold refrain, “In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes” (17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25). This has traditionally been interpreted as a sign that the author looked forward to the institution of the monarchy as the solution to Israel's problems in this dark period. But this interpretation fails on four counts. First, it wrongly assumes that the primary problem in the book is political when it is spiritual. Second, it overlooks the fact that far from solving the problem of apostasy in Israel, the monarchy actually sponsored the kinds of evils described in the book. Third, it discounts the negative view of kingship presented in the book of Judges itself. Gideon verbally rejects the office of hereditary king (8:22-23), but his actions (8:18-27), and especially his naming of his son Abimelech (which means “my father is king”) belie his pious response. Abimelech, the only one labeled a king, epitomized the evils of Canaanite monarchy (see Jotham's fable, 9:7-15) and may hardly be looked to as an ideal. Fourth, if the author is looking forward to kingship as modeled by David as the solution to the crises in Israel at this time, it is curious that, unlike Hezekiah and Josiah centuries later, the accounts of David (1 and 2 Samuel) never portray him as abolishing idolatrous practices and cult centers in the land. It is preferable, therefore to see these refrains as a statement that no one, not even God, is king in this nation. All conduct their affairs as they see fit.

Chapters 17-21 illustrate this, dealing first with the religious symptoms of the problem (chaps. 17-18) and then the social consequences of Israel's Canaanization (chaps. 19-21). Micah, an Ephraimite, set up a pagan cult shrine in his home and instituted his own priesthood (17:1-13). Then the Danites, who cannot drive the Canaanites from the land God allotted to them, come along. On their migration northward to claim unallotted land north of the Sea of Galilee, they seize Micah's priest and his idolatrous images, and when they reach their destination they set up an official cult shrine at Dan. In the meantime, the conduct of the initially nameless Levite (18:30 identifies him as a grandson of Moses) illustrates the corruption infecting even those charged with the spiritual well-being of the nation. Chapters 19-21 illustrate the social rot that comes with the spiritual degeneration of Israel. In fact, in the account of the outrage at Gibeah (19:16-26) are deliberate echoes of the wickedness of Sodom (Gen. 19:1-14). Far from being an ethical community of faith, the Israelites became like the worst of the Canaanites. And instead of exposing the immoral criminals in their midst, the Benjaminites defend them. The book closes with Israel in total disarray politically, spiritually, and morally, with one tribe all but eliminated, leaving the reader to wonder what will become of this people of God.

What then is the enduring significance of this book? First, Israel as a nation survived the dark days of the judges entirely by the grace of God. In mercy He sent oppressors as reminders of their rebellion. In mercy He responded to their cries and raised up deliverers. Second, the book illustrates the fundamental problem of the human heart, depravity. When God's people forget His saving acts, they go after other gods. Third, the book illustrates the inevitable link between spiritual commitments and ethical conduct. There are few human heroes in the book. At the beginning the author presents Othniel as a good judge, but his successors are presented as progressively worse. Deborah is the exception. But then, contrary to popular perceptions, her primary role is not that of a military leader; she is the prophet through whom the Lord raises up Barak. Finally, as Hebrews 11:32-36 declares, despite the questionable morality of the judges, when they cry out to God in faith He enables them to achieve great victories. This is far more to God's credit than theirs. The statement in Hebrews should not be taken as a blanket endorsement of their characters. In the end the book of Judges illustrates the eternal truth: the Lord will build His kingdom/church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Because God's plan of salvation depended on the survival of Israel, He did not let them disappear. On the contrary, by His grace they survived, and later under the leadership of His anointed king David, His glory was proclaimed far and wide.

JUDGING The interpretation of Matt. 7:1 that Christians should not make value judgments of the behavior of others is shown to be erroneous by multiple commands in Scripture to do exactly that (e.g., Matt. 7:15-20; John 7:24; 1 Cor. 5:12; 1 Tim. 3:10). As is frequently the case with biblical truths, the Christian's role in exercising judgment on others is found in a tension between warnings to avoid judging others and admonitions concerning how best to judge others. Christians are to judge others constructively with humility and gentleness (Gal. 6:1). We are forbidden to judge hypocritically, that is, when such judgment entails intolerance of another's sin coupled with blindness of one's own (Matt. 7:1-5; Luke 6:37; John 8:7; Rom. 2:1-4) or when human judgment impinges on God's prerogative as judge (Rom. 14:4; 1 Cor. 4:5; James 4:11-12). Instructions on proper exercise of judgment include (1) the call to judge reputed prophets by their fruits (Matt. 7:15-17), (2) encouragement for Christians to arbitrate between fellow believers who have a dispute rather than going to pagan law courts (1 Cor. 6:1-6), and (3) instructions regarding church cases (Matt. 18:15-20). First Corinthians 5:3-5 illustrates the function of a church court.

JUDGMENT DAY Appointed time in the future when God will intervene in history for the purpose of judging the wicked and upholding the righteous. In OT texts nations are pictured as being judged during this time. Yet in the NT the judgment seems to be more for individuals. In both Testaments the use of “day,” “that day,” or “great day,” are often used in conjunction with or in place of the day of judgment. In the OT Yahweh is pictured as the Judge, whereas in the NT the Judge is Christ.

Old Testament Teaching “The Day of the Lord” (day of Yahweh) is the phrase indicative of judgment in the OT. This phrase “Day of the Lord” is used 16 times in the Prophets. However, other phrases connote the Day of the Lord. The Day of the Lord is called: “great” (Zeph. 1:14; Joel 2:11,31; Mal. 4:5); “day of trouble” (Zeph. 1:15); “a day of destruction” (Isa. 13:6; Joel 1:15); “a day of desolation and waste” (Zeph. 1:15); “darkness and not light” (Amos 5:18); “a day of fire” (Joel 2:30); “earthquake” (Isa. 2:12-22); “day of Yahweh's wrath” (Zeph. 1:15,18; Ezek. 7:19; Isa. 13:9); “a day of battle” (Zech. 14:3); and “a day of vengeance” (Jer. 46:10; Isa. 63:4).

On the day of judgment God will judge nations and peoples. He will judge Judah and Israel (Amos 2:5-16; 3:1-15; Hos. 13:9-11; 1 Chron. 27:24; 2 Chron. 24:18). Also other nations such as Babylon (Isa. 13; Jer. 51:9,52); Egypt (Isa. 7:18; 11:11,16; Ezek. 30:9-19; Mic. 7:12); Ammon (Ezek. 21:28-30); Edom (Isa. 34:5; Ezek. 35:11); and Moab (Jer. 48:21-47) will be judged. Joel 3 refers to Yahweh's judgment against all nations. The day of judgment will also be a personal day of recompense. Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Isaiah are among the first to advance the idea of personal accountability during the day of judgment (Jer. 17:5-11; 31:29-30; Ezek. 18:1-32; 33:17-20; Isa. 1:28; 3:10-11; 10:1-4).

His wrath on that day will be like a consuming fire (Isa. 10:16; Ezek. 15:6; 22:31; 36:5-7) and yet a refining fire (Mal. 3:2-3). The day of judgment will be carried out by Yahweh (Pss. 58:11; 96:10), the Son of Man (Ezek. 20:4; 22:2), or the new Davidic messiah (Isa. 11:1-4). The day of judgment is temporal in nature as seen by use of phrases such as “in that day,” “in the coming day,” “behold the days are coming,” and “the end of days.” The day of judgment has both future and past implications. Prophets such as Amos and Isaiah point to a future time of judgment upon all who shun God's divine law. Yet writers such as Jeremiah and Ezekiel point to a time past when Yahweh executed a day of judgment. The fall of Jerusalem was understood as a day of judgment to those who were taken captive (Lam. 1:12; 2:1,20-22; Ezek. 20:36; 23:11; 36:19).

New Testament Teaching New Testament teaching builds on both OT and intertestamental writings. Generally the NT understands the day of judgment as being closely associated with the Parousia, resurrection of the dead, and the coming kingdom of God. The day of judgment is often referred to as the “day of Christ” (Phil. 1:10; 2:16) or “Day of the Lord” (1 Cor. 5:5; 1 Thess. 5:2; 2 Thess. 2:2; 2 Pet. 3:10). The Gospels point to Christ as the agent who will judge mankind (Matt. 16:27; 19:28; 25:31; Luke 9:26; 17:24; 22:69). However, in the judging sayings of the Gospels often Jesus addressed Jews as recipients of the coming judgment. At the time Christ warned individuals (Matt. 5:22) and towns (Matt. 10:15; Luke 10:14) of the coming judgment. When Christianity broke from Judaism, Christians were warned of the coming judgment (2 Tim. 4:8; Heb. 4:1-13; James 5:7-11; 1 Pet. 1:13-17). Certain apocalyptic texts warn that all persons will be judged at the last day (Rom. 2:1-16; Heb. 4:13; Jude 14-15; Rev. 20:10-15). The day of judgment will be a time for even the angelic beings to be judged as well (1 Cor. 6:3; Jude 6).

The day of judgment will be a time in which all of mankind throughout eternity will be judged. Thus the living and dead of all humanity shall stand and make an account to God (Acts 10:42; 2 Tim. 4:1; 1 Pet. 4:5). While the basis for salvation is in Christ alone (John 3:36), one who is committed to Christ will have deeds of service (Matt. 25:31-46; James 2:14-26; 1 John 2:3-6). These deeds of service will be shown for what they are on the day of judgment (1 Cor. 3:11-15). JUDGMENT SEAT In Matt. 27:19 the raised platform or bench occupied by Pontius Pilate while he was deliberating the accusations made against Jesus and the sentence he would pronounce in connection with Jesus' case. According to Acts 18:12, Paul the apostle was brought before the judgment seat in Corinth. In these two instances the judgment seat is to be understood in its ordinary literal sense. In Rom. 14:10 and 2 Cor. 5:10 the judgment seat of Christ is a theological concept. Those verses stress that individuals are accountable to the Lord for their lives and must one day face Him in judgment. JUDITH (Jū' dīth) Personal name meaning "Jewess." 1. One of Esau's Hittite wives who caused grief for his parents because they feared the women would lead Esau away from his culture and his God (Gen. 26:34-35). 2. Heroine of the book of Judith in the Apocrypha. A pious widow, she beguiled Holfernes, Nebuchadnezzar's general, and delivered her people from him by cutting off his head. See Apocrypha.

JUG Large, deep, earthenware or glass container with a narrow mouth and handle. Neither KJV nor RSV use the term. NIV uses "jug" in three passages: a water jug (1 Sam. 26:11-12,16; KJV, cruse; NRSV, jar) ;anoiljug (1 Kings 17:12,14,16; KJV, RSV, cruse; NRSV, jug); and an unspecified container (Jer. 48:12; KJV, bottle; RSV, jar). The NASB uses jug in six passages. At 1 Sam. 1:24; 10:3; 16:20; 25:18; 2 Sam. 16:1 the translation "skins" is preferable (NIV, NRSV). At Jer. 13:12 the RSV translation "jar" is preferred (NIV, skin). The KJV generally rendered the underlying Hebrew terms as bottle. See Cruse; Flask; Pottery; Vessels and Utensils.

JULIA (Jū' li' á) Common Roman name. In Rom. 16:15 a Christian woman to whom Paul the apostle extended a greeting. Her name suggests she may have had some association with the imperial household. She may have been sister or wife to Philologus and a slave of the emperor.

JULIUS (Jū' li' ūs) Common Roman personal name. In Acts 27:1 a centurion of the Augustan cohort assigned the responsibility of escorting Paul to Rome. Though Paul was his prisoner, Julius treated the apostle with kindness. He allowed Paul to go ashore at Sidon to visit with friends. Later he saved the apostle's life by restraining the soldiers who wanted to kill Paul to keep him from escaping. See Centurion; Paul.

JUNIA (Jū' nī' á) or JUNIAS (Jū' nī' á's) Roman personal name, possibly a shortened form of Junianus. In Rom. 16:7 Paul extended greeting to a certain Junia, whom he referred to as his kinsman, his fellow prisoner, and an apostle. The form of the name is feminine. Nothing is known of this individual beyond what may be inferred from this verse. Some recent JUNIPER In 1 Kings 19:4 a tree under which Elijah the prophet rested as he fled the wrath of Jezebel. The same plant is mentioned in Job 30:4 and Ps. 120:4. The Hebrew word thus translated probably refers to a kind of shrub that grows in the Arabian deserts. Modern translations read “broom.” See Broom Tree.

JUPITER (ju' pi' tēr) Latin name of Zeus, king of Greek gods. KJV translates Zeus as Jupiter (Acts 14:12-13). God worked through Paul to heal a crippled man at Lystra. The people responded by claiming the gods had come to earth. They named Barnabas, Zeus, or Jupiter. The priest of Jupiter tried to offer sacrifices to them. Paul used the opportunity for evangelistic preaching. KJV also inserts Jupiter in Acts 19:35, referring to the image of Artemis or Diana, the goddess for whose worship Ephesus was famous. The Greek says the image fell from heaven (HCSB, NRSV, NASB, REB, NIV, TEV). See Greece.

JUSTICE Order that God seeks to reestablish in His creation where all people receive the benefits of life with Him. As love is for the NT, so justice is the central ethical idea of the OT. The prevalence of the concept is sometimes missed by the reader due to a failure to realize the wide range of meaning in the Hebrew word mishpat, particularly in passages that deal with the material and social necessities of life.

Nature of Justice Justice has two major aspects. First, it is the standard by which penalties are assigned for breaking the obligations of the society. Second, justice is the standard by which the advantages of social life are handed out, including material goods, rights of participation, opportunities, and liberties. It is the standard for both punishment and benefits and thus can be spoken of as a plumb line. “I shall use justice as a plumbline and righteousness as a plummet” (Isa. 28:17, REB).

Often people think of justice in the Bible only in the first sense as God's wrath on evil. This aspect of justice indeed is present, such as the judgment mentioned in John 3:19. Often more vivid words like “wrath” are used to describe punitive justice (Rom. 1:18).

Justice in the Bible very frequently also deals with benefits. Cultures differ widely in determining the basis by which the benefits are to be justly distributed. For some it is by birth and nobility. For others the basis is might or ability or merit. On the other hand, it might simply be whatever is the law or whatever has been established by contracts. The Bible takes another possibility. Benefits are distributed according to need. Justice then is very close to love and grace. God “executes justice for the orphan and the widow, and shows His love for the alien by giving him food and clothing” (Deut. 10:18, NASB; cp. Hos. 10:12; Isa. 30:18).

Various needy groups are the recipients of justice. These groups include widows, fatherless, resident aliens (also called “sojourners” or “strangers”), wage earners, the poor, and prisoners, slaves, and the sick (Job 29:12-17; Ps. 146:7-9; Mal. 3:5). Each of these groups has specific needs that keep its members from being able to participate in aspects of the life of their community. Even life itself might be threatened. Justice involves meeting those needs. The forces which deprive people of what is basic for community life are condemned as oppression (Mic. 2:2; Eccles. 4:1). To oppress is to use power for one's own advantage in depriving others of their basic rights in the community (Mark 12:40). To do justice is to correct that abuse and to meet those needs (Isa. 1:17). Injustice is depriving others of their basic needs or failing to correct matters when those rights are not met (Jer. 5:28; Job 29:12-17). Injustice is either a sin of commission or of omission.

The content of justice, the benefits which are to be distributed as basic rights in the community, can be identified by observing what is at stake in the passages in which “justice,” “righteousness,” and “judgment” occur. The needs which are met include land (Ezek. 45:6-9; cp. Mic. 2:2; 4:4) and the means to produce from the land, such as draft animals and millstones (Deut. 22:1-4; 24:6). These productive concerns are basic to securing other essential needs and thus avoiding dependency; thus the millstone is called the “life” of the person (Deut. 24:6). Other needs are those essential for mere physical existence and well being: food (Deut. 10:18; Ps. 146:7), clothing (Deut. 24:13), and shelter (Ps. 68:6; Job 8:6). Job 22:5-9,23; 24:1-12 decries the injustice of depriving people of each one of these needs, which are material and economic. The equal protection of each person in civil and judicial procedures is represented in the demand for due process (Deut. 16:18-20). Freedom from bondage is comparable to not being “in hunger, in thirst, in nakedness, and in the lack of all things” (Deut. 28:48 NASB).

Justice presupposes God's intention for people to be in community. When people had become poor and weak with respect to the rest of the community, they were to be strengthened so that they could continue to be effective members of the community—living with them and beside them (Lev. 25:35-36). Thus biblical justice restores people to community. By justice those who lacked the power and resources to participate in significant aspects of the community were to be strengthened so that they could. This concern in Lev. 25 is illustrated by the provision of the Year of Jubilee, in which at the end of the 50-year period land is restored to those who had lost it through sale or foreclosure of debts (v. 28). Thus they regained economic power and were brought back into the economic community. Similarly, interest on loans was prohibited (v. 36) as a process that pulled people down, endangering their position in the community.

These legal provisions express a further characteristic of justice. Justice delivers; it does not merely relieve the immediate needs of those in dire straits (Ps. 76:9; Isa. 45:8; 58:11; 62:1-2). Helping the needy means setting them back on their feet, giving a home, leading to prosperity, restoration, ending the oppression (Pss. 68:5-10; 10:15-16; cp. 107; 113:7-9). Such thorough justice can be socially disruptive. In the Jubilee year as some receive back lands, others lose recently acquired additional land. The advantage to some is a disadvantage to others. In some cases the two aspects of justice come together. In the act of restoration, those who were victims of justice receive benefits while their exploiters are punished (1 Sam 2:7-10; cp. Luke 1:51-53; 6:20-26).

The Source of Justice As the sovereign Creator of the universe, God is just (Ps. 99:1-4; Gen. 18:25; Deut. 32:4; Jer. 9:24), particularly as the defender of all the oppressed of the earth (Pss. 76:9; 103:6; Jer. 49:11). Justice thus is universal (Ps. 9:7-9) and applies to each covenant or dispensation. Jesus affirmed for His day the centrality of the OT demand for justice (Matt. 23:23). Justice is the work of the NT people of God (James 1:27).

God's justice is not a distant external standard. It is the source of all human justice (Prov. 29:26; 2 Chron. 19:6,9). Justice is grace received and grace shared (2 Cor. 9:8-10).

The most prominent human agent of justice is the ruler. The king receives God's justice and is a channel for it (Ps. 72:1; cp. Rom. 13:1-2,4). There is not a distinction between a personal, voluntary justice and a legal, public justice. The same caring for the needy groups of the society is demanded of the ruler (Ps. 72:4; Ezek. 34:4; Jer. 22:15-16). Such justice was also required of pagan rulers (Dan. 4:27; Prov. 31:8-9).

Justice is also a central demand on all people who bear the name of God. Its claim is so basic that without it other central demands and provisions of God are not acceptable to God. Justice is required to be present with the sacrificial system (Amos 5:21-24; Mic. 6:6-8; Isa. 1:11-17; Matt. 5:23-24), fasting (Isa. 58:1-10), tithing (Matt. 23:23), obedience to the other commandments (Matt. 19:16-21), or the presence of the temple of God (Jer. 7:1-7).

Justice in Salvation Apart from describing God's condemnation of sin, Paul used the language and meaning of justice to speak of personal salvation. "The righteousness of God" represents God in grace bringing into the community of God through faith in Christ those who had been outside of the people of God (particularly in Romans but cp. also Eph. 2:12-13). See Government; Law; Poverty; Righteousness; Welfare. Stephen Charles Mott

JUSTIFICATION Divine, forensic act of God, based on the work of Christ upon the cross, whereby a sinner is pronounced righteous by the imputation of the righteousness of Christ. The doctrine of justification is developed most fully by the Apostle Paul as the central truth explaining how both Jew and Gentile can be made right before God on the exact same basis, that being faith in Jesus Christ. Without this divine truth, there can be no unity in the body of Christ, hence its centrality to Paul's theology of the Church and salvation.

Old Testament The OT functioned as the Scriptures of the primitive NT Church, so that one must identify the sources in the OT that gave rise to the understanding of the term “justification” (and the related terms “just” and “to justify”). Clearly a wide range of uses of “just” or “righteous” (both fully valid translations of the Hebrew tsadiq and the Greek dikaios) can be seen in the OT, including the description of men as “just” or “righteous” in God's sight (Job 1:1). However, a specific set of passages provides the clearest background of the apostolic understanding. These include Exod. 23:7, “Stay far away from a false accusation. Do not kill the innocent and the just, because I will not justify the guilty” (HCSB), where the legal standing of the person described as “righteous” is in view. To “acquit” here is to “justify.” This is clearly a forensic or legal context, the giving of a judgment. Deuteronomy 25:1 also uses the same language: “If there is a dispute between men, they are to go to court, and the judges will hear their case. They will clear the innocent and condemn the guilty,” where the law court is again the context and “to justify” is clearly to render a verdict. Likewise Prov. 17:15 and Isa. 5:23 use these same terms in a forensic or judicial context. These uses show that the apostolic use in the NT is not foreign to the OT Scriptural background.

The apostles were convinced the truth of justification by faith as a free and divine act of God based solely upon the exercise of faith and nothing more was not only consistent with the divine revelation of the OT, but they specifically drew from those Scriptures a positive witness to their teaching. Paul focused especially upon the key passage regarding Abraham, “Abram believed the LORD, and He credited it to him as righteousness” (Gen. 15:6 HCSB). This passage forms the central core of Paul's defense of his doctrine of justification in Rom. 4.

New Testament The centrality of the doctrine of justification comes out naturally in the writings of Paul, as it fell to him to explicate the ground of the believer's relationship to God in light of the relationship of Jew and Gentile in the one body of Christ. The conflict brought about by the Judaizers' insistence upon law keeping and circumcision forced the apostle to define with precision the basis of forgiveness and just how it is that any person, Jew or Gentile, can have peace with God. This explains the appearance of the doctrine primarily in those works directly related to the definition and defense of the gospel (Romans and Galatians).

The meaning of the family of Greek terms translated variously as “to justify” or “to declare righteous” is established clearly by its usage in the key passages in the NT. The term does not mean “to subjectively change into a righteous person” but instead means “to declare righteous,” specifically, to declare righteous upon the act of faith based upon the work of another, the divine substitute, Jesus Christ. Justification then involves both the forensic, legal declaration of the righteousness of the believer as well as the imputation of the righteousness of Christ as the grounds and basis of their acceptance. The fact that it is the righteousness of Christ which is imputed to the believer accounts for the resulting perfection of the relationship between the believer and God: “Therefore, since we have been declared righteous by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ” (Rom. 5:1 HCSB).

Paul's epistle to the churches of Galatia presents justification by faith as the focal point of attack by those he describes as “false brothers” (Gal. 2:4). The proclamation of a curse at the beginning of the epistle (1:6-8) places the entire discussion at the highest level of importance, and Paul's insistence that he is speaking of that which is the “truth of the gospel” (2:5) in contrast to a false gospel likewise focuses attention upon the argument he presents. The essence of his argument is placed in the context of his encounter with Peter and the Judaizers in Antioch. When Peter and even Barnabas withdrew from having table fellowship with the Gentiles in the fellowship, Paul recognized this action reflected an idea that one could be “more” Christian than someone else due to something one did, in this case, because one was circumcised. This would introduce a tiered fellowship of lesser and greater Christians. It is in this context that Paul insists upon justification by faith in opposition to justification by any work of righteousness, for faith, by nature, places all men on the same level and allows for no gradation. Hence, justification by “works of the law” is specifically denied and is instead contrasted to justification by faith (2:16). The very grace of God is nullified if there is any means of righteousness outside of faith in Christ, and specifically, through works of law (2:21). Instead, by citing the all encompassing scope of the law, the apostle proves that righteousness was never intended to come by law keeping (3:10,12). Instead, Paul derives from the testimony of Hab. 2:4, “the righteous man will live by faith,” the conclusion that no one is justified before God by law keeping (3:11). Christ redeems from the curse of the law by His death and that blessing is passed on, not through the avenue of law but that of faith (3:13-17). So strong is Paul's condemnation of the opposite position that he describes it as “bondage” (5:1) and being cut off from grace and from Christ (5:4). The strongest language used in all the NT is employed by the apostle against those who added a single requirement of “good works” and “law keeping” to the gospel of grace.

The letter to the Romans comprises the single longest, thought-out presentation of the gospel in all of sacred Scripture. Justification takes up the focus of chapters 3-5. While the discussion in Galatians is marked by the passion of debate, Romans presents a relentless and logical argument, drawn from scriptural foundations. After establishing the universal sinfulness of man in Rom. 1:18-3:19, Paul provides an over arching summary of the truth of justification in 3:20-31, followed by his scriptural defense, drawn primarily from the life of Abraham, in chapter four. He insists that no one will ever be justified by works of law before God (3:19-20). Instead, God's righteousness comes through “faith in Jesus Christ...given to all who believe” (3:22), whether they are Jew or Gentile. God does not justify as a result of man's actions but instead justifies “freely” as a gift by His grace” (3:24). The Father can justify believers because of the redemption that flows from the work of Christ (3:25-26), so that Paul can conclude that justification is wholly the work of God, obtained solely by faith alone (3:28).

These broad assertions are proven through the example of Abraham, who was justified by faith without works of law in Gen. 15:6. The contrast is drawn between the “working” one who receives a wage (4:4) and the “not-working one” who instead believes in the God who justifies (4:5). Paul quotes from Ps. 32 and interprets these words to mean that God credits righteousness apart from works and then proves this by rhetorically asking if this mercy was shown to Abraham before, or after, he received circumcision. Since he was justified before he was circumcised, Paul concludes that the promise of Gen. 15 cannot be undone by the giving of law that comes afterward. In the same way, we are justified by faith and not by the observance of law.

Upon completion of his biblical defense, Paul can conclude that the relationship described by the word “justified” is one that brings true and lasting peace between God and man (Rom. 5:1). This is the essence of biblical justification: right relationship between God and man. But the beauty of justification by faith is seen in the fact that it is God who establishes this relationship through Christ, so that it is not merely a temporary state that can be destroyed by man's actions but is instead a state that results in eternal peace between the redeemed and the Redeemer.

JUSTUS (Jūs' tūs) Common Jewish personal name. 1. In Acts 1:23 the surname of Joseph Barsabbas, one of two men put forward to replace Judas Iscariot among the Twelve. 2. A pious man, probably a Roman citizen, whose home joined the synagogue in Corinth (Acts 18:7). Paul left the synagogue and moved into the home of Titius Justus (KJV omits Titius following some Greek manuscripts). Some scholars equate him with Titus (following some Greek manuscripts), while more identify him with Gaius of Rom. 16:23. Neither identification is more than a scholarly guess based on similarity of name. 3. Surname of a fellow minister with Paul (Col. 4:11).

JUTTAH (Jüt' tah) Place-name meaning "spread out." Town in hill country of tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:55) given to the Levites (Josh. 21:16). It may be located at modern Yatta, six miles southwest of Hebron.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY Juvenile delinquency was treated very seriously by the writers of the Bible because rebellion among children, in disrupting the authority structure of the family, tore at the very fabric of society. A well-ordered family prevented trouble outside the home which in turn ensured a stable society (cp. Eph. 6:2-3).

God expects parents to control their children and children to obey their parents (Exod. 20:12; Eph. 6:1-4; 1 Tim. 3:4) yet realizes that this is not always the case (Isa. 3:5; Ezek. 22:7). The sons of Eli (1 Sam. 2:22-25; cp. 8:3), the boys who jeered at Elisha (2 Kings 2:23-24), and the prodigal son (Luke 15:12-13) are all examples of juvenile delinquency. The Mosaic law categorized striking (Exod. 21:15), cursing, (Exod. 21:17) and dishonoring (Deut. 27:16) one's parents as acts of familial rebellion and mandated that a son who refused correction should be stoned in public (Deut. 21:18-21).

In spite of the responsibility placed on parents for child rearing (Deut. 6:7; Prov. 13:24; 19:18; 22:6; Eph. 6:1-4), the Bible recognizes that, ultimately, children are responsible for their own actions (Ezek. 18:10-13). Jesus used the example of the prodigal son to teach that everyone stands delinquent before God and must come to Him for forgiveness (Luke 15:11-32).

KAB (Kāb) A measure of volume mentioned only in 2 Kings 6:25. Descriptions in ancient sources indicate a kab would be slightly larger than a quart. See Weights and Measures.

KABZEEL (Kāb' za ʿil) Place-name meaning “may God gather”; same as Jekabzeel in Neh. 11:25. Located in the southeast part of Judah near the border of Edom (Josh. 15:21). The home of Benaiah, an officer under David and Solomon (2 Sam. 23:20; 1 Chron. 11:22). One of the towns reoccupied by the Jews after the return from the exile (Neh. 11:25).

KADESH (Kā' dēsh) or KADESH-BARNEA (Kā' dēsh-bār nē' á) Place-name meaning “consecrated.” The site where the Hebrews stayed for most of the 38 years after leaving Mount Sinai and before entering the promised land. The OT locates it between the Wilderness of Paran and the Wilderness of Zin (Num. 13:3-21,26). Moses sent out the 12 spies into Canaan from Kadeshbarnea (Num. 13:3-21,26). The Hebrews also attempted their abortive southern penetration into Canaan from there (Num. 13:26; 14:40-45). Kadesh-barnea is mentioned as a site where Abraham fought the Amalekites (Gen. 14:7) and as the southern border of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:3).

The actual site of Kadesh-barnea has been much debated, but the two most frequently mentioned sites are Ein-Qedeis and Ein el-Qudeirat. Both of these sites are in the northern part of the Sinai Peninsula, and both have a spring. Most scholars today accept Ein el-Qudeirat because of its abundance of water (the largest springs and oasis in northern Sinai). Ein el-Qudeirat is located on the crossroads of two major roads of antiquity—the road from Edom to Egypt and the road from the Red Sea to the Negev and southern Canaan, later southern Judah. The location on the road from Egypt to Edom would fit well the biblical context of Kadesh-barnea as the oasis home for the Hebrews during the wildernesswandering period. Likewise, the location of Kadesh-barnea along the north-south road may explain the rationale for attempting the invasion of Canaan at Arad, since Arad lay north of Kadesh-barnea on that road.

Excavations of Ein el-Qudeirat have shown major fortresses dating from the period of Solomon to the fall of the monarchy (10th century B.C. to sixth century B.C.), but no remains from the period of the wilderness wandering have been found to date. This raises the question about the identity of the site of Kadesh-barnea. The site has not been fully excavated, however, and as yet no better alternative site has come to light.

KADESH-MERIBAH (Ká' dēsh-mēr' ī bāh) TEV transliteration of a phrase from the Hebrew text of Ezek. 47:19. The name is translated in the KJV as “the waters of strife in Kadesh” (Num. 20:2-13; Deut. 32:51; cp. Exod. 17:1-7). RSV has “Meribath-kadesh,” and NIV has “Meribah Kadesh” at Deut. 32:51; Ezek. 47:19. NASB has “Meribah-kadesh” at Deut. 32:51 and “Meribath-kadesh” at Ezek. 47:19. TEV has “When you were at the waters of Meribah, near the town of Kadesh” at Deut. 32:51. The same town as Kadesh-barnea. See Kadesh-barnea.

KADMIEL (Kād' mī ēl) Personal name meaning “ God is of old” or” God goes before.” 1. Levite who returned from the Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel. A representative of the line of Hodaviah (Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:43, Hodevah), also known as the line of Judah (Ezra 3:9). Helped rebuild the temple. 2. Levite who helped Ezra in the reaffirmation of the covenant after the return from the exile (Neh. 9:4-5). 3. Levite who signed the covenant after the exile (Neh. 10:9). The relationship between these persons is unclear. They may all represent the same person or be father and son.

KADMONITE (Kād' mon it) Name of a people meaning “easterners.” Tribe God promised (Gen. 15:19) Israel would dispossess. They probably inhabited the Syro-Arabian desert between Palestine-Syria and the Euphrates—which is to say areas to the east of Canaan. Their names often have Arabian associations. They may be related to the “children of the east” mentioned in Judg. 6:33. The sons of the concubines of Abraham were sent to live in the “east country” (Kedem) away from Isaac (Gen. 25:6). Job (Job 1:3), the camel-riding Midianite kings (Judg. 8:10-12,21,26), and the wise men whose names have Arabian associations (1 Kings 4:30-31) are all described as sons of the east.

KAIN (Kān) Tribe and place-name meaning “smith.” 1. Clan mentioned in the fourth oracle of Balaam (Num. 24:22; KJV, Kenite). Adam and Eve's son Cain is spelled the same in Hebrew, and many scholars regard Cain as the ancestors of the Kenites. See Kenites. 2. City southeast of Hebron in southern Judah (Josh. 15:57; KJV, NEB, Cain). Identified with Khirbet Yaqin. According to Arabian tradition Abraham watched the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah from a nearby hill. Kain was a settlement of the Kenites.

KAIWAN (Kī' wān) Babylonian god (Amos 5:26). KJV transliterates the name as Chiun. As is often the case when foreign gods were referred to, the original vowels of the name were probably replaced with the vowels of the Hebrew word for “abomination.” See Chiun; Gods, Pagan; Sakkuth.

KALLAI (Kāl' lā ī) Personal name meaning “swift” or “light.” A chief priest who returned from exile during the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:20).

KAMON (Kā' mōn) City of Gilead where Jair, judge of Israel, was buried (Judg. 10:5; KJV, Camon). The precise location is unknown.

KANAH (Kā' nah) Place-name meaning “place of reeds.” 1. Name of a brook that forms part of the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. 16:8; 17:9). Some of the cities of Manasseh, however, were south of the brook Kanah (Josh. 16:9). Identified by some with the modern Wadi Qanah.

