LION Large, swift-moving cat. The male has a heavy mane. Mentioned approximately 135 times in the OT, the lion is the proverbial symbol for strength (Judg. 14:18). In Palestine lions seemed to prefer the vegetation of the Jordan Valley (Jer. 49:19). The Bible describes the lion as powerful and daring (Prov. 30:30) and distinguished by a terrifying roar (Isa. 5:29). It was a sign of the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:9; Rev. 5:5). David defended his father's flock against lions and bears (1 Sam. 17:34-35). One of the most well-known stories in the Bible is about a young man being cast into a den of lions (Dan. 6:16-23). Since untamed lions were put in pits, it is possible that Daniel was cast into such a pit. Lions were kept as pets by pharaohs.

The Hebrews seemed to make closer distinctions than does English in the lion family, since five unrelated Hebrew words are translated “lion.” They have disappeared from Palestine, with the last one killed near Megiddo in the 13th century.

LIPS Fleшы, muscular folds surrounding the mouth. In the OT lips frequently take the character of the whole person. There are flattering and lying lips (Pss. 12:2; 31:18); joyful lips (Ps. 63:5); righteous lips (Prov. 16:13); fearful lips (Hab. 3:16). Uncircumcised lips (Exod. 6:12 KJV) most likely refer to stammering lips or lack of fluency in speech (Exod. 4:10). Mourning is expressed in part by covering the upper lip with one's hand (Lev. 13:45).

LITTER Covered and curtained couch with shafts so that it can be carried by porters (Song 3:7 NRSV, REB; Isa. 66:20 KJV, NASB, NRSV). The term used at Isa. 66:20 perhaps refers to covered wagons (NIV, REB). The NIV takes the term at Song 3:7 in this sense as well (carriage).

LITTLE OWL Any species of owl other than the great owl; included in the unclean birds of Lev. 11:17. See Owl.

LIVER Large organ that secretes bile. According to the NASB, the lobe of the liver was offered to God with the other choice parts of the burnt offering (Lev. 3:4,10,15). Only the covering of the liver was offered according to the NIV (also KJV). NRSV understood the offering to consist of the appendage to the liver, likely the pancreas. The ancients examined livers to discern the future. The only scriptural mention of the practice concerns the king of Babylon (Ezek. 21:21). In Lam. 2:11 the liver is likely regarded as the seat of emotions (liver, KJV, NASB margin; heart, NASB, NIV, RSV; bile, NRSV).

LIVING BEINGS, LIVING CREATURES Characters in Ezekiel's first vision (Ezek. 1:5,13-15,19-20,22; 3:13; 10:15,17,20). The creatures are later identified as cherubim (10:20). There were four creatures, each having a human form but with four faces. Perhaps the best interpretation views the creatures as a pictorial representation of the total sovereignty of God. Four creatures represent the four corners of the earth. The four faces represent four classes of creation: man, humanity; lion, king of wild beasts; ox, king of domestic beasts; and eagle, king of the birds. Central to this interpretation is the One seated on the throne above all the creatures (1:26-28). The book of Revelation develops a similar image to portray God's total sovereignty (Rev. 4:1-8).

LO-AMMI (Lō-ām' mī) Symbolic personal name meaning “not my people.” Son of Hosea the prophet whose name God gave to symbolize Israel's lost relationship with Him due to their sin and broken covenant (Hos. 1:9).

LOAN Grant temporary use. Because of Israel's experience of deliverance from slavery, her moral code gave special care to marginal folk (Exod. 22:21-24; Deut. 10:19; Ps. 82:3-4; Prov. 31:8-9). Thus loans were to be acts of generosity, not acts for profit at the expense of the poor (Lev. 25:35-37). Furthermore, because the earth was God's (Lev. 25:23; Deut. 10:14) and human possessions were gifts from God (Deut. 8:1-10), lending was sharing God's gifts.

Therefore the OT forbade charging interest to fellow Israelites (Exod. 22:25; Lev. 25:35-38; Deut. 23:19), for requesting loans indicated economic hardship. One might charge interest to sojourners (Deut. 23:20), though this arrangement was not meant to be exploitative (Exod. 22:21; Lev. 19:33-34; Deut. 10:19; Ezek. 22:7). Laws for collateral focused on protecting the debtor. The pledge must not threaten the debtor's dignity (Deut. 24:10-11), livelihood (Deut. 24:6), family (Job 24:1-3,9), or physical necessities (Exod. 22:26-27; Deut. 24:12-13). Compassionate lending was one measure of a righteous person (Ps. 15; Ezek. 18:5-9).

Years of release and the Jubilee Year (Exod. 23:10-11; Deut. 15:1-15; Lev. 25) provided a systematic means for addressing long-term economic hardship by returning family property, freeing slaves, and canceling debts. Deuteronomy 15:7-11 warns against scheming creditors who would refuse loans because a year of release was near; lending was to be an act of generosity (v. 10). As in most human communities, greed prevailed, and the prophets railed against the exploitation of the poor (e.g., Amos 2:6-8; 8:4), including violations of charging interest and abusing pledges (Ezek. 18:12-13; 22:12; Hab. 2:6-9; Neh. 5:6-11). LOCK 1 . A tuft, tress, or ringlet of hair. As a sign of their dedication to God, Nazirites were not permitted to cut their locks (Num. 6:5; Judg. 16:19). Priests were likewise prohibited from shaving their heads, though they could trim their hair (Ezek. 44:20). The Hebrew term that the KJV translated “locks” at Song 4:1,3; 6:7 and Isa. 47:2 is rendered “veil” by modern translations. 2. A bolt used to secure a door. In the OT period door locks were bolts with holes into which small iron or wooden pins would drop to secure the bolt (Neh. 3:3,6,13,15; Song 5:5; cp. Judg. 3:23-24). The bolt was generally seven to nine inches long for an interior door, 14 inches to two feet for an outside door. The key had iron pegs corresponding to the position of the pins in the bolt and worked by forcing these pins up (Judg. 3:25).

LOCUST Insect species of the order Orthoptera, family Acrididae. In the Middle East the locust periodically multiplies to astronomical numbers. As the swarm moves across the land, it devours all vegetation, high and low. The Hebrew OT uses different words to describe the insect at its various stages of life, from egg to larvae to adult insect. Eaten in several ways (raw, boiled, roasted), the locust is an excellent source of protein (Lev. 11:21-22; Mark 1:6).

The locust plague is used as a symbol for what God's judgment will be like (Joel 2:1,11,25; Rev. 9:3,7; cp. Exod. 10:3-20; Deut. 28:38). The image of the locust plague was also used to symbolize being overwhelmed by a large and powerful army (Judg. 6:5; Isa. 33:4; Jer. 46:23; 51:27; Joel 2:20; Nah. 3:15). Similar imagery is used in other ancient Near Eastern literature. See Insects.

LOD (Lōd) Place-name of unknown meaning, later called Lydda, 11 miles southeast of Joppa. Shemed or perhaps Elpaal of the tribe of Benjamin is credited with building it (1 Chron. 8:12). Returning exiles settled there about 537 B.C. (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37; 11:35) at what appears as the westernmost postexilic settlement though probably outside the governing authority of Sanballat of Samaria and of Judah (Neh. 6:2). See Lydda.

LO-DEBAR (Lō-Dē' bār) Place-name variously spelled in Hebrew to mean "no word" or "to him a word" or "to speak." After Saul and Jonathan had been defeated on Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. 31:1-13), Mephibosheth, Jonathan's lame son (2 Sam. 4:4) took refuge with Machir in the city of Lo-Debar (2 Sam. 9:3-4)—a city of Gad located in the eastern part of Gilead just south of the Sea of Chinnereth (Galilee). After David became king, he called for Mephibosheth so he could show kindness to the lone descendant of Jonathan (2 Sam. 9:1-5). David later needed the assistance of Machir of Lo-Debar during the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. 17:27-29).

The Hebrew text of Josh. 13:26 mentions the name of the city Lidebir near Mahanaim. This is usually translated “of Debir,” but many see this as an alternate spelling of Lo-Debar. See Debir.

Lo-Debar is cryptically referred to in Amos 6:13. Prior to the delivery of this oracle, LoDebar and Karnaim had been recaptured by Jeroboam II from the Arameans in a campaign blessed by God (2 Kings 14:25-28). Israel had taken the victory as an indication of its own strength and greatness, forgetting that God had brought them the victory. Amos took the consonants of the name Lo-Debar and added new vowels to make the name read “a thing of nought.” Amos was reminding Israel that its true strength and greatness lie not in their military achievements but in God who had blessed their efforts. Amos was calling the Israelites back to faith in this God. Phil Logan LODGE Temporary resting place, for example, in a private home (Josh. 2:1; Acts 10:18) or a campground (Josh. 4:3,8; Isa. 10:29). The temporary stay might be prolonged as was the case of Paul in Rome (Acts 28:23,30). Jeremiah longed to escape to a wayfarer's desert lodge to avoid his people's sinfulness (Jer. 9:2). See Hut.

LOFT KJV term for the upper room (NASB, NIV) or chamber (NRSV, cp. REB) of a house (1 Kings 17:19). See Architecture; House; Upper Room.

LOG 1. A liquid measure. See Weights and Measures. 2. Section of a tree trunk. The Bible refers to splitting logs (Eccles. 10:9), to burning logs for cooking (Ezek. 24:10), and to felling logs to use in house construction (2 Kings 6:2,5). The timber that King Hiram of Tyre sent to Solomon was likely logs lashed together to form rafts (1 Kings 5:8-9). The “log” of Jesus' hyperbolic expression (Matt. 7:3-5; Luke 6:41-42) was a long, shaped piece of lumber (KJV, beam).

LOGIA (Λο γία) Greek term applied to a collection of sayings. It comes from the same root as logos, a Greek word usually translated “word” (John 1:1,14). The Church Fathers used “logia” to denote a collection of the sayings of Jesus. In his History of the Church, Eusebius (ca. A.D. 260 to ca. 340) quoted Papias (A.D. 100S) who said that Matthew compiled the logia in Hebrew. Apparently this is not the same as the Gospel of Matthew itself. Rather the Hebrew logia were likely the sayings of Jesus contained in Matthew and Luke but not in Mark.

Exactly when the logia might have achieved written form is a subject of debate. In addition to NT evidence, two modern discoveries show that logia existed in early Christian communities. Around 1900 remnants of an actual logia were unearthed near Oxyrinus, Egypt. Three papyrus fragments were found containing sayings ascribed to Jesus. They have been dated to the A.D. 200S but are probably copies of an older collection. Each saying begins with “Jesus says.” Some of them can be found in the Gospels, while others are known from the Church Fathers. In addition, two logia of a community with Gnostic tendencies were found in 1946 near Nag Hammadi, Egypt. Dating from between A.D. 300 and 400, they contain over 200 sayings attributed to Jesus.

The Gospels, as well as those NT sayings of Jesus found outside the Gospels (such as Acts 20:35), and the modern discoveries all demonstrate the early church's concern for preserving Jesus' sayings. The same concern can be seen today in our red-letter edition Bibles. See Gnosticism; Logos; Luke; Mark; Matthew; Nag Hammadi.

LOGOS John deliberately used logos (translated “Word”) to describe Jesus (John 1:1). Logos had rich cultural meaning in the background of early Christians, both Jews and Greeks.

The Greek word logos (“word”) ordinarily refers to an explanation or reason for something otherwise meaningless. Logos has a variety of uses depending on context. With regard to language or grammar, logos can mean “sentence” or “statement,” while regarding logic or knowledge it can mean “reason,” “explanation,” “science,” or “formula.” A form of logos is utilized in English words to describe a particular discipline or science, such as theology, anthropology, and so forth.

Logos was given great significance by Greek philosophers, beginning with Heraclitus. The Stoics strongly emphasized the logos spermatikos (“seminal word”), the rational principle which pervades all reality, providing meaning and order to persons and the universe. The logos creates coherence and unity, provides an orderly pattern for existence, and holds everything together.

Foundational for biblical use of logos, however, is the OT concept of the “word” (dabar) of God. The Hebrews saw the word of God not as merely words but as a powerful and effectual means of accomplishing God's purposes (Isa. 40:8; 55:11; Jer. 23:29). By His word God spoke the world into existence (Gen. 1:3-31; Ps. 33:6; 2 Pet. 3:5). God communicated His word directly to persons, especially in the Law (Exod. 20:1-17; 34:28; Deut. 5:4-5) and the Prophets (1 Sam. 15:10; 2 Sam. 7:4; 23:2; 2 Kings 7:1; Isa. 38:4; Jer. 1:4,11; Ezek. 7:1; 11:14; Hos. 1:1; Joel 1:1; Jon. 1:1; Mic. 1:1; Hag. 1:1; Mal. 1:1). The wise person is the one who lives in accordance with the word of God (Gen. 15:1; Exod. 9:20-25; Num. 3:16; 1 Kings 6:11-12; Pss. 106:24; 119).

As Greek and Hebrew cultures overlapped, these concepts of “word” interacted. When Jewish scholars in Alexandria, Egypt, translated the Hebrew OT into Greek (the Septuagint, 275 B.C.), they utilized logos to translate dabar. An Alexandrian Jew, Philo (30 B.C.-A.D. 40), expressed Judaism in neo-Platonic terms, believing that Greek thinkers borrowed from Moses. Philo believed that Greek concepts such as logos were not contradictory to the OT view of the word and wisdom of God as personified in Prov. 8 and in the apocryphal books Wisdom of Solomon and Sirach. Just as the Stoic logos provided the rational order for creation, Philo reinterpreted the creation in Genesis to be through the Logos, the firstborn of creation.

In this cultural situation John described Jesus as the Logos (John 1:1-14). But John did not merely copy common cultural concepts. Writing under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, he poured new meaning into the concept of Logos. In relation to God, Jesus as the Logos was not merely an angel or created being who was the agent of creation, nor another word from God or wisdom from God, but He was God Himself (John 1:1-4). In relation to humanity, Jesus the Logos was not the impersonal principle of Stoicism, but He was a personal Savior who took on human flesh in the incarnation (John 1:4-14). The Word's becoming flesh and living among us (John 1:14) was in sharp contrast to the Greek ideas. By depicting Jesus as the Logos, John portrays Him as the preexistent Creator of the universe, with God, and identical to God. From this perspective of Jesus' divinity and eternity, any view of Jesus as a mere prophet or teacher is impossible (Phil. 2:5-11; Col. 1:13-20; 2:9-10; Heb. 1:1-4; 1 John 1:1-3; Rev. 19:13).

In other NT texts logos is used to refer to Scripture, particularly as proclaimed in gospel preaching (Luke 5:1; 8:11-15; Acts 4:31; 8:14; 12:24; Rom. 10:8; 1 Thess. 2:13; 1 Pet. 1:23-25; Heb. 4:12). The preaching of the gospel brings order and meaning to lives shattered by sin. Those who put faith in Jesus, the Logos, will be welcomed into the family of God (John 1:11-12).

LOINS Hebrew and Greek terms refer to the hips and lower back. Loins are used in the literal sense of the body's midsection (Exod. 28:42; 2 Kings 1:8; Isa. 11:5; Jer. 13:1; Matt. 3:4). Tying up one's long, lower garments about one's waist or loins indicated readiness for travel (Exod. 12:11; 1 Kings 18:46; 2 Kings 9:1). In the NT to gird up one's loins is used in the figurative sense of preparedness (Luke 12:35; Eph. 6:14; 1 Pet. 1:13). The OT sometimes uses loins as the seat of physical strength (Nah. 2:1). Thus to make someone's loins shake or loosed is to render the person helpless (Ps. 69:23; Isa. 45:1). Scripture also uses the loins as a symbol of procreative powers (Gen. 35:11; 1 Kings 8:19; Acts 2:30; Heb. 7:5,10). Modern translations frequently hide the Hebrew expression "from his loins" behind the translation "descendant."

LOIS (Λοΐς) Personal name, perhaps meaning "more desirable" or "better." The mother of Eunice and grandmother of Timothy (2 Tim. 1:5). Paul exalted Lois as a model of Christian faith and saw her as instrumental in nurturing her grandson in the faith.

LOOKING GLASS KJV term for a (hand) mirror (Exod. 38:8). In biblical times mirrors were made of polished metal (molten mirror, Job 37:18) which yielded a somewhat distorted image (1 Cor. 13:12). The women who ministered at the gate of the tabernacle donated their mirrors to be melted down for the bronze laver (Exod. 38:8). The KJV often refers to a mirror as a looking glass (Job 37:18; Isa. 3:23; 1 Cor. 13:12; James 1:23). See Glass.

LOOM Frame used for interlacing sets of threads at right angles to form cloth. The weaving of cloth was an important industry in the ancient world. Thus it is surprising that there are so few references to the process in Scripture. In a humorous scene, Samson convinced Delilah that his strength would be sapped should someone weave his hair into a piece of cloth on a loom. While he slept, Delilah did just that but was surprised when he easily freed himself from the loom (Judg. 16:14). Here “web” refers to cloth on a loom. Isaiah compared his finished life with cloth which is cut off from the loom (Isa. 38:12). Job 7:6 compares the brevity of life to the speed of the weaver's shuttle, the devise used to pass quickly the woof thread between the threads of the warp. Frequent references to a spear like a weaver's beam (1 Sam. 17:7; 2 Sam. 21:19; 1 Chron. 11:23; 20:5) perhaps suggest a javelin with a cord attached so that it might be easily retrieved. In this case, the heddle rod, a rod attached to cords or wires and used to guide warp threads, is possibly in mind. Other interpreters prefer to see a reference to the great size of the spear. See Cloth, Clothing.

LOOPS The inner and outer coverings of the tabernacle were each made of two large curtains held together by 50 clasps which passed through curved sections of blue cord for the inner tent or of leather for the outer tent (Exod. 26:4-5,10-11; 36:11-12,17).

LORD English rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. Generally, the term refers to one who has power or authority.

God as Lord Jehovah (or Yahweh; Hebrew YHWH , “self-existent”) is the name of God most frequently used in the Hebrew Scriptures. LORD commonly represents it in the English translations. The Jews meticulously avoided every mention of it and substituted in its stead another word, Adonai. They substituted the vowels in Adonai for those of Yahweh that produced the term Jehovah.

The importance of the name cannot be overstated. Exodus 3:14 furnishes a clue to the meaning of the word. When Moses received his commission to be the deliverer of Israel, God, who appeared in the burning bush, communicated to him the name to give as the credentials of his mission: “God said to Moses, ‘I AM WHO I AM’ [Heb. ehyeh asher ehyeh]; and He said, ‘Thus you shall say to the sons of Israel, “I AM has sent me to you”” (NASB). In both names, ehyeh and YHWH , the root idea is that of uncreated existence. When it is said that God's name is I am, simple being is not all that is affirmed. He is in a sense in which no other being is. He is, and the cause of His being is in Himself. He is because He is. The notice in Exod. 6:3, “By My name, LORD, I did not make Myself known to them” (NASB), does not imply that the patriarchs were completely ignorant of the existence or the use of the name. It simply means that previous to their deliverance from Egyptian bondage they had no experiential knowledge of such redemption. Under Moses they were to experience deliverance and have the redemptive power of God made real to them and the redemptive name of God entrusted to them. Previously, as shepherds in Palestine, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had known God as El Shaddai (“the Almighty,” Gen. 17:1), proving His power, but not in this kind of redemptive relationship. This name affirms God's lordship over His people (Exod. 34:23), as well as His power over the whole creation (Josh. 3:13). By this name God avows His superiority over all other gods (Deut. 10:17).

Adonai is another important designation for God as Lord in the OT. It derives from the Hebrew word Adon , an early word denoting ownership, hence, absolute control. Adon is not properly a divine title as it is used of humans in some places. It is applied to God as the owner and governor of the whole earth (Ps. 114:7). It is sometimes used as a term of respect (like our “sir”) but with a pronoun attached (“my lord”). It often occurs in the plural. Adonai is, in the emphatic form, “the Lord.” Many regard this title as the plural of Adon.

“Lord” or “Master” (Gk. kurios , “supreme”) signifies the one to whom a person or thing belongs, the master, the one having disposition of men or property, such as the “owner of the vineyard” (Matt. 20:8 HCSB; 21:40; Mark 12:9; Luke 20:15); the “Lord of the harvest” (Matt. 9:38 HCSB; Luke 10:2); the “master of the house” (Mark 13:35 HCSB); “Lord of the Sabbath” (Matt. 12:8 HCSB; Mark 2:28; Luke 6:5), who has the power to determine what is suitable to the Sabbath, and to release Himself and others from its obligation. This title is given to God, the ruler of the universe, both with the definite article ho kurios (Matt. 1:22; 5:33; Mark 5:19; Acts 7:33; 2 Tim. 1:16,18) and without the article (Matt. 21:9; 27:10; Mark 13:20; Luke 2:9,23,26; Heb. 7:21).

Jesus as Lord Kurios is the word normally employed in the NT to speak of Jesus as Lord. The word, however, has a wide range of reference, being used of God (Acts 2:34), of Jesus (Luke 10:1), of humans (Acts 16:19), and of angels (Acts 10:4). When characters in the Gospels speak of Jesus as Lord, they often mean no more than “sir.” At other times the designation kurios expresses a full confession of faith, as in Thomas's declaration, “My Lord and my God!” (John 20:28 HCSB). “The Lord” came to be used as a simple yet profound designation of Christ in Luke and Acts. “The Lord Jesus” was used frequently in Acts as well (4:33) to speak of faith in Christ as Lord (16:31) and to identify baptism as being in the name of the Lord Jesus (8:16; 19:5). The phrase “Jesus is Lord” evidently was the earliest Christian confession of faith. In Acts 2:36 Peter declared that God had made Jesus both Lord and Christ.

Paul often used a fuller phrase to speak of Jesus' lordship, “the Lord Jesus Christ.” It is significant that he used this in conjunction with the mention of God the Father and the Holy Spirit (1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Cor. 13:14). At other times Paul used the simpler formulas “the Lord Jesus” (2 Thess. 1:7) or “our Lord Jesus” (1 Thess. 3:13). In contrast to the many false gods and lords of pagans, there is for Christians one God, the Father, and one Lord, Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 8:5-6). Paul was certainly familiar with the early confession “Jesus is Lord” because he averred in 1 Cor. 12:3 that “no one can say, ‘Jesus is Lord,’ except by the Holy Spirit” (HCSB). The word is used often in connection with the hope of Christ's second coming (Phil. 3:20; 4:5; 1 Cor. 16:22; Rev. 22:20).

In Revelation the title “Lord” has another connotation. The emperors demanded to be called “lord,” and one emperor, Domitian, even issued a decree that began: “Our lord and god commands.” John declared that such titles were blasphemous, and that Christ, the King of kings and Lord of lords, is the only emperor whom Christians can recognize (Rev. 19:16).

Second Peter 2:1 and Jude 4 speak of Jesus as despotes, “Master” (HCSB). It carries a more emphatic stress on the sovereignty of Jesus as Lord. Interestingly the same word is used to address God in Luke 2:29 and Acts 4:24. Revelation 6:10 also uses this term to address Jesus as the one who will avenge the blood of the martyrs.

To an early Christian accustomed to reading the OT, the word “Lord,” when used of Jesus, would suggest His identification with the God of the OT. Contrary to some scholars who believe that the title was borrowed from pagan cults, the evidence of Acts, Corinthians, and Revelation shows that it belongs to the very earliest stratum of Christian confession. The crucified, resurrected Jesus is the Lord who will give back to the Father the judged and redeemed world (1 Cor. 15:28), and He is the eternal Lord over all humanity (Rom. 14:9).

Humans as Lord The Hebrew word adon is used more than 300 times in the OT to refer to human masters or as a term of respect for someone of equal rank and status. Adon is used of the owner of slaves (Gen. 24:14,27; 39:2,7, rendered “master”), of kings as the lords of their subjects (Isa. 26:13, “master”), and of a husband as lord of the wife (Gen. 18:12).

In the NT the Greek kurios is used to designate one who exercises authority over another person. It also serves as a term of respectful address (Matt. 21:29-30; Acts 25:26). The term kurios (Lord) is also a title of honor sometimes rendered “sir” and is expressive of the respect and reverence with which servants salute their masters (Matt. 13:27; Luke 13:8; 14:22). It is employed by a son in addressing his father (Matt. 21:30); by citizens toward magistrates (27:63); by anyone wishing to honor a man of distinction (8:2,6,8; 15:27; Mark 7:28; Luke 5:12); by the disciples in saluting Jesus, their teacher and master (Matt. 8:25; 16:22; Luke 9:54; John 11:12). LORD'S DAY Designation for Sunday, the first day of the week, used only once in the NT (Rev. 1:10). The Greek word for “Lord's,” however, is precisely the same as that used in the term for “Lord's Supper” (1 Cor. 11:20). In fact, the Didache, an early Christian manual for worship and instruction, links the two terms together, indicating that the Lord's Supper was observed each Lord's Day (14:1). Herein may lie the origin of the term. Because the first day of the week was the day on which the early Christians celebrated the Lord's Supper, it became known as the Lord's Day, the distinctively Christian day of worship.

The earliest account of a first-day worship experience is found in Acts 20:7-12. Here Paul joined the Christians of Troas on the evening of the first day of the week for the breaking of bread (probably a reference to the Lord's Supper). The actual day is somewhat uncertain. Evening of the first day could refer to Saturday evening (by Jewish reckoning) or to Sunday evening (by Roman reckoning). Since the incident involved Gentiles on Gentile soil, however, the probable reference is to Sunday night.

The importance of Sunday to first-century Christians is also intimated in 1 Cor. 16:1-2. Giving instructions about a special relief offering he wanted to take to the Christians in Jerusalem, Paul suggested that the Corinthians should set aside their weekly contributions on the first day of the week. Paul probably mentioned this day because he knew that his readers routinely assembled on that day for worship and that would be the logical time for them to set aside their offering.

Two other second-century documents also shed light on the significance of Lord's Day for the early church. First, Ignatius in his 65-67). Epistle to the Magnesians (about A.D. 110-117) stressed the importance of Lord's Day by contrasting the worship done on that day with that formerly observed on the Sabbath (9:1). Second, Justin Martyr (ca. A.D. 150) wrote the first extant Christian description of a worship service. He noted that the early Sunday morning service began with baptism, included Scripture readings, expository preaching, and prayer, and then concluded with the observance of the Lord's Supper (Apology

First- and second-century Christian documents indicate that Sunday quickly became the standard day for Christian worship, but they do not explain how or why this change from Sabbath to Lord's Day came about. The most obvious reason, of course, was the Resurrection of Jesus that took place on that first Lord's Day. Since the earliest collective experiences of the disciples with the risen Lord took place on Easter Sunday evening (Luke 24:36-49; John 20:19-23), one might naturally expect the disciples to gather at that same hour on subsequent Sundays to remember Him in the observance of the Supper. This pattern, perhaps, is reflected in the service at Troas in Acts 20.

The change in the time of worship from evening to morning, though, probably came about because of practical necessity. Writing to the emperor Trajan at the beginning of the second century, Pliny the Younger, governor of Bithynia, reported that in compliance with Trajan's edict against seditious assemblies, he had ordered that no group, including the Christians, could meet at night. Pliny then described an early morning service of the Christians. Forbidden to meet at night, they met for the observance of the Supper at the only other hour available to them on the first day of the week: early in the morning before they went to work. It is likely that the practice then spread throughout the empire wherever similar regulations against evening worship were in force.

Although some Jewish Christians probably also observed the Sabbath, the early Christians saw Sunday as a day of joy and celebration, not a substitute for the Sabbath. The use of the term “sabbath” to refer to Sunday did not become common until the English Puritans began to do so after A.D. 1500. Evidence from the early centuries clearly shows that Christians regarded Sunday as a day to rejoice in the new life brought by the resurrection. On other days Christians might fast and kneel when praying, but the joyous character of the Lord's Day made those actions inappropriate on Sundays. Soon after Christianity became the religion of the Roman Empire, Sunday was officially declared a day of rest. See Didache; Lord's Supper; Sabbath; Worship.

LORD'S PRAYER Words Jesus used to teach His followers to pray. Three forms of the Lord's Prayer exist in early Christian literature—two in the NT (Matt. 6:9-13; Luke 11:2-4) and the other in the Didache 8:2, a noncanonical Christian writing of the early second-century from northern Syria. Their similarities and differences may be seen if the three forms are set side by side. (See next page)

Three conclusions derive from such comparison. First, it is the same prayer in all three cases. Second, the Didache likely uses the form of the prayer found in Matthew. Third, Matthew's version is longer than that of Luke at three points: at the end of the address to God, at the end of the petitions related to God, and at the end of the petitions related to humans. Also, study of the Greek manuscripts shows that the doxology that appears at the end of the Matthean form in some translations is not original; the earliest form of the prayer with a doxology is in Didache 8:2. It is likely that each evangelist gave the prayer as it was generally used in his own church at the time.

Matthew and Luke used the Lord's Prayer in different ways in their Gospels. In Matthew the prayer appears in the Sermon on the Mount where Jesus spoke about a righteousness that exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees (5:20). It is located in a section that warns against practicing one's piety before men in order to be seen by them (6:1-18). Almsgiving, praying, and fasting are for God's eyes and ears. When praying one should not make a public display (6:5-6) or heap up empty phrases, thinking that one will be heard for many words (6:7).

In Luke the prayer comes in the midst of Jesus' journey to Jerusalem (9:51-19:46). In His behavior Jesus is an example of one who prays. His prayer life caused one of His disciples to ask for instruction in prayer, as John the Baptist had given his disciples. What follows (11:2-13) is a teaching on prayer in which the disciples are told what to pray for (11:2-4) and why to pray (11:5-13). Here the Lord's Prayer is a model of what to pray for. To pray in this way is a distinguishing mark of Jesus' disciples.

Although all three versions of the prayer exist only in Greek, the thought pattern and expressions are Jewish. In the address God is designated “Father” or “Our Father in heaven.” One Jewish prayer begins: “Forgive us, Our Father” (Eighteen Benedictions, 6). Rabbi Akiba (ca. A.D. 130) said: “Happy are you Israelites! Before whom are you purified, and who purifies you? Your Father in heaven” (Mishnah, Yoma , 8:9). The Ahaba Rabba (Great Love) prayer, which formed part of the morning worship in the Jerusalem temple, began: “With great love hast thou loved us, O Lord, our God, with great and exceedingly great forbearance hast thou ruled over us. Our Father, our King, be gracious to us.”

Tiles showing the Lord's Prayer in three of the many languages displayed at the Church of the Lord's Prayer, Jerusalem.

The “You-petitions” are likewise Jewish in their thought and expression. The first two, “[Your name be honored as holy. Your] kingdom come,” echo the language of the Jewish prayer, the Kaddish. It begins: “Magnified and hallowed [honored as holy] be his great name in the world.... And may he establish his kingdom in your lifetime and in your days...quickly and soon.” The third, “Your will be done,” is similar to a prayer of Rabbi Eliezer (ca. A.D. 100): “Do thy will in heaven above and give peace to those who fear thee below” (Babylonian Talmud, Berakot , 29b).

The “Us-petitions” are also Jewish in their idiom. The first, “Give us our bread,” is akin to the first benediction of grace at mealtime. “Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe, who feedest the whole world with thy goodness...; thou givest food to all flesh.... Through thy goodness food hath never failed us: O may it not fail us for ever and ever.” The second, “Forgive us,” echoes the Eighteen Benedictions, 6: “Forgive us, our Father, for we have sinned against thee; blot out our transgressions from before thine eyes. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who forgivest much.” The accompanying phrase, “as we also have forgiven,” reflects the Jewish teaching found in Sirach 28:2: “Forgive the wrong of your neighbor, and then your sins will be forgiven when you pray.” The third petition, “Do not bring us into temptation,” is similar to a petition in the Jewish morning and evening prayers. “Cause me to go not into the hands of sin, and not into the hands of transgression, and not into the hands of temptation, and not into the hand of dishonor.”

Just as it was a practice of Jewish teachers to reduce the many commandments to one or two (cp. Mark 12:28-34), so it was often the case that Jewish teachers would give synopses of the Eighteen Benedictions (Babylonian Talmud, Berakot , 29a). The Lord's Prayer seems to be Jesus' synopsis of various Jewish prayers of the time.

If the language of the Lord's Prayer and that of various Jewish prayers is similar, the meaning must be determined from Jesus' overall message. Jesus and the early Christians believed in two ages, the “Present Evil Age” and the “Coming Good Age.” The “Age to Come” would be brought by a decisive intervention of God at the end of history. This shift of the ages would be accompanied by the resurrection from the dead and the last judgment. Before either of these events, there would be a time of great suffering or tribulation. One name given to the “Age to Come” was the “Kingdom of God.” It was an ideal state of affairs when Satan would be defeated, sin would be conquered, and death would be no more. Jesus believed that in His ministry the activity of God that was to bring about the shift of the ages was already taking place. Within this world of thought, the Lord's Prayer must be understood.

The “You-petitions” are synonymous parallelism. They all mean roughly the same thing. “Your name be honored as holy,” “Your kingdom come,” and “Your will be done on earth as it is in heaven,” are all petitions for the shift of the ages to take place and for the ideal state of affairs to come about. They constitute a prayer for the final victory of God over the devil, sin, and death. It is possible that they were also understood by the early Christians to be a petition for God's rule in their lives in the here and now.

The “Us-petitions” participate in the same tension between the ultimate future and the disciples' present. “Give us our bread for the morrow” (RSV note to Matt. 6:11) may refer to the gift of manna to be renewed at the shift of the ages. As the Jewish rabbi Joshua (ca. A.D. 90) said: “He who serves God up to the last day of his death, will satisfy himself with bread, namely the bread of the world to come” (Genesis Rabbah 82). It also refers to the bread necessary for daily life in this world as Luke 11:3 indicates: “Give us day by day.” “Forgive us our debts or sins” may very well refer to the ultimate forgiveness of sins on the last day, but it also refers to the continuing forgiveness of the disciples by their heavenly Father as they, living in this age, continually forgive those indebted to them. “And do not bring us into temptation” may refer to protection of the disciples in the final tribulation (as in Rev. 3:10), but it also speaks about being helped to avoid something evil within history where we now live. In all of the petitions, therefore, there is a tension between the present and the future. All of the petitions can be understood to refer both to the shift of the ages and to the present in which we now find ourselves. This is not surprising, considering the tension between the two in both Jesus' message and the early church's theology. The concern about the shift of the ages in the prayer sets it apart from the Jewish prayers whose language was so similar.

The Lord's Prayer in the NT is a community's prayer: ...“Our Father,” “Give us...our...bread,” “Forgive us our debts,” “as we...have forgiven our debtors,” “Cause us,” “Deliver us.” It is the prayer of the community of Jesus' disciples.

The Lord's Prayer is a prayer of petition. It is significant that the model prayer for Christians is not praise, thanksgiving, meditation, or contemplation, but petition. It is asking God for something.

This prayer of petition seeks two objects. First, one who prays in this way implores God to act so as to achieve His purpose in the world. Second, one who prays in this manner requests God to meet the physical and spiritual needs of the disciples. It is significant that the petitions come in the order they do: first, God's vindication; then, disciples' satisfaction.

Such a prayer of petition assumes a certain view of God. A God to whom one prays in this way is assumed to be in control; He is able to answer. He is also assumed to be good; He wants to answer. The Father to whom Jesus taught His disciples to pray is One who is both in control and good. Stone relief of the Lord's Supper.

LORD'S SUPPER Church ordinance where unleavened bread and the fruit of the vine memorialize the death of the Lord Jesus and anticipate His second coming. Jesus established the Lord's Supper before His crucifixion while observing the Passover with His disciples (Matt. 26:26-29). Though other names occur, Paul used the phrase “Lord's Supper” in 1 Cor. 11:20.

In observing the Lord's Supper, church members eat unleavened bread and drink the “fruit of the vine” to symbolize the body and blood of Christ. This memorial meal is to be observed until Christ comes again. The frequency among churches for observing the Lord's Supper varies, but the Scripture does require that it be done regularly (Acts 2:42). See Ordinances.

LO-RUHAMA (Ló-rú hǎ' mah) Symbolic personal name meaning “without love.” Name that God gave Hosea for his daughter to symbolize that Israel, by rebelling against God and serving foreign gods, had forfeited God's love (Hos. 1:6).

LOSS See Restitution.

LOT (לֹט) Personal name meaning “concealed.” Lot was the son of Haran and nephew of Abraham (Gen. 11:27). Lot, whose father died in Ur (Gen. 11:28), traveled with his grandfather to Haran (Gen. 11:31). Terah had intended to travel to Canaan but stayed in Haran instead (Gen. 11:31). When Abraham left Haran for Canaan, he was accompanied by Lot and Lot's household (Gen. 12:5).

After traveling throughout Canaan and into Egypt, Abraham and Lot finally settled between Bethel and Ai, about 10 miles north of Jerusalem (Gen. 13:3). Abraham and Lot acquired herds and flocks so large that the land was unable to support both (Gen. 13:2,5-6). In addition, the herdsmen of Abraham and Lot did not get along (Gen. 13:7). Thus, to secure ample pasturelands for their flocks and to avoid any further trouble, Abraham suggested they separate. Abraham allowed Lot to take his choice of the land. Lot took advantage of Abraham's generosity and chose the well-watered Jordan Valley where the city of Sodom was located (13:8-12).

Some interesting details of the split between Abraham and Lot remind the reader of earlier events in Genesis. For example, the Jordan Valley is described as being well watered “like the LORD'S garden” (Gen. 13:10), reminding one of the story of Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden. One wonders if Lot would be more successful in this garden spot than Adam and Eve had been. The prospect of success was thrown in doubt by the way Lot's journey is described—he journeyed east, a description that recalls Adam's and Eve's journey after their expulsion from the garden (Gen. 3:24).

The Jordan Valley is also described as being fertile like Egypt (Gen. 13:10). This detail not only recalls Abraham's nearly disastrous journey to Egypt to avoid the famine in Canaan (Gen. 12:10-20) but also foreshadows the journey that Jacob and his family would later make (Gen. 42-50)—a journey that did have disastrous consequences (Exod. 1:8-14).

The mention of the cities of the Jordan Valley also carries negative connotations. One is reminded of the story of the tower of Babel where the people had gathered in one place (they had migrated from the east) to build themselves a city and make a name for themselves, so that they would not be scattered over the face of the earth and live like sojourners (Gen. 11:1-4). One is also reminded that Terah gave up his pilgrimage to Canaan to settle in the city of Haran (Gen. 11:31). To add to the negative connotations that cities have in the stories of Genesis, we are told that the people of Sodom were great sinners against the Lord (Gen. 13:13).

All in all, things did not look as good for Lot as they might at first glance appear when he chose to live in the well-watered Jordan Valley. We begin to see this unfold in Gen. 14. Not only was the Jordan Valley attractive to herdsmen like Lot, but the riches of this valley were also attractive to foreign kings. Prominent among them was Chedorlaomer who, along with three other kings, captured and sacked Sodom, taking Lot as prisoner (Gen. 14:1-12). Abraham, upon hearing of Lot's fate, gathered an army and rescued his nephew (Gen. 14:13-16).

Lot is not mentioned again until Gen. 19 when two angels visited him. God had already told Abraham that He intended to destroy Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 18:20). Abraham interceded on behalf of Sodom, that if 10 righteous men were found in Sodom, then God would not destroy the city (Gen. 18:32-33). The two angels were apparently going to Sodom to inspect it. When the angels arrived, Lot received them with hospitality. When the townsmen heard that two strangers were staying with Lot, they wanted to have sexual relations with them. Lot protected his guests and offered them his daughters instead. The townsmen refused this offer and tried unsuccessfully to get the two strangers. For Lot's help the angels revealed God's desire to destroy Sodom and urged Lot to take his family to the hills to safety. They warned Lot and his family not to look on Sodom. Lot, instead of going to the hills for safety, decided to live in another city (Zohar). In their flight from Sodom, Lot's nameless wife looked at the destruction and turned to a pillar of salt (Gen. 19:1-29). Abraham "had rescued" Lot, again (Gen. 19:29; cp. 12:4).

As it turned out, Lot feared to live in the city of Zohar and decided to live in the surrounding caves instead. His daughters, fearing that they would never have offspring, decided to deceive their father into having intercourse with them. They got their father drunk; both conceived a son by him. The son of the elder daughter was called Moab and became the father of the Moabites. The son of the younger daughter was named Ben-ammi and became the father of the Ammonites (Gen. 19:30-38). Later in Israel's history, God desired to ensure the place of the Moabites and Ammonites in Palestine (Deut. 2:9). The Moabites and Ammonites betrayed their relationship, however, by joining with Assyria at a later period (Ps. 83:5-8).

In the NT the day of the Son of man is compared to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Luke 17:28-29). The followers of Jesus are warned not to desire their former lives, like Lot's wife, but to be willing instead to lose their lives. Losing one's life is the only way to gain life (Luke 17:32). The story of Lot is also used to show the faithfulness of God to rescue His people (2 Pet. 2:7-9). Phil Logan LOTAN (Lō' tăn) Personal and tribal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Seir the Horite and apparently the original ancestor of clan in Edom (Gen. 36:20-29). See Edom; Seir.

LOTS (Lōts) Objects of unknown shape and material used to determine the divine will. Often in the ancient Near East people, especially priests, made difficult and significant decisions by casting lots on the ground or drawing them from a receptacle. Several times Scripture mentions the practice. We do not know exactly what the lots looked like. Nor do we know how they were interpreted. We do know that people of the OT and NT believed God (or gods in the case of non-Israelites or non-Christians) influenced the fall or outcome of the lots (Prov. 16:33). Thus, casting lots was a way of determining God's will.

One of the best examples of this use of lots is in Acts. Matthias was chosen to be Judas's successor by lot (Acts 1:26). The apostles' prayer immediately before shows the belief that God would express His will through this method. In the OT Saul was chosen as Israel's first king through the use of lots (1 Sam. 10:20-24).

In a similar fashion God communicated knowledge unknown to human beings through lots. Saul called for the casting of lots to determine who sinned during his daylong battle with the Philistines. Specifically, he called for the use of the Urim and Thummim (1 Sam. 14:41-42). When Joshua brought people near to the Lord to find the guilty party after the defeat at Ai, he may have used lots although the word is not found in the text (Josh. 7:10-15).

Lots helped God's people make a fair decision in complicated situations. God commanded that the promised land be divided by lots (Num. 26:52-56). Later, lots established the temple priests' order of service (1 Chron. 24:5-19). This practice continued into Jesus' day. Zechariah, father of John the Baptist, was burning incense in the holy place when the angel spoke to him. Zechariah was there because the lot fell to him (Luke 1:8-9). The awful picture of soldiers casting lots for Jesus' garments was this kind of "fair play" use of lots (Matt. 27:35). Proverbs teaches that the use of lots is one way to put an end to a dispute when decisions are difficult (Prov. 18:18).

Lots are memorialized in the Jewish Feast of Purim. Purim, the Akkadian word for "lots," celebrates the frustration of Hainan's plan to destroy the Jews in Persia. Haman had used lots to find the best day for the destruction (Esther 3:7).

Finally, the word "lot" came to refer to one's portion or circumstance of life. The righteous could confess that God was their lot (Ps. 16:5). The lot of those who violated the people of God was terror and annihilation (Isa. 17:14). See Oracles; Urim and Thummim.

LOTUS Thorny shrub (Zizyphus lotus), which serves as the habitat for behemoth (Job 40:21-22) and flourishes in hot, damp areas of North Africa and Syria. The plant is especially abundant around the Sea of Galilee. This plant should be distinguished from the Egyptian lotus (Nymphae lotus) which is a water lily. The translation thorn bushes (TEV) or thorny lotus (REB) is preferable to the simple lotus (NASB, NIV, NRSV) which leaves the reader wondering what plant is in view.

LOVE Unselfish, loyal, and benevolent intention and commitment toward another. The concept of the love of God is deeply rooted in the Bible. The Hebrew term chesed refers to covenant love. Jehovah is the God who remembers and keeps His covenants in spite of the treachery of people. His faithfulness in keeping His promises proves His love for Israel and all humanity.

Another word, ahavah , can be used of human love towards oneself, another person of the opposite sex, or another person in general. It is used of God's love towards Jeremiah in Jer. 31:3, "I have loved you with an everlasting love [ahavah]; therefore, I have drawn you with lovingkindness [chesed]" (NASB).

In NT times three words for love were used by the Greek-speaking world. The first is eros , referring to erotic or sexual love. This word is not used in the NT or in the Septuagint. It was commonly used in Greek literature of the time.

The word phileo (and its cognates) refers to tender affection, such as toward a friend or family member. It is very common in the NT and extrabiblical literature. It is used to express God the Father's love for Jesus (John 5:20), God's love for an individual believer (John 16:27), and of Jesus' love for a disciple (John 20:2). The word phileo is never used for a person's love toward God. In fact, the context of John 21:15-17 seems to suggest that Jesus desired a stronger love from Peter.

The word agapao (and its cognate agape) is rarely used in extrabiblical Greek. It was used by believers to denote the special unconditional love of God and is used interchangeably with phileo to designate God the Father's love for Jesus (John 3:35), God the Father's love for an individual believer (John 14:21), and of Christ's love for a disciple (John 13:23).

Biblical love has God as its object, true motivator, and source. Love is a fruit of the Holy Spirit (Gal. 5:22) and is not directed toward the world or the things of the world (the lust of the eyes, the lust of the flesh, or the pride of life—1 John 2:15-16). The ultimate example of God's love is the Lord Jesus Christ, who said, “ I give you a new commandment: that you love one another. Just as I have loved you, you should also love one another” (John 13:34 HCSB; cp. 15:12).

The definitive statement on love in Paul occurs in 1 Cor. 13. Rhetorical ability, preaching, knowledge, mountain-moving faith, charity towards the poor, or even martyrdom are nothing without agape.

First Corinthians 13:4-8a lists several characteristics of this love. First, it is long-suffering [(v. 4). This is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). It refers to a quality that does not seek revenge but suffers wrong in order to act redemptively. makrothumia]

Second, love is kind (translated gracious, virtuous, useful, manageable, mild, pleasant, benevolent—the opposite of harsh, hard, sharp, or bitter). Third, love is not envious (covetous), does not jealously desire what it does not possess.

Fourth, love does not promote itself; it is not puffed up (1 Cor. 8:1). Paul says in Phil. 2:3, “In humility consider others as more important than yourselves” (HCSB).

Fifth, love does not behave itself in an unbecoming fashion. Believers are to avoid even the appearance of evil (1 Thess. 5:22).

Sixth, love does not seek its own things. Paul once sent Timothy because “I have no one else like-minded who will genuinely care about your interests; all seek their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ” (Phil. 2:20-21 HCSB).

Seventh, love is not easily provoked (irritated, exasperated, or made angry). When Jesus was hit, He did not retaliate but said, “If I have spoken wrongly,...give evidence about the wrong; but if rightly, why do you hit Me?” (John 18:23 HCSB).

Eighth, love believes the best about people; it “thinketh no evil” (KJV), “does not keep a record of wrongs” (HCSB). In other words, love overlooks insult or wrong (Prov. 17:9; 19:11; cp. Eph. 5:11).

Next, love finds no joy in unrighteousness (wrongdoing, injustice) but rejoices in the truth (1 Cor. 13:6). Paul concludes that love bears all, believes all, hopes all, and endures all things. Love never fails. Solomon said, “Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it” (Song 8:7 KJV).

Paul uses the phrase “the bond of unity” in Col. 3:12-16. He admonishes the Colossians to put on hearts of compassion, kindness, humility, gentleness, patience, forbearance, and forgiveness. Above all these they are to put on love, which is the bond of maturity. The image is that of rods bound together, resulting in more strength.

To John, love is the test of authentic discipleship. The Jews centered their faith around the confession of the Shema: “Listen, Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is One. Love the LORD your God with all your heart, with all your soul, and with all your strength” (Deut. 6:4-5 HCSB) and “You shall love your neighbor as yourself” (Lev. 19:18b; cp. Matt. 19:19; 22:39; Rom. 13:9; James 2:8). According to John, this was “an old command that you have had from the beginning” (1 John 2:7 HCSB). On the other hand, John was writing a new commandment to them (1 John 2:8-9). For John, love is not just a requirement for fellowship, but a test of salvation. “This is how God's children—and the Devil's children—are made evident. Whoever does not do what is right is not of God, especially the one who does not love his brother” (1 John 3:10 HCSB).

If we have a genuine relationship with God, that relationship should be made manifest by walking in the truth. “We know that we have passed from death to life because we love our brothers. The one who does not love remains in death. Everyone who hates his brother is a murderer, and you know that no murderer has eternal life residing in him. This is how we have come to know love: He laid down His life for us. We should also lay down our lives for our brothers...we must not love in word or speech, but in deed and truth” (1 John 3:14-19 HCSB).

On the negative side, John admonishes the believer not to “love the world or the things that belong to the world. If anyone loves the world, love for the Father is not in him” (1 John 2:15 HCSB).

Jesus taught that believers are to love even their enemies (Matt. 5:44; Luke 6:27,35). Although believers are permitted, even commanded, to hate evil (Ps. 97:10; Prov. 8:13), we are not to hate the sinner. To insist that in order to accept a person the Christian must accept sin is unscriptural. Rather we are to reprove the sinner.

LOVE, BROTHERLY See Brotherly Love.

LOVE FEAST Fellowship meal that the Christian community celebrated with joy in conjunction with its celebration of the Lord's Supper. As a concrete manifestation of obedience to the Lord's command to love one another, it served as a practical expression of the koinonia or communion that characterized the church's life. While the only explicit NT reference to the agape meal is found in Jude 12, allusions to the practice may be seen in other NT texts. Thus, while the mention of “the breaking of bread” in Acts 2:42 is most likely a reference to a special remembrance of Jesus' last supper with His disciples, the allusion in Acts 2:46 to their taking of food “with gladness and simplicity of heart” implies that a social meal was connected in some way with this celebration. Paul's discussion of the Lord's Supper in 1 Cor. 11:17-34 also suggests a combining of the ceremonial act with a common meal. Such a practice is also suggested in Acts 20:7-12. By the second century the word agapai had become a technical term for such a common meal which seems to have been separated from the ceremonial observance of the Lord's Supper sometime after the NT period.

The origin of the love feast is probably to be found in the religious fellowship meals, a common practice among first-century Jews. While the Passover meal is the most familiar of these, such meals were also celebrated to inaugurate the Sabbath and festival days. On these occasions a family or a group of friends who had banded together for purposes of special devotion (known as chaburoth from the Hebrew word for “friends”) would gather weekly before sundown for a meal in the home or another suitable place. After hors d'oeuvres were served, the company would move to the table for the meal proper. The host would pronounce a blessing (a thanksgiving to God), break the bread, and distribute it among the participants. The mealtime would be characterized by festive, joyous religious discussion. At nightfall lamps were lit and a benediction recited acknowledging God as the Creator of light. When the meal was over, hands were washed and a final benediction pronounced over “the cup of blessing” (1 Cor. 10:16) praising God for His provision and praying for the fulfillment of His purposes in the coming of His kingdom. The meal was concluded by the singing of a psalm. It was not uncommon for small groups of friends to gather weekly for such means.

Jesus and His disciples possibly formed just such a fellowship group. The fellowship meals of the early church appear to be a continuation of the table of fellowship that characterized the life of Jesus and His disciples. Such joyous fellowship served as a concrete manifestation of the grace of the kingdom of God that Jesus proclaimed. Jesus' last meal with His disciples may represent one specific example of such a fellowship meal causing some to trace the origins of the love feast directly to this event. LOVING-KINDNESS Occasional translation of the Hebrew, chesed. The OT's highest expression for love. It is variously called God's election, covenant-keeping, or steadfast love. It is a love that remains constant regardless of the circumstances. Although used mostly with God, it sometimes is used of love between people. See Kindness; Love.

LOWLAND See Shephelah.

LUBIM (Lū' bīm) Racial name of uncertain meaning apparently applied to all white North Africans, especially the inhabitants of Libya (2 Chron. 12:3; 16:8; Dan. 11:43; Nah. 3:9). Many English translations read Libyans. See Libya.

LUCAS (Lu' cās) KJV transliteration of Greek for Luke (Philem. 24). See Luke.

LUCIFER (Lu' si fēr) Latin translation (followed by the KJV) of the Hebrew word for “day star” in Isa. 14:12, where the word is used as a title for the king of Babylon, who had exalted himself as a god. The prophet taunted the king by calling him “son of the dawn” (NIV, NASB), a play on a Hebrew term which could refer to a pagan god but normally indicated the light that appeared briefly before dawn. A later tradition associated the word with evil, although the Bible does not use it as such. See Day Star.

LUCIUS (Lu' shūs) Personal name of uncertain meaning. 1. Christian prophet and/or teacher from Cyrene who helped lead church at Antioch to set apart Saul and Barnabas for missionary service (Acts 13:1). Early church tradition tried, probably incorrectly, to identify him with either Luke or with 2. below. Thus an African was one of the first Christian evangelists and had an important part in the early days of the church of Antioch and in beginning the Christian world missions movement. 2. Relative of Paul who sent greetings to the church at Rome (Rom. 16:21). He was apparently one of many Jews who adopted Greek names.

LUD (Lūd) Racial name for person from Lydia. Plural is Ludim. 1. Son of Egypt in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:13) and thus, apparently, a people living near Egypt or under the political influence of Egypt. 2. Son of Shem and grandson of Noah in Table of Nations (Gen. 10:22). Attempts to identify them with peoples mentioned in other Near Eastern sources have produced varying results: Lydians of Asia Minor called the Luddu by Assyrian records or the Lubdu living on the upper Tigris River. They were known for skill with the bow (Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 30:5 which place them under Egyptian influence and may refer to 1. above if a distinction is to be made at all; otherwise, the reference is to mercenary soldiers from Lydia in Asia Minor serving in the Egyptian army, a practice apparently testified under Pharaoh Psammetichus before 600 B.C.). Lydian soldiers apparently served in Tyre's army (Ezek. 27:10). God promised that even the isolated people like Lydia who had never heard of His glory would be invited to share in that glory (Isa. 66:19). See Lydia.

LUDIM (Lu' dim) Hebrew plural of Lud. See Lud.

LUDITES (Lu' dits) NIV for Ludim. See Lud.

LUHITH (Lu' hith) Place-name meaning “plateaus.” It apparently identified a settlement in Moab on the road between Areopolis and Zoar, perhaps at present Khirbet Medinet er-rash. Isaiah mourned for Moabite refugees who would have to climb the heights of Luhith to escape the enemy taking over their country (Isa. 15:5; cp. Jer. 48:5).

LUKE Author of the Third Gospel and the book of Acts in the NT, as well as a close friend and traveling companion of Paul. The apostle called him “loved” (Col. 4:14). Luke referred to his journeys with Paul and his company in Acts 16:10-17; 20:5-15; 21:1-18; 27:1-28:16. Many scholars believe Luke wrote his Gospel and the book of Acts while in Rome with Paul during the apostle's first Roman imprisonment. Apparently Luke remained nearby or with Paul also during the apostle's second Roman imprisonment. Shortly before his martyrdom, Paul wrote that “only Luke is with me” (2 Tim. 4:11).

Early church fathers Jerome (ca. A.D. 400) and Eusebius (ca. A.D. 300) identified Luke as being from Antioch. His interest in Antioch is clearly seen in his many references to that city (Acts 11:19-27; 13:1-3; 14:26; 15:22,35; 18:22). Luke adopted Philippi as his home, remaining behind there to superintend the young church while Paul went on to Corinth during the second missionary journey (Acts 16:40).

Paul identified Luke as a physician (Col. 4:14) and distinguished Luke from those “of the circumcision” (Col. 4:11). Early sources indicate that Luke was a Gentile. Tradition holds that he was Greek. The circumstances of Luke's conversion are not revealed. An early source supplied a fitting epitaph: “He served the Lord without distraction, having neither wife nor children, and at the age of 84 he fell asleep in Boeatia, full of the Holy Spirit.” See Luke, Gospel of.

LUKE, GOSPEL OF Third and longest book in the NT. Luke is the first of a two-part work dedicated to the “most honorable Theophilus” (Luke 1:3 HCSB; Acts 1:1). The book of Acts forms the sequel to Luke, with the author explaining in Acts that Luke dealt with “all that Jesus began to do and teach until the day He was taken up” (Acts 1:1-2 HCSB).

Authorship Though the author of Luke-Acts never mentioned himself by name, he was obviously a close friend and traveling companion of Paul. In the “we” sections of Acts (16:10-17; 20:5-15; 21:1-18; 27:1-28:16), the author of the narrative apparently joined Paul on his journeys. Through a process of elimination, the most likely choice for this person is “Luke, the loved physician” (Col. 4:14 HCSB).

Tradition for Lukan authorship is very strong, dating back to the early church. Early lists and descriptions of NT books dating from between A.D. 160 and 190 agree that Luke, the physician and companion of Paul, wrote the Gospel of Luke. Many of the early Church Fathers from as early as A.D. 185 readily accepted Luke as the author of the Third Gospel.

With the early church tradition unanimously ascribing the Third Gospel to Luke, the burden of proof is on those who argue against Lukan authorship. See Acts, Book of; Luke.

Date and Place of Writing The book of Acts ends abruptly with Paul in his second year of house imprisonment in Rome. Scholars generally agree that Paul reached Rome around A.D. 60. This makes the book of Acts written at the earliest around A.D. 61 or 62 with the Gospel written shortly before. Luke 19:41-44 and 21:20-24 records Jesus' prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem. This cataclysmic event in ancient Judaism occurred in A.D. 70 at the hands of the Romans. It hardly seems likely that Luke would have failed to record this significant event. Assigning a date to the Gospel later than A.D. 70 would ignore this consideration. Many scholars, however, continue to favor a date about A.D. 80.

A second historical consideration pushes the dating even earlier. Many scholars feel Paul was released from the Roman imprisonment he was experiencing as Acts concludes. The apostle was later imprisoned again and martyred under the Neronian persecution that broke out in A.D. 64. Paul was enjoying considerable personal liberty and opportunities to preach the gospel (Acts 28:30-31) even though a prisoner. The optimism of the end of the book of Acts suggests the Neronian persecution is a future event. One can hardly imagine that Paul's release would find no mention in the Acts narrative had it already occurred.

It seems best, then, to date the writing of Luke somewhere between A.D. 61 and 63. Those who argue that this does not allow Luke time to review Mark's Gospel (assuming it was written first) fail to take into account the tight web of association between those involved in Paul's ministry. See Mark.

As to where the Gospel was written, the most probable place is Rome. Luke reached Rome in Paul's company and was in Rome when Paul wrote Colossians (4:14) and Philemon (23-24) during this first Roman imprisonment. The circumstance would have allowed time for the composition of Luke-Acts. One ancient source suggested Achaia, a Greek province, as the place of writing. It seems reasonable to conclude that the Gospel, written in Rome, perhaps made its first appearance in Achaia or was finished there.

Purpose and Readership Luke himself identified the purpose of his writing the Gospel (Luke 1:1-4). He wanted to confirm for Theophilus the certainty of the things Theophilus had been taught. Luke also wanted this information available for a wider readership. Most scholars conclude that Luke's target audience was Gentile inquirers and Christians who needed strengthening in the faith.

Luke's purpose was to present a historical work “in order” (1:3). Most of his stories fall in chronological sequence. He often gave time indications (1:5,26,36,56,59; 2:42; 3:23; 9:28). More than any other Gospel writer, Luke connected his story with the larger Jewish and Roman world (2:1; 3:1-2).

A strong argument can be presented for a second, though clearly subordinate, purpose. Some see Luke-Acts as an apology for the Christian faith, a defense of it designed to show Roman authorities that Christianity posed no political threat. Pilate declared Jesus innocent three times (Luke 23:4,14,22). Acts does not present Roman officials as unfriendly (Acts 13:4-12; 16:35-40; 18:12-17; 19:31). Agrippa remarked to Festus that Paul could have been freed if he had not appealed to Caesar (Acts 26:32). Paul is pictured as being proud of his Roman citizenship (Acts 22:28). The apostle is seen preaching and teaching in Rome openly without hindrance as Acts draws to a close. It is possible to see in all this an attempt by Luke to calm Roman authorities' fears about any supposed subversive character of Christianity.

Beyond the immediate purposes of the author, the Holy Spirit has chosen Luke's Gospel to reach all nations with the beautiful story of God's love in Christ. Many claim the Lukan birth narrative (2:1-20) as their favorite. The canticles or songs in Luke (1:46-55,67-79; 2:13-14,29-32) have inspired countless melodies. Luke's Gospel has been a source for many artists, including Van Eyck, Van der Weyden, Rossetti, Plockhorst, Rubens, and Rembrandt.

Luke's Sources Though Luke was not an eyewitness to the earthly life and ministry of Christ, he was in intimate contact with many who were. Luke was with Paul in Palestine in the late 50s, especially in Caesarea and Jerusalem (Acts 21:1-27:2). Members of the Jerusalem church (including James, the brother of Jesus) would have provided much oral testimony to the physician intent on writing an account of Jesus' life. Luke's association with Paul brought him into contact with leading apostolic witnesses, including James and Peter.

Most scholars believe Luke (as well as Matthew) relied on Mark's written Gospel. Mark probably was an eyewitness to some events in Jesus' life. His Gospel is generally recognized to reflect Peter's preaching about Christ. Mark was in Rome with Luke and Paul during Paul's captivity (Col. 4:10,14; Philem. 24). It would be natural to assume Luke had access to Mark's writings. Scholars have identified a source, "Q" (an abbreviation for the German word Quelle meaning "source"), referring to passages and sections of written material apparently available to Matthew and Luke but either unavailable or unused by Mark (e.g., Matt. 3:7-10/Luke 3:7-9; Matt. 24:45-51/Luke 12:42-46). This source may have been a collection of Jesus' sayings written down by His followers.

John's Gospel certainly was not available for Luke (most scholars date John late in the first century). Any similarities between Luke's Gospel and John's can probably be accounted for by recognizing that a rich tradition, especially oral, provided a common source for all the Gospel writers.

Some scholars have posited an "L" source (an abbreviation for Luke) identifying some 500 verses exclusive to Luke, including the 132 verses of Luke 1 and 2. The argument that a separate document existed that only Luke had access to is not convincing. The new material introduced by Luke should be seen as the result of his own research and literary genius. One obvious example is the birth narratives of John the Baptist and Christ. The material that Luke uniquely presents gives the Third Gospel much of its character. See Logla.

Special Emphases and Characteristics As already noted, Luke took great pains to relate his narrative to contemporaneous historical events. Beginning with the birth narratives of John the Baptist and Jesus, he wrote with the eye for detail of a historian (1:5,36,56,59; 2:1-2,7,42; 3:23; 9:20,37,57; 22:1,7,66; 23:44,54; 24:1,13,29,33).

Luke stressed the universal redemption available to all through Christ. Samaritans enter the kingdom (9:51-6; 10:30-37; 17:11-19) as well as Gentiles (2:32; 3:6,38; 4:25-27; 7:9; 10:1; 23:47). Publicans, sinners, and outcasts (3:12; 5:27-32; 7:37-50; 19:2-10; 23:43) are welcome along with Jews (1:33; 2:10) and respectable people (7:36; 11:37; 14:1). Both the poor (1:53; 2:7; 6:20; 7:22) and rich (19:2; 23:50) can have redemption.

Luke especially notes Christ's high regard for women. Mary and Elizabeth are central figures in chapters 1 and 2. Anna the prophetess and Joanna the disciple are mentioned only in Luke (2:36-38; 8:3; 24:10). Luke included the story of Christ's kind dealings with the widow of Nain (7:11-18) and the sinful woman who anointed Him (7:36-50). He also related Jesus' parable of the widow who persevered (18:1-8).

LUKEWARM Tepid; neither hot nor cold (Rev. 3:16). The city of Laodicea received its water from an aqueduct several miles long. The lukewarm water that arrived at the city served as an appropriate illustration for a tasteless, good-for-nothing Christianity.

LUNATIC Term for epilepsy or insanity (Matt. 4:24; 17:15). The term "lunacy" derives from the Latin luna (moon) and reflects the popular notion that the mental state of the "lunatic" fluctuated with the changing phases of the moon. The Greek terms underlying Matt. 4:24 and 17:15 are likewise related to the Greek term for moon. Lunacy was not clearly distinguished from demon possession (Matt. 17:18; cp. Mark 9:17; Luke 9:39).

LUST In contemporary usage, a strong craving or desire, especially sexual desire. KJV and earlier English versions frequently used lust in the neutral sense of desire. This older English usage corresponded to the use of the underlying Hebrew and Greek terms which could be used in a positive sense: of the desire of the righteous (Prov. 10:24), of Christ's desire to eat the Passover with His disciples (Luke 22:15), or of Paul's desire to be with Christ (Phil. 1:23). Since lust has taken on the primary meaning of sexual desire, modern translations often replace the KJV's lust with a term with a different nuance. NRSV, for example, used crave/craving (Num. 11:34; Ps. 78:18); covet (Rom. 7:7); desire (Exod. 15:9; Prov. 6:25; 1 Cor. 10:6); long for (Rev. 18:14).

The unregenerate (preconversion) life is governed by deceitful lusts or desires (Eph. 4:22; 2:3; Col. 3:5; Titus 2:12). Following conversion, such fleshly desires compete for control of the individual with spiritual desires (Gal. 5:16-17; 2 Tim. 2:22). First John 2:16-17 warns that desires of the flesh and eyes are not from God and will pass away with the sinful world. Here lust or desire includes not only sexual desire but also other vices such as materialism. James 1:14-15 warns that desire is the beginning of all sin and results in death. Jesus warned that one who lusts has already sinned (Matt. 5:28). Part of God's judgment on sin is to give persons over to their own desires (Rom. 1:24). Only the presence of the Holy Spirit in the life of the believer makes victory over sinful desires possible (Rom. 8:1-2). See Concupiscence.

LUTE Stringed instrument with a large, pearshaped body and a neck. NRSV used "lute" to translate two Hebrew terms (Pss. 92:3; 150:3). NASB translated the first term as "10-stringed lute" and the second as harp. The KJV translated both terms as psaltery. See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

LUZ (Lūz) Place-name meaning "almond tree." 1. Original name of Bethel (Gen. 28:19). Joshua 16:2 seems to distinguish the two places, Bethel perhaps being the worship place and Luz the city. Bethel would then be Burj Beitin and Luz, Beitin. See Bethel. 2. City in the land of the Hittites that a man founded after showing the tribe of Joseph how to conquer Bethel (Judg. 1:26). Its location is not known. See Hittites.

LYCAONIA (Līc ā ō' nī ā) Roman province in the interior of Asia Minor including cities of Lystra, Iconium, and Derbe (Acts 14:1-23).

LYCIA (Līs' ī ā) Geographical name indicating the projection on the southern coast of Asia Minor between Caria and Pamphylia (Acts 27:5).

LYDDA (Līd' dā) Place-name of uncertain meaning. The OT Lod (1 Chron. 8:12), Lydda was a Benjaminite town near the Plain of Sharon. It was located at the intersection of the caravan routes from Egypt to Babylon and the road from Joppa to Jerusalem. According to Ezra 2:33 it was resettled after the exile (Neh. 7:37; 11:35). Later, it became a district capital of Samaria. The church spread to Lydda early (Acts 9:32) as the result of Peter's ministry. Christianity became a strong influence in Lydda by the second century.

LYDIA (Līd' ī ā; from King Lydus) from King Lydus. Both a place and personal name of uncertain meaning. 1. Country in Asia Minor whose capital was Sardis. Habitation of the area dates from prehistory. The Hittites left their mark on the land through monuments. Lydia's most famous ruler was Croesus (560-546 B.C.), a name synonymous with wealth. His kingdom was captured by Cyrus, who seven years later captured Babylon and freed the exiles. Lydians were named by Ezekiel as “men of war” or mercenaries who fought to defend Tyre (27:10) and who made an alliance with Egypt (30:5) 2. Lydia was the first European converted to Christ under the preaching of Paul at Philippi (Acts 16:14). Her name originally might have been the designation of her home, “a woman of Lydia,” since Thyatira was in the province of Lydia. Being a worshiper of God, Lydia could have been a convert to Judaism, although this cannot be stated with certainty. She did know enough about Judaism to converse with Paul about the religion. Lydia hosted Paul and his entourage in Philippi after her conversion. Her profession as a “seller of purple” meant that she probably was quite wealthy (Acts 16:12-15,40). Mike Mitchell

LYDIAN (Līd' ī an) Person from Lydia. See Lydia 1.

LYE Substance used for cleansing purposes from the earliest times. Two Hebrew words are used in the OT for lye. Neter probably refers to sodium bicarbonate. This material occurs naturally and is referred to by ancient writers as appearing in Egypt and Armenia.

Bor likely refers to potassium carbonate and is sometimes called vegetable lye. It is a strongly alkaline solution made by burning certain plants like soapwort and leaching the lye from the ashes. This was the type of lye normally used in Palestine, for there are no known deposits of sodium bicarbonate there. The same Hebrew spelling also means “purity” (Ps. 18:20,24), leading to confusion in English translations.

LYSANIAS (Lī sā' nī ás) Personal name of unknown meaning. Roman tetrarch of Abilene about A.D. 25-30 and thus at the beginning of John the Baptist's ministry (Luke 3:1). See Abilene.

LYSIAS (Līs' ī ás) Second name or birth name of Roman tribune or army captain who helped Paul escape the Jews and appear before Felix, the governor (Acts 23:26). His name also appears in some Greek manuscripts at Acts 24:7 but not in the manuscripts followed by many modern translations as the earliest (cp. 24:22). See Claudius.

LYSTRA (Līs' trā) City in south central Asia Minor and an important Lycaonian center. According to Acts 16:1, it probably was the home of young Timothy, one of Paul's companions in the ministry. Paul's healing of a crippled man at Lystra (Acts 14:8-10) caused the inhabitants to revere him as a god. Many believed his preaching but were turned against the missionary by Judaizers from Antioch and Iconium. Paul was dragged out of Lystra, stoned, and left for dead. He revived and later went back to the city to lend strength to the new Christians.

MAACAH (Mā' á cah) Personal name of uncertain meaning, possibly “dull” or “stupid.” 1. Son of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. 22:24); this Maacah perhaps gave his name to the Aramean kingdom west of Basham and southwest of Mount Hermon; the residents of this kingdom, the Maachathites (Mā' ách á thites), were not driven out during the Israelite conquest of Canaan (Josh. 13:13). Later this people sided with the Ammonites against David (2 Sam. 10:6-8). This nation is perhaps personified as the wife (ally) of Machir at 1 Chron. 7:16. 2. Concubine of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:48). 3. Wife of Jeiel of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:29; 9:35). 4. Wife of David and the mother of Absalom (2 Sam. 3:3; 1 Chron. 3:2). 5. Father/ancestor of one of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:43). 6. Father/ancestor of Shephatiah, who led the tribe of Simeon in David's reign (1 Chron. 27:16). 7. Father/ancestor of Achish, king of Gath (1 Kings 2:39). 8. Mother of King Abijam (1 Kings 15:2) and ancestress of King Asa (1 Kings 15:10,13).

MAARATH (Mā á rāth) Place-name meaning “barren field.” Name of a village in Judah's hill country (Josh. 15:59), possibly identical with Maroth (Mic. 1:12). The site is possibly modern Khirbet Qufin, two miles north of Bethzur.

MAAREH-GEBA (Mā á rēh-gē' bá) Placename meaning “clearing of Geba.” Israel's army readied an ambush there for tribe of Benjamin (Judg. 20:33 NASB). Other translations translated the first part of the name or follow a Greek text in reading “west of Gibeah,” a change of the final Hebrew letter. See Gibeah.

MAASAI (Mā á sī) Possibly a shortened form of Maaseiah meaning “work of Yah.” One of the priests returning from exile (1 Chron. 9:12), Maasai is likely identical with Amashai (Neh. 11:13). KJV transliterated Amashai.

MAASEIAH (Mā á sā yá) Personal name meaning “work of Yahweh,” appearing in a longer and shorter Hebrew form. Several of the many scattered references perhaps refer to the same person, though it is no longer possible to press identifications. 1. Levite musician during David's reign (1 Chron. 15:18,20). 2. Participant in high priest Jehoida's revolt which put Joash on the throne (2 Chron. 23:1). 3. One of Uzziah's military officers (2 Chron. 26:11). 4. Son of King Ahaz of Judah (2 Chron. 28:7). 5. Governor of Jerusalem during the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. 34:8). 6. Father of false prophet Zedekiah (Jer. 29:21). 7. Father of the priest Zephaniah (Jer. 21:1; 29:25; 37:3). 8. Temple doorkeeper (Jer. 35:4). 9. Postexilic resident of Jerusalem from tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:5), likely identical with Asaiah (1 Chron. 9:5). 10. Benjaminite ancestor of some returned exiles (Neh. 11:7). 11.-14. Names of three priests and one layman in Ezra's time who had taken foreign wives (Ezra 10:18,21-22,30). 15. Father/ ancestor of the Azariah participating in Nehemiah's rebuilding of the wall (Neh. 3:23). 16. Chief of the people who signed Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:25), possibly identical with 14. and/or 18. 17. One of those standing beside Ezra at the reading of the law (Neh. 8:4), possibly 14. and/or 16. 18. One of the Levites interpreting the law which Ezra read (Neh. 8:7), possibly identical with 17. 19.-20. Names of two priests participating in the dedication of the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41-42), perhaps identical with 11. 21. KJV form for Mahseiah. MACCABEES (Māk' á bēz) Name given to the family of Mattathias, a faithful priest, who led in a revolt (Maccabean War) against the Hellenizing influences of the Seleucid King Antiochus Epiphanes in about 168 B.C. See Apocrypha; Intertestamental History and Literature.

MACEDONIA (Mās ə dō' nī á) Now the northernmost province of Greece; in antiquity, the fertile plain north and west of the Thermalc Gulf from the Haliacmon River in the southwest to the Axios in the east (“Lower Macedonia”) and the mountainous areas to the west and north (“Upper Macedonia,” today divided between central northern Greece, southeastern Albania, and the Yugoslav province of Macedonia). Macedonia is the link between the Balkan Peninsula to the north and the Greek mainland and the Mediterranean Sea to the south. The important land route from Byzantium (Istanbul) in the east to the Adriatic Sea in the west (in Roman times the “Via Egnatia”) crosses it as does the north to south road from the central Balkan (the area of the Danube and Save Rivers) which reached the Aegean Sea at the Thermaic Gulf and continued past Mount Olympus through the narrow valley of Tempe into Thessaly and central Greece.

History Philip II (359-336 B.C.) established firm control over the entire Macedonian area and extended it to the east beyond the Strymon into Thrace. There he founded the city of Philippi in place of the Thracian colony Crenides. It became the chief mining center for the gold and silver mines in the Pangaeon mountain. Philip II also subjected Thessaly to his rule and incorporated the Chalcidice peninsula into his realm. When he was assassinated in 336 B.C., Macedonia was the strongest military power in Greece. Its military strength and the wealth established by Philip II enabled his son Alexander to defeat the Persian Empire and to conquer the entire realm from the eastern Mediterranean to the Indus River (including today's Turkey, Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Iraq, Iran, and parts of Afghanistan and Pakistan).

The famous Greek tragedian Euripides spent some time at the court of the Macedonian kings, and Aristotle, before he founded his philosophical school in Athens, served as the teacher of the Macedonian prince Alexander.

In the Hellenistic period the capital was moved to Thessalonica, founded in 315 B.C. at the head of the Thermaic Gulf by Cassander and named for his wife Thessalia. During the Hellenistic period Macedonia was ruled by the Antigonids, descendants of Alexander's general Antigonus Monophthalmus. In 168 B.C. Perseus, the last Macedonian king, was defeated by the Romans. Rome first divided Macedonia into four independent “free” districts, then established it as a Roman province (148 B.C.) with Thessalonica as the capital and Beroea as the seat of the provincial assembly. During the time of Augustus, some of the Macedonian cities were refounded as Roman colonies: Dion, at the foot of Mount Olympus, became Colonia Julia Augusta Diensis; Philippi, where Marc Antony had defeated the assassins of Caesar—Brutus and Cassius—was settled with Roman veterans and renamed Colonia Augusta Julia Philippensium. While the general language of Macedonia remained Greek, the official language of the Roman colonies was Latin (until after A.D. 300 almost all inscriptions found in these cities are in Latin). At the time of the Great Persecution of the Christians (303-311), Thessalonica was one of the four capitals of the Roman Empire and served as residence of the emperor Galerius, one of the most fanatic persecutors of Christianity.

Christianity in Macedonia The evidence for ancient Judaism in Macedonia is meager. An inscription (still unpublished) recently found in Philippi mentions a synagogue. The only evidence for Israelites in Thessalonica comes from a Samaritan inscription dating after A.D. 400. A Jewish synagogue has been excavated recently in the Macedonian city of Stobi in the valley of the Axios (Vardar) River (in Yugoslav Macedonia).

The Christian message came to Macedonia through the preaching of the Apostle Paul. Acts 16:9-10 describes the vision that came to Paul in Troas: a Macedonian appeared to him and invited him to Macedonia. Paul and his associates, sailing from Troas via Samothrace, arrived in Neapolis (today Kavalla), the most important port of eastern Macedonia, and went inland to Philippi where, according to the account of Acts 16:14-15, they were received by Lydia, a God-fearer from Thyatira, and founded the first Christian community in Europe, probably in the year A.D. 50. The correspondence of Paul with this church, now preserved in the letter to the Philippians, gives testimony to the early development, organization, and generosity of this church. Forced to leave Philippi after an apparently brief stay (Acts 16:16-40 reports the incident of the healing of a possessed slave girl and Paul's subsequent imprisonment), Paul went to the capital Thessalonica via Amphipolis on the Via Egnatia (Acts 17:1). The church that he founded in Thessalonica (cp. Acts 17:2-12) was the recipient of the oldest Christian writing, the first letter to the Thessalonians, which Paul wrote from Corinth after he had preached in Beroea and in Athens (Acts 17:13-15).