2. City on the northern border of Asher (Josh. 19:28). Identified with modern Qana, about six miles southeast of Tyre. Not to be confused with Cana of the NT.

KAREAH (Ká rē' ah) Personal name meaning “bald.” Father of Johanan and Jonathan during the time of Jeremiah (Jer. 40:8,13,15-16; 41:11,13-14,16; 42:1,8; 43:2,4-5; 2 Kings 25:23 KJV, Careah).

KARKA (Kār' ká) or KARKAA (Kār ká' á) Place-name meaning “ground” or “floor.” A city on the southern border of Judah (Josh. 15:3; KJV, Karkaa). Precise location unknown.

KARKOR (Kār' kôr) Place-name meaning “soft, level ground.” A mountainous village in the eastern region of Gilead during the period of the judges. The exact site has not been located. Gideon and three hundred Israelite men conducted their second surprise attack on the Midianites at Karkor. According to Judg. 8:10-11, Zebah and Zalmunna, two Midianites leaders, were encamped at Karkor with 15,000 troops when Gideon attacked and routed them.

KARNAIM (Kār nā' ım) Place-name meaning “horns.” A city in northern Transjordan. The same as Ashteroth-karnaim and Ashtaroth. Amos used the name of this city and that of LoDebar to make a word play (Amos 6:13). See Ashtaroth; Lo-Debar (for the details of the word play).

KARTAH (Kār' tah) Place-name meaning “city.” Levitical city in the territory of Zebulun (Josh. 21:34). Location unknown. See Levitical Cities.

KARTAN (Kār' tăn) Place-name meaning “city.” A Levitical city in the tribal territory of Naphtali (Josh. 21:32). Also called Kiriathaim (1 Chron. 6:76). It was located near the Sea of Galilee. Usually identified with modern Khirbet el-Qureiyeh. See Levitical Cities.

KATTAH (Kăt' tah) (NASB) or KATTATH (Kăt' tătth) Place-name meaning “small.” A town in the tribal territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15). Probably the same as Kitron (Judg. 1:30). See Kitron.

KATYDID (Lev. 11:22 NIV) See Insects.

KEBAR (Kē' bār) (NIV) See Chebar.

KEDAR (Kē' dār) Personal name meaning “mighty” or “swarthy” or “black.” The second son of Ishmael and a grandson of Abraham (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chron. 1:29). The name occurs later in the Bible presumably as a reference to a tribe that took its name from Kedar. Little concrete information is known about the group, however. Apparently the descendants of Kedar occupied the area south of Palestine and east of Egypt (Gen. 25:18). They may best be described as nomadic, living in tents (Ps. 120:5; Song 1:5) and raising sheep and goats (Isa. 60:7; Jer. 49:28-29,32), as well as camels, which they sold as far away as Tyre (Ezek. 27:21).

The Kedarites were led by princes (Ezek. 27:21) and were famous for their warriors, particularly their archers (Isa. 21:17). They evidently were of some importance during the time of Isaiah (Isa. 21:16). See Abraham; Ishmael.

Hugh Tobias

KEDEMAH (Kēd' ə mah) Personal and tribal name meaning “eastward.” The last son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:31). Probably head of an Arabian tribe of the same name. Probably considered among the Kadmonites. See Kadmonites.

KEDEMOTH (Kēd' ə mōth) Place-name meaning “ancient places” or “eastern places.” One of the Levitical cities in the tribal territory of Reuben assigned to the family of Merari (Josh. 13:18; 21:37; 1 Chron. 6:79). From the wilderness nearby, Moses sent a delegation to Sihon, king of the Amorites, requesting passage through his country (Deut. 2:26). The city is associated with either Kasr ez-Za'feran or Khirbet er Remeil. Both of these cities are in the same vicinity and were in existence in Abraham's day. See Levitical Cities.

KEDESH (Kē' dēsh) Place-name meaning “sacred place” or “sanctuary.” 1. A city in the southern part of Judah (Josh. 15:23). Probably the same as Kadesh-barnea. See Kadesh-barnea. 2. Canaanite town in eastern Galilee defeated by Joshua (Josh. 12:22). The town was allotted to Naphtali (Josh. 19:32,37) and was called Kedesh in Naphtali (Judg. 4:6). It was also called Kedesh in Galilee and given to the Gershonite Levites as one of their cities (Josh. 20:7; 21:32). Kedesh in Naphtali was the home of Barak (Judg. 4:6) and the place where Deborah and Barak gathered their forces for battle (Judg. 4:1-10). Heber the Kenite pitched his tent in the vicinity where Sisera met his death at the hands of Jael, Heber's wife (Judg. 4:21; 5:24-27). Kedesh in Naphtali was captured by Tiglath-pileser III during the reign of Pekah of Israel. The inhabitants were exiled to Assyria (2 Kings 15:29). Usually identified with modern Khirbet Qedish, about two miles south of Tiberias. See Levitical Cities. 3. City in Issachar allotted to the Gershomite Levites (1 Chron. 6:72). The town is also called Kishon (Josh. 21:28 KJV; Kishion in other versions). It has been suggested that “Kedesh in Issachar” may have arisen from a misreading of “Kishon” for “Kedesh.” The site is uncertain, perhaps modern Tell Abu Qudeis, about two miles southeast of Megiddo.

KEHELATHAH (Kē hā lā' thah) Place-name meaning “assembly.” One of the desert camps of the Israelites during the wilderness wandering (Num. 33:22-23). Location unknown.

KEILAH (Kē ī' lah) Personal and place-name, perhaps meaning “fortress.” 1. Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:19). 2. Fortified city in the lowland plain (Shephelah) of the territory of Judah identified with modern Khirbet Qila, about eight miles northwest of Hebron and 18 miles southwest of Jerusalem. David rescued the city from a Philistine attack but later withdrew fearing the populace would hand him over to Saul (1 Sam. 23:1-13). The city was rebuilt by the returning exiles (Neh. 3:17-18). One of the traditional sites of the burial place of Habakkuk.

KELAIAH (Kə li' ah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “Yahweh has dishonored.” One of the Levites who divorced his foreign wife during the time of Ezra. Also identified as Kelita (Ezra 10:23). See Kelita.

KELAL (Kə' lāl) (NIV) See Chelal.

KELITA (Kə li' tā) Personal name probably meaning “crippled, dwarfed one,” but perhaps also meaning “adopted one.” A Levite who assisted in interpreting the Law when it was read to the assembly of the people during the time of Ezra (Neh. 8:7) and who participated in the sealing of the covenant (Neh. 10:10). Kelita is perhaps a nickname for Kelaiah mentioned in Ezra 10:23. There Kelaiah (that is, the dwarf) gave up his foreign wife in accordance with the instructions of Ezra.

KEMUEL (Kəm' u) Personal name of uncertain meaning; perhaps meaning “helper of God” or “assembly of God.” 1. Father of Aram, and the son of Abraham's brother Nahor (Gen. 22:21). 2. Son of Shiptan and representative of Ephraim in the division of Canaan among the tribes of Israel (Num. 34:24). 3. Father of Hashabiah, a Levite during the time of David (1 Chron. 27:17).

KENAN (Kə' nán) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Grandson of Adam, son of Enosh, and father of Mahalaleel (Gen. 5:9-14; KJV, Cainan; 1 Chron. 1:2). Listed as Cainan among the ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:37). See Cainan; Enosh.

KENANIAH (Kĕ nā nī' ah) (NIV, REB) See Chenaniah.

KENATH (Kĕ' nāth) Place-name of uncertain meaning. City in eastern Gilead taken by Nobah and given his name (Num. 32:42). The city was known as Kenath at a later time when it fell into the hands of Aram and Geshur (1 Chron. 2:23). The city is usually identified with the modern Qanawat in el-Hauran. Kenath was the easternmost city of the Decapolis. See Decapolis.

KENAZ (Kĕ' nāz) Personal name of unknown meaning. 1. Son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau, he was a clan chieftain of the Edomites (Gen. 36:11,15). 2. Father of Othniel, Israel's first-mentioned judge (Josh. 15:17; Judg. 1:13) and a brother to Caleb; also was the father of Seriah (1 Chron. 4:13). 3. Grandson of Caleb and son of Elah (1 Chron. 4:15). The Kenizzites are thought to be the people of Kenaz. Their land was promised to Abraham's offspring (Gen. 15:19). They were a nomadic people from the southeast who inhabited Hebron, Debir, and parts of the Negev. They are variously associated with Judah, Edom, and the Kenites. See Kenizzite.

KENEZITE (Kĕ' nēz it) (KJV) See Kenizzite.

KENITES (Kĕn' its) Name of a tribe meaning “smith.” Nomadic tribe, probably of blacksmiths, whose land, along with that of the Kadmonites and Kenizzites, God promised to Abraham (Gen. 15:19). Their home was the southeastern hill country of Judah. Balaam pronounced doom and captivity for them (Num. 24:21-22). Moses' father-in-law Jethro is called a “priest of Midian” (Exod. 3:1) and is described as a Kenite (Judg. 1:16). This association suggests a close relationship between the Kenites and Midianites. Some scholars have suggested that Moses learned about the worship of Yahweh through Kenite influence, but this theory contradicts the biblical witness.

The Kenites lived among the Amalekites during the time of Saul. The Kenites “showed kindness” to Israel during the time of the exodus (1 Sam. 15:6). The Chronicler includes the Kenite, Hemath, the father of the Rechabites, as one of the ancestors of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:55). No mention is made of the Kenites in the late history of Israel suggesting to many scholars that they disappeared or lost their identity shortly after 1000 B.C.

The word “Kenite” is probably related to an Aramaic word that means “smith.” Some scholars think the traveling blacksmiths of the Middle Ages resembled the Kenites. This would account for their relations with different peoples. In addition to their nomadic character, the biblical evidence also indicates that the Kenites were never completely absorbed by another people but maintained a separate existence throughout their history. See Amalekite; Cain; Jethro; Midian, Midianites; Moses.

KENIZZITE (Kĕn' iz zit) Clan name of uncertain meaning. Clan that God promised Abraham the Israelites would dispossess (Gen. 15:19). The Kenizzites lived in the Negev, the southern desert region of Judah, before the conquest of the land by Joshua. The tribe of Judah absorbed some of the Kenizzites while Edom absorbed others. The Kenizzites were probably related to the Kenites from whom they would have learned the craft of metalworking (1 Chron. 4:13-14). They probably derived their name from Kenaz—a descendant of Esau (Gen. 36:11,15)—who is listed among the Edomite chieftains (Gen. 36:42). Jephunneh the Kenizzite may have married a woman of the tribe of Judah. Their son was Caleb (Num. 32:12; Josh. 14:6,14; 15:13). See Kenaz; Kenites.

KENOSIS View asserting that the eternal Son of God by virtue of the incarnation gave up some or all of the divine attributes which were incommensurate with a fully human existence. This view is primarily based on Phil. 2:5-11, especially verse 7, which states that Christ “emptied Himself.” The idea of self-emptying is taken from the Greek verb kenoo which means “make empty.”

Other Scriptures cited in support of this thesis are Mark 13:32 that shows Christ's ignorance of the time of the end and John 11:34 seeming to show Jesus' lack of omniscience, as He did not know where Lazarus lay.

Although, as originally construed, the kenosis view of Christ sought to do full justice to the real humanity of Jesus, in reality it is a serious assault on the true deity of Jesus Christ. Most evangelicals have resisted the kenotic view and have replaced it with what may be termed a subkenotic view stating that what Christ laid aside in the incarnation was not some or all of the divine attributes such as omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence. Instead, what Christ “emptied Himself” of was the independent use of these attributes in order to live a normal human life. His dependence on the Father for strength and wisdom is found in such passages as John 5:19,30 and 6:57. Also, in Matt. 12:22-30 Jesus is seen casting out demons by the Holy Spirit (Matt. 4:1; Mark 1:12; Luke 4:1). No doubt this is a valiant attempt to safeguard the full humanity of Jesus Christ, while also maintaining His full deity which Scripture clearly affirms (John 1:1-14; 8:58; 1 John 5:20; Rom. 9:5). The problem remains, however, whether it is truly successful. In light of Paul's clear affirmation that in Christ all the fullness of the deity dwells bodily (Col. 2:9), one must try to reconcile this very high and early Christology with the subkenotic theological understanding of Phil. 2:5-11. This appears impossible.

An alternative reading of the Phil. 2:5-11 passage affords a solution which discounts all types of kenotic doctrine concerning Christ. The real concern of Paul in Phil. 2 is not a preincarnate Christ who “empties Himself” in the incarnation, thereby equating the kenosis with his incarnation. Rather, the already incarnate Christ (see Phil. 2:5) is referred to as doing something with the expression “emptied Himself” (heauton ekenosen). Paul is thinking in scriptural categories, having Isaiah's prophecies concerning the servant of Yahweh in (Phil. 2:10-11 with Isa. 45:23). The words “emptied Himself” suggest that the incarnate Christ is to pour out His life, having taken a position of a servant and (already) the likeness of humanity, as a fulfillment of Isaiah's conceptual parallel in Isa. 53:12: “poured out Himself to death” (NASB). To this Paul adds “even to death on a cross” (Phil. 2: 8 HCSB).

In this passage the incarnation is the presupposition of the kenosis. A further comparison of Phil. 2:9 with Isa. 52:13 shows this “servant” section to be Paul's source material throughout this wonderful christological passage. A high Christology can therefore be maintained in this passage. For Paul the incarnation was an addition not a subtraction. Human nature was added to the person of the Son of God. Jesus Christ was not less than God; He was (and is) more. As the God-Man, Christ Jesus gave His life in obedience to the Father as a ransom for many (Mark 10:45). See Christ, Christology; Incarnation.

KERCHIEFS KJV translation of the Hebrew word translated as “veils” in modern translations of Ezek. 13:18,21. Ezekiel compares the kerchiefs or veils used by women who prophesied “from their own inspiration” (v. 17 NASB) to nets used to catch birds. According to this comparison, the kerchiefs were like nets used to catch the souls of persons. God declared through Ezekiel that he would free His people from the snares these women set for them.

KERE-KETHIB (Kē rā-kē thēv') Transliteration of Hebrew terms meaning “read” and “written.” The terms represent notations made in the margin of the Hebrew text by early scribes called Masoretes. In such cases the text has the written consonants of the traditional text, but the scribes had placed vowel points in the text indicating how the word should be read. In the margin of the text stand the consonants of the word to be read. An example is the perpetual kere involving God's personal name, where the Hebrew text contains the consonants yhw̄h with the vowels a, o, a from adonai, the Hebrew word for Lord in which i is actually a Hebrew consonant. The textual margin would read 'dni, the consonants of adonai. How such readings developed in the history of the text is not known. They may have been early attempts to correct a text known to be incorrectly copied. They may have sought to make the text read in worship by the community conform to a standard written text. It may have been an attempt to record known differences between Hebrew texts at the time of the copyist. Some examples may have been theologically motivated, as the change in the divine name warned the reader not to pronounce the sacred name but to replace it with adonai or Lord.

KEREN-HAPPUCH (Kēr ĕn-hāp' pūk) Personal name meaning “paint-horn,” that is, “cosmetic box.” The youngest daughter born to Job after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42:14).

KERETHITES (Kēr' ə thīts) (NIV, REB) See Cherethites.

KERIOTH (Kēr' rī-ōth) Place-name meaning “cities.” A fortified city of Moab (Jer. 48:24,41; Amos 2:2 [KJV, Kiriath]). Keriath may be identical to Ar, the ancient capital of Moab, since Keriath was treated as the capital of Moab by Amos (2:2). Judas, the disciple of Jesus, may have been from Keriath. Many scholars take the designation “Iscariot” to be derived from the Hebrew meaning “man of Keriath.” See Iscariot.

KERIOTH-HEZRON (Kēr' rī-ōth-hēz' rōn) Place-name representing one or perhaps two cities. KJV uses the Hebrew to refer to two cities in Josh. 15:25—thus, Keriath and Hezron. Some scholars still follow this. If this is a reference to two cities, Keriath would be identified with the Keriath of Jer. 48:24; Amos 2:2. Hezron would be identified with the city of Hazor mentioned in Josh. 15:23, a city in the south of Judah near Kadesh-barnea (Josh. 15:3). Many scholars, however, take Keriath-hezron to refer to a village of Judah in the Negev district of Beersheba and identify it with modern Khirbet el-Qaryatein, about four miles south of Maon. See Hazor; Keriath.

KEROS (Kēr' rōs) Personal name meaning “bent.” One of the temple servants whose descendants returned from the exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47).

KERUB (Kēr' rūb) (NIV, REB) See Cherub.

KERYGMA (Kērīg' má) Transliteration of the Greek kerugma, “the content of what is preached”; “the message”; closely connected with the act of preaching. The word occurs eight times in the NT (Matt. 12:41; Luke 11:32; Rom. 16:25; 1 Cor. 1:21; 2:4; 15:14; 2 Tim. 4:17; Titus 1:3). The verb form is kerusso. The one proclaiming, announcing, preaching is a kerux, a herald or preacher (1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11).

Repentance comes, God saves those who believe (1 Cor. 1:21), believers are strengthened and confirmed (Rom. 16:25) through the message preached (Matt. 12:41; Luke 11:32). Foundational to preaching in the NT is utter dependence on the Spirit of God to accomplish its ends (1 Cor. 2:4-5).

The message God uses is about Jesus. Preaching in Acts is clear. In Him prophecy and promise find fulfillment (2:25-28,30-31,34-35; 13:32-33), the Messianic age has dawned, and the kingdom of God has come (2:16). Though attested by God (2:22), He was unjustly condemned (2:23,26; 13:28); though “the Holy and Righteous One” (3:14), and “the Prince of Life” (3:15), and altogether undeserving of such treatment, He was hung on a cross (5:30) and put to death by crucifixion (10:39). God has raised Him from the dead (3:15; 4:10; 5:30; 10:40; 17:18,31). The execution has been reversed. God has exalted Jesus to His right hand, the place of honor and authority (2:33). Though despised by men, He is now Prince and Savior (5:31) and has sent the Holy Spirit (2:33; 5:32). Faith in His name saves (3:16; 4:10). Salvation is in no one else (4:12); He alone can grant repentance and forgiveness of sins (5:31; 10:43; 13:38-39). All who hear “all about this life” (5:20), “the message of this salvation” (13:26), are called on to “pay attention” (2:14), to “listen” (2:22) and “know with certainty” (2:36) their truth. The only option is to “repent” (2:38; 3:19), “be baptized” (2:38), “and turn back” (3:19). The call of the kerygma is “listen” (13:16) and “beware” (13:40), for to reject Jesus is to perish (13:41).

The kerygma is not limitable to a few common elements from passages where the word appears. Not a bare outline followed as an evangelistic method, it is rather the rich, powerful and comprehensive proclamation of what God has done in Christ. See Gospel.

The earliest Greek translation translated kesitah as “lamb” (cp. REB). After God restored his fortunes, Job received a kesitah from each of his friends (Job 42:11).

See Hophni and Phinehas; Sacrifice and Offering.

KETURAH (Kĕ-tû´rah) Personal name meaning “incense” or “the perfumed one.” In Gen. 25:1 Keturah is called Abraham's wife, while 1 Chron. 1:32 calls her a concubine. She was Abraham's second wife, apparently taken after Sarah's death.

Keturah bore six sons (daughters rarely are listed) to Abraham, the most notable being Midian. The list of Keturah's children substantiates the link between the Hebrews and the tribes that inhabited the areas east and southeast of Palestine. As children of a second wife, they were viewed as inferior to Isaac, Sarah's son.

KEYS An instrument for gaining access (Judg. 3:25).

Old Testament The holder of the keys had the power to admit or deny entrance to the house of God (1 Chron. 9:22-27; Isa. 22:22). In late Judaism this key imagery was extended to angelic beings and to God as keepers of the keys of heaven and hell.

New Testament In the NT keys are used only figuratively as a symbol of access (Luke 11:52) or of authority, particularly the authority of Christ over the final destiny of persons. The risen Christ holds the key of David and controls access to the New Jerusalem (Rev. 3:7). By overcoming death, He has the keys to the world of the dead (Rev. 1:18). See Keys of the Kingdom.

Barbara J. Bruce

KEYS OF THE KINGDOM What Jesus entrusted to Peter in Matt. 16:19, whose interpretation has been the subject of much debate between Catholics and non-Catholics. Any solution must consider: (1) the role of Peter as a leading apostle, (2) Peter's confession of Jesus as the Christ, (3) Jesus' wordplay regarding the “rock” (petra) upon which He would build His church, (4) the meaning of “binding” and “loosing,” and (5) parallel references to both “keys” and the other above-mentioned terms in biblical literature (cp. Matt. 18:18; John 20:23; Rom. 9:32,33; Eph. 2:19-22; 1 Pet. 2:4-10; Rev. 1:18; 3:7-13).

The phrase “keys of the kingdom” relates to the authority given to Peter to “bind” and “loose.” This authority was delegated to Simon Peter but should not be understood as an arbitrary or even individual authority of Peter to save or condemn. Peter is a representative of the apostles, a fact observed from his frequent role as leader and spokesman. In Eph. 2:20 it is not Peter but simply “the apostles and prophets” who are the foundation stone, with Christ Jesus the cornerstone. Moreover, in 1 Pet. 2:4-5 (which possibly reflects Peter's own interpretation of Christ's words to him) Christians themselves are “stones” built upon Christ the “living stone.”

Furthermore, the authority given to Peter and the apostles cannot be separated from the heavenly insight and confession that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. It is the revelation given to (and confessed by) Peter that called forth our Lord's blessing. Thus, we cannot overlook the confessional/theological component of Peter's apostolic authority. Peter's authority as an apostle was based upon his divinely given confession. Paul (like Jesus, Matt. 16:23) certainly felt free to criticize Peter when Simon's theology/behavior warranted correction (Gal. 2:6-14). Moreover, the authority to “bind” and “loose,” the result of receiving “the keys of the kingdom,” is a stewardship, a delegated authority from Christ (cp. Matt. 16:19; John 20:21-23; Rev. 1:18; 3:7-8).

Finally, the related “key” passages in Scripture suggest that it is the preaching of the gospel that has been entrusted/delegated to the apostles. Though the gospel itself is certainly to be handed on (1 Tim. 6:20; 2 Tim. 2:2; 2 Pet. 1:12-16), Scripture nowhere suggests that the “power of the keys” was either a personal privilege or an ecclesiastical office that could be handed on by Peter or anyone else. Rather, it refers to the stewardship of the gospel (1 Cor. 3:10-4:1) entrusted to those historically unique eyewitnesses who as Christ's apostles could give authoritative testimony to the salvation that is found only in Him, a hope which could be confidently offered and promised (“on earth”) as an already present gift (“in heaven”) to those who confess Him. KIBROTH-HATTAVAH (Kīb rōth-hăt-tā' á vah) vah) Place-name meaning “graves of craving, lust, gluttony.” The first stopping place of the Israelites after they left Sinai (Num. 33:16). The Israelites craved meat, which the Lord gave them (Num. 11:31), but, because they overindulged, an epidemic broke out and many Israelites died. The dead were buried there, giving the place its name (Num. 11:34; Deut. 9:22; Ps. 78:30-31).

KIBZAIM (Kīb' zā'im) Place-name meaning “double gathering” or “double heap.” One of the Levitical cities in the tribal territory of Ephraim also designated as a city of refuge (Josh. 21:22). In a parallel list of cities in Chronicles, the name Jokmeam appears (1 Chron. 6:68). This is not to be confused with Jokneam (or Jokneam) of 1 Kings 4:12. The reason for the appearance of Jokneam in 1 Chronicles is unexplained. See Cities of Refuge; Jokmeam; Jokneam; Levitical Cities.

KID Translation of one of several Hebrew words referring to a young goat. See Goat; Sacrifice and Offering.

KIDNAPPING Act of capturing and holding a person using unlawful force and fraud. In modern times a person is usually kidnapped for the purpose of extorting ransom. In biblical times the usual purpose for kidnapping was to use or sell the person into slavery (Gen. 37:28; 40:15). NIV, NRSV translate the corresponding Greek term as “slave traders” (1 Tim. 1:10). Kidnapping freeborn Israelites either to treat them as slaves or to sell them into slavery was punishable by death (Exod. 21:16; Deut. 24:7).

KIDNEY One of a pair of vertebrate organs lying in a mass of fatty tissue that excrete the waste products of metabolism.

In the Bible “kidney” is used both literally and figuratively. When the word is used figuratively of humans, KJV usually translates the term as “reins” (Jer. 12:2; Rev. 2:23, NRSV uses “mind”), “heart” (Job 19:27; Pss. 7:9; 16:7, 73:21; Jer. 12:2), “vitals” (Lam. 3:13), “soul” (Prov. 23:16), or “inward parts” (Ps. 139:13; cp. Job 16:13).

The kidneys are often associated with the heart as constituting the center of human personality (Pss. 7:9; 26:2; Jer. 11:20; 17:10; 20:12; Rev. 2:23). Because the areas around the kidneys are sensitive, the Hebrews believed the kidneys were the seat of the emotions (Job 19:27; Ps. 73:21; Prov. 23:16). The kidneys were also used figuratively as the source of the knowledge and understanding of the moral life (Ps. 16:7; Jer. 12:2).

When used literally of animals (except Isa. 34:6), the kidneys are mentioned in relation to sacrifice. The kidney, along with the fat surrounding it, were reserved for God as among the choicest parts of the animal (Exod. 29:13,22). Deuteronomy 32:14 (KJV) speaks of the best wheat as the “fat of kidneys” (NRSV, choicest wheat).

KIDON (Kī' dōn) (NIV, REB) See Chidon.

KIDRON VALLEY (Kīd' ron) Place-name meaning “turbid, dusky, gloomy.” Deep ravine beside Jerusalem separating the temple mount and the city of David on the west from the Mount of Olives on the east. The spring of Gihon lies on the western slope. The garden of Gethsemane would have been above the valley on the eastern side. Cemeteries have been located in this area since the middle Bronze Age (before 1500 B.C.). David crossed the brook when he fled Jerusalem to escape from Absalom (2 Sam. 15:23). Solomon warned Shimei not to cross it or he would die (1 Kings 2:37). Here certain kings of Judah destroyed idols and other pagan objects removed from the temple area (1 Kings 15:13; 2 Kings 23:4,6,12; 2 Chron. 29:16; 30:14). After the Last Supper Jesus went through the Kidron Valley on His way to the Mount of Olives (John 18:1). KILION (Kil' ɪ-ōn) (NIV) See Chilion.

KILMAD (Kil' mād) NIV spelling of Chilmad. See Chilmad.

KILN Oven, furnace, or heated enclosure used for processing a substance by burning, firing, or drying. The Hebrew word tannur is used to refer to both the oven used in the home for baking bread and the large pottery kiln. The “pavement of sapphire” (NASB) in Exod. 24:10 probably refers to a glazed tile out of a potter's kiln. It is possible that the part of the wall around Jerusalem known as the “Tower of the Ovens” (Neh. 3:11 REB) got its name from a potter's kiln. The term “brickkiln” is used in Nah. 3:14, but this should probably read “brick mold” (NRSV, NASB) or “brick work” (NIV, REB), as the bricks in Palestine were usually sun dried. See Pottery.

KIMHAM (Kim' hām) (NIV, REB) See Chimham.

KINAH (Ki' nāh) Place-name meaning “lamentation.” City in the southeast of Judah near the boundary of Edom (Josh. 15:22). Perhaps a settlement of the Kenites. Usually identified with modern Wadi el-Qeini, south of Hebron.

KINDNESS OT translation of the Hebrew term chesed. Throughout the OT the idea of chesedis that of compassion and faithfulness to one's obligations as well as to relatives, friends, and even to slaves (Gen. 21:23; 39:21; 1 Sam. 15:6). Kindness is seen in the marriage relationship of Abraham and Sarah (Gen. 20:13). It is also seen in the marriage story of Ruth and Boaz (Ruth 2:20). Kindness is shown to relatives and neighbors or even the stranger who comes into one's house (Gen. 19:1-3). The king as well as the common man was subjected to kindness in Israel. In 2 Chron. 24:22 the text shows that Joash did not remember the kindness that his father Jehoiada had shown him. Kindness can be in the form of kind deeds done for another person. In Gen. 40:14 Joseph asks the king's butler to remember the kindness that he has shown him. In the prophets the people of Israel are charged with ethical behavior. This behavior consists of “observing kindness and justice” (Hos. 12:6). Micah 6:8 declares what the Lord requires of man, that he do justice, love kindness, and to walk humbly before God. In Zech. 7:9 one is told to dispense true justice, practice kindness and compassion each to his brother. The praiseworthy woman and kind man both show kindness (Prov. 31:26; Ps. 141:5 [HCSB uses “faithful love”]).

In the NT kindness is translated from the Greek word chrestotes. This word can describe gentleness, goodness, uprightness, generosity, and graciousness. The NT describes kindness as an attribute of God (Titus 3:4; HCSB, love). Kindness is a characteristic of true love (1 Cor. 13:4). The Lord's people should possess kindness and not refuse to dispense it to others (Matt. 5:7; Acts 20:35; Rom. 15:2-5; Eph. 4:32; 1 Pet. 3:8; 4:8; 1 John 3:17). At the time of judgment Christ will reward those who have shown kindness to others (Matt. 25:34-36). Kindness can be seen in the deeds of people such as Joseph (Matt. 1:19), the centurion (Luke 7:2-6), John (John 19:27), Julius (Acts 27:3,43), and Onesiphorus (2 Tim. 1:16-18).

KINE KJV plural of cow. See Cow.

KING, CHRIST AS Biblical teaching that Jesus of Nazareth fulfilled the OT promises of a perfect King and reigns over His people and the universe. The OT hope for the future included a vision of a new king like David, called “the anointed one,” or “the Messiah” in Hebrew (2 Sam. 7:16; 22:51). The Prophet Isaiah intensified the promises and pointed to the Messiah yet to come (Isa. 7:13-14; cp. Pss. 45; 110). The book of Daniel contains a vision of One to whom was given dominion, glory, and a kingdom, One that all peoples, nations, and languages would serve. His dominion is everlasting and shall never pass away. His kingdom shall never be destroyed (Dan. 7:13-14).

When Jesus Christ was born, His birth was announced in these categories. His earthly ministry then amplified these themes (Matt. 4:17; Luke 1:32-33). Similarly, John the Baptist proclaimed the presence of God's kingdom in the coming of Jesus (Matt. 3). The theme of Jesus as King, Ruler, or Lord dominates the NT from beginning to end. We find the culmination of this theme with the Lord seated on a throne, His enemies being made subject to Him and a new name given: “On His robe and on His thigh He has a name written, KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS” (Rev. 19:16 HCSB).

The question arises naturally, in what sense is Christ's kingship really operating in today's world? If He is king, how is it that the world is so little changed and His kingship so little acknowledged? Some would answer that Jesus' kingship is completely future. That fails to handle Christ's own statement that the kingdom of God is “in your midst” (Luke 17:21 NASB), “among you” (HCSB, NRSV), or “within you” (KJV, NIV). Christ's kingship is thus present yet still future, already here and still yet to come, spiritual and universal.

The present kingship of Christ is His royal rule over His people (Col. 1:13,18). It is a spiritual realm established in the hearts and lives of believers. He administers His kingdom by spiritual means—the word and the Spirit. Whenever believers follow the lordship of Christ, the Savior is exercising His ruling or kingly function. From this we understand that His kingship is more concerned with Jesus' reign than with the realm over which this takes place. When we pray “Your kingdom come” as we do in the Lord's prayer (Matt. 6:10), we have in mind this present rule of Christ the King.

Christ's kingship is also present today in the natural world. Christ is the one through whom all things came into being (John 1:3) and through whom all things are held together (Col. 1:17). He is in control of the natural universe as He demonstrated during His earthly ministry (Mark 4:35-41).

The Bible recognizes Jesus' present kingship and presents the kingship as a spiritual one (John 18:36). The crowd proclaimed Jesus King during His triumphal entry on Palm Sunday (John 12:12-19). We might say the door of heaven opened a bit so that for a brief moment His true kingship appeared to people on earth. He claimed that if the people had kept silent on that historic occasion, the stones would have cried out to proclaim Him King.

In addition to Christ's present rule, His kingship will become fully evident in the future. We will see and understand this clearly when Jesus returns (Matt. 19:28). The future kingdom will be essentially the same as the present rule in the sense that men and women will acknowledge Christ's rule in their hearts. It will differ, however, in that His rule will be perfect and visible (1 Cor. 15:24-28). Once manifest, the future kingdom will endure forever. Christ will rule over all things in heaven and on earth. At this time God the Father will exalt Jesus, His Son, to the highest place of authority and honor. At the name of Jesus, every knee will bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue will confess that Jesus is Lord to the glory of God the Father (Phil. 2:9-11).

Jesus established His kingship through His sacrificial death as each of the Gospels shows clearly. Pilate recognized more than he knew when he created the sign, King of the Jews, for the charge against Jesus. Jesus' kingship finds its highest exercise as He gives the blessings He secured for His people through His atoning work (Rom. 8:32; Eph. 1:3-11,20-22). Jesus will continue to reign as the second Person of the Trinity. His God/man personhood will not cease. Jesus Christ, the King, will reign as the God-man and will forever exercise His power for the benefit of the redeemed and for the glory of His kingdom.

David S. Dockery

KING, KINGSHIP Male monarch of a major territorial unit; especially one whose position is hereditary and who rules for life. Kingship includes the position, office, and dignity of a king. Though not so designated, the earliest known king in the Bible is Nimrod (Gen. 10:8-10), a Mesopotamia city builder who developed a mighty empire (perhaps early Babylonia). During the early Abrahamic period 10 more kings are named (Gen. 14:2-9), one being Melchizedek, the king of Salem. In Gen. 17:6 God promised Abraham that nations and kings would come from him. The Bible makes clear the flourishing of kings among the various people groups of the Canaanites, the Egyptians, and the Mesopotamians.