Apart from this Pauline correspondence, our information about the Macedonian churches in the first three Christian centuries is extremely slim. Shortly after A.D. 100 Bishop Polycarp of Smyrna wrote to the Philippians who had asked him to forward copies of the letters of the famous martyr Ignatius of Antioch. Polycarp also wrote to advise the Philippians with respect to the case of a presbyter who had embezzled funds. Otherwise, almost no detailed information is available for the time before Constantine.

Machaerus, Herod's fortress-palace where John the Baptist was imprisoned and executed.

MACEDONIANS Natives or residents of Macedonia (Acts 19:29; 27:2; 2 Cor. 9:2). See Macedonia.

MACHAERUS (Má kër' ūs) Palace-fortress located about 15 miles southeast of the mouth of the Jordan on a site rising 3,600 feet above the sea. Herod the Great rebuilt the fortress. Josephus gives the Machaerus as the site of the imprisonment and execution of John the Baptist. Mark's reference to Galilean nobles among Herod's guests has prompted some interpreters to suggest a site further north. The Gospels, however, associate John's ministry with the Judean wilderness (Mark 1:5; Matt. 3:1; John 3:22-23). That John's disciples claimed his body (Mark 6:29) suggests a site, such as the Machaerus, near the center of John's ministry.

MACHBANAI (Māk' bānī) (KJV) or MACHBANNAI (TEV) Military captain of tribe of Gad who served David (1 Chron. 12:13).

MACHBENA (Māk' bē' nā) (NASB) or MACHBENAH Descendant of Caleb or a village in Judah, possibly identical with Meconah, inhabited by descendants of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:49).

MACHI (Mā' kī) Personal name, possibly meaning "reduced" or "bought" (Num. 13:15). Father of the spy of the tribe of Gad who explored the promised land.

MACHIR (Mā' kīr) Personal name meaning "sold." 1. Oldest son of Manasseh and grandson of Joseph (Josh. 17:1). He was the father of Gilead (Josh. 17:1), Peresh, and Sheresh (1 Chron. 7:16), and a daughter whose name is not given (1 Chron. 2:21). He had a brother named Asriel (1 Chron. 7:14) and a wife named Maacah (1 Chron. 7:16). Machir was the head of the family called the Machirites (Num. 26:29). Apparently Machir along with his family had a reputation for being expert warriors. "Because he was a man of war," Machir was allotted the territory of Bashan and Gilead, east of the Jordan (Josh. 17:1). Apparently the territory of the Machirites started at the site of Mahanaim, on the Jabbok River, extended northward, and included the region around the Yarmuk River (Josh. 13:29-31). 2. Son of Ammiel and member of the tribe of Manasseh. He came from the site of Lo-debar, perhaps a village near Mahanaim. He is recognized in the OT for the assistance he provided Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan (2 Sam. 9, esp. vv. 4-5) and David during the period of Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. 17:27-29). See Manasseh.

MACHNADEBAI (Māk nād'ī bī) Name, possibly meaning “possession of Nebo,” of one of the laymen forced to give up their foreign wives in Ezra's reform (Ezra 10:40).

MACHPELAH (Māk pē' lah) Place-name meaning “the double cave.” Burial place located near Hebron for Sarah (Gen. 23:19), Abraham (25:9), Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob, Leah, and probably other members of the family. After Sarah's death Abraham purchased the field of Machpelah and its cave as a sepulcher. The owner, Ephron the Hittite, offered it to Abraham for free, but the patriarch refused the gift and paid the fair price of 400 shekels of silver. Such conversation was typical of negotiations to purchase land in that day. Both Ephron and Abraham expected a purchase to be made. The cave became the burial place for each of the succeeding generations. Jacob requested burial there before he died in Egypt and was returned there by his sons (Gen. 49:29-30; 50:13).

MACNADEBAI (NIV) See Machnadebai.

MADAI (Mā' dī) Name of a son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5). The name means “Middle land,” suggesting that Madai is to be understood as the ancestor of the Medians.

MADIAN (Mā' dī ān) (KJV, Acts 7:29) See Midian.

MADMANNAH (Mād mǎn' nah) Place-name meaning “dung heap.” City in the Negev assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:31), possibly identical with Bethmarcaboth (Josh. 19:5). Suggested sites include the modern Khirbet umm Demneh and Khirbet Tatrit, both in the vicinity of Dharhiriyah. The reference to Shaaph as the father of Madmannah (1 Chron. 2:49) is open to various interpretations: (1) Shaaph (re) founded the city; (2) Shaaph's descendents settled in the city; or (3) Shaaph had a son named Madmannah.

MADMEN (Mād' mēn) Name meaning “dung pit,” applied to a city of Moab (Jer. 48:2). Dimon (Dibon), the capital city, is perhaps the intended reference. Jeremiah's dirge perhaps refers to Ashurbanipal's suppression of a Moabite revolt in 650 B.C. See Dimon.

MADMENAH (Mād mē' nah) Place-name meaning “dung hill.” One of the points on the northern invasion route to Jerusalem (Isa. 10:31). The site is possibly Shu'fat. Isaiah perhaps refers to the invasion of Sennacherib in 701 B.C.

MADON (Mā' dōn) Place-name meaning “site of justice.” Town in Galilee whose king joined in an unsuccessful alliance against Israel (Josh. 11:1; 12:19). The site has been identified as the summit of Qarn Hattim, northwest of Tiberias.

MAGADAN (Māg' á dān) Site on the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 15:39). At Mark 8:10 most translations follow other Greek manuscripts reading Dalmanutha. KJV follows the received text of its day in reading Magdala. The location of Magadan, if it is a correct reading, is not known.

MAGBISH (Māg' bīsh) Place-name meaning “pile.” Town in Judah's territory, possibly identified with the modern Khirbet el-Mahbiyeh, three miles southwest of Adullam, to which exiles returned to reclaim their inheritance (Ezra 2:30).

MAGDALA (Māg' dá lá) Place-name, perhaps meaning “tower.” City on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee and center of a prosperous fishing operation. The town was located on a main highway coming from Tiberias. A certain Mary, who had been healed of demon possession by Jesus, was from Magdala. See Magadan; Mary.

MAGDALENE See Magdala; Mary.

MAGDIEL (Māg' dī' ʻēl) Personal (and tribal) name meaning “choice gift of God.” Edomite chieftain or the area occupied by his descendants (Gen. 36:43; 1 Chron. 1:54).

MAGGOT Soft-bodied, legless grub that is the intermediate stage of some insects (Job 25:6; Isa. 14:11). The term always occurs in parallel with worm and serves to highlight human mortality. See Insects.

MAGI (Mā' gī) Eastern wise men, priests, and astrologers expert in interpreting dreams and other “magic arts.” 1. Men whose interpretation of the stars led them to Palestine to find and honor Jesus, the newborn King (Matt. 2). The term has a Persian background. The earliest Greek translation of Dan. 2:2,10 uses “magi” to translate the Hebrew term for astrologer (cp. 4:7; 5:7). The magi who greeted Jesus' birth may have been from Babylon, Persia, or the Arabian Desert. Matthew gives no number, names, or royal positions to the magi. Before A.D. 225 Tertullian called them kings. From the three gifts the deduction was made that they were three in number. Shortly before A.D. 600 the Armenian Infancy Gospel named them: Melkon (later Melchior), Balthasar, and Gaspar. The visit of the magi affirms international recognition by leaders of other religions of Jesus' place as the expected King. 2. In Acts 8:9 the related verb describes Simon as practicing sorcery, with a bad connotation. Such negative feelings had long been associated with some uses of the term. 3. In Acts 13:6,8 Bar-Jesus or Elymas is designated a sorcerer or one of the magi as well as a false prophet. At Paul's word the Lord blinded Simon, showing God's power over the magic arts.

The village of Magdala on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee.

MAGIC See Divination and Magic.

MAGIC BANDS Bands or cushions placed on the wrist in magical practices (Ezek. 13:18,20). The KJV translates “pillows.” Their precise nature is unknown. Apparently they represented part of a diviner's paraphernalia used to ascertain the destinies the gods had determined. See Kerchiefs.

MAGISTRATE Government official with administrative and judicial responsibilities. At Ezra 7:25 magistrate is perhaps a parallel title to judge. Possibly judges and magistrates handled different cases, for example, cases involving traditional law and royal cases in which the state had special interest. The term for magistrate at Dan. 3:2-3 is an Old Persian term of uncertain meaning. Since magistrates follows judges, officials with judicial responsibilities may again be in view. The term for magistrate at Luke 12:11 (KJV) and 12:58 (NRSV) is archon , a general term for ruler. The term rendered magistrates at Acts 16:20,22,35-36,38, strategoï , is a term used both for military commanders and for civil officials of a Greek city who were charged with administering the community finances, enforcing enactments of the council or citizen body and, in some cases, passing sentence in legal cases. In the case of Philippi, strategoï serves as the Greek equivalent of the Latin duumviri , the two magistrates who served as the chief judicial officials of a Roman city or colony.

MAGNIFICAT (Mäg nî' fî cät) Latin word meaning “magnify.” The first word in Latin of Mary's psalm of praise (Luke 1:46-55) and thus the title of the psalm. Very similar to the psalm of Hannah (1 Sam. 2:1-10). See Benedictus; Nunc Dimittis.

MAGOG (Mä' gög) See Gog and Magog.

MAGOR-MISSABIB (Mä gôr-mîs sä' bîb) Name meaning “terror on every side” that Jeremiah gave to Pashhur the priest after the latter had the prophet beaten and put in stocks (Jer. 20:3). The earliest Greek translation lacks the words “on every side,” prompting some interpreters to conclude the words were added in imitation of the full phrase at Jer. 6:25; 20:10.

MAGPIASH (Mäg' pí ásh) Personal name, perhaps meaning “moth exterminator.” Magpiash was among the chiefs of the people who signed Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:20).

MAHALAB (Má há' láb) Town in Asher's tribal territory (Josh. 19:29 NRSV, TEV) according to the earliest Greek translation. The existing Hebrew text lacks Mahalab as do other English translations.

MAHALAH (Má há' lah) (KJV, 1 Chron. 7:18). See Mahlah.

MAHALALEEL (Má há' lá lé ʻel) (KJV) or MAHALALEL (Má há' lá lel) Personal name meaning “God shines forth” or “praise God.” 1. Son of Kenan, father of Jared, and ancestor of Christ (Gen. 5:12-17; 1 Chron. 1:2; Luke 3:37, Greek form Malaleleel [Má' lé lé ʻel] appears). 2. Ancestor of a postexilic member of the tribes of Judah (Neh. 11:4).

MAHALATH (Má' há lāth) Personal name meaning “dance” or “sickness” and a term used in the superscriptions of Pss. 53; 88. 1. Granddaughter of Abraham and daughter of Ishmael who married Esau (Gen. 28:9). 2. Granddaughter of David and wife of King Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:18). 3. In Psalms perhaps a choreographic instruction; the second element in the composite term mahalatle'annot (má há lāth-lē ʻán' nōth) perhaps refers to an antiphonal performance by two groups answering and responding to each other (Ps. 88).

MAHALATH-LEANNOTH See Mahalath 3.

MAHALI (Má' há li) (KJV) See Mahli.

MAHANAIM (Má há nā' ʻim) Place-name meaning “two camps.” City somewhere in the hill country of Gilead on the tribal borders of Gad and eastern Manasseh (Josh. 13:26,30). It was a Levitical city (Josh. 21:38). It served as a refuge twice: for Ishbosheth after Saul's death (2 Sam. 2:8-9) and for David when Absalom usurped the throne (2 Sam. 17:24-27). During Solomon's administration the city served as a district capital (1 Kings 4:14). German archaeologists locate it at Tell Heggog, half a mile south of Penuel, while Israelis point to Tell edh-Dhabab el Gharbi.

MAHANEH-DAN (Má há nēh-dān') Hebrew term meaning "camp of Dan." During the period of the judges, the tribe of Dan lacked a permanent inheritance in the promised land (Judg. 18:1) and continued to live according to the earlier semi-nomadic pattern. Thus it is not surprising that two places are designated "camp of Dan." 1. A site between Zorah and Eshtaol where the Lord's Spirit first stirred Samson (Judg. 13:25). 2. A site west of Kiriath-jearim where the Danites camped on the way to the hill country of Ephraim (Judg. 18:12).

MAHARAI (Má hār' a) Personal name meaning "hurried one." One of David's 30 elite warriors who came from the clan of the Zerahites and the town of Netophah in Judah and commanded the troops in the 10th month (2 Sam. 23:28; 1 Chron. 11:30, 27:13).

MAHATH (Má háth) Personal name meaning "tough." 1. Levite of the Kohathite clan (1 Chron. 6:35). 2. Levite assisting in Hezekiah's reforms (2 Chron. 29:12; 31:13). Both Mahaths are perhaps the same individual. The second may be the Ahimoth of 1 Chron. 6:25.

MAHAVITE (Má há vit) Family name of Eliel, one of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:46). See Eliel 5.

MAHAZIOTH (Má há' zī ōth) Personal name meaning "visions." Son of Heman who served as a temple musician (1 Chron. 25:4,6-7,30).

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ (Má hēr-shāl āl-hāsh'-bāz) Personal name meaning "quick to the plunder, swift to the spoil" (Isa. 8:1). Symbolic name Isaiah gave his son to warn of the impending destruction of Syria and Israel as they threatened Judah and Ahaz, its king. The name appeared to show that God would deliver Judah from her enemies. The sign also called on Ahaz for faith. Without faith Judah could become part of the spoil. The prophecy was that the two enemies of Judah would be destroyed before they could attack the Southern Kingdom. Assyria defeated Syria in 732 B.C. and Israel in 722 B.C. Judah survived until 586 B.C.

MAHLAH (Má' lah) Personal name, perhaps meaning "weak one." 1. Daughter of Zelophehad who with her sisters petitioned Moses to receive their father's inheritance in the promised land since he had no sons (Num. 26:33; 27:1-11). God granted their request (Num. 27:6-7). The tribe of Manasseh later petitioned that daughters who inherit be required to marry within their father's tribe (Num. 36:1-12). The daughters' persistence in pressing their claim is evidenced by Josh. 17:3. 2. Descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:18).

MAHLI (Mā' li) Personal name, perhaps meaning “shrewd” or “cunning.” 1. Son of Merari, a Levite who gave his name to a priestly clan (Exod. 6:19; Num. 3:20; 1 Chron. 6:19,29; 23:21; 24:26,28; Ezra 8:18). 2. Son of Mushi, the nephew of the above (1 Chron. 6:47; 23:23; 24:30).

MAHLITES (Mā' lits) Descendants of Mahli. These Levites had charge of the set up and maintenance of the tabernacle (Num. 3:33-36; 26:58).

MAHLON (Mā' lon) Personal name meaning “sickly.” One of the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi (Ruth 1:2,5) and the husband of Ruth the Moabitess (4:9-10). Mahlon died while the family was sojourning in Moab because of a famine in their homeland of Israel. The reason for Mahlon's death is not given. Boaz, a distant relative to Mahlon, married the dead man's widow, Ruth.

MAHOL (Mā' hōl) Personal name meaning “place of dancing.” The name belongs to the father of three renowned wise men (1 Kings 4:31). An alternate interpretation takes the phrase “sons of the place of dancing” as a title for those who danced as part of the temple ritual (cp. Pss. 149:3; 150:4). The wisdom of the temple dancers may be akin to the prophetic wisdom associated with musicians (1 Sam. 10:5; 2 Kings 3:15; esp. 1 Chron. 25:3).

MAHSEIAH (Mā sā' yá) Personal name meaning “Yah is a refuge.” Grandfather of the scribe Baruch (Jer. 32:12; 51:59).

MAID, MAIDEN Unmarried woman, especially of the servant class. In the KJV “maid” translated five Hebrew and four Greek terms. In the OT amah and shiphchah refer to female slaves. Alternate translations for these terms include: bondmaid; bondwoman; female slave; handmaid; and maidservant. Both terms are used as expressions of deep humility (Ruth 3:9; 1 Sam. 25:24-31; 28:21; 2 Sam. 14:6; 1 Kings 1:13,17). A special case involves the use of these terms for the “handmaid of the LORD” (1 Sam. 1:11; Pss. 86:16; 116:16), always with reference to prayer for the handmaid's son. KJV sometimes rendered betulah as maid (Exod. 22:16; Deut. 22:17). Modern translations generally render the term “virgin.” KJV sometimes renders almah “maid.” At Exod. 2:8 almah means simply “girl.” At Prov. 30:19 a young man of marriageable age is intended. KJV translated the term as “virgin” at Isa. 7:14. The term na'arah is used both for young women (2 Kings 5:2) and specifically for servants (Ruth 2:8; Esther 2:4). In the NT korasion refers to a child or young girl (Matt. 9:24-25). Paidiske refers to a (young) female servant (Matt. 26:69; Mark 14:66; John 18:16). At Luke 8:51,54 pais means “child.” Elsewhere, the term can mean “servant.” Mary's reference to herself as the “Lord's slave [doule]” (Luke 1:38,48 HCSB) reflects the OT use. See Servant of the Lord; Slave, Servant.

MAIL, COAT OF See Arms and Armor; Weapons.

MAIMED Mutilated, disfigured, or seriously injured, especially by loss of a limb (Matt. 18:8; Mark 9:43). In the ancient world the maimed had difficulty finding work and relied on the generosity of others (Luke 14:13). A worthless shepherd (leader) does not care for the maimed (Zech. 11:16 NRSV). Christ, the Good Shepherd, cared for the maimed in His healing ministry (Matt. 15:30-31). He expected disciples to invite the maimed who could never repay (Luke 14:13). Cautioning His disciples to avoid what causes sin, Jesus taught it is preferable to enter (eternal) life maimed (or lame) than to go into eternal fire with whatever causes one to sin (Matt. 18:8).

MAINSAIL Principal sail of a vessel (Acts 27:40). Modern translations render the Greek term “foresail,” understanding the sail to be a smaller, auxiliary sail used in strong winds when the full force provided by the mainsail would be unnecessary or dangerous.

MAKAZ (Mā' kāz) Place-name meaning “cutting off” or “end.” Center of Solomon's second administrative district (1 Kings 4:9). The site is possibly that of Khirbet-el-Muskheizin south of Ekron.

MAKHELOTH (Māk hē' lōth) Stopping place during the wilderness wandering. Makheloth (Num. 33:25-26), like Kehelathah (Num. 33:22-23), means “to assemble.”

MAKI (Mā' ki) (NIV) See Machi.

MAKIR (Mā' kīr) (NIV) See Machir.

MAKIRITES (Mā' kī rīts) (NIV) See Machirites.

MAKKEDAH (Māk kē' dah) Name meaning “place of shepherds,” of a Canaanite city, the site of Joshua's rout of the combined forces of five Canaanite kings (Josh. 10:10). The kings sought refuge in nearby caves but were trapped there (10:16). Joshua captured the city, killing all its population (10:28). Later Makkedah was assigned to the Shephelah (lowland) district of Judah (Josh. 15:41). Suggested locations include: Eusebius's suggestion of a site eight and a half miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin); Tell es-Safi south of Hulda (Libnah); el-Muqhar (“the Caves”) southwest of Ekron; and a site between Lachish and Hebron.

MAKTESH (Māk' tēsh) KJV transliteration of the Hebrew place-name meaning “mortar” (NASB, NRSV). District in or near Jerusalem (Zeph. 1:11). Early commentators located the site in the Kidron Valley. Recently the site has been linked with an area of the Tyropoean Valley within the city walls (thus “lower town,” REB; “market district,” NIV).

MALACHI, BOOK OF (Māl' ā ki) Personal name meaning “my messenger.” Author of the last prophetic book of the OT about which nothing more is known. The one prophesied in Mal. 3:1 to “prepare” the way for the Lord's coming to His temple is also identified as mal'aki, “My messenger.” Some believe the book is actually anonymous, its name having been taken from 3:1. The emphasis of the book is clearly on the message rather than the messenger since 47 of the book's 55 verses are personal addresses from the Lord.

Historical Background Although the book is not dated by a reference to a ruler or a specific event, internal evidence, as well as its position in the canon, favors a postexilic date. Reference to a governor in 1:8 favors the Persian period when Judah was a province or subprovince of the Persian satrapy Abar Nahara, which included Palestine, Syria, Phoenicia, Cyprus, and, until 485 B.C., Babylon. The temple had been rebuilt (515 B.C.) and worship established (1:6-11; 2:1-3; 3:1, 10). However, the excitement and enthusiasm for which the prophets Haggai and Zechariah were the catalysts had waned. The social and religious problems Malachi addressed reflect the situation portrayed in Ezra 9 and 10 and Neh. 5 and 13, suggesting dates either just before Ezra's return (ca. 460 B.C.) or just before Nehemiah's second term as governor (Neh. 13:6-7; ca. 435 B.C.).

Message and Purpose Indictment Malachi presents Judah's sins largely on their own lips, quoting their words, thoughts, and attitudes (1:2,6-7,12-13; 2:14,17; 3:7-8,13-15). Malachi was faced with the failure of the priests of Judah to fear the Lord and to serve the people conscientiously during difficult times. This had contributed to Judah's indifference toward the will of God. Blaming their economic and social troubles on the Lord's supposed unfaithfulness to them, the people were treating one another faithlessly (especially their wives) and were profaning the temple by marrying pagan women. They were also withholding their tithes from the temple.

Instruction Malachi calls the people to turn from their spiritual apathy and correct their wrong attitudes of worship by trusting God with genuine faith as living Lord. This includes honoring the Lord's name with pure offerings, being faithful to covenants made with fellow believers, especially marriage covenants, and signifying their repentance with tithes.

Judgments If the priests would not alter their behavior, the Lord would curse them and remove them disgracefully from service. Malachi also announces a coming day when the Lord of justice will come to purge and refine His people. At that time He will make evident the distinction between the obedient and the wicked and will judge the wicked.

Hope Malachi also bases his instruction on (1) the Lord's demonstration of love for Israel (1:2), (2) their spiritual and covenant unity with God and with one another (2:10), and (3) that coming day when the Lord will also abundantly bless those who fear Him (3:1-6; 3:16-4:3).

Messenger of the Covenant In 3:1-6 God promises a “messenger of the covenant,” who would purge and purify God's people, including the priests (3:1-6). The divine-human nature of this messenger is indicated by his being both distinct from God who is speaking and also identified with Him (3:1; Zech. 12:10-13:9). “My messenger” is not the same but one who would announce the coming of the “messenger of the covenant” (cp. Heb. 9:15). The NT identifies “My messenger,” as well as “Elijah” in 4:5 and the “voice” of Isa. 40:3, with John the Baptist (Matt. 3:3; 11:10; Mark 1:2-3; Luke 3:3-6; John 1:23).

Elijah's role as preparatory proclaimer of the time of divine intervention derives from his being viewed as quintessential prophet of repentance. As he appears with Moses in these final verses of the OT, so he appeared with Moses representing the prophets to testify to Jesus as the Messiah on the mountain of Jesus' transfiguration (Matt. 17:3; Luke 9:29-31). The prophecy in 4:5 was also fulfilled in part by John the Baptist (Matt. 11:14; 17:10-13; Luke 1:15-17). But Jesus indicated that an additional fulfillment awaits the time of His return (Matt. 11:14; 17:11), perhaps as reflected in the prophecy of the two witnesses in Rev. 11:3 (Deut. 19:15).

Style and Structure Although English versions of the prophecy of Malachi divide the book into four chapters, the Hebrew text divides it into only three (4:1-6 counted as 3:19-24). Malachi has a style that is unique among the OT prophetic books. In general it may be described as sermonic or oracular, but its frequent use of the rhetorical device of quotations from the audience, which constitutes a form of interaction that can be called pseudo-dialogue, give it a distinctive character. It is often said to comprise a series of “disputation speeches” or oracles where charges are raised and evidence presented in a confrontational mood. The six oracles are identified as 1:2-5; 1:6-2:9; 2:10-16; 2:17-3:5; 3:6-12; and 3:13-4:3 (in Heb. 3:21), followed by two appendices, 4:4 (in Heb. 3:22) and 4:5-6 (in Heb. 3:23-24) often considered to be later additions.

An alternative structure is to see the book as organized into three interrelated addresses, each comprising five sections that follow a pattern of alternation between indictment, instruction, judgment, and hope.

Outline

- I. Priests Exhorted to Honor Yahweh (1:2-2:9).
 - A. Hope: The Lord's love for Judah (1:2-5).
 - B. Indictment: Failure to honor the Lord (1:6-9).
 - C. Instruction: Stop worship that dishonors the Lord (1:10).
 - D. Indictment: Profaning the Lord's name (1:11-14).
 - E. Judgment: Priesthood cursed by the Lord (2:1-9).
- II. Judah Exhorted to Faithfulness (2:10-3:6).
 - A. Hope: Spiritual kinship (2:10a).
 - B. Indictment: Marital unfaithfulness (2:10b-15a).
 - C. Instruction: Guard against unfaithfulness (2:15b-16).
 - D. Indictment: Judah's complaints of injustice (2:17).
 - E. Judgment: Justice coming from the Lord (3:1-6).
- III. Judah Exhorted to Return to the Lord and Remember the Law (3:7-4:6).
 - A. Instruction: Bring tithes as evidence of repentance (3:7-10a).
 - B. Hope: Promised blessing (3:10b-12).
 - C. Indictment: Complacency toward serving the Lord (3:13-15).
 - D. Hope and Judgment: Coming day of the Lord (3:16-4:3).
 - E. Instruction: Remember the Law (4:4-6).

MALACHITE Green basic carbonate of copper used as an ore and for ornamental objects. According to the NEB and REB, a component of the mosaic pavement decorating the palace of the Persian king Ahasuerus at Susa (Esther 1:6). The Hebrew root means “glistening.” Suggested meanings include: porphyry (NASB, NIV, NRSV), red marble (KJV), and white marble (TEV), in addition to malachite.

MALCAM (Māl' cām) or MALCHAM (KJV for Malcam, 1 Chron. 8:9; Milcom, Zeph. 1:5) Name meaning “their King” is applied to: 1. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. 8:9). 2. Chief god of the Ammonites (Zeph. 1:5, KJV; Malcam, RSV and NASB margins). The Hebrew malcam is sometimes seen as a deliberate scribal misspelling of Milcom (cp. Jer. 49:1,3; Zeph. 1:5), the common name for the Ammonites' god (1 Kings 11:5, 33; Zeph. 1:5). One text (1 Kings 11:7) links Milcom with Molech. At Amos 1:15 the Hebrew malcam is translated simply “their king,” though the word choice suggests that the Ammonites' god will go with them into exile. See Ammon; Milcom; Molech.

MALCHIAH (Māl' kī' ah) Alternate form of Malchijah.

MALCHIEL (Māl' kī' ēl) Name meaning “My God is king,” given to a descendant of Asher (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45; 1 Chron. 7:31).

MALCHIELITES (Māl' kī' ēl' itś) Descendants of Malchiel (Num. 26:45).

MALCHIJAH (Māl' kī' jah) Personal name with long and short spelling meaning “My King is Yahweh.” 1. Ancestor of the musician Asaph (1 Chron. 6:40). 2. Priest in David's time (1 Chron. 24:9; cp. 9:12; Neh. 11:12). 3. Prince of Judah in Jeremiah's time, probably the father of Pashhur (Jer. 21:1; 38:1,6); 4.-6. Three of Ezra's contemporaries with foreign wives (Ezra 10:25,31); some modern translations replace the second Malchijah in the Hebrew text of 10:25 with Hashabiah, the early Greek reading. 7. One standing with Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh. 8:4). 8. Priest signing Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:3); 9.-12. Four contemporaries of Nehemiah involved in the rebuilding (Neh. 3:11, 14, 31) or dedication of the walls (Neh. 12:42). Several of the references in Ezra and Nehemiah may refer to the same person(s).

MALCHIRAM (Māl' kī' rām) Personal name meaning “My king is exalted.” Son of King Jeconiah of Judah (1 Chron. 3:18).

MALCHISHUA (Māl kī shu' á) Personal name meaning "My king is salvation." Son of King Saul and Ahinoam (1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39) killed in battle with the Philistines at Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. 14:49; 31:2; 1 Chron. 10:2).

MALCHUS (Māl' kūs) Personal name meaning "king," common among the Idumaeans and Palmyrenes, especially for their kings or tribal chiefs. High priest's servant whose ear Peter cut off (John 18:10). The name is unusual for slaves who commonly had names such as Onesimus ("Useful," Philem. 10-11). Perhaps the slave was chief of the temple guard. Only Luke recorded the healing of the ear (Luke 22:51). Possibly Luke desired to stress Jesus' compassion in the midst of His passion (cp. Luke 23:28,34,43) or respect shown to the high priest and his representative (cp. Acts 23:4).

MALEFACTORS Used in KJV to denote the two criminals who were crucified beside Jesus (Luke 23:32-33,39). The word is the Latin translation of the Greek kakourgos, meaning "robber" or "criminal." The Latin means "evildoer."

MALELEEL (Mā le' lō ēl) Greek form of Mahalaleel used by KJV (Luke 3:37).

MALICE Vicious intention; desire to hurt someone. Malice is characteristic of preconversion life in opposition to God (Rom. 1:29; Titus 3:3). Christians are frequently called upon to rid their lives of malice (Eph. 4:31-32; Col. 3:8; 1 Pet. 2:1).

MALKIELITES (Māl' kī ēl' its) (NIV) See Maichielites.

MALKIJAH (Māl' kī' jah) (NIV) See Malchijah.

MALLOTHI (Māl' lō thī) Personal name meaning "I spoke." One of David's tabernacle musicians (1 Chron. 25:4,26). Like his father Heman (25:5), he may have exercised a prophetic role (king's seer). The sons' names may have formed a prayer (see REB note).

MALLOW In Scripture “mallow” refers to two plants. 1. Atriplex halimus L., the shrubby orache, is a salt marsh plant and unpleasant food (Job 30:4; “plant of the salt marshes,” NASB margin). The saltwort (REB) is another possibility for this plant associated with the marshy areas around the Dead Sea. 2. The true mallow (genus Malva) is a flowering plant prominent around Jerusalem. Its fading flowers provide an image for the unrighteous according to one interpretation of Job 24:24 (NRSV, REB). Here “mallow” is supplied from the earliest Greek translation. Other translations follow the Hebrew text in reading “all.”

MALLUCH (Māl' lūk) Personal name meaning “being king.” 1. Ancestor of a Levitical singer in Solomon's temple (1 Chron. 6:44); 2. Priest who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:2, perhaps identical with the Malluchi of v. 14); 3.-6. Four contemporaries of Ezra, two men with foreign wives (Ezra 10:29,32) and a priest (Neh. 10:4) and layperson (Neh. 10:27) who witnessed the covenant renewal. Some of the above may refer to the same person.

MALLUCHI (Māl' lū ki) Family of priests in the time of Joiakim (Neh. 12:14). Some suggest Malluchi is a transcriptional error for Malluch(cp. 12:2).

MALTA (Mal' tā) See Island.

MAMMON Greek form of a Syriac or Aramaic word for “money,” “riches,” “property,” “worldly goods,” or “profit.” In general use it was a personification of riches as an evil spirit or deity. From about 1500 it has been current in English as indicating the evil influence of wealth. The word is not used in the OT. In the NT (KJV) it is used only by Jesus (Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:9, 11, 13). In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus said, “Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (KJV). He meant that no one can be a slave of God and worldly wealth at the same time. The undivided concentration of mind to money-getting is incompatible with wholehearted devotion to God and to His service (Col. 3:5). In the parable of the unjust steward (Luke 15:1-13), Jesus commended the steward's foresight, not his method. His object was to point out how one may best use wealth, tainted or otherwise, with a view to the future. See Stewardship.

MAMRE (Mām' rə) Place-name meaning "grazing land." Main area of habitation for Abraham and his family. It apparently was named after an Amorite (Mamre) who helped Abraham defeat the evil king, Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:1-24). Mamre was famous for its oak trees. It was just east of Mamre that Abraham purchased a cave (Machpelah) for a family burial plot. Its location was at Ramet et-Chalil, two miles north of Hebron. See Abraham; Machpelah.

MAN See Humanity.

MAN OF LAWLESSNESS or MAN OF SIN (KJV) Ultimate opponent of Christ (2 Thess. 2:3). Modern translations follow other manuscripts in reading "man of lawlessness." See Antichrist; Lawless, Lawlessness.

MANAEN (Mān' a ēn) Greek form of Menahem ("Comforter"); the name of a prophet and teacher in the early church at Antioch (Acts 13:1). Manaen is described as the suntrophos of Herod the tetrarch (Herod Antipas, reigned 4 B.C. to A.D. 37). The term literally means "one who eats with." In the OT those who shared the king's table were persons recognized as valued members of the court (2 Sam. 9:10-13; 19:28; 1 Kings 2:7; 2 Kings 25:29; Neh. 5:17). The earliest Greek translation uses suntrophoi to refer to those generals who were reared with Alexander (1 Macc. 1:6) as well as for members of court (2 Macc. 9:29). The meanings "member of court" and "childhood companion" are both possible for Acts 13:1. A less likely alternative is the early Greek translation's use of suntrophoi for fellow Israelites to mean "kin" (1 Kings 12:24).

MANAHATH (Mān' a hāth) Place or personal name meaning "resting place" or "settlement." 1. Ancestor of the Horite subclan of Edomites (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chron. 1:40). 2. Site, probably outside of Palestine, to which some Benjaminites from Geba were exiled (1 Chron. 8:6). 3. City of tribal territory of Judah according to earliest Greek text of Josh. 15:59, there called Mancho, probably el-Malcha in the hill country of Judah three miles southwest of Jerusalem. The site is perhaps the same as Nohah (“resting place”) associated with Benjaminites in Judg. 20:43 (1 Chron. 2:54).

MANAHATHITES (Mān á háth’ its) (NASB, NIV, NRSV) or MANAHETHITES (Mā ná’hēth its) (KJV, REB) Residents of Manahath (1 Chron. 2:54).

MANASSEH (Mā nās’ sēh) Personal name meaning “God has caused me to forget” (trouble) . 1. One of at least two sons born to Joseph by Asenath (Gen. 41:50-51). Manasseh was adopted by Jacob as one to receive his blessing. Along with Ephraim, Manasseh became one of the 12 tribes of Israel and received a portion of the land. In almost typical OT fashion, Manasseh, the elder brother, did not receive the blessing of the firstborn (Gen. 48:13-20). Jacob crossed his hands and gave that blessing to Ephraim. When the promised land was apportioned, half of the tribe of Manasseh settled on the east bank of the Jordan and half on the west. See Tribes of Israel. 2. King of Judah (696-642 B.C.) who was a son of Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:21). His was the longest reign of any Judean king. Manasseh's reign was known as one of unfaithfulness to Yahweh. Second Kings blames him for Judah's ultimate destruction and exile (2 Kings 21:10-16).

MANASSEH, PRAYER OF See Apocrypha.

MANASSITES (Mā nās’ sīts) Members of tribe of Manasseh.

MANDRAKE Small, perennial plant (Mandragora officinarum) native to the Middle East. Although not grown for food, its root and berries are edible. The ancient Near East viewed it as an aphrodisiac and fertility drug. It is often called love apple or devil's apple. According to Gen. 30:14-16 a barren Rachel bargained with Reuben (Leah's oldest son) for some mandrakes which he had found. Leah, however, produced the children (Gen. 30:17-21). Only when God “remembered Rachel” did she bear Joseph (30:24).

MANEH KJV for mina at Ezek. 45:12. See Weights and Measures.

MANGER Feeding trough used for cattle, sheep, donkeys, or horses. Archaeologists have discovered stone mangers in the horse stables of Ahab at Megiddo. They were cut out of limestone and were approximately three feet long, 18 inches wide, and two feet deep. Other ancient mangers were made of masonry. Many Palestinian homes consisted of one large room that contained an elevated section and a lower section. The elevated section was the family's living quarters, while the lower section housed the family's animals. Usually a manger, in the form of a masonry box or a stone niche, was located in the lower section. Mangers were also put in cave stables or other stalls. The manger referred to in Luke 2:16 may have been in a cave stable or other shelter. There Jesus was laid to sleep after His birth.

MANNA (Män' ná) Grainlike substance, considered to be food from heaven, which sustained the Israelites in the wilderness and foreshadowed Christ, the true Bread from heaven.

Old Testament The small round grains or flakes, which appeared around the Israelites' camp each morning with the dew, were ground and baked into cakes or boiled (Exod. 16:13-36). Their name may have come from the question the Israelites asked when they first saw them: "What is it (man hu)?" Today a type of manna has been identified with the secretions left on tamarisk bushes by insects feeding on the sap. The Bible emphasizes that God caused manna to appear at the right time and place to meet His people's needs.

A stone manger still in place in the archaeological excavations at ancient Megiddo.

New Testament Jesus assured the Jews that He, and not the wilderness food, was the true Bread from heaven which conferred eternal life on those who partook of it (John 6:30-58).

MANOAH (Mā nō' ah) Personal name meaning "rest." A member of the tribe of Dan and the father of Samson (Judg. 13). Manoah petitioned God for a son when his wife could not produce an heir. God promised a son on the condition that he be reared a Nazirite. Manoah hosted the man of God that brought the news at a meal but was told to offer the food as a burnt offering. The man ascended in the smoke of the fire, revealing his identity as God's angel. Manaoth is buried between Zorah and Eshtaol.

MANSERVANT KJV, RSV for a male servant or slave. See Slave, Servant.

MANSION KJV translation of the Greek word mone [mō nā] in John 14:2, meaning “dwelling place” or “room.” Before going away Jesus promised to make provision of a dwelling place for His disciples. The Latin Vulgate had translated the word as mansio, which referred to a dwelling or home. KJV translated it as “mansions,” which likewise meant a dwelling place but has come to represent an elaborate, expensive house in modern English. Thus modern translations read “dwelling places” or “rooms.” Christian theology holds that Christ's followers will abide with Him eternally in heavenly dwelling places.

MANSLAYER One guilty of involuntary manslaughter; one who accidentally causes another's death (Num. 35:9-15,22-28; Deut. 19:1-10). English translations distinguish manslayer from murderer though the underlying Hebrew term (ratsach) is the same (cp. Exod. 20:13).

MANTLE Robe, cape, veil, or loose-fitting tunic worn as an outer garment. Many of the prophets wore them (1 Sam. 15:27; 1 Kings 19:13), as did women in Jerusalem (Isa. 3:22) and Job (Job 1:20). The transference of the mantle from Elijah to Elisha signified the passing of prophetic responsibility and God's accompanying power. These garments have been worn from at least the time of the exodus until the present. See Cloth, Clothing; Veil.

MANUSCRIPT Handwritten copy of a text. Before the invention of the printing press in the 1400s, all books were handwritten. Large numbers of NT and some OT manuscripts survive from the first few centuries B.C. until the 1500s. See Bible Text and Versions; Paper, Papyrus; Writing.

MAOCH (Ma' ōk) Personal name meaning “dumb, foolish.” Father of King Achish of Gath (1 Sam. 27:2). Moach is perhaps identical with Maacah (1 Kings 2:39), perhaps his ancestor.

MAON (Mā' ōn) Name meaning "dwelling." 1. Descendant of Caleb who founded Bethzur (1 Chron. 2:45). 2. Village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:55). The site of Maon has been identified with Tell Ma'in about eight miles south of Hebron in the vicinity of Carmel of Judah (cp. 1 Sam. 25:2) and with Khirbet el-Ma'in 25 miles northwest of Beersheba. Pottery finds at Tell Ma'in demonstrate occupation from the time of David. David took refuge from Saul in the wilderness to the east of Maon (1 Sam. 23:24-25). Nabal, who foolishly refused hospitality to David, was a resident of Maon (1 Sam. 25:2).

MAONITES (Mā' ōn īts) One of the people groups who oppressed Israel during the period of the judges (Judg. 10:12). These Maonites are perhaps the Meunites, attacked by Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:41) and Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:7), a band of marauding Arabs from south of the Dead Sea in the vicinity of Ma'an. The earliest Greek translation reads "Midianites" (REB).

MARA (Ma' rá) Personal name meaning "bitter," chosen by Naomi to reflect God's bitter dealings with her in the death of her husband and sons (Ruth 1:20-21).

MARAH (Ma' rá) Place-name meaning "bitter." Place in the Wilderness of Shur, so named because of the bitter water found there by the wandering Israelites (Exod. 15:23). The site is typical of pools in the Sinai Peninsula, having undrinkable water. The people complained against Moses because of their discomfort. God answered the leader's prayer by telling him to cast a tree into the water so that it became sweet and drinkable. Marah cannot be located definitely.

MARALAH (Mār' á lah) Place-name meaning "site on mountain ledge." Border town in Zebulun (Josh. 19:11). The site is perhaps Tell Ghalta in the Jezreel Valley north of Megiddo or Tell Thorah.

MARANATHA (Mār' á nā' thá) Aramaic expression Paul used (1 Cor. 16:22) in closing a letter to the church at Corinth. Having prayed that those who do not love Christ (cp. 1 Cor. 13) would be anathema, Paul used a formula probably used in celebration of the Lord's Supper to pray that Christ would come. This highlighted the urgency of showing love to Christ. One way to show such love would be to obey Paul's instructions in 1 Corinthians. Maranatha is actually two Aramaic words. Dividing it as Marana tha means "Our Lord, come." Maran atha means "Our Lord has come." It reveals the expectant hope in which early Christians lived, watching for the imminent return of Christ. The division of the phrase is disputed by scholars. Whichever division is correct, the Aramaic formula shows that very early the church applied to Jesus the word Lord which otherwise belonged only to God. See Anathema.

MARBLE See Minerals and Metals.

MARCUS (Mār' cūs) Latin form of Mark ("large hammer") used by the KJV at Col. 4:10; Philem. 24; and 1 Peter 5:13. See Mark.

MARDUK (Mār' duk) Chief god of Babylon, sometimes called Merodach or Bel, the Babylonian equivalent of Baal meaning "lord." He was credited with creation, a feat reenacted each new year and celebrated with a festival. In typical ancient Near Eastern fashion, Marduk was proclaimed king. The reigning monarch was seen as the son of the god. As the kingdom grew, Marduk was attributed with more powers until he was acknowledged as lord of the heavens. The prophets mocked Marduk and his worshipers as products of human craftsmen who would lead Babylon to defeat and exile (Isa. 46:1; Jer. 50:2,38; 51:47). See Babylon; Bel; Gods, Pagan.

MARE Female horse. See Horse.

MAREAL (Mār ə'āl) (RSV, TEV) See Maralah.

MARESHAH (Mā rē' shā) Place and personal name meaning "place at the top" with two Hebrew spellings. 1. Son of Caleb and founder of Hebron (1 Chron. 2:42). The Hebrew text apparently refers to this son as first Mesha, then Meresha. 2. Member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:21). 3. A Canaanite city incorporated into the Shephelah district of Judah (Josh. 15:44). The city was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:8). Mereshah was near the site of the battle between the forces of King Asa and the Ethiopian commander Zerah (2 Chron. 14:9-14). Mareshah was home to the Prophet Eliezar (2 Chron. 20:37). Micah foretold the destruction of the city (Mic. 1:15). The site has been identified with Tell Sandahannah one mile southeast of Beit Jibrin.

MARI [Ma' ré] Ancient city accidentally discovered by Arab clansmen and later excavated by French archaeologists under the supervision of Andre Parrot. Today known as Tell el-Hariri, the site is comprised of about 135 acres (after erosion on its northeast sector), located adjacent to the right (west) bank of the Euphrates river, roughly 15 miles north of the modern Syrian-Iraqi border. Some 30 archaeological campaigns have unearthed city walls and various temples and palaces that date from about 3100 to 1760 B.C. when the city was demolished by Hammurabi of Babylon, never again to rise to a stature of prominence.

Located about midway between the great powers of Sumeria (Kish, Ur, Akkad) and Syro-Mesopotamia (Ebla, Aleppo), Mari played a significant role in the flow of trade as early as the third millennium, though, to judge from the documents which have already been published from this era, the city experienced a dependent status to these more powerful neighbors. By about 1800 no fewer than four trading routes converged on the city; the city's geographical and commercial horizons stretched from Iran in the east to the Mediterranean and Aegean in the west, including Turkey, Lebanon, Syria, Israel, and the Arabian Desert. From such an enviable position the kingdom of Mari played a crucial role in the international trade of timber, stone, wool, resin, garments, furniture, royal horses, wine, olive and sesame oils, myrtle, copper, lapislazuli and, perhaps most importantly, tin— an essential component in the forging or casting of bronze.

For about 25 years immediately prior to its destruction by Hammurabi, Mari experienced a “golden age” under its King Zimri-Lim. This era in Mesopotamian history has been compared by one noted historian to the age of Pericles in Greek history or of Caesar Augustus in Rome. For Mari it became a period of unsurpassed greatness in material prosperity, and its cultural remains have been matched by few sites in the neighboring areas of the ancient Near East.

The opulent prosperity in which Mari indulged is unmistakably etched into the remains of the magnificent palace of Zimri-Lim. Encompassing a nine-acre rectangular plot and containing more than 300 rooms, this palatial estate is one of the largest and best preserved buildings in all of Mesopotamian history. The excavators uncovered interior walls as thick as 13 feet and standing as high as 16 feet; lintels in some doorways were still intact. Apparently a two-story edifice, the palace was constructed to include many large open courts surrounded by a constellation of rooms that were interconnected by high doorways, thereby permitting ventilation and light to penetrate throughout a ground floor in which there were no windows. Floors were usually plastered or tiled; walls were plastered and frequently adorned with ornate sculpture or painting, and wood was used decoratively to add aesthetic luster.

Exhumed from this palace was Mari's greatest legacy of all: the royal archives. Embodying more than 25,000 texts and fragments, this documentation addresses almost every aspect within a culture: internal politics, international affairs, diplomacy and treaties, domestic policy, commerce and trade, agriculture, irrigation, law and jurisprudence, political intrigue, and religion. In point of fact, Zimri-Lim's reign is presently the most heavily documented of any king in antiquity, even including personal correspondence between himself and his wife, his daughters, his local administrators, and his territorial functionaries. His archive contains hundreds of bureaucratic registers that detail in a most graphic way certain aspects of daily life in a Mesopotamian court: where and how the king worshiped and his temples were serviced; where, what, and how often the king ate or was luxuriated; how courtiers were selected for the court or enticing female dancers were selected for the royal harem; what were various forms of entertainment for the court and/or visiting dignitaries; where, how far, and how frequently did the king journey; how was royalty attired.

Mari's bearing on biblical studies is significant, if indirect. Documentation from Mari has opened the historical, geographical, and social dimension of Northern Mesopotamia, the homeland of the biblical patriarchs. Certain patriarchal behavior attested in the writings of Moses may be seen to be reflected in the literature of Mari. This includes the prominence of the firstborn within family structure, the legal procedures entailed in adoption or formalizing inheritance, the centrality and interdependence of the clan as a model for social structuring, the notion of tribal or ethnic movement of people and the relocation and resettlement in a new area, the importance of genealogical registers similar to those of Gen. 5 and 11 as a means of establishing personal or clan authority, the prominent role and the forms of ritual in religious practices, the procedures for census taking, and the nature of prophets and prophecy. Mari's literary sources contribute to a richly textured reconstruction of Mesopotamian history during the early patriarchal period, just as they often provide linguistic elucidation of certain biblical concepts (compass points, tribal terms and leadership, flora and fauna, military terms). MARK, GOSPEL OF Second book of the NT and shortest account of the ministry of Jesus. Author The title “according to Mark” was added to this Gospel by scribes who produced the earliest copies of the Gospel. According to early church tradition Mark recorded and arranged the “memories” of Peter, thereby producing a Gospel based on apostolic witness. Although Mark was a common Roman name, the Gospel writer is probably John Mark. Mark became an important assistant for both Paul and Peter, preaching the good news to Gentiles and preserving the gospel message for later Christians. See Mark, John.

Readers Mark wrote his Gospel for Gentile Christians. He explains Jewish customs in detail for the benefit of readers unfamiliar with Judaism (7:3-4; 12:18). Mark translated several Aramaic expressions for a Greek-speaking audience (5:41; 7:11, 34; 15:22). Gentiles would have especially appreciated Mark's interpretation of the saying of Jesus that declared all foods clean (7:19; cp. Matt. 15:17-20). Mark's Gentile audience may explain his omission of the genealogy of Jesus. Perhaps these Gentile readers were Roman Christians. Mark's Gospel contains many terms borrowed from Latin and written in Greek; consider “taking counsel” (3:6), “Legion” (5:9), “tribute” (12:14), “scourged” (15:15).

Early Christian tradition placed Mark in Rome preserving the words of Peter for Roman Christians shortly before the apostle's death (1 Pet. 5:13). According to tradition Peter was martyred in Rome during the Neronian persecution, which would place the date of Mark's Gospel about A.D. 64 to 68. Such a hostile environment motivated Mark to couch his account of the life of Jesus in terms that would comfort Christians suffering for their faith. The theme of persecution dominates the Gospel of Mark (Mark 10:30; cp. Matt. 19:29; Luke 18:29). Jesus' messianic suffering is emphasized to inspire Christians to follow the same path of servanthood (10:42-45). Roman Christians would be encouraged knowing that Jesus anticipated that “everyone will be salted with fire” (9:49 HCSB; 13:9-13). Dying for the gospel would be equivalent to dying for Jesus (8:35; Matt. 16:25; Luke 9:24). Style Mark has been called the “Gospel of action.” One of his favorite words in telling the story of Jesus is “immediately.” Jesus is constantly on the move. In one day, according to Mark, Jesus instructed the multitudes by the sea, traveled across the sea of Galilee and calmed the storm, healed the Gerasene demoniac, crossed the sea again, healed the woman with a hemorrhage, and raised a little girl from the dead (4:1-6:1). Mark apparently had more interest in the work of Jesus than in the words of Jesus. Thus he omitted the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus taught as He moved from region to region, using the circumstances of His travel as valuable lessons for His disciples (8:14-21). Geographical references serve only to trace the expansive parameters of His ministry. According to Mark's “motion” picture, Jesus moved quickly—as if He were a man whose days were numbered.

Good storytellers captivate audiences by using everyday language that provokes strong imagery. Mark's language is simple, direct, and common. His sometimes rough and unrefined Greek grammar facilitates his ability to communicate the gospel message by using familiar patterns of speech. When Mark told a story, he possessed a flair for the dramatic and an eye for detail. His description of events was replete with vivid images which evoke a variety of emotions in just one story (5:1-20; cp. Matt. 8:28-34). In the graphic account of Jesus' encounter with the demoniac boy, only Mark recorded the child's convulsion which caused him to fall on the ground and roll "around, foaming at the mouth" (9:20,26 HCSB). Furthermore, Mark preserved Jesus' interrogation of the father as to the severity of the boy's condition and the depth of his own faith (9:21-24). Finally, only Mark recorded the actual words of Jesus' rebuke as well as the reaction of the crowd to the boy's lifeless body: "He's dead!" (9:25-26 HCSB).

A colonnaded street by the agora in Perga, a city significant in the life of the Gospel writer Mark.

Mark's concern for detail, sometimes to the point of redundancy (Mark 6:49-50 HCSB, "when they saw Him...because they all saw Him...He spoke to them and said"), demonstrates his reliance upon eyewitness testimony. Mark was careful to relate not only the words of Jesus but also His gestures, attitudes, and emotions (3:5; 6:34; 7:34; 8:12; 11:16). In the same fashion Mark recorded the reaction of the crowds, facial expressions of conversationalists, conclusions drawn by the disciples, and private remarks made by opponents (5:40; 10:22, 32, 41; 11:31; 14:40). Only an observant insider would relate stories with such pertinent information. Furthermore, the prominent role of Peter in the narrative (Peter remembered, 11:21; also 1:36; 14:37; 16:7) confirms early Christian tradition that Mark relied upon the recollections of the apostle when he produced “the gospel of Jesus Christ” (1:1).

Form Upon first reading the Gospel of Mark appears to be an arbitrary collection of stories about Jesus. After John the Baptist fulfilled his role as the forerunner to the Messiah (in a very brief appearance), Jesus began His public ministry in Galilee by preaching the “gospel of God” and collecting a few disciples (1:14-20). With these necessary introductions completed, Mark presented the life of Jesus by following a simple geographical scheme: from Galilee to Judea. The popular Galilean ministry of Jesus is recorded in chapters 1 -9. The brief Judean ministry (10:1-31) serves primarily as a prelude to the approaching passion of Jesus. Over one-third of Mark's Gospel is devoted to describing the events of the last week in the life of Jesus (10:32-15:47). The story ends as abruptly as it began; Mark finished his Gospel account with the angelic announcement of the resurrection of Jesus the Nazarene (the earliest Greek manuscripts of the NT end Mark's Gospel at 16:8). Mark's chronology of Jesus leaves the reader with the impression that his only purpose in writing a Gospel was to preserve the oral tradition in written form. However, upon closer inspection, it becomes apparent to the observant reader that Mark arranged the material in a more sophisticated fashion to convey truth on a higher level.

The stories of the cleansing of the temple and the cursing of the fig tree appear as isolated incidents in Matthew's Gospel, connected by chronological sequence (Matt. 21:12-22). In the Gospel of Mark, on the other hand, these two stories are interwoven to aid the reader in interpreting the parabolic activity of Jesus. Along the way to Jerusalem, Jesus indicated to His disciples that He was hungry and approached a fig tree to harvest its fruit. The tree was full of leaves, giving every indication of life, but it possessed no fruit. Mark recorded that Jesus “answered” the tree and announced, “May no one ever eat fruit from you again!” (11:14 HCSB). The disciples, who “heard it,” must have been puzzled by Jesus' actions, for Mark recorded that “it was not the season for figs” (11:13 HCSB). Without explanation Jesus led His disciples into Jerusalem where He cleansed the temple. From a distance the daily activity of the temple gave every indication of spiritual life, but upon closer inspection Jesus found no spiritual fruit. Israel, the fig tree, was supposed to provide “a house of prayer for all nations” (11:17 HCSB). Instead, the religious leaders turned the devotion of worshipers into financial profit (11:15,17). In essence, when Jesus “answered” the fig tree, he pronounced a curse on the Jewish religious leadership and demonstrated His divine displeasure by cleansing the temple. It should have come as no surprise, then, for Peter and the disciples, during their return trip, to find the cursed fig tree dead (11:21).

Mark's Gospel is not just a collection of stories about Jesus; his book tells the story of Jesus as a whole. Mark developed the unifying “plot” of the Gospel story by unveiling the hidden identity of Jesus. The messianic secret is part of the mystery of the kingdom of God, understood only by insiders—“to those outside, everything comes in parables” (4:11,33-34 HCSB). Throughout Mark's Gospel Jesus sought to conceal His true identity. Jesus silenced demonic profession because they knew Him (1:34). He ordered those who witnessed miracles not to tell anyone what they saw, although silence was only a remote possibility (7:36). Even after the climactic profession of faith, when the disciples revealed that they had learned the secret (“You are the Messiah!”), Jesus warned them not to tell anyone about Him (8:30). Mark used the messianic secret to organize his story around the progressive revelation of Christ and the faith pilgrimage of His disciples. Even Gentiles demonstrated that they belonged to the community of faith when they understood Jesus' parables and recognized Him as the Christ.

The literary form of Mark's Gospel is no accident. The arrangement of the gospel material gives every indication that a skilled literary craftsman has been at work. For example, Mark found irony in pairing the story of the disciples questioning the identity of Jesus after the stilling of the storm, “Who then is this?” (4:41 HCSB) with the account of the demons who are quick to shout, “Jesus, Son of the Most High God” (5:7). When the disciples finally offered their superlative confession of faith at Caesarea Philippi (8:27-30), they failed to understand the full implications of Jesus' messiahship (8:31-38). Mark depicted their partial spiritual vision by recording the unique miracle of Jesus healing the blind man in two stages (8:22-25). Although the disciples saw the messianic secret, their vision would not be focused until the resurrection. Beyond doubt, Mark's portrait of Jesus is a "painting" which can be appreciated both up close (style) and from a distance (form).

Message Jesus' favorite self-designation, especially in Mark, was "Son of Man." In Mark's Gospel Jesus is identified with humanity in title and in kind. Mark portrayed Jesus as a Man possessing every human emotion. Moved by compassion, anger, frustration, mercy, and sorrow (1:41; 3:5; 8:17; 14:6,33), Jesus ministered among His own kind. Mark offered the full humanity of Jesus without reservation (3:21; 4:38; 6:3-6; 13:32); from the beginning of His earthly ministry (2:20) Jesus lived in the ominous shadow of the cross until the agony of Gethsemane almost overwhelmed Him (14:34). However, Mark penned a Gospel which was also designed to evoke faith in the deity of Jesus: the divine voice announced it from heaven, demons screamed it in agony, Peter professed it boldly, even a Roman soldier acknowledged, "This man really was God's Son!" (15:39 HCSB).

MARK, JOHN Author of the Second Gospel and an early missionary leader. John Mark, as Luke calls him in Acts, was the son of Mary, in whose house the church was meeting when Peter was miraculously freed from prison in Acts 12. Commonly called by his Greek name, Mark, in the NT, John was probably his Jewish name. Mark was a Jew, Barnabas' cousin (Col. 4:10), and a companion of Barnabas and Paul on their first missionary journey. On the first missionary journey Mark ministered with the group on Cyprus, the home territory of Barnabas, and also a place with family connections for Mark. However, when they left for Pamphylia, Mark returned to Jerusalem.

Mark was the cause of the split between Paul and Barnabas when Mark's participation in the second missionary journey was debated (Acts 15:39). Barnabas sided with his cousin, while Paul refused to take Mark since he had left them on the first journey. Later, however, Paul indicated that Mark was with him (in Rome likely) as Paul sent letters to the Colossians (Col. 4:10) and Philemon (Philem. 24). Mark was also summoned to be with Paul in 2 Tim. 4:11. Whatever rift existed earlier was healed sometime and their friendship renewed.

The south city gate (possibly Hellenistic) at Perga of Pamphylia, the port from which Mark returned home.

Mark is closely related to Peter. In 1 Pet. 5:13 Peter refers to Mark, his “son,” as being with him in Rome (Babylon). Early church tradition supports the strong association between Peter and Mark. In the early second century, Papias mentioned that Mark was Peter's interpreter. Other early church figures associate Mark with Peter and note that the Gospel of Mark was based upon Peter's preaching.

MARKETPLACE Narrow streets and clustered buildings of most towns and villages in ancient Palestine left little room for a public marketplace. Shops were built into private residences or clustered in the gate area to form bazaars (1 Kings 20:34). Merchants operated booths just inside the city gate or hawked their merchandise outside the gate area in an open space or square. This area also served as a marshaling place for troops (2 Chron. 32:6) and the site for public meetings (Neh. 8:1), victory celebrations (Deut. 13:16), and the display of captives (2 Sam. 21:12).

Herod rebuilt many of the cities of Palestine following the Greek pattern that included open areas for public gathering (Gr. agora). Amidst the shops children played (Matt. 11:16), day laborers gathered to be hired (Matt. 20:2-3), and Pharisees and other leading citizens wandered, exchanging greetings

(Matt. 23:7; Luke 11:43). Paul went to the marketplace (Gr. agora) on his visits to Greek cities to speak to the crowd always gathered there (Acts 17:17). He and Silas were also tried by magistrates in the marketplace at Philippi after angering the local merchants (Acts 16:19). Victor H. Matthews

MAROTH (Mā' rōth) Place-name meaning “bitter” or “bitter fountain.” Town in lowlands of Judah which would be attacked as invading armies approached Jerusalem (Mic. 1:12). The town is perhaps identical with Maarath (Josh. 15:59).

MARRIAGE The sacred, covenantal union of one man and one woman formed when the two swear before God an oath of lifelong loyalty and love to one another, the sign and seal of which is sexual intercourse.

Nature of Marriage God instituted the first marriage in the garden of Eden when He gave Eve to Adam as a wife (Gen. 2:18-25). That later marriages were to follow the pattern of the first is indicated by the concluding divine instruction (see Matt. 19:4-6): “This is why a man leaves his father and mother and bonds with his wife, and they become one flesh” (Gen. 2:24). A unique unity between Adam and Eve was seen in that the two became “one flesh.” The oneness of marriage separated the couple from others as a distinct family unit.

Because God instituted it, marriage is more than just a ceremony. Biblical passages showing that the marriage relationship is based on a covenant or oath sworn before God are Prov. 2:17; Ezek. 16:8,59-62; Hos. 2:16-20; Mal. 2:14; Matt. 19:6. Any violation of that covenant invites God's judgment.

Purposes of Marriage God's Glory If man's chief purpose as the image of God is to glorify God and enjoy our relationship with Him forever (Ps. 73:28; 1 Cor. 10:31), clearly this is the chief purpose of marriage. Paul explains in Eph. 5:21-33 that the marriage relationship is to be patterned after that of Christ and the church. An inference to be drawn from that is that a husband and wife are to display in their relationship the nature of our relationship with Christ, our divine Husband, as His bride, the church. This same principle may also be inferred from the OT, where the marriage relationship was one of the key analogies used to describe Yahweh's relationship with Israel (e.g., Jer. 2:1; 3:6; 31:32; Hos. 1-3).

Marriage is also God's unique gift to provide the framework for intimate companionship, as a means for procreation of the human race and as the channel of sexual expression according to biblical standards.

Companionship Whereas the creation of male and female mankind was “very good” (Gen. 1:31), the creation of the male alone had not yet fulfilled God's purpose for man as the image of God (Gen. 2:18). This expresses no failure on God's part; instead, it instructs us that a male creature alone is not the perfect creation that God had in mind. Adam needed a wife to be all that God intended him to be, as is normally the case with all men unless God grants otherwise (see Matt. 19:10-12; 1 Cor. 7:6-7). The same, of course, would be true of the woman whom God made for the man (see 1 Cor. 11:9).

Adam needed “a helper who is like him,” that is, someone to complement or complete him, whose nature corresponded to his own (Gen. 2:21-23). He needed more than a vessel for the production of children; he needed a “help,” not a demeaning term since it is also used of God (Gen. 49:25; Exod. 18:4; Deut. 33:7,26; 1 Sam. 7:12; Isa. 41:10; Pss. 10:14; 33:20). Together, under God's direction and the husband's leadership, they could find satisfaction in fulfilling the purpose for which God had created them. The companionship that is shared between husband and wife in marriage enables physical, psychological, mental, emotional, and spiritual health.

Companionship within marriage is expressed in acts of love. The pattern of love that ought to define a marriage is found in 1 Cor. 13:1-7. Thus, marriage should be a place of patience, humility, joy, truth, peace, affirmation, and hope. Conversely, marriage is not a place for abuse. Nowhere in Scripture is a husband or wife given authority to strike or demean his/her spouse.

Procreation Marriage is also for the purpose of producing and rearing godly children (Gen. 1:28; Ps. 127). From the moment of conception children are a blessing and a heritage from the Lord. They are a source of joy in a marriage (Prov. 17:6). Parents are responsible for the moral and spiritual education of their children (Eph. 6:4). They are to lead their children by a consistent godly lifestyle and loving discipline so that children can learn to make choices based upon biblical truths. Children also have a responsibility to care for their parents in their old age. Though the OT places a high value on the firstborn son, all children are considered valuable to God from conception to maturity (Ps. 139:14-16; Prov. 17:6).

Sexual Intimacy Marriage is also for sexual intimacy. God's intention is for sexual acts to occur exclusively within the unique monogamous relationship of marriage as a reminder that they are "one flesh," bound together by covenant. Sexual intimacy was part of God's good creation (Gen. 1:27-28; 2:24-25). Intercourse is part of the natural expression of love within a marriage and provides emotional intimacy, deepens the couple's friendship, and helps to develop a servant attitude within the oneness of marriage (Gen. 2:24; Prov. 5:15-19; 1 Cor. 7:2-5). Sexual intimacy is to be a time of joy and mutual satisfaction for both the husband and wife (Song of Songs 6-7). God has given to both members of the marriage conjugal rights (1 Cor. 7:2-5).

Problems in Marriage Sexual Sins Adultery is a violation of the oath sworn before God that constituted the marriage. The Bible's condemnation of adultery includes such things as communal marriage, mate swapping, "open marriages," homosexuality, incest, and voyeurism such as pornography (Exod. 20:14; Lev. 18:22; Rom. 1:26-27; 1 Thess. 4:3; Heb. 13:4).

Sexual sins are serious because they undermine the foundation of family life, the oneness of the marriage relationship, and one's covenant commitment made before God. Moral purity was stressed for the husband and wife in Israel with severe penalties for either party when sin occurred (Lev. 18; Prov. 5). God likens idolatry to adultery because of the similarity of the divine human and husband-wife relationships.

Unequally Yoked Biblical marriage is between Christians. The expectation for a Christian to marry a Christian is reflected in Paul's instruction to marry "only in the Lord" (1 Cor. 7:39). His expectation is also seen in his comments concerning not being "unequally yoked together with unbelievers" (2 Cor. 6:14). Those who choose to marry an unbeliever violate the commands of Scripture.

A Christian who is already married to an unbeliever is not given permission to leave him or her but should maintain the relationship in order to rear the children as believers and to win over the unbelieving spouse (1 Cor. 7:12-16; 1 Pet. 3:1). An example of the impact that a believing spouse can have on the children is seen in the life of Timothy. There is evidence that Timothy's father was not a believer (Acts 16:1), but his mother passed her faith along to her son (2 Tim. 1:5; 3:14-15).

Divorce There is some disagreement among Christians over the Bible's teaching on divorce. Almost all agree, however, that divorce is contrary to the biblical teaching that marriage, being based on a covenant by which a man and woman become "one flesh," is intended to last a lifetime. In Matt. 19:6 Jesus declared, "So they are no longer two, but one flesh. Therefore what God has joined together, man must not separate" (HCSB). In response to the Pharisees' question about Deut. 24:1-4 where divorce was allowed, Jesus further declared, "Moses permitted you to divorce your wives because of the hardness of your hearts. But it was not like that from the beginning" (Matt. 19:8). Nevertheless, under certain circumstances God appears to permit divorce and then, by implication, remarriage. In the same passage Jesus further declares that "whoever divorces his wife, except for sexual immorality, and marries another, commits adultery" (Matt. 19:9; see also 5:32). An inference is that to divorce one's spouse because he/she has committed sexual immorality (that is, adultery) and then to marry another person is not adultery but is acceptable to God. (Some question this inference, in part, because the parallels in Mark 10:11-12 and Luke 16:18 do not have the exception.) Some argue from 1 Cor. 7:10-11 that the legitimacy of divorce does not imply the legitimacy of remarriage. But Paul appears to be dealing in the Corinthian passage with a situation (such as abuse, perhaps) that does not involve adultery. It also seems that a Christian is permitted to divorce an unbelieving spouse who has deserted him/her (1 Cor. 7:15-16), although this interpretation is less clear.

Divorce, whether it is justified or not, is a tragedy that fractures the lives of men, women, children, and the Christian's witness for Christ to the lost world. Nevertheless, the Gospels are filled with examples of how Jesus dealt with persons who were struggling with guilt and failure, including one woman who had been married five times and who was living with a man who was not her husband (John 4:1-42). Where guilt and sin were involved, Jesus did not minimize it, but in every case He acted with redemption. His goal was to help them to begin anew through God's grace and strength.

Biblical Submission A Christian marriage is to be a place of refuge for a husband and wife, where they can be cheered and refreshed in a safe, healthy environment. Within Scripture there are clear roles for the husband and wife. These roles in no way lessen the value of either party. The husband and wife are each created in the image of God and are of equal worth in the sight of God (Gen. 1:27). The marriage relationship models the way God relates to His people.

The Bible describes the marriage that pleases God in terms of mutual submission empowered by the Holy Spirit (Eph. 5:18-21; see also Phil. 2:1-4). Such a marriage also provides the marital fulfillment and companionship God intends. However, mutual submission is to be expressed differently by the husband and the wife. The husband is to practice self-denying, nurturing love patterned after that of Christ (Eph. 5:25-33). He is the initiator and is responsible for leading his wife with wisdom and understanding. He is also to protect, provide for, and honor her (1 Pet. 3:7; Col. 3:19). A wife, on the other hand, is to express her submission by following her husband's leadership with respect (Eph. 5:22-24,33; Col. 3:18), maintaining a pure and reverent life with “a gentle and quiet spirit” (1 Pet. 3:1-6). MARROW Soft tissue within bone cavities. In OT times marrow was regarded as among the choicest of foods (Ps. 63:5; Isa. 25:6). Good health was characterized by bones with moist marrow (Job 21:24). To fear the Lord and shun evil is marrow (KJV) or refreshment (NASB, RSV) or nourishment (NIV) to the bones (Prov. 3:8). The image of the dividing of joints and marrow pictures the power of Scripture to penetrate a person's thoughts and motives (Heb. 4:12).

MARS HILL Prominent rise overlooking the city of Athens where the philosophers of the city gathered to discuss their ideas, some of which revolutionized modern thought. Paul discussed religion with the leading minds of Athens on Mars Hill. He used the altar to an “unknown god” to present Jesus to them (Acts 17:22). See Areopagus; Greece.

MARSENA (Mār' sè nà) Aramaic or Persian personal name of uncertain meaning. One of the seven wise men or princes with access to the Persian King Ahasuerus (Esther 1:13-14; cp. Ezra 7:14).

MARSH Tract of soft, wet land (Job 8:11; 40:21). Ezekiel 47:11 refers to the salt marshes surrounding the Dead Sea.

MARSHAL Akkadian loanword for commander of troops (Jer. 51:27 NASB, NRSV; captain, KJV; commander, NIV, REB).

MARTHA Personal name meaning “lady [of the house]” or “mistress.” Sister of Mary and Lazarus of Bethany and one of Jesus' bestloved disciples. True to her name, Martha is portrayed as a person in charge: she welcomed Jesus as a guest in her home (Luke 10:38); she was concerned with meeting the obligations of a hostess, whether preparing food (Luke 10:40; John 12:2) or greeting guests (John 11:20). Together with Mary, she sent for Jesus when Lazarus was ill (John 11:3). Luke 10:38-42 contrasts Martha's activist discipleship with Mary's contemplative discipleship. The church cannot minister without “Marthas” who are willing to serve alone. Jesus' gentle rebuke serves as a perpetual reminder not to major on minor matters. Jesus must not be neglected in the name of service. In John 11:21-

27 Jesus led Martha from an inadequate to a lofty confession. Faced with the realities of death, Martha, however, later doubted (John 11:39).

MARTYR Transliteration of the Greek word martus, meaning “witness.” In the Septuagint this term rarely denotes one killed for his or her testimony, although a case may perhaps be made thematically in reference to prophetic proclamation. The messages and oracles of God were often rejected, resulting in the messenger's maltreatment or death (Suffering Servant of Isa. 42; 49; 50; 52-53; other examples of suffering in persecution in Jer. 20:2; 1 Kings 19:2; 2 Chron. 18:7-27; 1 Kings 19:10; Jer. 20:1-6).

Witnesses also bear testimony about moral, religious, or spiritual truths and views of which they are convinced by faith. Those truths may be external facts or internal convictions, and it is understood that ultimately one would give one's life for those truths. The NT refers only three times to a martyr in this last sense (Acts 22:20; Rev. 2:13; 17:6), but the early church greatly expanded this meaning and developed a theology of martyrdom during its centuries of persecution. See Persecution; Testimony; Witness, Martyr.

Mars Hill, where Paul was invited to address the intellectuals of Athens at the Areopagus.

“Mary's House” in Ephesus where tradition says that Mary the mother of Jesus lived out her last days.

MARY Greek personal name equivalent to Hebrew, Miriam. 1. Mary, the mother of Jesus. Mary was a young woman, a virgin, living in Nazareth, and a relative of Elizabeth, mother of John the Baptist (Luke 1:5; 2:26). Pledged to marry a carpenter named Joseph, the angel Gabriel appeared to her, announcing she would give birth to “the Son of the Most High” who would sit on “the throne of His father David” (Luke 1:32 HCSB). When Mary raised the issue of her virginity, the angel indicated the conception would be supernatural (Luke 1:34-35). Matthew said this virginal conception was a fulfillment of Isa. 7:14. Subsequently, Mary visited Elizabeth (Luke 1:39-45). Later, after journeying to Bethlehem and giving birth to Jesus (Luke 2:1-20), Mary and Joseph presented the baby to the Lord at the temple (Luke 2:22-38). Matthew indicates that Mary, Joseph, and Jesus lived in Bethlehem until the visit of the magi, when the threat posed by Herod forced them to take refuge in Egypt (Matt. 2:1-18). The family then lived in Nazareth in Galilee (Matt. 2:19-23; Luke 2:39).

In later tradition a natural tendency to appreciate Mary took on added and unwarranted dimensions. She was venerated and claims about her uniqueness began to be made, including her “immaculate conception,” “perpetual virginity,” “bodily assumption,” and continuing role as “co-mediatrix” of salvation. The Scriptures give no support for these ideas. All appearances of Mary in the Gospels support a view of her as a normal human woman. Matthew 1:25 indicates that after the birth of Jesus, Joseph and Mary began normal marital relations, producing several other children (Matt. 13:54-56; Mark 6:3). When Jesus was 12, He gently rebuked His mother for failing to recognize His deep interest in the things of God. At a wedding in Cana, Jesus performed Mary's requested miracle but reproved her (John 2:1-11).

Mary was present at the cross when Jesus committed her care to John who took her into his home (John 19:26-27). After the ascension Mary and her sons were with the disciples in Jerusalem as they waited for the promised coming of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:14).

2. Mary Magdalene, one of the women who followed and supported Jesus (Mark 15:41). She was from Magdala in Galilee. She experienced dramatic healing when seven demons came out of her (Mark 16:9; Luke 8:2). She was a key witness to Jesus' death (Matt. 27:56, Mark 15:40), burial (Matt. 27:61; Mark 15:47), the empty tomb (Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:1; Luke 24:1-10), and was the first to encounter the risen Christ (John 20:1-18). Her name being listed first may indicate a leadership role among the women. She has been identified as a sinful woman, perhaps a prostitute, perhaps even the “sinful woman” of Luke 7:36-50. However, there is no such evidence in any of the references to her.

3. Mary of Bethany, sister of Martha and Lazarus. Jesus stayed in this home more than once. Jesus commended Mary for her interest in His teaching (Luke 10:38-42). Mary and Martha sent for Jesus when Lazarus fell ill and died (John 11:1-45). Mary later anointed the feet of Jesus with perfume (John 12:1-8; Mark 14:3-9). A deep relationship existed between Jesus and this family. 4. Mary, mother of James the Younger and Joses. Along with Mary Magdalene, this Mary is identified as an eyewitness to the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus (Matt. 27:56-28:1; Mark 15:40-16:1; Luke 24:10). She was Galilean and a follower and supporter of the ministry of Jesus (Mark 15:40-41). 5. Mary, the wife of Clopas. This Mary also was a witness to the death of Jesus and may be the same Mary, mother of James and Joses (John 19:25), but this view is problematic. 6. Mary, mother of John Mark. When Peter was freed from prison in Acts 12, he went to the house of Mary, mother of John Mark, where the disciples were meeting. This home was apparently a gathering place for believers. John Mark was later associated with the missionary work of Paul, Barnabas, and Peter. 7. Mary, from Rome. A believer in Rome greeted by Paul (Rom. 16:6), who noted her hard work on behalf of believers.

Mosaic floors decorate the Western Palace area of Masada.

MASADA (Má sa´ dá) A mesa on the western shore of the Dead Sea. It rises about 820 feet above the surrounding valleys and was used as a stronghold between 142 B.C. and A.D. 73. Jonathan Maccabeus first fortified the rock. Herod the Great made it a monument to his building activity. A band of rebellious Jews held it briefly during the first revolt against Rome (A.D. 66-73). After a long struggle to recapture the fortress, the Tenth Legion raised an enormous siege ramp and broke through the walls. They found the bodies of over 900 men, women, and children, victims of a suicide pact to keep the Romans from taking them as prisoners.

MASCHIL (Mas' kēl) See Maskil.

MASH (Māsh) Son of Aram (Gen. 10:23) in Table of Nations and thus original ancestor of Syrian tribal group, possibly from Mount Masius (Tur Abdin) in Northern Mesopotamia or the Mashu mountains of the Gilgamesh epic, probably the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon Mountains. The name is copied as Meshech in 1 Chron. 1:17.

MASHAL (Mā' shāl) 1. City in the tribal territory of Asher later assigned to the Levites (1 Chron. 6:74). At Josh. 19:26; 21:30 the name appears as Misheal

(KJV) or Mishal (modern translations). 2. Technical Hebrew term for proverb, parable, simile. See Proverbs, Book of; Wisdom and Wise Men.

MASKIL (Mas' kēl) Term maskil is in the superscription of Pss. 32; 42; 44; 45; 52-55; 74; 78; 88; 89; 142 and also in 47:7. The Septuagint translates it as “ability of comprehension,” “intelligence,” and the Vulgate translates it as “understanding,” “intelligence.” The origin and meaning of the term are uncertain. Suggested meanings are: (1) a didactic psalm (a psalm of wisdom, understanding, or instruction); (2) a skillful, artistic composition or song. Second Chronicles 30:22 mentions Levites who are skilled (maskilim) in singing and praising God in worship. Maskils were collected groups of psalms composed for worship.

MASONS Building craftsmen using brick or stone. The professional mason in Israel first appears in the Bible in David's time, though the craft was very ancient and highly developed in Egypt by that time. The Bible suggests that no Israelites were skilled in the art of quarrying, squaring, and setting fine building stones in David's time. David relied upon the king of Tyre for craftsmen (2 Sam. 5:11-12; 1 Chron. 22:2-4, 14-18). Under the reign of Solomon, Israelites may have begun to develop this craft (1 Kings 5:18). As professional craftsmen, stone masons were probably members of a guild or trade association such as other tradesmen. Such associations were primarily social organizations, though in later times they could be a political force of concern to rulers (Acts 19:23-41). It was also common for members of the same trade to live and work in one location within the larger towns and cities (2 Kings 18:17; 1 Chron. 4:14; Neh. 11:35; Jer. 37:21; Matt. 27:7; Acts 18:3).