Kings were of three basic kinds in the ancient Near East: (1) kings of great nations often identified with a god (e.g., in Assyria, Babylon, and Egypt); (2) kings from a military elite who had taken control of a local population by force (e.g., Canaanite city kings); and (3) kings who arose from tribal or clan-oriented groups whose election to or inheritance of the kingship was determined in part by the people's will (e.g., Israel, Edom, Moab, and Ammon).

Transition from Judges to Kings From the time of Joshua to the time of Saul, the judges led Israel. Their leadership was temporary and local in nature, their main function being to lead those parts of Israel threatened by some outside force until the threat was gone. Israel during this period was bound together more by their covenant with God than by government.

As Israel became more settled in Canaan, they began to assimilate various aspects of Canaanite culture, and their complete trust in Yahweh alone for their welfare and security began to decline. This decline coupled with the threat of the Philistines to all tribes of Israel threatened the existence of Israel itself. Many in Israel began to feel a need for a hereditary and totalitarian leadership as a way of dealing with the threat (1 Sam. 8:5, 20; cp. Judg. 8:22-23).

The first national leader was Saul. Saul was anointed as the nagid over Israel (1 Sam. 11:15; 13:1; 15:1,11,35; 17:55; 18:6,22,25,27; 19:4; 24:8; 26:17; 29:3; 2 Sam. 5:25; 1 Chron. 11:2) Saul was a charismatic leader much in the mold of the judges. Israel remained a tribal league. Saul established no central government or bureaucracy, had no court or standing army, and his seat at Gibeah was a fortress and not a palace.

The significant thing about Saul's leadership is that for the first time after settlement in Canaan, Israel had a permanent national military leader. This was a very important step in the transition from the system of judges to the establishment of the monarchy.

David was also a figure much in the likeness of the judges with a charismatic personality. A prophet designated him leader just as the judges and Saul had been designated before him.

David's leadership, however, represents the second stage in the transition. Unlike Saul, David was able to fuse the tribes of Israel together into a nation who owed allegiance to the crown, to establish and maintain a court, and to establish a standing army. What had been a loose union of 12 tribes became a complex empire centered on the person of David. Because of his charismatic personality and divine enabling, David was able to effect the union of the northern and southern tribes (something Saul was apparently unable to do). David captured Jerusalem and made it the religious and political center of Israel. The Canaanite population of Palestine was subject to the king. Subjugated lands paid tribute to David and not to the individual tribes.

When David passed the power of the kingship along to his son Solomon, the transition from the system of judges to that of monarchy was complete. The usual understanding of king is one whose position is hereditary and who rules for life. These conditions were met for the first time when Solomon inherited the throne from David.

Functions and Powers of the King The king functioned as military leader (1 Kings 22:29-36) and supreme judge (1 Kings 3:16-28). Israel, unlike some nations surrounding it, placed limitations on the power of its kings (1 Sam. 8:10-18). It was normal for the elders of the nation to make a covenant with the king (2 Sam. 5:3; 2 Kings 11:17) in which the rights and duties of the king were recorded and deposited in the sanctuary—possibly at the time of the anointment ceremony (1 Sam. 10:25). It was clearly understood that the king was not exempt from observing civil laws (1 Kings 21:4), nor was the king the absolute lord of life and death, a power David assumed in his murder of Uriah (2 Sam. 11; cp. Ahab's murder of Naboth 1 Kings 21:14-18; also 2 Kings 5:7; 6:26-33). The prophetic denunciation of certain kings demonstrates that they were subject to the law (2 Sam. 12:1-15; 1 Kings 21:17-24; cp. Deut. 17:14-20).

The King's Court The officials at the king's court included the bodyguard (2 Kings 11:4), captain of the host or general of the army (1 Sam. 14:50; 2 Sam. 8:16), recorder (2 Sam. 8:16), secretary or scribe (2 Sam. 8:17; 2 Kings 18:18), chief administrator over the 12 district officers (1 Kings 4:5; cp. vv. 7-19), steward of the palace household (1 Kings 4:6; 18:3; 2 Kings 18:18; Isa. 22:15), overseer of forced labor (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 4:6; 5:13-17; 11:28; cp. modern translations for KJV tribute), friend of the king (2 Sam. 15:37; 1 Kings 4:5; 1 Chron. 27:33), counselor (2 Sam. 15:12), keeper of the wardrobe (2 Kings 22:14), officials in charge of the royal farms (1 Chron. 27:25-31), priests (2 Sam. 8:17; 20:25; 1 Kings 4:4), and prophets (1 Sam. 22:5; 2 Sam. 7:2; 12:25; 24:10-25).

To raise the necessary revenue to support a court of this size, Solomon introduced a system of taxation. Saul's court was simple and did not require extensive financial support while David depended on spoils of war (2 Sam. 8:1-14). Solomon divided the nation into 12 districts each of which would be responsible to support the court for one month out of the year (1 Kings 4:7-19, 27-28).

Other revenue for the king's court included royal property (1 Chron. 27:25-31; 2 Chron. 26:10; 32:27-29) and forced labor (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 4:6; 11:28). Solomon also received revenue from a road toll on trade routes through Israel (1 Kings 10:15), trade in horses and chariots (1 Kings 10:28-29), a merchant fleet (1 Kings 9:26-28), and, according to archaeological evidence, possibly from copper mines.

God as King Israel's faith included the confession that God was its ultimate King. Some modern scholars see the covenant between God and Israel recorded in Josh. 24 as a royal covenant made between King and people (Exod. 19:6; Num. 23:21; Deut. 33:5; Judg. 8:23; 1 Sam. 8:7; 12:12). The fact that kingship is prophesied for Israel as early as Gen. 17:6; 35:11; 49:10; and Num. 24:17-19 indicates that God did not regard human kingship as inherently wrong or contrary to His will for Israel. What displeased God was the manner, timing, and motivation for Israel's demand for a king (cp. 1 Sam. 8:5-8; 12:12; Judg. 8:22-23). The earthly king derived his authority from God as the Lord's anointed (1 Sam. 16:6; 2 Sam. 1:14) or the Lord's captain or prince (1 Sam. 9:16; 10:1; 13:14). Many of the Psalms speak of God as King (Pss. 24; 93; 95-98). See Kingdom of God.

KINGDOM OF GOD Concept of God's kingly or sovereign rule, encompassing both the realm over which rule is exerted (Matt. 4:8; 24:7; Mark 6:23; Luke 4:5; Rev. 16:10) and the exercise of authority to reign (Luke 19:12; Rev. 17:12,17-18). The kingdom of God is significant in the nation of Israel, the proclamation of the gospel, and presence of the church. The idea is a point of integration for both Testaments.

Old Testament God rules sovereignly over all His works as King. He desires His rule to be acknowledged in a bond or relationship of love, loyalty, spirit, and trust. Not surprisingly, then, one of the central themes of the OT is kingdom through covenant.

This theme is revealed on the first page of Scripture when God creates man in His own image. According to the grammar of the original text, ruling over the creatures in verse 26b is a result of creating man in the divine image. The fact that mankind is male and female prepares us for the command to be fruitful, and the fact that mankind is the divine image prepares us for the command to rule over the creatures.

The fact that mankind is male and female in itself has nothing to do with the divine image. Instead we should understand the divine image according to the background of the ancient Near East where the setting up of the king's statue was the equivalent to the proclamation of his domination over the area in which the statue was erected. Accordingly man is set in the midst of creation as God's statue. He is evidence that God is the Lord of creation. Man exerts his rule not in arbitrary despotism but as a responsible agent, as God's steward. His rule and his duty to rule are not autonomous; they are copies. Hence the concept of the kingdom of God is found on the first page of the Bible. Adam begins to rule the world under God by naming everything created on the earth just as God ruled by naming everything created in the heavens.

Careful attention must be paid to the language of the promises given to Abraham in Gen. 12 that are later incorporated into the covenant made in

Gen. 15. The first promise that God gives to Abram is that He will make him a great nation (12:2). The last promise is that in Abram all the clans or families of the earth will be blessed (12:3). God speaks of Abram as becoming a great nation through three considerations. (1) The term “nation” emphasizes a people as a political entity defined by cultural, ethnic, geographical, or social factors. (2) In 12:3 the nations of the world are not called “nations” but rather “clans” or “families.” The term family emphasizes a people with no real political structure and in which no system of final governmental headship or rule operates. (3) The background to Gen. 12 is chapter 11. There we have the history of Babel, where we see a complete confidence and naive optimism about human achievement and effort. Man is at the center of his world and he can achieve anything. This philosophy comes under divine judgment. By contrast Gen. 12 presents us with a political structure brought into being by God, with God at the center, and God as the governmental head and rule of that system. In other words, we have the kingdom of God brought into being by the promises to and covenant with Abraham (cp. Heb. 11:8-10).

When Abram's family does become a nation, God initiates with them the Sinai covenant or law of Moses as a means for the people being rightly related to God, to each other as God's true humanity, and to the creation as His stewards. Therefore, the covenant is the means for establishing His kingdom. The book of Judges proves that although each person did what was right in his own eyes (17:6), nonetheless, the Lord ruled over His people as King. Later God raised up a king after His own heart and made a special covenant with David. The Davidic covenant was God's king seeking to bring the people of God, and indeed all the nations, under this rule made explicit in the covenant (2 Sam. 7:19). Thus the king was the mediator of the covenant and the means of extending God's rule.

When the people failed to abide by the covenant, the prophets and the wise men were sent by God to call the people back to the covenant, the terms of God's rule. Zephaniah, for example, based his warnings on the covenant as found in Deuteronomy (cp. Zeph. 1:2 and Deut. 32:22; Zeph. 1:3 and Deut. 28:21; Zeph. 1:4-6 and Deut. 28:45; Zeph. 1:8-13 and Deut. 28:45; Zeph. 1:13 and Deut. 28:30,39; Zeph. 1:15 and Deut. 28:53,55,57).

Moreover, the literary structure of Zephaniah is chiasmic with 2:11 as the center of the book: “The nations on every shore will worship him, every one in its own land” (NIV). Zephaniah's theology, then, can be summed up by the theme, kingdom through covenant.

Although the prophets sought to bring the people back to the covenant, the Sinai covenant (law of Moses) failed to achieve the goal of establishing God's kingdom because it did not and, in fact, could not guarantee the obedience of the people of God. Hence the prophets begin to speak of a new covenant (Jer. 31) in which God's rule is guaranteed by an obedient people. As the failure of the Davidic line of kings became evident in history, the hope for a future king came more and more to the fore along with the promise of a new covenant through which God's kingship would be acknowledged in the hearts of His people in a new creation—new humanity in a new heavens and a new earth.

The OT ends (in the Hebrew Canon) with Chronicles, a book which focuses on good kings as the ideal of the future Messiah in whom Yahweh will be truly Lord over His people and over all His creation. So the last words of the OT call for a temple-builder from among the people to make this hope a reality—likely the Messiah Himself (2 Chron. 36:23).

New Testament In the NT the fullest revelation of God's divine rule is in the person of Jesus Christ. His birth was heralded as the birth of a king (Luke 1:32-33). The ministry of John the Baptist prepared for the coming of God's kingdom (Matt. 3:2). The crucifixion was perceived as the death of a king (Mark 15:26-32).

Jesus preached that God's kingdom was at hand (Matt. 11:12). His miracles, preaching, forgiving sins, and resurrection are an in-breaking of God's sovereign rule in this dark, evil age.

God's kingdom was manifested in the church. Jesus commissioned the making of disciples on the basis of His kingly authority (Matt. 28:18-20). Peter's sermon at Pentecost underscored that a descendent of David would occupy David's throne forever, a promise fulfilled in the resurrection of Christ (Acts 2:30-32). Believers are transferred from the dominion of darkness into the kingdom of the Son of God (Col. 1:13).

God's kingdom may be understood in terms of “reign” or “realm.” Reign conveys the fact that God exerts His divine authority over His subjects/kingdom. Realm suggests location, and God's realm is universal. God's reign extends over all things. He is universally sovereign over the nations, humankind, the angels, the dominion of darkness and its inhabitants, and even the cosmos, individual believers, and the church.

In the OT the kingdom of God encompasses the past, present, and future. The kingdom of God had implications in the theocratic state. The kingdom of God is “already” present but “not yet” fully completed, both a present and future reality. The kingdom was inaugurated in the incarnation, life, ministry, death, and resurrection of Jesus. God's kingdom blessings are in some measure possessed now. People presently find and enter God's kingdom. God is now manifesting His authoritative rule in the lives of His people. God's kingdom, however, awaits its complete realization. His people still endure sufferings and tribulations. When fully consummated, hardships will cease. Kingdom citizens currently dwell alongside inhabitants of the kingdom of darkness. God will eventually dispel all darkness. The final inheritance of the citizens of God's kingdom is yet to be fully realized. The resurrection body for life in the eschatological kingdom is a blessing awaiting culmination.

God's kingdom is soteriological in nature, expressed in the redemption of fallen persons. The reign of Christ instituted the destruction of all evil powers hostile to the will of God. Satan, the “god of this age,” along with his demonic horde, seeks to hold the hearts of individuals captive in darkness. Christ has defeated Satan and the powers of darkness and delivers believers. Although Satan still is active in this present darkness, his ultimate conquest and destruction are assured through Christ's sacrificial death and resurrection. Sinners enter Christ's kingdom through regeneration.

Many of Jesus' parables emphasize the mysterious nature of God's kingdom. For example, an insignificant mustard seed will grow a tree, as God's kingdom will grow far beyond its inception (Matt. 13:31-32). The kingdom of God is like seed scattered on the ground. Some seed will fall on good soil, take root, and grow. Other seed, however, will fall on hard, rocky ground and will not grow. Likewise, the kingdom will take root in the hearts of some but will be rejected and unfruitful in others (Matt. 13:3-8). As wheat and tares grow side by side, indistinguishable from each other, so also the sons of the kingdom of God and the sons of the kingdom of darkness grow together in the world until ultimately separated by God (Matt. 13:24-30,36-43).

Although closely related, the kingdom and the church are distinct. George Eldon Ladd identified four elements in the relationship of the kingdom of God to the church. The kingdom of God creates the church. God's redemptive rule is manifested over and through the church. The church is a "custodian" of the kingdom. The church also witnesses to God's divine rule.

The kingdom of God is the work of God, not produced by human ingenuity. God brought it into the world through Christ, and it presently works through the church. The church preaches the kingdom of God and anticipates the eventual consummation. See Jesus Christ; Salvation.

KINGS, BOOKS OF Covering the time frame between the final days of King David and the end of the Judean state, the books of 1 and 2 Kings are a vital part of the history of Israel. The title of these books is indicative of their contents: the kings and the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. First and Second Kings are part of a larger body of the OT known as the 12 Historical Books (Joshua-Esther). In the English Bible 1 and 2 Kings are the 11th and 12th books of the OT; however, until the 14th or 15th century A.D., Hebrew manuscripts placed 1 and 2 Kings together as a unified work. In the Greek translation of the OT, the Septuagint (third century B.C.), 1 and 2 Kings was coupled with 1 and 2 Samuel to form the four books of "kingdoms" or "reigns." Therefore, 1 and 2 Kings were known as 3 and 4 "kingdoms." In Jerome's Latin translation of the Bible, the Vulgate (ca.

A.D. 400), 1 and 2 Kings are equivalent to 3 and 4 Kings, thus preserving the ancient tradition of viewing the books of Samuel and Kings as interrelated regarding the history of Israel and demonstrating a degree of superficiality in separating the two books.

Time Frame The historical beginning point for the narrative of 1 Kings is approximately 970 B.C. The final event in 2 Kings 25, Evil-Merodach's release of King Jehoiachin from prison, occurs in approximately 560 B.C. Thus, the narrative of 1 and 2 Kings spans 410 years of history. These 410 years witness monumental changes within the nation of Israel including the division of the kingdom in 930 B.C. (Israel as the 10 northern tribes and Judah as the two southern tribes), the height of the monarchy under Solomon (970-930 B.C), and the exiles of both Israel and Judah (722 B.C. and 587/586 B.C.).

Author First and Second Kings are anonymous works. Since the texts themselves provide no direct internal evidence of authorship, two basic ideas dominate the theories concerning authorship. The first basic idea comes from the Jewish Talmud, which designates Jeremiah as the author. Jeremiah certainly fits the time frame for having composed these books with one exception: 2 Kings 25:27-30. Attributing Jeremianic authorship to these four verses is tenuous; however, one can assert the plausibility of prophetic authorship due to the strong prophetic outlook contained throughout the books.

German scholar Martin Noth advanced the second basic idea of authorship which is the hypothesis that a single "Deuteronomistic Historian" wrote the entirety of Joshua-2 Kings (excluding Ruth) after 560 B.C. during the Babylonian exile (587-539 B.C.). This idea has garnered the largest following among critical biblical scholars since Noth first postulated the idea in the late 1940s. Noth based his idea on the assumption that the book of Deuteronomy was a type of foundational document upon which the Deuteronomistic Historian based his selection of events to include in his history of Israel. In the Hebrew Bible, the books Joshua—2 Kings are known as the Former Prophets.

Theology of 1 and 2 Kings Regardless of whether a single author called the Deuteronomistic Historian composed the books of 1 and 2 Kings, the books are nonetheless very “Deuteronomic” in theology. The book of Deuteronomy propounds this truth: obedience to God's laws brings blessings, while disobedience to God's laws brings curses. This theology provides an axis along which the historical narrative of the former prophets runs; however, a majority of the OT outside of the Former Prophets also has philosophical similarities to this theological idea (i.e., the Prophets and the Wisdom Literature).

When interpreting the Deuteronomic theology of the OT, an interpreter must exercise caution in understanding the promises of Deuteronomy in respect to the covenant relationship between Israel and Yahweh. Without understanding that Deuteronomy is the word of God to His chosen people (those who are already in a covenant relationship with Yahweh), an interpreter could broadly misapply the truth of the text by asserting that any person can receive the blessings of Yahweh by behaving in a manner commensurate with Deuteronomic theology. This misapplication fails to recognize the covenant relationship that was already present between the chosen seed of Abraham and Yahweh. In other words, Deuteronomic theology is a truth only for those who are already in a covenant relationship with Yahweh. Attempted obedience to the laws of God without a covenant relationship is nothing more than either a “salvation by works theology” or a “prosperity theology.”

The other major Deuteronomic ideas that permeate 1 and 2 Kings are the ideas of centralized worship in Jerusalem (Deut. 12:1-28) and each particular king's faithfulness to promote complete devotion to Yahweh by ridding the land of idols (Deut. 12:29-32; 13:12-18). With the completion of the temple during Solomon's reign, worship became centralized in Jerusalem, thus bringing fulfillment to Deut. 12:5: “But you shall seek the LORD at the place which the LORD your God shall choose from all your tribes, to establish His name there for His dwelling, and there you shall come” (NASB). The kings that follow Solomon are judged on the basis of their faithfulness to promote complete obedience to Yahweh by ridding the land of idols, male cult prostitutes, Asherah poles, and so forth. In other words, the author of 1 and 2 Kings judged the kings of Judah and Israel based on their actions of devotion, or lack thereof, to the first and second commandments: (1) “You shall have no other gods before Me,” and (2) You shall not make for yourself an idol, or any likeness of what is in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the water under the earth. You shall not worship them or serve them; for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God” (Exod. 20:4-6a NASB).

The author of 1 and 2 Kings gave a culminating statement of qualitative judgment regarding how well each king followed God's covenant. These statements use David as the basis of judgment for each subsequent king of Judah. Second Kings 18:3 gives an example of such a statement regarding King Hezekiah: “And he did right in the sight of the LORD, according to all that his father David had done” (NASB). Twenty kings followed King Solomon in Judah. From these 20 kings, only eight remained faithful, to some degree, to God's covenant: Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joash/ Jehoash, Amaziah, Uzziah (Azariah in 2 Kings 15:1-7), Jotham, Hezekiah, and Josiah. Of these eight kings of Judah, only Hezekiah and Josiah received unmitigated praise for faithfulness to the covenant. The other six kings allowed at least some forms of idolatry to continue.

On a less positive note, all of the kings of the northern nation of Israel were wicked kings. The kings of the northern nation are judged on the basis that they did evil in the sight of the Lord and that they walked in the way of Jeroboam (the first king of the northern nation) and his sin (1 Kings 15:34). These evaluative formulas also seem to function as organizational markers.

Theological/Sacred History With verses like “now the rest of the acts of Solomon and whatever he did, and his wisdom, are they not written in the book of the acts of Solomon?” (1 Kings 11:41 NASB), a reader understands that the author of 1 and 2 Kings did not record every action that occurred in the history of Israel. This process of selectivity has been the impetus for the terms “Theological History” or “Sacred History.” The author chose certain events to include in the account of Israel's history. These chosen events are Deuteronomic in theology, and the seeming intent of the author is to give an accurate account of these selected events.

Critical scholarship in the 1900s repeatedly questioned the historical reliability of the accounts found in the Pentateuch and the historical books of the OT by asserting that extrabiblical evidence to verify the biblical accounts was either sparse or nonexistent. While space prohibits the exploration of the entirety of these skeptical questions, an interpreter should note that both the Merneptah Stela (ca. 1224 B.C.) and the Tell-Dan inscription found in 1993 are two examples of extrabiblical support for the presence of Israel in the land of Canaan and for the historicity of David's kingship. Also, the Moabite Stone provides extrabiblical support for the Omride dynasty of Israel found in 1 Kings 16:21-28. Furthermore, the Lachish letters and the Annals of Sennacherib offer additional extrabiblical material that accords with certain accounts in 1 and 2 Kings (albeit differences between the biblical texts and the extrabiblical texts do exist). With respect to the historicity of the events contained in the Bible, a reader would do well to heed the words of Walter Kaiser (A History of Israel, Broadman & Holman, 2000) by letting the Bible be “innocent until proven guilty.” Also, one must remember that lack of extrabiblical evidence is not consummate proof that a biblical event did not occur.

Survey of Events The books of 1 and 2 Kings have three major sections. Using these three major sections, a survey of the events recorded in the books follows.

Solomon and His Reign (1 Kings 1-11) The narrative of 1 Kings begins with David at the end of his life. David's son Adonijah attempted to make himself king by acquiring a following and declaring himself to be the king, but Nathan the prophet and Bathsheba interceded, and David named Solomon as his successor. Once Solomon was declared king, he exercised “wisdom” and exterminated those who might oppose his kingship: Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei. Also, Abiathar the priest, who joined Adonijah's insurrection, was banished from the priesthood in fulfillment of the prophecy against the house of Eli in Shiloh (1 Sam. 2:27-36; 3:10-14). First Kings 3 relates the story of Solomon's request for wisdom, God's granting of wisdom to Solomon, and Solomon's classic display of wisdom in his arbitration between the two prostitutes disputing over a child.

With control of the kingdom firmly established, Solomon turned his attention to taking foreign wives and to building projects. The temple in Jerusalem is Solomon's most significant building project. The completion of the temple fulfilled the words of Deut. 12:1-28 regarding the place where Yahweh would establish His name. The biblical text reveals the magnificence of the temple, the conscription of laborers to build the temple, and the dedication of the temple. When the people brought the ark of the covenant into the temple, the glory of God returned as a cloud—hearkening back to the time of the tabernacle. As Solomon offered his dedicatory remarks, the reader sees the fulfillment of God's promise to David that his son would build the temple (2 Sam. 7:12-13). While the temple was of monumental importance to the Hebrews, Solomon also pronounced the importance of the temple for the foreigners who would come and pray to Yahweh (1 Kings 8:41-43). A visit from the Queen of Sheba and economic activity with the King of Tyre followed the dedication of the temple. Although Solomon's wealth exceeded that of any king of Israel either before or after him, he still had an “Achilles heel”—foreign gods. The foreign wives that Solomon had married brought other gods into Solomon's presence. These wives turned Solomon's heart away from total devotion to Yahweh, and Solomon both worshiped these foreign gods and built shrines to them. This sinful action is a blight on the magnanimous reign of Solomon, but true to Deuteronomic form, the author of 1 Kings recorded God's pronouncement of judgment—the tearing away of the kingdom from Solomon. God brought this judgment to pass after Solomon had died. Interestingly no spiritual evaluation of Solomon is present in the text as is so common in 1 and 2 Kings for all the kings that follow after Solomon.

The Divided Kingdom (1 Kings 12-22 Kings 17) The once-united nation of Israel then entered a downward spiral. Solomon's son, Rehoboam, acted unwisely in pontificating his intention to place an even heavier burden of labor and taxation on the people than did his father. This action elicited Jeroboam, a former enemy of Solomon, to “break away” from the Jerusalem monarchy. The 10 northern tribes then became the nation of Israel, and the two southern tribes (Judah and Benjamin) became the nation of Judah (ca. 930 B.C). Jeroboam became the first king of the northern nation, and he erected idolatrous shrines at Dan and Bethel thus attempting to keep the people from traveling to Jerusalem to worship. These idolatrous shrines contained golden calves, which harken back to the rebellion of the Israelites at Mount Sinai. At this point in the narrative, the utter sinfulness of Jeroboam is emphasized; thus, he becomes the standard for the negative spiritual evaluation of all the northern kings that follow him. None of the 20 kings of Israel were faithful to the covenant with Yahweh, precipitating the destruction of the northern nation in 723/22 B.C. Second Kings 17 records that the Assyrians destroyed Samaria, the capital city of the northern nation. This destruction was followed by the importation of other conquered peoples. The intermarriage of these imported people with the nondeported Israelites was the inception of the Samaritans.

Although the northern nation presents a “gloomy picture,” the southern nation does have a few “bright spots” in her history. Eight of the 20 kings of Judah walked in some degree of faithfulness to the covenant with Yahweh. Through this chosen line of kings, God kept intact His promise to Abraham and the line through which He would bring His Son into the world.

The king formula comes to the fore in this section of the narrative. This introductory formula for the kings of Judah consists of four basic elements: (1) the regnal year of the king in the nation of Israel, (2) the age of the king when he began to reign, (3) the name of the queen mother, and (4) the spiritual evaluation of the king. This formula is an obvious organizing feature for the narrative; yet even with this formula, the similar names between the kings of the two nations and the plot movement from one nation to the other nation can be difficult to follow at times. The formula for the kings of Israel consists of the regnal year for the concomitant king of Judah and the length of the king's reign.

Though most of the kings of Israel have a scant amount of information concerning their exploits, the kings who reigned during the prophetic ministries of Elijah and Elisha do receive additional attention, such as Ahab and Jehu. Elijah enters the narrative in 1 Kings 17. With his confrontation of King Ahab (ca. 874/73-853), Queen Jezebel, and the prophets of Baal, Elijah appears as a champion for faithfulness to the covenant with Yahweh. Elijah was a miracle-working prophet who remained faithful to Yahweh in spite of persecution. After fleeing from Jezebel to the Negev/Sinai region, Elijah received the word of God regarding the concept of a remnant (1 Kings 19:18). Yahweh told Elijah that 7,000 people had not bowed their knees to Baal; therefore, God would spare their lives. After this word from God, Elijah then placed the prophetic mantle upon Elisha, who ministered during the ninth century B.C. The narrative records Elisha's interaction with Benhadad I, King of Assyria (ca. 880-842) and his interaction with Jehu, king of Israel (ca. 841-814/13). Many miracles that Elisha performed are recorded in 2 Kings 4-8. This grouping of miracles is known as “miracle clustering.”

This major section of 1 and 2 Kings ends with the destruction of the northern nation. What Shalmaneser V began by besieging Samaria, Sargon II finished by destroying Samaria. Occurring in 723/22 B.C., this cataclysmic event marked the end of the northern nation.

Judah Alone (2 Kings 18-25) This final section of the Kings narrative focuses on the nation of Judah. With Israel destroyed, Judah stood alone between the years of 722 and 587/86 B.C. During this time frame the two best kings of Judah came to the throne: Hezekiah and Josiah. In spite of the Deuteronomic reforms of these two kings, however, the nation of Judah continued to rebel against Yahweh. Therefore, God used the Babylonians as His instrument for punishing His people by destroying the city of Jerusalem and the temple in 587/86 B.C.

Hope for the Future Even though the history of God's people in 1 and 2 Kings is fraught with failure, God remained faithful to His chosen people. Even though both nations went into exile, God remembered His promise to Abraham, and He preserved His people while in exile. The last event in the book of 2 Kings is Evil-Merodach's goodness toward one of Judah's wicked kings, Jehoiachin (Jeconiah). Through Jehoiachin, God would bring His ultimate redemption to pass in the person of His Son, Jesus Christ. Thus, the Deuteronomic history of Israel ends on a “forward-looking” note to the inauguration of the new covenant (Jer. 31:31-34).

Outline

1 Kings

- I. God Works His Purposes Even through Human Revenge and Treachery (1:1-2:46).
- II. God Works through the Wisdom He Gives His Humble Leader (3:1-7:51).
 - A. God honors His humble leader's request and equips him with divine wisdom (3:1-28).
 - B. God's leader administers his people wisely (4:1-34).
 - C. God's leader wisely follows divine directives to build a house of worship (5:1-7:51).
- III. God Responds to the Worship and Sin of His People (8:1-11:43).
 - A. God fulfills His promise to His people and their leaders (8:1-21).
 - B. The incomparable God of heaven hears the prayers of His repentant people anywhere (8:22-53).
 - C. The faithful God leads His people to faithfulness and calls the nations to recognize His uniqueness (8:54-61).
 - D. God's people worship joyfully in His house (8:62-66).
 - E. God's favor is related to His people's obedience (9:1-9).
 - F. God blesses the efforts of His faithful leader (9:10-10:29).
 - G. A leader's unfaithfulness brings divine discipline on His people (11:1-43).
- IV. Disobedience Brings Results (12:1-16:34).
 - A. Leaders who refuse to be servants lose their subjects (12:1-24).
 - B. False worship leads to doom for God's people and their leader (12:25-13:10).
 - C. God's prophets must obey God's voice (13:11-25).
 - D. Disobedience leads a nation to eternal ruin (13:26-14:20).
 - E. God is faithful to His promises even when a people disobey (14:21-15:8).
 - F. In the midst of disobedience God honors a faithful leader (15:9-24).
 - G. God fulfills His threats against evil leaders (15:25-16:34).
- V. God Works in History through His Prophetic Messengers (17:1-22:53).

- A. God blesses and brings recognition to His faithful prophet (17:1-24).
- B. Yahweh proves His claim to be the only God of Israel through His prophet (18:1-46).
- C. God revives His depressed prophet and provides for His purposes to be worked out (19:1-21).
- D. God uses a prophet to prove His lordship over history (20:1-30a).
- E. God sends prophets to condemn His disobedient leaders (20:30b-43).
- F. God uses His prophets to bring guilty leaders to repentance (21:1-29).
- G. God speaks through His chosen prophet, not through those depending on human appointment and provisions (22:1-40).
- H. God blesses the faithful but is angry at the disobedient (22:41-53).

2 Kings

- I. Through His Prophets God Guides History and Reveals His Will (1:1-8:29).
 - A. God alone controls the fortunes of His people (1:1-18).
 - B. God provides spiritual leadership for His people (2:1-25).
 - C. The prophetic word from God controls history (3:1-27).
 - D. God's minister helps God's faithful people in their time of need (4:1-44).
 - E. God's mercy reaches across international lines (5:1-19a).
 - F. Greedy ministers cannot deceive God (5:19b-27).
 - G. God defeats the enemies of His people (6:1-7:20).
 - H. God does not forget His faithful people (8:1-6).
 - I. God controls the destiny of all nations (8:7-29).
- II. God's Mercy Has Limits (9:1-17:41).
 - A. God keeps His threats against false worship but honors those who carry out His will (9:1-10:36).
 - B. God protects His chosen leader (11:1-21).
 - C. God's people support His house of worship (12:1-16).
 - D. God's offerings are not to be used for political purposes (12:17-21).

- E. God's mercy and faithfulness protect even His disobedient people (13:1-14:29).
 - F. God works to punish a people who remain disobedient (15:1-16:20).
 - G. God brings an end to the nation that refuses to follow the prophetic word (17:1-41).
- III. God Honors Righteous Rulers but Punishes a Sinful People (18:1-25:30).
- A. God rewards those who trust in Him but punishes those who mock Him (18:1-19:37; cp. to Isa. 36:1-37:38)
 - B. God hears the prayers of His faithful servant (20:1-11; cp. to Isa. 38:1-22).
 - C. God knows the future of His people (20:12-21; cp. to Isa. 39:1-8).
 - D. Rebellion against God brings divine rejection (21:1-26).
 - E. A righteous ruler can delay divine judgment (22:1-20).
 - F. A righteous ruler cannot avert judgment forever (23:1-30).
 - G. Deserved punishment comes to God's disobedient people (23:31-25:26).
 - H. God preserves hope for His people (25:27-30).

KING'S DALE See Shaveh.

KING'S GARDEN Place in Jerusalem adjacent to and probably irrigated by the overflow of the pool of Shelah (Siloam) (Neh. 3:15). See King's Pool.

KING'S HIGHWAY Major transportation route east of the Jordan River. Literally “the way of the king,” this highway has been in continuous use for over 3,000 years. It runs from Damascus to the Gulf of Aqabah and is the main caravan route for the Transjordan. It is mentioned in Num. 20:17 and 21:22 as the route Moses and the Israelites would take through Edom and the land of Sihon. The Romans upgraded it during the reign of Trajan and renamed it Trajan's Road. The Arabic name is Tariq es-Sultani, which also means the way of the sultan or king. See Transportation and Travel.

KING'S POOL Probably the same as the Pool of Shelah, a reservoir in the king's garden in Jerusalem (Neh. 2:14), rebuilt by Shallum, ruler of the district of Mizpah (Neh. 3:15). See King's Garden.

KING'S TREASURE HOUSE See House of the Rolls.

KING'S VALE or KING'S VALLEY See Shaveh.

KINNERETH (Kin' nə-rēth) (NIV, REB) See Chinnereth.

KINSMAN Usually refers to a blood relative based on Israel's tribal nature. The most important relationship was that of the father to the oldest son.

Certain obligations were laid on the kinsman. In the case of an untimely death of a husband without a son, the law of levirate marriage becomes operative—that is, the husband's brother was obligated to raise up a male descendant for his deceased brother and thus perpetuate the deceased's name and inheritance. The living brother was the dead brother's go'el— his redeemer (Gen. 38:8; Deut. 25:5-10; Ruth 3:9-12).

The kinsman was also the blood avenger. A wrong done to a single member of the family was considered a crime against the entire tribe or clan. The clan had an obligation, therefore, to punish the wrongdoer. In the case of a murder committed, the kinsman should seek vengeance. According to the imagery of ancient people, the blood of the murdered man cried up from the ground for vengeance, and the cry was heard loudest by that member of the clan who stood nearest to the dead in kinship. Therefore the closest of kin followed through with the blood avenger responsibility (cp. Gen. 4:1-16, esp. v. 10).

The kinsman was also responsible to redeem the estate which his nearest relative might have sold because of poverty (Lev. 25:25; Ruth 4:4). It was the kinsman's responsibility also to ransom a kinsman who may have sold himself (Lev. 25:47-48).

The OT book of Ruth is the most striking example of a kinsman who used his power and Jewish law to redeem. Boaz demonstrated one of the duties of the kinsman—that of marrying the widow of a deceased kinsman. A correlation is sometimes made between the redemption of Ruth by Boaz and the redemption of sinners by Christ. KIOS (Kī' ōs) (NIV) See Chios.

KIR (Kīr) (Kir) Place-name meaning “wall.” 1. Moabite city mentioned in connection with Ar in Isaiah's prophecy against Moab (15:1). Many believe that Kir is the same as Kir-hareseth, an ancient capital of Moab along with Ar. Located at Kerak about 17 miles south of the Arnon River and 11 miles east of the Dead Sea. See Kir-hareseth. 2. Kir is the Hebrew translation of the city name Der (a word from Akkadian that also means “wall”). Kir was a Mesopotamian city east of the lower Tigris River (which is now identified with the modern Badrah) on the main road from Elam (Persia) to Babylon. During the Neo-Babylonian period (605-539 B.C.), Kir was the capital of the province of Gutium. The governor of this province joined Cyrus the Persian in the overthrow of the Babylonian Empire in 539 B.C. See Babylon.

Kir was the city from which Arameans migrated to Syria (Isa. 22:6). Their migration—like the migration of the Philistines from Caphtor—is spoken of in terms similar to that of the exodus of Israel from Egypt (Amos 9:7; cp. Amos 1:5). When Tiglath-pileser III conquered the area during the reign of Ahaz (2 Kings 16:9), the descendants of the original immigrants to Syria were sent back to Kir (cp. the aversion of the ancient Hebrews to being sent back to Egypt in Deut. 17:16; 28:68).

KIR-HARESETH (Kīr-hār' ē-sēth) Place-name meaning “city of pottery.” Known by various names in various texts and various versions of the OT: Kir-hareseth (2 Kings 3:25; Isa. 16:7), Kir-haraseth (2 Kings 3:25 KJV), Kir-heres (Isa. 16:11; Jer. 48:31,36), and Kir-haresh (Isa. 16:11 KJV). Perhaps also the same as Kir of Moab in Isaiah 15:1. See Kir I.

During the reign of Jehoram of Israel, Mesha, king of Moab, rebelled against Israel (2 Kings 3:4-27). The kings of Judah (Jehoshaphat) and Edom joined Israel in the resulting war. The forces allied against Mesha crushed the rebellion, but they were unsuccessful in capturing Mesha. He took refuge in Kir-hareseth—a well-fortified and impregnable city. After Mesha tried unsuccessfully to break through the besiegers, he offered his son as a sacrifice upon the city walls. As a result, “there came great wrath against Israel” (2 Kings 3:27 NASB), and the allied forces withdrew, leaving Mesha alive in Kir-hareseth (2 Kings 3:4-27). Apparently the forces of Israel and Judah feared the power of the Moabite god Chemosh and gave up the victory that lay within their grasp. Jehoram and Jehoshaphat did not have faith that Yahweh would give them victory over the people of Chemosh.

The prophets would later correct this view. Isaiah (15:1; 16:7,11) and Jeremiah (48:31,36) prophesied that Kir-hareseth was no match for the power of God. All human kingdoms are ultimately subject to God. Kir-hareseth was destroyed by the Babylonians whom the prophets described as God's instrument of punishment (Jer. 4:5-31; 6:1-8,22-26; 25:1-14).

Kir-hareseth is identified with modern Khirbet Karnak, about 50 miles southeast of Jerusalem and 11 miles east of the Dead Sea.

KIR-HARESH (Kīr-hā' rēsh) (KJV, Isa. 16:11) See Kir-hareseth.

KIR-HERES (Kīr-hē' rēs) Believed to be an alternate spelling of Kir-hareseth found in Isa. 16:11; Jer. 48:31,36. The Greek translation of the name in Isa. 16:11 suggests that the translators of the Septuagint had a Hebrew text that read Kir-hadesheth, a name meaning “New City,” which was mistaken for Kir-hareseth or Kir-heres. In the context Kir-hares (for Kir-hareseth) is likely the best reading (Isa. 16:7). The confusion between Kir-hadesheth and Kir-hareseth may be due to the similarity of the Hebrew “r” and “d.”

The name Kir-hares may be explained by the loss of the final Hebrew letter “th” from Kir-hareseth. See Kir-hareseth.

KIR OF MOAB See Kir 1.

KIRIATH (Kir' ı ath) Place-name meaning “city” in tribal territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18:28 NASB, NIV; KJV, Kirjath). The same as Kiriathjearim (Josh. 18:28 NRSV, REB, TEV). See Kiriath-jearim.

KIRIATHAIM (Kir' ı á thá' ım) Place-name meaning “double city” or “two cities.” 1. Levitical city and city of refuge in the tribal territory of Naphtali (1 Chron. 6:76; KJV, Kirjathaim). In the parallel list in Josh. 21:32 Kartan stands in the place of Kiriathaim and is probably another name for the same city. See Cities of Refuge; Levitical Cities; Kartan. 2. City taken from the Emim by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:5, Shaveh-kiriathaim means “the plain of Kiriathaim”). Later the Israelites took it from the Amorites and assigned it to the tribe of Reuben (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:19). The Moabites controlled the city during the exile (Jer. 48:1,23; Ezek. 25:9). Perhaps to be identified with el-Qereiyat, about five miles northwest of Dibon; however, no remains from before about 100 B.C. have been found on this site.

KIRIATH-ARBA (Kir' ı äth-är' bá) Place-name meaning “city of Arba” or “city of four.” The ancient name for the city of Hebron, the chief city in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:54). It was both a Levitical city (Josh. 21:11) and a city of refuge (Josh. 20:7). Caleb captured the city for Israel (Josh. 15:13-14). Bible students dispute the origin of the name. According to some, Kiriath-arba was originally named after Arba the Anakite hero (Josh. 14:15; 15:13). Others point to the nearby cave of Machpelah where, according to Jewish tradition, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were buried—thus, “city of four.” See Cities of Refuge; Hebron; Levitical Cities.

KIRIATH-ARIM (Kir' ı äth-ä' rım) Alternate spelling of Kiriath-jearim in Ezra 2:25. See Kiriath-jearim.

KIRIATH-BAAL (Kir' ı äth-bá' ál) Place-name meaning “city of Baal.” Another name for Kiriath-jearim in Josh. 15:60; 18:14. See Kiriath-jearim.

KIRIATH-HUZOTH (Kir ɪ ʔh-hu' zøth) Place-name meaning “city of streets.” City of Moab to which Balak took Balaam to offer a sacrifice (Num. 22:39). Some suggest a location near the Arnon River (Num. 22:36) not far from Bamothbaal (Num. 22:41 NIV). The precise location is unknown.

KIRIATH-JEARIM (Kir ɪ ʔh-jø' 4-rim) Place-name meaning “city of forests.” Kiriath-jearim was located at modern Abu Gosh nine miles north of Jerusalem. It was on the border where Dan, Benjamin, and Judah joined before Dan began their migration northward (Josh. 15:9,60; 18:14-15). Dan's army camped there in their search for new territory (Judg. 18:12). After the Philistines returned the ark of the covenant, it was kept at Kiriath-jearim for a time (1 Sam. 6:21-7:2). David attempted to move the ark to Jerusalem from there, but because he did so improperly, God struck down Uzzah (2 Sam. 6:1-8). Among Kiriath-jearim's sons was Uriah, a faithful prophet and contemporary of Jeremiah. He was executed for prophesying against the king (Jer. 26:20-24).

The Romans built a fort over the ancient ruins to guard the main route from Jerusalem to the Mediterranean Sea. A garrison from the Tenth Legion was stationed there.

Kiriath-jearim is identified with Deir al-Azhar near the modern village of Qaryet el-Inab or Abu Gosh.

KIRIATH-SANNAH (Kir ɪ-ath-sʔn' nah) Place-name, perhaps meaning “city of bronze.” Another name for the city of Debir, also known as Kiriathsepher (Josh. 15:15-16,49). See Debir 2.

KIRIATH-SEEPHER (Kir ɪ-ʔh-sø' phø) Place-name meaning “city of book.” Used in Josh. 15:15-16 as another name for Debir. Kiriath-sannah is the same city (Josh. 15:49). See Debir 2.

KISH (Kish) Personal name of unknown meaning, perhaps “gift.” 1. Father of Saul (1 Sam. 9:1-2). A man of the tribe of Benjamin who lived in Gibeah. He is said to have been the son of Abiel (1 Sam. 9:1) and the son of Ner (1 Chron. 8:33). Some think he was the grandson of Abiel and son of Ner. He was apparently a man of wealth, owning both asses and servants (1 Sam. 9:3). The description of Saul as being from the humblest family of the tribe of Benjamin is probably a good example of oriental modesty (1 Sam. 9:21). He was buried in Zela of Benjamin, where Saul and Jonathan were buried (2 Sam. 21:14). 2. A Benjaminite, the third son of Jeiel of Gibeon and Maacah (1 Chron. 8:29-30; 9:35-36). 3. Second son of Mahli who belonged to the Merari family of Levites. Kish's sons married his brother's daughters (1 Chron. 23:21-22). Kish's son, Jerahmeel, became the head of the family of Kish (1 Chron. 24:29). 4. Son of Abdi, also of the Merari family of Levites. He assisted in cleansing the temple during the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12). 5. The Benjaminite ancestor of Mordecai (Esther 2:5).

KISHI (Kish' í) Personal name possibly meaning “gift.” Levite of the Merari family (1 Chron. 6:44) also called Kushaiah (1 Chron. 15:17). See Kushaiah.

KISHION (Kish' ʾ-ōn) Place-name meaning “hard ground.” A town in Issachar allotted to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. 21:28). A parallel list calls the town Kedesh (1 Chron. 6:72). It has been suggested that “Kedesh in Issachar” may have arisen from a misreading of “Kishon” for “Kedesh.” The site is uncertain, perhaps modern Tell Abu Qudeis, about two miles southeast of Megiddo. See Kedesh; Levitical Cities.

KISHON (Ki' shōn) Place-name meaning “curving, winding.” A small river which flows from east to west through the Valley of Jezreel. In the spring it achieves a width of about 65 feet and a length of 23 miles. It was at the Kishon that Deborah and Barak defeated the Canaanite Sisera when his chariots became mired in the marshes (Judg. 4:7,13; 5:21). Later the river was the place where Elijah brought the prophets of Baal to be executed following God's display and victory on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18:40).

KISON (Ki' sōn) (KJV, Ps. 83:9) See Kishon.

KISS Most often used of the touching of the lips to another person's lips, cheeks, shoulders, hands, or feet as a gesture of friendship, acceptance, respect, and reverence. The location of the kiss carried different meanings as Jesus made clear in the episode of the woman kissing his feet (Luke 7:36-50). With the exception of three occurrences (Prov. 7:13; Song 1:2; 8:1), the term is used without any erotic overtones. Kiss translates two Hebrew words and three Greek words; the basic Hebrew term is found 32 times, and the basic Greek term is found 7 times.

In the OT close relatives kissed at greeting and departing with the connotation of acceptance most often in the foreground (Gen. 27:26-27; 29:11; 50:1; Exod. 18:7; 1 Sam. 10:1; Ruth 1:9). The term was further used of the gesture of reverence to idols (1 Kings 19:18; Hos. 13:2) as well as to the Lord (Ps. 2:12). A kiss of betrayal is also found (2 Sam. 20:9). The term “kiss” in the NT is used of Judas (Mark 14:44-45), of the father to the prodigal as a sign of acceptance and reconciliation (Luke 15:20), of the Ephesian elders to Paul as a sign of gratitude (Acts 20:37), of the woman who kissed the feet of Jesus (Luke 7:38), and of the “holy kiss” (1 Thess.5:26; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; Rom. 16:16).

The holy kiss was widely practiced among the early Christians as a manner of greeting, a sign of acceptance, and an impartation of blessing. This custom could well have been used to express the unity of the Christian fellowship. The substitute kiss involved kissing the hand and waving it in the direction of the object to be kissed (Job 31:27). The kiss of betrayal from Judas does not belong to the category of the kiss of Joab to Amasa (2 Sam. 20:9) but was the sign of respect from pupil to master. Either the action of Judas did not accord with his inner feeling, or his action had other motivation than betrayal.

The kiss still survives in the Near Eastern culture as a sign of love, respect, and reverence.

KITCHENS Place of meal preparation, particularly involving cooking. Ezekiel's vision of the temple included four small courts at the corners of the Court of the Gentiles where the sacrifices that the common people were permitted to eat were boiled (Ezek. 46:24). The KJV has “the place of them that boil.” The sin, guilt, and cereal offerings were cooked in the kitchens within the priests' chambers to protect them from contact with persons who had not been consecrated (Ezek. 46:19-20). There is no mention in the Bible of separate rooms in homes where meals were prepared. See Cooking and Heating.

KITE Bird of prey, best described as a scavenger of the Accipitridae family (hawk), the subfamily of Milvinae of the genus Milvus. Medium sized with red coloring (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13; Isa. 34:15). This bird was considered unclean and not for human consumption.

KITHLISH (Kith' lish) (KJV, REB) See Chitlish.

KITLISH (Kit' lish) (NIV) See Chitlish.

KITRON (Kit' rōn) Place-name of uncertain meaning. A city in the tribal territory of Zebulun from which the Israelites could not expel the Canaanites (Judg. 1:30). This city is probably the same as Kattath. See Kattath.

KITTIM (Kit' tīm) Tribal name for the island of Cyprus, sometimes spelled Chittim. This name was derived from Kition, a city-state on the southeastern side of the island. Long associated with maritime lore, the island was ruled first by Greece, then the Assyrians, and finally Rome. Genesis 10:4 traces the people's roots to Noah's son Japheth. Jeremiah and Ezekiel both mention it in their prophecies (Jer. 2:10; Ezek. 27:6; cp. Isa. 23:1,12).

Kittim is used in intertestamental writings as denoting all of the land west of Cyprus. First Maccabees credits it as being the land of Alexander the Great (1:1; 8:5). The writer of Daniel understood it to be a part of the Roman Empire (11:30) used to threaten Antiochus Epiphanes. The Dead Sea Scrolls contain several references to Kittim, the most notable being the defeat of her people (Romans) at the hands of God's people. See Cyprus.

KIYYUN (Kiy' yūn) NASB spelling of the word spelled Chiun in Amos 5:26 KJV. Other versions translate the word as “Kaiwan.” See Chiun; Kaiwan.

KNEAD, KNEADING BOWL Process of making bread dough by mixing flour, water, and oil along with a piece of the previous day's dough with the hands in a kneading bowl or trough. The mixture was allowed to stand in the bowl to rise and ferment (Exod. 12:34). Kneading the dough was usually the work of the woman (Gen. 18:6; 1 Sam. 28:24) but was performed on occasion by men (Hos. 7:4). The bowls could be made of wood, earthenware, or bronze and were the objects of either God's blessing or curse (Deut. 28:5,17; Exod. 8:3).

KNEEL A common posture in worship (1 Kings 19:18; Ps. 95:6; Isa. 45:23) and prayer (1 Kings 8:54; 2 Chron. 6:13; Ezra 9:5; Dan. 6:10; Acts 7:60; 9:40; 20:36; Eph. 3:14), although other postures are also found in the Bible. In the OT prayers are most often offered while standing (e.g., 1 Sam. 1:26; 2 Chron. 20:9; Neh. 9:4; Mark 11:25; Acts 6:6). Kneeling is also considered a sign of reverence, obedience, or respect (2 Kings 1:13; Matt. 17:14; 27:29; Mark 1:40; 10:17; Luke 5:8). “Kneel” and “bless” were once thought to come from the same Heb. root, but this etymology is no longer widely accepted. Blessing a child often involved placing the child on one's knees (Gen. 30:3; 48:9-12; 50:23-24). References to God as “blessed” (e.g., Gen. 9:26; 14:20 NIV) probably refer to kneeling before Him, that is, worshiping or praising Him.

KNIFE Small instrument made of flint, copper, bronze, or iron used mainly for domestic purposes. Joshua was ordered to make flint knives for the circumcision of Israelite males (Josh. 5:2-3). Since flint was not the common material used to make knives in the days of Joshua, the command to make the knives of flint probably reflects a very ancient practice of circumcision (Gen. 17:11). Knives were used most commonly for killing and skinning animals and for killing sacrificial animals (Lev. 7:2; 8:15,20,25; 9:8-15; 1 Sam. 9:24). Some Bible students think the pruning hooks of Isa. 18:5 were curved knives. Others believe that the lances of the priests of Baal were pointed knives with which they cut themselves to gain Baal's attention (1 Kings 18:28). According to Ezra 1:9 the furnishings for the temple included 29 knives (KJV, NRSV), but the meaning of the Hebrew term is uncertain as seen in modern translations: NIV, “silver pans”; REB, “vessels of various kinds”; RSV, “censers”; NASB, “duplicates.” See Circumcision.

Large, wide-bladed knife from the Roman era.

KNOB Ornamental detail on the seven-branched lampstand in the tabernacle (Exod. 25:31-36; KJV, knop; RSV, capital; NRSV, calyx; NIV, buds). Some suggest that the knob was an imitation of the almond. The word may also refer to the capital of a column (Zeph. 2:14).

KNOP An element of the candles that were part of the lampstand in the tabernacle (Exod. 25: 31-36). It may have resembled the fruit of the almond. An ornament in the shape of a gourd carved into the cedar wainscot in the temple (1 Kings 6:18). See Knob.

KNOWLEDGE Translation of several Hebrew and Greek words covering a wide range of meanings: intellectual understanding, personal experience, emotion, and personal relationship (including sexual intercourse, Gen. 4:1, etc.). Knowledge is attributed both to God and to human beings.

God's knowledge is said to be omniscient. He knows all things (Job 21:22; Ps. 139:1-18); His understanding is beyond measure (Ps. 147:5). He knows the thoughts of our minds and the secrets of our hearts (Pss. 44:21; 94:11). He knows past events (Gen. 30:22), present happenings (Job 31:4), and future events (Zech. 13:1; Luke 1:33).

The knowledge which God has of nations and human beings indicates that He has a personal interest—not merely an awareness—of people (Ps. 144:3). To be known by God may mean that a nation or individual is chosen by God to play a part in God's purposes in the world (Jer. 1:5; Amos 3:2; Gal. 4:9).

The Bible speaks often about human knowledge. Knowledge of God is the greatest knowledge (Prov. 9:10) and is the chief duty of mankind (Hos. 6:6). In the OT the Israelites know God through what He does for His people (Exod. 9:29; Lev. 23:43; Deut. 4:32-39; Pss. 9:10; 59:13; 78:16; Hos. 2:19-20). This knowledge of God is not simply theoretical or factual knowledge; it includes experiencing the reality of God in one's life (cp. Phil. 3:10) and living one's life in a manner that shows a respect for the power and majesty of God (cp. Jer. 22:15-16).

In the NT one knows God through knowledge of Jesus Christ (John 8:19; Col. 2:2-3). The Apostle Paul closely connected knowledge to faith. Knowledge gives direction, conviction, and assurance to faith (2 Cor. 4:14). Knowledge is a spiritual gift (1 Cor. 12:8) which can grow, increase, be filled, and abound (Phil. 1:9; Col. 1:9-10; 2 Cor. 8:7). It consists in having a better understanding of God's will in the ethical sense (Col. 1:9-10; Phil. 1:9), of knowing that God desires to save people (Eph. 1:8-9), and of having a deeper insight into God's will given in Christ (Eph. 1:17; 3:18-19).

Though Paul recognized the importance of knowledge, he also knew that it could be a divisive factor in churches such as at Rome and Corinth where some Christians claimed to be more spiritual because of their knowledge of spiritual matters (Rom. 14:1-15:6; 1 Cor. 8:1-13). Paul argued that knowledge puffs up but love builds up, and the knowledge exercised by the "strong" in faith could cause the "weak" in faith to go against their Christian conscience and lead to their spiritual ruin. Knowledge can be misused (1 Cor. 8). Love is more important than knowledge (1 Cor. 13), yet knowledge is still a gift, necessary for Christian teaching (1 Cor. 14:6) and for Christian growth toward a mature faith (1 Cor. 8:7; 2 Pet. 1:5-6; 3:18).

In the Gospel of John knowledge is a key concept, although the noun "knowledge" itself never occurs in John's Gospel. John instead frequently uses the verbs "to know." Jesus and the Father have a mutual knowledge (John 10:14-15), and Jesus' knowledge of God is perfect (e.g., John 3:11; 4:22; 7:28-29).

Knowledge of God is closely related to faith, expressing the perception and understanding of faith. Full knowledge is possible only after Jesus' glorification, since the disciples sometimes failed to understand Jesus (John 4:32; 10:6; 12:16). In the Gospel of John knowledge is expressed in Christian witness which may evoke belief in Jesus (John 1:7; 4:39; 12:17-18) and in love (John 17:26). Whereas Jesus' knowledge of the Father is direct, the disciples' knowledge of Jesus is indirect, qualified by believing. The Christian's knowledge of Jesus is the perception of Jesus as the revelation of God that leads to obedience to His word of love. So the Christian is caught up into God's mission of love to the world in order that the world may come to know and believe in Jesus as the revelation of the Father's love for the world.

KOA (Kō' ʾ) National name of unknown meaning. Ezekiel 23:23 lists the names of several nations God will bring against Israel. Koa, like Shoa, has not been identified to everyone's satisfaction. Some identify Koa with the Guti people of Babylon, but this is disputed.

KOHATH (Kō' hāth) Personal name of unknown meaning. The second son of Levi (Gen. 46:11) and father of Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel (Exod. 6:18) who became the heads of the Kohathite branch of the Levitical priesthood. Kohath went to Egypt with Levi (his father) and Jacob (his grandfather) (Gen. 46:11), had a sister named Jochebed (Exod. 6:20), and died at the age of 133 (Exod. 6:18). See Kohathites.

KOHATHITES (Kō' hāth-its) Descendants of Kohath, the son of Levi (Exod. 6:16). Since Kohath was the grandfather of Aaron, Moses, and Miriam (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59), the Kohathites were considered the most important of the three major Levitical families (that is, Kohathites, Gershonites, and Merarites). The Kohathites were further divided into four branches according to the four sons of Kohath: Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel (Exod. 6:18; Num. 3:19; 1 Chron. 6:1-3,16,18,33,38; 23:6,12-13,18-20; 26:23).

The Kohathites were active throughout Israel's history. The Kohathites, along with the Gershonites and Merarites, were placed around the tabernacle and were charged with caring for and moving it. The Kohathites were to camp on the south side of the tabernacle and were responsible to care for and move the ark, table, lampstand, altars, vessels of the sanctuary, and the screen (Num. 3:29-31). The Kohathites could not touch these objects and could move them only after they had been properly prepared by Aaron and his sons. The result of attempting to move these objects without their first being fit with poles for carrying was death (Num. 4:15,17-20; 7:9; cp. 1 Sam. 5-6; 2 Sam. 6:6-11).

After the conquest, Kohathites descended from Aaron received 13 cities from the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin (Josh. 21:4,9-19; 1 Chron. 6:54-60). The remaining Kohathites received 10 cities from the tribes of Dan, Ephraim, and Manasseh (Josh. 21:5,20-26; 1 Chron. 6:61,66-70). One of the latter 10 was Shechem, a city of refuge.

David appointed 120 Kohathites under the leadership of Uriel to bring the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:5). When Jehoshaphat sought deliverance from the Moabites and Ammonites, the Kohathites led the people in prayer and praise (2 Chron. 20:19). Mahath and Joel of the Kohathites helped in the purification of Israel's worship during the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12). During Josiah's religious reforms, two Kohathite priests (Zechariah and Meshullam) helped supervise the work (2 Chron. 34:12).

When the Israelites returned from the exile, some of the Kohathites were placed in charge of preparing the showbread every Sabbath (1 Chron. 9:32). See Amram; Cities of Refuge; Gershonites; Kohath; Levites; Levitical Cities; Merarites.

KOHELETH (Ko-hél' èth) English transliteration of the Hebrew title of Ecclesiastes (also spelled Qoheleth). Koheleth is a Hebrew word that is translated as preacher (KJV, RSV, NASB), teacher (NIV, NRSV), speaker (REB), or philosopher (TEV) in Eccles. 1:1.

KOLAIAH (Kō-li' ah) Personal name meaning “voice of Yah.” 1. Son of Maaseiah whose descendants lived in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 11:7). 2. Father of the false prophet, Ahab (Jer. 29:21-23).

KOPH (Koph) Nineteenth letter of Hebrew alphabet. Used as a heading for Ps. 119:145-152 and each verse in this section begins with the letter Koph (KJV), Qoph (NASB, NIV), or Qof (HCSB).

KOR (kōr) Some versions use cor. It is thought to be a dry measure equal to a homer or to about 6.3 imperial bushels, though estimates vary greatly. Those using the metric system have estimated a kor between 220 and 450 liters. It apparently represented the load a donkey could carry on its back. The measure in Luke 16:7 possibly represents a Greek transliteration of the Hebrew kor. See Weights and Measures.

KORAH (Kō' rah) Personal name meaning “bald.” 1. Son of Esau (Gen. 36:5,14; 1 Chron. 1:35) who became chief of a clan of Edom (Gen. 36:18). 2. Grandson of Esau, son of Eliphaz, and chief of a clan of Edom (Gen. 36:16). 3. Leader of rebellion against Moses and Aaron while Israel was camped in the wilderness of Paran (Num. 16). Korah, Dathan, and Abiram led a confederacy of 250 princes of the people against Aaron's claim to the priesthood and Moses' claim to authority in general. The rebels contended that the entire congregation was sanctified and therefore qualified to perform priestly functions. As punishment for their insubordination, God caused the earth to open and swallow the leaders and their property. A fire from the Lord consumed the 250 followers. 4. Levite descended from Izhar, of the family of Kohath (Exod. 6:21; 1 Chron. 6:22,37), probably to be identified with 3. above. The sons of Korah and Asaph were the two most prominent groups of temple singers (cp. 2 Chron. 20:19). Many of the psalms with the heading “A Psalm of the Sons of Korah” may have been taken from their hymnbook (Pss. 42; 44-49; 84-85; 87-88). In a later list of temple singers the group of Heman replaced Korah and was joined by Asaph and Ethan as the three groups of temple singers (1 Chron. 6:33-48).

The members of the group of Korah were also gatekeepers (1 Chron. 9:19; 26:1,19) and bakers of sacrificial cakes (9:31). 5. Son of Hebron in the lineage of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:43). 6. Possibly a town in Judah near Hebron. The five Korahites who joined David at Ziklag may have been persons from this town (1 Chron. 12:6). However, since these five men are also identified as Benjamites (1 Chron. 12:2), they may have been from a town of this same name whose location has yet to be determined.

KORAHITES (Kôr' á-hits) Descendants of Korah who belonged to the Kohathite Levites. The name is also spelled Korathites (Num. 26:58) and Korhites (KJV). See Kohathites; Korah.

KORATHITE (Kô' ráth-it) Alternate spelling of Korahites. See Korahites.

KORAZIN (Kô'-rá zín) (NIV) See Chorazin.

KORHITES (Kôr' hits) Alternate spelling of Korahites. See Korahites.

KORE (Kô' rə) Personal name meaning “one who proclaims.” 1. Son of Ebiasaph, a Levite of the family of Korah and father of Shallum and Meshelemiah, gatekeepers at the tabernacle (1 Chron. 9:19; 26:1). 2. Son of Imnah, the Levite, keeper of the eastern gate, and appointed by Hezekiah to receive the freewill offerings and distribute them among the priests (2 Chron. 31:14). 3. Mistaken transliteration in 1 Chron. 26:19 (KJV). The name should be Korah (see modern versions).

KOUM (Kûm) NIV and TEV spelling of cumi. NASB has kum. All three represent the Aramaic word which means “arise” in Mark 5:41.

KOZ (Kôz) Personal name meaning “thorn.” 1. Member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8). He may have belonged to the priestly family of Hakkoz. 2. KJV transliterates the name Hakkoz in Ezra 2:61; Neh. 3:4,21; 7:63 with “Koz,” apparently taking Hak to be the Hebrew article “the.” The person in these passages is probably the same as the person in 1 Chron. 24:10. See Hakkoz.

KUB (Kûb) (TEV) See Chub; Libya.

KUE (Kû'ê) Believed by many to be an ancient name for Cilicia. The name occurs in 1 Kings 10:28 and 2 Chron. 1:16. The Masoretes (the Hebrew scholars who added the vowels to the Hebrew text which had been written only with consonants) did not seem to understand the reference and added vowels to the consonants which gave the reading now found in the KJV, “linen yarn.” By adding different vowels to the consonants of the Hebrew text, modern Bible students read “from Kue.” If the Masoretes and the KJV are correct, then Solomon imported horses and linen yarn from Egypt. If the NRSV, NASB, NIV, REB, and TEV are correct (which in all likelihood they are), then Solomon imported horses from Egypt and Kue—that is, Cilicia in southeast Asia Minor (NEB, Coa). Many think, further, that the Hebrew word translated as “Egypt” (Mizraim) should be translated as “Musri,” a country in Asia Minor near Cilicia. From Egypt, Solomon acquired chariots (1 Kings 10:29). Thus Solomon acted as the middleman, putting horses with chariots and exporting them to other kingdoms. This proved to be a very lucrative arrangement for Solomon. See Cilicia; Mizraim; Musri; Solomon.

KUN (Kûn) TEV for Cun or Chun. See Cun.

KUSHALIAH (Kû-shî' ah) Personal name of unknown meaning. Levite of the Merarite family listed as one of the sanctuary singers during the reign of David. His son Ethan was appointed as a chief assistant of Heman (1 Chron. 15:17). This same person is also listed under the name Kishi (1 Chron. 6:44).

The Lion of Amphipolis guards the old bridge over the Strymon River. Paul passed through Amphipolis on his way from Philippi to Thessalonica.

LAADAH (Lā' á dah) Personal name meaning “throat” or “double chin.” Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron.4:21).

LAADAN (Lā' á dan) Personal name meaning “throat” or “double chin.” 1. Member of tribe of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:26) and ancestor of Joshua. 2. Original ancestor of clan of Levites and son of Gershon (1 Chron. 23:7-9; 26:21), though elsewhere Gershon's son is named Libni. Some suggest that Laadan originally belonged to family of Libni, but his clan became more prominent and overshadowed that of Libni in later times. See Libni.

LABAN (Lā' bán) Personal name meaning “white.” 1. Rebekah's brother (Gen. 24:29) and father of Leah and Rachel (Gen. 29:16). Laban lived in the city of Nahor that was probably close to the metropolis of Haran. Laban is known primarily from the two stories in Gen. 24 and 29-31. Laban was directly responsible for the betrothal of Rebekah to Isaac. After Abraham's steward relates that he has come to find a wife for Isaac, Laban and his father give their permission for the marriage (Gen. 24:50-51). Later Jacob fled to his uncle Laban's house after stealing the birthright from Esau. Laban agreed to give his daughter, Rachel, as payment for Jacob's seven years of labor. However, Laban deceived Jacob, making him marry the older daughter, Leah. After Jacob worked an additional seven years, Laban allowed him to marry Rachel (Gen. 29:15-30). See Jacob; Leah; Rachel; Rebekah. 2. Town used to locate Moses' speeches in Deuteronomy (1:1). It is sometimes identified with Libnah (Num. 33:20). LACE Ornamental braid used as a trim. Blue or purple cords were used to fasten the high priest's breastpiece to the ephod (Exod. 28:28; 39:21) and the golden plate to his turban (Exod. 28:37; 39:31). The translation “lace” (KJV, RSV) is frequently replaced with cord (NASB, NIV, NRSV, TEV) or braid (REB). The underlying Hebrew term is used elsewhere for a belt or signet cord (Gen. 38:18), for the cords or tassels on the corners of garments (Num. 15:38) or for strands of fiber (Judg. 16:9).