Dressed or ashlar masonry was not ordinarily used in private dwellings. The average man built his own home of sun-dried brick on a foundation of fieldstones. Biblical references to masons thus involve public works (2 Kings 12:11-15; 2 Kings 22:3-8; Ezra 3:7).

Limestone was a primary building stone in the hill country. It was easily cut, and it hardened when exposed to the air. To cut the stone loose from its bed, wooden wedges were driven into triangular slots cut along the line of the split. These wedges were soaked with water. As the wedges expanded, the force split the stone from the bed. Hammers, punches, and chisels were used to batter and dress the stone followed by rubbing with fine sandstone rubbing stones. Blocks could be squared and polished so finely that a blade could not be inserted between the joints.

Masons, under Herod's employ, cut massive limestone blocks as much as 46 feet long, 10 feet thick, and 10 feet high from quarries half a mile from where they were placed in the pediment of the temple mount. Some of these stones are estimated to weigh as much as 415 tons. They can be seen today in the southwest corner of the Wailing Wall. See Architecture; Occupations and Professions.

MASORA (Má so' rá) Hebrew term meaning “tradition,” used for note added to the margins of manuscripts of the Masoretic text of the OT as a safeguard to transmission of the text. See Bible Texts and Versions.

MASREKAH (Mäs' rə kah) Place-name, perhaps meaning “vineyard.” City in Edom whose king ruled the Edomites in the period before Israel had kings (Gen. 36:36; 1 Chron. 1:47). The site is perhaps Jebel el-Mushraq about 20 miles south-southwest of Ma'an. Eusebius (around A.D. 300) located Masrekah in Gabalene in northern Edom.

MASSA (Mäs' sá) Hebrew term with several meanings. 1. Seventh son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chron. 1:30). 2. Arab tribe perhaps descended from 1. The Massa are listed among the people who paid tribute to King Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 B.C.) of Assyria. Some interpret the use of Massa in the titles of collections of proverbs (Prov. 30:1; 31:1) as referring to the nationality of the person mentioned (cp. RSV, JPS, NASB). 3. Hebrew term for a load or burden (Exod. 23:5; Num. 4:24,32). 4. Hebrew term found at the beginning of an OT book (Nahum, Habakkuk, Malachi) or a smaller unit identifying the nature of the following literary unit. Once thought to be the same as 3., it is now understood as a distinct word and is usually translated “oracle,” “utterance,” or “pronouncement.” It often introduces a judgment oracle against a foreign nation (Isa. 13:1; 14:28; 15:1; 17:1; 19:1; 21:1,11,13; 23:1; Nah. 1:1; Zech. 9:1), against Israel (Isa. 22:1; 30:6; Ezek. 12:10; Hab. 1:1; Mal. 1:1), or against an individual (2 Kings 9:25). But it could also refer to a message of blessing or of blessing and judgment (cp. Jer. 23:33-34,36,38; Zech. 12:1; Mal. 1:1).

MASSAH (Mäs' sah) Place-name meaning “to test, try.” Stopping place during the wilderness wandering near the base of Mount Horeb (Sinai). Moses gave the name in response to the people's desire to put God to the test by demanding water (Exod. 17:7). Massah became a reminder of Israel's disobedience or hardness of heart (Deut. 6:16; 9:22; Ps. 95:8). Massah often appears together with Meribah (meaning “to strive with, contend, find fault with”; Exod. 17:7; Deut. 33:8; Ps. 95:8). Deuteronomy 33:8 gives a poetic account of the origin of the Levitical priesthood at Massah.

MAST Long pole rising from a ship's keel which supports a sail (Prov. 23:34; Isa. 33:23; Ezek. 27:5). See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

MASTER Scripture uses master in two basic senses: in authority and teacher. 1. As one in authority, master applies to slaveholders and to heads of households (which in biblical times frequently included slaves or servants). Greek terms translated master (of servants or a household) include despotes, kurios, oikodespotes (Mark 13:35; Luke 13:25; 14:21; 16:13; Eph. 6:9). 2. KJV regularly translated the Greek didaskalos (teacher) as master in the Gospels (Matt. 8:19; 9:11). KJV twice rendered kathegetes (guide, teacher) as master (Matt. 23:8,10). KJV sometimes also translated rabbi (rabbi, teacher) and rabboni (my rabbi, my teacher) as master (Matt. 26:25; Mark 9:5; John 4:31). Modern translations render the above terms as teacher or rabbi. Luke often uses epistates (manager, chief) where Matthew and Mark have teacher (didaskalos), rabbi, or Lord (e.g., Luke 5:5; 8:24,45; 9:33,49; 17:13).

MATRED (Má' tréd) Personal name possibly meaning “spear.” The Hebrew text understands Matred to be the mother of Mehetabel (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chron. 1:50). The earliest Greek and standard Latin translations take Matred to be Mehetabel's father.

MATRI, MATRITES (Má' trí) The family within the tribe of Benjamin from which Saul came (1 Sam. 10:21).

MATRIX KJV term meaning “womb” (Exod. 13:12,15; 34:19; Num. 3:12; 18:15).

MATTAN (Mát' tán) Personal name meaning “gift of God.” 1. Queen Athaliah's priest of Baal in Jerusalem killed in Jehoiada's purge (2 Kings 11:18). 2. Father of Shephatiah, a contemporary of Jeremiah (Jer. 38:1).

MATTANAH (Măt' tá nah) Place-name meaning "gift." Stopping place in the wilderness (Num. 21:18-19). The site is perhaps identical with Khirbet el-Medeiyineh, about 12 miles southeast of Madeba. Pottery shards at that site indicate occupation from before 1200 to about 800 B.C.

MATTANIAH (Măt tá ni' ah) Personal name meaning "gift of Yah." 1. Tabernacle musician/ prophet in David's time (1 Chron. 25:4). 2. Ancestor of Jahaziel (2 Chron. 20:14). 3. Member of the Asaphite subclan of Levites who participated in Hezekiah's reforms (2 Chron. 29:13). 4. Original name of King Zedekiah of Judah (2 Kings 24:17). 5. Asaphite among the first to return from exile (1 Chron. 9:15). 6. Levitic leader of the temple choir in Zerubbabel's time (Neh. 11:17,22). 7. Levitic temple gatekeeper (Neh. 12:25). 8. Father of the Levite Shemaiah (Neh. 12:35). 9. Grandfather of Hanan (Neh. 13:13). 10.-13. Four of those who returned from exile with foreign wives (Ezra 10:26-27,30,37). Some of 5.-13. may be identical.

MATTATHA (Măt' tá thá) Grandson of King David and ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:31).

MATTATHIAS (Măt tá thī' ás) 1. Two ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:25-26). 2. Priest whose refusal to obey Antiochus' decree to offer sacrifice initiated the Maccabean revolt (1 Macc. 2). 3. Four high priests from 5 B.C. to A.D. 65. See Intertestamental History and Literature; High Priest.

MATTATTAH (Măt' tát tah) Personal name meaning "gift." Layman with foreign wife (Ezra 10:33).

MATTENAI (Măt' tō ni) Personal name meaning "my gift." 1. Priestly contemporary of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:19). 2. and 3. Two laymen with foreign wives (Ezra 10:33,37).

MATTHAN (Măt' thăn) An ancestor of Christ (Matt. 1:15).

MATTHAT (Măt' thăt) Two ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:24,29).

MATTHEW (Māth' yu) Personal name meaning “the gift of Yahweh.” A tax collector Jesus called to be an apostle (Matt. 9:9; 10:3). Matthew's office was located on the main highway that ran from Damascus, down the Jordan Valley to Capernaum then westward to Acre to join the coastal road to Egypt or southward to Jerusalem. His duty was to collect “toll” or “transport” taxes from both local merchants and farmers carrying their goods to market as well as distant caravans passing through Galilee. He was an employee of Herod Antipas. Matthew knew the value of goods of all description: wool, flax, linen, pottery, brass, silver, gold, barley, olives, figs, wheat. He knew the value of local and foreign monetary systems. He spoke the local Aramaic language as well as Greek. Because Matthew had leased his “toll” collecting privileges by paying the annual fee in advance, he was subjected to the criticism of collecting more than enough, growing wealthy on his “profit.” Thus he was hated by his fellow Jews.

Matthew is the same person as Levi, a tax collector (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27), and thus the son of Alphaeus. James the son of Alphaeus is also listed among the apostles (Mark 3:18; Matt. 10:3; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). This indicates that both Matthew and his (half) brother were in close association with Jesus. Mary, the mother of James, keeps the vigil at the foot of the cross with Mary, the mother of Jesus (Matt. 27:55-56; Mark 15:40). If the James mentioned here is the same as the son of Alphaeus, then we have a larger family closely associated with the family of Jesus.

Later legendary accounts tell of Matthew's travel to Ethiopia where he became associated with Candace, identified with the eunuch of Acts 8:27. The legends tell us of Matthew's martyrdom in that country.

Matthew had the gifts to be trained as a disciple, could keep meticulous records, and was a potential recorder/author of the Gospel. From earliest times Christians affirmed that Matthew wrote the Gospel that bears his name. See Disciple; Matthew, Gospel of; Publican.

MATTHEW'S BIBLE The Thomas Matthew Bible was a revision of Tyndale's and Coverdale's versions likely prepared by John Rogers in 1537 in Antwerp. See Bible Translations.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF Opening book of the NT which appropriately begins with the declaration, “the historical record of Jesus Christ” (HCSB). When we begin reading this book today, we should, however, have in mind its ending (28:18-20). Matthew's purpose was to show that Jesus had the power to command His disciples to spread His gospel throughout all the world.

Matthew 28:16-20 is the scene of the resurrected Jesus meeting His disciples on a hill in Galilee. Jesus immediately declared His absolute authority: “All authority has been given to Me in heaven and on earth” (HCSB). The disciples would be reminded of many experiences during Jesus' ministry that proved His authority. Now with this knowledge of the resurrection, it was evident to them that He had received His authority from God. Jesus then gave the disciples a Commission to “make disciples of all nations” (HCSB). A disciple is (1) one who willingly becomes a learner of the Master's teaching and seeks to follow His example by implementing His teaching, and (2) who passes on to others what one has learned. Hearing Jesus' command, the disciples recalled His teaching and fellowship. Now they were called on to carry forward His mission. Jesus said they would make disciples as they went away from their meeting with Him. Their activities would include baptizing new disciples into the lordship of Jesus. This is the original commitment. The disciples would pass on to others all that Jesus taught them. In telling this story Matthew emphasized that Jesus has total authority, His teachings must be transmitted, and His message is for all people. If we, the modern readers, will keep these three themes in mind as we read the Gospel from the beginning, we will discover that the author shows us how Jesus demonstrated His authority, the teachings He employed, and His concern for all nations.

The Gospel is easily divided into seven sections: a beginning and an end with five teaching sections between. Because of this, Matthew has been recognized for its emphasis on the teachings of Jesus.

Matthew 1:1-4:25 opens the Gospel with the royal genealogy and builds to the proclamation of God in 3:17: “This is My beloved Son.” The genealogies confirm Jesus' authoritative, kingly lineage and remind the reader of His relation to all nations by mentioning Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and the wife of a Hittite. The wise men (Gentiles) came seeking the King of the Jews (2:2). The angel affirmed Jesus' divine nature to Joseph. The child received a messianic name (1:18-23). Joseph took the holy family to Gentile territory (Egypt) to escape the threats of Herod. When Jesus came to John for baptism, the voice from heaven proclaimed Him as God's Son. As God's Son, Jesus had the authority and power to confront Satan and overcome. Jesus then went to Galilee of the Gentiles (4:15) to begin His public ministry. This opening section makes it obvious that Jesus is designated by God to be the Messiah with authority—for all nations.

Matthew 5:1-7:29 is commonly called the Sermon on the Mount. It should be called the Teaching from the Mount since that is what the text calls it (5:2). While teaching and preaching overlap, teaching emphasizes the essential principles that must be passed on to maintain the discipline or movement at hand. Jesus gave His essential doctrine in this teaching. He stressed the importance of His commandments in 5:19; emphasized the authoritative nature of His teachings by declaring, “But I tell you” (5:22,28,32,39,44) and was recognized by the crowds as a Teacher with authority (7:28-29). Matthew presented Jesus as an authoritative Teacher. When the disciples went out to teach, they knew what to teach.

Matthew 8:1-10:42 opens with a series of 10 miracles demonstrating Jesus' authority over disease, natural catastrophes, demons, and death. What He had demonstrated verbally in the teachings on the Mount, Jesus acted out through displays of power. His disciples were amazed, “even the winds and the sea obey Him!” (8:27 HCSB), and the crowds stood amazed that He had the authority to forgive sins (9:8). His ministry to a Gentile centurion is in this section also. After demonstrating His power, Jesus gave authority to His disciples to go out and heal and teach as He had done (10:1), thus preparing them for their final Commission in 28:18-20. By continuing the emphasis on authority, teaching, and Gentiles, Jesus prepared His immediate disciples for their task after His death. Matthew continues to teach later generations of believers about Jesus' power and concern for all mankind.

Matthew 11:1-13:52 shows various people reacting to Jesus' authority. Various responses are noted in chapter 11, including Jesus' thanksgiving that the “infants” understand (vv. 25-30). When the leaders rejected Jesus' authority in chapter 12, Matthew implied that Jesus would go to the Gentiles by quoting Isaiah the prophet (12:18-21). Jesus continued His teaching in parables to those who were willing to listen (13:10-13). Therefore, when Jesus commissioned His disciples to go into all the world and teach, they were aware that He had already begun the movement by His example in His earthly ministry.

Matthew 13:53-18:35 opens with the story of Jesus' teaching in the synagogue in Nazareth. The people had the same response to Jesus' teaching as the crowds did at the end of the Sermon on the Mount. They were astonished (cp. 13:54; 7:28). Although Jesus presented His authoritative teaching, His hometown people rejected it (13:57). His disciples accepted Him (14:33) and so did the Gentile woman (15:22). Again Jesus taught authoritatively and related to Gentiles.

Matthew 19:1-25:46 makes the transition from Galilee to Jerusalem. Jesus dramatically presented His kingly authority by His triumphal entry into Jerusalem (21:1-9) and by cleansing the temple (21:10-17). Then, while He was teaching, the chief priests and elders challenged Him saying, “By what authority are You doing these things?” (21:23 HCSB). Jesus answered with parables and other teachings (21:28-22:46). Jesus warned the people about the examples of the Pharisees and Sadducees (23:1-38). He then concentrated His teaching only on His disciples (24:1-25:46). They could recall this when He commanded them to teach what He taught. The modern believer must also hear what Jesus taught and teach it to others.

Matthew 26:1-28:20 has no teaching situations, but it tells of the conspiracy ending in Jesus' execution. In the midst of the trial scene, Jesus was asked if He was the Messiah. Jesus responded by affirming His authority: “You have said it” (26:64 HCSB). Pilate, a Gentile, recognized

Jesus' kingly authority, placarding over the cross: “THIS IS JESUS THE KING OF THE JEWS” (27:37). The Gentile centurion proclaimed, “This man really was God's Son” (27:54). As in the birth story, so in the end, the author stressed Jesus' divine, kingly authority and emphasized the inclusion of the Gentiles.

When the resurrected Lord declared His authority to His disciples in 28:18, they understood because they had seen His authority displayed as they lived with Jesus. When modern readers come to 28:18, they understand because Matthew has shown us Jesus' authority from the beginning.

Matthew presented Jesus as the “Son of God,” a term that appears 23 times in this Gospel. While the virgin birth story affirms Jesus' Sonship, the quotation from Hos. 11:1 (Matt. 2:15) confirms it. Twice God proclaimed Jesus' Sonship: at His baptism (3:17) and at the transfiguration (17:5). Peter confessed it (16:16). Jesus attested to His Sonship in the Lord's prayer (6:9), His thanksgiving to God (11:25-26), and the garden of Gethsemane (26:39). The author wanted the reader to be aware that Jesus, the Son of God, is the One crucified on the cross; so Jesus called out to “my God” from the cross (27:46), and a Gentile centurion confessed that the dying One “really was God's Son” (27:54).

Matthew wanted the reader to be aware that forgiveness of sins comes through the death of the divine Son of God. The angel had told Joseph that Jesus would “save His people from their sins” (1:21). Jesus Himself had assured His disciples that His destiny was “to give His life—a ransom for many” (20:28). Jesus left behind a continuing reminder of His role in the forgiveness of sins when He instituted the Lord's Supper, “For this is My blood of the covenant, which is shed for many for the forgiveness of sins” (26:28).

It is impossible to know the exact date when the Gospel of Matthew was written. Some contemporary writers date it as early as A.D. 60, some as late as A.D. 95. The place of writing was probably some place along the coast of Phoenicia or Syria such as Antioch. This is because of Matthew's several references to Gentiles, a reference to Phoenicia and Syria, and the terms (in the Greek text) used for coins (17:24, 27). Although the Gospel nowhere identifies the author and many modern Bible students point to a complex history of editing and collecting sources, Matthew, the tax collector, the son of Alphaeus has been identified as the author since the second century. MATTHIAS (Măt thi' as) Shortened form of Mattathias ("gift of Yah"). Disciple who followed Jesus from the time of John's ministry of baptism until Jesus' ascension, who was chosen by lot and prayer to succeed Judas as an apostle and official witness to the resurrection (Acts 1:20-26). This selection was regarded as necessary to fulfill Scripture concerning the band of apostles (Ps. 69:25; Acts 1:20). Scripture mentions nothing further about Matthias. See Disciple; Acts, Book of.

MATTITHIAH (Măt ti thi' ah) Personal name meaning "gift of Yah." 1. Levite whom David appointed as a tabernacle musician with special responsibility for leading lyre music (1 Chron. 15:18,21; 25:3,21). Mattithiah also ministered before the ark (1 Chron. 16:5). 2. Levite baker (1 Chron. 9:31).

3. Layman with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:43). 4. Man standing beside Ezra at the public reading of the Law (Neh. 8:4).

MATTOCK Tool used for digging. See Tools, Agricultural Tools.

MAUL KJV term for a club (HCSB, NASB, NIV, REB) or war club (RSV) at Prov. 25:18. See Arms and Armor.

MAUNDY THURSDAY See Holy Week; Church Year.

MAW KJV term for the fourth stomach of a cud-chewing animal. The “maw” was among the choice cuts of meat reserved for the priests' portion (Deut. 18:3). Modern translations use stomach (HCSB, NASB, REB, NRSV) or inner parts (NIV).

MAZZAROTH (Māz' zā rōth) Puzzling term in Job 38:32. Either a proper name for a particular constellation (KJV, NRSV), a collective term for the 12 signs of the Zodiac (KJV margin, REB), or a general term meaning constellation or stars (NASB, NIV, TEV; cp. 2 Kings 23:5).

MEADOW Tract of grassland, especially moist, low-lying pasture. The KJV used meadow at two passages. At Gen. 41:2, 18 the reference is clearly to stretches of reed grass or papyrus thickets common along the Nile. The term rendered meadow in the phrase “meadows of Geba” (Judg. 20:33 KJV) is obscure. The NASB simply transliterates the phrase (Maareh-geba). In modern translations “meadows” illustrate God's blessing (Ps. 65:13 NASB, NIV, NRSV [pastures, HCSB]; Isa. 30:23; 44:4 NIV). Meadows are also used in pictures of God's judgment (Jer. 25:37; Hos. 4:16 NIV; Hos. 9:13 NASB; Zeph. 2:6 NRSV).

MEAH, TOWER OF (Mē' ah) KJV transliteration of a Hebrew phrase meaning “Tower of the Hundred” (Neh. 3:1; 12:39). See Hundred, Tower of.

MEAL OFFERING See Sacrifice and Offering, Grain Offering.

MEALS See Banquet; Food.

MEARAH (Mə a' rah) Place-name meaning “cave.” Part of the territory left unconquered following Joshua's conquest. The site is perhaps the caves called Mughar Jezzin located east of Sidon (Josh. 13:4).

MEASURING LINE Cord used to measure length (cp. 1 Kings 7:15, 23; 2 Chron. 4:3). References to a measuring line point to the restoration of Jerusalem (Jer. 31:39; Zech. 2:1; cp. Ezek. 47:3).

MEASURING REED Ezekiel's measuring reed was a cane about 10 feet long used as a measuring tool (Ezek. 40:3,5-8; cp. Rev. 21:15-16). See Weights and Measures.

MEAT In modern English meat refers to animal tissue used as food, frequently in contrast to plant products. Modern translations use meat in this sense, where KJV used the term “flesh” (e.g., Num. 11:4-33; Judg. 6:19-21; 1 Sam. 2:13,15). KJV used “meat” in two senses: for food, especially solid food in contrast to drink (for example, 1 Cor. 3:2; Heb. 5:12,14); and for a meal, especially the evening meal (e.g., 1 Sam. 20:5; Matt. 26:7). The KJV used “meat” in the general sense of food about 250 times. The context frequently indicates that flesh is not in view (Gen. 1:29-30; Ezek. 47:12; Hab. 3:17). A special case of the use of “meat” to mean food is the frequent use of the term “meat offering” (about 130 times in the OT). Here “meat offering” means food offering in contrast to a libation (drink offering). Modern translations render the expression as cereal or grain offering. Modern translations, for example NRSV, frequently replace the KJV's “meat” with a more specific term in light of the context: provisions (Gen. 45:23); scraps [of food] (Judg. 1:7); present (2 Sam. 11:8); meager fare (2 Sam. 12:3); solid food (1 Cor. 3:2; Heb. 5:12). KJV also used “meat” in the sense of a meal. Modern translations generally replace the KJV's “sit at meat” with “sit at table” which means to take a meal (1 Sam. 20:5; Matt. 9:10; 26:7; Mark 2:15). “To come to meat” (1 Sam. 20:27) is to come to supper. A “morsel of meat” (Heb. 12:16) is “a single meal” (NRSV).

MEAT OFFERING KJV term used about 130 times in the OT for a food offering in contrast to a drink offering (libation). Modern translations render the term “grain offering.” See Sacrifice and Offering.

MEAT TO IDOLS Offerings of animal flesh sacrificed to a god. Most religions of the ancient Near East had laws regarding offering sacrifices to the god(s). Israel's laws are in Lev. 1-8 and 16-17. Part of the ritual was for the people to eat some of the sacrifice. They believed that God and the people became closer by partaking of the same animal. Since most early Christians had Jewish backgrounds, a problem arose in the church when Gentile converts ate meat that had been offered to idols. The Jerusalem council decided that Christians should abstain from eating meat offered to idols so as not to cause weak believers to stumble. Paul echoed this sentiment in 1 Cor. 8:13.

MEBUNNAI (Mə būn' nī) Personal name meaning “building of Yah.” One of David's 30 elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:27). The name possibly resulted from scribal confusion of the first and third letters in the Hebrew name Sibbecai which replaces Mebunnai in the parallel lists (1 Chron. 11:29; 27:11).

MECHERATHITE (Mə-kâr' á-thit) The title of Hopher, one of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:36). Mecherathite means inhabitant of Mecherah. The site is unknown unless it is to be identified with Maacah (2 Sam. 23:34).

MECONAH (Mə-có' nah) Form of Mekonah preferred by modern translations.

MEDAD (Mə' dād) Personal name meaning "beloved." Israelite layman who prophesied in the wilderness camp (Num. 11:26-27). See Eldad.

MEDAN (Mə' dān) Personal name meaning "judgment." Third son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32) and ancestor of a little-known Arab tribe. The Medan should perhaps be identified with the Badan, a people conquered by Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria (732 B.C.). Others argue for textual corruption of the term Media.

MEDEBA (Méd' ə bá) Place-name meaning "water of quiet." City in Transjordan on the main north-south road (the King's Highway) about 25 miles south of Amman. The strategic importance of Medeba is indicated by frequent references to its changing hands. Sihon King of the Amorites took Medeba from Moab only to have the area pass into Israel's control (Num. 21:24,26,30). Medeba was included in Reuben's tribal allotment (Josh. 13:9,16). According to the Moabite stone, Omri King of Israel (885-874 B.C.) recaptured Medeba. Mesha King of Moab retook the city during the reign of Omri's son. An alliance of Israel, Judah, and Edom recaptured the city but the Israelites withdrew (2 Kings 3:25,27). Jeroboam II again secured control of the city of Israel (2 Kings 14:25). Isaiah 15:2 reflects the city's return to Moab. The site of Medeba is that of the modern city of Madaba.

MEDES, MEDIA (Médz, Mə' dí á) The region south and southwest of the Caspian Sea in the Zagros Mountains inhabited by the Medes, an Aryan people from north and west of the Caspian Sea. It is north of Elam and west of Assyria. The traditional capital of the region was Ecbatana.

Before 1500 B.C. the region was part of the Mitanni kingdom. Later the Elamites controlled the region and its nomadic inhabitants. The people known as the Medes entered the area over a long period between 1400 and 1000 B.C.

The Medes were first reported in history by the Assyrian Shalmaneser III about 850 B.C. They were a group of nomadic tribes rather than a state or kingdom. The Assyrians controlled them or sought to for more than 200 years, though the Medes enjoyed some periods of freedom before the Scythians conquered them in 653 B.C. Sometime before this, Deioces were united and organized the Medes. Despite the Scythians' invasion, the Medes continued to develop as a kingdom.

The greatest Median king was Cyaxares (625-585 B.C.). He was the third ruler of the united Medes and was able to defeat the Scythians. Afterwards Cyaxares turned his attention to the Assyrians, attacking Nineveh, the Assyrian capital. Before Nineveh fell in 612 B.C., Cyaxares conquered Asshur, the ancient center of the Assyrian Empire. Then, with the aid of the Scythians and Babylonians and others, Nineveh was taken. The end of the Assyrian Empire was near.

Babylon and Media divided the Assyrian Empire with Media taking the land east and north of the Tigris River. Nebuchadnezzar II and Cyaxares' granddaughter wed to seal the pact. The Medes turned their attention to the north and toward Asia Minor. After a five-year war with Lydia, Cyaxares concluded a peace in 584 B.C., again sealing it with a marriage. His son Astyages married the daughter of the Lydian king. Astyages became king of the Medes when Cyaxares died.

The end of the Median kingdom came with the rise of Cyrus II, founder of the Persian Empire. Cyrus was king of Anshan and a vassal to Astyages. Indeed, Cyrus' mother was Astyages' daughter. About 550 B.C, encouraged by Babylon, Cyrus rebelled against the Medes. His rebellion led to the defeat of Astyages. The kingdom of the Medes was replaced by the kingdom of the Persians.

Though conquered by the Persians, the Medes continued to hold a place of honor in the Persian Empire. Media was the second-most important portion of the Empire after Persia itself. Biblical references frequently combine “the Medes and the Persians” (Dan. 5:28; cp. Esther 1:19; 10:2). The kings of the Persian Empire are called “the kings of Media and Persia” (Dan. 8:20). The most famous Mede in Scripture is Darius the Mede (Dan. 5:31; 9:1). Media is sometimes referred to as the instrument of God, especially against Babylon (Isa. 13:17; 21:2; Jer. 51:11, 28), but the Medes also had to drink the cup of God's judgment (Jer. 25:25). Their final appearance in Scripture is the presence of Jews or Jewish converts from there at Pentecost (Acts. 2:9). See Assyria; Babylonia; Cyrus; Darius; Elam; Persia.

MEDIATOR The term “mediator” occurs frequently in the Bible, though more frequently in the NT than in the OT. The idea of mediation, though, permeates Scripture, with human mediation being common in the OT, while the mediation of Christ is one of the key themes of the new covenant.

Old Testament In the Hebrew Scriptures priests and prophets are mediators, and, to a lesser degree, kings are as well. In older texts before the initiation of the sacrificial system, fathers stood the mediatorial role for their families (Gen. 8:20; 12:7-8; 15:9-11). The prophet stands between God and man and communicates God's will and word. Moses was the one through whom God revealed his plan for the covenant nation (Deut. 18:18-22). God raised up the prophet Samuel, to whom he spoke directly (1 Sam. 3:1-21). The later prophets were regularly the instruments of God's redemptive and corrective revelation (Isa. 1:2-20; Amos 1-2), and they were considered the “watchmen” of impending destruction who interceded for Israel (Ezek. 33:1-9; cp. Num. 14:11-19).

Priests were mediators also of the Word of God and interpreted his will by teaching Scripture (Neh. 8:1-8), and by appeal to the Urim and Thummim (Exod. 28:30; Lev. 8:8), but more than that, they stood between God and the sinfulness of Israel. The Levites were sanctified to do the work of ministry in the tabernacle/temple and had direct access to God in the services of the sanctuary. Between God and His people is fixed a sin-stained gulf that can only be breached by the sacrifice of an unblemished member of the herd or flock. These sacrifices can only be offered by an authorized person, a priest ordained by birthright and anointed for the task (Exod. 28-29). The priest derived his authority from the system, inaugurated by God's command to Moses; the system did not derive its authority from the priest. These duties were carried out by the priests daily in the various sacrifices (Lev. 1-7), though there were special sacrifices at appointed times, especially the Day of Atonement sacrifice performed only by the high priest once a year (Lev. 16).

In a lesser sense the king stood as mediator, since he was “Yahweh's anointed” (1 Sam. 16:6). As such, he was the type of the true mediatorial Messiah from the line of David who would be prophet, priest, and king (Isa. 61:1-3).

New Testament God the Son became incarnate as a man and fulfilled (and continues to fulfill) the role as the perfect mediator between God and man. Paul declared that man is unable to commune with God unless he comes to Him through Jesus, because there is only one mediator “between God and man, a man, Christ Jesus” (1 Tim. 2:5 HCSB). Christ, who is superior to Moses (Heb. 3:1-6), mediates a new covenant (8:6; 9:15; 12:24) based upon his “once for all” substitutionary death on the cross (7:27) that guarantees that it will be a better covenant (7:22). Jesus takes on the three-fold office as prophet, priest, and king in order to serve as the mediator of His people. As High Priest of the people of God, Jesus has offered up Himself as the propitiation for our sins, turning God's wrath from us (Rom. 3:25, 1 John 2:2) and bringing peace by reconciling us to God (Eph. 2:12-17; Rom. 5:1). Christ's ministry as mediator continues on as He sits enthroned in heaven. Because Jesus was raised and continues to live forever, so does His priesthood, which assures Christians that He will always save and intercede for them (Heb. 7:24-25; Rom. 8:34). Through the mediatorial work on the cross believers can boldly enter the sanctuary (holy of holies) and approach the throne of grace to find aid (Heb. 4:14; 9:12; 10:19-23). Christ, being both fully God and fully man, is a mediator and high priest who can sympathize with our weaknesses and therefore assures us that we will receive grace and mercy (Heb. 4:15-16).

MEDICINE See Diseases.

MEDITATION Act of calling to mind some supposition, pondering upon it, and correlating it to one's own life. A wicked individual meditates upon violence (Prov. 24: 2). The meditation of a righteous person contemplates God or His great spiritual truths (Pss. 63:6; 77:12; 119:15, 23, 27, 48, 78, 97, 148; 143:5). He hopes to please God by meditation (Ps. 19:14). Thus meditation by God's people is a reverent act of worship. Through it they commune with God and are thereby renewed spiritually.

Most references to meditation occur in the OT, especially in the Psalms. The Hebrew words for meditation primarily were derived from two separate roots. The first (hagah) literally means “to utter in a low sound.” The word is used to denote the growling of a lion (Isa. 31:4) or the cooing of a dove (Isa. 38:14). Therefore it has been suggested that in ancient Hebrew meditation Scripture frequently was recited in a low murmur. The second root word (siach) has the basic meaning of “to be occupied with,” or “concerned about.” Thus meditation is the repetitious going over of a matter in one's mind because it is the chief concern of life. The constant recollection of God's past deeds by the hearing of Scripture and repetition of thought produce confidence in God (Pss. 63:6-8; 104:34; 119:15,23,48,78,97,99,148; 143:5).

Meditation is only mentioned twice in the NT. Jesus instructed Christians to meditate beforehand on their attitude toward persecution (Luke 21:14). Paul advised Timothy to meditate on the matters about which Paul had written him (1 Tim. 4:15). Meditation is an important part of the Christian's relationship with Christ. See Prayer.

MEDITERRANEAN SEA (Méd'ī tēr rā' nō'ân) Designated in the OT and the NT simply as “the sea” (Josh. 16:8; Acts 10:6); also referred to as the “Western Sea” (Deut. 11:24 RSV, NIV); and as the “Sea of the Philistines” (Exod. 23:31). The Mediterranean Sea is an inland ocean extending about 2,200 miles from Gibraltar to the Lebanon coast and varies in width 100-600 miles. Most of the important nations of ancient times were either on the Mediterranean's shores or operated in its 2,200 miles of water: Israel, Syria, Greece, Rome, Egypt, Philistia, and Phoenicia. Strangely, nature has provided few natural harbors for Israel (Dor, Joppa, and Acco). The shoreline is almost straight. In many places a high ridge rises up sharply from behind a narrow strip of beach.

The Hebrews were not a seafaring people. A more apt description might be that they were a “sea-fearing” people. The Hebrew's fear of the sea was partially due to their desert origin; therefore, their culture developed chiefly around agriculture. The story of Jonah demonstrates the Hebrew's fear of the sea.

God exercises leadership over all creation. As part of God's creation, the sea is subservient to Him. He rules over the raging sea (Ps. 89:9) and causes a storm on it (Jon. 1:4).

Sunset over the Mediterranean Sea.

For the Hebrews the Great Sea served as the western border for the land of Canaan (Num. 34:6) and the territory of Judah (Josh. 15:12). Only with the aid of the Phoenicians was Solomon able to assemble and operate a fleet of ships at Ezion Geber on the Red Sea. Timber was brought on rafts from Lebanon to Joppa (2 Chron. 2:16). Jehoshaphat's attempt at a navy ended in disaster (1 Kings 22:47-50). His ships were wrecked in the same harbor. Maritime commerce remained limited during most periods in Israel's history. Phoenicians were famous in the ancient world for their capacity as sailors and pilots.

Tyre eventually became the principal sea power in the Mediterranean. The extensive use of the Mediterranean by the Phoenicians was continued by the Romans who called it "Our Sea." Following the conquest of Palestine by Pompey in 63 B.C., traffic on the Mediterranean increased. This development helped to make possible the missionary activity of Paul, Silas, Barnabas, and others. Paul made three missionary journeys across the Mediterranean. Under Roman arrest, Paul made his final voyage across the Mediterranean Sea and shipwrecked (Acts 27). Paul's work involved such Mediterranean cities as Caesarea, Antioch, Troas, Corinth, Tyre, Sidon, Syracuse, Rome, and Ephesus. See Phoenicia; Transportation and Travel; Tyre.

MEDIUM One possessed by (Lev. 20:6) or consulting (Deut. 18:11) a ghost or spirit of the dead, especially for information about the future. Acting as a medium was punishable by stoning (Lev. 20:27); consulting a medium, by exclusion from the congregation of Israel (Lev. 20:6). The transformation of Saul from one who expelled mediums (1 Sam. 28:3) to one who consulted a medium at En-dor (28:8-19) graphically illustrates his fall.

The Hebrew word translated medium ('ov) may refer to the spirit of a dead person, to the medium possessed by the spirit, or to images used to conjure up spirits. Manasseh made such images (2 Kings 21:6; 2 Chron. 33:6). Josiah destroyed them as part of his reforms (2 Kings 23:24). Saul's success in quickly locating a medium (1 Sam. 28:8) points both to the popularity of the practice of consulting the dead and the difficulty of eradicating it.

Isaiah 8:19 suggests a possible connection between the consulting of mediums and ancestor worship. Those to be consulted are termed “fathers” and “gods” (cp. 1 Sam. 28:13 where Samuel is described as Elohim or “god”). The chirping and muttering of the spirits perhaps refers to the inarticulate sounds that must be interpreted by the medium. Consulting of mediums defiled the land and was described as prostitution. God's people were to trust God in times of distress and not resort to other “gods” in an attempt to learn the future.

MEEKNESS Moral quality of humility and gentleness, usually exhibited during suffering or difficulty and accompanied by faith in God. The word “meek” or “meekness” is often used in older versions of the Bible to translate the Hebrew word anav, the Greek word praus, and their related forms. The opposite of meekness is a harsh and proud wickedness that insists on immediate self-vindication (Prov. 3:33-34; 16:19; Isa. 32:7).

While the KJV employs “meek” or “meekness” 31 times, most modern English translations of the Bible favor “gentle” or “humble.” Biblical meekness is usually not simply gentleness and humility but those qualities displayed with integrity during times of trial.

While God can be described as “meek” or “gentle” in His dealings with humanity (2 Sam. 22:36; Ps. 18:35), meekness is primarily a character trait associated with the human condition (Ps. 9:12; Prov. 15:33; 22:4; Zeph. 2:3). In the OT God often promises deliverance or salvation to the “meek,” who are righteous persons suffering injustice, poverty, or oppression (Pss. 9:18; 10:12,17; 22:26; 25:9; 34:2; 37:11; 69:32; 76:9; 147:6; 149:4; Isa. 11:4; 29:19; 61:1). In the NT Jesus is presented as the preeminent example of meekness (Matt. 11:29; 21:5; 2 Cor. 10:1). Likewise, patient, humble, and faithful (“meek”) disciples, although presently suffering the same rejection as their Messiah, will one day be vindicated by God (Matt. 5:5, 11-12).

Paul and other NT writers teach that meekness should typify family, church, and societal relationships (Gal. 6:1; Eph. 4:2; Col. 3:12; 1 Tim. 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:25; Titus 3:2; James 1:21; 3:13; 1 Pet. 3:4,15). Such meekness is part of the “fruit of the Spirit,” which is produced in believers by the indwelling Holy Spirit (Gal. 5:23). See Humility; Patience; Poor in Spirit.

MEGIDDO (Mə gīd' dō) Place-name, perhaps meaning “place of troops.” One of the most strategic cities of Canaan since it guarded the main pass through the Carmel mountain range. This range was an obstacle along the International Coastal Highway that connected Egypt with Mesopotamia and even further destinations. Identified with current Tell el-Mutesellim, Megiddo had approximately 25 different eras of occupation during its life from the fourth millennium to the time of the Persian Empire. The city was very active while under Egyptian authority from the time of the patriarchs through to the judges (2000-1100 B.C), but this golden age came to an end about 1125 B.C. when it was destroyed.

The city was allotted to Manasseh (Josh. 17:11; 1 Chron. 7:29) after the partial conquest of Joshua (Josh. 12:21), but neither it nor its surrounding villages were secured by the tribe. Due to its obvious strength, it was among many cities whose overthrow was delayed until later (Judg. 1:27). Deborah and Barak fought the Canaanites and their leaders King Jabin and Sisera near the “waters of Megiddo,” possibly the Wadi Qina running through the surrounding hills (Judg. 5:19).

Manger and “hitching post” stones likely from a ninth-century B.C. storage area at Megiddo.

When Megiddo was finally annexed to the nation Israel is not known. Probably by the time of David the city was serving Israel's defensive and security purposes. Certainly by the time of Solomon the city was firmly Israelite, since he fortified the city (1 Kings 9:15), including his mighty six-chambered gate which followed the pattern of his other two key fortress cities of Hazor and Gezer.

A view from Megiddo of the Valley of Jezreel with the town of Nazareth in the distance.

Model of ancient Megiddo.

Megiddo was under the jurisdiction of Solomon's deputy, Baana (1 Kings 4:12). Buildings of current controversy have been excavated and explained variously as Solomon's or Ahab's stables, or storehouses where animals were loaded and unloaded.

During the divided monarchy, Megiddo's authority changed from Egyptian to Israelite to Assyrian. Five years into Jeroboam I's reign (ca. 920 B.C.), Pharaoh Shishak burst into both Israel and Judah, taking control of the coastal highway including Megiddo. However the Egyptian grip was not long lasting. Later the city was the place of death for the Judean king, Ahaziah, who was killed at the command of Jehu while fleeing from the scene of Jehoram's assassination (843 B.C., 2 Kings 9:27). Over a century later, the conquering Tiglath-pileser III chose Megiddo to be the seat of the Magidu administrative district in the Assyrian Empire (733 B.C.).

A Solomonic gateway area at ancient Megiddo.

After about 650 B.C. the city was no longer strongly fortified; however it was still strategically important. Josiah attempted to head off Pharaoh Neco II as he advanced along the coastal plain on his way to Carchemish (609 B.C.), but Josiah's attack ended when Neco II's archers fatally wounded him (2 Kings 23:29-30; 2 Chron. 35:22-24).

After returning from exile, Zechariah prophesied that the mourning for the false deities of Hadad and Rimmon (Hadad-rimmon) that took place in the plain below Megiddon (Megiddo) would be matched by Israel's mourning for its smitten Lord (Zech. 12:11).

Finally, in the NT, the Mount of Megiddo (har-Megiddon thus “Armageddon”) will be where the kings of the world are gathered for that final battle in the last day of the Lord. Where Israel was initially frustrated during their conquest of Canaan is exactly where they will be victorious with Christ in the end (Rev 16:16).

MEGIDDON, VALLEY OF (Mə gīd’ dōn) KJV term for plain of Megiddo, the broad portion of the Jezreel Valley in the vicinity of Megiddo (Zech. 12:11). The passage perhaps alludes to the death of Josiah on this plain (2 Chron. 35:22). See Megiddo.

MEHETABEEL (Mə hēt’ á bēl) Personal name meaning “God does good.” Ancestor of Shemiah, a contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh. 6:10). Modern translations use the form Mehetabel.

MEHETABEL (Mə hēt’ á bēl) Personal name meaning “God does good.” Wife of King Hadar of Edom (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chron. 1:50). Modern translations follow the Hebrew and also use Mehetabel for the KJV's Mehetabeel (Neh. 6:10).

MEHIDA (Mə hī’ dá) Personal name meaning “bought.” Family of temple servants (KJV “Nethinim”) at Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54.

MEHIR (Mē’ hīr) Personal name meaning “purchased.” Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:11).

MEHOLAH (Mə hō’ lah) (TEV) or MEHOLATHITE (Mə hō lá thīt) Title meaning inhabitant of AM-Meholah, given to Adriel, Saul's son-in-law (1 Sam. 18:19; 2 Sam. 21:8). Abel-Meholah is located in Gilead about 14 miles southeast of Beth-shean.

MEHUJAEL (Mə hu’ jā ēl) Personal name meaning “struck by God” or “priest of God.” Son of Irad (Gen. 4:18). Some interpreters see the name as a variant form of Mahalelel (Gen. 5:12-17).

MEHUMAN (Mə hū' mǎn) Personal name meaning “trusty.” Eunuch serving the Persian king Ahasuerus (Esther 1:10).

MEHUNIM (Mə hū' nīm) KJV form of Meunim or Meunites, an Arab tribe whose name likely derives from the city of Ma'an about 12 miles southeast of Petra. The Meunites raided Judah during the reign of Jehoshaphat (873-849 B.C.) according to 2 Chron. 20:1 (NASB, NIV, REB, NRSV following the Greek translation; the Hebrew text reads “Ammonites”). Uzziah (783-742 B.C.) subdued the Mehunites (2 Chron. 26:7). During the reign of Hezekiah (727-698 B.C.), Israelites dislocated the Meunites from the vicinity of Gedor in Transjordan about 18 miles north-northwest of Heshbon (1 Chron. 4:41; KJV, “habitations”). The Meunites are listed as temple servants in the postexilic period (Ezra 2:50; Neh. 7:52). They were perhaps the descendants of prisoners of war.

MEJARKON (Mě jār' kōn) Name meaning “waters of Jarkon” or “pale-green waters.” Stream in the territory of Dan (Josh. 19:46), probably the Nahr el-'Auja (“winding river”), which, fed by springs at Ras el-'Ain about 10 miles from the coast, flows year-round to the Mediterranean about four miles north of Joppa.

MEKERATHITE (Mě kē' rá thī) (NIV) See Mecherathite.

MEKONAH (Mə kō' nah) Place-name meaning “standing.” KJV form of Meconah, town in southern Judah between Ziklag and Ainrimmon (Neh. 11:28). The site is perhaps identical with Madmannah or Machbena (1 Chron. 2:49).

MELATIAH (Mě lá tí' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah has set free.” Man who assisted Nehemiah in building the wall (Neh. 3:7).

MELCHI (Měi' kī) Personal name meaning “my king.” Two ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:24,28).

MELCHIAH (Měi kī' ah) (KJV, Jer. 21:1) See Malchijah.

MELCHISHUA (Mēl kī shū' ā) (KJV, 1 Sam. 14:49; 31:2) See Malchishua.

MELCHIZEDEK (Mēl kīz' ə dēk) Personal name meaning “Zedek is my king” or “My king is righteousness.” Priest and king of Salem, a city identified with Jerusalem.

Old Testament When Abraham returned from the Valley of Siddim where he defeated Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and the kings aligned with Chedorlaomer, Melchizedek greeted Abraham with bread and wine. He blessed Abraham in the name of “God Most High.” In return, Abraham gave Melchizedek a tenth of everything (Gen. 14:20).

Melchizedek and Abraham both worshiped the one true God. Abraham also appeared to recognize the role of Melchizedek as a priest. Psalm 110:4 refers to one who would be forever a priest in the “order of Melchizedek.” This messianic psalm teaches that the leader or ruler of the Hebrew nation would be able to reflect in his person the role of priest as well as the role of king.

New Testament The writer of Hebrews made several references in chapters 5-7 to Jesus' priesthood being of the “order of Melchizedek” as opposed to Levitical in nature. The author of Hebrews cited Ps. 110:4. For the writer of Hebrews, only Jesus, whose life could not be destroyed by death, fit the psalmist's description of a priest of “the order of Melchizedek.”

MELZAR (Mēl' zār) KJV transliteration of what is likely an Assyrian loanword meaning “guard” (NIV), “overseer” (NASB), or “steward” (RSV) at Dan. 1:11,16. The KJV follows some early versions (Theodotian, Lucian, the Syriac, the Vulgate) in taking Melzar as a proper name. Modern translators point to the use of the article as evidence of a title.

MEM (Mēm) Thirteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet which serves as the heading for Ps. 119:97-104. Each of these verses begins with this letter.

MEMBERS Term used to describe body parts or individuals composing a group. Jesus warned of body parts which cause one to sin (Matt. 5:29). As a Christian Paul struggled with the reality of body parts which continue to give in to sin (Rom. 6:13). The bodily members are the sphere where the law of sin (Rom. 7:23) and passions (James 4:1) are at work. The image of various body parts cooperating in the life of one organism frequently serves to illustrate the unity of the church which is composed of different individuals exercising various, necessary functions (Rom. 12:4-5; 1 Cor. 12:12,27; cp. Eph. 4:25; 5:30). See Body; Body of Christ; Church.

MEMORIAL Something which serves as a reminder. Scripture witnesses to God's participation in human history for the salvation of God's people. Memorials to such events reinforced faith and provided opportunities for teaching. God's covenant name (Yahweh) was to be a “memorial name” (Exod. 3:15 NASB), a reminder of God's liberation of God's people. The Passover served as a similar reminder (Exod. 12:14; 13:9). The 12 stones taken from the Jordan's bed served as a reminder of God's provision of passage across the Jordan (Josh. 4:7). In the NT the Lord's Supper serves as a reminder of Christ's sacrificial death and an encouragement of His future coming (Matt. 26:13; Mark 14:9; 1 Cor. 11:25-26). All these memorials serve to “proclaim” the good news of what God has done.

MEMPHIS (Mēm' phis) Place-name meaning “the abode of the good one.” An ancient capital of Egypt located just south of modern Cairo on the west bank of the Nile River. It was founded by Menes, a pharaoh of the First Dynasty (about 2800 B.C.) and became the capital of Egypt as the Third Dynasty came to power (about 2686 B.C.). For over 300 years Memphis was the principal city of Egypt. Gradually, other cities grew in importance, and Memphis was eclipsed as the seat of power. During later dynasties Thebes and Avaris/Tanis served as the capital. Memphis regained its status as capital during the Hyksos reign (1750-1570) but was replaced when the alien occupation ended.

There remains little, architecturally, to attest to the glory and grandeur once enjoyed by the city. As the Moslems began to build Cairo, they raided the buildings of Memphis for material, even dismantling the temple of Ptah, which probably was the largest and most opulent structure in the city.

MEMUCAN (Mə mū' cān) One of the seven princes who served as advisors to King Ahasuerus of Persia (Esther 1:14,16,21). See Marsena.

One of several small sphinxes located at Memphis on the Nile River in Egypt.

MEN-PLEASERS Those who serve (only) to gain approval or win favor (Eph. 6:6; Col. 3:22).

MENAHM (Mēn' á hēm) Personal name meaning "consoler." King of Israel 752-742 B.C. Menahem became king by assassinating Shallum, who had killed King Zechariah only a month earlier (2 Kings 15:10-14). The period following the death of Jeroboam II in 753 B.C. was filled with turmoil. Several political factions fought for control. Shallum and Menahem each led an extremist party that sought the throne. They ruled by force. After becoming king Menahem attacked and destroyed one of Israel's cities because it resisted his rule (2 Kings 15:16). He ruled at least 10 years in Samaria. A significant event recorded about his reign is that he paid tribute to Tiglathpileser III, the king of Assyria. This is the first mention of the Assyrian monarch in the biblical record. It is possible that Menahem obtained the throne of Israel with Tiglathpileser's help. In any event, Menahem was little more than a puppet of the Assyrians during his reign. He was succeeded by his son, Pekahiah. See Tiglath-pileser.

MENAN (Mē' nān) (KJV) See Menna.

MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN (Mē' nā, mē' nā, tēk' əl, ū phār' sīn) Inscription that King Belshazzar of Babylon saw the fingers of a man's hand write on his palace wall as the king and his guests drank from the gold vessels taken from the temple in Jerusalem (Dan. 5:1-29). After the wise men of the kingdom could not decipher the writing, Daniel was brought in to give an interpretation.

Scholars have proposed a number of translations, the best of which probably is “mina, shekel, and halves.” Daniel interpreted the inscription with a wordplay using Hebrew words which sound similar to each word of the inscription, taking it to mean “numbered, weighed, and divided.”

Daniel's interpretation was that Belshazzar and his kingdom had been weighed in the balance and found wanting. The kingdom would be divided and given to his enemies, the Medes and Persians. Daniel 5:30 records that the overthrow occurred that very night. Thus God worked through Daniel to show His wisdom was greater than that of Persia's wise counselors and magicians, and only the God of Israel controlled history and human destiny.

MENI (Mə nē') Personal name meaning “to count” or “to apportion.” God of good luck worshiped together with the god Gad by Jewish apostates, probably in the Postexilic period (Isa. 65:11 NASB margin). The god is possibly identical with Manat, a deity worshiped by the Arabs before the rise of Islam. The KJV translated the god's name as “that number.” Modern translations prefer the translation “Destiny.”

MENNA (Mě'n' nâ) Name of an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:31). Form of Menan preferred by modern translations.

MENORAH (Mě' nô rah) Candelabrum used in Jewish worship, specifically the branched lampstand used in the tabernacle (Exod. 25:31-35; 37:17-20; cp. Zech. 4:2, 11). See Lamps, Lighting, Lampstand.

MENUHOTH (Mě nû' hōth) Name meaning “resting places. “Family descended from Judah (1 Chron. 2:52 NRSV) or their town (TEV). Other English translations take this family as the other half of the Manahethites (KJV, REB; Manahathites, NASB, NIV) mentioned in 1 Chron. 2:54. Menuhoth was possibly located to the northwest of Jerusalem towards Kiriath-jearim.

MEONENIM, PLAIN OF (Mə ðn' ə nīm) Meonenim is the Hebrew term for diviners or soothsayers (Deut. 18:10,14; Mic. 5:12). The KJV understood Meonenim as a proper name at Judg. 9:37. See Diviner's Oat

MEONOTHAI (Mə ðn' ə thī) Personal name meaning “habitations of the Lord.” A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:14).

MEPHAATH (Měph á' áth) Place-name meaning “height.” Town in Reuben's tribal allotment (Josh. 13:18), assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:37; 1 Chron. 6:79). In Jeremiah's time the town was in Moabite hands (Jer. 48:21). The site is perhaps that of modern Jawah about six miles south of Amman.

MEPHIBOSHETH (Mě phīb' ə shēth) Personal name meaning “shame destroyer” or “image breaker.” 1. Son of Jonathan who was granted special position and privilege in David's court (2 Sam. 9). Jonathan was killed in battle when Mephibosheth was five years old. Fearing that the Philistines would seek the life of the young boy, a nurse fled with him, but in her haste she dropped him and crippled him in both feet (2 Sam. 4:4). Mephibosheth may be an intentional change by copyists to avoid writing the pagan god's name “baal.” The original name would be Meribaal (1 Chron. 8:34). When David invited Mephibosheth to be a part of his court, he entrusted the family property to a steward, Ziba. During the Absalom rebellion Ziba tried unsuccessfully to turn David against Mephibosheth. Upon the king's return to Jerusalem, Mephibosheth vindicated himself and was allowed to remain in the king's house (2 Sam. 16; 19). See Meribaal. 2. Son of Saul, who with six other members of Saul's household, was delivered by David to the Gibeonites to be hanged. This was in retaliation for Saul's earlier slaughter of a band of Gibeonites (2 Sam. 21:1-9). Mephibosheth's mother guarded the bodies until the time of burial.

MERAB (Mē' rāb) Personal name from the root “to become many.” Eldest daughter of King Saul (1 Sam. 14:49), who was twice promised to David in exchange for killing Goliath (1 Sam. 17:25) and for fighting the Lord's battles against the Philistines (1 Sam. 18:17-19). Saul reneged on his promise and gave Merab to Adriel. Modern translators based on context and a few ancient texts often read “Merab” instead of the Hebrew text's “Michal” in 2 Sam. 21:8.

MERAI AH (Mə rā' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah has promised” or “stubborn.” Head of a priestly family in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:12).

MERAIOTH (Mə rā' ōth) Personal name meaning “obstinate” or “rebellious.” 1. Ancestor of the Zadokite high priests (1 Chron. 6:6-7,52). 2. Ancestor of Ezra the scribe, perhaps identical with 1. (Ezra 7:3; 1 Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11). 3. Priestly family in the postexilic period (Neh. 12:15), perhaps a scribal corruption of Meremoth (Neh. 12:3).

MERARI (Mə rār' ē) Personal name meaning “bitterness” or “gall.” Third son of Levi (Gen. 46:11; Exod. 6:16; Num. 3:17; 1 Chron. 6:1,16; 23:6). Merari was the ancestor of a division of priests, the Merarites.

Trajan's Market in Rome, a large second-century A.D. “shopping center” where merchants sold their wares.

MERARITES (Mə rār' its) Major division of priests descended from Merari, the third son of Levi. The Merarites and Gershonites were responsible for the setup, breakdown, and transport of the tabernacle (Num. 10:17; cp. 3:36-37; 4:29-33; 7:8). The Merarites received an allotment of 12 cities from the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Zebulun, including Ramoth-gilead, a city of refuge (Josh. 21:7,34-40; 1 Chron. 6:63,77-81). Representatives of the Merarites participated in David's move of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:6), served as tabernacle musicians (1 Chron. 15:17, 19) and gatekeepers (1 Chron. 26:10, 19), shared in Hezekiah's (2 Chron. 29:12) and Josiah's (2 Chron. 34:12) reforms, and returned from exile to assist in the new temple (Ezra 8:19).

MERATHAIM (Mēr á thá' ym) Place-name meaning “double bitterness,” or “double rebellion,” possibly a play on the Akkadian phrase mat marrati (“Land of the Bitter River”) or on nar marratu, a designation for the area touching the Persian Gulf known from Babylonian inscriptions. Jeremiah (50:21) announced God's judgment on the land.

MERCHANT Buyer and seller of goods for profit. With the exception of the period of Solomon (1 Kings 9:26-28; 10:15,22), Israel was not known in biblical times as a nation of merchants. References to Israelites involved in trade are surprisingly few. Israelites were prohibited from selling food to fellow Israelites for profit (Lev. 25:37) but could sell even carrion to a foreigner (Deut. 14:21). Merchants purchased cloth from housewives (Prov. 31:24); olive oil was sold (2 Kings 4:7). Abuses by merchants were often condemned: holding back grain to force up prices (Prov. 11:26); impatience for Sabbath or holy days to conclude so that commerce might resume; dishonest scales (Amos 8:5); forcing fellow Israelites into slavery to buy food (Neh. 5:1-8); violation of the Sabbath (Neh. 13:15-21). Jerusalem merchants assisted in Nehemiah's reconstruction of the walls, perhaps by providing finances (Neh. 3:32).

The majority of OT references to merchants concern nations other than Israel. The term translated as merchant or trader at Prov. 31:24 and Hos. 12:7 is, in fact, the word for Canaanite. Men of Tyre sold fish and all kinds of merchandise in postexilic Jerusalem (Neh. 13:16). Ezekiel 27:12-25 recounts the activities of the merchants of Tyre in full. They traded in common and precious metals, slaves, livestock, precious stones, ivory, wool, cloth, clothing, agricultural produce, wine, spices, and carpets (cp. Rev. 18:11-13). Tyre's trading partners included 22 nations or peoples encompassing Asia Minor, Palestine, Syria, Arabia, and Mesopotamia. Merchants generated great wealth. The prophets railed against the pride that accompanied merchants' material successes (Isa. 23; Ezek. 27).

In the NT Jesus used a merchant to illustrate the need to risk all to gain the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 13:45-46). Other references continue the prophetic attack on arrogant merchants. James 4:13 warns big businessmen who engaged in long-term foreign ventures not to dismiss God when making plans. Revelation condemns Roman merchants who grew rich on the sins of Rome (Rev. 18:3). MERCY Characteristic and action that comes from the very nature of God. On the human level it is best described as one's consideration of the condition and needs of his fellowman. It is an essential disposition of a covenant people, especially Israel and the church. In the OT God's mercy was not primarily given to people outside His covenant community but was expressed mainly towards His people Israel. It also became the expected attitude and action of the people of Israel towards one another. This expectation was passed on to the church and became a chief tenet in the lifestyle of believers. Jesus made it an essential part of His Christian manifesto in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:7). In both OT and NT mercy is an action taken by the strong towards the weak, the rich towards the poor, the insider towards the outsider, those who have towards those who have not.

Mercy as given by God is the foundation of forgiveness. It is His faithfulness and steadfast love. God is not seen as displaying an emotion called mercy but as taking merciful action. This action was taken as Israel was in need: provisions such as manna in the wilderness (Exod. 16:31-35), protection such as the Shepherd who keeps Israel and does not sleep (Ps. 121), and deliverance (Pss. 56:12-13; 107) as Yahweh who delivered His people from Egypt (1 Sam. 10:18). Mercy has never been the benefit of God's people because of their merit but is always the gift of God. "The LORD, the LORD God, compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in loving kindness and truth; who keeps loving kindness for thousands, who forgives iniquity, transgression and sin; yet He will by no means leave [the guilty] unpunished, visiting the iniquity of fathers on the children and on the grandchildren to the third and fourth generations" (Exod. 34:6-7 NASB).

God's justice and righteousness cannot be overlooked in this matter of mercy. Exodus 34:7 makes it clear that God's judgment will override His mercy where man's sinful rebellion turns away from His righteousness and love. Here God's mercy is manifested in His slow action and deferred punishment, not in ignoring sin and refusing to act in wrath. "The Lord does not delay His promise, as some understand delay, but is patient with you, not wanting any to perish, but all to come to repentance. But the Day of the Lord will come like a thief; on that day the heavens will pass away with a loud noise, the elements will burn and be dissolved, and the earth and the works on it will be disclosed” (2 Pet. 3:9-10 HCSB). God's wrath is the resulting action against man's rebellion after His mercy has been exhausted. In the OT God's wrath is exercised on the heathen nations as a result of their wickedness (Gen.18-19) and hostility to His people. God also expressed His wrath and withdrew His mercy from His beloved Israel and Judah.

Mercy in the NT is generally described by several root words: splanchnon, usually translated “compassion” or “bowels of mercy;” eleos, meaning “mercy;” oiktirmos, rendered “pity,” “mercy,” and “compassion.” The word hileos is rarely used and translates “merciful” and “propitious.” It is always used of God's mercy and is by some translated “forgive” (NIV). The HCSB translates Heb. 8:12, “For I will be merciful to their wrongdoing, and I will never again remember their sins.” A form of the word is used in 1 John 2:2, “He Himself [Jesus] is the propitiation (hilasmos) for our sins, and not only for ours, but also for those of the whole world” (HCSB). This is the word in the Septuagint, hilasterion, which is used to translate the Hebrew kapporet, “mercy seat” where the blood of the atonement was sprinkled. In the greatest sense Jesus was the full expression of the mercy of God. No one embodies and personally illustrates the meaning of mercy as does Jesus. Like the Father, Jesus moved well beyond feeling compassion on the suffering. He always was “moved with compassion” and “showed mercy” when He encountered those hurting or down and out. His greatest illustration of the meaning of mercy is perhaps the story of the good Samaritan, which was used to answer the scribe's question, “Who is my neighbor?” In the story two of the words mentioned above are used. Jesus said that when the Samaritan saw the man, he had compassion (splanchnizomai). His resultant action described a mercy that does more than feel, a mercy that takes action. At the end of the story, Jesus asked the scribe which man proved to be the neighbor. The scribe's answer was, “The one who showed mercy (eleos).”

The many ways that Jesus expressed His mercy are woven throughout the Gospels. He is seen stopping in a crowded procession to invite Himself to be the social guest at the house of a despised little tax collector (Luke 19:1-10). He cleansed lepers (Mark 1:41), taught the ignorant multitudes, was moved with compassion and healed the sick, and relieved their hunger with a boy's small lunch (Matt. 14:14-21). Jesus gave sight to the blind (Matt. 20:34), made the lame to walk (John 5:2-9), and raised the dead (Luke 7:2-15). His words sent back to John the Baptist about His identity and ministry summarize the scope of His mercy. "Go and report to John the things you have seen and heard: The blind receive sight, the lame walk, lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the poor have the good news preached to them" (Luke 7:22 HCSB).

In both OT and NT mercy is always extended by the larger to the smaller, the rich to the poor, the strong to the weak, and the Righteous One to the sinner. God's chief disposition towards sinful man is mercy, spawned by His love, which exerts His power to bring sinful man back to Himself. Mercy from God is never deserved and is always generated by His character and not man's. The word hilaskomai, "to be merciful," "to be propitious," expresses God's mercy that makes atonement for undeserving man's sin. Salvation is God's merciful act of withholding His wrath and eternal punishment as well as His grace in granting forgiveness and eternal life. Paul points out that God has said to Moses, "'I will show mercy to whom I show mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion.' So then it does not depend on human will or effort, but on God who shows mercy" (Rom. 9:15-16 HCSB). He goes on to say that Jews and Gentiles, who are both vessels of wrath, have become vessels of mercy. "So then," continues Paul, "He shows mercy to whom He wills, and He hardens whom He wills" (9:18).

Mercy is not only a central focus of the ministry of Jesus and the Father; it is also to be the practice of all believers. Jesus made it an essential ingredient of the life and manner of the believer when He spoke the Beatitudes in the Sermon on the Mount; "Blessed are the merciful, because they will be shown mercy" (Matt 5:7 HCSB). As noted earlier in this article, the mercy of the good Samaritan is lifted up as an example for all believers. Paul introduced the idea that showing mercy is a spiritual gift. “According to the grace given to us, we have different gifts: ...if exhorting, in exhortation; giving, with generosity; leading, with diligence; showing mercy, with cheerfulness” (Rom. 12:6,8 HCSB). The church of Jerusalem in Acts 2 exhibited the essence of the heart and spirit required of every believer as they brought all their goods together in their time of hardship so they might survive (Acts 2:44-47). This was a spirit of mercy that came out of the heart of the faith demonstrated by Jesus. James taught what heavenly wisdom and true religion is: “The wisdom from above is first pure then peace-loving, gentle, compliant, full of mercy and good fruits, without favoritism and hypocrisy” (James 3:17 HCSB). He described “pure and undefiled religion before God our Father is this: to look after orphans and widows in their distress and to keep oneself unstained by the world” (James 1:27 HCSB). This is mercy in action that moves beyond mere emotion and brings about healing, restoration, or whatever need that sparks the act of mercy.

If mercy is action of the stronger based on response to plight or need of the weaker, it could be asked if mercy can be expressed in the opposite situation. The NT shows that it can be. The ethic that Jesus calls for is “turning the other cheek,” “walking the second mile,” and “blessing those who curse you.” Jesus Himself embodied this very teaching. Mercy can be expressed by the person on the bottom towards the person on top. This is the very genius of the Christian faith. See for example the words of Jesus uttered in dying agony from the cross, “Father, forgive them, because they do not know what they are doing” (Luke 23:34 HCSB). Then there are the similar words of Stephen as the stones pounded upon his head and body: “Then he knelt down and cried out with a loud voice, 'Lord, do not charge them with this sin!' And saying this, he fell asleep” (Acts 7:60 HCSB). Thus, mercy is a feeling calling for action even by the oppressed towards the oppressor, the weak towards the strong, the victim towards the victor. “But I say to you who listen: Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, bless those who curse you, pray for those who mistreat you” (Luke 6:27-28 HCSB).

MERCY SEAT Slab of pure gold measuring about 45 inches by 27 inches that sat atop the ark of the covenant which was the same size. It was the base for the golden cherubim (Exod. 25:17-19,21) and symbolized the throne from which God ruled Israel (Lev. 16:2; Num. 7:89). On the Day of Atonement, the high priest sprinkled the blood of a sacrificial lamb on the mercy seat as a plea for forgiveness for the sins of the nation (Lev. 16:15). The Hebrew word means literally “to wipe out” or “cover over.” This has led modern translators to render the term “cover” (REB, NRSV note), “lid” (TEV), or “atonement cover” (NIV). “Mercy seat” is based on the earliest Greek and Latin translations. The mercy seat has been replaced as the symbol and place of God's presence and atonement. Christ's cross and resurrection showed the perfect presence and accomplished atonement once for all (Heb. 9).

MERED (Mē' rēd) Personal name meaning “rebel.” Descendant of King David who married Bithiah, a daughter of Pharaoh (1 Chron. 4:17-18), perhaps as part of a political alliance.

MEREMOTH (Mēr' ə mōth) Personal name meaning “heights.” 1. Priest who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:3). 2. Priest in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah who assisted with the temple treasury (Ezra 8:33), with the repair of the walls (Neh. 3:4, 21), and witnessed the renewal of the covenant (Neh. 10:5). 3. Layman with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:36).

MERIBBAAL (Mērɪb bā' ʔl) Personal name of disputed meaning: “opponent of Baal,” “obstinacy of Baal,” “beloved or hero of Baal,” or “Baal defends.” Original name of Mephibosheth. Apparently later copyists of text changed name with Baal to avoid use of pagan god's name (1 Chron. 8:34; 9:40, the latter with the Hebrew spelling “hero” compared to the former's spelling “opponent”). See Mephibosheth.

MERNEPTAH (Mēr' nē ptā) Personal name meaning “beloved of Ptah” (god honored in Memphis, Egypt). Ruler in the 19th Dynasty of Egypt 1236-1223 B.C. or 1224-1216 B.C. A stele produced during his rule is the earliest known nonbiblical reference to the Israelites. The stele praises Merneptah's conquest of Canaan, Ashkelon, Gezer, Yanoam, and Israel, Israel being marked as a people rather than a geographical place. Merneptah claimed to have “laid waste” to Israel. The stele shows that a people Israel existed in Canaan no later than 1220 B.C. and had sufficient strength to fight Merneptah even though they lost, if his account is accurate. They may have been an ally of three city-states opposing Merneptah.

MERODACH (Mər ō' dāk) Hebrew form of Marduk, the chief god of Babylon, also called Bel, corresponding to the Semitic Baal or “Lord” (Jer. 50:2). Merodach is an element in the names of the Babylonian kings Merodachbaladan (2 Kings 20:12; Isa. 39:1) and Evilmerodach (2 Kings 25:27; Jer. 52:31). With a different vocalization Merodach yields the name Mordecai (Esther 2:5). See Gods, Pagan.

MERODACH-BALADAN (Mə rō' dāk-bāl' á dan) Personal name meaning “god Marduk gave an heir.” A ruler of the Bit-Yakin tribe in southern Babylonia and king of Babylon 721-711 B.C. and for a short time in 704 B.C. He was little more than a puppet of Assyria, answering to Sargon. Merodach-baladan sent envoys to King Hezekiah of Judah (Isa. 39:1; 2 Kings 20:12-13) who flaunted the palace treasure house and treasuries. Two years later Sennacherib laid his ill-fated siege to the Holy City. Merodach-baladan continued to rebel against the Assyrians, coming out of exile more than once to oppose the kings of Nineveh. He eventually was beaten back to his seashore tribal lands. See Babylon; Hezekiah; Sargon; Sennacherib.

MEROM (Mē' rōm) Place-name meaning “high place.” Place in Galilee where Joshua led Israel to defeat a coalition of Canaanite tribes under King Jabin of Hazor in a surprise attack (Josh. 11:1-7). The location of the site has been debated but now appears to be the modern Merion. The town is near a wadi that is fed annually by a spring during the wet season. Thutmose III and Rameses II of Egypt claimed to have captured the area during their respective reigns.

MERONOTH (Mə rōn' oth) or MERON-O-THITE (Mə rōn'-ō-thī) Resident of Meronoth (1 Chron. 27:30; Neh. 3:7). The site is perhaps Beituniyeh, northwest of Gibeon.

MEROZ (Mē' rōz) Place-name of uncertain meaning. Town condemned in the Song of Deborah for failure to join in the Lord's battle against the oppressive forces of Sisera (Judg. 5:23). The site is unknown. Suggestions have included: Khirbet Marus three miles northwest of Hazor; Madon (Josh. 12:19); and (Shimron-)Merom (Josh. 11:5; 12:20), identified with Semuniyeh north of Megiddo on the edge of the Jezreel Valley. Marus is too far removed from the battle site to have been expected to participate. Madon is closer but still separated from the Jezreel by mountain terrain.

MESECH (Mē' sēk) (KJV, Ps. 120:5) See Meshech.

MESHA (Mē' shá) English translation of three Hebrew names. 1. Personal name meaning "Safety." Ruler of Moab who led a rebellion against Israel (2 Kings 3:4-27). The designation of Mesha as a sheep breeder (2 Kings 3:4 NRSV) is perhaps an honorary title for chief. The date of his revolt is uncertain. Second Kings 1:1 suggests the revolt followed immediately on Ahab's death (850 B.C.). Second Kings 3:4 sets the revolt in the reign of Jehoram (849-842 B.C.). The Moabite stone erected by Mesha to celebrate his exploits contains two apparently irreconcilable time notes: in the middle of the reign of Omri's son and 40 years after the beginning of Omri's oppressive taxation of Moab. If Omri's son is taken literally, the Moabite stone places the revolt in the reign of Ahab (869-850 B.C.). "Son of Omri" was, however, used as a title for any of the kings who succeeded Omri as king in Samaria, even of Jehu who overthrew Omri's dynasty. Jehoram, Omri's grandson, might thus be the "son" of Omri of the Moabite stone. Jehoram's reign, however, ended five years before the 40th anniversary of the earliest date of Omri's oppression of Moab. At the beginning of the revolt, Mesha succeeded in seizing Israelite border towns and in fortifying towns on his frontier. An alliance of Israel, Judah, and Edom, however, outflanked his defenses and attacked Mesha from the rear. Mesha retreated to Kir-hareseth from which he attempted, unsuccessfully, to escape to his Aramean allies. With no escape possible, Mesha sacrificed his firstborn son to his god Chemosh on the city walls. In response the Israelites lifted their siege and returned home. The Moabite stone describes Mesha as a builder of cities and highways. Archaeological evidence, however, suggests a decline in Moabite civilization following the revolt. See Moab and the Moabite Stone. 2. Descendant of Benjamin living in Moab (1 Chron. 8:9). 3. Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:42; RSV follows early Greek translation in reading Mareshah). 4. Placename meaning “debt.” City in the territory of the Joktanites (Gen. 10:30), most likely to be identified with Massa (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chron. 1:30), located between the head of the Gulf of Aqaba and the Persian Gulf. This Massa is identified with the Assyrian Mash and the Persian Maciya.

MESHACH (Me' shāk) Personal name of unknown meaning, apparently corrupted in transmission from Babylonian to Hebrew, perhaps to avoid pronouncing or acknowledging name of Babylonian god. One of Daniel's friends exiled to Babylon after the fall of Jehoiakim in 597 B.C. (Dan. 1:6-7). His Hebrew name was Mishael (“who is what God is”) but was changed to Meshach (perhaps, “who is what Aku is”) to mock Israel's God. Declining the rich food of the king's table, he and his friends proved that the simple fare of vegetables and water was to be desired to make one wise and strong. After refusing to bow to the king's golden image, he, Shadrach, and Abednego were thrown into a furnace but were delivered by God (Dan. 3). Thereafter, they were promoted in the king's court. See Abednego; Daniel; Shadrach.

MESHECH (Me' shēk) Personal name meaning either “sowing” or “possession.” 1. A people of Asia Minor (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5), known for trading in copper vessels (Ezek. 27:13), frequently associated with Tubal (Ezek. 32:26; 38:2-3; 39:1). This Meshech is identical to the Assyrian Mushki and the Greek Moschoi. At Ps. 120:5 the name appears in the form Mesech (KJV). 2. An otherwise unknown Aramean tribe (1 Chron. 1:17), perhaps identical with Mash (Gen. 10:23).

MESHEK (Mē' shĕk) TEV for Meshech (1 Chron. 1:17).

MESHELEMIAM (Mə shĕl ě mī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh is recompense.” Tabernacle gatekeeper in the time of David (1 Chron. 9:21; 26:1-2,9). Shelemiah is an abbreviated form of this name (1 Chron. 26:14). Other shortened forms include Shallum (1 Chron. 9:17, 19,31; Ezra 2:42) and Meshullam (Neh. 12:25). All may refer to the same Levite or various persons may be intended.

MESHEZABEEL (Mə shĕz' á bĕl) (KJV) or MESHEZABEL (Mə shĕz á bĕl) Personal name meaning “God delivers.” 1. Ancestor of one of those working on the wall (Neh. 3:4). 2. One of the chiefs of the people witnessing Ezra's covenant renewal (Neh. 10:21). 3. Member of the tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:24). All three are perhaps the same individual.

MESHILLEMITH (Mə shil' ě mĭth) or MESHILLEMOTH (Mə shil' ě mōth) Personal name meaning “reconciliation.” 1. A priest (1 Chron. 9:12; Neh. 11:13). 2. Member of the tribe of Ephraim (2 Chron. 28:12).

MESHOBAB (Mə shō' bāb) Personal name from a root meaning “return.” Leader of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:34).

MESHULLAM (Mĕ shul' lām) Personal name meaning “allied” or “given as a replacement.” 1. Grandfather of Shaphan, King Josiah's secretary (2 Kings 22:3). See Josiah. 2. Son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:19). See Zerubbabel. 3. Member of the tribe of Gad who lived in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:13). 4. Son of Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:17). 5. Son of Hodaviah, father of Sallu (1 Chron. 9:7). 6. Son of Shephatiah (1 Chron. 9:8). 7. Member of the priestly family, a son of Zadok, and the father of Hilkiah (1 Chron. 9:11). See Zadok. 8. Son of Meshillemith of the priestly Zadokite family (1 Chron. 9:12). See Zadok. 9. Descendant of Kohath, one of the foremen during the repairs made in the temple following the finding of the book of Deuteronomy during Josiah's reign (2 Chron. 34:12). 10. One sent by Ezra to secure the services of a Levite for a group of returning exiles (Ezra (8:15-18). He later opposed Ezra's plan to end foreign marriages because he had a foreign wife himself (10:29). 11. Son of Berechiah, he helped Nehemiah repair the walls around Jerusalem following the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:4). 12. Son of Besodiah who helped repair the old gate (the Jeshanah Gate, NIV) when Nehemiah repaired the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6). See Nehemiah. 13. He stood beside Ezra as the scribe read the Law to the people of Jerusalem (Neh. 8:2-4). 14. One of the priests who joined Nehemiah and others setting his seal to the covenant between the people and God (Neh. 10:7). 15. One of the leaders of the people who set his seal to the covenant between the people and God (Neh. 10:20). 16. Son of Ezra, head of a priestly house during the time Jehoiakim was high priest (Neh. 12:13). 17. Another head of a priestly house when Jehoiakim was high priest; son of Ginnethon (Neh. 12:16). 18. Guard of the storerooms at the gates (Neh. 12:25 NIV). 19. Prince of Judah who participated in the procession to dedicate the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:33).

MESHULLEMETH (Mə shūl' lē məth) Personal name meaning “restitution.” Wife of King Mannaseh and mother of Anion (2 Kings 21:19).

MESOBAlTE (Mə sō' bā it) (KJV) or MEZOBAlTE (Mə zō bā it) (NASB, NIV NRSV) Title of one of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:47). The REB and TEV amended the text to give the reading “resident of Zobah.”

MESOPOTAMIA (Mēs' o po tā' mī á) Strictly speaking, Mesopotamia (from the Greek “between the rivers”) is the designation of the area between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. Mesopotamia applies more generally to the entire Tigris-Euphrates valley. At times in antiquity the culture of Mesopotamia dominated an even larger area, spreading east into Elam and Media, north into Asia Minor, and following the Fertile Crescent into Canaan and Egypt.

The Scriptures witness to a long history of contacts between the Hebrew people and the people of Mesopotamia. Mesopotamia was the homeland of the patriarchs (Gen. 11:31-12:4; 24:10; 28:6). A Mesopotamian king subdued Israel for a time during the period of the judges (Judg. 3:8). Mesopotamia supplied mercenary chariots and cavalry for the Ammonites' war with David (1 Chron. 19:6; superscription of Ps. 60). Both the Northern Kingdom of Israel (2 Kings 15:29; 1 Chron. 5:26) and the Southern Kingdom of Judah (2 Kings 24:14-16; 2 Chron. 36:20; Ezra 2:1) went into exile in Mesopotamia.