LACHISH (Lá' kish) An important OT city located in the Shephelah (“lowlands”) southwest of Jerusalem. It has usually been identified in modern times with the archaeological site called Tell ed-Duweir. The same site has more recently come to be called Tel Lachish. Lachish is also mentioned in ancient Egyptian, Assyrian, and Babylonian records.

The earliest reference to Lachish is in the Amarna letters (about 1400 B.C.). It was evidently one of the important Canaanite cities of the time. The Hebrew army under Joshua's command defeated the king of Lachish, killed him, and conquered his city (Josh. 10:5,23,32-33). Later, Lachish was apportioned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:39). The next biblical reference to Lachish comes in 2 Chron. 11:9, from the reign of Rehoboam who “fortified” or “built up” the city (11:5-6). Lachish was also the city of refuge for Amaziah, who fled there from Jerusalem to escape a conspiracy against him (2 Kings 14:19; 2 Chron. 25:27).

Lachish is perhaps most well-known for the story of its siege and conquest in 701 B.C. at the hands of the Assyrian King Sennacherib (2 Kings 18; 2 Chron. 32; Isa. 36). Two later brief references appear (Jer. 34:7; Neh. 11:30).

The archaeological excavations at Lachish have been extensive and rewarding. They have shown occupation at Lachish from about 4000 B.C. to the time of its conquest by the Persian Empire (539-333 B.C.). The rich and varied finds represent almost all of the periods, but the chief interest for the student of the Bible centers on the periods beginning with the time of the Hebrew invasion of Canaan. According to excavations by David Ussishkin, the archaeological evidence shows that the site contained two different Canaanite occupation levels both destroyed by fire, one in the late 1200s B.C. and one around 1150 B.C. (this latter date based upon, among other things, a cartouche of Rameses III of Egypt). The renowned OT scholar W. F. Albright had attributed the earlier destruction level to the Israelites, but Ussishkin prefers to attribute the later destruction to the Israelites (though he recognizes the possibility that the Philistines could have been the culprits). As shown here, the archaeological evidence is often assumed to correlate with a later dating of the Israelite conquest. However, according to Josh. 10, Joshua did not burn Lachish. In Joshua 11:13 it was reported as exceptional that the Israelites burned Hazor alone among a group of conquered cities. The conquest accounts in Joshua only mention the burning of three cities, Jericho, Ai, and Hazor (Josh. 6:25; 8:8,19; 11:11). According to the accounts in Joshua, the Israelites conquered Lachish and only killed its inhabitants; thus, perhaps the desire to correlate a fire level with the conquest is ill-advised. It is possible that Israel wiped out the inhabitants in a time frame correlating to the biblical dating of the conquest (1406 B.C.) leaving the site itself intact as a possible site of Israelite settlement (Deut.6:10-11) resulting in a later return of Canaanites to the site.

The definitive line of a wall at Lachish running from the south going northeast up to the high place.

The biblical account of Sennacherib's conquest of Lachish in 701 B.C. is supported and amplified by Assyrian records of King Sennacherib's campaign (2 Kings 18; 2 Chron. 32; Isa. 36). This was graphically recorded in a large and elaborate bas-relief on the walls of the royal palace in Nineveh. Presently housed in the British museum in London, these carvings show Assyrian soldiers attacking the walled city, the city inhabitants defending their city, soldiers killing some of the defenders, families with possessions being led away captive, and the king on his throne reviewing the spoils taken from the city. A replica of this relief may be found in the library of The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, Kentucky.

The “Lachish Letters”—a group of messages in ancient Hebrew inscribed with ink on pottery shards dating to around 590 B.C.—are among the most significant finds from Lachish. They provide important linguistic and historical information about this period.

LADAN (Lá' dān) Modern translations' spelling of Laadan. See Laadan.

LADDER Series of steps used for ascent or descent. The Hebrew term may refer to steps carved out of rock or to steps constructed from wood, metal, stone, or even rope. The angels ascending and descending in Jacob's vision point to God's presence with Jacob (Gen. 28:12). Jesus' promise to Nathaniel points to Jesus as the one who incarnates God's presence (John 1:49-51).

LAEL (Lá' ʿēl) Personal name meaning “belonging to God.” Levite leader in clan of Gershon (Num. 3:24).

LAHAD (Lá' hād) Personal name meaning “slow, lazybones.” Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:2).

LAHMAM (Lāh' mām) Place-name meaning “food” or “bread.” Reading in many Hebrew manuscripts and early translations for Lahmas (Josh. 15:40). KJV, NRSV, TEV read Lahmam. Town in tribal territory of Judah near Lachish, possibly modern Khirbet el-Lahm, about two and a half miles south of Beth-gibrin.

LAHMAS (Lah' mās) Place-name, perhaps meaning “violence.” Reading of basic Hebrew manuscript (Josh. 15:40) adopted by REB, NIV, NASB.

Possibly, early scribes confused final letter with similar appearing final “m” in Hebrew. See Lahmam.

LAHMI (Lah' mī) Personal name meaning “my bread” or perhaps an abbreviated form of Bethlehemite. Brother of the giant Goliath. Elhanan the son of Jair killed him (1 Chron. 20:5). The parallel passage (2 Sam. 21:19) says Elhanan the Bethlehemite killed Goliath the Gittite (cp. 1 Sam. 17). The Chronicler may have been using a text of Samuel which copyists had made difficult to read and have interpreted it to the best of his ability. Some interpreters think the present text of Samuel represents copyists' confusion with the Chronicler's text accuracy. See Elhanan; Goliath.

LAISH (Lā' ish) Personal and place-name meaning “strong” or “lion.” The KJV form of Laishah. 1. Laish was from Gallim in Benjamin. He was the father of Paltiel (Phalti in KJV) and father-in-law of Michal, King Saul's daughter (1 Sam. 19:11-12; 25:44) See Michal. 2. Originally a Canaanite city in northern Palestine known for its quiet, secure, and isolated lifestyle (Judg. 18:7). It was spied out by the Danites as a place for their dwelling after the Philistines forced them from the coastal region. After finding it suitable, the Danites invaded Laish and renamed the city and area Dan. See Dan. 3. Town apparently in tribal territory of Benjamin whose troubles from Assyrian invasion Isaiah mentioned (Isa. 10:30). Its location is not known. Modern translations read Laishah.

LAISHAH (Lā' ish ah) Place-name meaning “lioness” or “towards Laish.” City on military route from Bethel to Jerusalem which Isaiah warned of Assyrian army's approach (Isa. 10:30). It may be modern el-Esawijeh southwest of Anathoth or Ras et-Tawil south of Geba. See Laish.

LAKKUM (Lāk' kūm) or LAKUM (Lā' kūm) Place-name, perhaps meaning “rising” or “fortification.” Border town in tribal allotment of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33). It may be modern Khirbet el-Mansurah near the southern end of the Sea of Galilee.

LAMA See Eli, Eli, Lama Sabachthani.

LAMB Young sheep. See Lamb of God; Sheep.

LAMB OF GOD Title specifically bestowed upon the Lord Jesus by John the Baptist (John 1:29), “Here is the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!” (HCSB). The title is found earlier than the NT but not with the specific meaning found there. For example, the phrase is used in a second-century apocryphal book to refer to the Messiah (“honor Judah and Levi, for from them shall arise for you the Lamb of God, saving all nations by grace”). Also, Jer. 11:19 and Isa. 53:7 point to a prophetic significance of the Lamb. It is in the NT, however, that the term finds its distinctly Christian significance to refer to Christ as the Lamb who atoned for our sins.

The source of the expression is to be found in the important place that the “lamb” occupies in the sacrifices of the Jewish people. A lamb was used for sacrifice during the annual Passover (Exod. 12:1-36) as well as in the daily sacrifices of Israel (Lev. 14:12-21; Heb. 10:5-7). On the Sabbath the number of the offerings was doubled, and at some of the great festivals a still larger number were laid upon the altar (Exod. 29:38; Num. 28:3,9,13). All this would be familiar to John the Baptist, being a member of a priestly family.

The lamb of the Passover occupied a prominent place in the mind of a devout Israelite, and when John spoke the words of John 1:29, the Passover was not far off. The sacrificial significance of the term is much more important than the mere comparison of the character of our Lord with meekness and gentleness, as some have suggested. The sacrificial use is clearly in view in the words of the Apostles Paul (1 Cor. 5:7) and Peter (1 Pet. 1:18).

While uses of the word “lamb” are fairly sparse in the rest of the NT, in the book of Revelation the references to the Lamb take center stage. The term occurs 27 times, but the word used by the Apostle John differs from the one spoken by the Baptist. The amnos of John 1:29 becomes the arnion in Revelation, a diminutive form suggestive of affection. Arnion is also the word used by the Lord in His rebuke and forgiveness of Peter (John 21:15). While the arnion in Revelation is the Lamb of sacrifice (5:6-10; 12:11), He also is the one who will come in wrath and judgment (6:16-17).

The relation between John 1:29 and Isa. 53 has been the subject of significant discussion. In verse 10 Isaiah's "suffering one" "would render Himself as a guilt offering," and in verse 4 "our griefs He Himself bore" (NASB). The prophet's word for "bearing" (in the Septuagint [LXX], pherein) involves the conception of a sin offering possessing justifying power, and the idea of "taking away" is in view. John, however, did not use the LXX word pherein but airein when he said Christ will "take away" the sin of the world. Some scholars have maintained that John's term simply means "put away," or "support," or "endure." But this surely misses the meaning of the associated term "lamb," which John could not have employed without some reference to its sacrificial and therefore substitutionary force.

Between the two references, we find in Christ the fulfillment of the promise that God would provide a sacrifice who would both bear the curse of sin and provide salvation for the world. While Isaiah may not have had a complete dogmatic conception of the full relation of the death of Christ to the salvation of the world at large, at the very least the idea of bearing the curse of sin was in Isaiah's mind. LAME, LAMENESS Physical condition in which walking is difficult or impossible. In the OT lame animals were not acceptable sacrifices (Deut. 15:21; Mal. 1:8,13). The lame were prohibited from serving as priests though they were allowed to eat from the priests' provisions (Lev. 21:18). The Jebusites boasted that their stronghold of Jerusalem was so impregnable that even the blind and lame would be able to turn back David's troops (2 Sam. 5:6 NRVS, NIV). A proverb excluding the blind and lame from “the house” (that is, the temple) is traced to the assault on Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:8). In the NT the healing of the lame forms an important part of Jesus' messianic work (Matt. 11:2-6; 15:29-31). By healing the lame in the temple, Jesus restored these excluded ones to full participation in the worshiping community (Matt. 21:14). Acts tells of the early church continuing Jesus' healing ministry to the lame: Peter and John (Acts 3:2); Philip (8:7); Paul (14:8-10).

LAMECH (La' mək) Personal name meaning “powerful.” 1. The son of Methushael (Gen. 4:18). He had two wives, Adah and Zillah, whose sons are credited with the rise of the nomadic way of life, music, and metalworking. Lamech is blamed with beginning polygamy (or bigamy) and the increase of sinful pride in the earth. The Song of Lamech (Gen. 4:23-24) is an ancient poem supporting unlimited revenge. 2. The son of Methuselah and father of Noah (5:25-31). He lived 777 years.

LAMED (La' mēd) Twelfth letter of the Hebrew alphabet used as a heading for Ps. 119:89-96. Each verse in this section of the psalm begins with the letter lamed.

LAMENT See Grief and Mourning; Lamentations; Psalms, Book of.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF Composed of five poetic laments over the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple in 587 B.C. (Lam. 2:7) and over the pitiable condition of the people of Judah that resulted (2:11). The misery after the destruction is all the more deplorable compared to the glory beforehand (1:1). The author calls on the people to recognize that because of their sin God is just in what He has done (1:5), so the people should turn to Him, repent, and appeal for mercy (2:18; 3:25-26,40-41). See Exile; Israel, Land of.

The somber tone of Lamentations is suited to solemn services. The Jews read the book annually on the ninth of Ab to commemorate, among other things, the destruction of the first and second temples. Christians traditionally read it in services during the last three days of Holy Week.

The book does not state who its author was, but from ancient times it has traditionally been ascribed to Jeremiah. While some scholars find reason to doubt this, others defend it.

The following factors favor authorship by Jeremiah: (1) There are similarities between Lamentations and Jeremiah in tenor, theology, themes, language, and imagery (cp. Lam. 1:15 and Jer. 8:21; Lam. 1:2 and Jer. 30:14). (2) Like the book of Jeremiah, Lamentations affirms that Judah should submit to the exile because it is deserved (Lam. 1:5; 3:27-28; Jer. 29:4-10), yet there is hope for restoration (Lam. 3:21-33; 4:22; 5:19-22; Jer. 29:11-14). (3) Both books suggest that the prophets and priests share with the people the blame for the nation's sin (Lam. 2:14; 4:13; Jer. 14:14; 23:16).

An eyewitness to the destruction of Jerusalem seemingly wrote Lamentations, and the Prophet Jeremiah was an eyewitness (Lam. 2:6-12; Jer. 39:1-14). We know that Jeremiah wrote a lament over Josiah (2 Chron. 35:25); therefore it is entirely possible he also wrote these laments.

The canonicity of Lamentations has never been seriously challenged. The English Bible, like the Greek and Latin, places Lamentations after Jeremiah, probably for reasons of authorship and historical content. In the Hebrew Bible Lamentations is included with the "Writings," specifically among the five Megilloth, or "Scrolls," which are read during holy days.

Lamentations takes the form of a lament, a dirge. It shares literary attributes with laments in the Psalms (e.g., 44; 60; 74; 79; 80; 83; 89). Some scholars propose that there is a metrical pattern in the Hebrew poetry of chapters 1-4 that is found in other dirges in the Bible.

Chapters 1-4 are alphabetic acrostics. Because there are 22 letters in the Hebrew alphabet, chapters 1, 2, and 4 have 22 verses: each verse begins with a succeeding letter of the alphabet. Chapter 3 has 66 verses because three successive verses are allotted to each letter of the alphabet. (Chapter 5 also has 22 verses, but it is not composed as an acrostic.) The reason the author used the alphabetic acrostic may have been either to control and restrain the grief that would otherwise run rampant or to express his sorrow completely—from A to Z, as we would say. See Acrostic.

The facts of the fall of Jerusalem are given in 2 Kings 25 and Jer. 52; Lamentations expresses the emotion. Like Job, Lamentations wrestles with the problem of evil. Like Ezekiel, it expresses what results when God leaves His temple, His city, and His people. Throughout, it is acknowledged that Judah deserved its punishment; it is consistent with the curse in Deut. 28:15-68. But along with this admission of guilt is a call for the punishment to end, as in the psalms of lament, and a call for the enemies who carried it out to be punished in return (Lam. 4:22), as in the imprecatory psalms and Hab. 1:12-17.

LAMPS, LIGHTING, LAMPSTAND System and articles used to illuminate homes in biblical times. Lamps are mentioned often in the Bible but seldom described. Archaeological excavations have provided numerous examples of these lighting implements used in ancient times, dating from before Abraham to after Christ. Lamps of the OT period were made exclusively of pottery. These lamps were of the open-bowl design with a pinched spout to support the wick. Wicks were made generally of twisted flax (Isa. 42:3). Lamps burned olive oil almost exclusively (Exod. 25:6), though in later times oil from nuts, fish, and other sources were used. Lamps from the Bronze Age to the Hellenistic times were made on the pottery wheel, after which molds were made for the enclosed forms of the Greek and Roman periods (from about 500 B.C. onward). For outdoor lighting the torch (KJV, lantern) was used (Judg. 7:16; John 18:3).

Hellenistic slipper lamps from Israel. These lamps are from the Maccabean era.

A golden lampstand with three branches extending from either side of the central tier was placed in the tabernacle (Exod. 25:31-40). Each branch may have had a seven-spouted lamp (Zech. 4:2), as do some individual lamps found in Palestine. This seven-branched candelabrum (menorah), supporting seven lamps, continued in prominence through the first and second temple periods and later became symbolic of the nation of Israel. Surrounding nations also employed multitiered and multilegged lamps and lampstands.

First-century B.C. pottery oil lamps.

Lamps (lights) were used symbolically in the OT and NT. Light depicted life in abundance, divine presence, or life's direction versus death in darkness (cp. Ps. 119:105; 1 John 1:5 with Job 18:5; Prov. 13:9). Jesus is depicted often in John as the light of the world (John 1:4-5,7-9; 3:19; 8:12; 9:5; 11:9-10; 12:35-36,46). Jesus' disciples are also described as the light of the world (Matt. 5:14-16). See Light, Light of the World.

LANCE, LANCET Weapon consisting of a long shaft with a metal head; javelin; spear (Judg. 5:8 NASB; 1 Kings 18:28 RSV; Jer. 50:42 KJV). In modern English a lancet is a two-edged surgical instrument. The KJV used “lancet” for a small lance (1 Kings 18:28). See Arms and Armor; Weapons.

LANDMARK Pillar or heap of stones serving as a boundary marker (Gen. 31:51-52). Some Babylonian and Egyptian examples are elaborately carved. Many ancient law codes (Babylonian, Egyptian, Greek, Roman) prohibited the removal of a landmark (Deut. 19:14; cp. 27:17; Prov. 22:28). In Job 24:2 removal of a marker parallels theft. Proverbs 23:10 warns against removing markers to rob orphans. Hosea 5:10 condemns the ruthless rulers of Judah as like those who remove landmarks, that is, those who have no regard for justice or for the traditional law. Moving the landmark meant changing the traditional land allotments (cp. Josh. 13-19) and cheating a poor landowner of what little land he owned.

LANE Narrow, constricted passageway. In English “lane” evokes the image of a rural path between hedges or fences. The Greek term is used for a city alley (Luke 14:21 KJV, NASB, NRSV; alley, NIV, REB, TEV; “streets and alleys” HCSB). Compare Acts 9:11; 12:10 where the same Greek term is used.

This array of lamps shows the progression from the middle Bronze Age to the Persian and Hellenistic periods.

LANGUAGE, CONFUSION OF See Babel; Pentecost

LANGUAGES OF THE BIBLE The OT was first written in Hebrew with the exceptions of much of Ezra 4-7 and Daniel 2:4b-7:28, which appear in Aramaic. The NT was written in Greek though Jesus and the early believers may have spoken Aramaic.

Characteristics of Hebrew Hebrew is a Semitic language related to Phoenician and the dialects of ancient Canaan. Semitic languages have the ability to convey abundant meaning through few words. Importance rests on the verb, which generally comes first in the sentence because action is the most significant element. Similarly, modifiers (such as adjectives) follow nouns, lending greater weight to the nouns. Typical word order for a sentence is: verb—subject—subject modifiers—object—object modifiers. Deviation from this order gives emphasis to the word that comes first.

Characteristics of Aramaic Aramaic is similar to Hebrew and shares a considerable vocabulary with it. It began as the language of Syria and was gradually adopted as the language of international communication. After about 600 B.C. it replaced Hebrew as the spoken language of Palestine. Hebrew then continued as the religious language of the Jews, but the Aramaic alphabet was borrowed for writing it.

Characteristics of Greek Greek belongs to the Indo-European language group. It spread throughout the Mediterranean world after about 335 B.C. with Alexander's conquests. The NT is written in a dialect called koine (meaning “common”), which was the dialect of the common person. New Testament Greek is heavily infused with Semitic thought modes, and many Aramaic words are found rendered with Greek letters (e.g., talitha koum , Mark 5:41; ephphatha , Mark 7:34; Eloi, Eloi, lema sabachthani , Mark 15:34; maranatha , 1 Cor. 16:22). So also are such Latin words as kenturion (centurion) and denarion (denarius). Greek's accurateness of expression and widespread usage made it the ideal tongue for the early communication of the gospel. Paul no doubt knew all three biblical languages and Latin as well. See Aramaic; Daniel, Book of; Ezra, Book of; Greek Language; Hebrew Language.

LANTERN Portable container with transparent openings used to display and protect a light. The Greek term used at John 18:3 is of uncertain meaning, though some type of light is clearly intended. In John's ironic scene, the mob comes with “artificial” lights to arrest Jesus, “the light of the world” (John 8:12; 9:5; 11:9; 12:35-36,40).

LAODICEA (La ðd i sē' á) City in southwest Asia Minor on an ancient highway running from Ephesus to Syria 10 miles west of Colossae and six miles south of Hierapolis. Christian communities existed in all three cities (Col. 2:1; 4:13-16), though the one in Colossae is the best known. Paul wrote a letter to the Laodiceans (Col. 4:16) which has not survived, though some scholars have attempted to identify this missing letter with either the letter to the Ephesians or to Philemon.

Laodicea was well-known in the ancient world for its wealth. The extent of its wealth is illustrated by the fact that Laodicea was rebuilt without the financial help of Rome after the disastrous earthquake of A.D. 60. Laodicea earned its wealth in the textile industry in the production of black wool and in the banking industry. Laodicea was also known for its medical school that concocted a spice nard for the treatment of ears and an eye salve. The major weakness of Laodicea was its lack of a water supply. This need was met by bringing water six miles north from Denizli through a system of stone pipes (another sign of Laodicea's wealth).

Laodicea is best known today to readers of Revelation where Jesus criticized Laodicea, using imagery drawn from its daily life (Rev. 3:14-22). First, Jesus said Laodicea is neither cold (like the cold, pure waters of Colossae) nor hot (like the therapeutic hot springs of Hierapolis). Laodicea is lukewarm and provides neither refreshment for the spiritually weary nor healing for the spiritually sick (Rev. 3:15-16). Despite their apparent spiritual uselessness, the Laodiceans were claiming a spiritual wealth equal to their material wealth; and further, they were claiming to have acquired both by their own efforts. In reality, however, the Laodiceans, while they may have had material wealth, were spiritually poor, blind, and naked (Rev. 3:17)—an obvious reference to the textile and banking industry and medical school of Laodicea. According to Jesus, what the Laodiceans needed more than anything else was the true gold, white (not black) garments, and ointment that only Christ could give (Rev. 3:18). A true spiritual foundation is laid only in Christ, not human effort.

Exterior view of the archways in the top tier of one of the great theaters at ancient Laodicea.

An unexcavated Roman theater, smaller of the two theaters at ancient Laodicea.

The letter of the risen Christ to the church at Laodicea (Rev. 3:14-22) contains numerous allusions to conditions in the city. A five-mile-long aqueduct supplied the city with tepid water that served as an image for “lukewarm” Christianity (3:15-16). The Laodicean claim to be rich and prosperous reflects the self-reliant refusal of this city to accept Roman aid for rebuilding after an earthquake of about A.D. 60 (3:17). The charge that the Laodicean Christians were naked, blind, and in need of clothing and ointment (3:17-18) reflects the city's well-known school of ophthalmology and its fine garments of raven-black wool of local sheep.

LAODICEANS, EPISTLE TO THE Short letter claiming Paul as its author. The letter was doubtless composed to fill in the gap suggested by Col. 4:16. The date of writing is unknown. Jerome (340?-420) warned against this spurious work. Despite Jerome's protests the letter was accepted as a genuine Pauline epistle by Pope Gregory the Great (590-604). About one half of the Latin manuscripts of the Pauline Epistles produced between 500 and 1600 contain the Epistle to the Laodiceans. With the Reformation the epistle quickly fell into disuse. The epistle was perhaps composed in Greek, though it survives only in Latin. Its 247 words are a patchwork of passages drawn from the authentic Pauline letters, chiefly Philipians but also Galatians, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and 1 and 2 Timothy. There are also echoes of Matthew and 2 Peter.

LAPWING (Vanellus vanellus) Shorebird with a short bill and a crest of feathers on its head. The lapwing is known for its irregular flapping flight and shrill cry. KJV included the lapwing among the unclean birds (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18). Modern translations generally identify the Hebrew term with the hoopoe.

LASCIVIOUSNESS KJV term for an unbridled expression of sexual urges (Mark 7:22; 2 Cor. 12:21; Gal. 5:19; Eph. 4:19; 1 Pet. 4:3; Jude 4). RSV translated the underlying Greek as licentiousness; NASB, sensuality. Other translations used a variety of terms: debauchery, indecency, lewdness, sexual sin.

LASEA [Lá sē' á] Place-name of uncertain meaning. City on south coast of Crete (Acts 27:8).

LASHA (Lá' shá) Place-name of uncertain meaning. A point on the original border of Canaan (Gen. 10:19). The traditional location is at Kallirhoe, east of the Dead Sea. Others identify it with Nuhashe or Laash in northern Syria near Hamath. The exact meaning of the prepositions and the direction of the borders are not clear.

LASHARON (Lá shár' ōn) Place-name meaning “belonging to Sharon.” Listed as one of the towns whose king Joshua killed in conquering Canaan (Josh. 12:18). The early Greek translators had great difficulty with the text, some Greek manuscripts omitting the verse altogether. “L” represents the Hebrew preposition “of, to, belonging to.” Sharon is the name of the plain in which the preceding town Aphek in the list is located. The original Hebrew text may have indicated Aphek in Sharon to distinguish it from other Apheks. See Aphek.

LAST DAY, LAST TIME See Eschatology; Judgment Day.

LAST SUPPER The last meal Jesus shared with His disciples before the crucifixion. The high point of the Bible and central event of the ages is the passion (betrayal, crucifixion, death, burial, resurrection, and ascension) of Jesus Christ. All that goes before it in the Bible anticipates His coming. All that comes after presents the full meaning of the person and work of Christ.

The Last Supper is reported in the four Gospels (Matt. 26:20-35; Mark 14:12-31; Luke 22:14-38; and John 13:1-17:26), but the oldest and most detailed description is in 1 Cor. 11:17-34, probably written before the Gospels were published. Even earlier is Isa. 52:13-53:12, which reads like eye-witness testimony. These two passages are used more than the Gospels to explain the significance of the passion.

As His last week unfolded, Jesus established a new celebration. The new communal meal forms the heart of Christian worship and will be celebrated until the second coming of Christ, when the symbolism will give way to the full reality the supper anticipates. The breaking and sharing of bread and the drinking of the cup were invested with new meaning, demonstrating continuity of the old and new covenants. The body and blood of Christ were given as a sacrifice to secure eternal salvation for all who trust Him as Lord and Savior. That night Jesus also demonstrated the principle of servant leadership. Judas Iscariot, one of the Twelve, though publicly honored that night, betrayed Christ into the hands of those who crucified Him.

Commentators love to explore apparent contradictions in timing and details of the Last Supper in relationship to the observance of Passover. The Synoptics relate it directly to the Passover meal, and John (if talking about the same event) places it on the day before. The assumption of conflict may not be correct. Often in his Gospel John related events not recorded in the other Gospels. Just as his narratives are different in other aspects, John may be describing another intimate meal with the disciples earlier in the final week of Jesus' life. See Ordinances.

LATCHET KJV term for a leather thong or strap used to fasten sandals (Gen. 14:23; Isa. 5:27; Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16; John 1:27). According to the rabbis, untying sandals was a slave's task that could not be required of a disciple. John the Baptist thus claimed for himself a position lower than that of a slave before Jesus.

LATTICE Structure of crisscrossed strips. Lattices were used as window covering to allow some light to penetrate while keeping heat and rain to a minimum (Judg. 5:28; 2 Kings 1:2; Prov. 7:6, KJV, casement; Song 2:9). According to one interpretation, in Ezekiel's temple vision the windows were latticed (Ezek. 41:16,26 NASB). Other translations describe the windows as covered. The NASB also spoke of the lattices of the doves (Isa.

60:8). Other translations use home (TEV), nests (NIV), dovecots (REB), or windows (KJV, NRSV).

LAUGH To express joy or scorn with a chuckle or explosive sound. Laughter is central to the account of the birth of Isaac. Both Abraham (Gen. 17:17) and Sarah (18:12) laughed in contempt and disbelief at God's promise that Sarah would bear a son. The name Isaac (from the Hebrew word for laughter) served as a joyful reminder that the last laugh was on those slow to believe (Gen. 21:3,6). Laughter can serve as a sign of contempt (Gen. 38:23; 2 Chron. 30:10; Job. 22:19) or of confidence (Job 5:22; 39:18,22 NASB). References to God's laughing at the wicked demonstrate God's confident contempt (Pss. 2:4; 37:13; 59:8). Laughter is frequently contrasted with signs of mourning (Job 8:21; Ps. 126:2; Luke 6:21,25). Though Hebrew wisdom recognized a time to laugh as part of God's ordering of time (Eccles. 3:4), wisdom downplayed the value of laughter, associating it with fools (Prov. 29:9; Eccles. 7:4,6), calling it madness (Eccles. 2:2), and finding sorrow preferable (Eccles. 7:3).

LAVER Large basin or bowl used in purification rites. The OT describes the lavers used in the tabernacle and in Solomon's temple. The bronze laver of the tabernacle was constructed from metal mirrors provided by the women who ministered at the tabernacle entrance (Exod. 38:8). The priests used the laver for washing their hands and feet before priestly service (Exod. 30:18; 40:30-31). Levites also used water from this laver to purify themselves (Num. 8:7). Solomon's temple employed a large laver, the molten sea (1 Kings 7:23-26; 2 Chron. 4:2-5), and 10 smaller lavers (1 Kings 7:38-39; 2 Chron. 4:6). The priests washed in the molten sea. The 10 lavers were used for washing sacrifices (2 Chron. 4:6). See Molten Sea; Temple.

LAW, ROMAN See Roman Law.

LAW, TEN COMMANDMENTS, TORAH Few expressions in the Bible are simultaneously more significant and more misunderstood than “law.” Biblical interpreters apply the word to specific commandments, customs, legal judgments, collections of regulations/ordinances, the book of Deuteronomy (which means “second law”), the entire complex of regulations revealed at Sinai, the Pentateuch (in contrast to the Prophets), and the OT as a whole as opposed to the NT. The NT recognizes other laws as well, including natural laws (Rom. 1:26; 2:14) and “the law of sin” that results in inevitable death (Rom. 7:23,25; 8:2).

The conviction of a contrast between the OT, in which God's people were under the law, as opposed to the NT, where God's people are under grace, is determinative for many peoples' understanding of Scripture. Appeal is sometimes made to John 1:17, “For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ” (HCSB). For this perception of a radical disjunction between the testaments two factors have been determinative. First, the Septuagint is virtually consistent in translating torah as nomos, “law” (202/220 occurrences). Second, Paul makes some strong assertions that whereas the law keeps us in custody and the letter [of the law] kills, through faith in Christ we are delivered from the law and made alive by the Spirit (2 Cor. 3:6-7; Gal. 3:19-29; cp. Rom. 4:14). Accordingly many see a radical contrast between the old covenant, under which people were governed by the rule of law, and the new covenant, under which we are governed by the Spirit.

However, a closer look at the biblical evidence raises questions about the validity of both the Septuagint's rendering of torah and Luther's perception of the old covenant as a works oriented system. We begin with a survey of the OT perspective on “law” under the old covenant.

Old Testament Terms for “Law” The OT has a rich and varied legal vocabulary: mitsvot, “commandments”; huqqim/huqqot, “ordinances, statutes, decrees”; mishpatim, “judgments, legal regulations”; edot, “covenant obligations, stipulations” (English “testimony” derives from the Greek Septuagint, marturion); piqqudim, “obligations, regulations”;

debarim , “words, verbal utterances”; torot , “authoritative instructions, teachings.”

The first five words usually refer to the specific laws and regulations prescribed by the Lord at Sinai and elsewhere. The most notable occurrence of the sixth, debarim , occurs in the expression, aseret haddebarim , “Ten Words,” usually rendered “Ten Commandments” or “Decalogue.” On occasion torah may be legitimately translated as “law.” However, its everyday meaning is illustrated by the book of Proverbs, which applies the term to the “instruction” that the wise provide for the community (13:14), parents provide for children (1:8; 4:1-11), and the woman of the household to those under her influence (31:26). Its theological meaning is presented most clearly by the book of Deuteronomy, which, contrary to the Greek (and English) name of the book (“second law”), does not present itself as “law” but as a series of pastoral addresses (Deut. 1:1-5; 4:40). Even the so-called “Deuteronomic Code” (chaps. 16-26) has a pronounced pastoral and didactic (rather than legal) flavor.

This conclusion regarding the meaning of torah is confirmed when we observe how easily its scope was extended to the rest of the Pentateuch despite the fact that at least two-thirds of Genesis-Numbers is narrative, that is, the story of Yahweh's grace in election, salvation, and providential care for Israel, and His establishment of His covenant first with Abraham and then with the patriarch's descendants at Sinai.

These observations do not obscure the fact that the Pentateuch contains a great deal of prescriptive material with which the Lord sought to govern every aspect of the Israelites' lives. Scholars have identified several specific documents that might qualify as law: the “Passover Ordinance” (Exod. 12-13), the Decalogue (Exod. 20:2-17; Deut. 5:6-21), the “Covenant Document” (seper habberit , Exod. 21-23, cp. 24:7), the “Tabernacle Ordinance” (Exod. 25-31), the “Instructions Concerning Sacrifice” (Lev. 1-7), the “Holiness Code” (Lev. 17-25), and the “Deuteronomic Code” (Deut. 12-26). Maimonides, a Jewish rabbi, established that 613 commandments were scattered throughout the Pentateuch.

Old Testament Large portions of the Pentateuch, specifically the ordinances and covenant obligations, represent theological developments based on the Ten Commandments; there are seven.

First, God and Moses perceived obedience to the laws, not as a way of or precondition to salvation, but as the grateful response of those who had already been saved. God did not reveal the law to the Israelites in Egypt and then tell them that as soon as they had measured up to this standard He would rescue them. On the contrary, by grace alone, through faith they crossed the Red Sea to freedom. All that was required was belief in God's promise that He would hold up the walls of water on either side and see them safely through to the other shore.

The Decalogue begins, not with the first commandment, but with a preamble: "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery" (Exod. 20:2; Deut. 5:6). Obedience to the Decalogue or any other law has never been intended as the way of salvation but as the appropriate response to salvation already received.

Second, obedience to the law was an expression of covenant relationship. Israel's primary commitment was not to a code of laws but to the God who graciously called Israel to Himself; they were to obey "His voice." In fact, He did not reveal His will to the people until He heard their declaration of complete and unconditional servitude to Him as covenant lord (Exod. 19:8).

Third, obedience to the law was the precondition to Israel's fulfillment of the mission to which she had been called and the precondition to her own blessing. The first point is highlighted in Exod. 19:5-6: if Israel will keep the Lord's covenant and obey His voice, she will be God's special treasure, His kingdom of priests, His holy nation (cp. Deut. 26:16-19). The second is spelled out in detail in Lev. 26:1-13 and Deut. 28:1-4.

Fourth, God's revelation of the law to Israel was a supreme act of grace and a unique sign of privilege (Deut. 4:6-8). In contrast to the nations who worshiped gods of wood and stone who never spoke (4:28; Ps. 115:4-8), Israel's God has spoken, clearly revealing to His people what He deemed an acceptable response to Him. Accordingly, for the genuinely faithful in Israel, obedience to the law was not a burden but a delight because of their deep gratitude for God's saving grace and covenant relationship and also because they knew God would respond to their obedience with favor (Deut. 6:20-25; Ps. 24:3-6).

Fifth, true obedience to the law was to be the external expression of an inward disposition of fear and faith in God and covenant love toward him. True biblical religion has always been a matter of the heart. This internal transformation is referred to metaphorically as a circumcised heart (Lev. 26:41; Deut. 10:16; 30:6-10; Jer. 4:4), a heart transplant (Jer. 24:7; 32:39; Ezek. 11:19; 36:26), the placement of God's Spirit within a person (Ezek. 11:19; 36:26), and the writing of God's Torah on the heart (Jer. 31:32).

Sixth, the laws viewed all of life holistically as under the authority of the divine suzerain. This is illustrated most impressively in Lev. 19, which, with its more than four dozen commandments, refuses to classify, let alone arrange in order of importance, civil, ceremonial and moral laws.

Seventh, the laws were perceived as comprehensible and achievable (Deut. 30:11-20) by those whose hearts were right with God. God did not impose upon His people an impossibly high standard but revealed to them in great detail a system of behavior that was uniquely righteous and also gracious (Deut. 4:6-8). At the same time there is a recognition of human depravity and the need for divine enablement for covenant faithfulness. Jeremiah anticipated a future new covenant when all Israel will love God and demonstrate with their lives that His torah has been written on their hearts (Jer. 31:31-34). God had a realistic view of His people. Recognizing their propensity to sin, within the law He graciously provided a way of forgiveness and communion through the sacrificial and ceremonial ritual.

Of course these seven facts did not prevent the Israelites from perverting obedience to the law into a condition for blessing and a condition for salvation. The prophets constantly railed against their people for substituting external rituals prescribed by the law for true piety, which is demonstrated first in moral obedience (Isa. 1:10-17; Hos. 6:6; Amos 5:21-24; Mic. 6:6-8). In every age Israelites misused the law, thinking that performance of rituals obligated God to receive them favorably. This did not prevent the Israelites from perverting the privilege of possessing the law into a divine right and unconditional guarantee of God's protection (Jer. 7:1-10,21-26; 8:8-12). Israel persistently perverted the law by placing great stock in rituals while disregarding God's ethical and communal demands. They imagined that God looked upon their hearts through the lenses of their sacrifices. They persisted in violating the moral laws even while they continued to observe the ceremonial regulations (Isa. 1; Jer. 7). In the end, Moses' predictions of disaster in Deut. 4 and 29-30 proved true in the exile of Judah in 586 B.C. The story of Israel as a nation was largely one of failure—not by God but by those whom He had called to be His people.

New Testament The legal vocabulary of the NT is more limited than that found in the OT. The most common term, nomos, “law,” bears a range of meanings from a specific duty that God requires of a person, to the Mosaic law, the Pentateuch as a whole, and indeed the OT as a whole (John 10:34; 12:34; 15:25; 1 Cor. 14:21). In addition, the NT uses entole, “commandment” (e.g. Luke 23:56), and dikaioma, “regulation” (Luke 1:6; Rom. 2:26).

Like Moses and the psalmists, the NT views God's original revelation of the law to Israel as a climactic moment of grace. The basic disposition toward the law is expressed most eloquently in John 1:16-17: “From his fullness we have all received one demonstration of grace after another; for the nomos (= torah) was given through (edothē dia) Moses; grace and truth happened through (egeneto dia) Jesus Christ.” The contrast here is not between law and grace as abstractions but between mediated grace in the form of torah and embodied grace in Jesus Christ.

Accordingly, when Jesus and Paul appear to be critical of the law, we should always ask whether their struggle was with the law itself or with misuse of the law. From the beginning Israelites had perverted the law by treating the law as a precondition of entrance into the kingdom of God rather than as a response to His grace; by adhering to the law's legal requirements as a matter of duty rather than a grateful expression of heartfelt covenant love for God and one's neighbor; and by treating physical descent from Abraham and membership in the Jewish nation as a guarantee of divine favor, rather than spiritual descent by faith as the precondition to blessing. It is to these abuses that many of the critical words concerning the law are addressed in the NT.

Jesus and the Law Jesus' own attitude toward the law is expressed fundamentally in two texts, Matt. 5:17-20 and 22:34-40 (cp. Mark 10:17-27; 12:28-31; Luke 10:25-37). In the first He declares that He came not to abolish (kataluein) the law or the prophets but to fulfill (plerosai) [them].” Here “law” refers not only to covenant obligations revealed at Sinai but to the entire Pentateuch. Here “fulfill” means to bring the OT revelation to its intended goal. Jesus goes on to declare the enduring validity and authority of every detail of the law until it is fulfilled. With Christ's first coming many aspects of the law are brought to complete fruition. As the eschatological fulfillment of the old covenant, in His person Jesus brings to an end the ceremonial shadows (sacrifices and festivals) and transforms old covenant customs into new covenant realities (baptism, the sign of the covenant made with the church, appears to replace circumcision, the sign of the covenant made with physical Israel); the Lord's Supper both replaces the Passover meal (Matt. 26:17-29; Mark 14:12-26; Luke 22:13-20) and anticipates the eschatological covenant meal (Rev. 19:6-10), of which the meal eaten on Sinai (Exod. 24:9-11; cp. Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25) was but a foretaste. However, other aspects of the law were to remain in force until Christ's return. When we read the OT law, we should always be open to both continuities and discontinuities with NT demands.

What Jesus means by a righteousness superior to that of the scribes and Pharisees He clarifies in Matt. 5:21-6:18. As God's Son who Himself fulfills the law and as the Lord of the covenant originally made with Israel at Sinai, Jesus has the perfect perspective on the law and the full authority to declare its intention. He declared that God's demands cannot be reduced to a list of rules, but involve the commitment of one's whole being to Him and a genuine concern for the well-being of others. Jesus reiterated this perspective in Matt. 22:34-40 (cp. Mark 12:28-31; Luke 10:25-37) when He distilled all the covenant obligations laid on the human partner to love for God and love for one's neighbor, a point He illustrated dramatically with the story of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:25-37). Jesus' shift of focus from commitment to a set of rules and from external observation of the law to inward motivation and intent was new to His immediate audience. However, it is the same perspective Moses developed fully in Deuteronomy.

Paul and the Law The writings of Paul are the source of most of the confusion on the NT's view of the law. He spoke of the law as a way of death, in contrast to the Spirit that gives life (Rom. 7:10) and the law as a curse from which Christ has redeemed us (Gal. 3:13). He contrasted the letter (of the old covenant), which kills, with the Spirit (of the new covenant), that delivers life (2 Cor. 3:6). Such statements are difficult to reconcile with Moses' and the psalmists' celebration of the law as the supreme gift of grace and the way of life for God's people.

In resolving this apparent discrepancy we should recognize, first of all, that the unity of divine revelation precludes later inspired utterances contradicting earlier revelation. When we understand Paul correctly, we will discover his perspective to be in line with that of Moses.

Second, we recognize that Paul agrees with Moses in affirming the law, declaring that without it we would not know what sin was (Rom. 7:7; cp. Deut. 4:6-8), evaluating it as holy, just, and good (Rom. 7:12-14; 1 Tim. 1:8; cp. Ps. 119), and rooting his understanding of the ethical implications of the gospel firmly in the Torah (Rom. 13:8-10; 2 Cor. 6:14-18; cp. Exod. 20:1-17). Furthermore, Paul, like Jesus, captures the spirit of the OT law by reducing its demands to love God and one's neighbor (Rom. 13:8-10; Gal. 5:13).

Third, we recognize that many of Paul's negative statements concerning the law occur in contexts where he is debating with Judaizers the way of salvation for Gentiles. His frustrations are less with the law of Moses itself than with himself (Rom. 7:7-25) and with those who argue that in order for Gentiles to become Christians they must first submit to the ritual of circumcision. If one looks to the law as a way of salvation, this also leads to death, for salvation comes only by grace through faith, which is precisely the way the Torah presents Israel's experience. Furthermore, his comment that apart from the Spirit it is impossible to satisfy the demands of the law is not contrary to Moses but a clarification of what Moses had meant by the circumcision of the heart.

In short, the problem is not with the law but with me because the law of sin inside me constantly wages war against the law of God. The glorious news of the Gospel is that in Christ God lifts the curse of sin, which the law proves we deserve. But this does not mean that the law has been suspended as a fundamental statement of God's moral will. The law served as a reflection of God's very nature. Since His nature does not change, neither does His moral will. Accordingly, those who fulfill the "Law of Christ," and those who love God with all their hearts and their neighbors as themselves will fulfill the essence of the law.

Since Paul's contrast of Sinai and Jerusalem in Gal. 4:21-31 is allegorical (allegowumena, v. 24), we should not interpret him as categorically rejecting the Israelite covenant or as affirming a fundamental rift between the Davidic covenant (Jerusalem) and the Israelite covenant. Ishmael, the son of Hagar the maidservant of Sarah, was rejected as the son of promise. Ishmael provided Paul a convenient link to the covenant made with Israel at Sinai. But in associating Sinai with slavery, Paul adapts the material to his rhetorical needs. The consistent witness of the OT declares that the covenant God established with Israel at Sinai was a symbol of freedom, made with a privileged people whom he had rescued from the bondage of Egypt (see Exod. 19:4-6; Deut. 4:1-40). In Galatians Paul argued that his detractors have put the cart before the horse and in so doing reversed the true course of history. By demanding that Gentile Christians adhere to the Jewish law, specifically circumcision, they are putting Sinai before the exodus.

The Law in the General Epistles With its emphasis on works as a requisite evidence of faith, no document in the NT follows as obviously in the direct train of the Torah as James (cp. 2:14-26). First Peter is not far behind, being laced with echoes from the Pentateuch from beginning to end.

Especially striking are Peter's call for holiness in 1:15-16, which is derived directly from Leviticus (Lev. 11:44-45; 19:2; 20:7,26), and his application of Exod. 19:5-6 to the church in 1 Pet. 2:9-12. The book of Hebrews applies the new covenant of Jer. 31:27-37 to Christians (Heb. 8:7-12) and declares explicitly that the old covenant is rendered obsolete in Christ. From the context it is evident that the author has in mind primarily the sacrificial system as the means of maintaining covenant relationship. Now in Christ the Aaronic priesthood, the sacrifices, and the Tabernacle/Temple itself are all superceded, and through Christ we have direct access to God. However this does not mean that nothing of the old covenant remains. If anything, from Heb. 10:26 to the end of the book the author draws on a series of OT texts to emphasize that his readers must respond to the grace of God with faith, perseverance, discipline, reverence, and high moral conduct.

Conclusion In Deut. 10:21 Moses declared that the God who redeemed Israel from Egypt and revealed to them his will is Israel's praise (tehilla). Yahweh, their God, is not a cruel taskmaster, who replaced the burdens of Egypt with the burdens of the law. Throughout Deuteronomy Moses presents the law as a glorious gift, and for one who observes it within the context of the covenant, it is the way to life and blessing. Into the dark world of human sin and alienation the Torah of Moses shone like a beacon of glory and grace. In the Torah Israel's God revealed Himself, declared the boundaries of acceptable and unacceptable conduct, and provided a way of forgiveness. No wonder the psalmists could celebrate the life to be found in the Torah with such enthusiasm (Ps. 119).

In the NT this Torah is fulfilled in Jesus Christ, and the apostles continue this tradition. There is no wedge between the law of the OT and the grace of the NT. The old covenant and its laws were grace. Having redeemed His people and having called them into covenant relationship, God could have left them to devise ceremonial and ethical responses to please Him, as did the nations whose gods neither hear, see, nor speak. At the same time the glorious grace proclaimed by the NT calls for response. Jesus, the divine Lord of both old and new covenants, declared that obedience to His commandments would be the inevitable and requisite proof of love for Him (John 14:15,21,23-24).

Obviously not all the laws associated with the old covenant continue under the new. With the shift from ethnic Israel to the transnational covenant community as the agent of divine blessing, the external demands intended to identify the nation of Israel as the covenant people are suspended. But what about the remainder? Theologians who divide the laws under the old covenant into civil, ceremonial, and moral requirements answer the question by declaring that the moral laws, especially as embodied in the Decalogue, continue in force. However, the OT refuses to draw such distinctions either between the three kinds of laws (all of life is equally holy) or between the Decalogue and the rest of the laws involved in God's covenant with Israel. Therefore a more careful approach is required, considering all aspects of the old covenant in the light of their fulfillment in Christ. Whatever else we may say about the relationship between the law of the old covenant and the law of the new, as grafted-in heirs of the covenant God made with Abraham and Israel, Christians are to give evidence of their faith and their privileged position through holy living. The Scriptures speak with a single voice in calling on all the redeemed to respond to God's grace with unreserved love for Him and self-sacrificing love for others. Daniel I. Block

LAWGIVER One who gives a code of law to a people (Isa. 33:22; James 4:12). The KJV used “lawgiver” seven times. Modern translations replace “lawgiver” with “scepter” four times (Gen. 49:10; Num. 21:18; Pss. 60:7; 108:8). At Deut. 33:21 modern translations replace lawgiver with commander (NRSV), leader (NIV), ruler (NASB, REB), or an equivalent. The remaining two cases (Isa. 33:22; James 4:12) identify God as lawgiver. Contrary to popular opinion, Scripture never expressly identifies Moses as “lawgiver.” The earliest Greek translation twice identified God as lawgiver (Ps. 9:21; 2 Esdras 7:89) and used the verb nomotheteo (to give law) with God as its subject several times (Exod. 24:12; Pss. 24:8,12; 26:11; 118:33,102). Once the Levitical priests are the subject (Deut. 17:10; cp. Heb. 7:11). The closest Scripture comes to identifying Moses as lawgiver is the question of John 7:19 (“Did not Moses give you the law?”). The NT more often identifies Moses as the intermediary through whom the law was given (John 1:17; Gal. 3:19). The Epistle of Aristeas is unique among Hellenistic Jewish literature in expressly identifying Moses as the lawgiver (131,148,312).

Christ is sometimes regarded as the “second Moses” or “second lawgiver,” though the NT does not expressly identify Him as such. Rather the NT designates Christ as the One who fulfills the law (Matt. 5:17) or is the end of the law (Rom. 10:4; cp. 7:4-6; 8:3-4). Christ does however set a new standard for judgment (Matt. 5:21) and gives a new commandment (John 13:34; 14:15,21; 15:10,12; 1 John 2:3-4,7-8).

LAWLESS, LAWLESSNESS Terms used by modern translations to describe people not restrained or controlled by law, especially God's law. As rebellion against God, sin is lawlessness (1 John 3:4; cp. 2 Thess. 3:4). Those responsible for Christ's death are characterized as lawless (Acts 2:23) as are Gentiles in their idolatry (1 Pet. 4:3). The leader of the eschatological (end-time) rebellion is called the man of lawlessness (2 Thess. 2:3; cp. 2:8). The lawless one is already at work but is presently restrained (2:6-7). The lawless one will be revealed before the return of Christ, who will destroy him with His breath (2:8).

LAWYER Authoritative interpreter of the Mosaic law. Characterization of the lawyers is especially harsh in Luke's Gospel: they rejected God's purpose for themselves by refusing John's baptism (7:30); they burdened others without offering any relief (11:45-46); they not only refused God's offer of salvation but hindered others from accepting it (11:52-53); they refused to answer Jesus' question concerning the legality of Sabbath healing (14:3). Lawyer is used in the general sense of a jurist at Titus 3:13.

LAYING ON OF HANDS Symbolic ceremonial act used to invoke a divine blessing or establish a connection for the purpose of sacrifice, ordination, or to impart spiritual gifts.

Old Testament A primary use of laying on of hands in the OT was sacrifices. In Lev. 16 the Lord instructed Moses and Aaron concerning the Day of Atonement. At a particular point Aaron was told that to place his hands upon a live goat and “confess over it all the wickedness and rebellion of the Israelites—all their sins—and put them on the goat's head” (Lev. 16:21), transferring the sins of Israel to the goat.

The identification of the worshiper with a sacrifice is seen in discussions concerning the burnt, fellowship, sin, and ordination offerings (Lev. 1:4; 3:2; 4:4; Num. 8:12).

Laying on of hands was used to set one apart for a special office. Moses laid his hands on Joshua to identify him as Moses' successor and of Moses imparting his authority to Joshua (Num. 27:18-23).

Laying on of hands was used in blessings. Jacob blessed his grandsons, the children of Joseph, by placing his hands upon their heads. The laying on of hands in this instance signified future blessings of Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 48:12-19).

The laying on of hands also meant to chastise, arrest, capture, or do violence to someone (Exod. 22:11; 2 Chron. 23:15).

New Testament There is little difference between the OT and NT usages except that in the NT the sacrificial use is dropped and spiritual gifts are added. As in the OT this expression is used for the arrest or capture of a person (Matt. 26:50; Acts 4:3).

Jesus blessed children by laying His hands on them (Mark 10:16). He also laid hands upon the sick to heal them (Mark 6:5; Luke 5:13) as did the apostles (Acts 28:8).

Laying on of hands is used in the ordination of the “seven” in Acts 6:6. It is used in the commissioning of Barnabas and Saul for their mission (Acts 13:3). The act of laying on of hands as a method of ordaining or acknowledging a person's call to a ministry position is a sober task. Paul warned Timothy not to lay hands upon someone too quickly (1 Tim. 5:22). By the laying on of hands, the church acknowledges God's commission of an individual and identifies itself with the Spirit's enabling the person for the task of ministry.

In Acts are instances when the laying on of hands was associated with receiving the Holy Spirit (Acts 8:17-20; 19:6). In these cases the act confirmed the authenticity of the gospel. First Timothy 4:14 speaks of Timothy receiving a spiritual gift from elders who laid their hands on him. In 2 Tim. 1:6 Paul mentions the spiritual gift that Timothy received, “through the laying on of my hands.” These references show that Timothy received authority, the spirit of power, love, and self-discipline (2 Tim. 1:7).

LAZARUS (Láz' á rūs) Personal name meaning “one whom God helps.” 1. One of the principal characters in a parable Jesus told to warn the selfish rich that justice eventually will be done. Poor Lazarus sat outside the mansion of the nameless rich man to receive whatever food might fall from the banquet table (Luke 16:19-31). Because of his poverty, he lived in poor health, also. In death the roles of the two were reversed, with Lazarus residing comfortably in heaven and the rich man being tormented in hell. The rich man asked that Lazarus be allowed to relieve his thirst. This is refused because of the gulf fixed between heaven and hell. A second appeal came for Lazarus to go and warn the rich man's family so that they might not join him in hell. This was refused because they have had adequate warning already. 2. Lazarus (a shortened form of Eleazer) of Bethany was a personal friend of Jesus and the brother of Mary and Martha (John 11:1-3). Jesus raised Lazarus from the dead after he had been in the tomb for four days to show the glory of God. Lazarus was at the Passover celebration in Bethany six days later. He became a target for murder by the chief priests because of his celebrity. Some believe Lazarus to be the “disciple whom Jesus loved” based on John 11:3 and 21:20-22. He is not mentioned in the other Gospels, although Luke 10:38-42 names the sisters Mary and Martha. See Beloved Disciple.

LEAF, LEAVES Foliage of plants or trees. Adam and Eve made their first clothes from leaves (Gen. 3:7). Leaves are frequently used to symbolize blessedness or cursedness. God's renewal of the earth following the flood was epitomized by an olive leaf (Gen. 8:11). God's providential care for the righteous is pictured by the image of a well-watered tree whose leaves do not wither (Ps. 1:3; cp. Jer. 17:8). Ezekiel's vision of the new Jerusalem included trees whose leaves never wither and whose leaves have healing power (Ezek. 47:12; cp. Rev. 22:2). Withered (Isa. 1:30), shaken (Isa. 33:9), fallen (Isa. 33:4), and faded (Isa. 64:4) leaves serve as images of judgment. A tree lacking fruit with withered leaves (Jer. 8:13) symbolizes a people found lacking when God judges (cp. Matt. 21:19; Mark 11:13). Jesus used the appearance of fig leaves which herald the arrival of summer to illustrate the need to heed the signs of the end (Matt. 24:32; Mark 13:28).

LEAGUE KJV used “league” at Dan. 11:23 in the sense of an agreement (NIV), alliance (NASB, NEB, NRSV), or treaty (TEV).

LEAH (Lē' ah) Personal name meaning “wild cow” or “gazelle.” Older daughter of Laban (Gen. 29:16) and Jacob's first wife. Jacob had asked for the younger Rachel's hand but was tricked into marrying Leah. Thus was preserved the ancient Near Eastern tradition of the elder marrying first. Leah bore six sons to Jacob (Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun) and a daughter (Dinah). Her handmaid, Zilpah, bore two sons to Jacob (Gad, Asher), which by the law of that day were officially Leah's. When Jacob returned to Palestine from Padan-aram, Leah and her children were placed in front of Rachel and Joseph, evidently to absorb any violence from Esau, Jacob's brother. This is indicative of the less-favored status of Leah to Rachel. Leah died in Palestine and was buried in the cave at Machpelah, where lay the remains of Abraham, Isaac, and their wives.

LEANNOTH (Lə ān' nōth) Transliteration of Hebrew word in title of Ps. 88 possibly meaning “to sing” or “for the poor,” “for the sick.” It may be part of the title of a tune to which the psalm was sung. The meaning remains obscure and uncertain.

LEATHER Animal skins tanned and prepared for human use. Elijah the prophet was recognized by his hairy garment and leather belt or girdle (2 Kings 1:8). The similar dress of John the Baptist marked him as a prophet (Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6). Leather shoes are one of the gifts that symbolize God's lavish care for His beloved bride Jerusalem (Ezek. 16:10). See Goatskin; Skin.

LEAVEN Small portion of fermented dough used to ferment other dough and often symbolizing a corruptive influence. The common bread of OT times was made with leaven. Such bread was acceptable as wave offerings for the priests and as loaves to accompany the peace offerings (Lev. 7:11-13; 23:17). However, bread made with leaven or honey, both associated with the process of fermentation and thus a source of corruption, was never to be used as offerings to be burned on the altar (Lev. 2:11-12). Unleavened bread was also prepared in times of haste (1 Sam. 28:24) and was required for the Feast of Unleavened Bread that was celebrated in conjunction with the Passover festival (Lev. 23:4-8). This unleavened bread, or bread of affliction, reminded the Israelites of their hasty departure from Egypt and warned them against corruptive influences (Exod. 12:14-20).

In the NT “leaven” is a symbol of any evil influence that, if allowed to remain, can corrupt the body of believers. Jesus warned His disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees, their teaching and hypocrisy (Matt. 16:5-12; Luke 12:1). Paul urged the Corinthians to remove wickedness from their midst and become fresh dough, unleavened loaves of sincerity and truth (1 Cor. 5:6-13). Jesus also used leaven to illustrate the pervasive growth of the kingdom of God (Matt. 13:33).

LEBANA (Lə bā' nā) Personal name meaning “white” or “full moon.” Original ancestor of clan of temple servants (Ezra 2:45; Neh. 7:48). See Nethinim.

A child's leather shoes from Egypt (Roman era).

LEBANAH (Lə bā' nah) Alternate spelling of Lebana (Neh. 7:48) in most English translations despite the same names in the Hebrew text (cp. REB). See Lebana.

LEBANON (Lēb' á nōn) Place-name meaning “white” or perhaps “white mountain.” A small country at the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea and the western end of Asia. It has long been a world center of transportation and trade. The proper noun literally means the “White” (mountain), probably derived from the snow-capped Mount Hermon, also known as Sirion (Ps. 29:6). Hermon is often covered with snow, and its white crown offers a majestic and impressive view. The constant snow-coverage is contrasted with the fickleness and apostasy of Israel (Jer. 18).

Sandy beaches lie along its Mediterranean coast. Rugged mountains rise in the interior. The country itself is dominated by two mountain ridges, the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon Mountains. Both ranges run parallel to the coast. The Lebanon range extends for about 105 miles along the coast, from modern-day Tripoli in the north to Tyre in the south.

The mountain ranges are about 6,230 feet high. Some summits reach a height of more than 11,000 feet: the highest peak is el-Qurnat el-Sawda (11,024 ft.). Between the higher parts of the range lie valleys and ravines.

The Holy Valley, which collects the water from the Mountain of the Cedars, is one of the most important valleys. It was in this region that the Maronites found refuge in the beginning of their history. This Holy Valley has retained its significance throughout the ages. Ain Qadisha (Spring of the Holy Valley) is highly revered. It gushes forth in the heart of a cedar forest and mountainside near Bsherrih. Another famous valley is the Valley of Adonis, through which the River of Adonis flows, and to where the pilgrimage of Adonis took place in the spring of the year. See Gods, Pagan.

In the Bible Lebanon is celebrated in various capacities. It is frequently featured in the OT, in a general way, as the northern boundary of Palestine (Josh. 1:4), dividing it from Phoenicia and Syria. Its imposing range was emblematic of natural strength and solidarity, therefore a perfect poetic foil to the majesty of God revealed in a thunderstorm so powerful that it “makes Lebanon skip like a calf” (Ps 29:6 HCSB). It was a proverbially lush land, noted for its magnificent forests (Isa. 60:13), especially the “cedars of Lebanon” (Judg. 9:15; Isa. 2:13). For the treepoor Palestinians, Lebanon's cedars symbolized the ultimate in natural wealth and beauty. The psalmist calls these ancient and beautiful cedars the “trees of the LORD...that He planted” (Ps. 104:16 HCSB). It is said that some of the cedars remaining in Lebanon are at least 2,500 years old. They share with the famous redwoods of California the distinction of being the oldest living things on earth.

Cedars, as well as other woods of Lebanon, were used in great abundance in the construction of David's palace and Solomon's temple and palace buildings (1 Kings 5:10-18; 7:2). Cedar was obtained also for the building of the second temple or the temple of Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:7).

The forests of Lebanon have been victims of human greed and irresponsibility. They were exploited by Egypt and Mesopotamia long before biblical times, and they continued to supply precious timber well into the Roman Era. Under the Ottoman Empire (A.D. 1516), the forest almost entirely disappeared. Today there is not much left of the cedar woods; almost all of them are gone. The olive tree also played an important part in ancient times and is still cultivated.

Tyre, to which Ezek. 27-28 is devoted, was one of the most famous cities of the ancient world. Along with the older port of Sidon, it was one of the centers of Phoenician civilization. See Phoenicia.

Many foreign powers have controlled the Phoenician city-states. They include, in order of rule, the Egyptians, Hittites, Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians. In 332 B.C. Alexander the Great conquered Lebanon. The region came under the control of the Roman Empire in 64 B.C.

LEBBEUS (Ləb bē' ūs) Reading of some ancient Greek manuscripts for Thaddeus in Matt. 10:3 (KJV). Modern translations and interpreters follow earlier Greek manuscripts that read simply "Thaddeus." See Thaddeus; Disciple.

LEB-KAMAI, LEB-QAMAI (Ləb-kā' mī) Transliteration of Hebrew text. A code name for Babylon (Jer. 51:1, NASB, NIV, NRSV, REB, RSV margin; Kambul, NEB). The code employed is athbash, a code which replaces each letter of a word with a letter that stands as far from the end of the alphabet as the coded letter stands from the beginning (z=a; y=b). NASB marginal reading "the heart of those who are against me" arose when the Masoretes added vowels to the code.

LEBO-HAMATH (Lə bō-hā' mǎth) Place-name meaning "entrance to or to come to Hamath." KJV, RSV translate, while other modern translations transliterate, the Hebrew name. Many modern interpreters think Lebo-hamath was an independent city in the city-state dominated by Hamath in Syria. It could be Lebwe north of Baalbek or Labau east of the Jordan. If a definite city is not meant, Lebo-hamath would represent the territory bordering the northwestern part of the Orontes River. Lebwe is close to the Litani River, about 43 miles north of Damascus. Whatever its precise location, Lebo-hamath represented the northern boundary of Canaan promised to Israel (Num. 13:21; cp. Ezek. 48:1), not conquered by Joshua (Josh. 13:5; Judg. 3:3), controlled by David (1 Chron. 13:5) and Solomon (1 Kings 8:65), and restored to Israel by Jeroboam II about 793-753 B.C. (2 Kings 14:25; cp. 13:25). Amos predicted complete defeat for Israel starting at Lebo-hamath (6:14). See Hamath.

LEBONAH (Lə bō' nah) Place-name meaning "the white one." Town used to locate annual feast site by Israel's elders as they sought wives for decimated tribe of Benjamin (Judg. 21:19). It is probably modern el-Lubban, three miles northwest of Shiloh, and was known for its fine grapes.

LECAH (Lə' cah) Personal name meaning "go!" Apparently the original ancestor for whom a town in Judah was named (1 Chron. 4:21). Its location is not known.

LEECH Wormlike, blood-sucking parasite of the class Hirudinae , which serves as a symbol of an insatiable appetite (Prov. 30:15; KJV, horseleach).

LEEKs Either Allium porrum , a bulbous vegetable, or Tragonella foenumgraecum , a grasslike herb. An Egyptian food eaten by the Hebrews during their captivity. After a steady diet of manna in the wilderness, they were ready to return to slavery and the foods of servitude (Num. 11:5). See Plants.

LEES Solid matter that settles out of wine during the fermentation process. In ancient Palestine wine was allowed to remain on the lees to increase its strength and flavor. Such wine “on the lees” was much preferred to the newly fermented product. At Isa. 25:6 a banquet of wine on the well-refined lees symbolizes God's people enjoying the best God can offer. Zephaniah 1:12 pictures the inhabitants of Jerusalem who did not believe God would act as wine resting on the lees (cp. Jer. 48:11). Since wine was normally strained before being drunk, the prophetic images point to a temporary respite. To drink dregs or lees is to endure the bitterness of judgment or punishment (Ps. 75:8).

LEG The upper leg or thigh was regarded as the one of the choicest parts of a sacrifice and was reserved for the priests (Lev. 7:32-34). The first term translated “leg” in Isa. 47:2 (KJV) is also translated robe (NRSV) or shirt(s) (NASB, NIV, REB).

LEGION In the NT a collection of demons (Mark 5:9,15; Luke 8:30) and the host of angels (Matt. 26:53). Behind this usage was the Roman military designation. The legions were the best soldiers in the army. At different times in Rome's history, the legion numbered between 4,500 and 6,000 soldiers. It was composed of differently skilled men: spearmen, commandos, skirmish specialists, calvary, and reserves. Originally, one had to be a property owner and Roman citizen to belong, but these requirements were waived depending on the need for troops.

LEHAB (Lē' hāb) National name meaning “flame.” Singular of Lehabim. See Lehabim.

LEHABIM (Lē' hā bīm) “Sons” of Egypt in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:13). Lehabim probably represents an alternative spelling of Lubim, the people of Libya. See Lehab; Lubim; Libya.

LEHABITES (Lē' hā bits) (NIV) See Lehabim.

LEHEM (Lē' hēm) Place-name meaning “bread” or “food.” NRSV reading (1 Chron. 4:22) based on evidence from early Latin and Greek translations. The name appears in a list of members of tribe of Judah. Hebrew reads Jashubi-lehem (KJV, NASB, NIV). REB, TEV emend the text to read “came back to” or “settled in Bethlehem.” See Jashubi-lehem.

LEHI (Lē' hi) Place-name meaning “chin” or “jawbone.” City where Samson killed 1,000 Philistines with the jawbone of a donkey and where God provided water from the jawbone (Judg. 15). Many interpreters read 2 Sam. 23:11 as occurring at Lehi (TEV, NRSV, REB). The site was apparently in Judah near Beth-shemesh.

LEISURE TIME The Bible usually speaks of “rest” in terms of cessation from toil, trouble, and sin (e.g., Exod. 33:14; Isa. 32:18; Heb. 4:1-11). While at rest, persons occupy themselves by enjoying God and one another's company, a foretaste of the activity of heaven.

The Bible recognizes the need for regularly scheduled breaks from work. The weekly Sabbath (Exod. 20:8-11) and several yearly festivals (Lev. 23:1-44; Deut. 16:1-17) were intended to focus on Israel's spiritual needs but also provided breaks from physical labor. The Mosaic law mandated a yearlong honeymoon for newlyweds (Deut. 24:5; cp. Luke 14:20). Jesus tried to find time to be by himself in order to rest and pray, but the press of the crowds often prevented Him from doing so (Matt. 14:13; Mark 3:20; 6:31; John 11:54).