MESSENGER One sent with a message. Messenger is often used in the literal sense (Gen. 32:3,6; Num. 20:14; 24:12; Deut. 2:26). In an extended sense, the prophets (2 Chron. 36:15-16; Isa. 44:26; Hag. 1:13) and priests (Mal. 2:7) are termed messengers in their role as bearers of God's message for humanity. The Hebrew and Greek terms for "messenger" are frequently rendered "angel," the heavenly messengers of God. Sometimes messengers made advance travel arrangements for their master (Luke 9:52). In this sense the prophetic messenger of Mal. 3:1 prepares for the Lord's coming. The Gospel writers applied this preparatory function to John the Baptist (Matt. 11:10; Mark 1:2; Luke 7:27). See Angels; Herald.

MESSIAH [Mēs sī' ah] Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning "anointed one" that was translated into Greek as Christos. "Christ" or Messiah is therefore a name admirably suited to express both the church's link with Israel through the OT and the faith that sees in Jesus Christ the worldwide scope of the salvation in Him.

The Old Testament and Early Jewish Background "Anointed" carries several senses in the OT. All have to do with installing a person in an office in a way that the person will be regarded as accredited by Yahweh, Israel's God. Even a pagan king such as Cyrus was qualified as the Lord's anointed (Isa. 45:1) to execute a divinely appointed task. The usual application of the term "anointed" was to God's representatives within the covenant people. Prophets such as Elisha were set apart in this way (1 Kings 19:16). Israel probably saw a close link between the anointed persons and God's spirit though the link is specifically mentioned only occasionally (2 Kings 2:9). Israelite kings were particularly hailed as Yahweh's anointed (cp. Judg. 9:8), beginning with Saul (1 Sam. 9-10 NIV) and especially referring to David (1 Sam. 16:6,13; 2 Sam. 2:4; 5:3) and Solomon (1 Kings 1:39). The royal family of David as being the line of Israelite kings are mentioned by the title of the "anointed ones" (2 Sam. 22:51; cp. 2 Kings 11:12; 23:30; Pss.

2:2; 20:6; 28:8; 84:9). The king in Israel thus became a sacred person to whom loyalty and respect were to be accorded (1 Sam. 24:6,10; 26:9,11,16,23; 2 Sam. 1:14,16). The oracle spoken by Nathan (2 Sam. 7:12-16) is important since it centers the hope of Israel on the dynasty of David for succeeding generations.

The king, especially in the Psalms, became idealized as a divine son (Ps. 2:2,7; cp. 2 Sam. 7:14) and enjoyed God's protecting favor (Pss. 18:50; 20:6; 28:8). His dynasty would not fail (Ps. 132:17), and the people were encouraged to pray to God on his behalf (Pss. 72:11-15; 84:9). The fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. led to great confusion especially when Yahweh's anointed was taken into exile as a prisoner (Lam. 4:20) and his authority as king rejected by the nations (Ps. 89:38,51). This humiliation of the Davidic dynasty posed a set of problems to Israel's faith, even when the people were permitted to return to the land. No revival came for the Davidic kingship, yet that restoration became the pious longing of the Jews both in Babylonian exile (Jer. 33:14-18) and in the later centuries. One of the clearest expressions of the continuing hope was in the Psalms of Solomon (17-18) (70-40 B.C.), a Jewish writing of the Messiah as the son of David. There Messiah was a warrior-prince who would expel the hated Romans from Israel and bring in a kingdom in which the Jews would be promoted to world dominion.

After the exile the Israelite priesthood came into prominence. In the absence of a king, the high priest took on a central role in the community. The rite of anointing was the outward sign of his authority to function as God's representative. This authority was traced back to Aaron and his sons (Exod. 29:7-9; 30:22-33; cp. Ps. 133:2). The high priest was the anointed-priest (Lev. 4:3,5,16) and even, in one place, a "messiah" (Zech. 4:14; cp. 6:13; Dan. 9:25).

In the exilic and Postexilic ages, the expectation of a coming Messiah came into sharper focus, commencing with Jeremiah's and Ezekiel's vision of a Messiah who would combine the traits of royalty and priestly dignity (Jer. 33:14-18; Ezek. 46:1-8; Zech. 4:1-14; 6:13).

The people in the Dead Sea scrolls were evidently able to combine a dual hope of two Messiahs, one priestly and the second a royal figure. The alternation between a kingly Messiah and a priestly figure is characteristic of the two centuries of early Judaism prior to the coming of Jesus.

Messiahship in Jesus' Ministry A question posed in John 4:29 (cp. 7:40-43) is: "Could this be the Messiah?" (HCSB). It is evident that the issue of the Messiah's identity and role was one much debated among the Jews in the first century. In the Synoptic Gospels the way Jesus acted and spoke led naturally to the dialogue at Caesarea Philippi. Jesus asked His disciples, “Who do you say that I am?” a question to which Peter gave the reply, “You are the Messiah” (Mark 8:29 HCSB). Mark made clear that Jesus took an attitude of distinct reserve and caution to this title since it carried overtones of political power, especially in one strand of Jewish hope represented by the Psalms of Solomon. Jesus, therefore, accepted Peter's confession with great reluctance since with it went the disciple's objection that the Messiah could not suffer (Mark 9:32). For Peter, Messiah was a title of a glorious personage both nationalistic and victorious in battle. Jesus, on the other hand, saw His destiny in terms of a suffering Son of man and Servant of God (Mark 8:31-38; 9:31; 10:33-34). Hence He did not permit the demons to greet Him as Messiah (Luke 4:41) and downplayed all claims to privilege and overt majesty linked with the Jewish title.

The course of Jesus' ministry is one in which He sought to wean the disciples away from the traditional notion of a warrior Messiah. Instead, Jesus tried to instill in their minds the prospect that the road to His future glory was bound to run by way of the cross, with its experience of rejection, suffering, and humiliation. At the trial before His Jewish judges (Matt. 26:63-66), He once more reinterpreted the title Messiah (KJV, Christ) and gave it a content in terms of the Son of Man figure, based on Dan. 7:13-14. This confession secured His condemnation, and He went to the cross as a crucified Messiah because the Jewish leaders failed to perceive the nature of messiahship as Jesus understood it. Pilate sentenced Him as a messianic pretender who claimed (according to the false charges brought against Him) to be a rival to Caesar (Mark 15:9; Luke 23:2; John 19:14-15). It was only after the resurrection that the disciples were in a position to see how Jesus was truly a king Messiah and how Jesus then opened their minds to what true messiahship meant (Luke 24:45-46). The national title “Messiah” then took on a broader connotation, involving a kingly role that was to embrace all peoples (Luke 24:46-47).

Messiah as a Title in the Early Church From the resurrection onward the first preachers announced that Jesus was the Messiah by divine appointment (Acts 2:36; Rom. 1:3-4). Part of the reason for this forthright declaration is to be traced to apologetic reasons. In the mission to Israel, the church had to show how Jesus fulfilled the OT prophecies and came into the world as the “Son of David,” a title closely linked with the Messiah as a royal person. Matthew's Gospel is especially concerned to establish the identity (Matt. 1:1), but it is equally a theme common to Luke (Luke 1:32,69; 2:4,11; Acts 2:29-36; 13:22-23). Paul also saw in Jesus the fulfillment of the messianic hopes of the old covenant (1 Cor. 5:7-8). Peter, too, sought to show how the sufferings of the Messiah were foretold (1 Pet. 1:11,20; 2:21; 3:18; 4:1,13; 5:1). Luke stressed the link between Jesus as the One anointed by the Holy Spirit (Luke 4:16-22) in a way that looks back to Isa. 61:1, and he recorded Peter's statement (Acts 10:38 HCSB) that “God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and with power” as a fulfillment of OT prophecy. The letter to the Hebrews is rich in this theme (Heb. 1:9; 2:2-4; 9:14-15).

The final stage of development in regard to the title “Messiah” came in the way that Paul used the word more as a personal name than as an official designation (Rom. 9:5, “Christ”). The reason for this shift lies in the intensely personal nature of Paul's faith which centered in Jesus Christ as the divine Lord (Phil. 1:21; Col. 3:4). Also Paul taught his converts, who were mainly converted to Christ from paganism, that Jesus was the universal Lord whose mission was wider than any Jewish hope could embrace. In Pauline thought, “Christ” is a richer term than “Messiah” could ever be, and one pointer in this direction is the fact that the early followers of the Messiah called themselves not converted Jews but “Christians,” Christ's people (Acts 11:26; 1 Pet. 4:16) as a sign of their universal faith in a sovereign Lord. MESSIANIC SECRET Term that Bible students use to describe Jesus' commands to His audience and His disciples not to reveal who He was after His performance of messianic wonders. Throughout the Gospel of Mark, Jesus made every attempt to conceal His true identity as the Christ. Although the messianic secret can be found in the Gospels of Matthew (8:3-4; 9:29-31; 12:15-16; 17:9) and Luke (4:41; 8:56; 9:21), Mark used the unveiling of the messiahship of Jesus as the unifying theme of his Gospel. Typically Matthew understood the messianic secret as the fulfillment of prophecy (Matt. 12:17-21); Luke provided no explanation. Mark, however, used the messianic secret to organize his story around the progressive revelation of the person of Christ and the messianic consciousness of the disciples. Demons demonstrated that they recognized Jesus immediately: “I know who You are—the Holy One of God!” (1:24-25,34; 3:11-12; 5:6-8; 9:20 HCSB); nevertheless, Jesus suppressed their confession. He prohibited public profession by those who experienced miraculous healing (1:43-44; 5:43; 7:36; 8:26). The parables of Jesus were offered in order to keep “outsiders” from learning the secret (4:11-12). Even the disciples, once they related that they understood the “secret of the kingdom of God” (4:11), were sworn to silence (8:30; 9:9).

Biblical interpreters have suggested a number of reasons why Jesus chose to conceal His identity for a time. Perhaps He avoided the title in light of the popular messianic expectations of the people—they were looking for a political deliverer. Some believe that Jesus prohibited messianic proclamation so that He could continue to move about freely in public. The only parable of Jesus that Mark recorded exclusively may provide a clue to the purpose of the messianic secret. Jesus introduced the parable of the secret growing seed (4:26-29) with the proverb: “For nothing is concealed except to be revealed, and nothing hidden except to come to light” (4:22 HCSB). Jesus intended for people of faith to learn the secret of His messiahship (4:11,34). He compared the mystery of the kingdom of God to a man who sows seed and discovers, to his amazement, that seeded ground produces plants which secretly grow at night— “he doesn't know how” (4:27). Like the seed that is covered by ground, the secret of Jesus' identity would be concealed for a season: discovering the messianic secret would take time. Jesus did not force people to accept Him as Messiah; “those who had ears to hear” must learn the secret on their own. The disciples not only needed time to recognize Jesus as Messiah (4:41; 6:52; 8:17-21), they also needed time to come to terms with His messianic agenda: messianic suffering precedes messianic glory (9:31-32). Complete human understanding of the messianic secret would only be possible after the resurrection (9:9-10). Therefore, no immediate messianic profession would possess any depth of understanding (especially demonic confession).

Jesus wanted the disciples to think about the secret until they could articulate the secret. See Christ, Christology; Jesus Christ; Messiah.

MESSIAS (Mēs sī' 4s) Greek for Messiah (John 1:41; 4:25 KJV).

METALS, METALSMITH, METALWORKER See Minerals and Metals; Mines and Mining; Occupations and Professions.

METHEG-AMMAH (Mēth ēg-ām' mah) Phrase of uncertain meaning used at 2 Sam. 8:1. KJV, NIV, NRSV take it as a place-name. NASB translated the phrase as “the chief city.” The parallel in 1 Chron. 18:1 has “Gath and its villages.” Other suggestions for translation include: “bridle of the water channel,” “reins of the forearm,” “control of the mother city,” “take the common land,” or “wrest supremacy from.”

METHUSAEL (Mə thū' sā ēl) (KJV) or METHUSHAEL (Mə thū' shā ēl) Personal name of uncertain meaning. “Man of God” is possible. Canaanite patriarch (Gen. 4:18). Some scholars regard the name as a variant of Methuselah (Gen. 5:21).

METHUSELAH (Mə thūz' ə lah) Personal name meaning either “man of the javelin” or “worshiper of Selah.” A son of Enoch (who walked with God) and grandfather of Noah (Gen. 5:21,26-29). According to the biblical record Methuselah is the oldest human ever, dying at age 969 (Gen. 5:27).

MEUNIM, MEUNITES (Mə' ū nīm; Mə ū' nīts) See Mehunim.

MEZAHAB (Mēz' á hāb) Either a personal name or a place-name meaning “waters of gold” (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chron. 1:50). If a person, Mezahab was the grandfather of Mehetabel, the wife of King Hadar of Edom. If a place-name, Mezahab was the home of Matred which should perhaps be identified with Dizahab(Deut. 1:1).

MEZUZAH (Mē zū' zá) Hebrew term for “doorpost.” Ancient doors pivoted on posts set in sockets. The blood of the Passover lamb was to be applied to doorposts (Exod. 12:7,22-23). At the beginning of the new year, blood was to be applied to the doorposts of the temple to make atonement for it (Ezek. 45:19). The command to write the words of the Shema (Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21) on the doorposts of one's home, like the command to write them on one's heart (Deut. 6:6), is a challenge to remember always that love of God is central to faith. At a later time these commands were understood literally. Today mezuzah refers to small scrolls inscribed with Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21 placed in a container attached to the doorjamb of some Jewish homes.

MIBHAR (Mib' hār) Personal name meaning “best” or “chosen.” One of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:38). The parallel at 2 Sam. 23:36, reflecting a copying error in transmission of the text, reads “of Zobah, Bani the Gadite.”

MIBSAM (Mib' sām) Personal name meaning “fragrant.” 1. Arab tribe descended from a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chron. 1:29). 2. Descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:25).

MIBZAR (Mib' zār) Personal name meaning “fortification.” Edomite clan chief and his tribe (Gen. 36:42; 1 Chron. 1:53). Mibzar is possibly Mabsara in northern Edom or Bozrah (Gen. 36:33; Amos 1:12).

MICA (Mi' cá) Variant spelling that modern translations used for “Micah,” reflecting Aramaic spelling in text of 2 Sam. 9:12; Neh. 10:11; 11:17,22; 1 Chron. 9:15. All passages reflect Levites. See Micha 2.

MICAH (Mi' cah) Abbreviated form of the personal name Micaiah, meaning “Who is like Yahweh?” 1. Ephraimite whose home shrine was the source of Dan's idolatrous worship (Judg. 17-18). 2. Descendant of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:5). 3. Descendant of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:34-35; 9:40-44; 2 Sam. 9:12 KJV, Micha). 4. Leader of a family of Levites in David's time (1 Chron. 23:20; 24:24-25). 5. Father of Abdon, a contemporary of Josiah (2 Chron. 34:20; 2 Kings 22:12, Micaiah). 6. Eighth century B.C. prophet who came from Moresheth (NRSV, HCSB) which probably should be identified with Moreshethgath. This village was located about 25 miles southwest of Jerusalem in the tribe of Judah. Micah, however, may have lived in Jerusalem during his ministry. He worked in the reigns of Jotham (750-732 B.C.), Ahaz (735-715 B.C.), and Hezekiah (715-686 B.C.) who were kings of Judah. The identification of these kings does not mean that he was active from 750 to 686 but that his ministry spanned parts of each reign. Jeremiah 26:17-18 refers to Micah as prophesying during the time of Hezekiah. Determining exact dates, however, for each of the prophecies contained in the book is difficult. Micah was a contemporary of Isaiah, Hosea, and possibly Amos. His prophecies addressed Samaria and Jerusalem. Samaria was the capital of the Northern Kingdom (Israel) and Jerusalem of the Southern Kingdom (Judah). Even though Micah ministered in Judah, some of his messages were directed toward Israel. See Micaiah; Micha; Michaiah.

MICAH, BOOK OF (Mi' cah) Book named after the eighth century B.C. prophet, containing some of his messages. See Micah.

Historical Background In Micah's time many political and national crises occurred. Micah addressed those issues. The Assyrian Empire began to dominate the ancient Near East about 740 B.C. Judah and Israel became tribute-paying vassals of this new political power, and in 722 B.C. Israel felt the might of the Assyrian army. Shalmaneser V and Sargon II destroyed the Northern Kingdom and its capital Samaria (2 Kings 16-17) because of an attempted rebellion. The records of Sargon II state that he "besieged and conquered Samaria, (and) led away as booty 27,290 inhabitants of it." While Judah survived, they still were vassals. Micah 1:2-7 associates the imminent destruction of Samaria as God's judgment for the people's idolatry. Hezekiah, king of Judah, instituted many reforms that caused the Assyrian king, Sennacherib, to respond with force. Many cities of Judah were destroyed, and Jerusalem was unsuccessfully besieged (2 Kings 18-19). The annals of Sennacherib boast that he laid siege to 46 cities and countless small villages. He took 200,150 people as booty along with the livestock. As for Hezekiah, Sennacherib says, "Himself I made a prisoner in Jerusalem, his royal residence, like a bird in a cage." Despite the failure to take Jerusalem, the citizens of the Southern Kingdom suffered greatly from the invasion.

Prophet's Message The subjects of Micah's messages reveal much about the society of his day. He constantly renounced the oppression of the poor by the rich. He characterized the rich as devising ways in which to cheat the poor out of their land (2:1-5). People were evicted from their homes and had their possessions stolen. Those who committed such crimes were fellow Israelites (2:6-11). The marketplace was full of deception and injustice (6:9-16). The rulers of the country, who had the responsibility of upholding justice, did the opposite (3:1-4).

Micah also denounced the religious practices of the nation. He predicted the destruction of Judah as an act of God's judgment. Other prophets, however, led the people to believe that this could never happen because God was residing in the nation and would protect them. Micah contended that the other prophets' message was not from God. Instead, the message from God was the imminent devastation of Judah (3:5-12).

Although the people worshiped other gods, they did not quit believing in and worshiping the God of Judah but combined this worship with devotion to the other deities (5:10-15). The people believed all that religion required of them was to bring their sacrifices and offerings to the temple. No relationship was acknowledged between their activity in the temple and their activity in daily life. Micah attempted to correct this misconception by arguing that God is not just interested in the physical act of making a sacrifice but is supremely concerned with obedience that extends into daily life (6:6-8).

Micah warned of impending judgment on God's people for their disobedience. At the same time he proclaimed messages of hope. Judgment would come, but afterwards God would restore a remnant of the people devoted to Him (4:1-13; 7:14-20). Unlike the unjust kings that the people were accustomed to, God would bring a ruler who would allow the people to live in peace (5:1-5). Ultimately Judah was destroyed in 586 B.C. by the Babylonians, but a remnant returned. Matthew saw in Micah's hope for a new ruler a description of Christ (Matt. 2:6). MICAIAH (Mi kā' yá) Personal name meaning "Who is like Yahweh?" 1. Son of Imlah and prophet of Yahweh who predicted the death of Ahab and the scattering of Israel's forces at Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings 22:7-28). Having witnessed Yahweh's heavenly council, Micaiah was certain Ahab's 400 prophets were possessed by a lying spirit. When accused and imprisoned on a charge of false prophesy, Micaiah replied, "If you indeed return safely the LORD has not spoken by me" (22:28 NASB). 2. Form of Michaiah that modern translations prefer.

MICE See Mouse.

MICHA (Mi kā) KJV for Micah and Mica. 1. Descendant of King Saul (2 Sam. 9:12). See Micah 3. 2. One in a family line of temple musicians (Neh. 11:17,22). Nehemiah 12:35 uses the longer form Micaiah.

MICHAEL (Mi' kəl) Personal name meaning "Who is like God?" 1. Father of one of the 12 Israelite spies (Num. 13:13). 2-3. Two Gadites (1 Chron. 5:13-14). 4. Ancestor of Asaph (1 Chron. 6:40). 5. Leader of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3) perhaps identical to the father of Omri (1 Chron. 27:18). 6. Leader of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:16). 7. Manassite who defected to David's army (1 Chron. 12:20). 8. Son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 21:2). 9. Ancestor of one of those who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:8). 10. Archangel who served as the guardian of the nation of Israel (Dan. 10:13,21; 12:1). Together with Gabriel, Michael fought for Israel against the prince (angelic patron) of Persia. This angelic Michael figures in much extrabiblical literature in the intertestamental period. In Rev. 12:7 Michael commands the forces of God against the forces of the dragon in a war in heaven. Jude 9 refers to a dispute between the devil and Michael over Moses' body. According to Origen (A.D. 185 to 254), this account formed part of the extrabiblical work, The Assumption of Moses. The incident is not mentioned in the surviving fragments of this work. See Angel.

MICHAH (Mi' kā) Abbreviated form of the personal name Micaiah that KJV used for the leader of a family of Levites in David's time (1 Chron. 23:20; 24:24-25). Modern translations prefer the form Micah.

MICHAIAH (Mi kā' yá) KJV form of Micaiah, a personal name meaning "Who is like Yah?" 1. Father of an officer of King Josiah (2 Kings 22:12). 2. Wife of King Rehoboam and mother of Abijah (2 Chron. 13:1-2). 3. Participant in Jehoshaphat's reforms (2 Chron. 17:7). 4. Member of a leading family in Jeremiah's time (Jer. 36:11,13). 5. Priest participating in Nehemiah's dedication of the walls (Neh. 12:41) and ancestor of a participating priest (Neh. 12:35).

MICHAL (Mi' kál) Personal name meaning "Who is like El (God)?" a variant form of Micah, "Who is like Yah?" and an abbreviated form of Michael. King Saul's younger daughter (1 Sam. 14:49), given to David in marriage for the price of 100 dead Philistines (1 Sam. 18:20-29). Saul may have thought David would be killed in the attempt. The king continued to set traps for David, but on one occasion Michal helped her husband escape (1 Sam 19:11-17). For revenge Saul gave her to Phaltiel (1 Sam. 25:44). Following Saul's death at Gilboa, David made a treaty with Abner, Saul's general. One of the points of the pact was that Michal would be returned to David, much to Phaltiel's regret (2 Sam. 3:14-16). David's dancing before the ark of the covenant as he brought the sacred box to Jerusalem enraged Michal, who criticized the king to his face. As punishment Michal was never allowed to bear children (2 Sam. 6:16-23; cp. 2 Sam. 21:8).

MICMASH, (Mik' másh) (NIV, NLT) MICHMASH Place-name meaning "hidden place." City in Benjamin about seven miles northeast of Jerusalem, four and a half miles northeast of Gibeah, rising 1,980 feet above sea level overlooking a pass going from the Jordan River to Ephraim. It is four and a half miles southeast of Bethel, which rises 2,890 feet above sea level. It is modern Mukhmas. Michmash served as a staging area, first for Saul (1 Sam. 13:2) and then for the Philistine army as they prepared to fight. It lay on the standard invasion route from the north (Isa. 10:28). The Philistines mustered 30,000 chariots and 6,000 horsemen there (1 Sam. 13:5-6). Before the battle could begin, Jonathan and his armor bearer sneaked into the Philistine camp, killed 20 sentries, and set off great confusion, resulting in the Philistines fighting each other (14:20). Exiles returning from Babylon reinhabited the city (Neh. 11:31; cp. 7:31). It served as Jonathan Maccabeus' residence and seat of government (1 Macc. 9:73). See Intertestamental History and Literature; Jonathan.

MICHMETHAH (Mik' mə thah) or MICHMETHATH (Mik mə thăth) (NASB, NIV, NRSV, REB) Place-name meaning “hiding place” or “concealment.” Site near Shechem (Josh. 16:6; 17:7). Michmethath has been identified with Khirbet Makhneh el-Foqa about five miles southeast of Shechem and with Khirbet Juleijil east of Shechem.

MICHRI (Mik' ri) Personal name meaning “purchase price.” Member of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 9:8).

MICHTAM (Mik' tām) KJV form of Miktam. Heading for Pss. 16; 56-60. The meaning of the term is disputed. Suggestions include a musical notation or a title for psalms connected with expiation of sin. At Isa. 38:9 Hezekiah's “writing” (Hb. miktav) should perhaps be Miktam.

MICRI (Mic' ri) (NIV) See Michri.

MIDDAY Noon or thereabouts (Neh. 8:3; Acts 26:13).

View of the gorge at Michmash.

MIDDIN (Mid' dīn) Place-name meaning “judgment.” Village in the wilderness district of Judah (Josh. 15:61). The Septuagint identified Middin with Madon. Khirbet Abu Tabaq in the Achor Valley has been suggested as a possible site.

MIDDLE GATE City gate of Jerusalem (Jer. 39:3). Archeologists have found evidence of battle (arrowheads, charred wood) located outside the remains of a gate in the middle of the north wall of the preexilic city. It seems probable that the Babylonians attacked the city from the north and that these are, in fact, the remains of the Middle Gate. The gate is possibly identical to the Fish Gate (2 Chron. 33:14; Neh. 3:3; Zeph. 1:10). See Gate.

MIDDLE WALL Term is found in Eph. 2:14 and variously translated: “middle wall of partition” (KJV); “dividing wall of hostility” (HCSB, NRSV, NIV); “barrier of the dividing wall” (NASB); “barrier of enmity which separated them” (REB). Investigation of the term has yielded several possible interpretations. 1. The wall that separated the inner and outer courts of the temple and prevented Jews and Gentiles from worshiping together. Inscriptions in Greek and Latin warned that Gentiles who disregarded the barrier would suffer the pain of death. 2. The curtain that separated the holy of holies from the rest of the temple. This curtain was rent at the death of Jesus (Mark 15:38) and is representative of the separation of all humanity from God. 3. The “fence” consisting of detailed commandments and oral interpretations erected around the law by its interpreters to ensure its faithful observation. In reality, the fenced-in law generated hostility between Jews and Gentiles and further divided them, as well as furthering the enmity between God and humanity. Destruction of the Law's mediators opens a new and living way to God through Christ Jesus (Eph. 2:18; 3:12; Heb. 10:20). 4. The cosmic barrier that separates God and persons, persons themselves, and other powers in the universe (Eph. 1:20-21)—angels, dominions, principalities. 5. Echoing Isa. 59:2, the term refers to the separation of humanity from God as a result of sin.

No one interpretation is sufficient by itself. The writer of Ephesians stressed that every conceivable barrier that exists between persons and between God and humanity has been destroyed by God's definitive work in Jesus Christ. See Ephesians; Gentiles; Law; Salvation; Sin; Temple.

MIDIAN, MIDIANITES (Mid' 1  n, Mid' 1  n its). Personal and clan name meaning “strife.” Midian was the son of Abraham by his concubine Keturah (Gen. 25:2). Abraham sent him and his brothers away to the east, leading to the association of the Midianites with the “children of the east” (Judg. 6:3). Midianites took Joseph to Egypt (Gen. 37:28,36). Since the caravan in the passage is also described as Ishmaelite (37:25; 39:1), it is possible that these two groups descended from Abraham had become interrelated. Alternately, the term Ishmaelite in these verses may be a generic term for nomadic travelers. The OT mentions the Midianites in widely scattered geographical locations, but their main homeland seems to be east of the Jordan and south of Edom. Later historians located the land of Midian in northwestern Arabia east of the Gulf of Aqaba. The people of Israel had both good and bad relationships with the Midianites. When Moses fled from Pharaoh, he went east to Midian (Exod. 2:15). Here he met Jethro (also called Reuel), the priest of Midian, and married his daughter. During the wandering in the wilderness, Reuel's father-in-law Hobab served as a guide for the Israelites (Num. 10:29-32). The Midianites are associated with the Moabites in seducing Israel into immorality and pagan worship at Baal-peor (Num. 25:1-18). For this reason God commanded Moses to execute a war of vengeance against them (Num. 31:3; cp. Josh. 13:21). In the time of the judges the Midianites along with the Amalekites began to raid Israel using camels to strike swiftly over great distances. Gideon drove them out and killed their leaders (Judg. 6-8). They never again threatened Israel; but Midian did harbor Solomon's enemy Hadad (1 Kings 11:18). See Amalekite; Baal-peor; Gideon; Ishmaelite; Jethro; Kenites.

MIDRASH Jewish interpretations of the OT included a form called Midrash. The Hebrew noun midrash is related to the verb darash, which means “to search” and thus refers to an “inquiry” or “examination.” The word was commonly used to denote the process of biblical interpretation or the written expression of that interpretation.

The term “midrash” appears twice in the Bible. In both contexts the word describes a “study,” “exposition,” “interpretation,” or “discussion.” In 2 Chron. 13:22 the word refers to a literary work written by the Prophet Iddo that recounted the acts of Abijah. In 2 Chron. 24:27 the term seems to refer to a commentary on the Book of the Kings. In the Dead Sea Scrolls, the term refers to biblical interpretation and functions as a synonym of peshet (“interpretation”). In the Qumran community “midrash” referred to biblical interpretation that quoted or alluded to a biblical text and then sought to show how the text was meaningful to contemporary readers.

According to early rabbinic tradition, Hillel the Elder formulated seven rules which guided Jewish biblical interpretation. These rules were sensible guidelines for understanding the Bible and examples of the application of each rule appear in the NT. Later rabbis formulated many other rules that resulted in wild, fanciful interpretations that lost all connection with the literary and historical context of the passage under discussion.

Rabbinic Midrash may be divided into two basic categories: Halakah and Haggadah. “Halakah” (derived from the Hebrew verb meaning “to walk,” which was often used to speak of one's legal or ethical conduct) investigated the legal parts of the OT with the aim of establishing rules of conduct. “Haggadah” was an interpretation of nonlegal portions of the OT that sought to inform, challenge, or inspire without establishing or supporting legal standards.

Ancient midrash appeared in several basic forms. The “Targums” were Aramaic paraphrases of the Hebrew OT. Another form of midrash completely rewrote OT narratives by editing, expanding, and paraphrasing rather freely. Another form of midrash quoted words from a biblical text and then interpreted them. Often the literary form resembled a modern commentary, although the rules that guided interpretation were sometimes very different from those used by modern commentators. Sometimes the interpreter gave a verse-by-verse explanation of a text, but at other times comments on the Scriptures were arranged according to topic.

The NT contains midrash and is midrashic in the sense that many portions of the NT offer interpretations of specific OT texts that follow the normal patterns of exegesis suggested by ancient rabbis. However, some recent critics who claim that the Gospels are midrash or contain midrash mean that the Gospel writers used narrative motifs from the OT to invent stories about the life of Christ that have no real basis in history. The search for these narrative motifs and the way in which they were used to create Gospel narratives is known as Midrash Criticism. Midrash critics claim that ancient Christians had no qualms about nonhistorical stories about Jesus as long as these stories expressed some spiritual truth. These claims however are unconvincing. The term “midrash,” as it is used by the midrash critics, refers to a “theological tale” or Jewish myth. However 1 Tim. 1:4; 4:6-7; and Titus 1:14 show that Paul, no doubt expressing the prevailing conviction of the early church, disparaged “Jewish myths” and called for believers to reject them. Second Peter 1:16 adamantly denies that the apostolic accounts concerning the “power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ” (HCSB) were “cleverly contrived myths.” The NT may be described as midrashic since it contains quotations and interpretations of OT texts. But the NT is not midrash, if by this one means that the NT writers present their own imaginative creations as if they were history.

The study of midrash may offer the modern interpreter of Scripture a greater insight into the methods of interpretation used throughout Jewish history. As the student examines the strengths and weaknesses of these approaches to interpretation, he may learn how one's culture and worldview impact his understanding of the Bible and how he may more “accurately interpret the word of truth.”

MIDWIFE Woman who assists in the delivery of a baby (Exod. 1:15-21). The duties of the midwife likely included cutting the umbilical cord, washing and salting the infant, and wrapping the child in cloths (Ezek.

16:4). The civil disobedience of the Hebrew midwives Siphrah and Puah confounded Pharaoh's plan to exterminate male Hebrews for a time (Exod. 1:15-21). Their faithfulness was rewarded with families of their own (Exod. 1:21), suggesting that childless women frequently served as midwives. The women of Ruth 4:14-17 and 1 Sam. 4:20 were likely serving as midwives.

MIGDAL EDER NIV transliteration of tower of Eder (Gen. 35:21). See Eder.

MIGDAL-EL (Mig' dāl-ēl) Place-name meaning “fortress of God.” Fortified town in Naphtali (Josh. 19:38). Migdal-el was located in northern Galilee in the vicinity of Iron (Yiron).

MIGDAL-GAD (Mig' dāl-gād) Place-name meaning “Tower of Gad.” Village near Lachish in the Shephelah district of Judah (Josh. 15:37). The site is perhaps that of Khirbet el-Mejdeleh five miles south of Beit Jibrin.

MIGDOL (Mig' dōl) Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning “tower, watchtower, fortress.” A town or a border fortress located in the northeast corner of Egypt. The site is mentioned in reference to two events in biblical history—the exodus and the exile. One of the sites on or near the route of the exodus, Migdol was located near the sites of Pi-hahiroth and Baalzephron, all of which were near the sea (Exod. 14:2). Jewish refugees fled to Migdol during the exile (Jer. 44:1). The coming doom of Egypt at the hand of Nebuchadnezzar was to be proclaimed there (Jer. 46:13-14). Ezekiel prophesied that the land of Egypt would be laid waste, “from Migdol to Syene” (Ezek. 29:10; 30:6 NRSV, NASB), that is from the northern extremity of the land, Migdol, to the southern extremity of the land, Syene.

Since “migdol” could be used as a proper name, “Migdol,” or as a common noun, “tower,” two questions remain unresolved. What is the exact location of the site of Migdol? Do all of the references to Migdol refer to the same site, or was there more than one site in Egypt named Migdol? More than one site may have borne the name Migdol, though the evidence we have at hand is inconclusive. The Amarna Letters from Egypt refer to an Egyptian city named Maagdali, but information about its location is not given. For instance, a papyrus manuscript mentions the Migdol of Pharaoh Seti I. This Migdol was located near Tjeku, the location of which is still debated. Some prefer to identify Tjeku with Succoth, modern-day Tell el-Maskhutah, while others identify it with Tell el-Her located further north near Pelusium. For this reason we may assume with some certainty that there were at least two sites named Migdol: the Migdol referred to by Jeremiah and Ezekiel located near Pelusium and the Migdol on the route of the exodus located near Succoth. Both may have been part of a line of border fortresses or migdols designed to provide protection for Egypt against invasion from the Sinai. See Amarna, Tell el; Egypt; Watchtower.

MIGHTY MEN Applied to the descendants of the Nephilim, “mighty men” likely indicates men of great size (Gen. 6:4; perhaps Josh. 10:2). Elsewhere mighty men refers to valiant warriors, especially to the elite groups of three and 30 who served David (2 Sam. 17:8,10; 23:8-39; 1 Kings 1:10,38). Many of David's elite forces were mercenaries.

MIGRON (Mig' rōn) Place-name meaning “precipice.” Town (or towns) in Benjamin (1 Sam. 14:2; Isa. 10:28). The town of 1 Samuel is generally located near Gibeah south of Michmash. The town of Isaiah 10 is generally located between Aiath (Ai) and Michmash, that is, to the north of Michmash. Suggested sites include Makrun, Tell Miryam, and Tell el Askar.

MIJAMIN (Mij' à min) Contracted form of the personal name Miniamin, meaning “lucky” (literally, “from the right hand”). The name is attested in Neo-Babylonian and Persian business documents. 1. Priest in David's time (1 Chron. 24:9). 2. Priest who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:5). 3. Priest witnessing Ezra's covenant renewal (Neh. 10:7). 4. Layman with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:25). The KJV form of 2. and 4. is Miamin.

MIKLOTH (Mik' lōth) Personal name meaning “sticks.” 1. Descendant of Jeiel and resident of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:32; 9:37-38). 2. Officer in David's militia (1 Chron. 27:4). REB, RSV followed the early Greek translation in omitting the name.

MIKNEIAH (Mik nī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh acquires” or “Yahweh creates.” Levitic musician in David's time (1 Chron. 15:18,21).

MIKTAM (Mik' tām) See Michtam.

MILALAI (Mil' a li) Personal name meaning “eloquent.” Musician participating in Nehemiah's dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:36). The earliest Greek translation lacks the name, prompting some to suggest a scribal corruption due to repeating the following name (Gilalai). The shorter Greek text may, however, result from omission due to the scribe skipping to a word with a similar ending.

MILCAH (Mil' cah) Personal name meaning “queen.” 1. Abraham's niece and the wife of Nahor, the patriarch's brother. She bore eight sons, one of whom was Bethuel, Rebekah's father (Gen. 11:29; 24:15). 2. One of five daughters of Zelophehad (Num. 26:33), left without support after the death of their father. They pled their case before Moses for an inheritance as a son would receive. In a landmark ruling for Israel, God commanded Moses to give each of the daughters an inheritance from their father's estate (Num. 27:1-8; 36:11; Josh. 17:3).

MILCOM (Mil' cōm) Name of deity meaning “king” or “their king.” Apparently a form created by Hebrew scribes to slander and avoid pronouncing the name of the national god of Ammon (1 Kings 11:5,7), who may have been identified with Chemosh, the god of Moab. From the inscription of Mesha there appears to have been a god, Athar, whose local titles were Chemosh and Milcom. This cult may have been practiced in Jerusalem before the Israelite conquest. “King” may have been the god's name or his title as king of the gods. David defeated Ammon and confiscated the crown (2 Sam. 12:30) of their king (KJV, NASB, NIV) or of the statue of the god Milcom (NRSV, REB; cp. TEV). Solomon built sanctuaries to Milcom on the Mount of Olives at the request of his foreign wives, reviving the ancient cult (1 Kings 11:5,33). The sites of Solomon's sanctuaries were destroyed and defiled during Josiah's reforms in 621 B.C. (2 Kings 23:13). Jeremiah described past accomplishments attributed to Milcom, but in a play on Judg. 11:24, he announced destruction and captivity for Milcom (Jer. 49:1,3 NRSV, NASB, REB; cp. NIV, TEV). Worshiping Milcom was turning one's back on Yahweh (Zeph. 1:5-6). See Chemosh; Gods, Pagan; Moab; Molech.

MILDEW Fungus causing a whitish growth on plants. The Hebrew term rendered “mildew” means “paleness.” The term may refer to the yellowing of leaves as a result of drought rather than to a fungus (Deut. 28:22-24; 1 Kings 8:37; 2 Chron. 6:28; Amos 4:9; Hag. 2:17). Mildew is one of the agricultural plagues God sent to encourage repentance.

MILE The Roman mile of Matt. 5:41 is about 4,848 feet (about 432 feet shorter than the modern statute mile).

MILETUM (Mī lē' tūm) (KJV) or MILETUS (Mī lē' tūs) Ancient city on the west coast of Asia Minor. Miletus had four natural harbors and was a major port for the Minoan and Mycenaean cultures. After 700 B.C. the Ionians developed it into an even greater center of commerce. It served as the port for Ephesus. It featured a major school of philosophy; many artisans practiced there; and it was among the first cities to mint coins. This culture flourished until 494 B.C. when the Persians sacked the city in answer to a revolt by the Ionians. Alexander captured Miletus on his way eastward in 334 B.C., and the city saw a revival of the arts under his Hellenistic regime. In particular the architectural beauty of the city increased. Rome's influence increased the pace of economic development.

A Roman milestone. The inscriptions are in two languages—Palmyrene and Greek.

Paul encountered a robust city when he sailed to Miletus. The people probably were open to the gospel he preached. He chose to meet with the elders of the church at Ephesus in Miletus (Acts 20:15-17). A second visit may have been made by the apostle a few years later (2 Tim. 4:20). The harbor began to silt up by A.D. 100, bringing a gradual halt to the city's usefulness and prominence. Today the ruins are over five miles inland. See Asia Minor, Cities of; Ephesus.

MILK Nourishing liquid and its by-products, a staple of the Hebrew diet. The OT uses the term variously of sweet milk, soured milk, cheese, butter, and, symbolically, of blessing and abundance. The NT only has a symbolic use of what is first and basic in the Christian life. The word is used 43 times in the OT, with 20 being symbolic, and only five times in the NT.

Most often milk came from sheep and goats (Prov. 27:27; Deut. 32:14); cow's milk was also known (Isa. 7:21-22), as was milk from humans (Isa. 28:9). Butter and cheese were known among the ancients (1 Sam. 17:18) as well as curdled, sour milk which still forms, after bread, the chief food of the poorer classes in Arabia and Syria. This soured milk was carried by travelers who mixed it with meat, dried it, and then dissolved it in water to make a refreshing drink such as that set by Abraham before the messengers (Gen. 18:8). After setting awhile, the drink would carry an intoxicating effect leading some to believe that the fermented variety is the drink that Jael gave to Sisera (Judg. 4:19).

The OT's most extensive use of milk is in conjunction with honey to symbolize abundance and blessing (Exod. 3:17; 13:5; 33:3; Lev. 20:24; Num. 13:27; Deut. 6:3; Josh. 5:6). Milk is also used to symbolize whiteness (Lam. 4:7) and in Song of Songs as a symbol of marital bliss (5:1).

Milk as a symbol prevails in the NT where the term is used only five times (1 Cor. 3:2; 9:7; Heb. 5:12-13; 1 Pet. 2:2). In each instance it speaks concerning what is basic to the Christian life but not all that is needed. The ancient Bedouins could live on milk for days but eventually had to have meat; so must the Christian.

One of the more perplexing sayings of Scripture is the repeated rule (Exod. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 14:21) not to boil a kid in its mother's milk. The rabbis interpreted this command to mean that milk and meat should neither be cooked nor eaten together. Certain scholars have seen in the command a prohibition relating to Canaanite sacrificial customs though recent archaeological investigations lend little support to this view.

MILL Two circular stones used to grind grain. Usually it was worked by two women facing each other. One woman fed the grain at the center, and the other guided the products into little piles. The grain to be ground is fed into the central hole in the upper stone and gradually works down between the stones. As the grain is reduced to flour, it flies out from between the stones onto a cloth or skin placed underneath the mill. To make fine flour, it is reground and sifted. The stone was made of basalt and was about a foot and a half in diameter and two to four inches thick.

It was forbidden to take millstones as a pledge because they were so important to sustaining life (Deut. 24:6). The manna which fell in the wilderness was tough enough so that people ground it in mills before cooking it (Num. 11:7-8).

In the NT our Lord prophesied that at His coming “two women will be grinding at the mill: one will be taken and one left” (Matt. 24:41 HCSB). In Rev. 18:21 the millstone was cast into the sea as a symbol of absolute destruction. See Manna.

MILLENNIUM This expression, taken from Latin words, means 1,000 years. The Bible passage that mentions the “thousand years” is Rev. 20:1-7, where the word appears six times. The Latin Vulgate uses mille anni and its variant renderings to translate the Greek chilia etc.

Various theological proposals have been offered to explain this passage from Rev. 20 as well as various other Scriptures that might be taken to speak to the same issue. One's view on this text will be determined by one's approach to interpreting predictive prophecy and by one's view on symbolic and apocalyptic language.

Broadly there are three schools of thought: amillennialism, premillennialism, and postmillennialism. The prefixes “a,” “pre,” and “post” suggest the view of the timing of the Lord Jesus Christ's second advent in relation to the “thousand years.” Hence, postmillennialists argue that Christ returns after the “thousand years.” Premillennialists argue that Christ comes before the thousand years. Amillennialists also contend that the Lord comes after the thousand years much like postmillennialists, but they understand the thousand years differently. For the amillennialist, as the prefix suggests, there really is no literal thousand years. Instead, the whole interadvent period between the first and second comings of Christ is taken to be the “millennium.” Some postmillennialists argue with the amillennialists that the millennium may not be a literal thousand years, yet they generally agree with the pre-millennialists that the millennium is yet future. There are many variations even among adherents to the same broad view of the millennium.

The amillennialist links the thousand years beginning with the binding of the devil (Rev. 20:2-3) which he interprets as having taken place at the first coming of Christ. In Mark 3:27 Jesus mentioned the binding of “the strong man.” Amillennialists also believe in a single cataclysmic end, which leaves no room for a literal thousand-year reign of Christ on the earth. Ephesians 1:10 and Rom. 8:18-23 suggest one event. Jesus Himself spoke of “that day” in which resurrection takes place. In a classic passage the resurrection of the righteous and unrighteous appears to take place on the same day (John 5:24-29).

The main argument of the postmillennialist is that the gospel will advance victoriously in the world, Christianize the nations, and usher in a golden age (the thousand years: literal or symbolic of an extended period of time). In Matt. 16 Jesus promised the church victory in the world. Postmillennialists remind us that Jesus affirmed that the “gates of hell (Hades)” would not prevail against the church. Gates are not used in attack but in defense. As the church marches on, it will triumph. The defenses of Satan will fall under the mighty power of God's Word. Jesus promised as much in His parable of the mustard seed (Matt. 13:31-32; Mark 4:30-32; Luke 13:18-19). In Rev. 7:9-10 a great multitude is seen as redeemed. This is seen by postmillennialists as the great advance and victory of the gospel in the world.

Premillennialists contend that the millennium is actually begun only with the cataclysmic arrival of Jesus in His second coming as indicated by Rev. 19:11-21. Only then do we see the reign of Christ on the earth. By reading the book of Revelation in chronological progression, a pre-millennial scenario naturally unfolds. Premillennialists have appealed to the many OT prophecies given by God concerning the nation of Israel and the land of Canaan, such as Jer. 30-33; Ezek. 36-37; 40-48, Isa. 2; 11-12; Joel 2, and so forth. Many premillennialists argue that these texts await a future fulfillment. Some premillennialists further argue that OT prophecies should not be spiritualized or allegorized but allowed to stand as prophecies made to Israel. Just as prophecies concerning Christ's first coming were fulfilled literally, so will those of His second coming. Jesus spoke of inheriting the earth in His Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:5; cp. Ps. 37). The Apostle Paul expected a future for Israel in Rom. 11:11-36 and very likely expected an intermediate phase of the kingdom between the coming of Christ and the end (1 Cor. 15:20-28).

Despite differences on the details, all evangelicals are firmly committed to the literal second coming of Jesus Christ. See Eschatology; Rapture; Future Hope; Seventy Weeks; Tribulation.

MILLENNIAL PERSPECTIVES ON REVELATION See Revelation, Book of.

MILLET (Panicum miliacum) Smallest cereal grain. Millet makes a poor quality bread and is normally mixed with other grains (Ezek. 4:9). Some identify the Hebrew term with “sorghum” (Sorghum vulgare).

MILLO (מִלּוֹ) Hebrew word meaning “filling” which describes a stone terrace system employed in ancient construction. 1. The story of Abimelech in the book of Judges mentions Beth-millo, “The House of the Filling.” Probably a suburb of Shechem, the Beth-millo most likely was a Canaanite sanctuary. The shrine was built upon an artificial platform or fill and thus received the name “House of the Filling.” 2. The extension of Jerusalem, beyond the original Jebusite city David captured, stretched northward to include the Hill of Moriah, the site of the future temple. A large open space between the hill and the main city below left ample room for added construction. To provide a level platform upon which to build, a series of retaining walls were raised along the slope of the hill. Loads of earth and rock were dumped behind the walls to form large terraces to support the royal halls and residences planned by Solomon. The area came to be called the Ophel, meaning “high” or “lofty.” It is probable that additional supporting terraces were built on the southern slopes in the city proper to extend the area available for general construction. Joash's murder by his own men near the Beth-millo "on the road to Silla" may refer to terraces in this portion of the city.

MIND Center of intellectual activity, an English term translating several different Hebrew and Greek terms. The biblical languages possess no one word parallel to the English "mind." KJV translates at least six different Hebrew terms as mind. The primary word is leb, which means "heart." For example, Moses said, "Hereby ye shall know that the Lord hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind (Num. 16:28 KJV; cp. 1 Sam. 9:20; Neh. 4:6). In addition, the word nephesh (soul) is translated "mind" in Deut. 18:6 when it refers to the desire of a man's mind (soul) and in Gen. 23:8 where it refers to mind in the sense of a decision or judgment. The word ruach (spirit) is rendered "mind" in Gen. 26:35. It speaks of the "grief of mind" (spirit) which Isaac and Rebekah experienced because Esau married heathen wives. Also used are the words lebbab (heart) in Ezek. 38:10; yetser (imagination) in Isa. 26:3; and peh (mouth, speech) in Lev. 24:12.

The NT has a similar situation because of the large number of terms that are used to describe mankind's "faculty of cognition." As in the OT the term "heart" (is sometimes used to represent the concept "mind." Matthew 13:15 speaks of understanding with the "heart." Other words include kardia) ennoia, which means "mind" in the sense of "intent," "arm yourselves also with the same resolve" (1 Pet. 4:1 HCSB). Gnome refers to mind in the sense of "purpose" (Rev. 17:13) or "opinion" (Philem. 14). Noema is also used to denote the mind, especially the "thought process." Paul said that Israel's "minds were blinded" so that they could not understand the OT (2 Cor. 3:14; 4:4; 11:3). The word phronema refers to what one has in the mind, the "thought": "The mind-set of the flesh is death" (Rom. 8:6 HCSB).

The more common terms for mind, however, are nous and dianoia. Dianoia occurs 12 times in the NT. It refers to "thinking through" or "thinking over" of something or to the "understanding" or "sentiment" which results from that process of reflection. Paul said that in times past we all lived according to the flesh, “carrying out the inclinations of our flesh and thoughts” (those things we had already thought over, Eph. 2:3). Nous is the most prominent term for mind; it occurs 24 times. Nous represents the “seat of understanding,” the place of “knowing and reasoning.” It also includes feeling and deciding. Hence it sometimes includes the counsels and purposes of the mind. An example is Paul's statement: “Each one must be fully convinced in his own mind” (Rom. 14:5 HCSB). The meaning of purpose is found in Rom. 11:34, which says, “For who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been His counselor?”

Mind is sometimes associated with the human soul. Three times in the KJV the word psuche (soul or life) is rendered by the word “mind.” Philippians 1:27 says believers are to be of “one mind (soul).” Hebrews 12:3 urges believers not to “faint in your minds (souls)” (Acts 14:2 also). These passages illustrate the fact that the mind is considered to be the center of the person. However, in Scripture the heart is more often considered to be the center of the human personality. In the OT especially this is true because of the lack of an exact equivalent for mind. The word “heart” fills this void, and the NT follows the practice of the OT very closely. Both mind and heart can be spoken of as the center of a person because in Hebrew thought a person is looked at as a single entity with no attempt to compartmentalize the person into separate parts which act more or less independently of one another. Therefore, the heart, mind, and soul, while in some ways different, are seen as one.

The mind is portrayed oftentimes, especially in the NT, as the center of a person's ethical nature. The mind can be evil. It is described as “reprobate” (Rom. 1:28 KJV), “fleshly” (Col. 2:18), “vain” (Eph. 4:17), “corrupt” (1 Tim. 6:5; 2 Tim. 3:8), and “defiled” (Titus 1:15). On the other hand, three Gospels command us to love God with “all” our mind (Matt. 22:37; Mark 12:30; Luke 10:27). This is possible because the mind can be revived and empowered by the Holy Spirit (Rom. 12:2) and because God's laws under the new covenant are put into our minds (Heb. 8:10; 10:16). See Anthropology; Heart; Humanity; Soul.

MINERALS AND METALS Inorganic elements or compounds found naturally in nature. A number of minerals and metals are mentioned in the biblical record.

Precious Stones Stones are desirable because of rarity, hardness, and beauty, the latter expressed in terms of color, transparency, luster, and brilliance. The Bible has three main lists of precious stones: the 12 stones of Aaron's breast-piece (Exod. 28:17-20; 39:10-13), the treasures of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13), and the stones on the wall foundation of the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:18-21). Other lists are found in Job 28:15-19; Isa. 54:11-12; and Ezek. 27:16. The precise identification of some of the terms is unclear, unfortunately, as can be seen by comparing these lists in various translations.

Adamant Appears in KJV, RSV, REB of Ezek. 3:9 and Zech. 7:12. The Hebrew word is sometimes translated "diamond" (Jer. 17:1 KJV, NRSV, REB, NASB). The stone was "harder than flint" (Ezek. 3:9) and may be emery (Ezek. 3:9 NASB) or an imaginary stone of impenetrable hardness. It is perhaps best translated "the hardest stone" (Ezek. 3:9 NRSV).

Agate Multicolored and banded form of chalcedony. It served on Aaron's breastpiece (Exod. 28:19) and by some translations is the third stone on the new Jerusalem foundation (Rev. 21:19 NRSV).

Amethyst (Exod. 28:19; 39:12; Rev. 21:20) Identical with modern amethyst, a blue-violet form of quartz.

Beryl (beryllium aluminum silicate) Most translations show beryl to be the first stone in the fourth row of the breastpiece (Exod. 28:20; 39:13; REB "topaz"; NIV "chrysolite"). The word also occurs in the list of the king of Tyre's jewels (Ezek. 28:13; RSV, NIV "chrysolite"; NRSV "beryl"; REB "topaz"). The RSV translates another and the NIV a third word in the list as "beryl." More certainty surrounds the use of beryl in Rev. 21:20.

Carbuncle In KJV, RSV the third stone of Aaron's breastpiece (Exod. 28:17; 39:10; REB "green feldspar;" NASB, NRSV "emerald"; TEV "garnet"; NIV "beryl") and material for the gates of the restored Jerusalem

(Isa. 54:12; REB “garnet”; NIV “sparkling jewels”). RSV also appears to translate a third word as carbuncle in Ezek. 28:13 by reversing the KJV order of emerald and carbuncle. NRSV omits carbuncle.

Carnelian (KJV and sometimes RSV, NASB “sardius”) A clear to brownish red variety of chalcedony. NRSV reading for one of the stones of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13; NASB, TEV, NIV “ruby”; REB “sardin”) and the sixth stone on the foundation of the new Jerusalem wall (Rev. 21:20; cp. 4:3).

Chalcedony Alternate translation for agate as the third stone decorating the new Jerusalem foundation (Rev. 21:19 HCSB, KJV, NASB, REB, NIV). This noncrystalline form of quartz, or silicon dioxide, has many varieties including agate, carnelian, chrysoprase, flint, jasper, and onyx.

Chrysolite (Rev. 21:20) Represents various yellowish minerals. It replaces the KJV rendering “beryl” frequently in the RSV (Ezek. 1:16; 10:9; 28:13) and throughout the NIV but not in NRSV. REB reads “topaz.”

Chrysoprase or Chrysoprasus (KJV) Apple-green variety of chalcedony, the tenth stone of the foundation for the new Jerusalem's wall (Rev. 21:20).

Coral (Job 28:18; Ezek. 27:16) Calcium carbonate formed by the action of marine animals. NRSV, REB, NASB translated a second word as coral (Lam. 4:7 KJV, NIV “rubies”).

Crystal Refers to quartz, the two Hebrew words so translated being related to “ice.” In Job 28:18 KJV has “pearls,” the NIV “jasper,” but NRSV, NASB read “crystal,” while REB has “alabaster.” The glassy sea (Rev. 4:6) and river of life (Rev. 22:1) are compared to crystal.

Diamond Third stone of the second row of the high priest's breastpiece (Exod. 28:18; 39:11; REB “jade”; NIV “emerald”) and one of the jewels of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13; NRSV, REB “jasper”; NIV “emerald”). It is not clear, however, if diamonds were known in the ancient Near East, and the translation is uncertain.

Emerald Bright green variety of beryl, readily available to the Israelites. It is the usual translation of the fourth stone of the high priest's breastpiece and one of the stones of the king of Tyre (Exod. 28:18; 39:11; Ezek. 28:13; REB "purple garnet"; NASB, NIV, NRSV "turquoise"), with NRSV translating another word as "emerald" in Ezek. 28:13. The rainbow around the throne is compared to an emerald (Rev. 4:3), which also served as the fourth stone in the foundations of the new Jerusalem wall (Rev. 21:19).

Jacinth Transparent red to brown form of zirconium silicate. It appears in Aaron's breast-piece (Exod. 28:19; 39:12; KJV "ligure"; REB, TEV "turquoise") and the new Jerusalem wall foundation (Rev. 21:20).

Jasper (Exod. 28:20; 39:13; Rev. 21:11, 18-19) A red, yellow, brown, or green opaque variety of chalcedony. In the RSV for Ezekiel 28:13, "jasper" translates the word elsewhere rendered "diamond" (REB "jade"), but NRSV reads moonstone with the sixth stone jasper as in other translations.

Lapis Lazuli Not one mineral but a combination of minerals that yields an azure to green-blue stone popular in Egypt for jewelry. It is an alternate translation for sapphire (NASB in Ezek. 28:13; NIV marginal notes).

Onyx A flat-banded variety of chalcedony; sardonyx includes layers of carnelian. Onyx was used on the ephod (Exod. 25:7; 28:9; 35:27; 39:6) and in the high priest's breastpiece (Exod. 28:20; 39:13). It was provided for the settings of the temple (1 Chron. 29:2) and was one of the precious stones of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13).

Pearl (Job 28:18 NASB, NRSV; KJV, NIV "rubies"; REB "red coral") Formed around foreign matter in some shellfish. In the NT, "pearl" serves as a simile for the kingdom of God (Matt. 13:46), a metaphor for truth (Matt. 7:6), and a symbol of immodesty (1 Tim. 2:9; Rev. 17:4; 18:16). Pearl is also material for the gates of the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:21).

Ruby Red variety of corundum, or aluminum oxide. The first stone of Aaron's breastpiece is sometimes translated "ruby" (Exod. 28:17; 39:10 NASB, NIV; KJV, RSV, REB "sardius"; NRSV "carnelian). It also appears as a stone of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13 NASB, NIV; REB, KJV “sardius”; NRSV “carnelian”).

Sapphire (Exod. 24:10; 28:18; 39:11; Job 28:6,16; Isa. 54:11; Lam. 4:7; Ezek. 1:26; 10:1; 28:13; Rev. 21:19) The Hebrew sappir is a blue variety of corundum. Despite the name, it is possible that sappir refers to lapis lazuli (NIV marginal notes) rather than true sapphire.

Topaz Second stone of Aaron's breastpiece (Exod. 28:17; 39:10); also mentioned in the wisdom list (Job 28:19) and the list of the king of Tyre's precious stones (Ezek. 28:13). True topaz is an aluminum silicate and quite hard, but the OT topaz may refer to peridot, a magnesium olivine. The ninth decorative stone of the new Jerusalem wall foundation is topaz (Rev. 21:20). See Beryl, Chrysolite above.

Turquoise Sky-blue to bluish-green base phosphate of copper and aluminum was mined in the Sinai by the Egyptians and was a highly valued stone in antiquity. Turquoise is sometimes substituted for emerald (Exod. 28:18 NASB, NIV); or jacinth (Exod. 28:19; 39:11 REB, TEV).

Common Minerals Alabaster In modern terms a fine-grained gypsum, but Egyptian alabaster was crystalline calcium carbonate with a similar appearance. Alabaster may be mentioned once in the Song of Songs (5:15 NRSV, NASB; KJV, REB, NIV “marble”). In the NT (Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3; Luke 7:37) it refers to containers for precious ointment.

Brimstone Refers to sulfur (NRSV, NIV). Burning sulfur deposits created extreme heat, molten flows, and noxious fumes, providing a graphic picture of the destruction and suffering of divine judgment (Deut. 29:23; Job 18:15; Ps. 11:6; Isa. 30:33; Ezek. 38:22; Luke 17:29).

Salt Sodium chloride is an abundant mineral, used as a seasoning for food (Job 6:6) and offerings (Lev. 2:13; Ezek. 43:24). As a preservative, salt was symbolic of covenants (Num. 18:19; 2 Chron. 13:5). Both meanings are present in Jesus' comparison of the disciples to salt (Matt. 5:13). Salt was also a symbol of desolation and barrenness, perhaps because of the barrenness of the Dead Sea, the biblical Salt Sea. The “salt pits” of Zeph.

2:9 were probably located just south of the Dead Sea. Sodium chloride could leech out of the generally impure salt from this area, leaving a tasteless substance (Luke 14:34-35).

Soda (Prov. 25:20 NASB, NIV; Jer. 2:22 REB, NIV), or Nitre (KJV), is probably sodium or potassium carbonate. Other translations prefer lye (Jer. 2:22 NRSV, NASB). In Prov. 25:20 the Hebrew text refers to vinegar or lye or soda, but some modern translations follow the earliest Greek translation in reading “vinegar on a wound” (NRSV, REB; TEV “salt in a wound”).

Metals Many metals occur naturally in compound with other elements as an ore which must be smelted to obtain a usable product. Biblical lists of metals (Num. 31:22; Ezek. 22:18,20) mention gold, silver, bronze, iron, tin, and lead.

Mineral deposits from the hot mineral springs at Hierapolis.

Brass Relatively modern alloy of copper and tin. Brass in the KJV should be rendered copper or bronze. RSV substitutes bronze, retaining brass only in a few places (Lev. 26:19, Deut. 28:23; Isa. 48:4; NRSV using brass only in Isa. 48:4). NIV does not use brass.

Bronze Usual translation of the Hebrew word that can indicate either copper or bronze. An alloy of copper and tin, and stronger than both, bronze was the most common metal used for utensils in the ancient Near East. The Bible mentions armor (1 Sam. 17:5-6), shackles (2 Kings 25:7), cymbals (1 Chron. 15:19), gates (Ps. 107:16; Isa. 45:2), and idols (Rev. 9:20), as well as other bronze objects.

Copper Usually alloyed with tin to make bronze which possessed greater strength. The KJV uses copper only in Ezra 8:27 (NRSV, NIV “bronze”). See Ezion-geber.

Gold Valued and used because of its rarity, beauty, and workability. It can be melted without harm and is extremely malleable. Thus it can be used for cast objects, inlays, or overlays. A number of Israel's worship objects were solid gold or gilded (Exod. 37). Gold occurs in the Bible more frequently than any other metal, being used for jewelry (Exod. 12:35; 1 Tim. 2:9), idols, scepters, worship utensils, and money (Matt. 10:9; Acts 3:6). The new Jerusalem is described as made of gold (Rev. 21:18,21).

Iron A more difficult metal to smelt than copper, it did not come into widespread use until about the time of Israel's conquest of Canaan. Prior to this time metal weapons and agricultural tools were of bronze. For some time thereafter iron technology was not widespread. The Canaanites' “chariots of iron” (Josh. 17:16,18; Judg. 1:19; 4:3) represent a technological advantage over Israel, while the Philistines may have enjoyed an iron-working monopoly (1 Sam. 17:7; 13:19-21). Iron was more widespread by the time of David (2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Chron. 20:3; 22:14), though it remained valuable (2 Kings 6:5-6). It was used where strength was essential and became a symbol of hardness and strength (Deut. 28:48; Ps. 2:9; Isa. 48:4; Jer. 17:1; Rev. 2:27). See Iron.

Lead Gray metal of extremely high density (Exod. 15:10) used for weights, heavy covers (Zech. 5:7-8), and plumb lines (cp. Amos 7:7-8). Lead is quite pliable and useful for inlays such as lettering in rock (Job 19:24). It was also used in the refining of silver (Jer. 6:27-30).

Silver Used in the Near East from quite early times; though not occurring often in a natural state, silver is easily extracted from its ores. Silver was originally more valuable than gold, usually occurring before it in lists. It became a measure of wealth (Gen. 13:2; 24:35; Zeph. 1:18; Hag. 2:8). By Solomon's day it was common in Israel (1 Kings 10:27) and was the standard monetary unit, being weighed in shekels, talents, and minas (Gen. 23:15-16; 37:28; Exod. 21:32; Neh. 7:72; Isa. 7:23). Silver was used for objects in Israel's worship (Exod. 26:19; 36:24; Ezra 8:26,28), idols (Exod. 20:23; Judg. 17:4; Ps. 115:4; Isa. 40:19), and jewelry (Gen. 24:53; Song 1:11). See Weights and Measures.

Tin (Num. 31:22; Ezek. 22:18, 20) Sometimes confused with lead; articles of pure tin were rare. It was principally used in making bronze, an alloy of tin and copper. See Bdellium; Mines and Mining. Daniel C. Browning, Jr.

MINES AND MINING Extraction of minerals from the earth.

The Earliest Mines Early mining efforts in the Fertile Crescent sought to provide people with the stones necessary to make weapons and tools. While the earliest walled settlements in the region date back to before 6000 B.C., people had been mining stones for tools long before that. Before 10,000 B.C. people were using tools and weapons made of flint found on the surface of the ground. From exposed beds of obsidian (a black volcanic stone) and flint (chert) early people no doubt removed the stone necessary to produce the axes, knives, and scrapers used to kill and clean food. With the domestication of small animals, wheat, and barley, people found greater uses for stone tools. Sickle blades with serrated edges were chipped from flint, several pieces being fitted together in a bone or wood handle. Larger stone tools, such as the hand ax, were suitable for cutting and shaping wooden beams used in building. The greatest use of surface-mined stones was the making of weapons for hunting. Flake blades of all sizes served as knives. Finely worked arrowheads found alongside large quantities of animal bones indicated the dependence upon hunting by Neolithic man in Palestine. Flint scrapers and borers were used in the tanning and sewing of hides.

Copper The use of mined minerals to form metals began sometime around 6500 B.C. near Catal Huyuk in Asia Minor. While making pigment from crushed malachite, a greenish carbonate of copper, human beings probably stumbled upon the knowledge for smelting, ushering in the Chalcolithic Period, about 4500-3200 B.C.

The Bible refers to Tubal-cain, a descendant of Cain, as the father of copper (bronze) and iron forging (Gen. 4:22). In the beginning copper ore was taken from deposits above the ground. Soon, however, mine shafts and tunnels were cut into areas where surface deposits hinted at the larger ore supplies below. In the Arabah and Sinai mining settlements were founded. Complex series of narrow shafts were bored into the mountains and hills of the Timna Valley to reach the valued copper deposits within the earth. Near the mines were constructed a series of huts, walls forming windbreaks, and areas for smelting to support the mining operations. The ruins of the mining center Khirbet en-Nahas, 17 miles south of the Dead Sea, possibly mark the location of biblical Irnash, the “Copper City.” Palestine, however, was relatively poor in copper ore. Much of what was used had to be imported from regions with greater ore concentrations. Trade relations were established with settlements in Asia Minor, Armenia, and the Island of Cyprus. Copper sheets and ingots were shipped by sea and land thousands of miles to meet the growing needs for metal tools, weapons, and jewelry. In later years these ingots served as a crude style of currency. Before 3000 B.C. people discovered that copper could be mixed with arsenic to form a stronger alloy. Copper tools last longer than stone implements and could withstand greater abuse. Men continued to mine the veins of minerals which ran into the earth often following the deposits with tunnels 50 yards long into the side of a hill. The widespread use of copper in the ancient Near East is highlighted from the magnificent copper hoard discovered at Nahal Mishmar near the Dead Sea. Among more than 400 copper artifacts were numerous mace heads, chisels and adzes, scepters, and small, heavy “crowns.” The copper from Naham Mishmar was most likely imported from Armenia or Azerbaijan, hundreds of miles away.

Bronze Copper tools, however, were soon replaced. Around 3200 B.C. metalsmiths discovered that by combining nine parts copper with one part tin a much stronger metal—bronze— was formed. Easier to cast than copper, bronze became the most widely used metal of the period. The copper for bronze continued to be mined in the same manner it always had, although stone tools for digging out the ore were replaced with stronger bronze counterparts. Tin deposits in Mesopotamia made the growth of this new technology easier in the northern Fertile Crescent, while Palestine and Egypt, without local tin deposits and mines, were forced to import raw materials. The regions of modern day Afghanistan exported the necessary tin throughout the ancient Near East.

Around 2500 B.C. Phoenicians established colonies in Spain and Portugal to mine the vast local supplies of copper and tin. These and other European tin supplies were shipped throughout the ancient Near East as late as the Roman period. Roman tin mines in Britain were worked by slave labor and had shafts cutting 350 feet deep into the ground. In Palestine the Timna copper mines came under the control of the Egyptians during the late Bronze period. Remains of a small open-air temple dedicated to Hathor, patron goddess of miners, have been discovered. The small enclosure has a small sacred area set with matsevot, standing stones dedicated to the deity. A central shrine with small niches carved into the overhanging face of a cliff was the focal point of the sanctuary, its “holy of holies.” The entire shrine was covered with a woolen tent. The design of the desert temple is similar to the Israelite tabernacle or tent of meeting. Before 1100 B.C. Kenites and Midianites occupied Timna, but no remains from between 1000 and 900 have been identified. It is hard to imagine, however, that Israel during the period of the United Monarchy, especially during Solomon's reign, would not have exploited these rich deposits within its domain.

Iron The chaotic political climate after 1300 B.C. disrupted the trade routes and commercial structures of the ancient Near East. Copper supplies dwindled, and the import of tin and copper by Egypt and Palestine was disrupted, forcing metalsmiths to develop a new method for tool manufacture. Attention was turned to iron. Although small beads discovered in Egypt give evidence of the early use of meteoric rocks for iron smelting around 4000 B.C., the much higher melting point of iron (400 degrees higher than that of copper) necessitated the development of new smelting methods. So great was the heat needed that the Bible compares the enslavement of Israel in Egypt to the ironsmith's furnace (Deut. 4:20). More efficient bellows were created to produce the high temperatures needed to melt the iron ore. Since iron deposits lay close to the surface, they were much easier to mine than those of copper had been.

The Hittites were among the earliest people to use iron on a large scale. They traded iron tools and weapons to Egypt. For the most part, however, the Hittites protected iron as a monopoly. Only after the fall of the Hittite kingdom about 1200 B.C. did iron become more widely used. Still, Israel made little use of it. The Bible describes Canaan as a land “whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills you can dig copper” (Deut. 8:9 NASB). Only small amounts of both ores were available. Iron mines located in the Gilead near 'Ajlun at Magharat Warda probably served as one of the earliest iron sources in Palestine, possibly providing for the iron bedstead of Og, king of Bashan.

The Bible speaks of the Philistines as controlling the iron-working skills in Palestine (1 Sam. 13:19-22), an ability that prevented Israelite domination over the Philistine settlements in the Coastal Plain and Shephelah. The domination of iron technology by these “Sea-Peoples” points to the early development and usage of iron in the Aegean region, homeland of the Philistines. At Beth-shemesh, a Philistine stronghold in the Jordan Valley, a large industrial area with bronze and ironworking facilities was discovered. Smelting ovens and flow pipes for the fires give evidence of the metalworking that occurred. Numerous iron weapons and pieces of jewelry were also found. However, excavation in other Philistine cities such as Ashdod and Tel Qasile (near modern Tel Aviv) give little evidence of the widespread use of iron. While the Philistines may have controlled the use of iron to some degree, theirs was not a monopoly. For the most part, tools in Palestine continued to be made of bronze. Common tools such as sickles were still chipped from flint even after 1000 B.C. Iron chariots, spear points, knives and swords, and common tools such as sickles and plows became more common after 900 B.C., replacing earlier bronze counterparts. During the United Monarchy, Israel gained increased control of bronze and metal exports across the ancient Near East, bringing great wealth to the empire of David and Solomon. Solomon created a virtual trade war between Israel and the Arameans to the north.

Other Minerals Other minerals were also mined in the ancient Near East but were more difficult to obtain and work. Lapis lazuli, a deep blue stone, was quarried for its beauty and used in jewelry. Egyptian faience was an attempt to produce a synthetic lapis. Lead was mined as early as 3000 B.C., but its soft nature made it unsuitable for tools or jewelry. Lead was later incorporated into bronze and, in the Roman period, was used in glassmaking. Silver was first mined in northeast Asia Minor and taken from a lead-silver alloy. Electrum, silver mixed with small amounts of gold, was also mined. Raw gold is found in veins of granite. These veins, however, were not mined in early periods. Rather, the weathering of gold-bearing rocks put pea-sized and larger bits of the metal into streams and rivers, mixing it with alluvial gravel. Found mostly at the upper reaches of rivers in areas of Egypt, the Nubian Desert, and the Caucasus, gold began to be mined rather late because of its more isolated location. Since the headwaters of rivers and streams were often in locales less accessible or desirable for pasturing flocks, gold mines only became widespread around 2500 B.C. Egyptian paintings depict the washing of river sand to extract nuggets, and authors such as Strabo and Pliny the Elder (60 B.C.) spoke in later periods of rich gold deposits in Spain. The rarity of gold made it synonymous with extravagant wealth and luxury. The Apostle John's description of heaven as a city with walls and streets of gold provided the believer with a glimpse of the grandeur and glory of an eternity with God. MINGLED PEOPLE KJV term for foreigners who are perhaps of mixed race and are associated with a dominant population (Jer. 25:20,24; 50:37; Ezek. 30:5). Modern translations generally replace mingled people with foreigners or with foreign plus a noun suitable to the context (folk, tribes, troops). The underlying Hebrew consists of the same three consonants as the term for Arabia. Modern translations follow the alternate vocalization and read Arabia or Arabs at Ezek. 30:5.

MINIAMIN (Mī nī' á mīn) Personal name meaning "lucky" (literally "from the right hand"). 1. Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:15). 2. Priestly family in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:17). 3. Priest who participated in Nehemiah's dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:41).

MINISTER, MINISTRY One who serves another. God's call to Abram (Gen. 12) contains the foundations of ministry. God's promise was to begin with Abram and Sarai and from them make a nation God would bless, which would be a blessing to all nations. The English words “minister” or “ministry” appear as translation of the Hebrew word sharat that literally means “to wait on” or “serve” as Joseph did for Potiphar (Gen. 39:4; Exod. 24:13; 1 Sam. 2:11). A related Hebrew word is ebed which has a more general meaning than sharat. Ebed can mean “work” or “work the ground.” Sharat is used to describe what the priests do in serving as God's representatives to the people and the peoples' representatives to God. So while Israel was created and called to be a people of God through whom all nations would be blessed, God designated Moses' brother Aaron and his male heirs (Exod. 28:35,43; 39:1) and the Levites (Num. 18:2; Deut. 10:8) to perform specific functions in the worship and service of God within Israel.

For Christians Jesus is the supreme model of a minister. In His inaugural sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth, Jesus read from the Prophet Isaiah, summarizing the purpose and the many dimensions of His ministry (Luke 4:18-19). Although Jesus has all authority in heaven and on earth, His style of leadership and ministry was not one of dominating His followers (Mark 10:42) but one of service. On one occasion when James and John sought prominent places in Jesus' kingdom, He reminded them, “For even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give His life—a ransom for many” (Mark 10:45 HCSB).

Jesus' ministry included teaching, preaching, evangelism, casting out demons, healing, providing for physical needs of people, and counseling. His supreme act of ministry was His obedience to the Father in going to the cross where He gave His life to atone for the sins of the world.

Jesus' ministry did not end with His resurrection from death and ascension to the right hand of the Father. Luke introduces his history of the early church by reminding his reader, Theophilus, that in his first volume, he described “all that Jesus began to do and teach until the day He was taken up” (Acts 1:1-2 HCSB). Luke is saying in effect that Jesus continues to do what He was doing. Before He did this as a person; now He is doing these things through His people, the church.

Ministry in Christ's church looks like Jesus' ministry on earth. God the Holy Spirit, Christ's representative in the church gives a variety of roles and gifts to those in the church for the purpose of ministry. These include preaching, evangelism, teaching, pastoral care, and administration. Three principal Greek words translated “minister” all carry a connotation of service rather than domination. Diakonos (Mark 10:43; Eph. 3:7; 6:21), in some passages translated “deacon,” has the connotation of one who waits on tables. Huperetes (Luke 1:2; 1 Cor. 4:1) originally designated the under-rowers who labored in a ship's belly. Leitourgos (Rom. 13:6; 15:16; Heb. 1:7) was used of a servant of the state or a temple. MINNI (Min' ni) People inhabiting the mountainous area south of Lake Urmia northeast of the Tigris-Euphrates valley (Jer. 51:27). The Minni are among the tribes summoned to punish the wickedness of Babylon. The Minni are known as the Manneans in Assyrian inscriptions from 800 to 600 B.C.

MINNITH (Min' nith) One of 20 cities involved in Jephthah's conquest of the Ammonites (Judg. 11:29-33). The site is unknown. The city likely lay between Rabbathammon and Heshbon. Suggested sites include Khirbet Hanizeh and Khirbet umm el-Hanafish.

MINSTREL KJV term for musician (Matt. 9:23). Modern translations have “flute players” or “musicians.” These musicians were hired to assist in mourning the child's death. See Grief and Mourning.

MINT AND CUMIN Mint is a sweet-smelling herb used to season food. Cumin is a carawaylike herb Judaism also used in seasonings and in medicine. Jesus named mint, dill, and cumin as He criticized the Pharisees for requiring the tittle of the herbs while ignoring more important matters of the Law (Matt. 23:23). See Cummin; Plants.

MIPHKAD GATE (Mīph' kād) KJV, TEV transliteration of the Hebrew name of a gate of Jerusalem or of the temple (Neh. 3:31), following the earliest Greek translation in taking Miphkad as a proper name. Other translations take “miphkad” as a common noun. Suggested meanings include: inspection (NASB, NIV); muster (REB, NRSV); or prison (cp. Jer. 52:11). If the Miphkad Gate is a city gate, it is perhaps identical with the Benjamin Gate (Jer. 37:13; 38:7; Zech. 14:10), located at the northernmost point on the east wall (perhaps identical with the Gate of the Guard, Neh. 12:39).

MIRACLES, SIGNS, WONDERS Events which unmistakably involve an immediate and powerful action of God designed to reveal His character or purposes. Words used in the Scriptures to describe the miraculous include sign, wonder, work, mighty work, portent, power. These point out the inspired authors' sense of God's pervasive activity in nature, history, and people.