The Bible cautions against the misuse of leisure time which leads either to idleness (Prov. 19:15; 24:33-34; Eccles. 10:18; Amos 6:4-6; 1 Tim.

5:13), excessive partying (Isa. 5:11-12), or troublemaking (2 Chron. 13:7; Prov. 6:10-15). See Sabbath.

LEMUEL (Lēm' u el) Personal name meaning “devoted to God.” A king who received words of wisdom from his mother concerning wine, women, and the legal rights of the weak and poor (Prov. 31:1-9). Exactly where his kingdom of Massa was is not known, although certain linguistic features in the text have led scholars to place it in north Arabia, possibly near Edom. This section of Proverbs apparently comes from a non-Israelite woman. See Proverbs.

LEND See Banking; Interest; Loan.

LENGTH, MEASURE OF See Weights and Measures.

LENT English word (stemming from an Anglo-Saxon word for “spring” and related to the English word “lengthen”) that refers to the penitential period preceding Easter. Early Christians felt that the magnitude of the Easter celebration called for special preparation. As early as the second century, many Christians observed several days of fasting as part of that preparation. Over the next few centuries, perhaps in remembrance of Jesus' fasting for 40 days in the wilderness (Matt. 4:1-2), 40 days became the accepted length of the Lenten season. Since, from the earliest years of Christianity, it had been considered inappropriate to fast on the day of the resurrection, Sundays were not counted in the 40 days. Thus, the Wednesday 46 days before Easter came to be regarded as the beginning of Lent.

In the early centuries the season before Easter was also the usual period of intense training for new Christians. During this period, the catechumens (those learning what it meant to be Christians) went through the final stages of preparation for baptism, which usually occurred at dawn on Easter Sunday. As the practice of infant baptism increased, the emphasis on Lent as a training period decreased. See Church Year.

LENTILS See Plants.

LEOPARD Large cat with yellow fur, with black spots that form patterns. This animal was one of the most dangerous both to animals and human beings. Known for its gracefulness and speed, it was common in Palestine in OT times, especially in the forests of Lebanon but is seldom found there now. Five were killed around Jerusalem just before World War II, and one was killed in Southern Palestine near Beer-sheba soon after the war. The leopard still survives in Israel and is protected by the government. Two locations suggest habitats of leopards—Beth-nimrah (“leopards’ house,” Num. 32:36) and “waters of Nimrim” (“waters of leopards,” Isa. 15:6; Jer. 48:34). In Hos. 13:7, the lurking, noiseless movement of the leopard symbolizes God’s wrath. Isaiah illustrated the serene peace of God’s kingdom as creating the seemingly impossible occurrence of a leopard lying down with the goat (Isa. 11:6). Some translate Hab. 1:8 as “cheetah.”

LEPROSY Generic term applied to a variety of skin disorders from psoriasis to true leprosy. Its symptoms ranged from white patches on the skin to running sores to the loss of digits on the fingers and toes.

For the Hebrews it was a dreaded malady which rendered its victims ceremonially unclean—that is, unfit to worship God (Lev. 13:3). Anyone who came in contact with a leper was also considered unclean. Therefore, lepers were isolated from the rest of the community so that the members of the community could maintain their status as worshipers. Other physical disorders or the flow of certain bodily fluids also rendered one unclean (Lev. 12:1—14:32; 15:1-33). Even houses and garments could have “leprosy” and, thus, be unclean (Lev. 14:33-57).

Jesus did not consider this distinction between clean and unclean valid. A person’s outward condition did not make one unclean; rather that which proceeds from the heart determines one’s standing before God (Mark 7:1-23; cp. Acts 10:9-16). Therefore, Jesus did not hesitate about touching lepers (Mark 1:40-45) and even commanded His disciples to cleanse lepers (Matt. 10:8). Jesus even made a leper the hero of one of His parables (Luke 16:19-31). See Diseases.

LESHEM (Lē' shēm) Place-name meaning "lion." City tribe of Dan occupied (Josh. 19:47). An alternate Hebrew spelling of Laish. See Laish.

LETTER FORM AND FUNCTION History and Form Letters in the ancient world were an important means of communication between people who were in different locations. They were, in fact, the only means available other than verbal messages. Letter writing is almost as ancient as writing itself, beginning in the second millennium B.C. Aids to composition were published in the ancient period, and two have survived. Tupoi Epistolikoi (Epistolary Types), also referred to as Pseudo-Demetrius (written before A.D. 100) identified and explained 21 types of letters. The other, Epistolimaioi Characters, (Epistolary Styles) also called Pseudo-Libanius, was written after A.D. 300 and presented 41 types of letters. In Demetrius each type of letter was defined, its logic presented, then illustrated by a sample letter. Libanius did not give actual sample letters but rather instructions and hints giving the gist of each type. In practice, types of letters were often mixed, so that any description of the contents of the "typical" ancient letter is artificial and misleading. Thousands of letters have survived from antiquity, demonstrating the influence of manuals like Demetrius and Libanius.

The method of classification of letters was related to rhetorical theory. Rhetoric is the art of persuasion and was the cornerstone of classical education. The various letter types employ the three principle types of rhetoric: judicial, deliberative, and epideictic. The setting for judicial rhetoric was the persuasion of judge and jury. Deliberative rhetoric was arguing for or against a course of action in the public arena or government assembly, the giving of advice. Epideictic rhetoric was the speech of praise or blame on occasions of celebration or commemoration, among them weddings and funerals. Epistolary theory developed from these categories, but most letter types were related to epideictic, expressing either praise or blame. Rhetorical training assisted letter writers in taking bare outlines and forms from manuals and adapting them, combining types for a particular situation.

As letter writing developed historically, many letters did not fit into any of the established categories of rhetoric, instead falling into another broad category, exhortation, which was only marginally related to rhetorical theory. The Greek term is paraenesis, which has carried over into English, as has the corresponding Latin term praeceptio, precept. Such letters are sometimes referred to as hortatory or paraenetic.

Letter writers often employed the services of an amanuensis. The closest modern equivalent is a secretary. The amanuensis might be trained in rhetoric and letter writing and could participate in the writing at several levels. He might simply take dictation and prepare the letter for the writer's signature. Often, however, he might edit what was written. Sometimes the amanuensis was a full participant, or collaborator, with the named writer in the content of the letter. He might even compose the letter according to guidelines given by the person sending the letter. Dictation could be painfully slow, and interfere with the speaker's train of thought. The great Roman Cicero (106-43 B.C.) once complained of having to dictate slowly, syllable by syllable. The historian Plutarch credits Cicero with the development of shorthand (Gk., and its introduction to Rome. Shorthand was in wide use by the time the letters of the NT were written. Seneca, writing in A.D. 63-64, described this shorthand as employing signs in place of whole words, allowing the transcriber to match the speed of the speaker. tachugraphy)

Letters in the Bible Old Testament The first mention of a letter is in 1 Sam. 11:14-15, when David's treachery led to the death of the letter bearer himself, Uriah, the husband of Bathsheba. The wicked Queen, Jezebel, wrote letters (1 Kings 21:8-9) when engineering the murder of Naboth. The king of Aram (Syria) sent a letter to the king of Israel concerning his general Naaman in 2 Kings 5:5-7. Jehu, king of Israel wrote letters that secured the deaths of the remaining sons of Ahab (2 Kings 10:1-7). Hezekiah, a righteous king of Judah, received letters from Kings of Assyria and Babylon (2 Kings 19:14; 20:12; Isa. 37:14; 39:1; 2 Chron. 32:17).

Hezekiah also sent letters throughout the 12 tribes of Judah and Israel, inviting all the people to come and observe Passover (2 Chron. 30:1-12). Solomon exchanged letters with Hiram, king of Tyre (2 Chron. 2:1-12). In 2 Chron. 21:12 the Prophet Elijah sent a letter pronouncing judgment and a painful death on Jehoram, king of Judah. When Ezra was rebuilding the temple, letters were exchanged between enemies of the Jews and the royal court of Persia (Ezra 4-5). Nehemiah received letters from the king of Persia, Artaxerxes, authorizing him to return to Jerusalem and complete the temple (Neh. 2:1-9). Numerous hostile letters were exchanged between the elders of Judah and Tobiah, their enemy (Neh. 6:17-19). The king of Persia, Ahasuerus, sent a number of letters in the book of Esther (1:22, 3:13; 8:5,10). Mordecai, uncle of Esther, sent letters to Jews in many locations (Esther 9:20-30). Jeremiah sent a letter to the exiles in Babylon (Jer. 29:1). Shemaiah wrote a letter to the exiles claiming the high priesthood for himself (Jer. 29:24-32).

New Testament Letters are even more common in the NT, and 21 out of 27 books are in the form of letters. Revelation contains seven brief letters. Thirteen books are letters written by the Apostle Paul, and eight, called the general letters, were written by others. The writer of Hebrews is unknown. James and Jude, brothers of Jesus, wrote letters. The Apostle Peter wrote two letters, and the Apostle John wrote three.

The first specific mention of letters is when Saul of Tarsus requested letters from the high priest to authorize the arrest of believers in Damascus, Syria (Acts 9:2; 22:5). The Jerusalem church sent a letter to the Gentile believers in Antioch, Syria, exempting them from the law of Moses (Acts 15:23-30). The Roman commander, Claudius Lysias, wrote to the Roman governor Felix about Paul (Acts 23:25-33).

The NT letters, for the most part, fall into the category of exhortation. Most are a mixture of letter types. In a number of them, significant elements of deliberative rhetoric are mixed in as well. The ancient rhetorical theorist Posidonius suggested three major kinds of paraenesis: advice related to actions, exhortation related to habits and character, and consolation related to emotions or passions. All of these are present in NT letters.

Scholars sometimes challenge the authenticity of several letters ascribed to Paul, but compelling evidence to overthrow the ancient testimony of Pauline authorship is lacking. We may have confidence that Paul indeed wrote all 13 letters bearing his name.

Like all correspondence, Paul's letters were “occasional” documents, written at a particular time for a reason. Most NT letters were written in order to be read aloud to the congregations who received them, serving as a substitute for the writer speaking to the church in person. Paul's surviving correspondence was with churches he started, at least one church he had not visited (Colossae), and with individuals (Timothy and Titus) working under his authority. Only God knows how many letters Paul wrote during 30 years of missionary activity, but we are blessed by the presence of his surviving letters in the NT canon.

As the major corpus of letters in the Bible, the Pauline letters have been studied more than the other letter collection (generals). Paul's letters indicate the use of an amanuensis in seven letters (Rom.; 1 Cor.; Gal; Col; 1-2 Thess.; and Philem.). The use of an amanuensis may be inferred in 2 Corinthians from grammatical features. That he used an amanuensis for all his letters is a reasonable assumption. One amanuensis names himself, Tertius (Rom. 16:23). In five letters Paul wrote a portion with his own hand (1 Cor.; Gal.; Col.; 2 Thess.; Philem.). The use of different amanuenses offers a reasonable explanation for some of the differences of style, vocabulary, and grammar among the letters of Paul. In eight letters Paul mentions associates as collaborators (1-2 Cor.; Gal.; Phil.; Col.; 1-2 Thess.; and Philem.). The collaborative efforts likely influenced style and vocabulary to some extent. Paul's letters demonstrate that he and his amanuenses knew and employed the conventional forms of letter writing in the first century A.D.

New Testament letters generally may be divided into three parts, the address, the body, and the conclusion. Within this framework the following features might be found, though few of the letters contain them all.

(1) The address, consisting of the identification of the writer and recipients, the opening greeting, the thanksgiving, and a prayer.

(2) The body of the letter, consisting of differing elements that vary widely from letter to letter. The closest thing to common features are a formal opening, paraenesis on the areas of primary concern, and application.

(3) Conclusion, including final blessings, greetings (sometimes to specific people), the “peace” wish, and postscripts.

The letters of the NT had to be carried from the writers to the recipients.

The Roman Empire had an efficient postal system, but it was restricted only to government use. The Latin word positus, associated with this system, is the origin of the English word postal and related terms. Mail was carried by horseback, and stations were maintained at intervals on the postal routes. Changes of horses, along with food and other supplies were kept at these stations in order to speed the mail carriers on their way. In the private sector letters and other documents were carried by a variety of means. Professional couriers were used, but for most people this was not an option. Friends, acquaintances, or other travelers carried letters for others. In Paul's case the couriers seem to have come from the circle of his coworkers and members of churches he was associated with. LETUSHIM (Lə tū' shīm) or LETUSHITES (Lə tū' shīts) (NIV) Tribal name meaning “smiths.” Descendants of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:3). Nothing else is known of this tribe. They do not appear in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 1:32). See Keturah.

LEUMMIM (Lə ūm' mīm) or LEUMONITES (Lə ūm' ð nīts) (NIV) Tribal name meaning “peoples.” Descendants of Abraham and Keturah. Probably an Arabian tribe of which we know nothing. They do not appear in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 1:32). See Keturah.

LEVI (Lê' vi) Personal name meaning “a joining.” 1. Third son of Jacob and Leah (Gen. 29:34) and original ancestor of Israel's priests. He is characterized in Scripture as savage and merciless, avenging the rape of his sister, Dinah, by annihilating the male population of an entire city (Gen. 34:25-31). Later Jacob spoke harshly of Levi rather than blessing him (Gen. 49:5-7). The tribe that bears his name is also characterized as an instrument of wrath. After the people of Israel sinned in the wilderness by making the molten calf, Moses commanded the people of Levi to slaughter those who had participated in the debacle (Exod. 32:28). Levi's descendants became a tribe of priests. See Levites. 2. Name of two of Jesus' ancestors (Luke 3:24,29). 3. A tax collector in Capernaum who became a follower of Jesus (Mark 2:14). In the parallel account in the Gospel of Matthew, the man's name is given as “Matthew” instead of “Levi” (9:9). The name of Levi appears in none of the lists of apostles.

LEVIATHAN (Lê vi' á thán) Name of an ancient sea creature, meaning “coiled one,” subdued by God. Leviathan appears in biblical and extrabiblical literature. A serpentine form is indicated in Isa. 27:1 (“Leviathan the fleeing serpent...the twisting serpent,” NRSV). The sea creature is used interchangeably with other mysterious creations of the divine. Again, Isa. 27:1 refers to leviathan as “the dragon that is in the sea.” The psalmist in 74:14 presents a many-headed leviathan among the supernatural enemies of God dwelling in the sea. Job 3:8; 41:1-9 present the sea creature as too formidable a foe for a person to consider arousing. Yet leviathan was created by God and subject to Him (Ps. 104:24-30).

Apocalyptic literature depicts leviathan as throwing off his fetters at the end of the present age, only to be defeated in a final conflict with the divine. Ugaritic literature of Ras Shamra during the 1300s B.C. depicts the mythical Baal defeating the sea creature called Lotan (another linguistic form for Leviathan). The Hittites wrote of a struggle between the dragon Illuyankas and the mortal Hupasiyos. A cylinder seal found at Tel Asmar dated about 2350 B.C. shows two men fighting a seven-headed serpent.

Leviathan was seen in ancient legend as a sea monster engaged in primordial warfare with the gods. This creature represented chaos in a personified manner that any creator deity had to overcome in order to create. Leviathan was also seen as a threat to the orderliness of the universe and ultimately to be subdued at the end of time.

The ancient pagan myths concerning Leviathan were familiar to the Hebrews of the OT. To what degree these myths of Leviathan influenced the Hebrews, if any, may never be known. Scripture used the name known to so many people and removed fear connected with it, showing that God easily controlled Leviathan, which thus offered no threat to God's people. LEVIRATE LAW, LEVIRATE MARRIAGE Legal provision requiring a dead man's brother (levirate) to marry his childless widow and father a son who would assume the dead man's name and inherit his portion of the promised land (Deut. 25:5-10). The practice is an important element in the story of Ruth (Ruth 2:20; 3:2,9-13; 4:1-11). The Sadducees appealed to levirate law in asking Jesus a question about the resurrection (Matt. 22:23-33).

LEVITES (Le'vites) Lowest of the three orders in Israel's priesthood. In the earliest biblical records, sacrifices were offered by the chief of a tribe, the head of a family (Gen. 12:7-8; 31:54) or possibly by a priest at a temple (Gen. 14:18). Originally, Israel's priests and temple personnel were to be drawn from the firstborn of every family in Israel (Exod. 13:11-15). Later God chose the tribe of Levi to carry out this responsibility for Israel (Num. 3:11-13). The tribe of Levi was appointed because it was the only tribe that stood with Moses against the people who worshiped the golden calf (Exod. 32:25-29; Deut. 10:6-9). The Levites were not given a tribal inheritance in the promised land (God was their inheritance) but were placed in 48 Levitical cities throughout the land (Num. 18:20; 35:1-8; Josh. 13:14,33). The tithe of the rest of the nation was used to provide for the needs of the Levites (Num. 18:24-32). Since the Levites were dependent on the generosity of others, families were encouraged to invite the Levites (as well as widows, strangers, and orphans) to join them in their eating and their celebration of the joyous national feast (Deut. 12:12,18; 16:11,14). These factors point to the total dedication of the Levites to the work of the Lord rather than the earthly concerns of making a good living.

The tribe of Levi included at least three separate families: Gershon, Kohath, and Merari (with the families of Moses and Aaron being treated somewhat separately from the rest of the tribe of Gershon). During the wilderness journey they were in charge of taking the tabernacle down, transporting it, setting it up, and conducting worship at the tent where God dwelt (Num. 1:47-54; 3:14-39). In some passages (Deut. 17:9,18; 18:1; 24:8) the terms “priest” and “Levite” (or Levitical priests) seem identical, but in Exod. 28 and Lev. 8-10 it is clear that only the family of Aaron fulfilled the priestly duties of offering sacrifices in the tabernacle. Because there appears to be a different way of handling the relationship between the priests and the Levites in these texts, interpreters differ in the way they understand the Levites. Although it is possible that the role of the Levites changed or that the distinction between the priests and Levites was not maintained in each period with equal strictness, the interpretation which maintains a general distinction between the priests and Levites seem to fit most texts.

The Levites were consecrated to God and given by God as a gift to Israel in order that they might perform the duties at the tabernacle (Exod. 29; Lev. 8). Their work made it possible for the people to come to the tabernacle and offer sacrifices for the atonement of sins. The Levites assisted the priests in their responsibilities (Num. 3:5-9; 16:9) by preparing grain offerings and the showbread, by purifying all the holy instruments used in the temple, by singing praises to the Lord at morning and evening offerings, by assisting the priests with burnt offerings on Sabbaths and feast days, and by being in charge of the temple precinct and the chambers of the priests (1 Chron. 6:31-48; 23:1-13,24-32; 25:1-6; 2 Chron. 29:12-19). Because of their work, the holiness of the temple was maintained; and the glory of the Lord dwelt among Israel. During David's reign the Levites were integrated into the administration of the government, including the keeping of the gates, judges, craftsmen, musicians, and overseers of the royal treasury (1 Chron. 9:22-28; 23-26) In Jehoshaphat's time the Levites were involved with teaching the people the word of God (2 Chron. 17:7-9). This responsibility probably continued into the postexilic period of Ezra (Neh. 8:9-12). See Levitical Cities.

LEVITICAL CITIES (לְעִטְיָוֹת) Residence and pasturelands provided the priestly tribe of Levi in lieu of a tribal inheritance. Because of their priestly duties, the tribe of Levi did not receive any part of the land of Canaan as an inheritance (Num. 18:20-24; 26:62; Deut. 10:9; 18:1-2; Josh. 18:7). To compensate them for this, they received the tithes of Israelites for their support (Num. 18:21), and 48 cities were allotted to them from the inheritance of the other tribes. On the average four cities from each tribe were Levitical cities. The practice of setting cities aside in this manner was a common ancient Near Eastern practice.

The Levites were not the sole possessors or occupiers of these cities. They were simply allowed to live in them and have fields to pasture their herds. These cities did not cease to belong to the tribes within which they were located. Although 6 of the 48 were asylums for those guilty of manslaughter (Kedesh, Shechem, Hebron in Canaan, Bezer, Ramoth-gilead, and Golan), Levitical cities and cities of refuge are not synonymous. The privilege of asylum was not extended to all 48 Levitical cities. The aim of having cities of refuge was to control blood revenge by making it possible for public justice to intervene between the slayer and the victim's avenger of blood. The cities of refuge were probably priestly cities containing important shrines. Cities of refuge also served as punitive detention centers. The slayer was not permitted to leave until the death of the high priest. This was possibly interpreted as a vicarious expiation of life by life.

Levitical cities were a series of walled cities, apart from the lands surrounding them. Unwalled suburbs and fields outside the cities remained tribal property. The Levites could not sell any open plots of land. The legal status of Levitical houses within these cities differed from ordinary property. To prevent the dispossession of Levites, it was ordained that they might at any time redeem houses in their own cities which they had been forced to sell. Moreover, such a house, if not redeemed, reverted to its original Levitical owner during the year of Jubilee. Pastureland belonging to Levites could not be sold (Lev. 25:32-34).

Theological, political, and economic reasons led to establishing the cities. The cities formed bases of operation so that the Levites could better infiltrate each of the tribes to instruct them in God's covenant. Such bases would be most needed precisely where one finds them: in those areas least accessible to the central sanctuary. Obviously, there was also a political dimension. Certainly, the Levitical desire to secure Israel's loyalty to the Lord of the covenant would also imply a commitment to secure loyalty to the Lord's anointed, the king. There was a blending of covenant teaching and political involvement. The economic factor may have been the most significant. The list of cities describes the dispersion of the Levites who were not employed at the large sanctuaries, had no steady income, and who belonged, therefore, in the category of widows and orphans. The cities were established for men needing economic relief. See Cities of Refuge; Year of Jubilee.

LEVITICUS, BOOK OF (Lĕ vit' 1 cūs) Third book of the OT containing instructions for priests and worship. The Hebrew name of Leviticus comes from the first word in the book, wayyiqra' , “and he called.” In the later rabbinic works and similarly in the Syriac translation, the Peshitta, the book was called torat hohanim , “book of the priests.” The English title comes from the Latin Vulgate translation of the Greek term Leuitikon. This is an adjectival form, “Levitical,” which thus means “that which concerns the priests.” Since Hellenistic Jews called the priests “Levites” (an equation already evident in Deut. 17:9,18; 18:1), the meaning of the Greek title is actually no different from the traditional title of the Jews, the “book of priests.”

Authorship Christian and Jewish interpreters prior to the 18th and 19th centuries assumed the Mosaic authorship of Leviticus as well as the rest of the Pentateuch. By the end of the 19th century, however, it was commonly accepted that the Pentateuch was composed of four basic but different sources: J, E, D, and P. This reconstruction came to be known as “the documentary hypothesis.” See Pentateuch.

The P source referred to the Priestly Code and contained most of the material in the Pentateuch that pertains to priesthood and sacrifice, including Leviticus (although some have proposed an additional source for Lev. 17-26, the H[oliness] source, composed about the time of Ezekiel). This source was regarded as the latest of the four and reflected a transcendent deity who can only be approached through the meticulous processes outlined in the Israelite sacrificial system. It was thought to have been composed in the postexilic period in the fifth century B.C. To give the contents of Leviticus an authoritative ring, the text is said to fictitiously portray the material as though it was revealed by God to Moses. Thus, the ancient sacrificial system, the Aaronic priesthood, and the tabernacle are nothing but a fabrication depicting practices of the postexilic period as though they occurred the second millennium B.C., during the time of Moses.

On the negative side one recent area of investigation that has demonstrated the falsehood of this reconstruction is the history of the Hebrew language. Based on sound and testable methodology, it has been demonstrated that the main premise that Ezekiel preceded Leviticus has been demolished because Ezekiel's language is of a later linguistic stratum than the language of Leviticus.

On the positive side Mosaic authorship of Leviticus and virtually all the Pentateuch is clearly affirmed by a straightforward reading of the biblical text. Leviticus is repeatedly said to comprise what God wanted Moses to tell the people of Israel. No other book claims divine inspiration more than the third book of the Pentateuch. No less than 38 times is the expression found, “The LORD said to Moses [or Aaron]” (1:1; 4:1; 6:1). Moses' authorship of the Pentateuch was assumed by later Jews in the postexilic community (1 Chron. 15:15; 2 Chron. 23:18; Ezra 3:2; Neh. 1:7) and by the NT writers (Matt. 8:4; Mark 12:26; Luke 16:31; John 1:17; 1:45; Acts 3:22). In Rom. 10:5 Paul claims that the statement from Lev. 18:5, “The one who does these things will live by them” (HCSB), was written by Moses. And speaking to the leper He had just healed, Jesus, citing Lev. 14, said, “See that you don't tell anyone; but go, show yourself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses prescribed, as a testimony to them” (Matt. 8:4). Speaking in more general terms, Jesus said “If you believed Moses, you would believe Me, because he wrote about Me” (John 5:46-47) and “Didn't Moses give you the law?” (John 7:19). Thus, on the basis of the claims of Scripture, the testimony of Jesus, the virtual unbroken unilateral tradition among both Jews and Christians, and the scholarly evidence, we may assume with confidence that Moses is the author of Leviticus.

Contents The first section of Leviticus relates to the latter part of the book of Exodus. Exodus 26-27 gives the Lord's instruction for the building of the tabernacle, the place of worship during ancient Israel's sojourn in the wilderness. These instructions are carried out and the tabernacle accepted as an appropriate place of worship (Exod. 35-40). Exodus 28-29 recounts the Lord's instructions for ordaining Aaron and his sons as priests. This ordination takes place in Lev. 8-9. One of the primary tasks of the priests was to offer sacrifice at the tabernacle. Before beginning this practice, ancient Israel needed instruction on the offering of sacrifice. The book of Leviticus begins at that point. Before listing the major types of sacrifice, we should consider its basic significance. A sacrifice is in part a gift to God, not as a way to earn God's favor but as a way to give thanks for God's gift of life. Sacrifice is also a means of facilitating communion between God and worshipers. Another important purpose of sacrifice is atonement, restoring the relationship between God and worshiper. In the offering of sacrifice, worshipers give of themselves to God. In the shedding of the blood of the sacrificial victim, the vital power of life is released (Lev. 17:11). God honors this act and gives life back to the worshiper. Thus sacrifice was important in the relationship between the ancient Israelite and God.

Leviticus lists five main types of sacrifice: (1) The whole burnt offering: a means of atonement that symbolizes the dedication of the whole life to God. The entire animal was burned on the altar (Lev. 1:3-17). (2) The cereal or grain offering: indication that everyday life is a gift from God, since grain constituted the everyday diet in ancient Israel (Lev. 2:1-16). (3) The peace, or shared, offering: the sacrifice of part of the animal and a communal meal from the remainder of the meat (Lev. 3:1-17). (4) The sin, or purification, offering: a sacrifice of repentance for sin which has broken human relations to God and has endangered the welfare of the community (Lev. 4:1-5:13). This sacrifice is for unwitting sin (Lev. 4:2,13,22,27). (5) The guilt offering: might also be called a compensation or reparation offering; it calls for sacrifice and compensation to one who has been wronged. The guilty one repays that which has been taken plus 20 percent (Lev. 5:14-6:7).

Leviticus 6-7 provides further instruction on sacrifice for the priests, and Lev. 8-10 describes the beginning of sacrifice at the tabernacle.

Leviticus 11-15 provides instruction on that which is clean and unclean. A person who comes into contact with an unclean object becomes unclean and is not allowed to participate in worship. Thus it is important to avoid contact with that which is unclean because worship was such a central life-giving event in the life of the community of God's people. These chapters describe various causes of uncleanness, including improper diet, childbirth, and various skin diseases. Leviticus 11 presents the famous dietary regulations, and Lev. 12 describes uncleanness related to childbirth. Leviticus 13 gives instruction in determining uncleanness related to leprosy, and Lev. 14 describes the way to cleanse leprosy. Leviticus 15 lists bodily discharges that cause one to be unclean.

Leviticus 16 describes the ritual of the Day of Atonement, a way of removing the impact of sin and uncleanness. First, the priest made sacrifice for himself so that he was prepared to do the same for the community. Then two goats were brought, and one chosen for sacrifice. It was offered as a purification offering, and the blood was used to cleanse the sanctuary of any sin and uncleanness. The priest then took the other goat, the scapegoat, and confessed the sin of the people with his hands over the goat, symbolically passing the sin of the people to the goat. Then the goat was taken into the wilderness, a significant symbol of the removal of the sin of the people. This central ritual assumed that ancient Israel would encounter sin and uncleanness. Since God is perfectly holy, the Lord could not dwell among sin and that which is unclean. This ritual then provided a means of removing sin and uncleanness so that God could continue to dwell among the people and be present in the sanctuary to give them life.

Leviticus 17-27 is the Holiness Code. This section gets its name from the frequent use of the phrase, “You shall be holy; for I the Lord Your God am holy.” In the OT holiness means to be set apart; however, it does not indicate being set apart from the world in a separatist way. The term is used of ancient Israel's being set apart to God. As God is holy—set apart, unique, different, distinct, “There is no other like God”—so ancient Israel as people of God was to be holy, different from other people because they were people of God. These chapters then give instruction in how ancient Israel was to live a holy life. Leviticus 18 illustrates this. The chapter begins with a plea to live not as the Egyptians, whom ancient Israel had just left, nor as the Canaanites, whom ancient Israel would soon encounter, but as people of the Lord God. Then the chapter gives instruction in sexual conduct, particularly on forbidden sexual relations. Living according to such instruction would distinguish ancient Israel from other people in the land as people of the holy God. The conclusion of chapter 18 emphasizes this again in urging the people to be loyal to God. Holiness is not a means of removing the people from the world but of giving them a way to relate to the world as the people of God.

A number of the instructions in the Holiness Code relate to ethics and faithfulness to the Lord. Note the famous verse in Lev. 19:18, “You shall love your neighbor as yourself.” There is also instruction on keeping the Sabbath as a day of rest and worship. Each seventh year was to be a Sabbath year for the land, to give it renewal and also as a sign that the land is not owned by ancient Israel but a gift from God. Each 50th year ($7 \times 7 + 1$) was a Jubilee Year in which all slaves were to be freed and property revert to its original owner. This again shows that people do not own other persons or property; they are rather stewards of such gifts from God. This practice shows that life is to be structured for the good of the community rather than isolated individuals.

These chapters also contain instructions on worship. Regular worship in the tabernacle was to include the constant burning of the lamp. This symbolized both the Lord's presence with the people and light as the first of God's creations. Also of importance in the tabernacle was the bread that symbolized the relationship between God and ancient Israel and reminded the people that God gives the gift of food. The Holiness Code also gives instruction on the special feasts. In the spring came Passover and unleavened bread, reminders of the exodus from Egypt. The summer feast (Weeks and Pentecost) related to the harvest and celebrated the giving of the law. The fall festival included the Day of Atonement and the beginning of the new year. Also here was the Feast of Tabernacles, a harvest festival remembering the time in the wilderness.

The message of Leviticus begins with the fact that God is present with the people and continues with the notion that God is perfectly holy. This is why the book gives so much instruction on holiness and includes sacrifice as a means of removing the effects of sin and uncleanness so that this perfectly holy God can continue to dwell among and give life to the people. All of this instruction is a gift from God and helps the people understand how to live as God's covenant people. The book thus provides an important part of the story of God with the people, for it gives instruction on how to maintain and, when necessary, restore that relationship. The book seeks to explore further the instruction in Exod. 19:6, "You shall be to Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation."

The NT uses Leviticus to speak of the atoning sacrifice of Christ. See Atonement; Covenant; Holy; Purity, Purification; Sacrifice and Offering.

Outline

- I. Offer Yourself in Praise and Adoration to God (1:1-7:38).
 - A. Offer pleasing sacrifices (1:1-6:7).
 1. Burnt offerings (1:1-17).
 2. Cereal offerings (2:1-16).

3. Peace offerings (3:1-17).
 4. Sin offerings (4:1-35).
 5. Guilt offerings (5:1-6:7).
- B. Give instructions to the priests who offer pleasing sacrifices (6:8-7:38).
1. Burnt offerings (6:8-13).
 2. Cereal offerings (6:14-23).
 3. Sin offerings (6:24-30).
 4. Guilt offerings (7:1-10).
 5. Peace offerings (7:11-38).
- II. Consecrate Priests to Mediate between God and People (8:1-10:20).
- A. Set apart priests who mediate (8:1-36).
 - B. Sacrifice for the priests who mediate (9:1-24).
 - C. Warn the priests who mediate (10:1-20).
- III. Purify Yourself before God (11:1-16:34).
- A. Eat clean animals; reject unclean animals (11:1-47).
 - B. Purify mother and child after childbirth (12:1-8).
 - C. Test for an infectious skin disease and remove the infected one from the camp (13:1-59).
 - D. Restore the cleansed inhabitant to the community (14:1-32).
 - E. Remove the threat of infection (mildew) from the house (14:33-57).
 - F. Cleanse unhealthiness within the community (15:1-33).
 - G. Make atonement for the community (16:1-34).
- IV. Present Yourself in Holiness before God (17:1-26:46).
- A. Give attention to acceptable slaughter of beasts (17:1-16).

1. Make proper sacrifices before the Lord (17:1-9).
2. Sanctify life by refusing to eat blood (17:10-16).
- B. Follow the commandments of the Lord (18:1-20:27).
 1. Reject abominable sexual practices (18:1-23; 20:10-21).

LEVY To impose or collect by authority (Num. 31:28). The priests and Levites were supported in part by a levy of war gains.