Old Testament The two Hebrew words most frequently used for “miracle” are translated “sign” [of] and “wonder” (mophet). They are synonyms and often occur together in the same text (Exod. 7:3; Deut. 4:34; 6:22; 7:19; 13:1; 26:8; 28:46; 34:11; Neh. 9:10; Ps. 105:27; Isa. 8:18; Jer. 32:20; Dan. 6:27). “Sign” may be an object or daily activity as well as an unexpected divine action (Gen. 1:14; Exod. 12:13 RSV; Josh. 4:6; Ezek. 24:24). The basic nature of a sign is that it points people to God. “Wonders” describe God's supernatural activity, a special manifestation of His power (Exod. 7:3), but false prophets can perform actions that people perceive as signs and wonders (Deut. 13:1-3). Wonders can serve as a sign of a future event. Signs seek to bring belief (Exod. 4:5; cp. 10:2), but they do not compel a person to believe (Exod. 4:9). At times God invites people to ask for signs (Isa. 7:11). The signs He has done should make all peoples on earth stand in awe (Ps. 65:8). They should join the psalmist in confessing that the God of Israel “alone does wonders” (Ps. 72:18 HCSB).

New Testament The phrase “signs and wonders” is often used in the NT in the same sense as it is found in the OT and also in Hellenistic literature (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22; John 4:48; Acts 2:43; 4:30; 5:12; 6:8; 7:36; 14:3; 15:12; Rom. 15:19; 2 Cor. 12:12; 2 Thess. 2:9; Heb. 2:4).

“Sign” (semeion) in the NT is used of miracles taken as evidence of divine authority. Sometimes it is translated as “miracle” (Luke 23:8 NIV; Acts 4:16,22 NASB, NIV). John was particularly fond of using “sign” to denote miraculous activity (2:11,18,23; 3:2; 4:54; 6:2,14,26; 7:31; 9:16; 10:41; 11:47; 12:18; 20:30; Rev. 12:1,3; 13:13-14; 15:1; 16:14; 19:20).

“Wonders” (translates a Greek word from which the word “terror” comes. It denotes something unusual that causes the beholder to marvel. Although it usually follows “signs,” it sometimes precedes it (Acts 2:22,43; 6:8) or occurs alone (as in Acts 2:19). Whereas a sign appeals to the understanding, a wonder appeals to the imagination. “Wonders” are usually presented as God's activity (Acts 2:19; 4:30; 5:12; 6:8; 7:36; 14:3; 15:12), though sometimes they refer to the work of Satan through human instruments (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22; 2 Thess. 2:9; Rev. 13:11-13).teras)

New Testament writers also used dunamis, power or inherent ability, to refer to activity of supernatural origin or character (Mark 6:2; Acts 8:13; 19:11; Rom. 15:19; 1 Cor. 12:10,28-29; Gal. 3:5; 2 Thess. 2:9; Heb. 2:4).

“Work” (is also employed in the NT in the sense of “miracle.” John the Baptist heard of the “works” of Jesus while he was in prison (Matt. 11:2). The Apostle John used the term frequently (5:20,36; 7:3; 10:38; 14:11-12; 15:24).ergon)

Worldview Considerations Contemporary philosophical and theological arguments over the possibility and definition of “miracle” reflect the altered worldview of the last several centuries— from a theistic to a nontheistic concept of the universe. The perceived tension between the natural and the miraculous as a by-product of a naturalism that is intent on squeezing out the supernatural realm of reality.

The people of the Bible did not face this problem. The biblical perspective on the universe is that it is created, sustained, and providentially governed by God. The Bible makes no clear-cut distinction between the natural and supernatural. In the “natural” event the Bible views God as working providentially; whereas, in the miraculous, God works in striking ways to call attention to Himself or His purposes.

Christian thinkers have responded in different ways throughout the centuries in saying how miracles relate to the natural order. Some hold that miracles are not contrary to nature (Augustine and C. S. Lewis, for instance). This harmony view contends that human knowledge with limited perspective does not fully understand or comprehend the higher laws that God employs in working the miraculous. Others (like Thomas Aquinas) have maintained miracles stand outside the laws of nature. This approach is called the intervention view, based on their belief that God intervenes in the natural order to do the miraculous.

One's view of the miraculous is related to one's view of the universe. A mechanistic perspective believes the world is controlled by unalterable natural laws and cannot allow for the possibility of miracles. Christians in every century have refused to have their universe so limited. They have affirmed the continuing miraculous work of God in the universe He created, continues to care for, uses to reveal Himself, and has promised to redeem. See Sign.

MIRIAM (Mir' íám) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “bitter,” “God's gift,” “beloved,” or “defiant.” 1. Sister of Moses and Aaron and the daughter of Jochebed and Amram. Miriam played a key role in the rescue of Moses (Exod. 2:4-8) and in the subsequent experience of the exodus and the wilderness community. After crossing the Red Sea, she assumed the role of prophetess and led the women in the song of victory that was steeped in faith and gratitude (Exod. 15:20-21). At Hazereth Miriam sided with Aaron in an act of rebellion against Moses when he married an Ethiopian woman (Num. 12:1-15). Beneath her disapproval of Moses' choice of a wife lay a deeper problem of ambition and insubordination. Consequently God reminded her of Moses' divinely appointed leadership and chastened her with leprosy. She was healed following Moses' intercessory prayer and a seven-day quarantine (Num. 12:15). Miriam died at Kadesh (Num. 20:1). Later biblical writers remembered her as an example to Israel in cases of leprosy (Deut. 24:9) and as a leader sent by God (Mic. 6:4). See Intercession; Leprosy; Poetry. 2. Member of the clan of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:17).

MIRMA or MIRMAH (Mir' má) Leader of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:10).

MIRROR Polished or smooth surface that produces images by reflection. Throughout the biblical period mirrors were made of polished metal (bronze, Exod. 38:8; molten [metal], Job 37:18). Glass mirrors became available only in the late Roman period. Paul's readers could be expected to appreciate the illustration of the unclear image of a metal mirror (1 Cor. 13:12). See Gauze, Garments of; Glass.

Bronze mirror with a bone handle from the Etruscan culture (ca. 350 B.C.).

MISGAB (Mīs' gāb) KJV, REB transliteration of the Hebrew for “height” used as a proper place-name (Jer. 48:1). Other translations treat the term as a common noun and translate as “fortress” or a similar term.

MISHAEL (Mīsh' ā ēl) Personal name, perhaps meaning “Who is what God is?” 1. Cousin of Moses and Aaron (Exod. 6:22) who helped bury Nadab and Abihu (Lev. 10:4). 2. One standing with Ezra at the public reading of the law (Neh. 8:4). 3. One of Daniel's three friends (Dan. 1:6-7,11,19; 2:17), given the Babylonian name “Meshach.”

MISHAL (Mī' shāl) Personal name meaning “depression.” Form of Misheal in modern translations.

MISHAM (Mi' shām) Benjaminite builder of Ono and Lod (1 Chron. 8:12). The name perhaps derives from the root meaning “to inspect.”

MISHEAL (Mi' shə' al) Place-name meaning “place of questioning.” Levitical town in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:26). Elsewhere, the KJV used the form Mishal (Josh. 21:30) or Mashal (1 Chron. 6:74). The town appears in the list of towns conquered by Pharaoh Thutmose III. The site is unknown.

MISHMA (Mish' mā) Personal name meaning “fame.” 1. Arab tribe descended from a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chron. 1:30). 2. Descendant of Simeon. Inclusion of the names Mibsam and Mishma in the genealogies of both Ishmael and Simeon suggest the incorporation of Arabs into that tribe as Simeon expanded southward (cp. 1 Chron. 4:38-43).

MISHMANNAH (Mish mǎn' nah) Personal name meaning “strength” or “tasty morsel.” One of David's army officers (1 Chron. 12:10).

MISHNAH Hebrew term that means “to repeat” and eventually, in the rabbinic period (beginning about A.D. 100), “to learn.” Specifically, in rabbinic Judaism mishnah refers to the teaching or learning about the oral law (halakah) passed on by a particular teacher (rabbi). Today the Mishnah usually refers to the collected edition of rabbinic discussions of halakah compiled by Judah ha-Nasi (literally “the Prince,” or Patriarch), head of the rabbinic academy at Javneh (or Jamnia) at about A.D. 220. In rabbinic tradition he is usually referred to simply as “Rabbi.”

Organization The Mishnah has six major divisions:

1. Zeraim (seeds) deals with agricultural produce and proper tithing.
2. Moed (set feasts) deals with religious festivals.
3. Nashim (women) deals with laws regulating women.
4. Nazikim (damages) deals with property rights and legal proceedings.
5. Kodashim (holy things) deals with the temple.

6. Tohoroth (cleannesses) deals with laws of purity.

The six major divisions are each further subdivided into specific tractates. References to the Mishnah in scholarly writing are usually given according to tractate, not according to the major divisions. While these divisions appear clear and orderly, the modern reader of the Mishnah is frequently confused by the inclusion of what appears to be legal discussion unrelated to the major division in which they are found. For example, Benedictions (are treated in the first division on agricultural produce. To some extent these inconsistencies become more understandable when we look at the way in which the Mishnah was developed from earlier mishnoth of individual rabbis.Berakoth)

Development According to the Mishnah itself, oral tradition and its teachings go all the way back to Moses himself who received the halakah from God on Sinai and passed it on to subsequent generations. In rabbinic tradition this understanding seems to have functioned in at least two ways. First, the teachings of previous generations is regarded as important in setting oral law. Second, this understanding did not mean that oral law was seen as the literal passing on of particular words. Halakah was to some extent a spiritual ideal only imperfectly brought to concrete realization in the teaching of specific rabbis. Therefore halakah was a matter of exceptional religious importance and heated debate. The Mishnah frequently preserved contrary opinions. While it usually resolves the matter on one side or the other, the preservation in the tradition also allows for reconsideration by later generations.

Modern scholars see the Mishnah as a collection and editing of Jewish case law whose traditions may go back to about 150 B.C. but primarily from the period of 50 B.C. to A.D. 220. The tradition of the Mishnah appears to begin with the sect of Judaism called the Pharisees, who sought to liberalize the legal system of Judaism by applying regulations for temple purity particularly with regard to food laws to the entirety of Judaism. This sect may be regarded as liberal since they argued that the entirety of the nation should be righteous before God in ways similar to the priesthood. The Pharisees were largely a lay movement. The major representatives of this party in the Mishnah are Hillel and Shammai who taught around A.D. 50.

After the Romans destroyed the Jerusalem temple in A.D. 70, Yohannan ben Zakkai founded the rabbinic movement at Javneh (Jamnia) in Galilee. This movement succeeded in eventually unifying the surviving elements of Judaism into a coherent traditional system that forms the core of Judaism into the modern era. Hence, one of their primary concerns was to set the boundaries of legal interpretation or “make a fence around the Law.” The Mishnah primarily represents the collections of various teachers' opinions on halakah and seeks to establish the limits of normative interpretation through an examination of case law and Scripture. Rabbi Akiba (A.D. 50-135) is one of the towering figures who probably contributed to the present system of the organization of the Mishnah. He also sought to make explicit the scriptural basis of halakah. His student Rabbi Meir appears to be the connecting link between Akiba's Mishnah and the Mishnah of Rabbi.

The Mishnah of Rabbi is the basis of the Talmud that was written in Palestine about A.D. 360 and in Babylonia about A.D. 500. Those rabbis quoted in the Mishnah are referred to as the Tannaim while those in the Talmud are referred to as Amoraim. Scholars are somewhat divided on the issue to what extent Rabbi simply collected and systematized various rabbis' opinions or to what extent he functioned as an editor who left his own stamp upon the material. It is probably safe to conclude that Rabbi was a highly respected rabbi whose opinion was considered authoritative in his day. Nevertheless, the extent to which he could creatively edit the rabbinic traditions of halakah was probably limited by the community of rabbis who would not hesitate to challenge him if he misrepresented tradition. The Mishnah may therefore be seen as a compendium of the tradition of rabbinic Judaism for the first two centuries.

Rabbinical Oral Law Several principles seem to have been used to determine the oral law that would enter the Mishnah. First, the Mishnah presumes the written Mosaic law as given in Scripture as its fundamental underpinning. Rabbi Akiba sought to give explicit scriptural precedent for decisions in the oral law, sometimes in what appear to be exceptionally strained logic. The Mishnah preserves some legal debate based upon direct scriptural commentary (referred to as midrash). In most of the Mishnah, however, the oral law is developed by reference to precedent and the development of case law, much on the same order that British and American jurisprudence has developed. From generation to generation certain rabbis are considered to be of particular importance in establishing the halakah. For example, almost always the halakah is according to Hillel rather than Shammai, even though Shammai's opinion is also quoted. While much of the Mishnah concerns matters of pragmatic concern to the social and religious organization (the rabbis do not distinguish between the two) of Judaism, some segments seem to preserve tradition for its own sake. For example, the Mishnah preserves an entire section dealing with the temple organization and sacrifice, in spite of the fact that the temple no longer existed at the time of the writing of the Mishnah. Such discussion indicates that perhaps priests were part of the academy of Yohannan ben Zakkai and also reflects the continuing hope through the first two centuries that the temple would be rebuilt.

Mishnah and Understanding the Bible The Mishnah has proven helpful to an understanding of the Bible in two ways. First, it has helped in reconstructing specific elements in the Judaism of Palestine at the time of Jesus. Second, it has been helpful in understanding the development of Judaism during the same period that the early Christians were engaged in similar development.

1. An earlier generation of Christian scholars tended to see the Mishnah as descriptive of the practices of Judaism in Palestine during Jesus' life. More recent scholars are more cautious since they recognize the long history of development of the Mishnah and also since it has become more and more apparent that Judaism in Jesus' day was composed of many religious viewpoints and movements. Particularly, the practices of the Pharisaic sect may be reflected in some of the early traditions included in the Mishnah. For example, Jesus' saying in Matt. 7:12 is quite similar to rabbinic statements in the Mishnah. Also, certain Mishnaic evidence may be helpful in better understanding social relationships depicted in the Gospels. For example, evidence from Nashim (on women) helps us to reconstruct the social position of Palestinian Jewish women in the first century. In this context it appears that Jesus is certainly more liberal in His treatment of women than was rabbinic tradition. The evidence of the Mishnah should not be taken as representative of what all or most Jews believed in the first century. Rather, it should be taken as a clue to what some Jews believed and balanced with other historical data. See Jewish Parties in the New Testament.

2. Since the earliest Christians were also Jews, the Mishnah may give some indication of the development of early Christianity alongside of the development of rabbinic Judaism. At the same time that Yohannan ben Zakkai was founding the academy at Javneh, Christian Jews were coping with the loss of the temple and the development of their own religious communities. Understanding of the development of Judaism in this period alongside the development of Christianity may help in understanding the commonalities and strains between the two sibling religions. MISHRAITES (Mish' rā its) Family from Kiriath-jearim (1 Chron. 2:53). The name designates residents of Mishra, a place of which nothing is known.

MISPAR (Mis' pār) Modern translation spelling of personal name meaning “writing.” Returning from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2).

MISPERETH (Mis pēr' ēth) Personal name meaning “court recorder” or “learned.” Exile who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:7). Parallel list has Mizpar (Ezra 2:2).

MISREPHOTH-MAIM (Mis rə phōth-mā' im) Limit of pursuit of the coalition of King Jabin of Hazor (Josh. 11:8; 13:6). The most likely site is Khirbet el-Mushreifeh at the north end of the plain of Acco. The meaning of the name is debated. Suggestions include: Mishrephoth on the west (REB); “eminence of the waters”; “hot springs”; “lime burning at the water.”

MISSION(S) Task on which God sends a person that He has called, particularly a mission to introduce another group of people to salvation in Christ. In the Christian context the person sent is called a missionary. This person is charged with the task of spreading the gospel of Jesus Christ to people to whom he is sent. The mission of the churches is to send our missionaries to all parts of the world until everyone has had the opportunity to hear the message of Jesus and accept Him as Lord. Interestingly, the term mission is not found in the Scriptures, yet the concept of mission permeates the entire Bible.

Old Testament While some scholars insist that the OT has little, if anything, to say about mission, the more general understanding is that mission is an important OT concept. Its foundation lies in the understanding that the transcendent God is also the God who is involved in history. He is the God who acts. The record of His involvement in history indicates that His work is both revelatory and redemptive. People know who God is by what He has done. Since the fall (Gen. 3), God's primary activity has been redemptive, as the confessions in the OT reveal (Deut. 6:20-24; 26:5-9; Josh. 24:2-15). This redeeming activity of God is missionary because God sends His messengers to the house of Israel and His prophets as His spokesmen to all nations.

Clearly, God's mission concern is inclusive, not exclusive. As indicated in the listing of the nations in Gen. 10, God's interest has been in all people, not just in Israel. When God called Abraham and his descendants, they were chosen, not to be exclusive vessels, but rather to be a means of blessing "all families of the earth" (Gen. 12:1-3; 18:16-19; 22:9-19; 26:1-5; 28:10-14). Later God told Israel that they had been elected as God's chosen people (Exod. 19:3-6). They were to be the recipient and guardian of God's special revelation (Heb. 1:1-3) and the channel through which the Redeemer would enter the stream of human history (Isa. 49:1-10). Still, the election was not an end in itself. God called Israel to be holy, separate, or distinct from other nations, but they were also to be priests to the other nations. To live among them and lead them to God was their purpose for being.

This truth was kept before Israel in three ways. The message of the prophets served as the first important reminder. For instance, Jeremiah was called to be a prophet to all nations (Jer. 1:3-10) and spoke out in judgment against them (Jer. 48:47; 49:6,39). He also prophesied that all nations would be gathered in Jerusalem (Jer. 3:17). In like manner, Isaiah envisioned that all nations would be redeemed by coming to Jerusalem (Isa. 25; 66:18-24). Further, he warned them of God's judgment (Isa. 12-25) and called upon Israel to be a "light to the Gentiles" (Isa. 49:6).

The second reminder of Israel's responsibility in mission came through worship. The Psalms took into account that God was the Lord of all nations (Pss. 67:1-2; 72:8,17,19; 50; 96). The architecture of the temple provided a place for foreigners to worship in the court of the Gentiles (1 Kings 8:41-43), and the prayer of Solomon at the temple dedication mentioned this fact (2 Chron. 6:32-33).

Furthermore, the history of Israel reminded her of her mission responsibility through Rahab (Josh. 6:22-25) and Ruth (Ruth 1-4) becoming a part of Israel although they were foreigners.

The OT emphasized that the nations would have to come to Jerusalem to be saved. Jonah was shocked to receive a different kind of mission. God told him to go to Nineveh and call the people to repentance. He rebelled at helping the nation's oppressor escape judgment. Still, the book of Jonah became the major OT witness to God's love for and willingness to let foreigners relate to Him in worship. New Testament The NT brings to a crescendo the Bible's symphonic theme of mission. The mission begins with Jesus who was sent to earth to reveal the Father (John 1:18; 14:9), to glorify Him (John 13:31; 14:13; 17:1,6), to bring the kingdom of God on earth (Matt. 12:22-32), and to make God's love and mercy known to a lost world. He came to seek and save the lost (Luke 19:10). His mission was also inclusive. While Jesus' ministry was primarily for the Jews, He also met the needs of non-Jews. He healed the daughter of a Canaanite woman and praised the woman for her faith (Matt. 15:21-29). He also healed the servant of the Roman centurion (Matt. 8:5-13). On another occasion, He initiated a conversation with a Samaritan woman that led both to her conversion and to that of the entire community (John 4).

Through His teachings Jesus made clear that His mission was to continue after He ascended. Each of the Gospels and Acts contains an account of His mandate to His followers, telling them to go to all the world, make disciples, baptize them, and preach the gospel (Matt. 28:19-20; Mark 16:15-16; Luke 24:46-49; John 20:21-22; Acts 1:8). Jesus assumed that the church would reach out beyond itself. This commission made a dramatic change in the emphasis of mission. Instead of looking to foreigners to come to Jerusalem as did the OT, the church's mission is to go into the entire world and not wait for the world to come to it. Not just selected prophets like Jonah but all the believers were to go and tell what they had seen with others.

The scope of mission was inclusive. The church was to cross all barriers—to reach out to all ethnic groups, clans, tribes, social classes, and cultures. The message of salvation was to be shared with all people everywhere.

The new disciples were to be baptized and taught. The purpose of the teaching was to do more than share information. It was to provide nourishment in the faith as well.

Since the Great Commission is a mandate, the church is expected to be obedient. Even so, it does not have to do the job alone. Christ has promised that He will be with the church until “the end of the world.” With this assurance the church was obedient, for the gospel was presented first in Jerusalem (Acts 1-8), then in Samaria (Acts 8-12), and finally to all the world (Acts 13-28).

Jesus' presence would be felt through the Holy Spirit. In fact, the disciples were not to go out into the world until the Holy Spirit had come upon them (Acts 1:8). This is the only time in the Bible that a church is told not to be involved in mission. The reasons are clear. The Holy Spirit empowers the church. He also convicts and converts sinners (Acts 5:14; 11:21,24; 18:8), performs mighty works of grace in believers (Acts 4:8-10), disciplines the church (Acts 5:13-14), sends forth workers (Acts 8:26; 13:1-3), presides over the missionary council (Acts 15), restrains and contains workers (Acts 16:6-10), and exercises supreme ecclesiastical authority (Acts 20:28).

Empowered by the Holy Spirit, the church did mission by preaching Jesus (Acts 2; 8:35; 10:36-44; 1 Cor. 2:1-2). The church's mission to the world was strengthened through its intimate fellowship and unity (Acts 2:44), and every effort was made to maintain this characteristic (Acts 6:1-7; 15; and Paul's letters to the churches in Corinth and Galatia).

The missionaries Jesus sent out were instructed to go only to the house of Israel to preach and to meet human need. They were not to be overly concerned about their physical or material needs nor were they to spend an undue amount of time with those who willfully rejected their message (Matt. 10:1-15). After the resurrection missionaries were arrested (Acts 4-5), suffered (2 Cor. 4:7-10), and died (Acts 7).

The Apostle Paul was the most outstanding of these missionaries. God had called him as a missionary to the Gentiles (Acts 26:16-18; Rom. 1:5; Eph. 3:1), and he was sent out by the church in Antioch (Acts 13:1-3). The Holy Spirit led him in his ministry (Acts 16:6-10). He preached Jesus (1 Cor. 2:1-2), met people on their own level (Acts 17), established autonomous, indigenous churches (Acts 14:23), and worked with others—often training them to do the works of the ministry (Acts 16:1-3). Paul further refused to be dependent on the work he established for his own livelihood, yet he was grateful when churches responded to his needs (Phil. 4:14-18). Significantly, he identified with those with whom he worked (1 Cor. 9:19-23).

Mission was the heartbeat of the NT churches. See Confession; Election; Evangelism; Gospel; Holy Spirit; Kingdom of God; Paul; Salvation.

MIST Translation of several Hebrew and Greek terms with a combined range of meaning including subterranean water, fog, and clouds. The KJV frequently has “vapor(s)” where modern translations have “mist.” The mist of Gen. 2:6 refers to subterranean waters welling up and watering the ground. In Job 36:27 rain distills from the mist or fog rising from the earth. Mist often appears as a symbol for something which quickly passes away (Isa. 44:22; Hos. 13:3; James 4:14; 2 Pet. 2:17).

MITANNI (Mi tǎn' nī) Major kingdom between 1500 and 1300 B.C., located in what is now the northern parts of Turkey and Iran. Mitanni rivaled Egypt in its developed culture and control of the ancient Near East during this period. The people had many advanced technologies, including horse-drawn chariots. They also had fairly sophisticated laws for that day. Mitanni maintained considerable influence over Palestine for several centuries, affecting in particular the Jebusite culture of Jerusalem. See Chariots; Egypt; Jebusites; Jerusalem.

MITE See Coins.

MITHAN (Mith' an) Place-name, perhaps meaning "gift." Town of unknown location; hometown of Joshaphat (1 Chron. 11:43). Greek translation understood this as Bethany.

MITHCAH (Mith' cah) (KJV) or MITHKAH (Mith' kah) Place-name meaning "sweetness." One of the wilderness stations (Num. 33:28-29).

MITHNITE (Mith' nit) Title given to Joshaphat, a member of David's army (1 Chron. 11:43). See Mithan.

MITHRA, MITHRAISM Persian god and the mystery religion devoted to his worship.

The God Mithra Originally a Persian deity considered to be the mediator between mankind and Ahura Mazda, god of light. This god overcame evil and brought life, both animal and vegetable, to mankind. Statues of Mithra characteristically show him holding a bull by the nostrils while plunging a knife into its neck. The Romans identified Mithra with the sun god. December 25 was celebrated as his birthday. Three traditions relate the birth of Mithra: (1) he was born of an incestuous relationship between Ahura Mazda and his own mother; (2) he was born of an ordinary mortal; (3) Mithra was born from a rock. After his redemptive work on earth was finished, Mithra partook of a last supper with some of his devotees and then ascended to heaven where he continues to assist the faithful in their struggle against demons.

The Religion of Mithra Since Mithraism belongs to the general category known as mystery religions, our knowledge of its specific doctrines and rituals is very limited. Only devotees of the religion were allowed to witness its rituals or have access to its sacred doctrines. Most of our knowledge, therefore, consists of inferences drawn from artifacts and places of worship discovered by archaeologists.

Characteristics of Mithraism Mithraism was basically a religion of the common people, although at least one Roman emperor (Commodus, A.D. 180-192) was initiated into its mysteries. It was the only mystery religion that excluded women from membership. It had no professional clergy. Its seven stages of initiation prepared the initiate for ascent to the god of light. These stages corresponded to the seven planetary spheres through which one must ascend to reach the abode of the blessed: the Raven, the Occult, the Soldier, the Lion, the Persian, the Runner of the Sun, and the Father. Male children were allowed to participate in the lower stages.

Rituals In its ancient rural setting the actual slaying of a bull was part of the ritual. The initiate was placed in a pit covered by an iron grate. The bull was slain on the grate, and the initiate attempted to catch its sacred blood with his tongue. By the time the religion reached the Roman Empire, this act seems to have become mere symbolism. Beyond this, we know almost nothing except that bas-reliefs depict celebrants carrying counterfeit heads of animals, Persians, etc. This suggests the wearing of costumes corresponding to the stage of initiation.

Rival to Christianity Of all the mystery religions, Mithraism became the strongest rival to Christianity. Its rivalry with Christianity may be explained by common external features. Among the more prominent are: December 25, the god's birthday; Sunday, the holy day; baptism; a sacred meal; categorical ethics; belief in a final judgment with eternal life for the righteous and punishment for the wicked; and that the world would finally be destroyed by fire. See Mystery Religions.

MITHREDATH (Mith' rə dāth) Personal name meaning "gift of Mithra" (a Persian deity). 1. Cyrus' treasurer who returned the temple vessels (Ezra 1:8). 2. Syrian officer who protested Nehemiah's rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Ezra 4:7).

MITRE KJV term for a type of headdress, probably a turban. The mitre formed part of the high priest's garments (Exod. 28:4,36-39) and was required dress on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:4). Priests were prohibited from showing signs of mourning such as disheveled hair (Ezek. 24:17; Lev. 21:10). They perhaps wore turbans whenever they went out. In Zech. 3:5

the high priest Joshua received a clean mitre as a sign of the restoration of the priesthood.

MITYLENE (Mīt ə lē' nə) Place-name meaning “purity.” Chief city of the Aegean island of Lesbos southeast of Asia Minor. Paul stopped at Mitylene on his return trip to Syria from Achaia as part of his third missionary journey (Acts 20:14).

MIXED MULTITUDE Term for foreigners who associate themselves with a dominant ethnic group. The term is used for those foreigners who joined with the Israelites in the exodus from Egypt (Exod. 12:38), who became associated with the people of Judah during the exile (Neh. 13:3), or who were associated with the Egyptians (Jer. 25:20) or Babylonians (Jer. 50:37). See Mingled People.

MIZAR (Mī' zār) Proper name meaning “littleness” or an adjective meaning “little” (Ps. 42:6). The context of the psalm suggests a site at the headwaters of the Jordan in the territory of Dan.

MIZPAH or MIZPEH (Miz' pāh, Miz' pēh) Place-name or common noun meaning “watchtower” or “lookout.” A name commonly used in Palestine to refer to places used to provide security. The name appears in two different forms, Mizpah and Mizpeh, with the same basic meaning.

The name Mizpah was used for at least two different sites in the Transjordan, one located in the territory of Gilead, the other in Moab. In Gilead, Laban and Jacob made a covenant (Gen. 31:25-55), set up a pillar, and named it Mizpah (Gen. 31:49). Mizpah was also the name of the hometown of Jephthah, the Gileadite (Judg. 11). While the location of Mizpah of Gilead is not known, it was most likely located in the northern part of Gilead, perhaps a site like Ramothgilead. The location of Mizpeh in Moab has not been identified. In biblical history this was the site to which David took his parents (1 Sam. 22:3-5) when Saul sought his life.

At least two sites and one region west of the Jordan were named Mizpah. The account of Joshua's encounter with Jabin, king of Hazor (Josh. 11) refers to “the land of Mizpah” (v. 3) and “the valley of Mizpeh” (v. 8), a region in north Palestine, the location of which is unknown. A second Mizpeh west of the Jordan was located in the tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:38). While the exact location is unknown, this Mizpeh may have been near Lachish.

The town of Mizpeh located in the territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18:26) seems to be the most important of the Mizpeh's in the OT. In spite of the numerous references to this important OT site, its location is still debated. Two major sites have been suggested as possible locations: Nebi Samwil, located about five miles north of Jerusalem, and Tell en-Nasbeh, located about eight miles north of Jerusalem. While a major excavation has never been done at Nebi Samwil, the stories of Samuel seem to fit this location. On the other hand, Tell en-Nasbeh has been excavated, and the archaeological data fits well the history of Mizpeh of Benjamin.

The important role of Mizpah played in OT history is reflected in the many events associated with the site. Mizpah was a rallying point for Israel as they gathered against the tribe of Benjamin (Judg. 20). Samuel gathered Israel to Mizpah for prayer in the light of the Philistine threat (1 Sam. 7:5-11). Mizpah was a major site at which legal decisions were made (1 Sam. 7:15-17). One of the most interesting chapters in the history of Mizpah took place after the fall of Jerusalem. With Jerusalem in shambles following the Babylonian attack in 587 B.C., Mizpah became the administrative center of this Babylonian province. At Mizpah, Gedaliah, who had been appointed governor of the province, sought to encourage those who had remained behind (Jer. 40). MIZRAIM (Miz' rä 'im) Hebrew word for Egypt (Gen. 12:10; 13:10; 25:18). 1. Son of Ham (Gen. 10:6,13). 2. The Mushri, a people of Cilicia in southeastern Asia Minor (possibly 1 Kings 10:28; 2 Kings 7:6; 2 Chron. 1:16-17 TEV; NIV note). Mushri derives from the Assyrian word for “march” and possibly designates any people living outside their borders. Some scholars revocalize the Hebrew consonantal text to read Mushri, but they have no textual evidence for this. See Egypt.

MIZZAH (Miz' zah) Personal and clan name meaning “from this” or “light ray.” Edomite clan chief (Gen. 36:13,17; 1 Chron. 1:37).

MNASON (Mná' son) Personal name meaning “remembering,” variant of Jason. Native of Cyprus, and Paul's host during his final trip to Jerusalem in about A.D. 60 (Acts 21:16).

MOAB AND THE MOABITE STONE (Mó' áb, Mó' á bit) Personal and national name and monument the nation left behind. The narrow strip of cultivable land directly east of the Dead Sea was known in biblical times as “Moab,” and the people who lived there, as “Moabites.” Moab is rolling plateau (averaging approximately 3,300 feet elevation), bounded on the west by the rugged escarpment which drops down to the Dead Sea (almost 1,300 feet below sea level), on the east by the desert, and running through it the steep Wadi al-Mojib canyon (the Arnon River of biblical times). The Mojib/Arnon, which flows essentially east-west and enters the Dead Sea approximately midway along the latter's western shore, separates northern Moab from Moab proper.

Relatively few springs appear on the Moabite plateau, and the waters of the Mojib/Arnon are virtually inaccessible because of the steepness of the river canyon. Still, the area is well watered by winter rains brought by winds from the Mediterranean. The porous soil holds enough of the moisture for the villagers to grow cereal crops and to find good pasturage for their sheep and goats. Moab's agricultural productivity is illustrated by the biblical passages pertaining to Ruth and King Mesha, surely the two bestknown Moabites from the Bible. The book of Ruth opens with a time of famine in Judah; thus Elimelech, Naomi, and their two sons emigrated to Moab where food was still available (Ruth 1:1-5). King Mesha, we are told, “was a sheep breeder, and used to pay the king of Israel 100,000 lambs and the wool of 100,000 rams” (2 Kings 3:4 NASB).

The chief cities of northern Moab, the region north of the Arnon River to the Jabbok, were Heshbon, Medeba, and Dibon. Since this region was somewhat cut off from Moab proper by the Arnon, it was more vulnerable to international pressures and often changed hands during biblical times. According to Num. 21:25-30, sometime before the appearance of the Israelites in the region, the Amorites had taken it from Moab. Then the Amorites lost it to the Israelites and assigned it to the tribe of Reuben (Josh. 13:15-28). According to Judg. 11:13 Ammon (the region north of the Jabbok) claimed that the land belonged to them, even though they apparently had never occupied it. Moab finally reconquered the area, probably in the mid-ninth century B.C. (2 Kings 3; Isa. 15-16; Jer. 48).

Moab proper was more isolated from the outside world, bounded by the Dead Sea escarpment on the west, the desert on the east, the Mojib/ Arnon on the north, and a second river canyon on the south—called today Wady el-Hesa, probably, but not certainly, the River Zered of biblical times (Num. 21:12). The chief cities of Moab proper were Kir-hareseth (present-day Kerak) and a place called Ar Moab (possibly to be identified with the present-day village of Rabbah approximately nine miles northeast of Kerak). Second Kings 3 describes a military campaign undertaken by King Jehoram of Israel and supported by King Jehoshaphat of Judah which penetrated Moab proper and culminated in a siege of Kirhareseth. The siege was lifted when King Mesha of Moab sacrificed his oldest son on the city wall.

In addition to biblical passages such as those indicated above and occasional references in Assyrian texts, our major source of information about ancient Moab is the so-called Moabite Stone. This stone, which bears an inscription from the reign of the same King Mesha mentioned in 2 Kings 3, was discovered in 1868, near the ruins of ancient Dibon, by a German missionary. Known also as The Mesha Inscription, the monument reports the major accomplishments of King Mesha's reign. He boasts especially of having recovered Moabite independence from Israel and of having restored Moabite control over northern Moab.

Since they were neighbors, the history of the Moabites was intertwined with that of Israel. Moreover, the Israelites regarded the Moabites as close relatives, as implied by Gen. 19:30-38. We hear of peaceful interchange as well as conflicts between the Israelites and Moabites already during the time of the Judges. The story of Ruth illustrates peaceful relations, while the episode of Ehud and Eglon illustrates conflict (Judg. 3:12-30). Saul is reported to have fought against the Moabites (1 Sam. 14:47). David, a descendant of the Moabitess Ruth according to the biblical genealogies (Ruth 4:18-22), placed his parents under the protection of the king of Moab while he was on the run from Saul (1 Sam. 22:3-4). Yet he is reported to have defeated the Moabites in battle later on and to have executed two-thirds of the Moabite prisoners by arbitrary selection (2 Sam. 8:2). Moab was represented among Solomon's wives, and the worship of Chemosh, the Moabite god, accommodated in Solomon's Jerusalem (1 Kings 11:1-8).

Our most detailed information about Moabite-Israelite relations comes from the midninth century B.C., the time of the Omri dynasty of Israel and King Mesha of Moab (1 Kings 16:15-2 Kings 10:18). At this point the inscription of the Moabite Stone supplements the biblical record. We learn that Omri conquered northern Moab and gained some degree of domination over Moab proper. Ahab continued Omri's policies. King Mesha ascended the throne of Moab approximately midway during Ahab's reign, however, and eventually succeeded in throwing off the Israelite yoke. Mesha apparently began the struggle for Moabite independence during the turbulent years following Ahab's death (2 Kings 1:1). Ahaziah, who succeeded Ahab to the throne of Israel, was unable to respond to Mesha's challenge because of an accident that led to his premature death (2 Kings 1). Later, when Jehoram followed Ahaziah to the throne of Israel and attempted to restore Israelite control over Mesha, he was unsuccessful (2 Kings 3).

Eventually by 700 B.C. Moab fell under the shadow of Assyria as did Israel, Judah, Ammon, and the other petty Syro-Palestinian kingdoms. Thus Moab and Moabite kings are mentioned in the records of Tiglath-pileser III, Sargon II, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon. Also, prophetic oracles such as Amos 2:1-3; Isa. 15; and Jer. 48 pertain to these last waning years of the Moabite kingdom. See Arnon; Jehoshaphat; Joram; Kirhareth; Mesha; Ruth; Transjordan.

MOABITE (Mō a bit) Resident of Moab.

MOABITESS (Mō a bit' ēs) Female resident of Moab. Prominent women from Moab include Ruth (Ruth 1:22; 2:2,21; 4:5,10), some of Solomon's wives (1 Kings 11:1), and the mother of Jehozabad (2 Chron. 24:26).

MOADIAH (Mō a dī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah promises” or “Yah's ornament.” Priestly clan in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:17), perhaps to be identified with Maadiah (Neh. 12:5).

MODERATION Self-control; calmness; temperateness (Phil. 4:5). The underlying Greek term is used in parallel with kindness (2 Macc. 9:27). Modern translations read “forbearance” (RSV), “forbearing spirit” (NASB), “gentleness” (NIV, NRSV), and “consideration of others” (REB).

MODIOS See Weights and Measures.

MOLADAH (Mō lā' dah) Place-name meaning “generation.” City near Beersheba in southern Judah assigned both to Judah (Josh. 15:26) and to Simeon (Josh. 19:2), perhaps reflecting the political realities of different times or the dependence of Simeon on Judah. The similarity to the name Molid suggests that Moladah was a Jerahmeelite settlement (1 Sam. 27:10; 1 Chron. 2:29). The city was among those repopulated by Jews returning from exile (Neh. 11:26). Moladah is perhaps identical to the Edomite village of Malathah which served as a retreat for Herod Agrippa I. Various sites have been proposed: Khirbet Kuseifeh, 12 miles east of Beersheba; Tell el-Milh, southeast of Beersheba; and Khireibet el-Waten, east of Beersheba.

MOLE Large rodent, gray in color. In Lev. 11:30 some translate the Hebrew word as “chameleon” (NIV, NASB, RSV). Others translate “mole” in Lev. 11:29 (NASB, NEB), or in Isa. 2:20 (NASB, RSV, KJV). See Rodents.

MOLECH (Mō'lek) Transliteration of Hebrew word related to word for “king” but describing a foreign god or a practice related to foreign worship. The meaning of “Molech” is debated. Two views generally are proposed. One suggestion is that “Molech” denotes a particular type of offering, a votive sacrifice made to confirm or fulfill a vow. This viewpoint is supported by the fact that some Carthaginian-Phoenician (Punic) inscriptions from the period 400-150 B.C. imply that the word malak is a general form for “sacrifice” or “offering.” Such a meaning is possible in some passages (Lev. 18:21; 20:3-5; 2 Kings 23:10; Jer. 32:35).

A second suggestion is that “Molech” is the name of a pagan deity to whom human sacrifices were made. This deity often is associated with Ammon (cp. 1 Kings 11:7) “the abomination of the children of Ammon.” Leviticus 20:5 condemns those who “commit whoredom with Molech” (Lev. 18:21; 20:3-5; 2 Kings 23:10; Jer. 32:35). Some recent archaeological evidence points to child sacrifice in ancient Ammon. Many scholars contend that all the biblical texts referring to Molech can be understood by interpreting it as a divine name.

The etymology of the term Molech is interesting. Scholars suggest that it is a deliberate misvocalization of the Hebrew word for king or for the related participle (molek), “ruler.” They propose that the consonants for the Hebrew word for king (mlk) were combined with the vowels from the word for shame (boshet). Thus, this title was a divine epithet expressing contempt for the pagan god.

In times of apostasy some Israelites, apparently in desperation, made their children “go through the fire to Molech” (Lev. 18:21; 20:2-5; 2 Kings 23:10; cp. 2 Kings 17:31; Jer. 7:31; 19:5; 32:35). It generally is assumed that references like these are to the sacrifices of children in the Valley of Hinnom at a site known as Topheth (“Topheth” probably means “fire pit” in Syriac). Precisely how this was done is unknown. Some contend that the children were thrown into a raging fire. Certain rabbinic writers describe a hollow bronze statue in the form of a human but with the head of an ox. According to the rabbis, children were placed in the structure that was then heated from below. Drums were pounded to drown out the cries of the children.

An alternate view contends that the expression “passed through Molech” refers not to human sacrifices but that parents gave up their children to grow up as temple prostitutes. Such a view appeals to Lev. 18 where throughout the chapter the writer is concerned with sexual intercourse (esp. vv. 19-23). Another view sees an original fire ceremony dedicating, but not harming children, that later was transformed into a burnt-offering ceremony.

The practice of offering children as human sacrifice was condemned in ancient Israel, but the implication is clear in the OT that child sacrifice was practiced by some in Israel (2 Kings 21:6; 23:10; 2 Chron. 28:3; Ps. 106:38; Jer. 7:31; 19:4-5; Ezek. 16:21; 23:37,39). The exile seems to have put an end to this type of worship in Israel. However it lingered on in North Africa and among the Carthaginian Phoenicians into the Christian era. MOLID (Mō' līd) Personal name meaning “begetter.” Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 2:29).

MOLTEN SEA Large cast bronze basin that stood in the courtyard to the southeast of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:23-26; 2 Chron. 4:2-5). The basin was cast by Hiram of Tyre who was responsible for all the bronze work in the temple (1 Kings 7:13-14). The bronze for the molten sea was supplied by the spoils from David's campaigns (1 Chron. 18:8). The basin was over 14 feet in diameter, over seven feet high, and over 43 feet in circumference. It was about three inches thick. The estimated weight is about 30 tons, and the estimated volume is about 12,000 gallons (U.S.). The brim was turned outward resembling a lily, and below the brim were two rows of gourds (cp.

1 Kings 7:24; 2 Chron. 4:3). The sea rested on the backs of 12 oxen. The oxen were arranged in groups of three, each group facing toward one of the four compass directions (1 Kings 7:25; 2 Chron. 4:4). The oxen were later removed by Ahaz and replaced with a stone base (2 Kings 16:17; cp. Jer. 52:20). After the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C., the basin was broken in pieces and taken to Babylon (2 Kings 25:13; Jer. 52:17). The basin was used for the purification of the priests (2 Chron. 4:6).

MONEY BELT Modern rendering of the term the KJV translated as purse (Matt. 10:9; Mark 6:8). See Purse.

MONEY CHANGERS Persons whose profession was to sell or exchange Roman or other moneys for Jewish money acceptable in the temple worship. In NT times regions and cities issued their own money. This caused Jews of the Dispersion, those who lived outside of Judea, to bring many kinds of money to Jerusalem. To help visitors change money into that acceptable in Jerusalem, money changers set up tables in the temple court of the Gentiles. Syrian silver coins were the money of Jerusalem then, and worshipers used them to pay their temple tax of a half shekel and to buy sacrifices for the altar.

Three words are translated “money changers”: kollubistes (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:15) of Semitic origin referred to the exchange rate or commission; kermatistes (John 2:14) referred to a dealer in small change; and trapetzites (Matt. 25:27) which Luke used in a slightly different form (trapezan, 19:23, or shulhanim in Hebrew) referred to a money agent who sat at a table.

Money changers were in the area with vendors who sold animals, birds, and other items used in temple worship and sacrifices. Such transactions were numerous and required the service of brokers who knew the value of foreign money. Some exchangers profited greatly and loaned their money along with what others invested with them. Their interest rates ranged from 20 to 300 percent per year.

In anger at this corruption of the purpose of the temple, Jesus turned over the tables of the money changers and drove them and the sellers of animals out of the temple court (Matt. 21:12).

MONTH See Calendar; Time.

MOON Light in the night sky created by God and controlling the calendar (Gen. 1:14-19). Hebrew uses several words for moon, new moon, full moon, or bright, white moon. Two of Israel's greatest festivals were celebrated at the beginning of the full moon: the Passover in the spring and the Feast of Booths in the fall. Each month they celebrated the “new moon” with a little more festivity than a regular Sabbath (Num. 28:11-15 NIV).

Still the OT strongly teaches against worshiping the moon (Deut. 4:19; Job 31:26-28; Isa. 47:13-15) as did Israel's neighbors. The people of Israel were to remember that the moon was nothing more than an object created by Yahweh and had no power over people. Joel said in the last days the moon would become dark (Joel 2:10; 3:15) or turn to blood (Joel 2:31). The moon will not give its light on the “day of the LORD,” the light of the sun and the moon being replaced by the everlasting light of the Lord (Isa. 13:10; 60:19-20). James Newell

MOON, NEW See Calendar; Festivals; Time.

MORAL DECLINE The Bible teaches that in the latter days the world will be gripped by an unprecedented decline in morals. False teaching will allow wickedness to grow, resulting in apathy (Matt. 24:12) and open hostility (Matt. 24:9-11,24; 2 Tim. 3:1-5) toward the things of Christ. Religion will become a pretense for personal gain rather than an expression of true devotion to God (cp. 2 Tim. 3:5), and as a result the standards of moral behavior rooted in the Bible will be held to be irrelevant.

The NT lists the characteristics of persons who reject Christ (Gal. 5:19-21; Eph. 5:3-5; Col. 3:5-6; 1 Tim. 1:9-10; Rev. 21:8). These include all thoughts and actions that are less than Christlike. Today many who speak of morals often limit their discussion to sexual matters. The NT, however, is clear that sexuality is just one of many elements of human behavior to be judged by God's moral code.

Although at their root level the kinds of activities which will become rampant at the end of time will be the same kinds of activities that people have always done in opposition to God, their intensity will be much greater and their effect worldwide in scope.

MORASTHITE (Mô rās' thī) Resident of Moresheth (Jer. 26:18; Mic. 1:1).

MORDECAI (Môr' də kī) Personal name meaning "little man." 1. Esther's cousin and the mastermind behind her rise to power and subsequent victory over the evil Haman. Haman, a descendant of the Amalekite king Agag, sought to destroy the Jewish race. Mordecai, a descendant of King Saul's family, led Esther to thwart the attempt. Haman was hanged on the gallows he had erected for Mordecai. See Esther, Book of. 2. A man who returned from Babylon to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

MOREH (Mô' rēh) Place-name meaning "instruction" or "archers." 1. Place where several important events in the lives of the patriarchs and the nation Israel occurred. An oak tree at the site near Shechem is mentioned several times as being the focal point. Abraham's first encampment in the land of Canaan was at Shechem by the oak of Moreh. There he built an altar after God had appeared to him and entered into covenant (Gen. 12:6-7). Jacob at Shechem buried the foreign gods his family had brought from Haran (Gen. 35:4). At Moreh God set forth the blessings and curses on Israel regarding their keeping the commandments (Deut. 11:26-30). Joshua set up a memorial stone under the oak as a reminder of the covenant made between God and the people (Josh. 24:26). 2. Hill in tribal territory of Issachar where Gideon reduced his troops by testing the way they drank water (Judg. 7:1). Modern Nebi Dachi opposite Mount Gilboa.

MORESHETH or MORESHETH-GATH (Mó' rə shēth-Gāth) Place-name meaning "inheritance of Gath." Home of the Prophet Micah (Mic. 1:1). The prophet pictured his home as a bride receiving a going away gift from Jerusalem, her father, a warning of exile for Jerusalem's leaders and thus separation from their neighbors (1:14). The city was apparently located near Philistine Gath and is usually identified with Tell ej-Judeideh about 22 miles southwest of Jerusalem and nine miles east of Gath. Recently, this identification has been questioned. This may be the Gath Rehoboam fortified (2 Chron. 11:8). It may be Muchrashti of the Amarna letters.

MORIAH (Mó rī' ah) Place-name of uncertain meaning translated in various ways, including "Amorites" by earliest translators. The rocky outcropping in Jerusalem located just north of the ancient city of David. It was on this rock that Abraham would have sacrificed Isaac as a burnt offering, but God intervened and provided a ram (Gen. 22:2,13). Later the Jebusite city of Salem was built adjacent to the hill. After David captured the site, he purposed to build there a temple for the ark of the covenant. However, God gave that task to his son Solomon (1 Chron. 28:3-6). It may be modern Khirbet Beth-Lejj.

MORNING First part of the day by modern reckoning. Morning can refer to the time before dawn (Mark 1:35; cp. Gen. 44:3), to dawn (Gen. 19:15; 29:25; Judg. 16:2), or to some time after sunrise. Morning is frequently paired with evening (Gen. 1:5,8) to indicate a complete day. The coming of morning serves as a figure for joy (Ps. 30:5) or vindication (Ps. 49:14) which comes quickly.

MORTAR 1. Vessel in which substances are crushed with a pestle. Mortars were frequently fashioned from basalt or limestone. They were used to grind grain for flour, herbs for medicine, olives for oil (Num. 11:8). By extension, mortar designates a hollow place (pestle) (Josh. 15:19). Mortar is used as a proper name for a district of Jerusalem in Zeph. 1:11. 2. Building material, usually clay (Exod. 1:14; Isa. 41:25; Nah. 3:14), though sometimes bitumen (Gen. 11:3; KJV “slime”), used to secure joints in brick or stone. Modern translations sometimes replace the mortar of the KJV with another term, for example, plaster (Lev. 14:42,45) or whitewash (Ezek. 13:10-11,14-15).

MOSERA, MOSERAH, or MOSEROTH (Mō sē' rōth) Place-name meaning “chastisements.” A wilderness station (Num. 33:30-31). The singular form of the name (Mosera or Moserah) was the site of Aaron's burial (Deut. 10:6). Numbers 20:22-28 has prompted the location of Moseroth in the vicinity of Mount Hor.

MOSES (Mō' zās) Personal name meaning “drawn out of the water.” Moses was the leader of the Israelites in their exodus from Egyptian slavery and oppression, their journey through the wilderness with its threats in the form of hunger, thirst, and unpredictable enemies, and finally in their audience with God at Mount Sinai/Horeb where the distinctive covenant, bonding Israel and God in a special treaty, became a reality. Nothing is known about Moses from sources outside the OT. To be sure, the name “Moses” doubtlessly appears in Egyptian dress in compound names such as Tuthmoses III, but none of these references gives information about the Moses of Israel.

The story about Moses in the OT, found in the extensive narratives from Exod. 1 through Deut. 34, is more than simply a biography of Moses. It is a covenant document that celebrates God's making of the redemptive people of Israel in fulfillment of His promises to the patriarchs and declares the glory of that God and the nature of His relationship to them.

The artistic narrative begins in Exod. 1, not with data about Moses, but with an account of events in Egypt that affected Moses' people. Since the Israelites had grown to be a large people, the Egyptian pharaoh feared their power. To control them he launched an official policy of oppression against them. When the oppression failed to curb the population growth of the Israelites, the pharaoh announced a new policy for limiting that growth. “You must throw every son born to the Hebrews into the Nile, but let every daughter live” (Exod. 1:22 HCSB). The next chapter announces the birth of Moses. Moses' life began under the pharaoh's judgment of death.

The mother, however, acted to protect the baby Moses from the pharaoh's death decree. When the baby could no longer be hidden, the mother constructed an ark, a basket of bulrushes made waterproof with bitumen and pitch. She placed the child in the basket and the basket in the river. A sister stood watch over the basket to know what might happen. She witnessed an apparently terrible twist of fate, however, when the pharaoh's own daughter came to the river. She found the ark, opened it, and recognized the child as a Hebrew. Rather than killing the child as her father had commanded, however, the woman showed compassion on the child, made the proper preparations, and, with the help of the baby's sister, established a procedure for adopting the baby as her own child. As a part of that process, the princess committed the child to a wet nurse suggested by the girl watching the ark. Of course, the wet nurse was the child's own mother.

Stream in the Wilderness of Zin that local tradition says was formed when Moses and Aaron hit the rock.

After the baby had been weaned, the mother delivered the child to the princess. As a part of the adoption procedure, the princess named the child Moses. The young hero grew to maturity in the palace of the king who had sought to kill him. The mature Moses became concerned about the oppression of his people. The storyteller emphasized the identity between the oppressed people and Moses. “He went out to his own people...he saw an Egyptian beating a Hebrew, one of his people” (Exod. 2:11 HCSB). Moses responded to the particular act of oppression against his people by killing the Egyptian.

Rock traditionally considered the Rock of Rephidim that Moses struck to get water for the Israelites.

In the wake of his violent act against the Egyptian taskmaster, Moses fled from Egypt and from his own people to the land of Midian. Again he intervened in the face of oppression, inviting danger and risk. Sitting at a well, the typical meeting place for the culture (Gen. 29:2), Moses witnessed the violent aggression of male shepherds against female shepherds who had already drawn water for their sheep. Moses saved the oppressed shepherds, whose father, the priest of Midian, invited him to live and work under the protection of the Midianite's hospitality. Eventually one of the Midianite's daughters became Moses' wife. In the idyllic peace of the Midianite's hospitality, Moses took care of Jethro's sheep, fathered a child, and lived at a distance from his own people.

The event at the burning bush while Moses worked as a shepherd introduced him to the critical character of his heroic work. The burning bush caught Moses' attention. There Moses met the God of the fathers who offered Moses a distinctive name as the essential key for Moses' authority —“I am who I am.” This strange formulation played on God's promise to Moses to be present with him in his special commission. God sent Moses back to the pharaoh to secure the release of his people from their oppression. The divine speech of commission has a double character. As the heroic leader of Israel, he would initiate events that would lead to Israel's exodus from Egypt. But as the man of God, he would represent God in delivering the people from their Egyptian slavery. With the authority of that double commission, Moses returned to the pharaoh to negotiate the freedom of his people.

The negotiation narratives depict Moses in one scene of failure after the other. Moses posed his demands to the pharaoh, announced a sign that undergirded the demand, secured some concession from the pharaoh on the basis of the negotiations, but failed to win the release of the people. The final scene is hardly a new stage in the negotiations. To the contrary, God killed the firstborn of every Egyptian family, passing over the Israelite families. In the agony of this death scene, the Egyptians drove the Israelites out of Egypt (Exod. 12:30-36). But they acquired silver, gold, and clothing from the Egyptians in preparation for the event. When they escaped, they took the silver, gold, and clothing. Thus in leaving Egypt, Israel robbed the most powerful nation at the time of its firstborn sons and of its wealth.

Moses led the people into the wilderness where the pursuing Egyptians trapped the Israelites at the Red Sea. God, who had promised to be with His people, defeated the enemy at the Sea. Then God met their needs for food and water in the hostile wilderness. Even the serpents and the Amalekites failed to frustrate the wilderness journey of the Israelites under Moses' leadership. Exodus 17:8-13 shows Moses to be faithful in the execution of his leadership responsibilities. Numbers 12:1-16 shows Moses to be humble, a leader of integrity who fulfilled the duties of his office despite opposition from members of his own family.

The center of the Moses account emerges with clarity in the events at Mount Sinai. The law at Sinai constitutes God's gift for Israel. It showed Israel how to respond to God's saving act in the exodus, and it showed each new generation how to follow Moses' teaching in a new setting in the life of the people. The laws carried the name of Moses as an affirmation of their authority. The law of Moses became a model for Israelite society. Indeed, Israel's historians told the entire story of Israel under the influence of the Moses model and suggested that the Davidic kings should have constructed their leadership for Israel under the influence of the Moses model (Joshua—Kings). Only the good king Josiah and, to a lesser extent, Hezekiah matched that model.

The death of Moses is marked by tragic loneliness yet graced with God's presence. Because of Moses' sin (Num. 20) God denied Moses the privilege of entering the promised land. Deuteronomy 34 reports the death scene. Central to the report is the presence of God with Moses at the time of his death. Moses left his people to climb another mountain. Atop that mountain, away from the people whom he had served so long, Moses died. God attended this servant at his death. Indeed, God buried him, and only God knows where the burial place is.

MOST HIGH Most common translation of the Hebrew word Elyon. It is used in conjunction with other divine names such as El (Gen. 14:18), and Yahweh (Ps. 7:17) to speak of God as the Supreme Being. See Names of God.

MOTE Archaic English word referring to a small particle or speck. It is found in the KJV in Matt. 7:3 for the Greek word karphos, which refers to a minute fragment of straw, chaff, or wood. Thus it can be translated “speck” (HCSB, NRSV, NASB, NIV, TEV, REB) or “splinter” (NAB, NJB). Jesus used the word in His Sermon on the Mount to contrast a slight moral fault one may enjoy pointing out in others, while neglecting one's own more heinous fault, represented by the “log,” “plank,” or “beam” in one's own eye.

MOTH Literally “consumer” or “waster,” it is an insect whose destructive power is used to illustrate the result of sin (Ps. 39:11) and the judgment of God (Hos. 5:12). The moth's weakness is used to speak of the frailty of man (Job 4:19). Jesus urged His followers to avoid the temptation to accumulate wealth on earth where the moth could destroy it but to lay up immortal treasures in heaven (Matt. 6:19-20). See Insects.

MOTHER Female parent who carries, gives birth to, and cares for a child. Usually refers to humans but may refer to animals or even as a metaphor for deity. In the Bible a wife has two equally important roles: to love, support, and provide companionship and sexual satisfaction for her husband and to bear and rear children. So important was the latter that a stigma was attached to barrenness (Gen. 16:1-2; 18:9-15; 30:1; 1 Sam. 1:1-20; Luke 1:5-25, esp. v. 25).

The Bible refers to every aspect of motherhood: conception (Gen. 4:1; Luke 1:24), pregnancy (2 Sam. 11:5; Luke 1:24), the pain of childbirth (Gen. 3:16; John 16:21), and nursing (1 Sam. 1:23; Matt. 24:19). A new mother was considered to be ritually unclean, and an offering was prescribed for her purification (Lev. 12; cp. Luke 2:22-24). The book of Proverbs (1:8; 31:1) indicates that even in ancient times mothers shared with fathers the responsibility for instructing and disciplining children. Mothers have the same right to obedience and respect as fathers (Exod. 20:12; Lev. 19:3), and in OT times death could be the penalty for those who cursed or assaulted parents (Exod. 21:15, 17; Deut. 21:18-21). Jesus enforced the fifth commandment and protected it against scribal evasion (Matt. 15:3-6).

Motherly virtues are often extolled: compassion for children (Isa. 49:15), comfort of children (Isa. 66:13), and sorrow for children (Jer. 31:15, quoted in Matt. 2:18).

The fact that God would use a human mother to bring His Son into the world has bestowed upon motherhood its greatest honor. Jesus set an example for all to follow by the provision He made for His mother (John 19:25-27). Jesus made plain, however, that devotion to God must take precedence to that of a mother (Matt. 12:46-50). Even the OT (Gen. 2:24) indicated that a man's devotion to his wife supercedes that to his mother.

In addition to the literal sense, including that of animal mothers (Exod. 34:26; Lev. 22:27), the word is often used metaphorically. Israel is compared to an unfaithful mother (Hos. 2:2-5; Isa. 50:1). Revelation 17:5 calls Babylon (Rome) the mother of harlots (those who are unfaithful to God). A city is the “mother” of her people (2 Sam. 20:19). Deborah was the “mother” (or deliverer) of Israel. In a more positive vein, the heavenly Jerusalem is the “mother” of Christians (Gal. 4:26). Jesus spoke of His compassion for Jerusalem as being like that of a mother hen for her chicks (Matt. 23:37). Paul compared his ministry to a mother in labor (Gal. 4:19) and a nursing mother (1 Thess. 2:7).

MOUNT OF THE BEATITUDES The “Horns of Hattin” near Capernaum which tradition identifies as the site of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:1-7:29). The reference to Jesus' ascending the mountain is perhaps meant to recall the story of Moses at Sinai (Exod. 19:3,20).

MOUNT OF THE CONGREGATION KJV expression generally rendered Mount of Assembly by modern translations. Part of Isaiah's exposure of the pride of the king of Babylon is the charge that he desired to ascend to the distant mountain where according to Babylonian myth the gods assembled (Isa. 14:13). The desire is tantamount to a claim to divinity.

MOUNT OF THE VALLEY KJV designation for an elevation in a valley in the territory of Reuben in Transjordan (Josh. 13:19). Modern translations render the phrase hill in/of the valley.

MOUNTAIN Elevated topographical feature formed by geological faulting and erosion. The geography of Palestine featured high mountains and deep rifts. The two usual words for mountain in the Bible are har (Hb.) and oros (Gr.). The simple definition for each is mountain or hill, though they may indicate hill country or a mountainous region.

Jebel Musa, the traditional site of Mount Sinai, in the southern Sinai Peninsula.

Many important events in the Bible took place on or near mountains. God called Moses to His work at Mount Horeb, sometimes called “the mountain of God.” A part of God's call was the promise that the Israelite people would worship there upon their escape from Egypt (Exod. 3:1-12). After the exodus God commanded Moses to gather the people at Mount Sinai (probably identical to Horeb). There God gave the law including the Ten Commandments to Moses.

Other OT mountain episodes include Aaron's death on Mount Hor (Num. 33:38), the death of Moses on Mount Nebo (Deut. 34:1-8), and Elijah's defeat of the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (Kings 18:15-40).

Much of Jesus' life and ministry also took place on mountains. One of the temptations took place on “a very high mountain” (Matt. 4:8 HCSB). Jesus' most famous teaching session is called the “Sermon on the Mount” (Matt. 5-7). Jesus went up to a mountain to pray (Luke 6:12). Jesus was transfigured on a mountain (Matt. 17:1-8). There He was declared to be preeminent over both Moses and Elijah, the representatives of the Law and Prophets. Many of their greatest victories came on mountains.

The term “mountain” also is used symbolically. It is a natural image for stability (Ps. 30:7), obstacles (Zech. 4:7), and God's power (Ps. 121:1-2). God will remove all obstacles when His redemption is complete “and every mountain and hill be made low” (Isa. 40:4 NASB).

Mountains often have been called “holy places.” Jerusalem (elevation 2,670 feet) often was called Mount Zion, the hill of the Lord (Pss. 2:6; 135:21; Isa. 8:18; Joel 3:21; Mic. 4:2). God met His people there in worship. The “new Jerusalem” is also known as Mount Zion (Rev. 14:1).

Some of the more famous biblical mountains with their feet elevations are: Ebal (3,084), Gerizim (2,890), Gilboa (1,630), Hermon (9,230), Nebo (2,630), Tabor (1,930), Sinai (7,500). See Jerusalem; Palestine; Sermon on the Mount; Zion. Bradley S. Butler

MOUTH The external orifice used to ingest food and to communicate. 1. Synonym for lips (1 Kings 19:18; 2 Kings 4:34; Job 31:27; Prov. 30:20; Song 1:2). 2. Organ of eating and drinking (Judg. 7:6; 1 Sam. 14:26-27), sometimes used in figurative expressions such as when wickedness (Job 20:12) or God's word (Ps. 119:13) is described as sweet to the mouth. Anthropomorphic descriptions of the earth or Sheol speak of them opening their mouths to drink blood or swallow persons (Gen. 4:11; Num. 16:30,32; Isa. 5:14). 3. Organ of speech (Gen. 45:12; Deut. 32:1) or laughter (Job 8:21; Ps. 126:2). The phrase “the mouth of the LORD has spoken” serves as a frequent reminder of the reliability of a prophetic message (Isa. 1:20; 40:5; Jer. 9:12; cp. Deut. 8:3; Matt. 4:4). Fire (2 Sam. 22:9) or a sword (Rev. 1:16) proceeding from the mouth of God pictures the effectiveness of God's word of judgment. 4. Hebrew term for “mouth” is used for the openings of wells, caves, sacks, as well as for the edge of a sword.

MOZA (Mō' zā) Personal name meaning “offspring.” 1. Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 2:46). 2. Descendant of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:36-37; 9:42-43).

MOZAH (Mō' zah) Place-name meaning “unleavened.” City in Benjamin (Josh. 18:26), later a center for pottery production as attested by numerous vessels recovered at Jericho and Tell-en-Nasbeh bearing the inscription Mozah on their handles. The site is likely that of modern Qaluniya, four miles northwest of Jerusalem on the Tel Aviv road.

MUFFLER KJV term for a scarf (NRSV) at Isa. 3:19. The item is part of the finery of the Jerusalem socialites. Other translations render the Hebrew term as veils (NASB, NIV, TEV) or coronets (REB).

MULE Hybrid animal produced by the union of a male ass and a female horse. Since the Mosaic law forbade crossbreeding (Lev. 19:19), the Israelites imported mules (Ezek. 27:14). They were used as war animals, for riding, and for carrying burdens (2 Kings 5:17). They were especially good for moving heavy burdens in mountainous areas, being better than the horse, ass, or camel. David chose a mule to symbolize royalty for Solomon's coronation (1 Kings 1:33), possibly because the Israelites did not have horses. However, this is not the donkey used in Zech. 9:9 and Matt. 21:5 for Jesus' entry to Jerusalem.

MUPPIM (Mūp' pīm) Son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21). The name perhaps is derived from the root "to wave." See Shephupham.

MURDER Intentional taking of human life. Human life is given great value in the Bible. Persons are created in the image of God; and persons are called to obey, serve, and glorify God. Human life is viewed as a sacred trust. It is because of this that taking human life is viewed as a serious crime in the Bible.

The prohibition against murder is found in the Ten Commandments, the heart of Hebrew law (Exod. 20:13; Deut. 5:17). Murder is the unlawful killing of a human being by another. Deliberately taking the life of a human being usurps the authority that belongs to God. The prohibition against murder is a hedge to protect human dignity. The OT (Gen. 9:6) prescribed that a murderer should be prepared to forfeit his own life. In Num. 35:16-31 careful attention is given to determining whether a killing is to be classified as murder.

Jesus removed the concept of murder from a physical act to the intention of one's heart (Matt. 5:21-22). According to Jesus, murder really begins when one loses respect for another human being. Spitting in the face of another, looking with contempt upon another, or unleashing one's anger are signs that a murderous spirit is present. Jesus forces us to move to the spirit behind the prohibition of murder. We are compelled to do all that we can do to protect the life of our neighbor and help it flourish. The writer of 1 John pushed Jesus' teaching to its ultimate: "Everyone who hates his brother is a murderer, and you know that no murderer has eternal life residing in him" (1 John 3:15 HCSB). MUSHITE (Mu' shi) Member of clan of Mushi.

MUSIC, INSTRUMENTS, DANCING Expression of the full range of human emotions vocally or instrumentally through music was as much a part of the lives of biblical people as it is of modern times. Workers bringing in the harvest might sing a vintage song (Isa. 16:10; Jer. 48:33). Those digging a well (Num. 21:17), as well, might be heard singing. Indeed all of life could be touched by song. The celebrations of a community, ritual practices of worship, even the act of warfare gave rise to song.

In such a musical climate, celebration through dance found a natural place in both the religious and secular life of ancient Israel. A variety of musical instruments was available to provide instrumental accompaniment to both song and dance.

Music Music as performed in early Near Eastern times has become better known through archaeological finds of descriptive texts and the remains of actual instruments.

The secular and religious music of ancient Israel found its home against this background of ancient Near Eastern music in which all of life could be brought under the spell of song. In reading the OT, Gen. 4:21 stands as the first reference to music. As one of Lamech's sons, Jubal “was the father of all those who play the lyre and pipe” (NASB). Jubal brought the advent of music to the portrayal of cultural advance. The name Jubal itself is related to the Hebrew word for “ram” (, the horns of which served as a signaling instrument in ancient Israel.yovel)

The joy taken in music is evidenced by its prominent role in the celebrations of life. A farewell might be said “with joy and with songs, with timbrel and with lyre” (Gen. 31:27 NASB); a homecoming welcomed “with tambourines and with dancing” (Judg. 11:34; cp. Luke 15:25). Work tasks of everyday living enjoyed the music evidenced by the songs or chants of the well diggers (Num. 21:17-18), those who tread grapes (Jer. 48:33), and possibly the watchman (Isa. 21:12).

Under certain circumstances musical celebration brought condemnation. The account of Moses' return from the mountain to be confronted by the singing and dancing of the people around the golden calf (Exod. 32:17-19) symbolized a condition of broken covenant. The Prophet Isaiah's rebuke of the idle rich who have “lyre and harp, tambourine and flute and wine” at their feasts is cast against their failure to take notice of the deeds of Yahweh (Isa. 5:12 NRSV). Both the scorn of mockers (Job 30:9) and the acclamation of heroes (1 Sam. 18:6-7) were expressed in song.

Victory in warfare provided impetus for numerous songs. The song of Miriam, one of the oldest poetic verses in the OT, celebrated the defeat of Pharaoh at the Sea (Exod. 15:21). Judges 5 stands as musical witness to Israel's victory over Jabin, the king of Canaan. Known as the “Song of Deborah,” the verses are the musical celebration of a narrative event. Chants of victory on the lips of the victor (cp. Samson following his slaying of the Philistines recorded in Judg. 15:16) or those greeting the one successful in battle (cp. 1 Sam. 18:7) establish music as a medium for uncontainable joy. Celebration erupted into song. Emotions that might be limited by the restriction of prose, expressed themselves through the poetry of music as seen in David's moving lament at the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1:19-27).

In the early days of OT history, a special place seems to be accorded women in musical performance. The Prophetess Miriam and Deborah, a prophetess and judge, were among Israel's earliest musicians. Judges 11:34 pictures Jephthah's daughter greeting his victorious return from battle against the Ammonites “with tambourines and with dancing.” David's reputation for valor spread through the singing of women's voices: “Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands” (1 Sam. 18:7). The depiction of dancing women entertaining at festive occasions found on Egyptian tomb paintings provides early Near Eastern background for the role of women in musical celebration.

The establishment of the monarchy about 1025 B.C. brought a new dimension to the musical tradition of ancient Israel with the appearance of professional musicians. Egypt and Assyria, neighboring countries to Israel, had known the tradition of professional musicians much earlier. Such musicians took their place both at court (1 Kings 1:34,39-40; 10:12; Eccles. 2:8) and in religious ritual. An Assyrian inscription, praising the victory of the Assyrian king Sennacherib over King Hezekiah of Judah, lists male and female musicians as part of the tribute carried off to Nineveh.

Although much uncertainty remains concerning the specifics of temple worship, biblical references offer clues to the role music played in cult observances. As a hymn proclaiming the future rule of God in all the earth, Ps. 98 calls for the employment of music in praise:

Shout to the LORD, all the earth;

be jubilant, shout for joy, and sing.

Sing to the LORD with the lyre, with the lyre and melodious song.

With trumpets and the blast of the ram's horn shout triumphantly in the presence of the LORD, our King (vv. 4-6 HCSB).

Worship featured trumpet calls (cp. Num. 10:10) and songs of thanksgiving, expressions of praise and petition sung after the offering of sacrifices (2 Chron. 29:20-30).

The psalms show not only the emotional range of music from lament to praise but also provide words for some of the songs used in temple worship. Guilds of musicians, known through reference to their founders in some psalm headings (for example, “the sons of Korah”), were evidently devoted to the discipline of liturgical music.

During the Babylonian exile the question, “How can we sing the LORD'S song on foreign soil?” (Ps. 137:4), arose. Psalm 137 further alludes to the demand of the Babylonians for the Hebrew captives to “sing us one of the songs of Zion” (v. 3). The return from exile and reestablishment of the temple saw the descendants of the original Levitical musicians (cp. Ezra 2:40-41) reassume responsibility for liturgical music. Strabo's statement that the singing girls of Palestine were considered the most musical in the world shows that music continued in importance in Israel during Hellenistic times.

The structures of some psalms offer evidence for conjecturing the nature of vocal performance. Refrains (such as the “Lift up your heads, O gates! Rise up, O ancient doors!” of Ps. 24) and acclamations such as “Hallelujah” as well as divisions into strophes stand as performance clues. The common device of poetic parallelism, whereby a thought is balanced synonymously or antithetically with a second thought, provides further evidence for surmising the nature of musical performance, responsive and antiphonal performances being possibilities.

In light of the recognized obscurity in many of the headings, one can speak in general terms of five different types of information provided by the Psalm titles. Representatives of this classification are titles that identify psalms with persons or groups of persons (Pss. 3; 72; 90); titles purporting to indicate historical information concerning the psalm, particularly with respect to David (Pss. 18; 34); titles containing musical information (Pss. 4; 5); titles with liturgical information (Pss. 92; 100); and titles designating the

Nearly two-thirds of the psalms contain terms indicating collections, compilers, or authors in their headings: David, portrayed in biblical tradition as a composer, instrumentalist, court musician, and dancer, being most often mentioned. Others mentioned include the sons of Korah, Asaph, Solomon, Heman the Ezrahite, Ethan the Ezrahite, Moses, and Jeduthun.

Deriving from the Greek translation of the Hebrew mizmor, the word “psalm” is applied to some 57 songs. As a technical term appearing only in the Psalter, psalm refers to songs with instrumental accompaniment. Other terms indicating the type of psalm include shiggaion (Ps. 7), sometimes argued to indicate a lament; miktam (Pss. 16; 56-60) connected to the Akkadian meaning “to cover”; maskil (Ps. 78) whose meaning is still unknown. Some 30 psalms include in their heading the word “song” (Hb. shir), with “song of praise,” “prayer,” “a song of love,” and “a song of ascent” also occurring. Headings may include as well terms which indicate the liturgical aim and usage of the particular psalm (for instance, “for the thank offering,” “for the memorial offering,” “for the Sabbath”).

Some 55 psalms contain the expression “to the choirmaster” in their headings. Other technical musical expressions consisting of remarks that concern types or kinds of performances include “with stringed instruments” (neginot, Pss. 4; 6; 54, perhaps meant to exclude percussion and wind instruments) and “for the flutes” (nehilot), though both meanings are dubious. The terms higgaion (perhaps “musical flourish”), shemini (“on the eighth,” perhaps an octave higher), and “the gittith” (Pss. 8; 81; 84) remain obscure as to meaning.

The singing of psalms to other tunes popular at the time is suggested by headings such as “Hind of the Dawn” in Ps. 22 (RSV) and “to Lillies” used in Pss. 45; 69; 80 (RSV).

Although found some 71 times in the Psalter, the interpretation of the term Selah remains uncertain. Suggestions range from understanding the term according to its earliest Greek translation, generally thought to indicate a type of musical interlude or change in singing, to a call for repetition of the verse, louder singing, or the kneeling and bowing down of worshipers.

Musical Instruments Pictorial representations as well as remains from instruments discovered through archaeology aid in our present knowledge of ancient musical instruments. A wide scope of literary remains gives further evidence. Descriptions and comments about musical instruments are to be found in both the OT and NT, their early translations, rabbinic and patristic literature, and the writings of Roman and Greek authors. Caution, however, must be applied in using the data available, leaving many identifications difficult and at best hypothetical.

The most frequently named musical instrument in the Bible is the “shofar” (ram's horn). Limited to two or three notes, the shofar (often translated “trumpet”) served as a signaling instrument in times of peace and war (Judg. 3:27; 6:34; Neh. 4:18-20). Having as its chief function the making of noise, the shofar announced the new moons and Sabbaths, warned of approaching danger, and signaled the death of nobility. As the only ancient instrument still used in the synagogue today, the shofar found a prominent place in the life of Israel, noted by its function in national celebration (1 Kings 1:34; 2 Kings 9:13).

Similar in function to the shofar was the trumpet, a straight metal instrument flared on the end and thought to have had a high, shrill tone. Sounded in pairs, the trumpet was known as the instrument of the priests (cp. Num. 10:2-10 for a description of uses; 2 Chron. 5:12-13 where some 20 trumpeters are mentioned). The sound of the trumpets introduced temple ceremony and sacrifice, the trumpet itself being counted among the sacred temple utensils (2 Kings 12:13; Num. 31:6).

As the instrument of David and the Levites, the lyre (Hb., kinnor, KJV “harp”) was employed in both secular and sacred settings (cp. Isa. 23:16; 2 Sam. 6:5). A popular instrument throughout the ancient Near East, the lyre was often used to accompany singing. The number of strings on the lyre could vary; its basic shape was rectangular or trapezoidal.

The harp was a favorite instrument of the Egyptians. In Hebrew the designation nebel, though admittedly uncertain, may imply a type of angular harp with a vertical resonator or represent another type of lyre. Mainly a religious instrument in biblical tradition, the nebel is rarely mentioned in secular functions (cp. Isa. 5:12; 14:11). Like the lyre, the harp was often associated with aristocracy, thus being often made from precious woods and metals (1 Kings 10:12; 2 Chron. 9:11).

Chief among “flutes” and “pipes,” woodwinds generally associated with secular uses, was the chalil, the most popular wind instrument in the ancient Near East and principal among the biblical wind instruments. Perhaps better described as a primitive clarinet, the chalil (NASB “flute” or KJV “pipe”) was an instrument consisting of two separate pipes made of reed, metal, or ivory; each pipe having a mouthpiece with single or double reeds. Used in the expression of joy (1 Kings 1:39-40) or mourning (Jer. 48:36; Matt. 9:23), the chalil was primarily a secular instrument that could be played at funerals or feasts.

Other musical instruments mentioned in the biblical texts include the timbrel or tambourine (Hb. toph, often symbolic of gladness, Gen. 31:27), cymbals, bells (presumably metal jingles without clappers; Exod. 28:33-34; 39:25-26 where they are attached to the high priest's robe), and a rattle-type noisemaker translated variously as castanets, rattles, sistrums, cymbals, or clappers (2 Sam. 6:5).

Mentioned in the NT are pipes (RSV “flute”), the lyre (RSV “harp”), cymbals, and the trumpet. The “sounding brass” of 1 Cor. 13:1 is perhaps understood through rabbinic literature in which it is seen as a characteristic instrument for weddings and joyous celebrations.

Dancing As rhythmic movement often performed to music, dancing enjoyed a prominent place in the life and worship of Israel. Various Hebrew words in the OT used to express the idea of dance seem to imply different types of movement: to skip about (raqad, Job 21:11), whirling about (karar, 2 Sam. 6:14,16), and perhaps twisting or writhing (machol, Ps. 30:11). Pictured in the homecoming welcome of victorious soldiers by women, dancing could be accompanied by song and instrument music (1 Sam. 18:6). See Dancing; David; Levites; Psalms, Book of; Shiloh; Zither.