LEWDNESS Lust; sexual unchastity; licentiousness. Lewdness sometimes refers to an especially heinous crime: brutal gang rape resulting in murder (Judg. 19:25-27); murder by priests (Hos. 6:9); any vicious crime (Acts 18:14). Most often lewdness is used figuratively for idolatry (Jer. 11:15; 13:27; Ezek. 16:43,58; 22:9; 23:21,27,29,35,48-49; 24:13; Hos. 2:10). Since the cults of many of Israel's neighboring peoples were fertility cults that employed sexual acts as part of worship, the application of lewdness to idolatry or unfaithfulness is easily understood. See Fertility Cults.

LIBATION Act of pouring liquid as a sacrifice to a god. See Sacrifice and Offering.

LIBERALITY NASB term for generosity or openhandedness (Rom. 12:8; 2 Cor. 8:2). The KJV used “simplicity” for the text of Rom. 12:8 and “liberality” for 2 Cor. 8:2. The precise meaning of the underlying Greek is a matter of interpretation. “Simplicity” can mean wholeheartedly, generously (NIV, NRSV), or openhanded (REB). “Simplicity” can also mean purely, without mixed motives or desire for selfish gain. See Stewardship.

LIBERTY, LIBERATION Freedom from physical, political, and spiritual oppression. Throughout the Bible one of God's primary purposes for His people is to free them from physical oppression and hardship and to liberate them from spiritual bondage. One of the dominant themes of the OT is that Yahweh is the God who liberated the Israelites from their bondage in Egypt. In the NT God is the one who liberates people from bondage to sin through Jesus Christ. Jesus showed in Luke 4:18-19 that these purposes extend to all those who are oppressed, not just those who call on His name. This liberation always comes from God, but He desires to use His people to accomplish these purposes. If they refuse, He will use other means. See Freedom.

LIBNAH (Lib' nah) Place-name meaning “white” or “storax tree.” 1. Wilderness station east of the Jordan (Num. 33:20). Its location is not known; Umm Leben 66 miles south of Haradah has been suggested. See Haradah. 2. Town in the Shephelah of Judah that Joshua defeated (Josh. 10:29-30). Joshua allotted it to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:42) and separated it as a city for the Levites (Josh. 21:13). It illustrated western border rebellion against King Joram of Judah (853-841 B.C.) just as Edom represented rebellion in the east (2 Kings 8:22). It lay on the invasion route to Jerusalem followed by Sennacherib about 701 B.C. (2 Kings 19:8). The mother of Kings Jehoahaz (609 B.C.) and Zedekiah (597-586 B.C.) came from Libnah (2 Kings 23:31; 24:18). Debate continues concerning Libnah's location: Tell es-Safi at the head of the Elah Valley appears too far north; Tell Bornat just west of Lachish; Tell el-Judeideh, usually identified as Moresheth-gath. Tell Bornat is the most popular candidate but far from certain.

LIBNI (Lib' ni) Personal name meaning “white.” 1. Original ancestor of clan of Levites (Exod. 6:17; Num. 3:21; 26:58). See Laadan. 2. A Levite in clan of Merari (1 Chron. 6:29).

LIBNITE (Lib' ni) Member of clan of Libni. See Libni.

LIBRARY Systematically arranged collection of writings. A private library is one owned by an individual; a public library is one owned corporately and is open to use by many. A special library of official records is an archive. Many of the earliest libraries were archives housed in palaces or temples.

Though the Bible does not use the word “library,” it makes indirect allusions to collections of books. The Bible itself is a “library” and was called such in Latin: bibliotheca. It was probably not until about A.D. 300 that all 66 books were published in a single volume.

The Material and Form of Ancient Books The earliest writings, which were from Mesopotamia, were inscribed in cuneiform on clay tablets, which ranged in size from six-by-six inches up to seven-by-thirteen inches. Longer historical texts would be placed on clay barrels or prisms. One omen series required 71 tablets for 8,000 lines. Each tablet when translated would be the equivalent of a few pages in English rather than a complete book.

Egypt provided the ancient world with its famous papyrus, made from the stalks of a reed plant. As this was imported into Greece through the Phoenician harbor of Byblos, the Greeks called a book biblos. The word “Bible” is derived from its plural ta biblia, “the books,” and the Greek word for library bibliotheke meant a container for such a book. Papyri sheets were normally written only on one side. They could be attached together to form long scrolls (an Egyptian royal papyrus could be over 100 feet long). Greek papyri rolls were generally shorter. The longer books of the NT, such as Matthew or Acts, would take a 30-foot scroll.

The Dead Sea Scrolls from Palestine were written on leather. The famous Isaiah Scroll is 23.5 feet long; the newly published Temple Scroll was originally 28.5 feet long. Late in 200s B.C. the city of Pergamum was supposedly forced by a shortage of papyrus to invent “parchment” (also called “vellum”), a specially treated animal skin that was stretched thin until it became translucent.

The Jews and pagan Greeks and Romans used both papyri and parchments in scroll form. Christians, perhaps as early as the first century, began to use the codex form, that is, the folding of several sheets of papyrus or parchment in a “book” form. This had several advantages. Both sides of the pages could be used; it was more compact; and above all one could more readily find Scripture references. Almost all of the early Christian Scriptures preserved in Egypt's dry climate are papyri codices.

When Paul was in prison in Rome, he requested “the scrolls, especially the parchments” (2 Tim. 4:13 HCSB). The books were probably scrolls of the OT. On the other hand, the parchments were probably parchment codices, possibly of his notes and letters.

Archives and Libraries in the Old Testament Era Abraham came from Mesopotamia, which had a well-developed tradition of palace and temple archives/libraries. Since 1974 over 20,000 tablets have been found in the archives of Ebla in northern Syria from pre-Abrahamic times. Many of the 25,000 tablets from Mari (1700s B.C.) and the 4,000 tablets from Nuzi (1400s B.C.) have helped to illuminate the backgrounds of the Hebrew patriarchs. Sumerian texts from among the 20,000 tablets at Nippur (before 1500 B.C.), and Akkadian texts from among the 20,000 tablets of Ashurbanipal's (about 668-629 B.C.) famous library at Nineveh have provided literary parallels to biblical stories such as the Gilgamesh Epic. Texts written in five scripts and seven languages from the libraries of Ugarit shed important light on the literary and religious background of the Canaanites. See Archaeology; Ashurbanipal; Ebla; Mari; Nuzi; Sumer; Ugarit

Joseph and Moses (Acts 7:22) had access to the royal libraries of Egypt. The excavations of Amarna have uncovered a building with shelves for storing rolls and an inscription, "Place of the Records of the Palace of the King." Rameses II (1292-1224 B.C.) had some 20,000 rolls, which no doubt included medical works like the Ebers Papyrus, literary works like The Shipwrecked Sailor, and magical texts like The Book of the Dead.

Solomon, who was famed as a prolific author (1 Kings 4:32), must have had an extensive library. It was probably at the palace archives that such documents as Historical Record of Israel's Kings (1 Kings 14:19 HCSB) and of Judah's Kings (1 Kings 14:29) were housed. Sacred texts were kept in the temple (2 Kings 23:2)

We know from the Bible that Persian kings kept careful archives (Ezra 4:15; 5:17; 6:1). Ahasuerus (Xerxes) had a servant read from his chronicle one night as a cure for his insomnia (Esther 6:1).

In 1947 the Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered in jars in caves near Qumran. These were originally from the library of the Essene monastery. They included manuscripts of all of the OT books except for Esther, works from the OT Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, and sectarian compositions such as the Manual of Discipline , the War Scroll, and the Temple Scroll. The excavators also recovered a table, a bench, and inkwells from the scriptorium, where the manuscripts were copied. See Dead Sea Scrolls.

Greek and Roman Libraries The tyrants of the 500s B.C., Peisistratus of Athens and Polycrates of Samos, were the first Greeks to gather libraries. Individuals such as Euripides, Plato, and Aristotle also had their own libraries. Alexander the Great took with him copies of Homer, of the Greek tragedians, and of various poets.

The first corporate Hellenistic library was conceived by Ptolemy I at Alexandria in Egypt and then established by Demetrius of Phalerum (Athens) under Ptolemy II (285-247 B.C.). This became the greatest library in the ancient world, amassing up to 700,000 scrolls. The main building was in the palace area with a secondary collection near the Serapeum. Many of the first librarians were outstanding scholars and literary critics such as Zenodotus of Ephesus, Apollonius of Rhodes, Callimachus the poet, and Eratosthenes the geographer. Callimachus compiled an annotated catalogue, the Pinakes , in 120 scrolls. It is possible that the learned Apollos (Acts 18:24) may have made use of this famous library.

The re-erected marble façade of the second-century A.D. Library of Celsus at Ephesus.

The second largest Hellenistic library was established at Pergamum (Rev. 1:11) by Eumenes II (197-158 B.C.) The excavators have identified a building next to the temple of Athena as the library. Rows of holes evidently held shelves for the scrolls; stone inscriptions identified the busts of authors. Antony gave Cleopatra its 200,000 scrolls in 41 B.C.

By the first century B.C. wealthy Romans, such as Cicero and Lucullus, had well-stocked libraries in their villas. Satirists mocked those like Trimalchio, who acquired books but never read them. Some 1,800 badly scorched papyri have been recovered from a wealthy man's library at Herculaneum, which was buried by volcanic mud from Vesuvius' eruption in A.D. 79.

Caesar was killed in 44 B.C. before he could erect Rome's first public library. This was built some time after 39 B.C. by Asinius Pollio. Augustus built three public libraries; Tiberius built another in the temple of Augustus. Most Roman libraries, such as Trajan's famous Biblioteca Ulpia, had both Greek and Latin collections.

The Use of Libraries The use of archives and libraries would be restricted, first of all, by literacy; and, secondly, in the case of temple or palace archives, to priests and scribes. At Alalakh (1700 B.C.) we have a record of only seven scribes out of a population of 3,000.

Though powerful individuals like the emperors could borrow books, most libraries did not permit books to circulate. An inscription from Athens reads: "No book shall be taken out, since we have sworn thus. [The library will be] open from the first hour (of daylight) until the sixth." LIBYA (Lib' y a) Large land area between Egypt and Tunisia. Libya's northern border is the Mediterranean Sea. The people who inhabited the territory in biblical days are referred to variously as Chub (Ezek. 30:5), Put (1 Chron. 1:8; Nah. 3:9), Phut (Gen. 10:6; Ezek. 27:10), and Libyans (Ezek. 30:5; 38:5; Acts 2:10). Most of our knowledge of Libya comes from Egyptian records that mention border wars and invasions. Pharaoh Shishak I (about 950 B.C.) is thought to have been a Libyan. He began a dynasty in Egypt that reigned for over 200 years. He supported Jeroboam I in establishing the kingdom of Israel in 922 B.C. (1 Kings 11:40; 14:25-28; 2 Chron. 12:1-12).

LIFE Principle or force considered to underlie the distinctive quality of animate beings. What is living has movement; in death movement ceases. “Life” is used in the Bible to describe the animating force in both animals and humans (e.g., Gen. 1:20). Living organisms grow and reproduce according to their kinds. Human life as bodily existence, the value of human life, and its transient nature is described (e.g., Pss. 17:14; James 4:14). This physical, bodily existence is subject to suffering, illness, toil, death, temptations, and sin (e.g., Pss. 89:47; 103:14-16; 104:23; Rom. 5:12-21; 6:21-23; 8:18). “Life,” as used in the Bible, however, has a much wider application than only to physical, bodily existence.

God's Unique Life Only God has life in the absolute sense. He is the living God (Josh. 3:10; Matt. 16:16). All other life depends on God for its creation and maintenance (Acts 17:25; Rom. 4:17). God is spoken of as the God of life or as life giving (Deut. 32:40; Jer. 5:2). In stark contrast to God, the idols are dead (Isa. 44:9-20; Jer. 10:8-10,14) as are those who depend on them for life (Pss. 115:8; 135:18).

In the same way that God is Creator by giving His breath or spirit to living creatures, so no possibility of life exists when God withholds His breath or spirit (Job 34:14-15). Thus, God is Lord of both life and death (2 Cor. 1:9; James 4:15). Life is something which only God can give (Ps. 139:13-14) and which only God can sustain (Ps. 119:116).

This being the case, every life is solely the possession of God. No one has a right to end a life (Exod. 20:13; Deut. 5:17; cp. Gen. 4:10,19-24). Since life belongs to God, one must abstain from the consumption of blood, the vehicle of life (Gen. 9:4; Lev. 3:17; 17:10-14; Deut. 12:23-25). Thus, even animal life is valued by God as is evidenced by the fact that animals' blood was sacred to God.

Earthly Existence, Physical Life The Bible summarizes the lives of many people. Often the biblical account includes a statement about their life span, such as, “These are all the years of Abraham's life that he lived, one hundred and seventy-five years” (Gen. 25:7 NASB). The OT emphasizes quality of life. The person who finds wisdom is fortunate: “She [wisdom] is a tree of life to those who embrace her” (Prov. 3:18 HCSB). Wisdom affects how people live. Psalm 143 testifies to the dark moments of life. Then the psalmist prays for God to intervene: “For Your name's sake, LORD, let me live. In Your righteousness deliver me from trouble” (143:11 HCSB).

Jesus at His temptation quoted Deut. 8:3: “Man must not live on bread alone” (Matt. 4:4; Luke 4:4 HCSB). Rather each person must live “on every word that comes from the mouth of God” (Matt. 4:4). Earthly life involves God.

Jesus warned that “one's life is not in the abundance of his possessions” (Luke 12:15 HCSB). Yet many people see one's belongings as the criterion of success. Jesus healed people and raised some from the dead to relieve the harshness of life (cp. Mark 5:21-43). Jesus brought wholeness into human, physical life.

Life as Fellowship with God The OT uses bold metaphors for fellowship with God: “For with You is life's fountain. In Your light we will see light” (Ps. 36:9 HCSB). We come to God to receive life. We walk in fellowship with God, and in His light we see life. Otherwise, we are devoid of life and cannot see. Even when we do come to God, we may depart from Him. Another psalmist pleaded for God's hand to be upon him: “Then we will not turn away from You; revive us, and we will call on Your name” (Ps. 80:18 HCSB).

The proper response to life as the gift of God is to live life in service to God (Isa. 38:10-20) by obeying the Law (Lev. 18:5), doing God's will (Matt. 6:10; 7:21), and feeding on God's Word (Deut. 6:1-9; 8:3; 32:46-47; Matt. 4:4). Only that life which lives in obedience to God deserves to be called life in the true sense of the word (Deut. 30:15-20; Ezek. 3:16-21; 18:1-32).

The NT deepens this emphasis. Paul points out that Christians differ in terms of food they eat and days they celebrate (Rom. 14:1-6); these things are part of custom and tradition. All Christians are to make the Lord Jesus central and live so as to show that He is their purpose for living. "For none of us lives to himself, and no one dies to himself. If we live, we live to the Lord; and if we die, we die to the Lord. Therefore, whether we live or die, we belong to the Lord. Christ died and came to life for this: that He might rule over both the dead and the living" (Rom. 14:7-9 HCSB). Such living demands fellowship with the Savior who is the purpose for living.

Paul wrote that we died with Christ and were raised together with Him (Col. 3:1-3) and that the lives of Christians (individually) have been hidden with Christ in God. When Christ (the Christians' life) comes a second time, we will be manifested with Him in glory (Col. 3:4). Our fellowship with Him now is dependent on our constantly seeking and thinking on what is above (Col. 3:1-2). This is the new and transformed life.

Paul describes God's servants as an aroma for God among the people to whom they witness (2 Cor. 2:15). To those who are perishing, believers are a fragrance from death to death. To those who are being saved, they are a fragrance from life to life (2 Cor. 2:16). Those who reject the message continue on in death. Those who accept the message move from one level of life to another. The life that Christ initiates grows. Paul exclaimed: "Who is competent for this?" (2 Cor. 2:16 HCSB).

Paul set forth his picture of life: the process of living for me, Christ; the act of death, gain (Phil. 1:21). When Christ is central, life has no boundaries.

Christ as the Life, the One Who Imparts Life Old Testament believers identified life with God (Pss. 42:8; 27:1; 66:9). The “I am” sayings in the Gospel of John identify life with Jesus. “I am the bread of life” (John 6:35,48). “I have come that they may have life (John 10:10 HCSB). “I am the resurrection and the life” (John 11:25). “I am the way, the truth, and the life” (John 14:6). John states the purpose for his Gospel: “But these are written so that you may believe Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God, and by believing you may have life in His name” (John 20:31). Since Jesus was God incarnate, He made genuine life a reality—not a distant prospect.

Life to Come, Life beyond This Life The genuine life that comes from Jesus to those who obey God is true or eternal life. Just as physical life is the gift of God, so is eternal life (John 6:63; Rom. 6:23; 1 Cor. 15:45; Eph. 2:8-10). Eternal life, or true life, refers as much to the quality of life one has as to the quantity of life. According to the Bible, all people will have an endless duration of life either in the blessing of God's presence or in the damnation of God's absence (e.g., Dan. 12:2; Matt. 25:31-46; John 5:28-29). The thing that distinguishes the life of these two groups of people is not its duration but its quality. Eternal life is of a quality like God's life. This kind of life is a true blessing (Luke 18:29-30; 1 John 5:12). The quality of this life is marked by freedom from the power of sin to destroy, by holiness, and by a positive relation with God (Rom. 6:20-23). True life is not only something to be hoped for in the future, it is a present reality. Believers share in the life of God in this life (Luke 11:20; Rom. 6:4,11; 8:6; 1 John 3:14), but the believer does not fully experience true life until the resurrection when believers obtain the crown of life (James 1:12; Rev. 2:10).

True life is offered to all, but it is received only by those who realize that the source of true life is what God has done in Jesus Christ and does not come from within the individual (Eph. 2:8-10). Those who have true life as a gift are to conform themselves to the manner of life Jesus exhibited (John 5:39-40). Christians are to lose themselves (2 Cor. 5:15) and serve God in love (Matt. 25:31-46; Gal. 2:19). Just as food maintains physical life, service to God maintains true life (John 6:27,32-58; Acts 7:38).

Eternal life is indestructible (1 Cor. 15:42-57; 1 Pet. 1:23), though threatened by the devil, the law, and death. The devil attempts to destroy this life (Luke 12:4-5; 1 Pet. 5:8), but he is not able to harm it for God protects the believer (Rom. 8:7-39; Eph. 6:10-18). The law threatens this life by tempting people to believe that they can attain this life by their own efforts (Rom. 7:10,13; 2 Cor. 3:4-6). Death is also an enemy of true life, but it is powerless to destroy the life that God gives (Rom. 5:12-21; 6:9-10; 7:24-8:11, 35-39).

Life beyond this life is not that of a “spirit” but that of a bodily resurrection. Paul highlighted both earthly existence and the life to come: “Godliness is beneficial in every way, since it holds promise for the present life and also for the life to come” (1 Tim. 4:8 HCSB). This “present” life is one of testing. James says those who pass this test “will receive the crown of life that He has promised to those who love Him” (James 1:12 HCSB). This future life is one of open fellowship with God (Col. 3:4). See Eschatology; Eternal Life; Resurrection.

LIFE, BOOK OF Heavenly document mentioned in Ps. 139:16 and further defined in the NT (Luke 10:20; Rev. 13:8). In it are recorded by God the names and deeds of righteous people.

LIFE, ORIGIN OF The Bible teaches that all matter (John 1:3), including living matter, was created by God ex nihilo (out of nothing—Heb. 11:3) through a series of special, decisive acts, each introduced in Gen. 1 by the phrase “and God said” (Gen. 1:3,6,9,14,20,24,26; cp. Ps. 148:5; Rev. 4:11). Plants and animals were created in self-reproducing “kinds” (Gen. 1:11-12,21,24). All of creation was God-directed and purposeful (Isa. 43:7; 45:18; Col. 1:16).

The Bible teaches the special creation of people (Gen. 1:26-28; 2:7; Matt. 19:4). God created people to bring glory to Himself (Isa. 43:7; cp. Col. 1:16) and made the earth to be their specially prepared home (Isa.

45:18). The psalmist stood in wonder at the intricate design of the human body and saw it as testimony of God's creative power (Ps. 139:13-15).

Each of the Bible's statements about creation is incompatible with the various theories of evolution. See Creation and Science.

LIFE SPAN The life expectancy in industrialized western countries closely approximates the natural life span of mankind according to Ps. 90:10: "Our lives last seventy years or, if we are strong, eighty years" (cp. 2 Sam. 19:32-35; Luke 2:36-37). While modern medicine, improved health care, and a healthy diet can increase this natural limit somewhat, it is unreasonable to assume that people will, or should, live as long as the patriarchs of old.

With the exception of Enoch, who "walked with God, and he was not, for God took him" (Gen. 5:24), each of the antediluvian fathers lived in excess of 595 years (Gen. 5:3-31). The recorded life span of the descendants of Noah gradually decreased after the flood so that the patriarchs each lived only twice today's normal span (Gen. 25:7-8; 35:28-29; 47:28; 50:26). While many scholars accept these year totals as accurate, others calculate them downward based on known or suggested genealogical or mathematical formulae.

The Bible records many tragic instances of human life cut off prematurely (e.g., Gen. 4:8; 1 Sam. 31:2; 2 Chron. 35:23-25; Job 21:21; Ps. 39:5,11; Luke 12:20). No one knows the day of their death (cp. Gen. 27:2). Because the years pass so quickly, the psalmist pleaded, "Teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom" (Ps. 90:12).

LIFE SUPPORT (ARTIFICIAL) While the Bible does not speak directly to the issue of life support by artificial means, it does provide principles relevant to the time of one's death. These principles suggest that extreme measures to prolong life artificially encroach upon the prerogative of God to control life and death. For the same reason, any and all forms of euthanasia are contrary to the teaching of Scripture.

The Bible teaches that only God gives life and that only God should take life away (Exod. 20:13; Job 1:21; cp. Rom. 14:7-8). Human life is a sacred and precious gift because each person is created in the image of God (Gen. 1:26-27; Ps. 8:5). The writers of the OT voiced a strong preference for life over death (Deut. 30:19), even in the face of crushing pain and defeat (Job 2:9-10).

Yet there comes a God-appointed time for everyone to die (Eccles. 3:2; Heb. 9:27). Although Christians value life highly, they need not fear death (1 Cor. 15:54-55; Heb. 2:14-15; cp. 2 Cor. 5:8). The Apostle Paul, who was torn between life on earth and eternal life in heaven, was willing to follow either path that God desired for him (Phil. 1:19-26).

LIGHT, LIGHT OF THE WORLD Light is one of the Bible's most complex symbols. The primary term for light is 'or in the OT and phos in the NT. Light may denote daylight in contrast to darkness (Gen. 1:5,18; Isa. 5:30). It may refer to luminaries (sun, moon, or stars, Isa. 60:19; Ps. 136:7-9) or the light given by luminaries (Isa. 13:10; Jer. 31:35) or by other sources (lamp, Jer. 25:10; fire, Ps. 78:14). The expression 'or habboqer, "light of the morning," means "dawn" (Judg. 16:2; 1 Sam. 14:36). In many of its figurative uses, the exact significance of light is uncertain, though some link to the notion of physical light as the basis for life on earth is often present. Light is linked with instruction (Isa. 2:5; Ps. 119:105,130), truth (Ps. 43:3), good (Isa. 5:20), salvation (Ps. 27:1; Isa. 49:6), life (Ps. 36:9; Job 33:28,30), peace (Isa. 45:7), rejoicing (Ps. 97:11), covenant (Isa. 42:6), justice and righteousness (Isa. 59:9), God's presence and favor (Ps. 44:3; 89:15), or the glory of Yahweh (Isa. 60:1-3). Apocalyptic visions of the end are associated with the extinguishing of light (Isa. 13:10; Jer. 4:23; Matt. 24:29). In the new age, the new Jerusalem "does not need the sun or the moon to shine on it, because God's glory illumines it, and its lamp is the Lamb" (Rev. 21:23 HCSB; cp. Isa. 60:19; Zech. 14:6-7; Rev. 22:5).

On the first day God created light (Gen. 1:3), which implies that light existed before the sun and other luminaries (Gen. 1:14-18). God Himself is the source of that light (cp. Ps. 104:2; perhaps James 1:17). If so, this light likely signified the divine presence just as the luminous cloud of the Shekinah glory (cp. Exod. 24:15-18; 40:38; 2 Chron. 5:13-14; 7:2).

The identification of light with the divine presence of the Shekinah glory above sheds light on the meaning of light in the Gospel of John and 1 John. In the person of Jesus, “the true light, who gives light to everyone, was coming into the world” (John 1:9 HCSB). The only begotten God, who is in the bosom of the Father, has made the Father known (1:18) because he “became flesh and took up residence among us. We observed His glory, the glory as the One and Only Son from the Father, full of grace and truth” (1:14; cp. Exod. 34:6). In other words, in Jesus God was made manifest because in Him the Shekinah glory had returned to reside among us and this glory consisted of fullness of grace and truth (cp. John 1:16-17). Light thus signifies Jesus' glory, which is fullness of grace and truth. Jesus is “the light of the world” and His followers will have “the light of life” (i.e., the truth that brings life; John 8:12). Jesus, who is the light, the embodiment of grace and truth, also brings salvation (John 12:35-36,46-47) and the doing of God's works (John 9:4-5). This salvation and doing of God's works comes from guidance and instruction from the light (John 12:35,47). Notions of illumination, both positive manifestation of God's prior work of grace (John 1:13; 3:21) and negative reproof of human evil (John 3:20), are present as well. Human beings who reject the light are thus rejecting Jesus, the embodiment of grace and truth (John 3:14-21; cp. John 18:37-38, where Pilate apparently exemplifies one who rejects Jesus as the embodiment of truth).

The attribution of God (rather than the Word) as light in 1 John 1:5 falls into place in this line of interpretation. Not only is the only begotten God characterized by fullness of grace and truth, His Father, whom He makes known as characterized by fullness of grace and truth, is as well (John 1:17-18). John can thus deny that those who do not do the truth have fellowship with God, who is light (1 John 1:6). 1 John 2:8-10 is entailment of the truth—hating one's brother is incompatible with the character of both the Father and the Son (note “the true light is already shining” in v. 8). In addition, 1 John 1:7-10 indicates that walking in the light (i.e., the truth) includes the confession of our sins, which keeps us in fellowship with one another and effects cleansing from all sin through the blood of Jesus.

Paul's use of light in 2 Cor. 4:4-6 runs along parallel lines with John's usage (cp. Luke 2:32). "Light" (here photismos) is defined as "the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God" (2 Cor. 4:4 HCSB). "For God, who said, 'Light shall shine out of darkness,'" is the One who has "shone in our hearts to give the light (photismos) of the knowledge of God's glory in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 4:6). Indeed, the beholding of the glory of the Lord results in our "being transformed into the same image from glory to glory; this is from the Lord who is the Spirit" (2 Cor. 3:18). Since they are being conformed to the glorious image of Jesus, who is the embodiment of grace and truth, it is fitting that Christ's disciples too are called "the light of the world" (Matt. 5:14,16). They have come to Christ to receive life (cp. Eph. 5:13-14) and thus are possessors and givers of light (1 Thess. 5:5; Rom. 13:12; Eph. 5:8; Phil. 2:15; cp. John 5:35). Like Paul (a prototypical disciple), they too are called "to open their [the Jewish people's and the rest of the nations'] eyes that they may turn from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins and a share among those who are sanctified by faith in Me [Jesus]" (Acts 26:18 HCSB). As sons of light, they bear fruit in all goodness, righteousness, and truth (Eph. 5:9) and bring glory to the Father (Matt. 5:16).

LIGHTNING Flash of light resulting from a discharge of static electricity in the atmosphere. In the OT lightning is always associated with God. God is the Maker of lightning and thunder (Job 28:26; Jer. 10:13) which reveal God's power and majesty (Pss. 77:18; 97:4). Lightning and thunder frequently accompany a revelation of God (the giving of the law, Exod. 19:16; 20:18; Ezekiel's first vision, Ezek. 1:13-14). In poetic language God's voice is identified with the thunder (Job 37:3-5). Lightning also appears as God's weapon in those passages in which God is portrayed as a warrior (arrows: 2 Sam. 22:15; Pss. 18:14; 77:17; 144:6; fire: Ps. 97:3; Job 36:32). Both the OT and the NT continue the association with power and majesty (4:5; 11:19) and with weapons/judgment (8:5; 16:18). Lightning serves as an illustration for Christ's clearly visible coming (Matt. 24:26-27) and of Satan's (sudden, catastrophic, visible) fall (Luke 10:18).

LIGHTS, FEAST OF Also known as Hanukkah. See Festivals.

LIGN ALOES KJV transliteration of the Vulgate (official Latin translation) reading at Num. 24:6 [lignum aloes means “wood of aloes”]. NASB, NIV, NRSV simply read “aloes.” The REB reflects the KJV tradition with the reading “aloe trees.” See Aloe.

LIGURE KJV term for a gem usually identified with the jacinth, which was regarded as precious in ancient times (Exod. 28:19). See Minerals and Metals.

LIKENESS Quality or state of being like; resemblance. Old Testament passages center around two truths: (1) that God is wholly other and cannot be properly compared to any likeness (Isa. 40:18) and (2) that humanity is created in the image and likeness of God (Gen. 1:26). The first truth forms the basis for the prohibition of making any graven images (Exod. 20:4; Deut. 4:16-18) and perhaps explains Ezekiel's reluctance to speak of elements in his vision in concrete terms (Ezek. 1:5,10,16,22,26,28). The likeness of God in humanity (Gen. 1:26) has been interpreted variously. Likeness has sometimes been distinguished from image, though the terms are best regarded as synonyms. Interpreters have identified the divine likeness with the ability to think rationally, to form relationships with other humans and with God or with the exercise of dominion over creation (cp. Ps. 8:5-8). The divine likeness is sometimes thought to have been lost in the fall, but its passing to Seth (Gen. 5:3) argues against the popular form of this argument. Though the likeness of God was not lost with Adam's sin, neither Adam nor subsequent humanity fulfilled God's purpose. God's purpose for humanity was fulfilled in Jesus Christ who is in a unique sense the likeness of God (2 Cor. 4:4; cp. John 1:14,18; 14:9; Heb. 1:3). Paul's statement that Christ came “in flesh like ours under sin's domain” (Rom. 8:3 HCSB) parallels “taking on the likeness of men” (Phil. 2:7), testifying that the incarnate Christ was truly human. The Christian life is characterized as a new creation in the likeness of God (Eph. 4:24; cp. 2 Cor. 4:4). See Idols; Image of God.

LIKHI (לִּיכִי hi) Personal name meaning “taken.” Member of tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:19).

LILY In biblical usage any of a number of distinctive flowers ranging from the lotus of the Nile (1 Kings 7:19) to wild field flowers in Palestine (Matt. 6:28). The lily was the inspiration for the rim of the molten sea in the temple in Jerusalem (1 Kings 7:26; cp. 1 Kings 7:19,22). The Song of Songs uses it to beautify the writer's description of love (2:1; 4:5). See Flowers.

LILY BLOSSOM See Lily Work.

LILY OF THE COVENANT, LILY OF THE TESTIMONY Translation of the Hebrew shushan edut in the title of Ps. 60, taken as a reference to the hymn tune (NASB margin, NIV, HCSB, REB). KJV, RSV simply transliterate the Hebrew.

LILY WORK Decorative work capping the two freestanding columns flanking the entrance to Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:19,22). These columns were likely inspired by Egyptian columns with a lotus motif. The brim of the molten sea was perhaps also inspired by the shape of the lotus blossom (1 Kings 7:26). See Temple.

LIME White, caustic solid consisting primarily of calcium oxide obtained by heating limestone or shells to a high temperature. Mixed with water, lime was used as a plaster (Deut. 27:2,4). Burning someone's bones to lime amounts to complete annihilation (Isa. 33:12) and was regarded as an especially heinous crime (Amos 2:1).

LINE Tool used for measuring length or distance; a plumb line; a cord; a row. Sometimes the distance to be measured is relatively short (1 Kings 7:23). Elsewhere the line serves as a surveying tool for measuring a larger distance (Ps. 16:6; Isa. 34:17; Jer. 31:39; Zech. 1:16; 2:1-2). The surveying image is applied both to contexts where judgment (Amos 7:17) and restoration (Jer. 31:39; Zech. 1:16; 2:1) are in view. In contrast, references to a plumb line refer to judgment (2 Kings 21:13; Isa. 34:11; Lam. 2:8) upon those who failed to meet God's high standards (Isa. 28:17). Line is used in the sense of a cord in the story of Rahab and the spies (Josh. 2:18,21). Line can also refer to a row (of men, 2 Sam. 8:2; of writing, Isa. 28:10,13).

LINEAGE KJV and RSV term (Luke 2:4) meaning descent (cp. NRSV) or family (NASB). HCSB has “family line.” See Genealogies.

LINEAR MEASURES See Weights and Measures.

LINEN Most common fabric used in the ancient Near East. It was spun from the flax plant and bleached before being woven into clothing, bedding, curtains, and burial shrouds. The tabernacle curtains (Exod. 26:1) and the high priest's garments (Exod. 28:6) were of “fine linen,” cloth woven so finely that it cannot be distinguished from silk without the aid of magnification. See Flax.

LINTEL Wooden crossbeam over a doorway. The lintel is most prominent in the celebration of the Passover. The people of Israel were to sprinkle the blood of the sacrificial lamb on the lintel and the doorposts as a sign to the death angel. Every household that had blood on the lintel would be spared the death of the firstborn (Exod. 12:22-23).

LINUS (Li' nūs) Personal name possibly meaning “linen.” Paul's companion who sent greetings to Timothy (2 Tim. 4:21). Early church tradition identified him as the first bishop of the church at Rome, but it is doubtful Rome had only one bishop or pastor that early in its history.