MUSTARD Large annual plant which grows quite fast. Its seeds were once thought to be the smallest in the plant world. Jesus used the mustard plant in a parable to symbolize the rapid growth of the kingdom of God (Matt 13:31-32), and its seed as a simile for faith (Matt. 17:20). See Plants.

MUSTER GATE NRSV, REB designation for a Jerusalem city gate where troops were mustered, that is, gathered for enlistment (Neh. 3:31). See Miphkad Gate.

MUTENESS Inability to speak. In the OT muteness is traced to God (Exod. 4:11). God made Ezekiel mute (Ezek. 3:26) in response to Israel's failure to listen to his message. Later He restored Ezekiel's speech (24:27; 33:22) as a sign of the people's receptiveness to hear. Daniel became speechless in response to the appearance of a heavenly messenger (Dan. 10:15). The psalmist considered muteness an appropriate punishment for liars (Ps. 31:18). By extension, to be mute means to hold one's peace (Ps. 39:2,9; Isa. 53:7; Acts 8:32), especially in the face of injustice. In Prov. 31:8 the mute are the symbol of all those who suffer without a voice. Isaiah 56:10 pictures Israel's leaders as mute dogs who cannot bark a warning. In Isa. 35:6 the singing of those once mute accompanies return from the exile. In Hab. 2:18-19 idols are mocked as mutes (1 Cor. 12:2).

In the NT muteness is either not explained (Mark 7:32,37) or else attributed to demons (Matt. 9:32; 12:22; Mark 9:17,25; Luke 11:14). An exception is Zechariah's muteness (Luke 1:20,22) which served as a sign of the truthfulness of Gabriel's message as well as a punishment for Zechariah's unbelief.

MUTH-LABBEN (Mûth-lâb' bën) Hebrew phrase in the title of Ps. 9 which means "death of the son." The phrase likely refers to the tune to which the psalm was performed.

MUTTER To utter words indistinctly or with a low voice. Muttering together with chirping characterized the speech of mediums (Isa. 8:19). See Medium; Sheol.

MUZZLE Leather or wire covering for an animal's mouth to prevent its eating or biting. Deuteronomy 25:4 is one of many laws in the Deuteronomic code concerned with humane treatment of others. Paul cited this prohibition of muzzling a treading ox to illustrate the principle that “the laborer is worthy of his pay” and specifically that “those who preach the gospel should earn their living by the gospel” (1 Cor. 9:9-14; 1 Tim. 5:17-18 HCSB).

MYRA (Mī' rā) One of the six largest cities of Lysia in southeastern Asia Minor located on the River Andracus about two and one-half miles from the sea. The site of the ancient ruins is called Dembre today. Myra was a stopping point on Paul's voyage to Rome (Acts 27:5-6). Some manuscripts of the Western Text give Myra as port call after Patara in Acts 21:1.

MYRIAD (Mīr' ī ad) Greek term literally meaning 10,000 but frequently used to mean “countless or innumerable” (Jude 14; Rev. 5:11; 9:16; Luke 12:1; Acts 19:19; 21:20; Heb. 12:22).

MYRRH Aromatic resin having many uses in the ancient Near East. It was traded along with spices (Gen. 37:25), used as an ingredient in anointing oil (Exod. 30:23), applied as perfume (Esther 2:12), placed in clothes to deodorize them (Ps. 45:8), given as a gift (Matt. 2:11), and used to embalm bodies (John 19:39).

MYRTLE See Plants.

MYSIA (Mīs' ī ā) Northwest region of Asia Minor (Acts 16:7). The NT mentions several cities in this region: Adramyttium (Acts 27:2); Assos (Acts 20:13-14); Pergamum (Rev. 1:11; 2:12); and Troas (Acts 16:8,11; 20:5,6; 2 Cor. 2:12; 2 Tim. 4:13). Hindered from mission work in Bythia, Paul passed through Mysia before embarking on his Macedonian mission (Acts 16:6-11). Acts 20 records Paul's seven-day stay at Troas and an overland (mission) trip to Assos. On another occasion Paul found in Troas an open door of mission opportunity (2 Cor. 2:12).

MYSTERY Comes from the Greek noun musterion, though our English word does not do it justice. A musterion in the ancient world was any religious cult that demanded secrecy from its participants, who had to undergo sacred rites for membership. An element of this may lie behind musterion in the NT, but the word normally translated “mystery” in the book of Daniel is more likely the background for NT usage. In Daniel a mystery (Aramaic raz) was a revealed secret, something that could not be understood apart from divine revelation or explanation (Dan. 2:17-47; 4:9); this is certainly the force of the numerous instances of musterion in the NT. Jesus used musterion only once, and this was in reference to the mysteries or secrets about the kingdom that He revealed and explained to His disciples (Matt. 13:11; cp. Mark 4:11; Luke 8:10). Paul used musterion 21 times, and on each occasion the secret is already known from previous revelation (see Rom. 16:25; Eph. 1:9; 6:19; Col. 2:2; 4:3; 1 Tim. 3:16), or it is explained in the context (see Rom. 11:25; 1 Cor. 15:51; Eph. 3:1-13; 5:32; Col. 1:25-27)—that is, it is no longer a secret. The final four uses of musterion in the NT occur in Revelation, where the secret is a symbol that needs to be decoded (1:20; 10:7; 17:5,7).

MYSTERY RELIGIONS Several different cults or societies characterized in part by elaborate initiation rituals and secret rites. Though attested in Greece before 600 B.C., the mystery religions flourished during the Hellenistic and Roman periods (after 333 B.C.) before dying out before A.D. 500. In particular the intermingling of religious concepts made possible by Alexander the Great's far-flung conquests accelerated the spread of some cults and facilitated the development of others. Knowledge of the mystery religions is fragmentary due to the strict secrecy imposed on those initiated; scattered references in ancient writers, some antagonistic to mystery religions, and archaeological data provide the most important evidence. Scholars often disagree about the interpretation of the data.

Many mystery religions emerged, but among the more important were those associated with the following deities: the Greek Demeter (the famous Eleusinian mysteries) and Dionysus, the Phrygian Cybele (the Magna Mater) and Attis; the Syrian Adonis; the Egyptian Isis and Osiris (Sarapis); and Mithra, originally a Persian deity. Orphism and Sabazius both contributed to the mysteries of Dionysus while Samothrace was the home of the Cabiri mysteries. Many of the deities in the mystery religions were ancient and were worshiped in separate cults both before and after the development of the mystery cults.

The central feature of each mystery religion was the sacred rites, called mysteries, in which the cultic myth of the god or goddess worshiped in the cult was reenacted. Only those formally initiated into the cult could participate. The precise nature of these rites is unknown due to the vow of secrecy but probably involved a drama based upon the cult myth and the dramatic visual presentation of certain sacred objects. Mention is made of "things said," probably sacred formulas and secret love. References exist to eating and drinking, likely a form of communion. By participating in these rites the worshiper identified with the deity and shared in the deity's fate. These powerful symbols afforded those initiated the means to overcome the suffering and difficulties of life and promised a share in the life beyond.

Many, but not all, of the deities worshiped in the mysteries were originally associated with fertility. As such, their associated myths often referred to the natural cycle as it waxes and wanes (for instance, Demeter) or to the dying and rising of a god (Attis, Adonis, Osiris). Some scholars think that the mysteries used this feature of the myth to give symbolic expression of rising to immortality with the deity. However, not all scholars agree; some deities venerated in mystery religions did not die or rise; moreover, the exact use of the myth in the mysteries is often unclear, though some concept of immortality seems to be implied.

Public festivals were given in honor of some deities worshiped in the mystery religions, but their relationship to the secret rites is not clear. The spring festival of Cybele (March 15-27) involved processions, sacrifices, music, and frenzied dancing which led to castration. The public revelry, pantomimes, theatric productions, and excesses of drink associated with the worshipers of Dionysius/Bacchus (the Bacchanalia) are well-known.

Rites of initiation into the mystery religions included ritual cleansing in the sea, baptisms, and sacrifices. Mention should be made of the Taurobolium, used in the worship of Cybele, a rite in which a bull was slaughtered on a grill placed over a pit in which a priest stood; the person below eagerly covered himself with blood. Some have interpreted this as a rite of initiation, but it is more likely a purification ritual affording rebirth for a period of time, perhaps 20 years. The mystery religions dislodged religion from the traditional foundations of state and family and made it a matter of personal choice. With a few exceptions, for instance, Mithraism that was restricted to males, the mysteries were open to all classes and sexes. Those initiated formed an association bound together by secret rites and symbols peculiar to their cult. These associations met regularly with a designated leader in houses or specially built structures. The worshipers of Mithras met in a structure called a Mithraeum designed to imitate the cave in which Mithras killed the bull, the central act of the cult myth. Scenes of the slaying (tauroctony) appear prominently in several such structures.

At the meetings ritual acts or sacraments practiced by the particular cult were shared by the members. Mention is made of common meals or banquets. Members of the association were required to meet certain moral standards; some mention also is made of ascetic requirements. However, a word of caution is in order: generalizations about the mystery religions are difficult since each cult was individualistic. Exceptions to nearly all generalizations can be found.

NAAM (Ná'ám) Personal name meaning “pleasantness.” Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:15).

NAAMAH (Ná'á mah) Name meaning “pleasant” or “delightful.” 1. Sister of Tubal-cain (Gen. 4:22). 2. Ammonite wife of Solomon and mother of Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:21,31; 2 Chron. 12:13). 3. Village in the Shephelah district of Judah (Josh. 15:41), likely Khirbet Farad about 22 miles west of Jerusalem between Timnah and Eltekeh.

NAAMAN (Ná'á mán) Personal name meaning “pleasantness.” Syrian general cured of leprosy under the direction of the Prophet Elisha (2 Kings 5). Naaman's leprosy apparently was not contagious, nor was it seen as the result of some moral sin. Following his cleansing, he professed faith in Israel's God. See Leprosy.

NAAMATHITE (Ná'á má thit) Title meaning “resident of Na'ameh,” given to Zophar, one of Job's three friends (Job 2:11; 11:1; 20:1; 42:9). Na'ameh is perhaps Djebel-el-Na'ameh in northwest Arabia.

NAAMITES (Ná'á mits) Family of Benjaminites descended from Naaman (Num. 26:40).

NAARAH (Ná'á rāh) Name meaning “girl” or “mill.” 1. Wife of Ashur (1 Chron. 4:5-6). 2. Form of Naarath preferred by modern translations.

NAARAI (Ná'á ri) Personal name meaning “attendant of Yah.” One of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:37). The parallel account gives the name Paarai (2 Sam. 23:35).

NAARAN (Ná'á rān) City allotted to Ephraim, likely identical with Naarah (1 Chron. 7:28; cp. Josh. 16:7).

NAARATH (Ná'á rāth) KJV form of Naarah, a city in the tribal territory of Ephraim just north of Jericho (Josh. 16:7). Suggested sites include 'Ain Duq, Khirbet el 'Nayash about five miles northeast of Jericho, and Tell el-Jishr. The city is perhaps identical to Naaran (1 Chron. 7:28).

NAASHON (Ná' ásh òn) or NAASSON (Ná áss' on) (KJV) See Nahshon.

Part of a large stable from the late Nabatean period at Kurnub (the ancient Nabatean town of Mamphis).

NABAL (Ná' bál) Personal name meaning “fool” or “rude, ill-bred.” See Abigail.

NABATEANS (Ná bá té' áns) Arabic people whose origins are unknown. Although not mentioned in the Bible, they greatly influenced Palestine during intertestamental and NT times. They appear to have infiltrated ancient Edom and Moab from a homeland southeast of Petra. That city later became their capital. From Petra they continued pushing northward as far as Madeba. In 85 B.C. Damascus requested a ruler of the Nabateans. The Arabs responded. Although overrun by Pompey in 63 B.C., they continued to influence Transjordan through a series of governors. Paul narrowly escaped being arrested in Damascus (2 Cor. 11:32). He spent time in Arabia following his conversion, probably preaching the gospel (Gal. 1:17).

NABONIDUS (Nā bō nī' dūs) Personal name meaning “Nabu is awe inspiring.” Last king of the Neo-Babylonian Empire (555-539 B.C.). See Babylon.

NABOPOLASSAR (Nā bō pō lās' sār) Personal name meaning “Nabu, protect the son.” King (626-605 B.C.) who revolted from the Assyrians and established the Neo-Babylonian Empire. He rebelled in 627 B.C. and established his capital in Babylon. His reign was one of continual warfare as he slowly captured the cities of the Assyrian realm. He made an alliance with the Median King Cyaxares in 614, and the two conquered Nineveh in 612 B.C. See Babylon.

NABOTH (Nā' bōth) Personal name, perhaps meaning “sprout.” Owner of a vineyard in the Jezreel Valley adjacent to the country palace of King Ahab, who desired the property for a vegetable garden. Naboth refused to sell on the grounds that the property was a family inheritance (1 Kings 21:3-4). Hebrew law only allowed farmland to be leased for the number of crops until the Jubilee Year (Lev. 25:15-16). Farmland was not to be sold in perpetuity (Lev. 25:23). Jezebel, who had no regard for Israel's laws, plotted Naboth's judicial murder on the charge that he had blasphemed God and the king (1 Kings 21:8-14). Naboth's murder evoked God's judgment on Ahab and his family (1 Kings 21:17-24).

NACHON (Nā' kōn) (KJV) See Nacon.

NACHOR (Nā' kōr) (KJV, Josh. 24:2; Luke 3:34) See Nahor.

NACON (Nā' cōn) Place-name meaning “firm” or “prepared.” Threshing floor between Baaljudah (Kiriath-jearim) and Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:6). The designation is either a place-name or the name of the owner. Chidon is given as the owner's name in the parallel account (1 Chron. 13:9).

NADAB (Nā' dāb) Personal name meaning “willing” or “liberal.” 1. Aaron's eldest son (Exod. 6:23; Num. 3:2; 1 Chron. 6:3), who participated in the ratification of the covenant (Exod. 24:1,9), served as a priest (Exod. 28:1), and was consumed by fire along with his brother Abihu for offering unholy fire before the Lord (Lev. 10:1-7; Num. 26:61). Nadab died childless (Num. 3:4; 1 Chron. 24:2). 2. Descendant of Judah and Tamar (1 Chron. 2:28,30). 3. Descendant of Benjamin and great-uncle of Saul (1 Chron. 8:30; 9:36). 4. Son of Jeroboam (1 Kings 14:20) and idolatrous king of Israel (901-900 B.C.). Baasha assassinated him during a siege of the Philistine city of Gibbethon (1 Kings 15:25-28). The extermination of the family of Jeroboam (15:29) was seen as fulfillment of the Ahijah's prophecy (14:10-11).

NAG HAMMADI (Nág Hám ma' dé) Modern Egyptian village 300 miles south of Cairo and about 60 miles north of Luxor or ancient Thebes. Because of the close proximity of Nag Hammadi to the site of an important discovery of ancient documents relating to Gnosticism, the collection of documents is usually referred to as the Nag Hammadi Documents or Library. Another name occasionally associated with the documents is Chenoboskion, the name of an ancient Christian community that is also near the discovery site. Although the documents were found in an abandoned cemetery near Chenoboskion, they probably had no ancient association with that community.

Unlike the Dead Sea Scroll materials, which consisted primarily of scrolls, the documents found near Nag Hammadi are codices, books containing leaves. Each codex was formed of sheets of papyrus bound in leather, and measured from about 9½ inches to 11½ inches. Thirteen separate codices were found containing 51 smaller writings. While the documents are written in the Coptic language, an ancient language of Egypt, they are probably translations of Greek originals. The date of the present documents appears to be about A.D. 350. While there is debate as to the dates of the original texts, some were probably written before A.D. 200.

Discovery of the Nag Hammadi Documents As in the case with many major archaeological discoveries, the find was something quite unexpected. In 1945 an Arab peasant, digging in an ancient cemetery for soft dirt to be used as fertilizer, found instead a large earthenware jar. At first he feared to open the jar due to his superstitious beliefs, but the prospect of valuable treasure inside prompted him to break open the container. He found the 13 leather-bound books or codices. Some of the documents may have been destroyed, but the discovery eventually came to the attention of those involved in antiquity studies.

Contents of the Nag Hammadi Documents Practically all the materials reflect the religious outlook called “Gnosticism,” an emerging worldview that caused considerable difficulty for early Christianity. Until the discovery of the Nag Hammadi Documents, our knowledge of Gnosticism came primarily from early Christian writers who wrote against the movement.

Christian writers such as Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Tertullian not only gave descriptions of the teachings of Gnosticism, but they also quoted from gnostic writings. With the Nag Hammadi discovery, however, a small library of actual gnostic writings became available for study.

The Nag Hammadi Documents represent a rather wide diversity of content. Of special interest are several more clearly defined categories. The materials referred to as “Gospels” are especially important. In this category are such works as The Gospel of Philip, The Gospel of Truth, and perhaps the most important work found at Nag Hammadi, The Gospel of Thomas, which purports to be a collection of sayings of Jesus. Another category of documents concerns the work and circumstances of the apostles. The Apocalypse of Paul relates an account of the heavenly journey of Paul. The Revelation of Peter describes special revelations given to Peter by Jesus before Peter's imprisonment. The Revelation of James tells of the death of James.

An additional category of documents contains a wide variety of mythological speculations covering such topics as creation, redemption, and ultimate destiny. In this category are such works as On the Origin of the World, Secret Book of the Great Invisible Spirit, Revelation of Adam, The Thought of Our Great Power, The Paraphrase of Shem, The Second Logos of the Great Seth, and The Trimorphic Protennoia.

Although the Nag Hammadi Documents represent a diversity of gnostic systems, most of the materials do reflect the gnostic orientation. A possible exception is the work called The Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles, which is an apocryphal work about the 12 apostles.

Significance of the Nag Hammadi Documents (1) They provide primary source material enabling a greater understanding of Gnosticism. (2) They prove the existence of gnostic systems independent of the Christian framework. Some were primarily Jewish, and others existed as movements independent of either a Jewish or a Christian orientation. (3) They enhance the study of the NT, especially of the books that may have been written as reactions to Gnosticism, such as Colossians, John, and possibly 1 Corinthians. (4) They reflect the diversity of Gnosticism and point to the diversity of early Christianity and the resultant struggle for orthodoxy. (5) They reinforce an appreciation for the seriousness of the gnostic threat to early Christianity. Firsthand evidence now exists of the divergent gnostic views of creation, Christ, redemption, the doctrine of humanity, and the significance of the institutional church.

In conclusion, although not as well-known as the Dead Sea Scrolls, the discovery at Nag Hammadi represents an important milestone in the understanding of the struggles and developments of the early Christian church. See Apocrypha, New Testament; Gnosticism.

NAGGAI (Näg' ı) or NAGGE (Näg' gē) (KJV) Personal name, perhaps meaning “splendor of the sun.” Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:25).

NAHALAL (Ná hál' ál) Place-name meaning “pasture” with alternate forms: Nahallal (Josh. 19:15 KJV); Nahalol (Judg. 1:30). Town Zebulun's territory allotted to the Levites (Josh. 19:15; 21:35). The Israelites did not drive out the Canaanite inhabitants of the city (Judg. 1:30). The site is uncertain. Tell en-Nahl north of the Kishon River at the southern end of the plain of Acco is possible as are modern Nahalal about six miles west of Nazareth and Tell el-Beida.

NAHALIEL (Ná há' lí ʔl) Place-name meaning “palm grove of God,” “torrent valley of God,” or less likely, “God is my inheritance.” One of Israel's stopping places in Transjordan (Num. 21:19). The streambed is perhaps the Wadi Zerqa Ma'in or the Wadi Wala, a north tributary of the Arnon.

NAHALLAL (Ná hál' lál) or NAHALOL (Ná' há lól) (KJV) See Nahalal

NAHAM (Ná' hām) Personal name meaning “consolation.” Either the brother (KJV, REB) or brother-in-law (NASB, NIV, NRSV) of Hodiah (1 Chron.4:19).

NAHAMANI (Nā há má' nī) Personal name meaning “comfort.” Exile who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:7). The name does not appear in the parallel list (Ezra 2:2).

NAHARAI (Nā' há ri) or NAHARI (KJV) Personal name meaning “intelligent” or “snorting.” One of David's 30 elite warriors who served as armor bearer to Joab (2 Sam. 23:37; 1 Chron. 11:39). The KJV used the alternate form Nahari in 2 Samuel.

NAHASH (Nā' hāsh) Personal name meaning “serpent” or perhaps “magnificence.” 1. Ammonite ruler whose assault of JabeshGilead set the stage for Saul's consolidation of power as king (1 Sam. 11:1-11). Saul's opponent was likely the Nahash who befriended David (2 Sam. 10:1-2). His son Hanun provoked David's anger (2 Sam. 10:3-5). Another son, Shobi, served as David's ally (2 Sam. 17:27). 2. Parent of Abigail (2 Sam. 17:25). Various harmonizations of 2 Sam. 17:25 and 1 Chron. 2:16 have been offered: Nahash was a woman; Nahash is an alternate name for Jesse; the Amorite ruler Nahash and Jesse were at different times the husband of the same woman.

NAHATH (Nā' hāth) Personal name meaning “descent,” “rest,” “quietness,” or even “pure, clear.” 1. Edomite clan chief (Gen. 36:13,17; 1 Chron. 1:37). 2. Levite (1 Chron. 6:26), possibly identical with Toah (1 Chron. 6:34) and Tohu (1 Sam. 1:1). 3. Overseer in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron. 31:13).

NAHBI (Nāh' bi) Personal name meaning “hidden” or “timid.” Naphtali's representative among the 12 spies sent to survey Canaan (Num. 13:14).

NAHOR (Nā' hōr) Personal name meaning “snore, snort.” 1. Son of Serug, father of Terah, and grandfather of Abraham (Gen. 11:22-26). 2. Son of Terah and brother of Abraham (Gen. 11:26). He married Milcah, his niece, who bore eight sons for him (11:29; 22:20-23). Nahor's genealogy shows the link between the Hebrews and other Semitic peoples of the ancient Near East. Of special interest is his relationship to the Arameans who dwelled in the region of modern Syria, probably descendants of his children born to Reumah (22:24), his concubine. 3. City in Mesopotamia where Abraham's servant sought and found a wife for Isaac (Gen. 24:10); this was in keeping with the ancient custom of marrying within one's family. The city probably was located southeast of Haran. It is mentioned in the Mari Texts.

NAHSHON (Nāh' shōn) Personal name meaning "serpent." Leader of the tribe of Judah during the wilderness years (Num. 1:7; 2:3; 7:12,17; 10:14), brother-in-law of Aaron (Exod. 6:23), and an ancestor of King David (Ruth 4:20-22) and of Jesus (Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:32).

NAHUM, BOOK OF (Nā' hūm) Personal name "Nahum" means "comfort, encourage." He was a Hebrew prophet and the OT book that bears his name contains some of his messages. Very little biographical information is known about the Prophet Nahum. He is called an Elkoshite (1:1), but the location of Elkosh is unknown.

The date of the prophet's ministry can be placed between 600 and 700 B.C. by two events mentioned in his book. Nahum 3:8 refers to the destruction of the Egyptian capital, No-amon or Thebes, in 663 B.C. and indicates that the prophet was active after this time. In chapter 2 he looked forward to the destruction of Nineveh which took place in 612 B.C. Nahum, therefore, prophesied after 650 B.C, probably close to the time of the fall of Nineveh.

Historical Background Since about 730 B.C. Israel and Judah had been Assyrian vassals. Almost a century later the Assyrian Empire began its decline. Many vassal nations revolted along with Josiah of Judah (2 Kings 22-23). A coalition of Medes, Babylonians, and Scythians attacked Assyrians and in 612 B.C. destroyed the capital, Nineveh. The Assyrians formed a coalition with the Egyptians, but in 605 B.C. they were defeated. See Assyria.

The Prophet's Message The Assyrian oppression caused the people to ask how God could allow such inhumanity to go unanswered. Nahum responded to Assyrian tyranny with a message marked by its vivid language. Assyria's might had been heavy upon Judah, but Nahum announced that God would destroy them.

The book opens with an affirmation of God as an avenging God. The fierceness of His wrath is pictured in terms of the destruction of nature. For over a century the Assyrians seemed to have had an uncontrolled reign, but now God was responding. His judgment is likened to an approaching storm. Perhaps the people of Judah doubted God's justness since Assyria seemed to have no restraints. Nahum, however, sought to dispel this notion.

The second chapter graphically portrays the future fall of Assyria's capital, Nineveh. Such an event must have been hard for the people to imagine. Nineveh was a massive city with a defensive wall that measured eight miles in circumference and ranged in height from 25 to 60 feet. A moat also surrounded it. Yet Nahum poetically affirmed the city's fall. The enemy would rush upon the city with their chariots (2:4), but the defenders would be unable to keep them out (2:5). The great city would be plundered (2:7-10).

The book of Nahum closes with more threats against Nineveh. Ironically, as Assyria had destroyed Thebes in 663 B.C, SO the same fate would befall Nineveh (3:8-11). Preparations for a siege on the city are alluded to in 3:14. Water would be stored and fortifications strengthened by the addition of more mud bricks. Yet these preparations would not keep away God's devastating judgment.

While the book of Nahum is harsh and deals with the unpleasantness of war, it served to give hope to the people of Judah. They had been subjected to the cruel domination of Assyria for over a century, but now their faith in God to act on their behalf could be bolstered through God's response. God's justness was reaffirmed.

Nails from Roman times.

NAIL 1. Keratinous covering of the top ends of fingers and toes. If an Israelite desired to marry a prisoner of war, she was to cut her nails either as a sign of mourning for her parents or as part of her purification on entering the community of Israel (Deut. 21:12). 2. Metal fasteners used in construction and for decoration (1 Chron. 22:3; 2 Chron. 3:9; Isa. 41:7; Jer. 10:4). The earliest nails were made of bronze. With the introduction of iron, larger nails were made of iron. Smaller nails continued to be made of bronze. Nails were sometimes plaited with precious metal and nail heads decorated with gold foil when used for ornament (cp. 2 Chron. 3:9). The nails used in the crucifixion of Jesus were likely iron spikes five to seven inches long (John 20:25). 3. KJV used nail (pin) as an alternate translation for a Hebrew term modern translations consistently render “peg” (Exod. 35:18; Judg. 4:21-22; Zech. 10:4).

NAIN (Nān) Place-name meaning “pleasant.” Village in southwest Galilee where Jesus raised a widow's son (Luke 7:11-15). The ancient town sat on a hillside overlooking the Plain of Esdraelon.

NAIOTH (Nā' ōth) Place-name meaning “dwelling.” The name refers either to a building or district in the city of Ramah that housed the prophetic school that Samuel led (1 Sam. 19:18-24). David sought refuge from Saul at Naioth. Three groups of royal messengers and finally Saul himself fell victim to prophetic frenzy when they attempted to capture David there.

NAKED Being without clothes (Gen. 2:25; Job 1:21; Eccles. 5:15; Amos 2:16; Mic. 1:8) or else poorly clothed (Deut. 28:48; Matt. 25:36-44; James 2:15). The phrase “to uncover the nakedness of” means to have sexual intercourse (Lev. 18:6-19; 20:11,17-21). Nakedness frequently occurs in conjunction with shame (Gen. 3:7; 9:21-27; Isa. 47:3; Ezek. 16:8,36-37).

NAMES OF GOD The name of God holds an important key to understanding the doctrine of God and the doctrine of revelation. The name of God is a personal disclosure and reveals His relationship with His people. His name is known only because He chooses to make it known. To the Hebrew mind, God was both hidden and revealed, transcendent and immanent. Even though He was mysterious, lofty, and unapproachable, He bridged the gap with mankind by revealing His name. See Naming.

The truth of God's character is focused in His name. The divine name reveals God's power, authority, and holiness. This accounts for Israel's great reverence for God's name. The Ten Commandments prohibited the violation of God's name (Exod. 20:7; Deut. 5:11). Prophets spoke with authority when they uttered God's name. Oaths taken in God's name were considered binding, and battles fought in the name of God were victorious. Other nations would fear Israel not because it was a mighty nation but because it rallied under the Lord's name. In the NT God's name is manifested most clearly in Jesus Christ. He is called "the Word" (John 1:1), and Jesus Himself makes the claim that He has revealed the name of God (John 17:6). God's name is His promise to dwell with His people. God of the Fathers Before Moses' encounter with God in the Midianite desert, God was known generally as the God of the Fathers. Various names were used for God under this conception, most of which were associated with the primitive Semitic word El.

El is a generic term for God or deity. It appears in ancient languages other than Hebrew. One can see the similarities to the modern Arabic word for God, Al or Allah. The word El refers to an awesome power that instills within mankind a mysterious dread or reverence.

Even though El was a term for God in pagan or polytheistic religions, it is not a designation for an impersonal force like one would find in animism. Pagans worshiped El as a high and lofty God. He was the chief God in the Canaanite pantheon. See Canaan.

The word El in the Bible is often a reference to deity as opposed to the particular historical revelation associated with the name "Yahweh" (see below). More often than not, however, it is used interchangeably as a synonym for Yahweh, the God of Israel, and translated God.

One of the most interesting uses of El is its alliance with other terms to reveal the character of God. Some of these combinations are:

El-Shaddai "God of the Mountains" or "The Almighty God." This term is more closely associated with the patriarchal period and can be found most frequently in the books of Genesis and Job. Exodus 6:3 underlines El-Shaddai as the name revealed to the patriarchs. God used it to make His covenant with Abraham (Gen. 17:1-2).

El-Elyon “The Most High God” or “The Exalted One” (Num. 24:16; 2 Sam. 22:14; Ps. 18:13). Melchizedek was a priest of El-Elyon and blessed Abraham in this name (Gen. 14:19-20), referring to El-Elyon as “Maker of heaven and earth.” Canaanites at Ugarit also worshiped god as El-Elyon. El-Elyon seems to have had close ties to Jerusalem.

El-Olam “God of Eternity” or “God the Everlasting One” (Gen. 21:33; Isa. 26:4; Ps. 90:2). God's sovereignty extends through the passing of time and beyond our ability to see or understand.

El-Berith “God of the Covenant” (Judg. 9:46) transforms the Canaanite Baal Berith (8:33) to show God alone makes and keeps covenant.

El-Roi “God who sees me” or “God of vision” (Gen. 16:13). God sees needs of His people and responds.

Elohim Plural form for deity. It is a frequently used term and the most comprehensive of the “El” combinations. The plurality of this word is not a hint of polytheism. It is a plural of majesty. It is a revelation of the infinite nature of God. In the creation narrative we read: “Then Elohim said, “Let us make man in our image” (Gen. 1:26). This name suggests that there is a mystery to the Creator God which mankind cannot fully fathom. God is absolute, infinite Lord over creation and history. The Christian sees in this term a pointer to the Trinitarian reality of creation.

Other Uses The name El is frequently combined with other nouns or adjectives. Some examples are: Isra-el (One who is ruled by God), Beth-el (House of God), Peni-el (Face of God). In the crucifixion narrative (Mark 15:34) Jesus employed a form of El when he cried from the cross, “Eloi, Eloi,” “My God, My God,” quoting Ps. 22.

Covenant Name The covenant name for God was “Yahweh.” Israel's faith was a new response to God based on His disclosure. This name was so unique and powerful that God formed a covenant with His people based upon His self-revelation. Yahweh titles appear in English translations as Jehovah. See YHWH.

Yahweh-Jireh “The LORD will provide” (Gen. 22:14). This was the name given to the location where God provided a ram for Abraham to sacrifice in the place of Isaac. This name is a testimony to God's deliverance.

Yahweh-Nissi “The LORD is my banner” (Exod. 17:15). Moses ascribed this name to God after a victory over the Amalekites. The name of God was considered a banner under which Israel could rally for victory. The Lord's name was the battle cry.

Yahweh-Mekaddesh “The LORD sanctifies” (Exod. 31:13). Holiness is the central revelation of God's character. God calls for a people who are set apart.

Yahweh-Shalom “The LORD is peace” (Judg. 6:24). This was the name of the altar that Gideon built at Ophrah signifying that God brings well-being not death to His people.

Yahweh-Sabaoth “The LORD of hosts” (1 Sam. 1:3; Jer. 11:20; cp. 1 Sam. 17:45). This can also be rendered “the LORD Almighty.” It represents God's power over the nations and was closely tied to Shiloh, to the ark of the covenant, and to prophesy. The title designates God as King and Ruler of Israel, its armies, its temple, and of the entire universe.

Yahweh-Rohi “The LORD is my shepherd” (Ps. 23:1). God is the One who provides loving care for His people.

Yahweh-Tsidkenu “The LORD is our righteousness” (Jer. 23:5-6; 33:16). This was the name Jeremiah gave to God, the Righteous King, who would rule over Israel after the return from captivity. He would establish a new kingdom of justice.

Yahweh-Shammah “The LORD is there” (Ezek. 48:35). This is the name of God associated with the restoration of Jerusalem, God's dwelling place.

Other Names Baal This was the chief god of the Canaanite pantheon. In some ancient religions, Baal and El could be used interchangeably. There were tendencies within Israel to identify Baal with Yahweh, but Baal worship was incompatible with Hebrew monotheism. Prophets, such as Elijah and Hosea, called the people away from these tendencies and back to the covenant.

Adon* or *Adonai This is a title of authority and honor. It can be translated “Lord.” It is not exclusively a title for deity because it is used in addressing a superior, such as a king or master. In this sense it is used to ascribe the highest honor and worship to God. Adon or Adonai was often used in conjunction with Yahweh. In time Adonai became a substitute for Yahweh. In the postexilic period it took on the connotation of God's absolute lordship.

Symbolic Titles A prominent characteristic of Scripture is its use of figurative language. Many of the names for God are symbolic, illustrative, or figurative.

Ancient of Days (Dan. 7:9,13,22) The picture presented is of an old man who lived for many years. This, of course, is not a literal description of God but a confession that He lives forever and His kingdom is everlasting. His rule encompasses the expanses of time. Unlike the portrait presented in other religions where the gods are bound within time, Yahweh is active in time and history. He gives history meaning and is drawing it to a conclusion. He is from “everlasting to everlasting” (Ps. 90:2).

Rock (Deut. 32:18; Ps. 19:14; Isa. 26:4) God is strong and permanent. Yahweh is sometimes identified as “The Rock of Israel.”

Refuge (Ps. 9:9; Jer. 17:17) God is a haven from the enemy.

Fortress (Ps. 18:2; Nah. 1:7) God is a defense (stronghold) against the foe.

Shield (Gen. 15:1; Ps. 84:11) God is protection.

Sun (Ps. 84:11) God is the source of light and life.

Refiner (Mal. 3:2-3) God is purifier. Political Names Many descriptions of God came from political life.

King In the ancient East it was common to address gods as king. Kingship was also ascribed to Yahweh. His covenant people were to obey Him as a Sovereign. This title is the key to understanding the kingdom of God, which is the most frequent title used in Scripture to describe God's rule.

Judge The judge was the political ruler during the time of tribal confederacy. Yahweh is the Judge who arbitrates disputes, sets things right, and intervenes for Israel in its military campaigns.

Shepherd God is frequently described as a Shepherd. This was a nurturing term to describe the care given to His covenantal people. It also had political or ruling connotations. Yahweh is the Shepherd King (Ezek. 34). In the NT the image of God as shepherd is continued in parables (Luke 15:4-7) and in John's portrayal of Christ as the Good Shepherd (John 10:1-18). God the Father In the OT the word "father" is used for God to describe the close kinship that He enjoys with His worshipers. There are many figurative references to God's fatherhood. "As a father has compassion on his children, so the LORD has compassion on those who fear Him" (Ps. 103:13 HCSB). God is a "father to Israel" (Jer. 31:9) and speaks of Israel as His "son" (Exod. 4:22; Hos. 11:1).

Father is the distinguishing title for God in the NT. Jesus taught His disciples to use the Aramaic Abba, a term of affection that approximates our word "Daddy," to address the heavenly Father. See Abba.

Father takes on a richer meaning when it is joined with other designations:

Our Father (Jesus taught His disciples to address God in this manner when they prayed; Matt. 6:9);

Father of mercies (2 Cor. 1:3);

Father of lights (James 1:17);

Father of glory (Eph. 1:17).

When the Father title is juxtaposed with the word “Son,” the significance of God's name in relation to Jesus Christ is understood. Christ's claim to have come in His Father's name reveals that He was God's unique representative (John 5:43). He shares the Father's essential authority and works done in His Father's name bear witness to this special relationship (John 10:25). Christ has provided a full revelation of God because He has clearly declared His name (John 12:28; 17:6). See Jehovah.

NAMING In biblical tradition the task of naming a child generally fell to the mother (Gen. 29:31-30:24; 1 Sam. 1:20) but could be performed by the father (Gen. 16:15; Exod. 2:22) and in exceptional cases by nonparental figures (Exod. 2:10; Ruth 4:17). The last son of Jacob and Rachel received a name from each parent, Jacob altering the name Rachel gave (Gen. 35:18). Naming could be attributed to God originating through a divine birth announcement (Gen. 17:19; Luke 1:13). Naming took place near birth in the OT and on the eighth day accompanying circumcision in NT narratives (Luke 1:59; 2:21).

The biblical concept of naming was rooted in the ancient world's understanding that a name expressed essence. To know the name of a person was to know that person's total character and nature. Revealing character and destiny, personal names might express hopes for the child's future. Changing of name could occur at divine or human initiative, revealing a transformation in character or destiny (Gen. 17:5,15; 32:28; Matt. 16:17-18).

The knowing of a name implied a relationship between parties in which power to do harm or good was in force. That God knew Moses by name occasioned the granting of Moses' request for divine presence (Exod. 33:12,17). The act of naming implied the power of the namer over the named, evidenced in the naming of the animals in Gen. 2:19-20 or Pharaoh's renaming Joseph (Gen. 41:45; cp. Dan. 1:6-7; 2 Kings 24:17).

Proper names consisting of one or more terms consciously chosen by the namer conveyed a readily understandable meaning within the biblical world. Reflecting circumstances of birth Rachel, called the child of her death, Benoni, "son of my sorrow" (Gen. 35:18). Jacob was named "the supplanter" for he was "holding on to Esau's heel" (Gen. 25:26). Moses, the "stranger in a strange land," named his son Gershom (Exod. 2:22). Conditions of the times proved imaginative as well: Ichabod, "The glory has departed from Israel," came about by the ark of the covenant falling into Philistine hands (1 Sam. 4:21-22) and the symbolic names of Isaiah's sons: Shear-jashub, "a remnant shall return," (Isa. 7:3); Maher-shalal-hash-baz, "swift is the booty, speedy is the prey," (Isa. 8:3, NASB).

Personal characteristics: Esau means "hairy"; Careah means "bald" (Gen. 25:25; 2 Kings 25:23); and the use of animal names in early times; Deborah means "bee"; Jonah means "dove"; Rachel means "ewe." Less frequently occurring are names taken from plants: Tamar means "palm tree"; Susanna meaning "lily."

Simple names functioning as epithets, such as Nabal meaning "fool" and Sarah meaning "princess," gave way to compound names factual or wishful in nature, such as Mattaniah meaning "gift of Yahweh" and Ezekiel meaning "may God strengthen." Compound names in the main employ the divine names El and Yah (Elijah, Ishmael, Nathaniel). Titles and kinship terms (Abimelech, melech means "king"; Abigail, Ab(i) means "father") and foreign names occur: Aramaic, Greek, and Roman (Martha, Salome, Alexandra, John Mark).

The patronymic practice whereby a child received the name of a relative, especially the grandfather (Simon Bar-Jona is “son of Jona”) was common by the Christian era. Geographical identities are attested as well (Goliath of Gath and Jesus of Nazareth). See Family; Names of God.

NAOMI (Nā ó' mī) Personal name meaning “my pleasantness.” Wife of Elimelech and mother-in-law to Orpah and Ruth (Ruth 1:2,4). Naomi suffered the deaths of her husband and two sons while in Moab. Her matchmaking between Ruth and Boaz was successful, and she became a forebearer of David, Israel's greatest king (Ruth 4:21-22). See Ruth, Book of.

NAPHATH-DOR (Nā phāth-Dōr') Designation of the region surrounding the coastal city of Dor about 15 miles west of Megiddo (Josh. 12:23; 1 Kings 4:11). The alternate form Naphoth-Dor is used at Joshua 11:2 (RSV). KJV translated the term Naphath variously (borders, coasts, regions). NASB rendered the term “height(s),” relegating the Hebrew to the margin; REB, “districts.”

NAPHISH (Nā' phīsh) Personal name meaning “refreshed.” A son of Ishmael and ancestor of a northwest Arabian tribe of the same name (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:31). The tribe dwelt in Transjordan before being displaced by Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 5:19).

NAPHOTH-DOR (Nā phōth-Dōr') RSV alternate form of Naphath-Dor (Josh. 11:2). The NIV consistently used the form Naphoth Dor (Josh. 11:2; 12:23; 1 Kings 4:11).

NAPHTALI (Nāph' tā li) Personal name meaning “wrestler.” Sixth son of Jacob and second son by his concubine Bilhah (Gen. 30:6-8). In blessing him Jacob likened Naphtali to a hind let loose (49:21), probably a reference to unbridled energy. The tribe which bears his name inhabited a territory north of the Sea of Galilee that extended along the northwest side of Jordan beyond Lake Huleh (Josh. 19:32-39).

Naphtali is praised in the Song of Deborah for placing itself in jeopardy on behalf of Israel (Judg. 5:18). The tribe joined with Asher and Manasseh to help drive the Midianites out of the land (7:23). During Solomon's reign the territory was designated a separate economic district (1 Kings 4:7, 15) and produced Hiram, the king's chief brass worker (7:13-14). The Syrians invaded Naphtali during Baasha's reign and inflicted heavy losses (15:20). The territory finally succumbed to Tiglath-pileser III in 734 B.C. (2 Kings 15:29). See Tribes of Israel.

NAPHTUHIM (Nāph' tu hīm) Residents of Naphtuh, an unidentified geographic area (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron. 1:11; Naphtuhites, NIV and REB). The Naphtuhim were most likely residents of the Nile Delta or else inhabitants of the oases to the west of the Nile Valley. The term may come from Egyptian for Ptah, pointing to Middle Egypt.

NAPKIN See Handkerchief.

NARCISSUS (Nār sīs' sūs) Common name among both slaves and freedmen meaning “daffodil.” The Narcissus of Rom. 16:11 headed a household, perhaps including slaves and/or associated freedmen, which included some Christians. The most famous Narcissus was a freedman who served as an advisor to Emperor Claudius (A.D. 41-54). He committed suicide shortly after Nero's accession of the throne. It is possible, though not certain, that Paul had this Narcissus in mind.

NARD Expensive fragrance derived from the roots of the herb Nardostachys jatamansi. The term appears twice in the Song of Songs (1:12 ESV; 4:13-14) and in two of the Gospel accounts of the woman anointing Jesus at Simon's house in Bethany (Mark 14:3; John 12:3; “spikenard,” KJV). The disciples rebuked her for this action, stating that the ointment could have been sold for a sizable sum and the proceeds donated to the poor.

NATHAN (Nā' thán) Personal name meaning “gift.” 1. Prophet in royal court during reign of David and early years of Solomon. David consulted Nathan about building a temple. Nathan responded favorably. That night the Lord spoke to Nathan with instructions for David that his successor would build the temple. Nathan included the words of the Lord that David would have a house, a great name, and a kingdom forever. David responded with gratitude to the Lord (2 Sam. 7; 1 Chron. 17).

David committed adultery with Bathsheba and had her husband, Uriah, slain in battle. The Lord was displeased and sent Nathan to rebuke the king. The prophet told a story in which a rich man took the only little ewe lamb that belonged to a poor man and prepared a meal for one of his guests. David said the rich man should die. Nathan responded, "You are the man!" David repented, but his first child born to Bathsheba died (2 Sam. 11-12).

Adonijah tried unsuccessfully to become king in the closing days of David's life. Nathan, along with Zadok, the priest, Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, Shimei, Rei, and David's mighty men, opposed Adonijah. Bathsheba and Nathan spoke to David about an earlier decision to appoint Solomon as the next king. David declared Solomon to be king (1 Kings 1:5-53).

Later references indicate that Nathan wrote the chronicles for David (1 Chron. 29:29) and a history of Solomon (2 Chron. 9:29). Nathan advised David in arranging the musical instruments played by the Levites (2 Chron. 29:25). 2. Son of David, born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:14; 1 Chron. 14:4). His mother was Bathsheba (Bath-shua) (1 Chron. 3:5). He is in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Luke 3:31). 3. Nathan of Zobah, father of Igal, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:36). He may be the same as Nathan the brother of Joel (1 Chron. 11:38), within another list of David's mighty men. 4. The two Nathans mentioned as fathers of Azariah and Zabud may be the same man and identified as the Prophet Nathan (1 Kings 4:5) during Solomon's reign. If Zubad (1 Chron. 2:36) is the same as Zabud, his father Nathan may be the prophet; thus, the prophet's father was Attai, a descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:25). 5. Returning exile whom Ezra sent on a mission to secure ministers for God's house (Ezra 8:15-17). He may be the same exile who had married a foreign wife and put her away (Ezra 10:39).

NATHANAEL (Ná thán' á ěl) Personal name meaning “giver of God.” An Israelite whom Jesus complimented as being guileless (John 1:47) and who, in turn, confessed the Lord as being the Son of God and King of Israel (v. 49).

Nathanael was from Cana of Galilee (John 21:2) and apparently became one of the inner core of disciples who followed Jesus. Although Matthew, Mark, and Luke do not mention him by name, his two appearances in John point to his devotion to Christ. Some have equated him with Bartholomew.

Philip announced to Nathanael that Jesus was the promised Messiah (John 1:45). It was then that Nathanael made the infamous remark, “Can anything good come out of Nazareth?” (v. 46). See Disciple.

NATHAN-MELECH (Ná thán-mě' lěk) Personal name meaning “the king has given” or perhaps “Melech [the god Molech] has given.” Nathan-Melech served as an official of King Josiah (2 Kings 23:11). See Eunuch.

NATIONS See Gentiles.

NATIVES Term used by several modern translations (NASB, REB, NRSV) to designate the inhabitants of Malta (Acts 28:2). Barbarous people (KJV) reflects the Greek barbaroi which designates the islanders as non-Greek speaking. NIV reads “islanders,” HCSB “local people.”

NATIVITY OF CHRIST See Jesus Christ; Jesus, Life and Ministry.

NATURAL According to nature. 1. Natural use (Rom. 1:26-27 KJV; natural relations, RSV) refers to heterosexual relations, thus “natural intercourse,” (NRSV, REB). 2. Natural affection refers specifically to affection for family members. Those lacking natural affection (astorgoi) are unloving to their families or generally inhuman or unsociable (Rom. 1:31; 2 Tim. 3:3). 3. Natural branches refer to original or native branches as opposed to engrafted ones (Rom. 11:21,24). 4. Natural or unspiritual person (1 Cor. 2:14) is one not open to receiving gifts from God's Spirit or to discerning spiritual matters (contrast 2:15). This contrast between the spiritual and natural is also evidenced by James 3:15 (NASB) and Jude 19 (NIV). 5. The natural face (James 1:23) is literally the face of one's birth. To see one's natural face is to see oneself as one actually is.

NATURAL REVELATION See Revelation.

NAUM (Ná' ūm) KJV form of Nahum, an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:25).

NAVE 1. Term used by some modern translations (NASB, NRSV) for the main room of the temple between the vestibule and the holy of holies (1 Kings 6:3,5, 17; 7:50; 2 Chron. 3:4-5,13; 4:22). KJV referred to this room as the temple or house. See Temple of Jerusalem. 2. KJV used “nave” for the center of a wheel through which an axle passes (1 Kings 7:33). Modern translations render the underlying Hebrew as “rim.”

NAVEL 1. Depression in the middle of the belly marking the place where the umbilical cord was formerly attached. Ezekiel 16:4 graphically portrays Jerusalem's hopeless state before God's adoption in the image of a child whose umbilical cord (navel string) is not cut. Modern translations often replace “navel” with another word more appropriate to the context, for example, “flesh” or “belly” (Job 40:16; Prov. 3:8; Song 7:2). See Midwife. 2. Hebrew expression for “midst of the land” or “center of the earth” (NRSV) in Judg. 9:37; Ezek. 38:12. Israel's neighbors used the term to designate the earthly place, often a worship place or sacred city, linking heaven and earth. Some scholars use later Jewish references to Jerusalem as the cultic “navel of the earth” to interpret Gerazim and Jerusalem as places celebrated as the earth's linking point. However the two biblical passages seem to have only geographical meanings.

NAZARETH, NAZARENE (Náz' á rêth; Náz á rên') Place-name meaning “branch.” Nazareth did not enjoy a place of prominence until its association with Jesus. It does not appear in the OT. As He became known as “Jesus of Nazareth” (Matt. 26:71; Luke 18:37; 24:19; John 1:45; Acts 2:22; 3:6; 10:38), His hometown became fixed in Christian memory. Nazareth was located in lower Galilee about halfway between the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean Sea. It lay in the hill country north of the Plain of Esdraelon. The hills formed a natural basin with three sides but open toward the south. The city was on the slopes of the basin, facing east and southeast. Cana was about five miles to the northeast. A Roman road from Capernaum westward to the coast passed near Nazareth.

It was a small village in Jesus' day, having only one spring to supply fresh water to its inhabitants. Today the spring is referred to as "Mary's well." The modern city has about 20,000 citizens, mainly Moslems and Christians. The angel went to Nazareth to announce to Mary and Joseph the coming birth of Jesus (Luke 1:26-28). Following Jesus' birth in Bethlehem and the sojourn in Egypt, Joseph and Mary returned with Jesus to Nazareth (Matt. 2:19-23) where Jesus grew from boyhood to manhood (Luke 2:39-40; 4:16), being stamped as a Nazarene (Matt. 2:23), apparently a midrashic play on the Hebrew term netser; "shoot" in Isa. 11:1.

Nazareth did not possess a good reputation, as reflected in the question of Nathanael, himself a Galilean (John 1:46). The early church received similar scorn as the Nazarene sect (Acts 24:5). Such lack of respect was likely due to an unpolished dialect, a lack of culture, and quite possibly a measure of irreligion and moral laxity. Jesus was rejected by His townspeople near the beginning of His public ministry, being cast out of the synagogue at Nazareth (Luke 4:16-30; Matt. 13:54-58; Mark 6:1-6). See Galilee.

NAZIRITE (Nāz' ī rīt) Member of a class of individuals especially devoted to God. The Hebrew term means consecration, devotion, and separation. Two traditional forms of the Nazirite are found. One was based on a vow by the individual for a specific period; the other was a lifelong devotion following the revelatory experience of a parent that announced the impending birth of a child.

The Nazirite's outward signs—the growth of hair, abstention from wine and other alcoholic products, the avoidance of contact with the dead—are illustrative of devotion to God. Violation of these signs resulted in defilement and the need for purification so the vow could be completed. Numbers 6:1-21 regulated the practice and lined the phenomenon to cultic law and locality. Verses 1-8 show how the Nazirite's period was begun. In case of defilement, a method of purification was given (vv. 9-12). The status was terminated (vv. 13-21) by the burning of shaven hair and the giving of various offerings. Parallels exist between the cultic purity of the high priest and the Nazirite.

The Catholic Church of the Annunciation built over the caves where tradition says Mary and Joseph lived.

An overview of modern Nazareth from the southwest.

The lifelong Nazirite in biblical tradition included Samson (Judg. 13), Samuel (1 Sam. 1), and John the Baptist (Luke 1:15-17). In the NT Paul took the Nazirite vow for a specific period of time (Acts 18:18; 21:22-26). Amos 2:12 shows an ethical concern for protecting the status of the Nazirite. See Abstinence.

NEAH (Nē' ah) Place-name meaning “settlement.” Border town in the tribal territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13). The site was perhaps that of modern Nimrin west of Kurn Hattin.

NEAPOLIS (Nē āp' o līs) Name meaning “new city,” of the seaport of Philippi (Acts 16:11). Neapolis (modern Kavala) is located about 10 miles from Philippi in northeastern Macedonia. The city sits on a neck of land between two bays, each of which serve as harbors.

NEARIAH (Nē ā ri' ah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “Yah's young man.”
1. Descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:22-23). 2. Commander of Hezekiah's forces who defeated the Amalekites (1 Chron. 4:42-43).

NEBAI (Nē' bī) Personal name meaning “projecting” or “fruitful.” One of the witnesses to Ezra's renewal of the covenant (Neh. 10:19).

NEBAIOTH (Nə bi' ōth) or NEBAJOTH (Nə bā' jōth) (KJV) Personal name meaning "fruitfulness." Son of Ishmael and ancestor of an Arab tribe of the same name (Gen. 25:13; 28:9; 36:3). KJV used the alternate form Nebajoth in 1 Chron. 1:29; Isa. 60:7.

NEBALLAT (Nə bāl' lāt) Place-name, perhaps meaning "blessed with life." The name perhaps derives from Nabu-uballit, the personal name of an Assyrian governor of Samaria. Neballat was resettled by Benjaminites after the exile (Neh. 11:34). The site is identical with modern Beit Nebala on the edge of the Plain of Sharon about four miles east of Lod.

NEBAT (Nə' bāt) Personal name meaning "God has regarded." Father of Jeroboam I (1 Kings 11:26; 12:2,15). Nebat was from Zeredah about 10 miles west of Shiloh.

The harbor, town, and acropolis of Neapolis (modern Kavalaj).

NEBO (Nə' bō) Place and divine name meaning "height." 1. Babylonian god of speech, writing, and water. Worship of Nebo was popular during the Neo-Babylonian era (612-539 B.C.). Isaiah mocked parades featuring the idol of Nebo (Isa. 46:1). 2. Moabite city located southwest of Heshbon. The tribes Reuben and Gad requested the area around Nebo for their flocks (Num. 32:2-3). It was held by Israel until recaptured by King Mesha about 850 B.C. 3. Town reinhabited by exiles returning from Babylon (Ezra 2:29). The site has been identified with Nob. 4. Mountain about 12 miles east of the mouth of the Jordan River from which Moses viewed the promised land (Deut. 32:49). It rises over 4,000 feet above the Dead Sea and gives an excellent view of the southwest, west, and as far north as Mount Hermon. Israel captured the area around Mount Nebo as they marched toward Canaan. They camped in the area of Mount Nebo opposite Jericho when the Balaam incident occurred (Num. 22-24). During the period of the judges, it was the possession of Eglon of Moab. David recaptured the area (2 Sam. 8:2), and it remained a part of Israel until Mesha rebelled and took control about 850 B.C.

NEBO-SARSEKIM (Nē bō-Sār' sē kīm) NIV form of the name of a Babylonian official (Jer. 39:13). The NIV and similar REB readings result from dividing the present Hebrew text differently from the majority of English translators. See Sarsechim.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR (Nēb ū kād nēz' zār) Personal name meaning “Nabu protects.” King of Babylon 605-562 B.C. He was the son of Nabopolassar and inherited the throne upon the death of his father. Nebuchadnezzar served as a general under his father and was a brilliant strategist. His victory over the Egyptian forces at Carchemish (605) signaled the completion of Babylon's conquest of Palestine (Jer. 46:1-2). See Babylon.

NEBUSHASBAN, NEBUSHAZBAN (Nē bū shās' bān, Nē bū shāz' bān) Variant transliterations of personal name meaning “Nabu save me.” High official of Nebuchadnezzar involved in the fall of Jerusalem (Jer. 39:13).

NEBUZARADAN (Nēb' ū zār' ā dān) Personal name meaning “Nebo has given offspring.” An officer in the Babylonian army during King Nebuchadnezzar's reign. His title is given as “captain of the guard” (bodyguard, Jer. 39:13), a designation which is uncertain. He led his troops in a siege of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (2 Kings 25:8-9), burned the city's buildings, tore down its walls, and carried away the people into exile. Four years later he returned and deported still more citizens (Jer. 52:30). See Babylon.

NECHO (Nē' kō) KJV form of Neco (2 Chron. 35:20,22; 36:4). KJV used the hyphenated form Pharaoh-necho at Jer. 46:2. See Neco.

NECHOH (Nē' koh) KJV alternate form of Neco. This form always occurs in the hyphenated form Pharaoh-nechoh (2 Kings 23:29,33-35). See Neco.

NECK Portion of the body connecting the head to the torso. To put one's feet on the neck of an enemy is a sign of complete victory (Josh. 10:24). A yoke placed on the neck is a frequent emblem of servitude (Gen. 27:40; Deut. 28:48; Isa. 10:27). To fall upon someone's neck with weeping or kissing is a special sign of tenderness (Gen. 33:4; 45:14; cp. Luke 15:20). To be stiff-necked or to harden one's neck is a common picture of stubborn disobedience (Exod. 32:9; 33:3,5).

NECKLACE Ornament worn around the neck (Song 1:10; Ezek. 16:11). The gift of a gold necklace is sometimes the sign of installation to a high office (Gen. 41:42; Dan. 5:29).

NECO (Nē' cō) Second Pharaoh (609-594 B.C.) of the 26th dynasty of Egypt whose forces killed Josiah in battle (2 Kings 23:29-35; 2 Chron. 35:20-24) and who installed Jehoiakim as king of Judah in his place (2 Kings 23:34-35). The Twenty-sixth Dynasty was established with Assyrian patronage. Neco began to reign three years after the fall of Nineveh, the Assyrian capital. The resulting power vacuum encouraged the ambitious Neco to seize Gaza as a base (Jer. 47:1) for a campaign to bring Syria under his control and to bring aid to the Assyrian remnant in their struggle with the rising force of Babylon. Josiah met Neco in battle as the latter was on route to Carchemish. There Neco was defeated by Nebuchadnezzar in 605 B.C. (Jer. 46:2). Later Nebuchadnezzar would extend his control as far as the Nile (2 Kings 24:7). See Assyria; Egypt; Josiah.

NECROMANCY Conjuring the spirits of the dead to predict or influence future events. See Medium.

NEDABIAH (Nēd a bi' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah is generous.” Son of Jeconiah, the exiled king of Judah (1 Chron. 3:18).

NEEDLE Small slender instrument used in sewing with an eye at one end through which thread is passed. The needles of NT times were similar in size to modern needles with the exception of our smallest needles. Needles were most often made of bronze, though bone and ivory were also used. Jesus' teaching that “it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich person to enter the kingdom of God” (Matt. 19:24 HCSB; cp. Mark 10:25; Luke 18:25) illustrates the impossibility of a rich person's being saved apart from the intervention of God who does the impossible (Matt. 19:26). Some late Greek manuscripts read “rope” (kamilos) for camel (kamelos). This attempt to dull the sharp edge of Jesus' saying runs counter to the context. The use of the term “needle's eye” for a gate of Jerusalem is an interpretive fiction, again designed to make Jesus' word more palatable. No such gate exists.

NEEDLEWORK Decorative work sewn upon cloth. Needlework was used in the decoration of the screens for the tabernacle door (Exod. 26:36; 36:37) and for the gate to its court (Exod. 27:16; 38:18) as well as for Aaron's girdle (Exod. 28:39; 39:29). Needlework was included in the prize spoils of war (Judg. 5:30) and in lists of luxury items for trade (Ezek. 27:16,24). Embroidered garments were the clothing of royalty (Ezek. 16:10,13,18; 26:16). The mention of material of various colors suggests that some needlework may have involved applique.

NEESINGS (nēez' ings) KJV term meaning "sneezings" or "sneezes" (Job 41:18).

NEGEB (Nēg' eb) or NEGEV (Nēg' ēv) (preferred sp.) Place-name meaning "dry" referring to an arid region in southern Palestine and coming to mean "south." During biblical times it was more populated than today indicating either more rainfall then or better conservation of the resources. It was the land of the Amalekites during Abraham's day (Gen. 14:7). There he exiled Hagar (21:14). The Israelites wandered in the Negev after a futile attempt to enter Canaan (Num. 14:44-45). David incorporated it into his kingdom, and Solomon established fortresses in the region. Daniel used the term, translated "south," to refer to Egypt (Dan. 11:15,29). After Judah fell in 586 B.C. Edom took the area into its kingdom. In NT times it was known as Nabatea. See Directions; Nabateans; Palestine.

NEGINAH, NEGINOTH (Nē gē' nah, Nēg' 1 nōth) Neginoth, the plural form of neginah, is used as a technical term in the superscriptions of several psalms (Pss. 4; 6; 54-55; 61; 67; 76) and as the subscription of Hab. 3:19. The term is generally understood to specify the instrumentation needed for performance "with stringed instruments" (cp. Isa. 38:20; Lam. 5:14). Other references suggest that neginah designates a taunt song (Job 30:9; Ps. 69:12; Lam. 3:14).

NEHELAM, NEHELAMITE (Nē hēl' am, Nē hēl' á mit) Either a family name or a reference to the home of the false prophet Shemaiah (Jer. 29:24,31-32). The name is perhaps a play on the Hebrew word for dreamer (cp. Jer. 23:25,32).

NEHEMIAH (Nē hə mī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah comforts or encourages” and name of OT book featuring work of Nehemiah. 1. Leader who was among the first to return with Zerubbabel from exile to Judah in about 538 B.C. (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7). 2. Son of Azbuk, “the ruler of the half part of Bethzur” (Neh. 3:16), one who helped Nehemiah son of Hachaliah with rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem. 3. Nehemiah, the son of Hachaliah, is the main character in the book that bears his name. He was a contemporary of Ezra and Malachi, Socrates in Greece (470-399 B.C.), and only a few decades later than Gautama Buddha in India (560-480 B.C.) and Confucius in China (551-479 B.C.).

Nehemiah held the distinguished position of cupbearer to the king (1:11). This was an office of trust; tasting the king's wine and food, the cupbearer stood between the king and death. That Nehemiah, a Jew and a captive, served this Gentile king in such a strategic capacity was an unusual credit and honor to this man of strong character.

Nehemiah's memoirs include first-person accounts (1:1-7:5; 12:27-47; 13:4-31), and the other material uses the third person pronoun (chaps. 8-10). Thus his story is both autobiographical and biographical. Visitors to Susa informed him of the dilapidation of Jerusalem's walls. He was so upset that he cried and “mourned for days” (1:4); he prayed a confession (1:5-11). His grief became apparent to Artaxerxes who permitted him to go to Jerusalem.

Nehemiah's first act there was to inspect the walls at night (2:15). He then called an assembly and convinced the people of the need for a building program. He was an excellent leader who demonstrated engineering knowledge and brilliant organizing ability (chap. 3) so the work began.

Trouble arose from without and from within. Sanballat and his friends tried to stop the work but without success (chap. 4). Trouble from within was economic. Building the walls caused a labor shortage; farms were mortgaged and high rates of interest were charged. Nehemiah said, “The thing which you are doing is not good” (5:9 NASB). He corrected the problem and even gave financial aid to those in need (chap. 5). Again

Sanballat and other non-Jews made several attempts to lure Nehemiah away from the job and shut it down, but they failed. Nehemiah proved to be a person of strong will and unusual boldness. “So the wall was completed... in fifty and two days” (6:15). The dedication of the wall is described later in 12:27-43.

The theological climax of the book of Nehemiah and of the life of Ezra is the Great Revival (Neh. 8-10). It was a grand experience. It warrants close study for revival attempts today. People assembled and requested Ezra to read from the book of the law of Moses (8:1). The book was probably the Pentateuch (Torah) or some part of it. Ezra read, and others helped by giving “the sense so that they understood the reading” (8:8 NASB). This probably included translating the Hebrew Scripture into Aramaic, the commonly spoken language.

A great celebration occurred, and they observed the Feast of Tabernacles. Results were impressive: “They confessed and worshiped the LORD their God” (9:3 NASB) and “separated themselves from all foreigners” (9:2) that is, they divorced their foreign spouses. They prayed a long prayer of confession (9:6-37). The people responded, “Now because of all this we are making an agreement in writing” (9:38). The signers and terms of the covenant were then recorded (chap. 10).

Nehemiah was dissatisfied with the small size of the population of Jerusalem. He made an ingenious proposal: to “cast lots to bring one out of ten to live in Jerusalem, the holy city, while nine-tenths remained in the other cities” (11:1 NASB). Nehemiah's last chapter cites his reforms made during his second visit to Jerusalem in 432 B.C. He threw out a Gentile who was permitted to live in the temple; he restored the practice of tithing to support the Levites; he corrected Sabbath wrongs by those who bought and sold on the Sabbath; and he dealt forthrightly with those who had married foreigners, those not in covenant relation with God.

Nehemiah was indeed an outstanding person. His theology was very practical; it affected every area of life. Note his prayers and how practical they were (1:4-11; 2:4; 4:4-5,9; 5:19; 6:9,14; 13:14,22,29,31). He boldly asked, “Remember me, O my God, for good, according to all that I have done for this people” (5:19 NASB; cp. 13:14,31). His faith was practical: “And the king granted them to me because the good hand of my God was on me” (2:8; cp. 2:18 for a practical application of this concept). He believed “the God of heaven will give us success” (2:20) and that “our God will fight for us” (4:20). He had respect for the Sabbath, the temple and its institutions, the Levites, and tithing. Nehemiah was a man of action; he got things done. He knew how to use persuasion but also force. One may properly call him the father of Judaism. Because of Nehemiah, Judaism had a fortified city, a purified people, a dedicated and unified nation, renewed economic stability, and a new commitment to God's law.

NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF Nehemiah and Ezra were one book in the ancient Hebrew and Greek OT and probably were not divided until after the interbiblical period. Jewish tradition says Ezra or Nehemiah was the author. Because of the close connection between Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, one person might have written or compiled all three books. Those who follow this argument refer to the author as the Chronicler.

The literary style of Nehemiah is similar to that in Ezra. There are many lists (chaps. 3; 10:1-27; 11; 12:1-26). The author/compiler wove Ezra's and Nehemiah's stories together, Ezra being featured in Neh. 8.

Nehemiah's Jerusalem.

The book has four major sections: the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls (chaps. 1-7), the Great Revival (chaps. 8-10), population and census information (chaps. 11-12), and the reforms of Nehemiah (chap. 13). Nehemiah made two visits from King Artaxerxes to Jerusalem (2:1-6; 13:6-7). His first, 445 B.C., was to repair the walls; they were in a state of disrepair almost a century after the first arrival from exile in 538 B.C. The second was a problem-solving trip in the 32nd year of Artaxerxes (13:6), 432 B.C. See Ezra, Book of; Nehemiah 3.

Outline

- I. God's Work Must Be Done (1:1-7:33).
 - A. God's leaders must be informed of needs in God's work (1:1-3).
 - B. God's leaders must be responsive spiritually to needs in God's work and must pray (1:4-11).
 - C. God's leaders must enlist the aid of others, sometimes outside the family of God (2:1-9).
 - D. God's leaders likely will encounter opposition (2:10).
 - E. God's leaders must exercise caution and discretion along with careful planning (2:11-16).
 - F. God's leaders must inform and challenge God's people to work (2:17-20).
 - G. God's work demands hard work, good organization, plenty of cooperation, and good records to give credit where credit is due (3:1-32).
 - H. God's leaders will pray in the face of ridicule and insult (4:1-9).
 - I. God's leaders may expect opposition from within as well as from without (4:10-12).
 - J. God's leaders must encourage weary workers with practical, prayerful faith (4:13-15).
 - K. God's work gets done by hard work and committed workers (4:16-23).
 - L. God's work is slowed by internal problems of unfairness (5:1-5).
 - M. God's leaders must confront profiteering problem causers (5:6-13).
 - N. God's leaders at times can be sacrificially generous to meet a pressing need (5:14-19).
 - O. God's leaders know opposition can be very personal and must deal with it head-on (6:1-14).
 - P. God's help and the cooperation of many workers bring success (6:15-16).
 - Q. God's work can have traitors within (6:17-19).
 - R. God's leaders will enlist others and give them clear instructions (7:1-5).
 - S. God's leaders need to keep and use good records (7:6-73).
- II. God's Way Must Include Revival and Reformation (8:1-13:31).
 - A. God's people want to hear God's Word (8:1-3).

- B. God's Word must be read and then interpreted (8:4-8).
- C. God's way calls for joyous celebration (8:9-12).
- D. God's way prescribes formal expressions of joyous worship (8:13-18).
- E. God's way elicits confession (9:1-5).
- F. God's people give practical expression to prayerful repentance (9:6-37).
- G. God's people are willing to commit themselves (9:38).
- H. God's people will sign pledges of commitment (10:1-27).
- I. God's people must give practical expressions of commitment (10:28-39).

NEHILOTH (Nə hī lōth) Technical musical term in the superscription of Ps. 5. The term is generally understood to specify the instrumentation for the psalm, “with flutes.”

NEHUSHTA (Nə hūsh' tā) Personal name meaning “serpent” or “bronze.” Mother of King Jehoiachin of Judah (2 Kings 24:8). As queen mother she was among those deported in the first exile (24:12,15).

NEHUSHTAN (Nə hūsh' tān) Name of a “brazen serpent” destroyed by King Hezekiah as part of an attempt to reform Judah's life and worship (2 Kings 18:4). The object was believed to be the one Moses fashioned to relieve a plague in the Israelite camp during the exodus (Num. 21:8-9). The word “Nehushtan” probably is a play on words in the Hebrew, the word for bronze being very similar. Nehushtan probably was a serpentine nature god worshiped in connection with the Canaanite cults. King Jehoiachin's mother was Nehushta (2 Kings 24:8), probably in honor of this foreign deity. See Bronze Serpent

NEIEL (נֵיֵל) Name meaning “dwelling place of God.” Town assigned to Asher (Josh. 19:27). The site is probably that of Khirbet Ya'nin on the eastern edge of the plain of Acco about 18 miles southeast of that city.

NEIGH Loud, prolonged cry of a horse used as a figure of approaching battle (Jer. 8:16) or of unbridled sexual desire (Jer. 5:8; 13:27; 50:11).

NEIGHBOR The Bible records a number of directives concerning the treatment of a neighbor but little definition as to what or who a neighbor is. In Exodus the term is first used in a way which crosses ethnic or national bounds, when the Israelites were to borrow gold and silver jewelry from their Egyptian neighbors (Exod. 3:22; 12:36). In this instance it was the women of Israel who were to go to their Egyptian friends and neighbors and to ask them for the jewelry made of precious metals.

After those references, the remainder of OT texts concerning neighbors are either positive commands, “Share with your closest neighbor” regarding the Passover meal (Exod. 12:4) and “Love your neighbor as yourself” (Lev. 19:18) or negative injunctions. Such commandments include prohibition of false witness and coveting (Exod. 20:17-18), moving property lines, and otherwise defrauding one living in close proximity (Lev. 19:13). Several teachings in the book of Proverbs and in the writings of the prophets address proper attitudes and actions toward one's neighbors.

The fact that certain directives were national in nature gives a ready explanation for the later mind-set addressed by Jesus when dealing with or teaching about “undesirable” neighbors. Usury, for example, could not be charged on a loan to a neighbor but was allowable to foreigners.

Though the Samaritans lived in close proximity to the Jews in NT times, they were not socially recognized to be neighbors by the Jews. When Jesus spoke to a Samaritan woman at Sychar (John 4), both the woman and Jesus' disciples were initially uncomfortable with the contact.

The most important teaching to define a neighbor came from Jesus' answer to the question, "Who is my neighbor?" Jesus responded by giving the parable of the good Samaritan, which portrayed the Samaritan as the merciful neighbor. Jesus told the man to "go and do the same" (Luke 10:37).

NEKEB (Nē' kēb) KJV transliteration of a Hebrew term meaning tunnel, shaft, or mine (Josh. 19:33). Modern translations take Nekeb as a component of the place-name Adami-nekeb. If a separate site is intended, el-Bossa is possible.

NEKODA (Nē' kō' dā) Personal name meaning "speckled." 1. Family of temple servants returning to Jerusalem after the exile (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:50). 2. Family who returned from exile but were unable to establish their Israelite descent (Neh. 7:62).

NEMUEL (Nēm' ū ēl) 1. Ancestor of a family of Simeonites, the Nemuelites (Num. 26:12; 1 Chron. 4:24); this Nemuel is also called Jemuel (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15) 2. A Reubenite (Num. 26:9).

NEMUELITES (Nēm ū ēl its) See Nemuel.

NEPHEG (Nē' phēg) Personal name meaning "boaster." 1. A Levite (Exod. 6:21). 2. Son born to David in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 3:7; 14:6).

NEPHEW 1. The son of one's brother or sister. KJV never used "nephew" in this sense, but NASB and NIV used it in this sense for Lot (Gen. 12:5; 14:12). 2. When KJV was translated, "nephew" was used in the broader sense of a lineal descendant, especially a grandson (Judg. 12:14; Job 18:19; Isa. 14:22; 1 Tim. 5:4).

NEPHILIM Transliteration of a Hebrew word that designates a class of beings mentioned in Gen. 6:4 and Num. 13:33. Some interpreters believe the word is related to naphal meaning “to fall.” In Gen. 6:4 the term refers to “heroes of old” (NRSV) so some have concluded that these are beings that have fallen from heaven and married the daughters of men. However, the text does not state that explicitly. At most it says that the Nephilim were on the earth during the days when the sons of God married the daughters of men. When the 12 spies were sent to Canaan, they saw giants whom they called the Nephilim, beside whom they seemed small, as “grasshoppers.” There is no attempt to relate these people to the Nephilim of Gen. 6. See Giants; Rephaim; Sons of God.

NEPHISH (Nē' p̄hīsh) (KJV, 1 Chron. 5:19) See Naphish.

NEPHISHESIM (Nē p̄hīsh' ə sīm) See Nephisim.

NEPHISIM (Nē p̄hī' sīm) Family of temple servants who returned from exile (Ezra 2:50), probably identical with the Nephushesim (Nephischesim, KJV) of Neh. 7:52.

NEPHTHALIM (Nēph' thā līm) Greek form of Naphtali used by the KJV (Matt. 4:13,15; Rev. 7:6).

NEPHTOAH (Nēph tō' ah) Name meaning “opening,” found only in the phrase “Waters of Nephtoah.” Boundary marker for Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:9; 18:15). The site was formerly identified with Atam, south of Bethlehem. The most frequent identification is now Lifta, about three miles northwest of Jerusalem.

NEPHUSHESIM (Nē phūsh' ə sīm) See Nephisim.

NER (Nēr) Personal name meaning “light.” Father of Saul's general Abner and grandfather of Saul (1 Sam. 14:51; 26:5,14; 2 Sam. 2:8; 1 Chron. 9:36).

NEREUS (Nē' rūs) Personal name borrowed from Greek mythology where Nereus is the sea god who fathers the Nereids (sea nymphs). The NT Nereus was a Roman Christian, possibly the son of Philogus and Julia (Rom. 16:15).

NERGAL (Nēr' gāl) Name, perhaps a form of "Ne-uru-gal" (Lord of the great city), of the Mesopotamian god of the underworld whose cult was centered in the ancient city of Cuth (Cuthah, modern Tell Ibrahim). Following the fall of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, the Assyrians resettled Samaria with Mesopotamian peoples who brought their gods, including Nergal, with them (2 Kings 17:30). The name is also an element in the name of the Babylonian official Nergal-sharezar (Jer. 39:3, 13). See Assyria.

NERGAL-SHAREZER (Nēr' gāl-shá rē' zēr) A personal name meaning "Nergal, protect the king." Probably a different spelling of the name "Neriglissar." He is mentioned as being among the officers of Nebuchadnezzar's court who helped destroy Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (Jer. 39:3, 13). He was a son-in-law of Nebuchadnezzar who usurped the Babylonian throne following the death of Evil-merodach. Nergal-sharezer quite possibly had something to do with the rebellion and the king's death. From the Babylonian Chronicle it is known that Nergal-sharezer mounted a military campaign across the Taurus Mountains to fight the Medes. He succeeded at first but was met with a bitter defeat later and soon died, perhaps at the hands of those who placed Nabonidus on the throne. See Babylon.

NERI (Nēr' rī) Personal name meaning "lamp." An ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:27).

NERIAH (Nēr' rī' ah) Personal name meaning "Yahweh is light." Father of two men who assisted Jeremiah: Baruch the scribe (Jer. 32:12; 36:4-19) and Seraiah the quartermaster (Jer. 51:59).

NERO (Nēr' rō) Personal name meaning "brave." Roman emperor A.D. 54-68. Nero became emperor in A.D. 54 at the age of 17. He succeeded his stepfather, Claudius, who was probably murdered at the request of Agrippina, Nero's mother.

For the first years of his reign, Nero was content to be dominated by his mother and his two mentors, Burrus and Seneca. The latter was a leading Stoic philosopher who was able, for a time, to moderate Nero's more excessive tendencies. As he grew older, Nero threw off these moderating influences and took control. To remove opposition he probably was involved in the death of his half brother Britannicus, and he had his mother murdered.

Nero was a complex personality. He could be extremely cruel, and his life was marked with debauchery and excess. Yet he was also a poet, an actor, a musician, and an athlete. He attempted to turn the crowds of Rome away from the brutal gladiatorial contests to an appreciation of the Greek-style Olympic games and other forms of cultural competition.

During Nero's rule the Great Fire broke out in Rome (A.D. 64). Much of the city was destroyed including Nero's palace. The story, probably true in part, goes that Nero fiddled while Rome burned.

Nero took measures to provide relief for those affected by the fire. Still he could not dispel the rumor that he had the fire set. People knew that he planned to build a much larger palace for himself, and they reasoned that he used the fire to clear off the land. Nero felt the need to divert suspicion to another group. He selected the Christians as his scapegoats. He claimed that they had set the fire. A systematic persecution of the Christians followed. Because of his lifestyle and the persecution, many Christians viewed him as the antichrist.

Nero neglected the army. This proved to be his downfall. He lost the loyalty of large segments of the army. Finally, several frontier armies revolted. Nero's support at home melted away. Realizing that the end was inevitable and near, he committed suicide by stabbing himself in A.D. 68. See Rome and the Roman Empire.

NEST Hollow container fashioned by a bird to contain its eggs and young. Nest is often used as a simile or metaphor for a human dwelling (Num. 24:21; Job 29:18; Hab. 2:9; Prov. 27:8). The term translated “nest” (Matt. 8:20; Luke 9:58) suggests a leafy “tent” rather than a nest.

NET 1. Loosely woven mesh of twine or cord used for catching birds, fish, or other prey. Fishing nets were of two basic types. The first was a cone-shaped net with leads around its wide mouth used for hand casting (Matt. 4:18-21; Mark 1:16-19). The second was the seine net, a large draw with floats at its head and lead sinkers at its foot. Such a net was often hauled ashore to empty (Isa. 19:8; Ezek. 26:5,14; 32:3; 47:10; Matt. 13:47). In the majority of OT cases the seine net is a figure for judgment at the hands of ruthless military forces. Fowling nets frequently had hinged mouths that could clamp shut when sprung (Prov. 1:17; Hos. 7:11-12). Nets of unspecified type are frequently used as figures of the Lord's chastisement (Job 19:6; Ps. 66:11; Lam. 1:13; Ezek. 12:13) or of the plots of the wicked (Pss. 9:15; 31:4; 35:7-8). 2. Netting or network refers to grillwork used as part of the ornament of the altar of burnt offering (Exod. 27:4-5; 38:4) and of the capitals of the temple columns (1 Kings 7:17-20). The grillwork of the altar perhaps functioned as a vent.

NETAIM (Nə tá' ım) Name meaning "plantings." Site of a royal pottery works (1 Chron. 4:23). The site has not been identified.

NETHANEEL (Nə thán' ə ɛl) or NETHANEL (Nə' rō) Personal name meaning "given by God." 1. Leader of the tribe Issachar and a son of Zuar (Num. 1:8). He commanded an army of 54,400 men (2:5-6). 2. Fourth son of Jesse and brother of King David (1 Chron. 2:14). 3. One of several priests to blow the trumpet before the ark of God (1 Chron. 15:24). 4. Prince of Judah whom King Jehoshaphat sent out with others to teach the law of God in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7-9). 5. Levite and father of Shemaiah who recorded the names and order of the people who would minister in the temple (1 Chron. 24:6). 6. Fifth son of Obed-edom who was a gatekeeper in the temple (1 Chron. 26:4). 7. Levite who contributed to the Passover offering when Josiah was king (2 Chron. 35:9). 8. Priest and son of Pashur who had married a foreign wife while exiled in Babylon (Ezra 10:22). He might have participated in the dedication of the wall around Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36). 9. Head of the priestly family of Jedaiah when Joiakim was high priest (Neh. 12:21). 10. Priest, one of Asaph's associates, who played a trumpet, in dedicating the rebuilding of Jerusalem's wall (Neh. 12:36). Some identify him with 8.

NETHANIAH (Nēth á nī' ah) Personal name meaning “given of Yah.” 1. Son of Asaph who served in a company of prophets established by David. They issued their message with harps, psalteries, and cymbals (1 Chron. 25:1-2). 2. Levite sent along with Jehoshaphat's princes to teach from the book of the law of God in all the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7-9). 3. Father of Jehudi sent to Baruch by the princes of Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:14). 4. Father of Ishmael who killed Gedaliah (2 Kings 25:23-25; Jer. 40:8,14-16; 41).

NETHINIM (Nēth' ı nīm) Name meaning “those given (to the priests and Levites),” which Ezra and Nehemiah apply to persons of foreign extraction who performed menial tasks in the temple. Moses assigned Midianite prisoners of war to the priests (32 servants; Num. 31:28,40) and the Levites (320 servants; Num. 31:30,47). Joshua forced the Gibeonites to serve as woodcutters and water bearers for the sanctuary (Josh. 9:27). The servants which David gave to the Levites were also likely war prisoners (Ezra 8:20).

Representatives of the Nethinim returned from exile with Zerubbabel in 538 B.C. (Ezra 2:43-54; Neh. 7:46-56). The lists of returnees contain many foreign names suggesting their origin as prisoners of war. Despite their foreign origin, the Nethinim appear to be accepted as part of the people of Israel. They were prohibited from mixed marriages with the people of the land (Neh. 10:28-30) and shared in the responsibility for repair of the Jerusalem city walls (Neh. 3:26; contrast Ezra 4:1-3). The Nethinim resided in the Ophel district of Jerusalem, likely near the water gate (Neh. 3:26), a site conducive with their task as water bearers.

NETOPHAH (Nə tó' phah) Name meaning “dropping.” A village and surrounding district in the hill country of Judah (2 Sam. 23:28-29; 1 Chron. 11:30; 27:13; Neh. 7:26). Netophah is frequently associated with Bethlehem, suggesting a site near that town. The inference finds added support in the inclusion of two Netophites in David's elite circle of warriors. The site is most likely Khirbet Bedd Faluh, about three and a half miles southeast of Bethlehem. The nearby spring, Ain en-Natuf, preserves the name.

NETOPHATHITES (Nə tōph' á thits) Residents of Netophah (1 Chron. 9:16; Neh. 12:27-28).

NETTLE Two different Hebrew words are sometimes translated “nettle” (other times “weeds,” “thistles” [HCSB]). Nettles are coarse plants with stinging hairs belonging to the family Urtica; generally, any prickly or stinging plant (Job 30:7; Prov. 24:31; Isa. 34:13; Hos. 9:6; Zeph. 2:9). NIV frequently replaced “nettles” with “undergrowth,” “weeds,” or “briars.” The Hebrew term used at Job 30:7 and Zeph. 2:9 perhaps refers to wild mustard. Nettles are used as a sign of desolation and judgment.

NEW Different from one of the same which existed before; made fresh. Scripture expresses God's concern for persons and the larger creation in the broad categories of a new act and a new relationship.

God's New Act Scripture often calls to mind past acts such as the creation and exodus that reveal God's care for God's world and people. Though rooted in God's acts in history, biblical faith does not relegate God to the distant past. Time and again writers of Scripture called God's people to anticipate God's new intervention in their lives. Isaiah 43:14-21 promised Babylonian exiles that God was now “doing a new thing” which paralleled God's acts saving Israel from Egyptian slavery. God again acted in a new way in Jesus Christ who offered a new teaching with authority (Mark 1:27) and whose ministry could be compared to new wine bursting old expectations of God's involvement in human salvation (Mark 2:22).

New Relationships God acted in the past to establish relationships, notably with the descendants of Abraham and the people of Israel at Sinai. Jeremiah anticipated God's establishing a new covenant with God's all-too-often faithless people, a covenant in which God would make knowledge of the law a matter of the heart (Jer. 31:31-34; Heb. 8:8-13). Luke 22:20 points to Christ's sacrificial death as the basis for this new covenant. In Christ the believer experiences newness of life (Rom. 6:4; 2 Cor. 5:17). This renewed life is characterized by new relationships with God and others (Eph. 2:15-16; Col. 3:10-11). See New Birth.

NEW AGE See Age to Come.

NEW BIRTH Term referring to God's impartation of spiritual life to sinners. It is synonymous with regeneration and finds its origin in John 3:1-10. There Jesus told Nicodemus, "Unless someone is born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God" (v. 3 HCSB). Jesus indicated that the idea of the new birth is rooted in the OT when He chastised Nicodemus for his dismay at this teaching: "Are you a teacher of Israel and don't know these things?" (v. 10; cp. Ezek. 36:26-27). The new birth is caused by the gracious and sovereign act of God apart from man's cooperation (John 1:13; Eph. 2:4-5). God brings the new birth about through the preaching of the word of God (1 Pet. 1:23; James 1:18). The result of the new birth is a changed life (2 Cor. 5:17) which includes saving faith and repentance (Eph. 2:8; Acts 11:18; 16:14) and obedience to God's law (1 John 3:9). See Regeneration; Salvation.

NEW COVENANT See Covenant.

NEW GATE A gate of the Jerusalem temple (Jer. 26:10; 36:10), which should perhaps be identified with the Upper Gate that Jothan built (2 Kings 15:35) and/or with the Upper Benjamin Gate (Jer. 20:2).

NEW JERUSALEM See Eschatology; Jerusalem.

NEW MOON See Calendar; Festivals.

NEW TESTAMENT Second major division of the Christian Bible with 27 separate works (called "books") attributed to at least eight different writers. Four accounts of Jesus' life are at the core. The first three Gospels (called "Synoptic") are very similar in content and order. The Fourth Gospel has a completely different perspective.

A history of selected events in the early church (Acts) is followed by 20 letters to churches and individuals and one apocalypse. The letters deal mainly with the interpretation of God's act of salvation in Jesus Christ.

Matters of discipline, proper Christian behavior, and church polity also are included. The apocalypse is a coded message of hope to the church of the first century that has been reinterpreted by each succeeding generation of Christians for their own situations.

NEZIAH (Nə zī' ah) Personal name meaning “faithful” or “illustrious.” Head of a family of temple servants (Nethinim) who returned from exile (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56).

NEZIB (Nē' zīb) Name meaning “garrison,” “idol,” “pillar,” or “standing place.” Village in the Shephelah district of Judah (Josh. 15:43). Site is identified with Beit Nesib east of Lachish about two miles from Khirbet Qila (Keilah).

NIBHAZ (Nīb' hāz) Deity worshiped by the residents of Avva whom the Assyrians used to resettle the area about Samaria after the fall of that city in 722 B.C. (2 Kings 17:31). The deity is otherwise unknown. The name is perhaps a deliberate corruption of the term for altar (Mizbeach), which had possibly become an object of worship.

NIBSHAN (Nīb' shān) Name meaning “prophecy.” Town assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:62). Location of the site is uncertain, though its position in the list suggests a locale on the shore of the Dead Sea.

NICANOR (Nī cā' nōr) Personal name meaning “conqueror.” One of seven Hellenists “full of faith and the Holy Spirit” (HCSB) chosen to administer food to the Greek-speaking widows of the Jerusalem church (Acts 6:5).

NICODEMUS (Nīc ō dē' mūs) Personal name meaning “innocent of blood.” John identifies Nicodemus as a Pharisee, “a ruler of the Jews” (John 3:1), that is, a member of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish ruling council, and as “a teacher of Israel” (John 3:10), that is, an authority on the interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures. Nicodemus' coming at night suggests his timidity and his trek from the darkness of his own sin and ignorance to the light of Jesus (John 3:2). Nicodemus greeted Jesus with a title of respect, “Rabbi”

(teacher), recognizing Him as a Godsent teacher whose signs bore witness to the presence of God (John 3:2). Jesus replied that Nicodemus could never see the kingdom of God without being “born again” (v. 3) or “born of water and the Spirit” (v. 5). Nicodemus could only marvel at the impossibility of such a thing (vv. 4,9), but the text does not indicate whether Jesus was finally able to make it clear to him.

True to his name, Nicodemus defended Christ before his peers (John 7:51) who were unaware that one of their number might have believed in Him (v. 48). Their response is a twofold rebuke that may be paraphrased, “Are you a Galilean peasant?” and, “Are you ignorant of the Scriptures?” (v. 52).

The reference to Nicodemus' initial coming at night highlights his later public participation in Jesus' burial (John 19:39-41). Nicodemus' contribution was enough aloes and spices to prepare a king for burial, and so he did. On one level the burial was a simple act of Pharisaic piety (cp. Tobit 1:17). On a deeper level it recognized that in His suffering and death Christ fulfilled His role as King of the Jews.

NICOLAITANS (Nīc ō lā' ī tāns) Heretical group in the early church who taught immorality and idolatry. They are condemned in Rev. 2:6,15 for their practices in Ephesus and Pergamum. Thyatira apparently had resisted the false prophecy they preached (Rev. 2:20-25). The Nicolaitans have been linked to the type of heresy taught by Balaam (Num. 25:1-2; 2 Pet. 2:15), especially the pagan feasts and orgies that they apparently propagated in the first-century church.

NICOLAS (Nīc' ō lās) Personal name meaning “conqueror of people.” One of seven Hellenists “full of faith and the Holy Spirit” chosen to administer food to the Greek-speaking widows of the Jerusalem church (Acts 6:5). Nicolas was a proselyte, that is, a Gentile convert to Judaism, from Antioch. Some church fathers connect Nicolas with the heretical sect of the Nicolaitans (Rev. 2:6,15). The name, however, is common, and there is no other reason to associate this Nicolas with a sect active in Asia Minor.

NICOLAUS (Nīc ō lā' ūs) NRSV and HCSB form of Nicolas (Acts 6:5), which more accurately transliterates the Greek Nikolaus.

NICOPOLIS (Nīc ōp' ō līs) Place-name meaning “city of victory,” shared by many cities in the ancient world. The site in which Paul most likely wintered (Titus 3:12) was Nicopolis in Epirus in northwest Greece on the north side of the Sinus Ambracicus. Octavius founded the city on the campsite from which he mounted his successful battle of Actium.

NIGER (Nī' ġēr) Latin nickname meaning “black.” Surname of Simeon (KJV, Symeon), one of the teacher-prophets of the early church at Antioch. Blacks were a common sight among the populations of Egypt and North Africa in the Hellenistic period. Simeon's Latin nickname suggests that he originated from the Roman province of Africa, to the west of Cyrenica. His inclusion in Acts 13:1 demonstrates the multiracial and multinational leadership of the church at Antioch. Their concern for missions was likely rooted in their own ethnic diversity. Some have conjectured that Simeon Niger was identical to Simon of Cyrene (Mark 15:21). Acts 13:1, however, only designates Lucius as a resident of Cyrene.

NIGHT Period of darkness between sunset and dawn. Night occurs often in the simple temporal sense. Night forms part of God's ordering of time (Gen. 1:5,14; 8:22). Night is frequently a time of encounter with God, either through dreams or visions (Gen. 20:3; 31:24; 46:2; 1 Kings 3:5; Job 33:15; Dan. 2:19; 7:2,7,13; Acts 16:9; 18:9), appearances (Gen. 26:24; Num. 22:20; 1 Chron. 17:3; 2 Chron. 1:7; 7:12; Acts 23:11; 27:23), or by speech (Judg. 6:25; 7:9; 1 Sam. 15:16). Night is sometimes associated with danger (Ps. 91:5). The absence of night in the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. 21:25; 22:5) points to the security of believers and the constant presence of God there. Night can also be associated with God's acts of deliverance (Deut. 16:1; 2 Kings 19:35; Job 34:25).

NIGHT MONSTER Translation (NASB, ASV) of the Hebrew term lilit (Isa. 34:14 NRSV). The term occurs only here in Scripture unless textual emendations are accepted (Job 18:15; Isa. 2:18). Interpreters divide over the natural (night creatures, NIV; nightjar, REB) or supernatural (night monster, KJV, NASB; night hag, RSV) nature of “Lilith” (English). Whatever Lilith's nature, the text stresses the great desolation which falls on God's enemies.

NIGHT WATCH Ancient division of time (Pss. 90:4; 119:148; Lam. 2:19; Matt. 14:25). According to the later Jewish system, the night was divided into three watches (evening, midnight, and morning). The Greco-Roman system added a fourth (crowing of the rooster, HCSB) between midnight and morning (Mark 13:35). The fourth watch (Matt. 14:25; Mark 6:48) designates the time just before dawn.

NILE RIVER Major river considered the “life” of ancient Egypt. Hebrew word usually used for the Nile in the OT is y'or. This is in fact borrowed from the Egyptian word itrw or itr by which the Egyptians referred to the Nile and the branches and canals that led from it.

The Egyptian Nile is formed by the union of the White Nile that flows out of Lake Victoria in Tanzania and the Blue Nile from Lake Tana in Ethiopia. These join at Khartum in the Sudan and are later fed by the Atbara. Thereafter the Nile flows 1,675 miles northward to the Mediterranean Sea without any further tributary. In antiquity six cataracts or falls prevented navigation at various points. The first of these, going upstream, is found at Aswan, generally recognized as the southern boundary of Egypt. From Aswan northwards the Nile flows between two lines of cliffs that sometimes come directly down to its edge but in other places are up to nine miles away. The shore land could be cultivated as far as Nile water could be brought. This cultivated area the Egyptians called the Black Land from the color of the rich soil. Beyond that lay the Red Land of the low desert stretching to the foot of the cliffs. At the cliff tops was the great inhospitable desert where few Egyptians ventured. Below the modern capital, Cairo, and the nearby ancient capital, Memphis, the Nile forms a huge delta. The many ancient cities in this area now lie below the water table. Little archaeological excavation has been done here, though this is the area where the closest links with Palestine are likely to have been located. The eastern edge of the Delta is the site of the land of Goshen where Jacob/Israel and his descendents were settled. See Goshen.

The Nile is the basis of Egypt's wealth, indeed of its very life. It is the only river to flow northwards across the Sahara. Egypt was unique as an agricultural community in not being dependent on rainfall. The secret was the black silt deposited on the fields by the annual flood caused when the Blue Nile was swollen by the runoff from the winter rains in Ethiopia. This silt was remarkably fertile. Irrigation waters, raised laboriously from the river, let the Egyptians produce many varieties of crops in large quantities (Num. 11:5; Gen. 42:1-2). If the winter rains failed, the consequent small or nonexistent inundation resulted in disastrous famine: some are recorded as lasting over a number of years (cp. Gen. 41).

Even today water is brought to the individual fields by small channels leading off the arterial ditches. These channels are closed off by earth dams which can be broken down with the foot when it is a particular farmer's turn to use the water (Deut. 11:10). Since life was concentrated in the valley, the river was also a natural highway. All major journeys in Egypt were undertaken by boat helped by the current when traveling north or by the prevailing wind when headed south. See Egypt.

NIMRAH (Nim' rah) Place-name meaning "clear (water)." Alternate form of Beth-nimrah (Num. 32:36) used at Num. 32:3.

NIMRIM (Nim' rīm) Place-name meaning "leopards" or "basins of clear waters." The name occurs in the phrase "Waters of Nimrim" (Isa. 15:6; Jer. 48:34), the stream upon which Moab's agricultural productivity depended. The stream is either the Wadi en-Numeirah which flows east into the Dead Sea about eight miles north of its lower end or the Wadi Nimrin which flows east into the Jordan eight miles north of its mouth.

NIMROD (Nim' rōd) Personal name meaning "we shall rebel." Son of Cush or Ethiopia (Gen. 10:8-10; 1 Chron. 1:10). A hunter and builder of the kingdom of Babel who some Bible students have linked to Tukulti-ninurta, an Assyrian king (about 1246-1206 B.C.). The Bible does not give sufficient information to connect him with any other known figure of history. Others think that Amenophis III of Egypt (about 1411-1375 B.C.) or the heroic Gilgamesh might have been the ancient Nimrod. Regardless, extremely popular legends involve Nimrod as a ruler in both Assyrian and Egyptian lore. The Prophet Micah called Assyria "the land of Nimrod"

(5:6). Nimrod shows that the great Mesopotamian culture had its origin from the creative work of the God of Israel.

NIMSHI (Nim' shi) Personal name meaning "weasel." Grandfather of Jehu (2 Kings 9:2,14). Elsewhere Jehu is called the son of Nimshi (1 Kings 19:16; 2 Kings 9:20; 2 Chron. 22:7). Either "son" is used loosely in the sense of descendant, or a variant tradition is involved.

NINEVE (Nin' ə və) (KJV, Luke 11:32) or NINEVEH Greatest of the capitals of the ancient Assyrian Empire, which flourished from about 800 to 612 B.C. It was located on the left bank of the Tigris River in northeastern Mesopotamia (Iraq today). Its remains are represented by two mounds named Quyundjiq ("Many Sheep") and Nebi Yunus ("The Prophet Jonah").

Biblical References Nineveh is first mentioned in the OT as one of the cities established by Nimrod (Gen. 10:9-12). It was the enemy city to which God called the reluctant Prophet Jonah in the eighth century B.C. The book of Jonah calls it "that great city" (1:2; 4:11) and "an exceeding great city" (3:3). The additional phrase "of three days' journey" (3:3) has been rendered by the NIV: "a visit required three days." The phrase could be an idiom that would refer to the first day for travel to, the second for visiting, and the third day for the return from a site. The phrase "more than a hundred and twenty thousand people who cannot tell their right hand from their left" (4:11) has sometimes been taken to refer to children, which would yield a population of 600,000. The area within the city walls, however, would not have contained more than 175,000.

The final biblical references are from Nahum, who prophesied the overthrow of the "bloody city" by the attack of the allied Medes and Chaldeans in 612 B.C. By 500 B.C. the prophet's words (Nah. 3:7) "Nineveh is devastated" (NASB) were echoed by the Greek historian Herodotus who spoke of the Tigris as "the river on which the town of Nineveh formerly stood." Excavations Muslim village and cemetery have occupied the site of Nebi Yunus preventing excavations there. The tell of Quyundjiq which rises 90 feet above the plain has attracted excavators after it was first accurately sketched by C. J. Rich in 1820.

In 1842 Paul Emile Botta, the French consul at the nearby city of Mosul, became the first excavator of the Near East when he began digging at Quyunjdjiq. In 1845 the Englishman, A. H. Layard, dug briefly at Quyunjdjiq for a month. Both moved to other sites that they mistakenly believed to be Nineveh. Layard later returned in 1849 to Quyunjdjiq and discovered Sennacherib's palace there.

Hormuz Rassam, a native of Mosul assisted Layard and then worked at the site of Quyunjdjiq 1852-54 and 1878-82. He found Ashurbanipal's palace and library in 1853. George Smith, who had deciphered the Babylonian flood story in the Gilgamesh Epic in 1872, was sent to the site by The Daily Telegraph. In 1873 he found a tablet which contained 17 further lines of the flood story. Iraqi scholars made some soundings in 1954 at Nebi Yunus that confirmed Layard's guess that Esarhaddon's palace lay here. Palaces Sennacherib (704-681 B.C.) built the enormous southwest palace at Quyunjdjiq. We observe on his reliefs captive Philistines, Tyrians, Aramaeans, and others working under the supervision of the king himself. His “palace which has no equals” covered five acres and had 71 rooms, including two large halls 180 feet long and 40 feet wide. He boasted that the materials for the palace included “fragrant cedars, cypresses, doors banded with silver and copper...painted brick...curtain pegs of silver and copper, alabaster, breccia, marble, ivory.” The rooms were embellished with 9,880 feet of sculptured reliefs depicting Assyrian victories over enemy cities, including the Judean city of Lachish captured in 701 B.C. Sennacherib's city was enclosed by eight miles of walls with 15 gates. It had gardens and parks watered by a 30-mile long aqueduct.

Ashurbanipal (669-627 B.C.), the last great Assyrian king, built the northern palace with its magnificent reliefs of royal lion hunts. He amassed a library of 20,000 tablets, which contained important literary epics, magical and omen collections, royal archives and letters. See Assyria.

NINEVITES (Nin' ə vits) Residents of the Assyrian capital Nineveh (Luke 11:30,32). The Ninevites served as an example of Gentiles who repented and were accepted by God (Jon. 3). See Assyria.

NIPPUR (Nĭp' pŭr) City located in Mesopotamia, approximately 50 miles southeast of the ancient city of Babylon and approximately 100 miles south of modern Baghdad, Iraq. Although it is never mentioned in the Bible, its history is important in the larger context of the biblical world. It is believed to have been the center of one of the first true civilizations, that of Sumer.

The city was founded approximately 4000 B.C. by a primitive group called the "Ubaidians." Nippur was for more than 2,000 years the undisputed cultural and religious center, although it never was used as the capital city for any kingdom.

Nippur was a flourishing center of industry and scribal education. Documents discovered in the area describe a variety of commercial enterprises. Some of the tablets, dating back to 2500 B.C. and earlier, were found, as were records of a much later time. One of the most important later discoveries appeared in the ruins of a business house. The records, known as the Murashu documents after the banking family responsible for them, give some indication of the extent of Jewish involvement in the business world after the time of the Babylonian exile. Scribal education concerned the use of one of the earliest forms of writing called cuneiform. Also, part of education was an emphasis on mathematics.

Nippur was most important, however, for its religion. Various gods controlled every aspect of life. The chief deity was En-lil, also occasionally called Bel (“the lord”). He was thought of as god of the terrestrial world and the father of other gods. His significance made his home, Nippur, the place where people from peasants to kings came to offer gifts.

According to tradition, kingly authority descended from heaven after the flood. The several cities in the area, except for Nippur, took turns as the seat of government and often waged war against each other for political supremacy. The undisputed source of this supremacy, however, was En-lil, the principal deity. His authority was transmitted to the human kings through the priesthood of his temple, the Ekur (“mountain house”), the leading shrine in the area.

Nippur's influence and prominence began to wane with the rise of Babylonian power. By the time of Hammurabi, 1792-1750 B.C., Nippur had been replaced by Babylon as the religious and cultural center. It did, however, continue to be an influential city to about 250 B.C. See Babylon; Cuneiform; Hammurabi; Mesopotamia; Sumer.

NISAN (Nĕ san') Foreign term used after the exile for the first month of the Hebrew calendar (Neh. 2:1; Esther 3:7). This month that falls within March and April was formerly called Abib. See Calendar.

NISROCH (Nĭs' rōk) God worshiped by the Assyrian king Sennacherib (2 Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38). No god of this name is otherwise known. The name is perhaps a corruption of the name Marduk, Nusku (the fire god), or Ashur (cp. early Greek readings Esdrach and Asorach).

NITER (Ni' tēr) (KJV, Prov. 25:20; Jer. 2:22) See Lye.

NO, NO-AMON (Nō, Nō-á' mōn) Ancient name for Egyptian city of Thebes (modern Luxor). Inherent in its name is its reputation. “No” is a word for the best of cities and “Amon” was the name of the Egyptian god Amun-Re. Jeremiah (46:25), Ezekiel (30:14-16), and Nahum (3:8) were well aware of its prominence. To attack this capital city was to strike at the heart and spirit of Egypt.

Although Thebes existed before the Middle Kingdom (about 2040-1750 B.C.), it was not particularly noteworthy. In the new kingdom (about 1550-1070 B.C.) Thebes became the worship and cultural center of Egypt. Pharaoh after pharaoh added to the magnificent temples of Karnak and its “queen” just to the south, Luxor. These two edifices dominated the east side of the Nile while the funerary temples and the valleys of the kings (Biban el-Moluk) and queens occupied the west side. Deir el-Bahri (Hatshepsut), the Memnon Colossi (Amenhotep III), the Ramasseum (Rameses II), and Medinet Habu (Rameses III) are just a few sites still witnessing to the past glory of Thebes. As Nahum indicated, Thebes was not invincible. In 661 B.C. Ashurbanipal (of Assyria) sacked the sacred site. Mortally wounded, the city never fully recovered. See Egypt.

NOADIAH (Nō á dī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah has met.” 1. Levite who returned from exile and served as a temple treasurer (Ezra 8:33). 2. Prophetess who discouraged Nehemiah's building of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 6:14).

NOAH (Nō ah) Personal name of uncertain meaning, related to “rest.” 1. Son of Lamech, a descendant of Adam in the line of Seth, and a survivor of the flood. A good and righteous man, Noah was the father of Shem, Ham, and Japheth who were born when he was 500 years old. God warned Noah that He was going to wipe mankind from the face of the earth. Because Noah walked with God and stood blameless among the people of that time, God gave him specific instructions for building the ark by which Noah and his family would survive the coming flood. Noah followed the building instructions down to every detail. Then a week before the flood (Gen. 7:4), Noah led his family and all of the animals into the ark just as God directed. After seven days the rain began and lasted for 40 days. As he sought to know whether it was safe to leave the ark, he sent out first a raven and then a dove. When the dove returned with an olive leaf, Noah knew the water had receded.

Once out of the ark, Noah built an altar and sacrificed clean animals as burnt offerings on the altar. Then the Lord promised never again to destroy living creatures as He had done in the flood and established a covenant with Noah and his sons and sealed that covenant with a rainbow.

The sinful nature of humanity is one thing that remained preserved on the ark. Once on dry ground, Noah planted a vineyard, drank of its wine, became drunk, and exposed himself in his tent. Ham informed Shem and Japheth about their father's nakedness. The latter two showed respect for their father and covered him. As a result, they received rich blessings for their descendants from Noah. Ham in turn received a curse for his descendant: Canaan. Noah lived another 350 years after the flood and died at the age of 950 years.

Hebrews 11:7 affirms Noah's actions of faith in building the ark. The references to Noah in 1 Pet. 3:20 and 2 Pet. 2:5 speak of Noah and his family who were saved from the flood. See Covenant; Flood.

2. One of Zelophehad's five daughters (Num. 26:33). Of the tribe of Manasseh, these daughters received an inheritance in the land in their father's name even though he was dead with no male offspring (27:1-11). This was most unusual in that time.

NOB (^{Nöb}) City in Benjamin likely situated between Anathoth and Jerusalem (Neh. 11:31-32; Isa. 10:32). Following the destruction of the Shiloh sanctuary in about 1000 B.C. (Jer. 7:14), the priesthood relocated to Nob. Because the priest Ahimelech gave aid to the fugitive David (1 Sam. 21:1-9), Saul exterminated 85 of the priests of Nob (1 Sam. 22:9-23). Only Abiathar escaped. The site of Nob was perhaps on Mount Scopus about one mile northeast of ancient Jerusalem, on the hill Qu'meh one mile further north, or Ras el-Mesharif about one mile north of Jerusalem. See Ahimelech.

NOBAH (Nō' bāh) Personal name meaning “barking” or “howling.” 1. Leader of the tribe of Manasseh who conquered Kenath in Gilead (Num. 32:42). 2. Town in Gilead, formerly Kenath (Num. 32:42). Site is perhaps identical with Kanawat about 60 miles east of the Sea of Galilee. 3. Town in Gilead (Judg. 8:10-11) to the east of Succoth and Penuel and west of the king's highway (KJV, “the way of them that dwell in tents”; NRSV, “caravan route”).

NOD (Nōd) Place-name meaning “wandering.” After murdering his brother Abel, Cain was condemned to be “a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth” (Gen. 4:12,14 NRSV). Nod is located “away from the presence of the LORD” and “east of Eden” (Gen. 4:16). The text is not so much interested in fixing the physical location of Nod as in emphasizing the “lostness” of the wanderer Cain.

NODAB (Nō' dāb) Name meaning “nobility.” Tribe conquered by Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 5:19). The name is preserved by Nudebe in Hauran. The association of Nodab with Jetur and Naphish suggests its identification with Kedemah (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:31).

NOE (Nō' ē) (KJV, NT) See Noah.

NOGAH (Nō' gāh) Personal name meaning “brilliance” or “luster.” Son born to David in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 3:7; 14:6). The omission of the name in the parallel list (2 Sam. 5:15) has suggested that the name results from dittography or copying twice of the following name, Nepheg.

NOHAH (Nō' hāh) Personal name meaning “quiet.” Son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:2). The name is omitted from the parallel list (Gen. 46:21).

NON (Nōn) (KJV, NASB) Alternate form of the personal name “Nun” (1 Chron. 7:27).

NOON Middle of the day, specifically 12 o'clock noon. Noon is frequently associated with death and destruction (2 Sam. 4:5; 1 Kings 20:16; 2 Kings 4:20; Ps. 91:6; Jer. 6:4; 15:8; 20:16; Zeph. 2:4). Noon is also associated with blessings and vindication (Job 11:17; Ps. 37:6; Isa. 58:10).

NOPH (Nōph) Variant form of Moph, the Hebrew term for Memphis (Isa. 19:13; Jer. 2:16; 44:1; 46:14, 19; Ezek. 30:13,16). See Memphis.

NOPHAH (Nō' phah) Place-name meaning “blast.” Nophah passed from Moabite to Ammonite to Israelite control (Num. 21:30). The REB and RSV by altering one letter of the Hebrew text read “fire spread,” a reading supported by the earliest Greek translation and Samaritan Pentateuch. If Nophah was a place, it is perhaps Nobah (Num. 32:42).

NORTH GATE Designation of two gates in Ezekiel's vision of the renewed temple, a gate entering the outer court (Ezek. 8:14; 44:4; 46:9; 47:2) and a gate entering the inner court (Ezek. 40:35,40,44).

NOSE Part of the face between the eye and mouth that bears the nostrils and covers the nasal cavity. Jewelry was worn in the nose (Gen. 24:47; Isa. 3:21; Ezek. 16:12). Prisoners of war were sometimes led captive with hooks in their noses (2 Kings 19:28; Isa. 37:29). The precise significance of placing a vine or branch to one's nose (Ezek. 8:17) is unknown. Suggestions include an act connected with idolatrous worship, a provocative gesture (cp. our turning up one's nose), or, if the text is emended, to a stench from the people which reaches God's nose. Cutting off the nose of an adulteress is a penalty known from Assyrian law (Ezek. 23:25,35).

Nostrils are often associated with the breath of life (Gen. 2:7; 7:22; Job 27:3; Isa. 2:22). The Lord's nostrils pile up the waters, allowing passage through the sea (Exod. 15:8; 2 Sam. 22:16) and are associated with judgment (2 Sam. 22:9; Job 41:20; Ps. 18:8; Isa. 65:5).

NUCLEAR WEAPONS Description of the end of the world predicted in 2 Pet. 3:10,12 is interpreted by some as describing the effects of an atomic blast. In modern military arsenals only nuclear weapons can cause the elements “to burn and be dissolved” (2 Pet. 3:10 HCSB).

Nuclear weapons represent the best in mankind combined with the worst in mankind. People were created with the capacity for great intelligence and creativity. Nothing that people propose to do, said God in response to the Tower of Babel, will be impossible for them (Gen. 11:6). Yet by means of nuclear weapons, people now also hold the capacity to literally destroy creation.

Like all technological advances, nuclear weapons tempt those who control them into thinking that they can control their own lives. For this reason, Isaiah's warning to Hezekiah, who “depended on the weapons of the house of the forest” (Isa. 22:8b NASB) for security, is apropos: without first ordering one's life according to God's principles, even the best of human efforts is futile (Isa. 22:11; cp. Isa. 7:9), and quite possibly self-destructive.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF Fourth in the chronological series of the Torah, Numbers carries the title Bemidbar (“in the wilderness”) in the original Hebrew text. This is the initial word in the text, and it characterizes much of the ensuing history recorded in the book.

Though the descendants of Jacob were introduced to the covenant relationship with Yahweh, or the Lord, they chose their own way on many occasions. As a result, they faced God's judgment time and again. For their rebellion, disobedience, and lack of faith, the adults who left Egypt were sentenced to die in the wilderness, and their children took their place as the warriors and leaders who would later receive the promised land.

The book carries the title Numbers in English translations as a result of the early Greek title Arithmoi and the Latin title Numeri. In both instances, the title reflects a focus on the censuses taken to account for the number of fighting men in each tribe.

Numbers is a book of transition, in which the conditional nature of the Sinaitic covenant is most clearly demonstrated to the generation of adults who escaped Egyptian bondage. The older generation chose disobedience, which carried a death sentence in the wilderness. More time elapses historically in this book than the other books combined which relate to the exodus from Egypt (Exodus, Leviticus, Deuteronomy). The nearly 40 years of wandering take place in Numbers as a result of Israel's disobedience and lack of faith in the covenant God, Yahweh.

This book is essential for understanding the reasons for the second giving of the commandments (see Exod. 20 and Deut. 5). Were it not for the death sentence on the adults, it would not have been necessary for Moses to reintroduce the Law and the commandments to another generation who would take the promised land.

Numbers also records historical details which are only alluded to by other biblical writers. In Ps. 95, for example, the writer gives the command, "Do not harden your hearts as at Meribah, as on that day at Massah in the wilderness" (HCSB). The context indicates a reference to Israel's choice to accept the spies' majority report (Num. 14). Another incident found in Numbers is the fashioning of the bronze snake (Num. 21). Jesus refers to this event during His instruction of Nicodemus.

Many individuals hold to a multiple authorship scheme for the Torah. No legitimate grounds exist, however, for presupposing that Moses did not record most of the events of the Exodus (Exod., Lev., Num.) during the time covered in this book. The internal and external evidence of Numbers points to Moses as the original author. NUMBER SYSTEMS AND NUMBER SYMBOLISM To understand properly the number systems of the biblical world, one must look to the neighbors of Israel. The Egyptians were already using relatively advanced mathematics by 3000 B.C. The construction of such structures as the pyramids required an understanding of complex mathematics. The Egyptian system was decimal. The Sumerians by that same time had developed their own number system. In fact, the Sumerians knew two systems, one based on 10 (a decimal system) and one based on six or 12 (usually designated as a duodecimal system). We still make use of remnants of the Sumerian system today in our reckoning of time—12 hours for day and 12 hours for night, 60 minutes and 60 seconds as divisions of time. We also divide a circle into 360 degrees. Our calendar was originally based on the same division with the year having 12 months of 30 days for a total of 360. Even our units of the dozen (12) and gross (144) and inches to the foot may have their origin in the Sumerian mathematical system.

The Hebrews did not develop the symbols to represent numbers until the postexilic period (after 539 B.C.). In all preexilic inscriptions, small numbers are represented by individual strokes (for example, //// for four). Larger numbers were either represented with Egyptian symbols, or the name of the number was written out (“four” for the number 4). The Arad inscriptions regularly used Egyptian symbols for numbers, individual strokes for the units and hieratic numbers for five, 10, and larger numbers. The Samaria ostraca more frequently wrote out the number. Letters of the Hebrew alphabet are first used to represent numbers on coins minted in the Maccabean period (after 167 B.C.).

With the coming of the Hellenistic and Roman periods to Palestine, Greek symbols for numbers and Roman numerals appeared. The Greeks used letters of their alphabet to represent numerals, while the Romans used the familiar symbols I, V, X, L, C, M, and so on.

Biblical passages show that the Hebrews were well acquainted with the four basic mathematical operations of addition (Num. 1:20-46), subtraction (Gen. 18:28-33), multiplication (Num. 7:84-86), and division (Num. 31:27). The Hebrews also used fractions such as a half (Gen. 24:22), a third (Num. 15:6), and a fourth (Exod. 29:40).

In addition to their usage to designate specific numbers or quantities, many numbers in the Bible came to have a symbolic meaning. Thus seven came to symbolize completeness and perfection. God's work of creation was both complete and perfect, and it was completed in seven days. All of mankind's existence was related to God's creative activity. The seven-day week reflected God's first creative activity. The Sabbath was that day of rest following the workweek, reflective of God's rest (Gen. 1:1-2:4). Israelites were to remember the land also and give it a sabbath, permitting it to lie fallow in the seventh year (Lev. 25:2-7). Seven was also important in cultic matters beyond the Sabbath: major festivals such as Passover and Tabernacles lasted seven days as did wedding festivals (Judg. 14:12,17). In Pharaoh's dream the seven good years followed by seven years of famine (Gen. 41:1-36) represented a complete cycle of plenty and famine. Jacob worked a complete cycle of years for Rachel; then, when he was given Leah instead, he worked an additional cycle of seven (Gen. 29:15-30).

A major Hebrew word for making an oath or swearing, shaba, was closely related to the word "seven," sheba. The original meaning of "swear an oath" may have been "to declare seven times" or "to bind oneself by seven things."

A similar use of the number seven can be seen in the NT. The seven churches (Rev. 2-3) perhaps symbolized all the churches by their number. Jesus taught that forgiveness is not to be limited, even to a full number or complete number of instances. We are to forgive, not merely seven times (already a generous number of forgivenesses) but 70 times seven (limitless forgiveness, beyond keeping count) (Matt. 18:21-22).

As the last example shows, multiples of seven frequently had symbolic meaning. The year of Jubilee came after the completion of every 49 years. In the year of Jubilee all Jewish bondslaves were released and land which had been sold reverted to its former owner (Lev. 25:8-55). Another multiple of seven used in the Bible is 70. Seventy elders are mentioned (Exod. 24:1,9). Jesus sent out the 70 (Luke 10:1-17). Seventy years is specified as the length of the exile (Jer. 25:12, 29:10; Dan. 9: 2). The messianic kingdom was to be inaugurated after a period of 70 weeks of years had passed (Dan. 9:24).

After seven the most significant number for the Bible is undoubtedly 12. The Sumerians used 12 as one base for their number system. Both the calendar and the signs of the zodiac reflect this 12-base number system. The tribes of Israel and Jesus' disciples numbered 12. The importance of the number 12 is evident in the effort to maintain that number. When Levi ceased to be counted among the tribes, the Joseph tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh, were counted separately to keep the number 12 intact. Similarly, in the NT when Judas Iscariot committed suicide, the 11 moved quickly to add another to keep their number at 12. Twelve seems to have been especially significant in the book of Revelation. New Jerusalem had 12 gates; its walls had 12 foundations (Rev. 21:12-14). The tree of life yielded 12 kinds of fruit (Rev. 22:2).

Multiples of 12 are also important. There were 24 divisions of priests (1 Chron. 24:4) and 24 elders around the heavenly throne (Rev. 4:4). Seventy-two elders, when one includes Eldad and Medad, were given a portion of God's spirit that rested on Moses, and they prophesied (Num. 11:24-26). An apocryphal tradition holds that 72 Jewish scholars, six from each of the 12 tribes, translated the OT into Greek, to give us the version we call today the Septuagint. The 144,000 servants of God (Rev. 7:4) were made up of 12,000 from each of the 12 tribes of Israel.

Three as a symbolic number often indicated completeness. The created cosmos had three elements: heaven, earth, and underworld. Three Persons make up the Godhead: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Prayer was to be lifted at least three times daily (Dan. 6:10; cp. Ps. 55:17). The sanctuary had three main parts: vestibule, nave, inner sanctuary (1 Kings 6). Three-year-old animals were mature and were, therefore, prized for special sacrifices (1 Sam. 1:24; Gen. 15:9). Jesus said He would be in the grave for three days and three nights (Matt. 12:40), the same time Jonah was in the great fish (Jon. 1:17). Paul often used triads in his writings, the most famous being "faith, hope, and love" (1 Cor. 13:13). One must also remember Paul's benediction: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all" (2 Cor. 13:14).

Four was often used as a sacred number. Significant biblical references to four include the four corners of the earth (Isa. 11:12), the four winds (Jer. 49:36), four rivers which flowed out of Eden to water the world (Gen. 2:10-14), and four living creatures surrounding God (Ezek. 1; Rev. 4:6-7). God sent forth the four horsemen of the Apocalypse (Rev. 6:1-8) to bring devastation to the earth.

The most significant multiple of four is 40, which often represented a large number or a long period of time. Rain flooded the earth for 40 days (Gen. 7:12). For 40 days Jesus withstood Satan's temptations (Mark 1:13). Forty years represented approximately a generation. Thus all the adults who had rebelled against God at Sinai died during the 40 years of the Wilderness Wandering period. By age 40 a person had reached maturity (Exod. 2:11; Acts 7:23).

A special system of numerology known as gematria developed in later Judaism. Gematria is based on the idea that one may discover hidden meaning in the biblical text from a study of the numerical equivalence of the Hebrew letters. The first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, aleph represented one; beth, the second letter, represented two, and so on. With gematria one takes the sum of the letters of a Hebrew word and seeks to find some meaning. For example, the Hebrew letters of the name Eliezer, Abraham's servant, have a numerical value of 318. When Gen. 14:14 states that Abraham took 318 trained men to pursue the kings from the east, some Jewish commentaries interpret this to mean that Abraham had but one helper, Eliezer, since Eliezer has the numerical value of 318. Likewise, the number 666 in Revelation is often taken as a reverse gematria for the emperor Nero. The name Nero Caesar, put in Hebrew characters and added up following gematria, totals 666. Any interpretation based on gematria must be treated with care; such interpretation always remains speculative.

NUN 1. (Nūn) Father of Joshua (Exod. 33:11; Num. 11:28; 13:8, 16). 2. (Nūn) Fourteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet which serves as a heading for Ps. 119:105-112. Each verse of this section begins with “nun.”

NUNC DIMITTIS Latin phrase meaning “you can now dismiss.” The first words in Latin of Simeon's psalm of praise in Luke 2:29-32 and thus the title of the psalm. See Benedictus; Magnificat.

NURSE 1. Woman who breast-feeds an infant (Gen. 21:7; Exod. 2:7; 1 Sam. 1:23). In OT times children were often nursed as long as three years

(1 Sam. 1:22-24). Weaning was often a time of celebration (Gen. 21:8). Generally a mother nursed her own child; though sometimes a wet nurse was employed (Exod. 2:7). A nurse might continue as an honored family member after the child was grown (Gen. 24:59; 35:8). Paul likened the gentleness of his missionary approach to a mother nursing her children (1 Thess. 2:7). 2. Woman who cares for a child such as a governess or nanny (Ruth 4:16; 2 Sam. 4:4). 3. One who cares for the sick (1 Kings 1:2,4 NASB, RSV).

NURTURE KJV translation (Eph. 6:4) of the Greek paideia (disciple, instruction). The noun occurs elsewhere in the Pauline corpus only once (2 Tim. 3:16) which relates that all Scripture is profitable for “training (paideia) in righteousness.” To bring up children “in the training and instruction of the Lord” (Eph. 6:4 HCSB) is to discipline and correct them as the Lord would.

NUZI (Nu' ze) City located in the northeast section of the Fertile Crescent, and then named Gasur, that flourished under Sargon shortly before 2000 B.C. Few cities that are not mentioned in the OT contribute to its understanding as significantly as Nuzi (modern Yorghana Tepe). Its most relevant history, as far as the OT is concerned, is its revival as part of the Hurrian kingdom, situated in the state of Mitanni, about 1500 B.C., about the time of the Israelites' bondage in Egypt. Twenty thousand Akkadian documents have been found at Nuzi that reflect primarily the legal, social, and economic situation of Mesopotamian culture about 2000-1400 B.C. The sociological importance of this discovery is estimated differently among scholars. Most scholars accept the value for general Near Eastern studies and biblical background, and some use the information to determine the date of the patriarchs and the literature about them according to biblical parallels with Nuzi customs.

Some parallels are more exact than others, but the following examples can be cited as relevant to patriarchal and later Israelite culture. Marriage customs of Nuzi and the patriarchs converge when we hear Rachel and

Leah complain how their father Laban unfairly hoarded their dowry and left them nothing, contrary to provisions they expected under Nuzilike marriage arrangements (Gen. 31:14-16). In spite of this injustice, Laban later relied on the honor of Jacob to conform to the custom of not marrying additional wives (Gen. 31:50). In the case of infertility, both Rachel and Leah offered their maids as surrogate mates that would bear sons to their husband Jacob, a custom seen also at Nuzi (Gen. 30:1-13). Jacob's grandmother, Sarah, had done the same for Abraham (Gen. 16:1-4), assuming as one would have in Nuzi that the child would be hers (v. 2). Up to that point Abraham had despaired that his servant Eliezer was his only legal heir, hinting that he had adopted Eliezer for this purpose, according to Nuzi custom (Gen. 15:2). Two further parallels in the area of inheritance are found in Jacob's verbally removing Reuben's privileges as the first born because of his sin against his father (Gen. 49:2-4), and the transfer of inheritance between the brothers Esau and Jacob (Gen. 25:27-34). Both cases indicate prerogatives provided in Nuzi law. Though the exact reason why Rachel stole her father's idols is not explained (Gen. 31:19,27-32), the importance of possessing one's father's idols appears at Nuzi as well. Nuzi parallels with Israelite law are also very interesting. The double portion granted to the firstborn on the basis of Deut. 21:15-17 (cp. Gen. 48:21-22), the occasional rights of daughters to be heirs (Num. 27:8), and cancellation of debts after so many years (Deut. 15:1-3) are examples.

The name “Hebrew” for an alien as Joseph was in Egypt (Gen. 39:13-14), and as the Israelites were in that country (Exod. 1:15-19) or while in Philistia (1 Sam. 14:21), is very similar to the same use of the term habiru found in the Nuzi documents and elsewhere. This sheds light on the perpetual discussion of the source and meaning of this significant name for the Israelites. NYMPHA (Nīm' pha) or NYMPHAS (Nīm' phás) Christian host of a house church, likely in Laodicea (Col. 4:15). Because the name occurs only in the accusative case, it is not possible to determine whether it is masculine or feminine. Modern translations follow the best Greek manuscripts in reading “her house” and using the feminine name Nympha. The KJV followed other manuscripts reading “his house” and thus used the masculine form Nymphas, an abbreviation of Nymphadorus meaning “gift of nymphs.”

OATHS Statements by which a person promises or guarantees that a vow will be kept or that a statement is, in fact, true. In the OT the name of God was invoked as the One who would guarantee the results or veracity of a statement. Oaths were often accompanied and evidenced by the raising of a hand or hands toward heaven or by placing the hand under the thigh (Gen. 14:22; 24:2-3; Dan. 12:7).

Old Testament In Israel oaths were often announced at a sacred place and a prophet or priest would preside over the oath ceremony. If someone violated the oath, it was considered a serious matter. Using the Lord's name in an oath directly appealed to Him for involvement in the oath. Thus He is established as the supreme Enforcer and Judge in the oath. Those who violated oaths were considered to have defiled the name of the Lord (Lev. 19:12; Ezek. 17:13-18). Often oaths included a curse intended to carry the conviction that the one taking the oath was making a true statement. The more serious the oath the more terrible the curse would be to enforce the oath.

A common formula for oaths is seen in the phrase, “May the LORD do so to me and worse, if” (Ruth 1:17; 1 Sam. 14:44). At times a ruler might use his name joined with an oath to enforce an oath's truthfulness (1 Sam. 20:13; 2 Sam. 3:8-10). Thus the oaths carried a curse that supported the veracity of the statement, and they called God to be the witness and judge of the oath.

An oath reinforced God's promises to His people (Gen. 26:3). There were boundaries clearly stated in the Law concerning vows and their disposition (Num. 30). Because of the risk of perjury or breaking an oath, there are a number of admonitions against oaths (Exod. 20:7; Lev. 19:12; Jer. 34:18-20). There are also examples of the consequences of making an oath in a rash manner (Judg. 11:30-36).

New Testament There appears to be a subtle difference in the NT when it comes to the issue of oaths. Jesus did not use oaths to confirm the authority of His teaching. He pointed to a higher ethic that rests upon the integrity of the child of God as one not needing to prove his veracity by affirming an oath. So in the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus exhorts His followers to refrain from oaths, and, “But let your word 'yes' be 'yes' and your 'no' be 'no.' Anything more than this is from the evil one” (Matt. 5:33-37 HCSB).

The admonition of Jesus to His followers to have honesty in their speech does not discount the use of oaths in the NT. Though Jesus did not use oaths when Caiaphas placed Him under oath, He accepted the challenge and declared Himself to be the promised Messiah of Israel (Matt. 26:63-64).

Paul, like Jesus, condemned lying and perjury (1 Tim. 1:10). Paul did use oaths of a type when he called upon God to be a witness to his holy, righteous, and blameless behavior (1 Thess. 2:10), his gentleness towards the believers (2 Cor. 1:23), and his service and love towards them (Rom. 1:9; Phil. 1:8).

Jesus emphasized the integrity and sincerity that should exist between people. Oaths should be rarely used and are left for serious cases. A current application of proper oath taking would be when a witness in a court of law takes an oath before God to tell the truth.

OBADIAH (O bá di' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh's servant.” 1. Person in charge of Ahab's palace. He was devoted to Yahweh and saved Yahweh's prophets from Jezebel's wrath. He was the go-between for Elijah and Ahab (1 Kings 18:3-16). 2. Descendant of David through Hananiah (1 Chron. 3:21). 3. Son of Izrahiah of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3). 4. Son of Azel of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44). 5. Levite who returned to Jerusalem with the first of the Babylonian exiles (1 Chron. 9:16). 6. Gadite who joined David, along with Ezer and Eliab. Obadiah was second in command behind Ezer (1 Chron. 12:8-9). 7. Father of Ishmaiah, an officer from the tribe of Zebulun who served in David's army (1 Chron. 27:19). 8. One of five officials Jehoshaphat sent throughout the cities of Judah to teach "the book of the law of the LORD" (2 Chron. 17:7-9). See Jehoshaphat. 9. Levite descended from Merari appointed by Josiah to oversee the repairing of the temple (2 Chron. 34:12). See Josiah. 10. Priest who returned from Babylonian exile to Jerusalem with Ezra (Ezra 8:9). He joined other priests along with princes and Levites in putting his seal upon the covenant (Neh. 9:38) made between the people and God (Neh. 10:5). 11. Gatekeeper and guardian of "the ward" (KJV), "the storehouses of the gates" (NASB) during the leadership of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. 12:25).

OBADIAH, BOOK OF Shortest book of the Minor Prophets, preserving the message of the Prophet Obadiah.

The Prophet No source outside his book mentions Obadiah. "Obadiah" is a common name in the OT. Meaning "servant of Yahweh," it reflects his parents' faith and spiritual ambitions for their child. The title "The vision of Obadiah" turns attention to the divine author, "vision" being a technical term for a prophetic revelation received from God.

The Situation Historically, the book belongs to the early postexilic period at the end of the sixth century B.C. Its central section, verses 10-14, deals with the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians in 586 B.C., concentrating on the part the Edomites played in that tragic event. Edom was a state to the southeast of Judah. Despite treaty ties ("brother," v. 10) the Edomites, along with others, had failed to come to Judah's aid and had even helped Babylon by looting Jerusalem and handing over refugees. Moreover, the Edomites filled the vacuum caused by Judah's exile by moving west and annexing the Negev to the south of Judah and even its southern territory (cp. v. 19).

Judah reacted with a strong sense of grievance. Obadiah's oracle responded to an underlying impassioned prayer of lament, like Pss. 74; 79; or 137, in which Judah appealed to God to act as providential trial Judge and Savior to set right the situation.

The Message The response begins with a prophetic messenger formula which reinforces the thrust of the title that God is behind the message. Verses 2-9 give the divine verdict. Addressing Edom, God promised to defeat those supermen and topple the mountain capital which reflected their lofty self-conceit. Their allies would let them down, and neither their famed wisdom nor their warriors would be able to save them. This seems to look fearfully ahead to the Nabateans' infiltration from the eastern desert and their eventual takeover of Edom's traditional territory. The end of verse 1 appears to be a report from the prophet that already a coalition of neighboring groups was planning to attack Edom.

The catalog of Edom's crimes (vv. 10-14) functions as the accusation that warranted God's verdict of punishment. Repetition raises "day" to center stage. The underlying thought is that Judah had been the victim of "the day of the LORD" when God intervened in judgment and had drunk the cup of God's wrath (vv. 15-16; cp. Lam. 1:12; 2:21). In OT theology the concept of the day of the Lord embraces not only God's people but also their no-less-wicked neighbors. This wider dimension is reflected in verses 15-16 (cp. Lam. 1:21). The fall of Edom was to trigger this eschatological event in which order would be restored to an unruly world. Then would come the vindication of God's people, not for their own sakes but as earthly witnesses to His glory; and so "the kingdom will be the LORD'S" (Obad. 21).

The Meaning Like the book of Revelation, which proclaims the downfall of the persecuting Roman Empire, the aim of Obadiah is to sustain faith in God's moral government and hope in the eventual triumph of His just will. It brings a pastoral message to aching hearts that God is on the throne and cares for His own.

Outline

- I. God Knows and Will Judge the Sins of His People's Enemies (vv. 1-14).
 - A. Pride deceives people into thinking they can escape God's judgment (vv. 1-4).
 - B. Deceitful people will be deceived by their "friends" (vv. 5-7).

- C. Human wisdom cannot avoid divine judgment (vv. 8-9).
 - D. Conspiracy against “brothers” will not go unpunished (vv. 10-14).
- II. The Day of the Lord Offers Judgment for the Nations but Deliverance for God's People (vv. 15-21).
- A. Sinful people will receive just recompense (vv. 15-16).
 - B. God will deliver His people in holiness (vv. 17-18).
 - C. God's remnant will be restored (vv. 19-20).
 - D. The kingdom belongs to God alone (vv.21).

OBAL (Ō' bāl) Personal name meaning “stout.” Son of Joktan and ancestor of an Arab tribe (Gen. 10:28). At 1 Chron. 1:22 the name takes the alternate form Ebal.

OBED (Ō' bēd) Personal name meaning “serving.” 1. Son of Boaz and Ruth (Ruth 4:13-17), father of Jesse, and grandfather of King David. He was an ancestor of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:5; Luke 3:32). 2. Son of Ephlal and father of Jehu (1 Chron. 2:37-38). 3. One of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:47). 4. Gatekeeper in Solomon's temple (1 Chron. 26:7). 5. Father of Azariah, a commander assisting in coronation of King Josiah (2 Chron. 23). See Athaliah.

OBED-EDOM (Ō bēd-ē' dom) Personal name meaning “serving Edom.” 1. Philistine from Gath who apparently was loyal to David and Israel. At Obed-edom's house David left the ark of the covenant following the death of Uzzah at the hand of God (2 Sam. 6:6-11). Obed-edom was unusually blessed of God (probably a reference to prosperity) during the three months the ark was at his house. 2. Levite who served as both gatekeeper and musician in the tabernacle in Jerusalem during David's reign (1 Chron. 15:18,24; 16:5). His duties related especially to the ark of the covenant. A guild of Levites may have adopted the name “Obed-edom” as their title as keepers of the ark. 3. Member of the Korhites (1 Chron. 26:1,4-8) who kept the south of the temple (v. 15). 4. Keeper of the sacred vessels of the temple. Joash of Israel took with him the sacred vessels to Samaria following his capture of Jerusalem and of Amaziah king of Judah (2 Chron. 25:23-24).

OBEDIENCE To hear God's Word and act accordingly. The word translated "obey" in the OT means "to hear" and is often so translated. In the NT several words describe obedience. One word means "to hear or to listen in a state of submission." Another NT word often translated "obey" means "to trust."

The person's obedient response to God's Word is a response of trust or faith. Thus, to really hear God's Word is to obey God's Word (Exod. 19:5; Jer. 7:23).

The Bible views disobedience as a failure to hear and do God's Word (Ps. 81:11). Israel's story was one of a nation who failed to hear or to listen to God (Jer. 7:13; Hos. 9:17). Jesus warned: "Anyone who has ears should listen!" (Matt. 11:15 HCSB).

Obedience does affect one's spiritual life. It is essential for worship (1 Sam. 15:22; John 4:23-24). The obedience of faith brings about salvation (Rom. 1:5; 10:16-17). Obedience secures God's blessings (John 14:23; 1 John 2:17; Rev. 22:14). Spiritual insight is gained through obedience (John 7:17). A life of obedience to God is the fruit of faith (James 2:21-26).

True obedience means imitating God in holiness, humility, and love (1 Pet. 1:15; John 13:34; Phil. 2:5-8). True disciples do the will of God (Matt. 7:21). Facing clashing claims for one's allegiance, the Christian obeys God rather than other persons (Acts 5:29).

What motivates us to obey God? Obedience springs from gratitude for grace received (Rom. 12:2). Christians obey God as an expression of their spiritual freedom (Gal. 5:13; 1 Pet. 2:16). Jesus taught that our love for God motivates us to obey Him (John 14:21,23-24; 15:10).

How does obedience affect our relationships with others? The Bible speaks of obedience from the wife to the husband (Eph. 5:22), from children to their parents (Eph. 6:1), from slaves to masters (Col. 3:22).

Obedience with joy should be shown to church leaders (1 Thess. 5:12-13). Obedience is expected from all Christians to persons in authority (1 Pet. 2:13-14).

The NT places special emphasis on Jesus' obedience. Christ's obedience stands in contrast to Adam's disobedience (Rom. 5:12-21). A desire to obey the will of God motivated Jesus' actions (Luke 4:43; John 5:30). Jesus acted and spoke only as the Father directed (John 3:34). By living a life of obedience, Jesus showed Himself to be the Savior (Heb. 5:7-10). Christ's work on the cross is viewed as a sacrifice of obedience (Rom. 5:19; Heb. 10:7-10).

God has spoken in the Scriptures. Disobedience to God's Word comes from a sinful heart—a heart that will not trust God. Obedience comes from a heart that trusts God. If God's people obey Him, they find the blessings He yearns to give. If they disobey, believers receive judgment and necessary discipline.

OBEISANCE To bow down with one's face to the ground as a sign of homage and submission. KJV and RSV translate the Hebrew chavah as “obeisance” when the object of homage is a person but as “worship” when the object of homage is God or other gods (84 times in the RSV). Most often persons did obeisance to the king (1 Sam. 24:8; 2 Sam. 1:2; 9:6-8; 14:4) or a royal official (Gen. 43:28; Esther 3:2,5). Moses did obeisance before his father-in-law (Exod. 18:7). Saul did obeisance before Samuel's ghost (1 Sam. 28:14).

OBELISK Stone pillar used in worship, especially of the Egyptian sun god Amun-Re. Foursided and made from one stone, obelisks tapered to the top, where a pyramid rested. They apparently symbolized the rays of the rising sun and the hope of the pharaoh for rejuvenation and new vitality. At times they were used in tombs to represent hope for resurrection. A 4,000-year-old obelisk still stands in modern Matariyeh, ancient On. Another has been transplanted to Central Park in New York City. Many obelisks were built from about 1550 to about 1100 B.C. Some were more than 100 feet tall. The Hebrew term translated “obelisks” at Jer. 43:13 (NASB, NRSV, RSV) means pillar or standing stone (“sacred pillars,” NIV, REB). The Egyptian context suggests the pillars were in fact obelisks, perhaps dedicated to the sun-god Re. See On.

OBESITY Because most people in the ancient world constantly lived on the edge of starvation, obesity was neither an option nor, for most, something to be avoided. Only the rich could afford the luxury of being fat, and for this reason fatness became a mark of status and wealth.

Eglon, king of Moab, was “very fat” (Judg. 3:17,22) and Eli, high priest at Shiloh, was “heavy” (1 Sam. 4:18; cp. 2:29). Both men had attained a social position by which they could be “acceptably fat,” yet in both cases their fatness is portrayed as a narrative symbol of extravagance and slothfulness. The book of Proverbs similarly cautions that excessive eating and drinking is the mark of a fool (Prov. 23:20-21; cp. Phil. 3:19) and urges restraint (Prov. 23:1-3; 25:16).

Paul H. Wright

OBIL (O' bil) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “camel driver,” “tender,” or “mourner.” Overseer in charge of David's camels (1 Chron. 27:30).

OBLATION Gift offered at an altar or shrine, especially a voluntary gift not involving blood. KJV used “oblation” to translate four Hebrew words. Modern translations often replace “oblation” with either “offering” (Lev. 7:38; Isa. 1:13; Ezek. 44:30) or “gifts,” sometimes “contributions” (2 Chron. 31:14; Ezek. 20:40). RSV used “oblation” only at 1 Kings 18:29,36 where it replaced the “sacrifice” of the KJV, NIV, and NASB. See Sacrifice and Offering.

OBOTH (O' both) Place-name meaning “fathers” or “water skins.” A wilderness station (Num. 21:10-11; 33:43-44), perhaps identical with 'Ain el-Weiba near Panon (modern Feinan).

Fallen Egyptian obelisk at Rameses (Tanis).

OBSCENE OBJECT REB translation for an object the queen mother Maacah erected for the worship of Asherah, a fertility goddess (1 Kings 15:13; 2 Chron. 15:16). The precise nature of the image is unclear. The Vulgate or early Latin translation took the image to be a phallic emblem. Some recent interpreters have suggested a stylized palm tree as a symbol of fertility. Alternate translations include: idol (KJV); abominable image (NRSV); repulsive Asherah pole (NIV); and horrid image for Asherah (NASB). See Asherah; Fertility Cult.

OBSCURITY KJV term for gloom or darkness (Isa. 29:18; 58:10; 59:9).

OBSERVER OF TIMES KJV term for a soothsayer (Deut. 18:10, 14; cp. Lev. 19:26; 2 Kings 21:6; 2 Chron. 33:6). See Divination and Magic.

OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS Occupations and professions of ancient civilizations were, as in modern times, related to the natural resources, commerce, and institutions of the nations. Israel was no exception.

In the course of time, occupations developed from the simple task to the more complex and from unskilled to skilled labor. This evolution was spurred by Israel's shift from a nomadic existence to a settled life and from a clan-type government to that of the monarchy. The development of secular occupations paralleled the settlement of the people into towns and villages and the evolution of their government from a loose-knit tribal group to a nation involved in international politics. In earliest biblical times the Hebrews followed their herds from pastureland to pastureland and water hole to water hole, though at times they lived for long periods near major cities (Gen. 13:18; 20:1; 26:6; 33:19). Their occupations were centered in the family enterprise.

When Israel entered into Canaan, the Hebrews moved toward a settled existence. As a settled people agricultural pursuits became extremely important for survival. As the monarchy developed, many new occupations appeared within the biblical text, mostly to maintain the royal house. Finally, as villages grew larger, and commerce between cities and nations expanded, various trades and crafts expanded with them.

A sampling of the most common occupations and professions of the Bible are briefly described and grouped around the places where they were usually practiced: the home, the palace, the marketplace, and the religious occupations related to the church of Christianity and temple of Judaism.

Occupations around the Home The earliest occupations and professions mentioned in the Bible, as might be expected, are tasks and chores done at home. One of the principal duties around the home centered on food preparation. Baker (Gen. 40:5) is mentioned early in Scripture as a member of the Egyptian pharaoh's court. Baking bread was a frequent task performed in the Hebrew home long before it evolved into a specialized trade. Butler of the pharaoh's palace was also known as a cupbearer (Neh. 1:11; cp. Gen. 40:5, 21), one who was responsible for providing the king with drink. He, presumably, tasted each cup of wine before it was presented to the pharaoh as a precaution against poisoning. Cooks did the majority of the ancient people's food preparation (1 Sam. 9:23-24). Within the home female family members did the cooking. As cooking became an occupation outside of the home, men entered the trade. A related, and daily, chore of grinding grain fell to the grinder (Matt. 24:41) or miller, another trade which later entered the marketplace. See Mill.

The majority of persons in biblical times were involved in some form of food gathering or production. Fishermen (Isa. 19:8; Matt. 4:18) were one such group of food gatherers. The ancient fishermen's tools were not unlike his modern counterparts: fishing by hook and line, spears, and nets. The fisherman, and fishing, is mentioned often in Scripture, most notably as a metaphor as in Mark 1:17 when Jesus challenged Simon and Andrew to become “fishers of men.” Hunters (Jer. 16:16) form the second major group of food gatherers. The ancient hunter's success depended upon proficiency in the use of a bow and arrow, spear, traps and snares, and his knowledge of his prey. Nimrod (Gen. 10:9) is the first person to be designated a hunter in the Bible. Shepherds (Luke 2:8) were also engaged in food production. Those persons who have rule over others are often described in terms of the shepherd's duties. They were to care for and feed the people for whom they were responsible. Psalm 23 identifies the Lord as a Shepherd and vividly describes the duties of the keeper of the sheep. Given the rugged terrain of Palestine, the constant threat from wild animals, and the ceaseless search for water and pastureland, the responsibilities and dangers of the shepherd were great. Abel is the first to be described as a “keeper of sheep” (Gen. 4:2). Closely akin to the shepherd was the herdsman (Gen. 4:20). Jabal is described as one “having cattle.” The only distinction that might be made between a shepherd and herdsman is in their charges: the shepherd had sheep; the herdsman had cattle. Abel's brother Cain is identified as the first farmer (Gen. 4:2). The Bible calls the worker of land a “tiller” or “plower” (Ps. 129:3). He is closely associated with God in Scripture since it is God who instructs and works closely with him in producing the crops. Farm work involved the gleaner (Ruth 2:3), harvestman (Isa. 17:5), and reaper (Ruth 2:3). The harvestman and reaper are, apparently, two names for the same task. It is likely, also, that the farmer served as his own harvester. The gleaner is different. By gleaning what farmers left in the field, the poor and landless obtained food. See Agriculture; Fish; Gleaning; Hunter. Nomadic existence does not require any complicated structure of government. Rule was in the hands of the leader of each tribe. Some form of government became necessary, however, when towns and villages began to form. Before the coming of the monarchy, with its more centralized system of government, God chose judges (Judg. 2:16) to lead His people, especially in times of crisis. Since the crises were generally wars, the judges were primarily military leaders, who rescued the Israelite tribes from destruction by their warring neighbors. These and later judges also settled disputes (cp. Luke 18:2) See Judge.

Occupations around the Palace People who worked around the home could be found doing multiple tasks on any given day. Outside the home skills became more specialized. In Israel with the development of the monarchy, some of the Hebrews found employment within the palace. The king (1 Sam. 8:5) held first place. Many kings, among Israel's neighbors, were held to be gods; not so in Israel. The Israelite king was the political ruler and spiritual example and leader to his people. The king determined, by his obedience or disobedience to Israel's God, the fortunes of the nation, but he was never god. (Note, however, the poetic designation in Ps. 45:6). See King.

Joseph was a governor (Gen. 42:6) of Egypt. His position was second only to Pharaoh. He was, in fact, ruler (Gen. 41:43) over all the land of Egypt. Daniel was another Hebrew who enjoyed rule in a foreign nation. He was one of three administrators or commissioners (Dan. 6:2) given rule over the Median Empire. No information is given regarding his duties.

In NT times the Roman government used a deputy (Acts 13:7), also called a proconsul, to oversee the administrative responsibilities of its provinces. The Romans had extended their empire beyond the limits of the emperor's ability to rule personally. Deputies were used where the Roman army was unnecessary. Where a military presence was necessary, a governor (Matt. 27:2), or procurator, was used. The NT names only three men employed as governors in Palestine, although there were more: Pontius Pilate, Felix, and Festus. See Governor; Rome and the Roman Empire.

Beyond the task of governing, the palace provided ample opportunity for military occupations to develop. The armor-bearer (Judg. 9:54) was one of the servants provided for a warrior as he went into battle. The army was made up of men of various ranks and responsibilities. Many of the terms designating those in places of leadership are ambiguous and may refer to one and the same rank. The commander (Isa. 55:4) apparently referred to any leader among the people. It is possible that such ranks as captain, lieutenant, and prince, which could be included under the umbrella of “commander,” were, in the first place, military ranks alone. Soldiers (1 Chron. 7:4) are mentioned frequently in connection with the many wars recorded in the Bible. The geographical location of Israel put it in constant danger of invading armies. Every adult male (over the age of 20) within the tribes of Israel was expected to serve in the military. The Mosaic law, especially in the book of Numbers, set forth the regulations for establishing an army. See Arms and Armor.

The government included a corps of service and judicial personnel, as well. The jailer (Acts 16:23) is prominent in several NT passages. He had charge of all prisoners—political or religious. Under Roman rule the jailer was strictly responsible for the safekeeping of the inmates. If one were to escape, or otherwise be unable to complete his sentence, the jailer was liable to fulfill the sentence of the prisoner.

In addition to providing government and a military presence, nations found it necessary to collect taxes from their citizens. The despised publican or tax collector (Matt. 9:10) is wellknown from the NT. The principal duty was extorting as much in taxes as possible. It is believed, by some, that the publican was able to keep for himself any amount of monies collected beyond that levied by the government.

The scribe (Matt. 5:20), in addition to service in a religious fashion, served in an administrative capacity in the government as well. Scribes involved in the copying and interpretation of the law of Moses are known from the time of Ezra, who is identified as a “scribe skilled in the law of Moses” (Ezra 7:6). Within ancient governments scribes served the royal court, keeping records of the king's reign. Each king organized his government with advisors and people responsible for different areas. The Bible lists the organization of David (2 Sam. 8:16-18; 20:23-26) and Solomon (1 Kings 4:1-19). The exact responsibility of each official is difficult to determine as a look at different translations will show.

Work around the Marketplace The market place offered numerous opportunities for employment outside the home. These opportunities may be grouped around the sale of goods, many of which could be classified as arts and crafts, and dispensing of services.

A stonemason working at his craft.

Among early craftsmen the Sam. 5:11) had special meaning as the occupation of Jesus. Most of the biblical references to carpenters, however, are to foreign workers. Most notable are the workers of Hiram, king of Tyre, who labored on Solomon's temple. Associated with these craftsmen of wood are carpenter (2the feller (Isa. 14:8) and hewers (Josh. 9:21), both cutters of wood. The metalworkers identified in the Bible are the coppersmith (2 Tim. 4:14), the goldsmith (Neh. 3:8), and the silversmith (Acts 19:24) as workers in their respective metals. In more general terms metalworkers are identified as founders (Judg. 17:4) and smiths (1 Sam. 13:19). Oddly enough, miners are not directly mentioned in the biblical text, although craftsmen in various metals were numerous. The metals used by the craftsmen were often imported, though Israel may have controlled some mines near the Red Sea when they controlled those regions. See Mines and Mining.

In the sphere of salesmanship, the merchant (Gen. 23:16) or seller (Isa. 24:2) held a prominent position in commerce from the earliest biblical times. Their trade developed into one of international proportions. The potter (Jer. 18:2; Rom. 9:21) may have been one of the busiest men in the marketplace. The demands for his product would be great. Pottery was less expensive and more durable than other containers available to the Israelites, which accounts for its common use.

The mason sold his talent of cutting stone for building purposes (2 Kings 12:12), while the tanner (Acts 9:43) busied himself with preparing skins for use in clothing and as containers. Tent-making (Acts 18:3) must have been a craft learned from Israel's earliest days of seminomadic existence in the time of the patriarchs. This trade carried over into the NT period. Paul, Aquila, and Priscilla are said to have made their living by making tents (Acts 18:3).

Many services were offered in biblical times.

The apothecary or perfumer (Neh. 3:8) has been characterized as the equivalent of a modern druggist. His main task involved the compounding of drugs and ointments for medical purposes. Jewish religious practices suggest that making perfume was also a part of the apothecary's craft (Exod. 30:35).

The banker, called a lender (Prov. 22:7), suffered a poor reputation among the Jews. Their religious law forbade the lending of money for interest. In the NT these bankers were the infamous “money changers” of the temple. See Banking; Commerce.

The fuller (Mal. 3:2) may be best described as an ancient laundryman. He worked with soiled clothing and with the material from the loom ready for weaving. His service entailed the cleaning of any fabric.

A host (Luke 10:35), often thought of as an “innkeeper,” provided minimal accommodations for travelers, in some cases, little more than provision of space for erecting a tent or a place to lie down to sleep.

Among the most respected persons of Scripture was the master (James 3:1), more appropriately called an instructor or teacher (Rom. 2:20). Biblical references to this profession apply mainly to religious teaching, but the term suited anyone who offered instruction. See Education in Bible Times.

Prominent, throughout the Bible, are various occupations related to musical talents. Descriptive names include: singers and players (Ps. 68:25) in the OT, and musicians, harpists, flutists (pipers), and trumpeters (Rev. 18:22) in the NT. In both Testaments music played a significant part in the religious life and worship of the nation.

Occupations around the Church and Temple While “occupation” is not a technically accurate term when referring to the early church, there were “offices” filled by Christians, normally on a voluntary basis. See Offices in the New Testament.

The officers of the temple were much more authoritarian. The priest (Exod. 31:10) acted as an intermediary between God and the people who came to worship at the temple. In many cases priests sacrificed the offerings for the people and the nation, taking for themselves a share in the offering.

Priests also served as advisers to the king (2 Sam. 20:25). Until recently the prophet (Gen. 20:7) was looked upon as the antithesis of priesthood. Many of the prophets were hostile toward the abuses of the priests and the excesses of the priesthood, but they did not condemn the priesthood, itself. In fact, some prophets were members of the temple personnel. The prophets functioned mainly as “messengers” of their God. Where the priest was a “ritual” intermediary, the prophet was a “speaking” one. Their message, at times, had a predictive element in it; generally, however, they addressed the historical situation facing their hearers. See High Priest; Levite; Priests; Prophets; Temple.

Conclusion Occupations during the entire span of biblical times were many and varied, as they are today. However, they were occupations suited to a nontechnological society. The nation of Israel remained an agriculturally oriented economy throughout its existence as recorded in the biblical text.

OCHRAN (Ok' rān) (NASB, REB, NRSV) or OCRAN (KJV, NIV) Personal name meaning “troubler.” Father of Pagiel, a leader of the tribe of Asher (Num. 1:13; 2:27; 7:72,77; 10:26).

ODED (O' dēd) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “counter,” “restorer,” or “timekeeper.” 1. Father of the Prophet Azariah (2 Chron. 15:1). 2. Prophet in the time of Ahaz who urged the Israelites to release the people of Judah they had taken as prisoners of war (2 Chron. 28:8-15).

ODOR Scent or fragrance, usually in the phrase “pleasing odor” (KJV, “sweet savour”). A synonym for a burnt offering (Num. 28:1-2). See Sacrifice and Offering.

OFFAL NIV term for the waste remaining from the butchering of a sacrificial animal (Exod. 29:14; Lev. 4:11; 8:17; 16:27; Num. 19:5; Mal. 2:3). Other translations render the underlying Hebrew as “dung.”

OFFENSE Translates several Hebrew and Greek terms. The following two senses predominate. 1. That which causes indignation or disgust (Gen.

31:36). Here offense approximates crime (Deut. 19:15; 22:26), guilt (Hos. 5:15), trespass (Rom. 5:15,17-18,20), or sin (2 Cor. 11:7). Christ is said to be a rock of offense in this sense (Rom. 9:33; Gal. 5:11; 1 Pet. 2:8). What was especially offensive was the claim that an accursed one was the Messiah and that faith in this crucified one and not works was necessary for salvation. 2. That which serves as a hindrance (Matt. 16:23) or obstacle (2 Cor. 6:3). This hindrance is often temptation to sin (Matt. 18:7; Luke 17:1).

OFFICES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Although technical terms for “office” have been avoided in the NT, the concept of office is present. Formal characteristics in the NT associated with what we now call offices include permanency, recognition by others (possibly by a title), authority, payment, and appointment (including the laying on of hands). The first three elements are somewhat essential, the last two are not. Terms often associated with offices include apostles, prophets, evangelists, bishops, and deacons. The NT focus on these offices is usually on function or task more than status or position.

The term “apostle” occurs 80 times in the NT and has various referents. Most narrowly it applied to the 12 disciples. When Matthias replaced Judas, the requirement was one who had followed Jesus from His baptism to His ascension (Acts 1:21-22). Paul uses the term technically to refer to those who have seen the risen Lord (1 Cor. 9:1; 15:7-9) and who have been personally commissioned by Christ (e.g., Acts 9:15; Rom. 1:1). Thus Paul claims to be the last of the apostles (1 Cor. 15:7-8) and regards this office as the most significant (1 Cor. 12:28; Eph. 4:11). Most believe that the apostolate ceased in the first century due to the qualification of being an eyewitness of Jesus' resurrection (cp. Eph. 2:20).

Some of Paul's coworkers are also given the title of apostle. Barnabas is called an apostle in Acts 14:14 (cp. Acts 14:4; 1 Cor. 9:5-6). Although not directly named apostles, Apollos is possibly included in Paul's references to “us apostles” in 1 Cor. 4:9 (cp. 1 Cor. 4:6) and Silas in Paul's mention of “apostles of Christ” in 1 Thess. 2:6 (cp. 1 Thess. 1:1). Whether Andronicus and Junias were well-known “among the apostles” or “by the apostles” (Rom. 16:7) is debated.

A few times Paul uses the term nontechnically meaning “messenger.” Paul sent Titus and a brother as messengers (to the Corinthians in order to hasten their collection efforts (2 Cor. 8:23). Paul also states that Epaphroditus was a messenger (apostoloi)apostolos) sent by the Philippian church to bring him aid (Phil. 2:25). The term “apostle” is also applied to Jesus who is “the apostle and high priest of our confession” (Heb.3:1).

Often closely tied to the office of apostle is that of prophet. Prophets were those who regularly proclaimed the divine word to the community (1 Cor. 13:2; 14:22,29; Eph. 3:5; 2 Pet. 1:19-21). Their message was given directly from God and was considered authoritative. Because of the importance of the prophetic word and the possibility of this gift being abused, it was necessary that prophetic utterances be tested. The most extensive passage is found in 1 Cor. 14. Paul provides some guidelines for how prophets and other gifted individuals should conduct themselves in worship. He states that those who prophesy do so for the edification, exhortation, and comfort of the body (1 Cor. 14:3-5,26,31). Consequently Paul prefers that the congregation focus on prophecy more than speaking in tongues (1 Cor. 14:5,12,19,22-26). The prophets are to conduct themselves in an orderly fashion and others are to pass judgment on the validity of their utterances (1 Cor. 14:29-33,40). The importance of the prophets is seen in 1 Cor. 12:28 and Eph. 4:11, where they are listed second after apostles. Prophets mentioned by name include Anna (Luke 2:36), Judas and Silas (Acts 15:32), and Agabus (Acts 21:10). Prophets were in Jerusalem (Acts 11:27), Antioch (Acts 13:1), and Corinth (1 Cor. 14). Some believe that the office of prophet ceased shortly after the completion of the canon (cp. Eph. 2:20; Heb. 1:1-2).

The term “evangelist” is a derivative of the verb euangelizomai (“to announce good news” or “preach the gospel”). Evangelists are mentioned only three times in the NT. In Acts 21:8 Philip, one of seven chosen in Acts 6, is called “the evangelist.” Evangelists are named third in Eph. 4:11 after apostles and prophets. Finally, Timothy is exhorted by Paul to “do the work of an evangelist” (2 Tim. 4:5), which probably means to make known the truths of the gospel.

By the time the Pastoral Epistles were written, there appear to be two established offices in the local congregations, bishops and deacons. The terms “bishop” (or overseer) and “elder” (or presbyter) are used interchangeably, denoting the same office. Since the Greek word for bishop (episkopos) means “overseer,” the main function of the bishop was to oversee the spiritual life of the congregation. The qualifications for a bishop are given in 1 Tim. 3:1-7 and Titus 1:5-9 and focus on character more than duties. One of the distinguishing requirements between a bishop and a deacon was the bishop's ability to teach (1 Tim. 3:2; 5:17; Titus 1:9). Pastors and teachers (Eph. 4:11) appear to be those whom Christ has given to shepherd and instruct the church. As such it is probable that these leaders can also be identified as bishops or elders. (episkopos)

Although the term “deacon” comes from a Greek word (diakonos) meaning “servant” or “minister,” it is sometimes used technically referring to an office-holder in the church. In Phil. 1:1 Paul addresses the “bishops and deacons” and the qualifications for deacons are given in 1 Tim. 3:8-13. Another possible reference to official usage of the term is found in Rom. 16:1, where Paul mentions that Phoebe was a diakonos (diakonon) of the church at Cenchrea (cp. 1 Tim 3:11). The account of the appointing of seven men to aid in the distribution of food may provide the prototype for this office (Acts 6:1-6). The deacons' responsibility can probably be best described as a supporting role to the bishops (or elders). That is, they were responsible for taking care of those duties which would allow the bishops to devote themselves more freely to the word of God and prayer (1 Tim. 3:2; Titus 1:9; cp. Acts 6:2-4).

Other leaders are often mentioned without a specific office being named. In Gal. 6:6 Paul states that those who are taught the word should provide for the physical sustenance of their teachers. This text suggests that a class of teachers was giving formal Christian instruction and that they were teaching to such an extent as to need compensation for their labors. In 1 Thess. 5:12-13 Paul exhorts the congregation to respect and highly esteem those who diligently labor, lead, and admonish them. Although Paul does not use any formal title, it is possible that these leaders were, or later became known as, bishops or elders. Other leaders mentioned by Paul include Stephanas (1 Cor. 16:15-16), Epaphras (Col. 1:7; 4:12), and Archippus (Col. 4:17). Furthermore, in Heb. 13:17 the author instructs the congregation to obey their leaders and to submit to them. The reason for such respect is because these leaders keep watch over their souls and are accountable to God for such leadership.

Some have included the order of widows as an official “office” (1 Tim. 5:3-16). The reason for this is that Paul states that certain widows over 60 are to be “placed on the official support list” (1 Tim. 5:9 HCSB). It is difficult, however, to know how formal this “order” was and precisely what the widows' functions were.

Although offices are important in the church, the NT stresses that all believers share in the responsibility of ministry. Those who hold offices have been specially gifted by God. Yet all have gifts of service and all are expected to serve.

OFFSCOURING That which is removed by scouring: the dregs, filth, garbage, refuse, or scum (Lam. 3:45; 1 Cor. 4:13).

OG (𐤒𐤂) Amorite king of Bashan defeated by the Israelites before they crossed the Jordan (Num. 21:33-35; Deut. 1:4; 3:1-13). Og is identified as the last member of the Rephaim or giants (Deut. 3:11). The term translated “bed” (cp. Job 7:13; Amos 3:12) is perhaps better rendered “resting place” in the sense of burial place. Some interpreters suggest that this resting place was similar to black basalt sarcophagi found in Transjordan.

OHAD (𐤐 𐤁𐤃) Personal name meaning “unity.” Son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15). The name is omitted in parallel lists (Num. 26:12-14; 1 Chron. 4:24).

OHEL (ó'hèl) Personal name meaning “tent,” “family (of God),” or “(God is) shelter.” Descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:20).

OHOLAH (ó hō' lah) Personal name meaning “tent dweller.” A woman's name Ezekiel used to portray Samaria (Ezek. 23:1-10). Oholah and her sister Oholibah (Jerusalem) are shown as whores who consorted with various men (other nations). The obvious meaning is their spiritual adultery against God. God declared through the prophet that Samaria eventually would be delivered into the hands of her “lover,” Assyria (23:9).

OHOLIAB (ó hō' li ab) Personal name meaning “father's tent.” Danite craftsman, designer, and embroiderer who assisted Bezalel in supervision of the construction of the tabernacle and its equipment (Exod. 31:6; 35:34; 36:1-2; esp. 38:23).

OHOLIBAH (ó hōl' i bah) Personal name meaning “tent worshiper.” Younger sister in the allegory of Ezek. 23 identified with Jerusalem (23:4, 11-49). The sexual misconduct of these sisters represents Israel's and Judah's embrace of idolatry. See Ohalah.

OHOLIBAMAH (ó' hōl' i bā' mah) Personal name meaning “tent of the high place” or “tent dweller of the false cult.” 1. Hivite daughter of Anah and wife of Esau (Gen. 36:2). 2. Edomite leader descended from Esau (Gen. 36:41).

OIL Indispensable commodity in the ancient Near East for food, medicine, fuel, and ritual. Oil was considered a blessing given by God (Deut. 11:14), and the olive tree was a characteristic of the land which God gave to Israel (Deut. 8:8).

Preparation In biblical times domestic oil was prepared from olives. Sometimes oil was combined with perfumes and used as a cosmetic (Esther 2:12). The extraction of oil from olives is abundantly confirmed by archaeological findings of stone presses found at several sites in Palestine. This oil, called “beaten oil,” was lighter and considered the best oil. After the beaten oil was extracted, another grade of oil was produced by heating the pulp and pressing it again.

Ancient oil lamp decorated with two human figures.

Domestic oil was stored in small cruses, pots, or jars (1 Kings 17:12; 2 Kings 4:2); oil used in religious ceremonies was also kept in horns (1 Sam. 16:13).

Use Oil was used in a variety of ways in biblical times; but, most often, oil was used in the preparation of food, taking the place of animal fat. Oil was used with meal in the preparation of cakes (Num. 11:8; 1 Kings 17:12-16) and with honey (Ezek. 16:13), flour (Lev. 2:1,4), and wine (Rev. 6:6).

Oil was used as fuel for lamps, both in homes (Matt. 25:3) and in the tabernacle (Exod. 25:6).

Oil was extensively used in religious ceremonies. The morning and evening sacrifices required, in addition to the lambs, a tenth of a measure of fine flour and a fourth of a hin of beaten oil. Other cereal offerings also required oil. Oil was used during the offering of purification from leprosy.

In the NT oil was used to anoint a body in preparation for burial (Matt. 26:12; Mark 14:8). Several persons in the OT were anointed with oil: kings (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:13), priests (Lev. 8:30), and possibly prophets (1 Kings. 19:16; Isa. 61:1). Some objects were also anointed in dedication to God: the tabernacle and all its furniture (Exod. 40:9-11), the shields of soldiers (2 Sam. 1:21; Isa. 21:5), altars (Lev. 8:10-11), and pillars (Gen. 35:14).

As medicine oil or ointment was used in the treatment of wounds (Isa. 1:6; Luke 10:34). James 5:14 may refer either to a symbolic use of oil or to its medicinal use.

Oil was used cosmetically as protection against the scorching sun or the dryness of the desert (Ruth 3:3; Eccles. 9:8). Since olives were found in abundance in Palestine, olive oil was also used as a commodity of trade (1 Kings 5:11; Ezek. 27:17; Hos. 12:1).

Oil was regarded as a symbol of honor (Judg. 9:9), while virtue was compared to perfumed oil (Song 1:3; Eccles. 7:1). The abundance of oil was a demonstration of blessing and prosperity (Job 29:6; Joel 2:24). However, as a symbol of affluence, oil was also associated with the arrogance of the rich (Hb. "valley of oil"; KJV "fat valley," Isa. 28:1,4). Oil was a symbol of joy and gladness (Ps. 45:7), and in time of sorrow, anointing with oil was not practiced (2 Sam. 14:2). OINTMENT Perfumed unguents or salves of various kinds used as cosmetics, medicine, and in religious ceremonies. The use of ointments and perfumes appears to have been a common practice in the ancient Near East including the Hebrews. Terminology The OT uses various words to describe ointment. The most common, shemen, simply means "oil" (Gen. 28:18; Hos. 2:8). The OT does not distinguish between oil and ointment. In the NT, muron, "ointment" (Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3-4; Luke 7:37-38) was a perfumed ointment.

Manufacture The base for ointment was olive oil. Olives were very common in Palestine; however, perfumed salves were very expensive. A great demand arose for ointments as people attempted to protect themselves against the hot wind from the desert and the arid condition of the land.

The preparation of ointments was the job of skilled persons trained in the art of producing perfume. Bezaleel and Aholiab were appointed by God to prepare the sacred ointment and the incense used in worship (Exod. 31:1-11). While the blending of perfumes and ointment for secular use was probably done by women (1 Sam. 8:13), priestly families were responsible for the production of the large amount of ointments necessary for temple use (1 Chron. 9:30). In the postexilic period a group of professional people in Jerusalem were skilled in the manufacture of perfumed ointments (Neh. 3:8). These people were called “apothecaries” (KJV) or “perfumers” (HCSB, NASB, NRSV, NIV) (Exod. 30:25,35; 37:29; Eccles. 10:1). Their function was to take the many gums, resins, roots, and barks and combine them with oil to make the various ointments used for anointing purposes. In many cases, the formula for these ointments and perfumes was a professional secret, handed down from generation to generation. Egyptian and Ugaritic sources have shown that water mixed with oil was heated in large pots (Job 41:31). While the water was boiling, the spices were added. After the ingredients were blended, they were transferred to suitable containers. To preserve the special scents of the ointment, alabaster jars with long necks were sealed at the time the ointment was prepared and then broken just before use (Mark 14:3). Dry perfumes were kept in bags (Song 1:13) and in perfume boxes (Isa. 3:20 NRSV; NIV: “perfume bottles”; KJV: “tablets”). See Vessels and Utensils.

Ingredients Various spices were used in the manufacturing of ointments and perfumes: aloes (Ps. 45:8; John 19:39); balsam (Song 5:1,13; 6:2); galbanum (Exod. 30:34), myrrh, or more literally mastic or ladanum (Gen. 37:25; 43:11); myrrh (Esther 2:12; Matt. 2:11), nard (Song 4:13-14; Mark 14:3; KJV “spikenard”), frankincense (NIV “incense”; Isa. 60:6; Matt. 2:11); balsam or balm (Gen. 37:25; Jer. 8:22); cassia (Exod. 30:24; Ezek. 27:19), calamus (Exod. 30:23, NRSV “aromatic cane”; Song 4:14;), cinnamon (Exod. 30:23; Rev. 18:13), stacte (Exod. 30:34), and onycha (Exod. 30:34). Onycha, an ingredient derived from mollusks found in the Red Sea, was used in the mixture to be burned on the altar of incense. These spices were used as fragrant incense in worship. They were also mixed with oil to produce the holy anointing oil and to produce cosmetics and medicine.

Value Most of these spices were imported by the people who lived in Palestine. The great variety of spices used in the manufacture of ointments gave rise to merchants who traded in expensive spices and perfumes (Gen. 37:28; Ezek. 27:17-22). In biblical times Arabia was one of the principal traders in aromatic spices. Spices were also imported from Africa, India, and Persia. Perfumed ointments were highly prized. Solomon received an annual payment of perfume as tribute from his subjects (1 Kings 10:25); the queen of Sheba brought many costly spices as gifts to Solomon (1 Kings 10:2). Hezekiah, king of Judah, included valuable perfumed ointment and spices as part of his treasure (2 Kings 20:13; Isa. 39:2). When Mary anointed Jesus with a pound of costly ointment, Judas Iscariot rebuked Jesus because the ointment was worth the equivalent of one year's salary (John 12:3-8).

Use Many personal things were perfumed with spiced ointment. The breath was perfumed (Song 7:8), probably with spiced wine (Song 8:2). The garments of the king were perfumed with myrrh, aloes, and cassia (Ps. 45:8), or myrrh, frankincense, and with "every fragrant powder of the merchant" (Song 3:6 HCSB). The bed of the prostitute was perfumed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon (Prov. 7:17).

One of the most important uses of ointment in the OT was in religious ceremonies. The manufacture of the anointing oil consisted of mixing olive oil with myrrh, sweet cinnamon, calamus, and cassia (Exod. 30:22-25). This ointment was considered to be holy; anyone who manufactured the sacred oil for use outside the worship place was to be cut off from the people (Exod. 30:33). Many individuals were anointed with the sacred ointment. The anointing of a person was viewed as an act of designation of that person to the service of God. The shield of a soldier was anointed with oil (2 Sam. 1:21) as a symbol of dedication to God. Jacob anointed the pillar at Bethel, and the site where God appeared to him became a holy place (Gen. 28:18; 35:14). Ointments were used also in burial rites.

Many people in the ancient Near East believed strongly in the curative power of oil. For this reason they used ointments as medicine in the treatment of some diseases (Jer. 8:22; Mark 6:13; James 5:14) and as unguents for wounds (Isa. 1:6; Luke 10:34). The law of Moses commanded the person healed of leprosy to be anointed with oil (Lev. 14:15-18,26-29).

Ointments were used as cosmetics for protection of the skin. Perfumes were used to counteract bodily odor. The whole body was usually anointed with perfume after bathing (Ruth 3:3; 2 Sam 12:20; Ezek. 16:9). Perfumes were used inside the clothes (Song 1:13) and by women who desired to be attractive to men (Esther 2:12). See Anoint; Burial; Diseases; Oil.

OLD GATE KJV, NASB, NRSV designation for a Jerusalem city gate repaired in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 3:6; 12:39). This rendering is doubtful on grammatical grounds (the adjective and noun do not agree). Some interpreters thus propose gate of the old (city). Others take the Hebrew Yeshanah as a proper name (NIV, REB, TEV). A village named Jeshanah is located near Bethel. The gate may have pointed in this direction.

OLD TESTAMENT First part of the Christian Bible, taken over from Israel. It tells the history of the nation of Israel and God's dealings with them to the return from exile in Babylon. For Jews it is the complete Bible, sometimes called Tanak for its three parts (Torah or Law, Nebiim or Prophets, Kethubim or Writings). Christians see its complement in the NT, which reveals Jesus Christ as the fulfillment of OT prophecy. The OT has three major divisions: Law, Prophets (Former and Latter), and Writings. The Law (Genesis-Deuteronomy) begins with the creation of the world and concludes as Israel is about to enter the promised land. The Prophets—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the 12 Minor Prophets—continue with the nation in the land of Palestine until the exile and includes prophetic messages delivered to the nation. The Writings (all other books) contain the account of the return from exile, collected wisdom literature from throughout the nation's history, and selected stories about God's leading in individual lives. See Bible Formation and Canon.

OLD TESTAMENT QUOTATIONS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Influence of the OT is seen throughout the NT. The NT writers included approximately 250 express OT quotations, and if one includes indirect or partial quotations, the number jumps to more than 1,000. It is clear that the writers of the NT were concerned with demonstrating the continuity between the OT Scriptures and the faith they proclaimed. They were convinced that in Jesus the OT promises had been fulfilled.

Types of Quotations Formula quotations are introduced by a typical introductory quotations formula that generally employ verbs of “saying” or “writing.” The most common introductory formulas are: “as the Scripture has said” (John 7:38 HCSB); “what does the Scripture say?” (Gal. 4:30); “as it is written,” emphasizing the permanent validity of the OT revelation (Mark 1:2; Rom. 1:17; 3:10); “this took place to fulfill,” emphasizing the fulfillment of OT prophecies (Matt. 4:14; 12:17; 21:4); “as God said,” “He also says,” “the Holy Spirit says,” which personify Scripture and reflect its divine dimension (Rom. 9:25; 2 Cor. 6:16; Heb. 3:7); “Moses,” “David,” or “Isaiah” says, which emphasize the human element in Scripture (Rom. 10:16,19-20; Heb. 4:7).

Composite quotations combine two or more OT texts drawn from one or more of the sections of the Hebrew OT canon (Law, Prophets, and Writings). For example, Rom. 11:8-10 quotes from the Law (Deut. 29:4), the Prophets (Isa. 29:10), and the Writings (Ps. 69:22-23). In some cases a series of OT texts may be used in a commentarylike fashion as in John 12:38-40 and Rom. 9-11. Composite quotes are often organized around thematic emphases or catchwords in keeping with a practice common to Judaism and based on the notion set forth in Deut. 19:15 that two or three witnesses establish the matter. The “stumbling stone” motif reflected in Rom. 9:33 (Isa. 8:14; 28:16) and 1 Pet. 2:6-9 (Isa. 8:14; 28:16; Ps. 118:22) is a good example of this method.

Unacknowledged quotations are often woven into the fabric of the NT text without acknowledgment or introduction. For example, Paul quoted Gen. 15:6 in his discussion of Abraham (Gal. 3:6) and Gen. 12:3 (Gal. 3:8) with no acknowledgment or introductory formula.

Indirect quotations or allusions form the most difficult type of OT quotation to identify. The gradation from quotation to allusion may be almost imperceptible. An allusion may be little more than a clause, phrase, or even a word drawn from an OT text that might easily escape the notice of the reader. For example, the reader might easily miss the fact that the words spoken from the cloud at the transfiguration of Jesus as recorded in Matt. 17:5 combine three separate OT texts: “You are My Son” (Ps. 2:7 HCSB), “in whom My soul delights” (Isa. 42:1 NASB), and “you must listen to him” (Deut. 18:15).

Sources of Old Testament Quotations Since the NT was written in Greek for predominantly Greek readers, it is not surprising that a large majority of OT quotes in the NT are drawn from the Greek translation of the OT known as the Septuagint (LXX). Of Paul's 93 quotes, 51 are in absolute or virtual agreement with the LXX, while only 4 agree with the Hebrew text. This means that 38 diverge from all known Greek or Hebrew OT texts. Of Matthew's 43 quotes, 11 agree with the LXX, while the other 32 differ from all known sources. How then are these quotes to be explained? The NT writers may have used a version of the OT that is unknown to us, or they may have been quoting from memory. It is also possible that the NT writers were more concerned with meaning and interpretation. It has also been suggested that the OT quotations may have been drawn from “testimony books,” collections of selected, combined, and interpreted OT texts gathered by the early Christian community for proclamation and apologetics. The frequent use of certain OT texts, such as Ps. 110, Isa. 43, and so forth, in the preaching and writing of the early church and the discovery of such collections at Qumran seem to support such a possibility.

Uses of Old Testament Quotations The NT writers used OT quotations for at least four reasons: (1) to demonstrate that Jesus is the fulfillment of God's purposes and of the prophetic witness of the OT Scriptures (Rom. 1:2; Matt.

4:14; 12:17-21; 21:4-5); (2) as a source for ethical instruction and edification of the church (Rom. 13:8-10; 2 Cor. 13:1); (3) to interpret contemporary events (Rom. 9-11; 15:8-12); (4) to prove a point on the assumption that the Scripture is God's Word (1 Cor. 10:26; 14:21; 15:55). The approaches employed in the use of the OT are reflective of first-century Judaism as represented in the Dead Sea Scrolls, Philo of Alexandria, and later rabbinic Judaism. Some OT quotations are used in their literal historical sense and, therefore, have the same meaning in the NT as they had in the OT. The quotation of Ps. 78:24 in John 6:31 is a good example of such usage. Some quotations reflect a typical approach to interpreting the OT in first-century Judaism known as midrash. Midrash is an exposition of a text that aims at bringing out its contemporary relevance. The OT text is quoted and explained so as to make it apply to or be meaningful for the current situation. The use of Gen. 15:6 in Rom. 4:3-25 and the use of Ps. 78:24 in John 6:31-58 reflect such an approach.

Some OT texts are interpreted typologically. In this approach the NT writer sees a correspondence between persons, events, or things in the OT and persons, events, or things in their contemporary setting. The correspondence with the past is not found in the written text but within the historical event. Underlying typology is the conviction that certain events in the past history of Israel as recorded in earlier Scriptures revealed God's ways and purposes with persons in a typical way. Matthew's use of Hos. 11:1 (2:15) suggests that the Gospel writer saw a correspondence between Jesus' journey into Egypt and the Egyptian sojourn of the people of Israel. Jesus recapitulated or reexperienced the sacred history of Israel. The redemptive purposes of God demonstrated in the exodus (reflected by the prophet Hosea) were being demonstrated in Jesus' life. In some cases the understanding and application of the OT quotation is dependent on an awareness of the quotation's wider context in the OT. The use of the quotation is intended to call the reader's attention to the wider OT context or theme and might be referred to as a "pointer quotation." In first-century Judaism where large portions of Scripture were known by heart, it was customary to quote only the beginning of a passage even if its continuation was to be kept in mind. A good example of this use may be seen in Rom. 1-3. Paul had discussed both the faithfulness of God and the sinfulness of humanity. In Rom. 3:4 Paul quoted Ps. 51:4 to support his first point. He continued his argument with a further reference to human wickedness which is, in fact, the subject of Ps. 51:5; but he did not feel the need to quote the verse since it was already suggested to those familiar with the biblical text. Finally, there is a limited allegorical use of the OT text in which the text is seen as a kind of code having two meanings—the literal, superficial level of meaning, and a deeper, underlying meaning such as in Gal. 4:22-31.

An ancient olive press. Olives have been an export of Canaan for as many as 3,000 years before Christ.

The olive tree has always been one of the most important trees in Israel's culture and economy. It provided food, and the oil extracted was used for cooking, medicinal purposes, and light.

Despite similarities with contemporary Jewish use(s) of the OT, the NT writers interpreted the OT in a radically new way. New Testament writers did not deliberately use a different exegetical method. They wrote from a different theological perspective. The writers of the NT were convinced that the true meaning of the OT is Jesus Christ and that He alone provides the means of understanding it. True interpretation of the OT is achieved by reading OT passages or incidents in light of the event of Christ. While many of the OT texts quoted in the NT had already been accepted as messianic (e.g., Ps. 110:1) or could in light of Jesus' actual life claim to be messianic (Ps. 22; Isa. 53), for the early Christians, all Scripture was to be interpreted by the fact of Christ because it is to Him that the OT Scripture points (John 5:39). In summary, the NT writer quoted or alluded to the OT in order to demonstrate how God's purposes have been fulfilled and are being fulfilled in Jesus.

OLIVES See Agriculture; Ointment; Plants.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF Two-and-a-half milelong mountain ridge that towers over the eastern side of Jerusalem, or more precisely, the middle of the three peaks forming the ridge. Heavily covered with olive trees, the ridge juts out in a north-south direction (like a spur) from the range of mountains running down the center of the region. Both the central Mount of Olives and Mount Scopus, the peak on its northern side, rise over 200 feet above the Temple Mount across the Kidron Valley. It provided a lookout base and signaling point for armies defending Jerusalem.

David crossed the Mount of Olives when fleeing Absalom (2 Sam. 15:30). Ezekiel saw the cherubim chariot land there (Ezek. 11:22-23). Zechariah described how the Mount of Olives would move to form a huge valley on the Day of the Lord (Zech. 14:3-5). Many crucial events in Jesus' life occurred on the Mount of Olives (Matt. 26:30; Mark 11:1-2; Luke 4:5; 22:39-46; Acts 1:9-12).

OLIVET DISCOURSE [ōl' t vā] Jesus' major sermon preached on the Mount of Olives; Jesus gave instructions concerning the end of the age and the destruction of Jerusalem. The discourse (Matt. 24-25; Mark 13) is in part an apocalypse because it uses symbolic, visionary language that makes it a difficult passage to understand. Parts of it appear scattered throughout Luke 12-21. Meaning of the Signs (Matt. 24:4-8) The opening remarks warn against misplaced belief in deceptive signs which do not in any way signal the end of the world. These signs occurred in Jesus' day and preceded the destruction of Jerusalem, the event uppermost in Jesus' mind and for which He sought to prepare His disciples. They are still operative after 2,000 years, a further indication that they do not herald the end time.

The western slope of the Mount of Olives on which Jesus gave His Olivet discourse.

Time of Persecution (Matt. 24:9-14) These verses suggest a time of severe distress. Many would say that the reference is to a period of ultimate suffering that is to take place just before the Parousia (Christ's return or second coming; 24:14). Jesus' assertion that the gospel must be preached worldwide seems to strengthen this view. "The one who endures to the end" (24:13 HCSB) could refer to the period immediately prior to the Parousia. It could also pertain to the end of some other event such as the destruction of Jerusalem. Oppression of Christians and family betrayal were common. That Christians were despised and subjected to great suffering is an accurate description of the situation in Judea before the Jewish War, A.D. 66-70, when Titus destroyed the city.

Abomination that Makes Desolate (Matt. 24:15-22) Extrabiblical histories describe the desecration of the Jerusalem temple in 167 B.C. by Antiochus Epiphanes, who built an altar there to Zeus. That event is usually seen as having fulfilled Daniel's prophecy (Dan. 11:31). However, Jesus applied the prophecy to a future overthrow of Jerusalem by Titus' armies. The horror of this siege was unprecedented. Temple and city were utterly demolished. See Intertestamental History and Literature.

Second Coming of Christ (Matt. 24:26-25:46) Jesus spoke in veiled language about His coming. Unnatural occurrences in the heavens were commonly used in apocalyptic writings to describe the indescribable but also to screen deliberately from view those things meant to remain hidden. Much of God's plans are mystery, but Jesus disclosed enough. The coming of the Son of Man will be entirely public and “at an hour you do not expect” (Matt. 24:44 HCSB). He will come in the clouds with great power (Acts 1:9-11). The sign of His Parousia is obscure in its meaning. The sermon is interrupted by the statement, “This generation will certainly not pass away until all these things take place” (Matt. 24:34). Jesus was not confused or in error concerning these events. He referred to the destruction of Jerusalem that took place in that generation as a foretaste of the final coming. Concluding parables teach the necessity of remaining watchful. A description of final judgment ends the discourse. Its basic message is a call to be prepared when Jesus does return.

OLYMPAS (Ō līm' pás) Perhaps a shortened form of Olympiodorus (gift of Olympus). Christian whom Paul greeted in Rom. 16:15. Olympas was apparently a member of a house church including the others mentioned in 16:15.

OMAR (Ō' mar) Personal name meaning “talkative.” Son of Eliphaz and ancestor of an Edomite clan of the same name (Gen. 36:11,15; 1 Chron. 1:36).

OMEGA (Ō má' gá) Last letter in the Greek alphabet. Together with the first letter, alpha, omega designates God and Christ as the all-encompassing “Reality” (Rev. 1:8; 21:6; 22:13). See Alpha.

OMEN 1. Sign used by diviners to predict the future. The Israelites were prohibited from interpreting omens (Deut. 18:10 NASB, NIV). Pagan prophesy employed reading of omens (Num. 24:1 NASB, NRSV; Ezek. 21:21 NIV). As Lord of history God frustrates the plans of “liars” who interpret omens (Isa. 44:25 NASB, NRSV). See Divination and Magic. 2. Sign indicating a future event. Ahab's reference to Ben-hadad as “my brother” was understood as an omen or sign of Ahab's favor (1 Kings 20:33 NASB, NRSV). Companions of the high priest Joshua were a good omen (NRSV) or a symbol (NASB) of hope for a restored people of God (Zech. 3:8). The faithful witness of Christians in the face of opposition is likewise an omen or sign pointing to the salvation of believers and the destruction of God's enemies (Phil. 1:28).

OMER (Ō' mēr) 1. Unit of dry measure equal to one tenth of an ephah or a little more than two quarts (Exod. 16:13-36). See Weights and Measures. 2. First sheaf (omer) of the barley harvest that was elevated as an offering (Lev. 23:9-15). See Sacrifice and Offering.

OMNIPOTENCE State of being all-powerful, which theology ascribes to God. Scripture often affirms that all power belongs to God (Ps. 147:5), that all things are possible for God (Luke 1:37; Matt. 19:26), and that God's power exceeds what humans can ask or think (Eph. 3:20). For Scripture God's omnipotence is not a matter of abstract speculation but a force to be reckoned with. God's power is revealed in God's creating and sustaining the universe (Ps. 65:6; Jer. 32:17; Heb. 1:3), in God's deliverance of Israel from Pharaoh's forces (Exod. 15:1-18), in the conquest of Canaan (Deut. 3:21-24), in the incarnation (Luke 1:35), in Christ's death on the cross (1 Cor. 1:17-18,23-24), and in the ongoing ministry of the church (1 Cor. 2:5; Eph. 3:20). See God.

OMNIPRESENCE Being present everywhere at once; one of God's unique attributes. One of the characteristics of created objects is that they are limited by space. An object or person can occupy only one place at a time. Because God created the heavens and the earth (Gen. 1:1) and through His Son continually sustains all that is (Heb. 1:3), He is present to the whole of creation and to its parts. King David realized that there was nowhere he could go to escape God's presence (Ps. 139:7-12), and no conditions such as darkness could hide him from God. Even though God is present everywhere, He is not perceived everywhere. He can be fully present and yet hidden from the eyes of creatures, or He can make His presence felt either in blessing or judgment. See God.

OMNISCIENCE State of being all knowing, which theology ascribes to God. Though Scripture affirms God's immeasurable understanding (Ps. 147:5), God's omniscience is not a matter of abstract speculation. Rather, God's knowing is a matter of personal experience. God knows us intimately (Ps. 139:1-6; Matt. 6:4,6,8). Such knowledge is cause for alarm for the unrighteous but for confidence for God's saints (Job 23:10; Pss. 34:15-16; 90:8; Prov. 15:3; 1 Pet. 3:12). See God.

OMRI (Om' ri) Personal name meaning "pilgrim" or "life." 1. King of Israel 885-874 B.C. and founder of the Omride dynasty, which ruled until 842.

Omri came to the throne in a very odd manner. Zimri, a chariot captain in Israel's army, assassinated King Elah and took control of the palace of Tirzah (1 Kings 16:8-15). Half of the people rebelled and installed Omri ("commander of the army," v. 16 NASB) as king. When Zimri realized his situation was hopeless, he burned the palace down upon himself. Omri became king only after successfully opposing another rebellion in the person of Tibni (vv. 21-22). In his reign of 11 years, Omri's greatest accomplishment was to buy the hill of Samaria and build the capital of Israel there. He was succeeded by his son Ahab. Assyrian sources continued to call Israel "the land of Omri." Micah accused Jerusalem of following Omri's actions and also his son Ahab's. That was grounds for God's destroying Jerusalem (Mic. 6:16). 2. Officer of the tribe of Issachar under David (1 Chron. 27:18). 3. Grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8). 4. Grandfather of a member of the tribe of Judah who returned to Jerusalem from exile about 537 B.C.

ON (𐤀) 1. Egyptian place-name meaning “city of the pillar,” called in Greek Heliopolis or “city of the sun” and in Hebrew Bethshemesh, “city of the sun” (Jer. 43:13) and Aven. It was the cult center for the worship of the sun-god, Re (Atum). Although not important politically, the city became a vital religious center very early in Egypt's history. Located at Matariyeh about five miles northeast of modern Cairo, the city endured as a cult center until very late. Joseph's Egyptian wife came from On (Gen. 41:45), her father serving as priest in the temple there. Speaking in Egypt, Jeremiah warned that God would destroy On and its worship (Jer. 43:13). Ezekiel or the scribes copying his work substituted Aven, Hebrew for “trouble, deceit,” for On in pronouncing judgment on it (Ezek. 30:17). 2. Personal name meaning “powerful, rich.” Member of tribe of Reuben who was one of the leaders challenging authority of Moses (Num. 16:1).

ONAM (Ō' nām) Personal name meaning “vigorous.” 1. Ancestor of an Edomite subclan (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chron. 1:40). 2. Ancestor of a family of Jerahmeelites, a subclan of Judah (1 Chron. 2:26,28).

ONAN (Ō' nān) Personal name meaning “power.” A son of Judah and his Canaanite wife, Shuah (Gen. 38:2-8). Following the death of his older brother, Er, Onan was to have married the widow and produced a son who would carry on Er's name. Onan repeatedly failed to complete the responsibilities of the marriage and thus God killed him (38:8-10). See Levirate Law, Levirate Marriage.

ONESIMUS (Ō nēs' ɪ mūs) Personal name that may mean “profitable.” The slave for whom Paul wrote his letter to Philemon. In his letter Paul pled with Philemon to free the servant because Onesimus had been so helpful to the apostle. Onesimus had robbed his master, escaped, met Paul, and accepted Christ. In sending him back to Philemon, Paul urged the owner to treat the slave as a Christian brother (v. 16).

Later, Onesimus accompanied Thychius in bearing Paul's letter to the church at Colossae (Col. 4:7-9). Two traditions connect Onesimus with a bishop of that name in the second-century church and with Onesiphorus in 2 Tim. 1:16. Neither connection has been proven satisfactorily. See Philemon, Letter to.

ONESIPHORUS (Ō nē siph' ō rūs) Personal name meaning “profit bearing.” Ephesian Christian praised for his effort to seek out the place of Paul's arrest, his disregard of the shame connected with befriending one in chains, and his past service in Ephesus (2 Tim. 1:16-18). The greeting of and prayer for the household of Onesiphorus (2 Tim. 1:16; 4:19) has suggested to some that he was already dead. All that can be assumed is that Onesiphorus was not at Ephesus.

ONLY BEGOTTEN KJV alternate rendering of the Greek adjective monogenes (John 1:14,18; 3:16,18; Heb. 11:17; 1 John 4:9). Elsewhere the KJV rendered the term “only [child]” (a son in Luke 7:12; 9:38; a daughter in 8:42). KJV, NKJV, NASB render monogenes as “only begotten [son]” when referring to Jesus (cp. NASB margin, “unique, only one of His kind”), but most modern translations (ESV, NAB, NJB, NLT, NRSV, REB, TEV) render the term consistently as “only.” NIV, HCSB render the term “One and Only [Son].”

The term monogenes is related to Greek monos, “only,” and genes, “offspring, race, kind,” suggesting the meaning “only one of its kind, unique” for monogenes. Four times the Septuagint (Greek translation of the Hebrew Old Testament) uses monogenesto to translate Hebrew yachid, “only” (Judg. 11:34 [“only child”]; Pss. 22:20 [“my very life”]; 25:16 [“alone”]; 35:17 [“my very life”]). In Gen. 22 referring to Isaac as Abraham's “only son” (vv. 2, 12,16) and a few other places, the Septuagint rendered yachid with agapetos, “beloved.”

Although unicus, “only,” had been used in the Old Latin to translate monogenes, Jerome (A.D. 340?-420) replaced it with unigenitus, “only begotten,” in the Latin Vulgate, from which derives the traditional English rendering. Jerome's concern was to refute the Arian doctrine that claimed the Son was not begotten but made. This led Jerome to impose the terminology of the Nicene Creed (A.D. 325) onto the NT.

Monogenes is used for an only child (Luke 7:12; 8:42; 9:38), but the writer of Hebrews used monogenes of Isaac with full knowledge that Isaac was not Abraham's only child (Heb. 11:17-18). Here monogenes designates Isaac as Abraham's son in a unique sense, the special child of promise through whom Abraham's descendants would be named.

Believers are rightly called huiioi, “sons” of God by adoption in Christ (Matt. 5:9; Luke 20:36; Rom. 8:14,19; 9:26; Gal. 3:26; 4:6-7; Rev. 21:7), but John used monogenes to designate the unique relationship of eternal Sonship that Jesus has with God. Being fully God and of the same nature as God the Father, Jesus the Son alone can make God's glory known (John 1:14,18; cp. Heb. 1:1-3). As the "One and Only Son," Jesus is the unique gift of God, the giving of God's own self for salvation (John 3:16; 1 John 4:9). Because Jesus is the unique representative of God, rejection of Jesus means rejection of God, resulting in swift condemnation (John 3:18).

ONO (Ō' nō) Name meaning "grief." Benjaminite town about seven miles southeast of Joppa. The town appears in a list of Pharaoh Thutmose III (1490-1436 B.C.). The Mishnah regarded Ono as fortified since the time of Joshua. The city was rebuilt by Shemed, a descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:12). Ono was home to some of those who returned from exile (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37; 11:35). Ono is identified with Kefr' Ana in the Wadi Musrara. This broad wadi is called the valley of craftsmen (Neh. 11:35) and the Plain of Ono (Neh. 6:2).

ONYCHA (Ōn' 1 ká) Spice probably derived from the closing flaps or the shell of a Red Sea mollusk which was used in the incense reserved for the worship of Yahweh (Exod. 30:34).

OPHEL (Ō' phēl) Place-name meaning "swelling," "fat," "bulge," or "mound." It became the proper name of a portion of the hill on which the city of David was built (2 Chron. 27:3). The Ophel was just south of Mount Moriah, on which the temple was constructed, joining the old city with the area of Solomon's palace and temple. The hill has been inhabited since pre-Israelite times by peoples such as the Jebusites from whom David took the site. David and later kings further fortified Ophel. It served as the living quarters for those who rebuilt the ramparts following the exile (Neh. 3:26-27). This may reflect a gradual extension of the name to an ever-larger area. Micah used the Hebrew term to name "the strong hold of the daughter of Zion" (4:8 KJV). Isaiah warned that the "forts" or "hill" (NASB) would be destroyed (32:14). The Hebrew term is used with an uncertain meaning in 2 Kings 5:24 for “tower,” “hill,” (NASB), “citadel” (NRSV). The term also occurs on the Moabite stone.

OPHIR (O' phir) Placename and personal name meaning “dusty.” Place famous in the ancient Near East for its trade, especially in gold. Solomon's ships with help from Phoenician sailors brought precious goods from Ophir (1 Kings 9:28; 10:11; cp. 1 Kings 22:48). Gold from Ophir was apparently highly valued, the phrase becoming a stock descriptive term in ancient Near Eastern commercial language (Isa. 13:12; Job 22:24; 28:16; Ps. 45:9). Ophir is mentioned outside the Bible on a piece of broken pottery found at Tell el-Qasileh, north of Tel Aviv on the Plain of Sharon. This inscription reads, “Gold of Ophir for Beth-horon, 30 shekels.”

The geographical location of Ophir is disputed among biblical scholars. Three regions have been suggested: India, Arabia, and Africa. Scholars who support an Indian location do so because of the resemblance of the Septuagint (the Greek translation of the OT) form of Ophir to the Egyptian name for India. The available evidence with regard to trade practices indicates that Egyptian, Phoenician, and Greek fleets obtained eastern goods indirectly through ports in South Arabia and East Africa.

Other scholars have suggested that Ophir was located on the Arabian Peninsula. At least five areas have been identified, but the evidence for certainty with regard to any of them is lacking. The strongest argument for an Arabian location is the occurrence of the name Ophir among the names of Arabian tribes, descendants of Joktan, in the Table of Nations in Gen. 10.

Finally, one location in Africa has been suggested: the East African coast in the general vicinity of Somaliland. This location is supported because of its distance from Palestine and the products that are characteristic of Africa that are mentioned in biblical texts (1 Kings 9:28; 10:11,22).

The location of Ophir will remain a matter of uncertainty. A knowledge of ancient trade routes and practices, maritime ventures in the ancient Near East, and economic policies in ancient Israel will be helpful in determining the cite of Ophir. See Aphek; Commerce; Economic Life.

OPHNI (Óph' ní) Name meaning “high place.” Town allotted to Benjamin (Josh. 18:24). Ophni was likely in the vicinity of Geba and is perhaps Jifna, three miles northwest of Bethel near the intersection of the road between Jerusalem and Shechem and the road leading from the Plain of Sharon to Bethel.

OPHRAH (Óph' rah) Name meaning “fawn.” 1. Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:14). 2. City in Benjamin (Josh. 18:23), likely north of Michmash (1 Sam. 13:17-18). This Ophrah is perhaps identical with Ephron (2 Chron. 13:19) and Ephraim (2 Sam. 13:23; John 11:54). Jerome located Ophrah five Roman miles east of Bethel. This site is likely et-Taiyibeh five miles north of Michmash and four miles northeast of Bethel. 3. Town associated with the Abiezer clan of Manasseh who settled west of the Jordan (Judg. 6:11,24; 8:32). This Ophrah was the home of Gideon. Suggested sites include et-Taiyibeh south of modern Tulkarm, et-Taiyibeh (Afula) on the Plain of Esdraelon west of Mount Moreh, and Fer'ata west of Mount Gerazim near Shechem. The latter site is better identified with Tizrah.

ORACLES Communications from God. The term refers both to divine responses to a question asked of God and to pronouncements made by God without His being asked. In one sense oracles were prophecies since they often referred to the future; but oracles sometimes dealt with decisions to be made in the present. Usually in the Bible the communication was from Yahweh, the God of Israel. In times of idol worship, however, Israelites did seek a word or pronouncement from false gods (Hos. 4:12). Many of Israel's neighbors sought oracles from their gods.

Although the word “oracle” is not used very frequently in the OT, oracles were common in that period. This difference occurs because the Hebrew words translated “oracle” may also be translated as “burden,” “saying,” “word,” and such. Translations are not consistent in how they render these Hebrew words. Both the NRSV and the NASB translate the same Hebrew word as “oracle” in Num. 24:3, but it is rendered “declare” in 1 Sam. 2:30. Jeremiah 23:33-34 makes a play on a Hebrew word that may be translated either “burden” or “oracle.” The NASB and NIV use “oracle,” but the NRSV and KJV use “burden.” Moreover, in the KJV the English word “oracle” is used to refer to the holy of holies in the temple.

Concordance study shows the following meaning and use of “oracle.” Sometimes “oracle” refers to the whole of a prophetic book (Mal. 1:1 NRSV, NASB, NIV) or a major portion of one (Hab. 1:1 NRSV). In Isaiah several smaller prophecies of judgment or punishment are called “oracles” (13:1 NRSV; 14:28). The NRSV also entitles Zech. 9 and 12 “An Oracle.” Specific sayings about God's judgment on Joram (2 Kings 9:25) and Joash (2 Chron. 24:27) are also called oracles. Other examples, although the word “oracle” is not used, include Elijah's word to Ahab (1 Kings 21:17-19) and Elisha's word to Jehoram (2 Kings 3:13-20). On the basis of these kinds of usages, many Bible students understand oracles to be divine words of punishment or judgment. However, Balaam's oracle (Num. 24:3-9) is a blessing. Also references to Ahithophel's counsel (2 Sam. 16:23) and to oracles in Jerusalem which were pleasing but false (Lam. 2:14) show us that prophetic pronouncements were not always negative.

The NT does not reflect quite the same use of oracles or the word “oracle” as does the OT. The early church did have prophets like Agabus (Acts 21:10-11), who expressed God's word regarding what was to come. The word “oracles” in the NT most often refers to the teachings of God in the OT (Acts 7:38; Rom. 3:2). It may refer to Christian teachings too (Heb. 5:12).

Why Were Oracles Given? We must distinguish between oracles that were sought and those that came without any request. The first kind might be called “decision oracles.” The second kind will be referred to as “pronouncement oracles.” Decision oracles came when people asked God a question or sought His counsel. For example, David needed to know the right time to attack the Philistines, so he asked God. The answers he received were oracles (2 Sam. 5:19,23-24). Saul, the first king of Israel, was chosen through an oracle (1 Sam. 10:20-24). In that case, the communication from God was through the casting of lots. The falling of the lots was considered an oracle from God. Decision oracles, then, were God's response to questions and concerns in the present. They did not condemn sin or predict the future in any specific sense.

Pronouncement oracles were God's word to a situation or a person even though no word from God had been sought (but see comments below on Balaam's oracle). The pronouncement oracles were sometimes brief as when Elijah foretold a drought in Israel (1 Kings 17:1). The message could be long; thus the whole book of Malachi is a pronouncement oracle. This kind of oracle usually told what was going to happen. It also frequently condemned sin. It expressed God's view of present acts or circumstances. In that sense, many of the prophecies in the OT were pronouncement oracles. Because they were God's word, these pronouncements were true, even though they could be changed as in the case of Jonah's pronouncement over Nineveh (Jon. 3:4-9).

Pronouncement oracles were given to produce an effect. People were to hear and to change their ways. With that in mind, the pronouncement oracles against foreign nations form a special group. Many of the writing prophets have pronouncements against (or concerning) nations surrounding Israel (Amos 1; Isa. 13-19; Jer. 46-51). These foreign nations had little chance to hear and heed the word of an Israelite prophet. Other nations had their own gods and their own prophets. Apparently, the pronouncements over foreign nations were intended to have an effect on the people of Israel as well as bring about the events described. At times Israel or Judah heard their name included among foreign nations (e.g., Amos 2:4-16). God cared for the other nations even though they cared little for Him. God's expression of concern by pronouncing judgment (or salvation as in Isa. 19:19-22) was intended to remind Israel of her mission to share God with others. At least these words reminded the hearers of God's international, even universal, power and expectations.

Balaam's oracle (Num. 24) is a special case. Balak sought a pronouncement through the prophet Balaam. Balak's intention was to curse or to pronounce judgment on the Israelites. God did not allow this but gave Balaam an oracle of blessing to pronounce. Balaam's oracle, then, was positive and sought—a positive pronouncement oracle. The seeking of a pronouncement like this may have been more common than we know. Oracles came either in response to human questions or when God wished to make His views known to produce a change.

How Were Oracles Given or Received? Oracles were given through special people. Although anyone could seek a word from God, and many, such as Gideon or Abraham, received an oracle directly, these divine communications usually came through priests, prophets, or prophetesses. These groups seemed to have their own specific ways of receiving oracles. In the earlier period priests were more often sought out to receive a word from God. Later the prophets were more prominent. Of course, for a long period both functioned as intermediaries. One caution about prophets and their pronouncements must be made. Often the prophets were not prophets until they received God's word (consider Amos' experience in Amos 7:14-15). The word came to some reluctantly as in the case of Jeremiah. God's giving of an oracle to a man or woman made them a prophet; for, when the divine word came, the prophet had to speak (Amos 3:8b).

Different methods were used by priests and prophets to receive the two forms of oracles although we should not try to make too rigid a distinction. Decision oracles often came through the use of objects. Examples of such objects include the High Priest's Urim and Thummim and the ephod. Lots, too, were used. See Ephod; Lots; Urim and Thummim.

Decision oracles could also come through a person without the use of any objects. David sought the Lord's will at the point of building a temple. His answer came through Nathan, the prophet (2 Sam. 7). In 1 Kings 22 a dramatic conflict arose while the kings of Judah and Israel together sought a decision oracle. No objects were used in this case. The drama came from a true prophet receiving one answer regarding the decision and a large number of false prophets giving a different answer. Prophets did sometimes use music as a means of receiving a decision oracle as did Elisha (2 Kings 3:15). However the exact way music was used is unclear to us.

Frequently the OT gives no indication as to how God communicated His pronouncement oracles to His prophet or priest. Careful reading of the OT shows a variety of methods in use. Audition—the actual hearing of a voice—and visions undoubtedly played a part in the receiving of God's words. We cannot know how much of God's revelation came through the actual ear or eye or how much came through the mind. Balaam spoke when the Spirit came upon him (Num. 24:2-3). He described himself as one whose eye was opened, one who heard God's word and saw His vision. Nahum and Habakkuk wrote of a vision or of seeing their oracles (Nah. 1:1; Hab. 1:1). Through Jeremiah God condemned those prophets who relied on dreams to receive an oracle (Jer. 23:23-32). However, Solomon earlier had received God's pronouncement in a dream (1 Kings 3:5-15). Several times God used scenes that the prophet saw as a means of giving a pronouncement oracle. Some of the scenes were external (Jer. 18:1-12), and some were visionary (Ezek. 37:1-14). The frequent use of sights in pronouncements has led some to believe that the prophets had encounters with God that later they had to interpret and communicate to others.

Regardless of how the oracle came, it was to be expressed to others. This expression seems most often to have been oral. The priest or prophet told the oracle to either the individual or a group. The place may have been in a field or a king's throne room. The pronouncement oracles were often proclaimed in the city, even in a temple (Amos in Bethel and Jeremiah in Jerusalem). Many of the oracles, though, give us no indication of where or when they were spoken.

Oracles which were not simply yes or no seem most often to have been given in poetic form. This is especially true of the pronouncements of the writings of the prophets, which have been preserved for us. Though given orally in the beginning, at some time the pronouncement oracles were written down. They may have been written by disciples of the prophet or by others who heard. They may have been written when they were first told or at a later time. Whatever the case, the oracles were given by God and preserved for us.

How Did People Respond to the Oracles? Again, a distinction should be made between the decision and the pronouncement oracles. Those who were seeking God's help or counsel in a decision-making process undoubtedly acted on what they learned. Others, who heard oracles they had neither sought nor welcomed, may not have been as quick to accept the pronouncement (consider Elijah's words to Ahab, 1 Kings 21:20-24). Most often the response of those who heard or read the oracles of God can be guessed at. Two points should be recognized. First, oracles were remembered long after their pronouncement. When Jehu killed Joram (2 Kings 9:24-25), he had the body taken to Naboth's vineyard in order that an oracle pronounced in Ahab's day might be fulfilled. Second, though we do not know the response of the original hearers, God's pronouncements are still being read and are producing change in people in our day. Thus, the oracles are still functioning. ORATION, ORATOR Elaborate speech delivered in a formal and dignified manner and designed to persuade an audience. An orator is one distinguished for skill and persuasiveness as a public speaker. HCSB uses “oration” in Prov. 30:1 while KJV and RSV use the term only once in Acts 12:21; NRSV, HCSB, and NIV used “public address.” Herod Agrippa's oration was praised for the rhetorical skill (12:22), but Herod was judged for failure to give God the glory (12:23). A similar antipathy between skill in oratory and reliance on God's power is often found in Paul (1 Cor. 2:1-2,4,13; 4:19-20).

Paul spoke of “the debater of this age” (1 Cor. 1:20 HCSB). Paul disclaimed “brilliance of speech” and claimed to be “untrained in public speaking” (1 Cor. 2:1; 2 Cor. 11:6) but elsewhere compared his preaching to a skilled builder laying a foundation (1 Cor. 3:10) and spoke of destroying arguments and obstacles to knowledge of God (2 Cor. 10:5). Acts often presents Paul as a persuasive speaker (Acts 18:4,13;19:26; 26:28-29). Festus, in fact, recognized Paul as a man of great learning from his speech

The Greeks classified oratory into three modes. (1) The judicial mode, the speech of the law court, concerns guilt and innocence. Examples of judicial rhetoric include the cases involving Paul which were brought before Gallio, Felix, and Festus (Acts 18:12-16; 24:1-21; 25:15,18-19; 26:1-29). (2) The deliberative mode is concerned with the expediency of a course of future action. Examples include the Sanhedrin's debate over Jesus' growing following which culminated in Caiaphas's suggestion that the expedient course was to seek Jesus' death (John 11:47-50) and Demetrius's discourse on what action was necessary to save the business of the silversmiths in Ephesus (Acts 19:23-27). (3) The epideictic (demonstrative) mode concerns praise and blame. Examples include Paul's praise of love (1 Cor. 13) and his censure of the Galatians (Gal. 1:6-9; 3:1-5). Broadly speaking, this mode includes any exhortation to virtuous action (as in James). See Rhetoric.

ORCHARD Grove of fruit (Neh. 9:25; Eccles. 2:5) or nut trees (Song 6:11). An enclosed orchard is sometimes called a garden or park.

ORDINANCES Christians agree universally that baptism and the Lord's Supper were instituted by Christ and should be observed as “ordinances” or “sacraments” by His followers. Jesus doesn't use “ordinance” in connection with baptism or the Lord's Supper. Some interpreters believe sacrament conveys the concept that God's grace is dispersed almost automatically through participation in the Lord's Supper. Others believe ordinance stresses obedience in doing that which Christ explicitly commanded. Extreme dangers involved in the terms range from superstition to legalism.

The “sacraments” varied in number for a thousand years in the church's early history. Peter Lombard (about A.D. 1150) defended seven, and Thomas Aquinas (about A.D. 1250) argued that all were instituted by Christ. After A.D. 1500 Martin Luther and other Protestant reformers rejected five of these, insisting that only baptism and the Lord's Supper have a biblical basis. Most Protestants agree with their assessment.

Not only the name and number but the practice and meaning of the ordinances have been matters of continuing debate. Who should receive baptism or participate in observing the Lord's Supper? What are essential elements in the observances that ensure validity? What do they accomplish in the life of the individual and the church? Definitive answers acceptable to all Christians have not been forthcoming for these or many other questions, but a survey of biblical evidence should be helpful in reaching some conclusions.

Baptism Biblical references to baptism abound in the Gospels, Acts, Pauline Epistles, and other NT books. John the Baptist preached and practiced a baptism of repentance (Matt. 3:11-12; Mark 1:2-8; Luke 3:2-17). His proclamation looked forward to the coming kingdom. “Repent, because the kingdom of heaven has come near!” (Matt. 3:2 HCSB). Multitudes responded. Confessing their sins, they “were baptized by him in the Jordan River” (Mark 1:5). Apparently not everyone who came received baptism because John challenged some to “produce fruit consistent with repentance” (Matt. 3:8). John regarded his role as a transitional one to prepare the way (Matt. 3:11). The coming One would baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire.

All the Gospel writers record that Jesus was baptized by John (Matt. 3:13-17; Mark 1:9-11; Luke 3:21-22; John 1:32-34). Matthew noted that John hesitated to baptize Jesus but finally consented “to fulfill all righteousness” (3:15). The identification of Jesus as Messiah followed as the heavens opened, the Spirit descended on Him like a dove, and a voice proclaimed Him the beloved Son. This event inaugurated His public ministry and set the stage for Christian baptism.

The coming age prophesied by John the Baptist arrived in Jesus. Jesus affirmed the ministry of John by submitting to baptism and adopted the rite for His own ministry, giving it new meaning for the new age. The Gospel of John indicates that Jesus gained and baptized more followers than John the Baptist (John 4:1-2) but notes that the actual baptizing was done by His disciples. Jesus referred to His impending death as a baptism (Luke 12:50), linking the meaning of baptism with the cross. These and other scattered references to baptism in the Gospels are evaluated and interpreted in a variety of ways by Bible students, but the total impact of evidence favors the view that Jesus practiced and commanded baptism. Central in this evidence is the Great Commission (Matt. 28:19-20).

The Acts of the Apostles reflects the practice of the earliest Christian churches regarding baptism, referring to baptism far more frequently than any other NT book. At Pentecost after Peter's sermon, "those who accepted His message were baptized, and that day about 3,000 people were added to them" (Acts 2:41 HCSB). They had been exhorted by the apostle to "repent, ...and be baptized, each of you, in the name of Jesus the Messiah for the forgiveness of your sins, and you will receive the gift of the Holy Spirit" (2:38). At other times baptism was "in the name of the Lord Jesus" (8:16; 19:5). Sometimes the gift of the Spirit followed baptism; at other times, the spirit preceded baptism (10:44-48). These were apparently regarded as separate experiences.

Baptism "for" the forgiveness of sins may be translated "on the basis of." Many NT passages stress that forgiveness is based on repentance and trust in what Jesus had done, not on a rite baptism or otherwise (John 3:16; Acts 16:31). The gospel is for everyone; baptism is for disciples. Salvation is provided by Christ and not through baptism. References to Jesus' blessing little children contain no indications of baptism (Mark 10:13-16), and baptism of "households" described in Acts (16:31-33) should not be utilized to defend a later Christian practice.

If baptism is for believers only and does not convey salvation, then why do Christians universally baptize? It is highly unlikely that the early Christians would have adopted this practice without hesitation unless they were convinced strongly that Christ had intended that they do so. Further reflection upon what Christ had done enabled them to understand baptism in relation to the gospel. No NT writer contributed more to a fuller theological interpretation of baptism than Paul.

Paul (Saul) encountered the living Christ while on a journey to Damascus to persecute Christians. This led to a meeting in Damascus with Ananias, where Paul's sight was restored and where he was also baptized (Acts 9:17-18). What Paul had known about baptism previously must have been largely negative, but from this time baptism became a part of his missionary message and practice among both Jews and Gentiles.

Paul's basic message declared that a right relationship with God is based exclusively on faith in Jesus Christ. "For in it [the gospel] God's righteousness is revealed from faith to faith, just as it is written: 'The righteous will live by faith'" (Rom. 1:17 HCSB). Throughout Romans Paul stressed the primacy of grace over law. Access to this grace is through faith in Jesus Christ (5:2). Where sin (breaking the law) abounds, grace much more abounds. This poses the question (6:1), "What should we say then? Should we continue in sin in order that grace may multiply?" Paul denied emphatically that this is the case, for one dead to sin lives no longer in it. This fact is clearly illustrated in Christian baptism. "Are you unaware that all of us who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into His death? Therefore we were buried with Him by baptism into death, in order that, just as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we too may walk in a new way of life" (vv. 3-4).

Paul assumed here the universal Christian practice of baptism and a common understanding that it symbolizes death, burial, and resurrection of the believer with Christ. The mode of immersion most clearly preserves this symbolism along with the added emphasis of death to sin and resurrection to a new life in Christ. The stress is on what Christ has done more than what the believer does. Through faith in Him grace is received and makes baptism meaningful.

Paul in 1 Corinthians related unity in Christ to baptism. "For we were all baptized by one Spirit into one body" (12:13). The body of Christ encompasses Jews and Greeks, slave and free, each with a diversity of gifts; but they are bound together in a unity of spirit and symbolized in baptism. Galatians 3:26-29 stresses identification with Christ and unity in Him also, using the figure of putting on clothing. "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ” (3:27). However, the preceding verse should be noted also. “You are all sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus.” For those who belong to Christ, earthly distinctions disappear; and all are one in Christ, heirs according to the promise.

The subjective aspect of baptism for the believer and the objective aspect in Christ are brought together in Col. 2:9-12. In a circumcision not by hands of men but by Christ, the sinful nature is put off. The Colossians have been buried with Christ in baptism and raised with Him through faith in the power of God, who raised Him from the dead. Consequently, they are to set their hearts on things above and put to death the earthly nature (3:1,5).

It is evident from the above and other passages that, for Paul, baptism portrayed the gospel message of the death and resurrection of Christ, affirmed the death of the believer to sin and the rising to walk in newness of life, and signified a union of the believer with Christ and a unity with other believers. The rite itself does not effect these, for they are based on what Christ has done and is doing. Baptism serves as the effective public symbol and declaration for those who trust in Christ as Savior and Lord.

The Lord's Supper The earliest written account of the institution of the Lord's Supper is in 1 Cor. 11:23-26. The Corinthian church was divided, and many of its members were selfish and self-indulgent. In their fellowship meal, therefore, they did not eat “the Lord's Supper” (v. 20), for some overindulged while others were left hungry and humiliated. In response to this abuse, Paul reminded them of the tradition that he had received and passed on to them regarding the Supper of the Lord with His disciples the night He was betrayed.

On the night when He was betrayed, the Lord Jesus took bread, gave thanks, broke it, and said, “This is My body, which is for you. Do this in remembrance of Me.”
In the same way He also took the cup, after supper, and said, “This cup is the new covenant in My blood.

Do this, as often as you drink it, in remembrance of Me.” (HCSB)

The terms “eucharist” or “thanksgiving” and “communion” or “fellowship” are often applied to the Supper, and each highlights a significant aspect of this ordinance. “The Lord's Supper” appears more satisfactory for the overall designation, reminding Christians that they share the loaf and cup at His table, not their own.

The account of the Last Supper in Mark 14:22-26 is roughly parallel to Paul's account but with some differences (Matt. 26:26-30; Luke 22:17-20). Both accounts (Mark's and Paul's) record the blessing (thanksgiving) and breaking of bread. Both refer to covenant in connection with the cup as His blood, though only Paul called this a new covenant (Jer. 31:31-34). Both contain a future emphasis, though in different forms. Mark indicated that Jesus said He would not drink again of the fruit of the vine until He drank it anew in the kingdom of God. Paul related that “as often as you eat this bread and drink the cup, you proclaim the Lord's death until He comes” (1 Cor. 11:26 HCSB).

Paul stressed the memorial aspect of the Supper. “Do this in remembrance of Me.” Christians were to remember that the body of Christ was broken and His blood shed for them. As in baptism sharing the Supper is a proclamation of the gospel in hope, “until He comes.” As the Passover was a symbol of the old covenant, the Lord's Supper is a symbol of the new. Christians remember the sacrifice provided for their deliverance from bondage and look forward to the ultimate consummation in the land of promise, the kingdom of God.

The Supper shared in remembrance of the past and hope for the future is fulfilled in fellowship for the present. Time and again the phrase “in Christ” is repeated in the writings of Paul. Union in Christ and unity with Christians is a recurring theme. Not surprisingly, therefore, one finds these emphases related to the Lord's Supper. “The cup of blessing that we bless, is it not a sharing in the blood of Christ? The bread that we break, is it not a sharing in the body of Christ?” (1 Cor. 10:16 HCSB). Paul was not talking about a repetition of the sacrifice of Christ, but a genuine sharing of fellowship (koinonia) with the living Lord. Fellowship in Christ is basic for fellowship in His body (v. 17).

All Christians are unworthy to share the Lord's Supper, but His grace has provided for them in their unworthiness. The tragedy is that some partake in an unworthy manner, not discerning the Lord's body. Paul addressed this matter for the Corinthians and for us, urging that Christians examine themselves and respect the corporate body of Christ as they share the Supper of the Lord.

Conclusions Christ instituted both ordinances. Both portray publicly and visibly the essential elements of the gospel, and both symbolize realities involving divine activity and human experience. Baptism is a once-for-all experience, but the Lord's Supper is repeated many times. Baptism follows closely one's profession of faith in Christ and actually in the NT was the declaration of that faith. The Lord's Supper declares one's continuing dependence upon the Christ proclaimed in the gospel, who died, was buried, and rose for our salvation.

The significance of baptism and the Lord's Supper will increase as churches and people commit themselves anew to the Christ proclaimed by the gospel. This commitment will recognize that, in observing the ordinances, they are presenting in a unique way the gospel of Christ and committing themselves fully to its demands. Calling upon Christ the Savior and Lord to provide strength and leadership for the people of God individually and collectively, believers will leave the observance of the ordinances to give faithful service in His world.

ORDINATION, ORDAIN Appointing, consecrating, or commissioning of persons for special service to the Lord and His people.

English Translations KJV uses "ordain" to translate over 20 Hebrew and Greek words. These words relate to a variety of ideas such as God's work and providence; the appointment to an office or a task; and the establishment of laws, principles, places, or observances. While all these ideas do not relate directly to ordination, they contain basic concepts of divine purpose, choice, appointment, and institution that undergird the practice.

Old Testament Four primary examples provide OT precedents for ordination: the consecration of Aaron and his sons as priests to God (Exod. 28-29; Lev. 8-9), the dedication of the Levites as servants of God (Num. 8:5-14), the appointment of 70 elders to assist Moses (Num. 11:16-17,24-25), and the commissioning of Joshua as Moses' successor (Num. 27:18-23). The variety in these examples helps explain the various contemporary understandings of ordination.

The ordination of the priest was based on God's choice of Aaron and his sons “to minister as priest to Me” (Exod. 28:1 NASB). The ordination itself was a seven-day act of consecration accompanied by washing, donning vestments, anointing, sacrificing, and eating (Lev. 8). The basic Hebrew term for “ordination” literally means to “fill the hands” and may refer to filling the priest's hands with the offerings (Lev. 8:27). The ordination of the Levites also was based on God's choice of them “to serve the tent of meeting” (Num. 8:15 NASB). The ordination involved cleansing, presentation before the Lord, laying on of hands by the whole congregation, offering the Levites as a wave offering, and sacrifices.

The appointment of the 70 to assist Moses in bearing “the burden of the people” (Num. 11:17) was at God's initiative, but Moses selected persons who were known as elders and leaders. Their ordination involved standing with Moses and receiving from the Lord the Spirit who previously was upon Moses. When the Spirit rested on them, they prophesied (11:25). The ordination of a successor for Moses was at Moses' initiative (27:15-17), but Joshua was chosen by God because he was “a man in whom is the Spirit” (v. 18). Joshua's ordination involved standing before the priest and the entire congregation and being commissioned in their sight. Moses laid his hand on Joshua, and Moses placed some of his authority on Joshua, including the role of inquiring of the judgment of the Urim.

New Testament The NT practice of ordination is generally associated with the laying on of hands, but other appointments, consecrations, and commissionings must be considered even if they lack formal investiture.

Jesus' appointment of the Twelve “that they might be with Him and that He might send them out to preach” (Mark 3:14 HCSB) was based on prayer (Luke 6:12), His choice and call (Mark 3:13), and the apostles' responses. When He sent them out, He gave them “power and authority” (Luke 9:1) but no formal ordination. The same was true of the 70 (Luke 10:1). The Great Commission was given solely on the basis of Jesus' “power” (KJV) (or authority, Matt. 28:18). The Holy Spirit was given directly without the laying on of hands (John 20:22). The disciples were chosen and appointed by Jesus for their task of bearing fruit (John 15:16).

Several other NT passages describe appointments without reference to ordination. Having been chosen by lot, Matthias was installed as one of the Twelve (Acts 1:21-26). Barnabas and Paul appointed elders “in every church” after prayer and fasting (14:23). Titus was left in Crete to perform the same function (Titus 1:5).

Several passages describe ordination accompanied by the laying on of hands. Acts 6:1-6 tells of the appointment of seven men to the daily ministry to widows in the Jerusalem congregation. Barnabas and Paul were set apart for the work to which God had called them (Acts 13:1-3). Timothy was chosen by prophecy, recommended by Paul, and ordained to his task by the laying on of hands by Paul and the assembly of elders (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6). References to laying on of hands in 1 Tim. 5:22 and Heb. 6:2 likely deal with other practices than ordination. See Laying on of Hands; Minister, Ministry.

OREB AND ZEEB (Ó' rēb and Zē' ēb) Personal names meaning “raven” and “wolf.” Two Midianite princes captured and executed by the Ephraimites following Gideon's rout of their forces (Judg. 7:24-8:3). The Midianite nobles gave their names to the sites of their deaths, the rock of Oreb near

Beth-barah on the Jordan and the winepress of Zeeb. Israel's deliverance from Midian became proverbial for God's deliverance of His people (Ps. 83:11; Isa. 9:4; 10:26).

OREN (Ō' rēn) Personal name meaning "cedar." Member of the Jerahmeelite clan of Judah(1 Chron. 2:25).

ORGAN KJV term for a musical instrument which modern translations identify as a pipe or shrill flute (Gen. 4:21; Job 21:12; 30:31; Ps. 150:4). At the time of the KJV translation, "organ" designated any wind instrument. The modern pipe organ was not known in the biblical period, though primitive organs were used in the Jerusalem temple after 100 B.C. and provided music for Roman games and combats. The organ came into the church after A.D. 600.

ORION Constellation bearing the name of a giant Greek hunter who, according to myth, was bound and placed in the heavens. Job 38:31 perhaps alludes to this myth. God is consistently portrayed as the creator of the Orion constellation (Job 9:9; Amos 5:8). The plural of the Hebrew term for Orion is rendered constellations at Isa. 13:10.

ORONTES RIVER (Ō rōn' tēz) Principal river of Syria which originates east of the Lebanon ridge (modern Asi [Turkish], Nahr el-'Asi [Arabic]), rises near Heliopolis (Bealbek) in the Beka Valley of Lebanon, and flows north some 250 miles through Syria and Turkey before turning southwest into the Mediterranean south of Antioch-on-the-Orontes (Antakya) to reach the coast just south of ancient Seleucia, the seaport of Antioch. This river is never actually mentioned in the Bible but was famous for its association with Antioch, which owed to the river the fertility of its district. Cities of the Orontes Valley include Antioch (Acts 11:19; 13:1), Hamath (2 Sam. 8:9; 2 Kings 17:24; 2 Chron. 8:4; Isa. 11:11), Qarqar, where King Ahab of Israel joined a coalition of Syrian kings warring against Shalmaneser III, and Riblah (2 Kings 23:33; 25:6,21). Nahr el-'Asi (rebellious river) is the modern name of the Orontes. See Antioch; Rivers and Waterways.

OSNAPPAR (Ōs nap' pər) or OSNAPPER Assyrian king who repopulated Samaria with foreigners following its capture in 722 B.C. (Ezra 4:10). Osnappar is most often identified with Ashurbanipal. KJV used the form Asnapper. See Assyria.

OSPRAY, OSPREY Large, flesh-eating hawk included in lists of unclean birds (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12 KJV, NRSV). The identity of the bird is questionable. Other possibilities include: black vulture (NASB margin, NIV); black eagle, (KJV margin); bearded vulture (REB); and buzzard (NASB).

OSSIFRAGE English applies “ossifrage” to three birds: the bearded vulture, the osprey and the giant petrel. The KJV included the ossifrage among the unclean birds (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12). Other translations identify the bird as a black vulture (REB) or vulture (NASB, NIV, NRSV).

OSTIA (Ōs' tē ə) Roman city at the mouth of the Tiber about 15 miles from Rome which, following construction of an artificial harbor by Claudius (A.D. 41-54), served as the principle harbor for Rome. Before this construction silt prohibited seagoing vessels from using the port. Such vessels were forced to use the port of Puteoli about 138 miles to the south of Rome (Acts 28:13).

OSTRACA (Ōs' trā cə) Potsherds (pottery fragments), especially fragments used as an inexpensive writing material. See Archaeology and Biblical Study; Pottery; Writing.

OSTRICH The ostrich, the largest of birds, is a swift, flightless fowl. One passage in Job (39:13-18) describes some of the characteristic habits of the ostrich. The female lays her eggs in the sand. The male does most of the incubating, mainly at night. Unhatched eggs serve as food for the young. Although the parent bird leaves the nest when it senses danger, this diversionary tactic actually is a protective measure. However, such habits may have created the impression that the ostrich was indifferent to its young (Lam. 4:3). The ostrich is listed as unclean (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15), probably because of its eating habits.

OTHNI (Ōth' nī) Personal name, perhaps meaning “force” or “power.” Levitic gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:7).

OTHNIEL (Ōth' nī ēl) Name meaning “God is powerful.” 1. First of Israel's judges or deliverers. Othniel received Caleb's daughter Achsah as his wife as a reward for his capture of Kiriath-sepher (Debir) (Josh. 15:15-19; Judg. 1:11-15). As the first judge Othniel rescued Israel from the Mesopotamian king Cushanrishathaim (Judg. 3:7-11). Othniel was the only judge to come from the southern tribes. See Judges, Book of. 2. Clan name associated with a resident of Netophah (1 Chron. 27:15).

OUCHES KJV term for (filigree) settings for precious stones (Exod. 28:11,13-14,25; 39:6,13,16,18). See Jewels, Jewelry; High Priest.

OUTCAST Scripture never employs outcast in the now common sense of one rejected by society. Outcast rather designates one banished from court (2 Sam. 14:14 NRSV) or more often dispersed persons, exiles, or refugees (Deut. 30:4; Ps. 147:2; Isa. 11:12; 56:8; Jer. 30:17; Mic. 4:6-7). “Outcasts” often has the technical sense of Diaspora. NASB employs outcast for one excommunicated from the synagogue (John 16:2).

OUTER SPACE The Bible teaches that outer space was created by God (Gen. 1:1,14-19; Job 9:7-10; 26:7; Pss. 8:3; 136:7-9; Amos 5:8). God made the sun, moon, and stars to provide light for the earth and indicate the passage of time through seasons, days, and years (Gen. 1:14-15).

Long before recorded history people began to worship the heavenly bodies. The deities of the sun, moon, and stars held prominent places in the pantheons of the ancient Near East. The Babylonians developed a sophisticated system of causation based in part on the movement of the stars. These ideas penetrated ancient Israel (e.g., 2 Kings 23:5; Jer. 8:1-2) where they were roundly condemned as idolatrous by the writers of the Bible (Deut. 4:19; 17:3; Job 31:26-28; Isa. 47:13; Jer. 10:2).

The biblical poets were awestruck by the vastness and mystery of outer space. They often referred to the sun, moon, and stars as witnesses to the power of God and permanence of His work. For instance, Job recognized that the earth “hangs on nothing” (Job 26:7) and that the movements of the constellations were known only to God (Job 38:31-33). The psalmist likened the permanence of the Davidic monarchy to the sun and moon (Pss. 72:5; 89:37). It is only at the end of time, when the creation process will be reversed by the day of the Lord, that the sun, moon, and stars will be darkened (Isa. 13:10; Joel 2:31; Matt. 24:29; Rev. 6:12-13; 8:12).

The Bible gives no indication that there is life on other planets, and strongly supports the uniqueness of life on Earth.

OUTER TUNIC (Gk. chiton) See Cloth, Clothing.

OUTLANDISH KJV term meaning “foreign” (Neh. 13:26).

OVEN Device used for baking food, especially bread (Lev. 2:4; Exod. 8:3). Ancient ovens were cylindrical structures of burnt clay two to three feet in diameter. A fire was built on pebbles in the oven bottom. Bread was baked by either placing the dough against the oven walls or upon the heated pebbles. Dried grass (Matt. 6:30; Luke 12:28), thorny shrubs, and animal dung were often used as fuels. See Cooking and Heating.

OVENS, TOWER OF THE See Furnaces, Tower of.

OVERLIVE KJV term meaning “outlive” (Josh. 24:31).

OVERPASS KJV term (Jer. 5:28) meaning either “surpass” previous limits or bounds (NASB, NIV, RSV, TEV) or else “pass over” in the sense of overlook (NASB margin, REB).

OVERRUN Term meaning “outrun” (2 Sam. 18:23; Ps. 105:30 HCSB).

Large domed oven.

OVERSEER Superintendent or supervisor. Various translations use overseer for a variety of secular positions (household manager, Gen. 39:4-5; prime minister, Gen. 41:34; foreman or supervisor, 2 Chron. 2:18) and ecclesiastical (Acts 20:28) offices. HCSB, NASB, and NIV employ overseer for the bishop of the KJV, NRSV(Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:1-2; Titus 1:7).

OVERSHADOW To cast a shadow over; to envelop. The cloud which overshadowed the mount of transfiguration (Matt. 17:5; Mark 9:7; Luke 9:34) recalls the cloud “overshadowing” the tabernacle (Exod. 40:35 according to earliest Gk. translation) when it was filled with God's glory. Luke 1:35 describes the mystery of the virginal conception in terms of Mary's being “overshadowed” by the power of God. Luke's picture does not involve sexual intercourse of a god and human woman as was common in pagan myth. The Spirit is Creator, not consort (Gen. 1:2; Ps. 33:6; and especially Job 33:4; Ps. 104:30 where the Spirit's roll is life-giver). The Spirit which brought power and life to the church at Pentecost (Acts 1:8) and is the source of resurrection life (Ezek. 37:5-14) brought life to Mary's womb.

OWL Bird of prey belonging to the order Strigiformes which are generally nocturnal. Hebrew terms for various bird species cannot be identified precisely with English terms. NRSV mentions two species of owl, the little and great owls (Deut. 14:16). KJV mentions these as well as the owl of the desert (Deut. 14:16; Ps. 102:6) and screech owl (Isa. 34:14). NIV mentions six species: the horned owl; screech owl (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15); little owl (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:16); great owl; white owl; and desert owl (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16). Owls, like other predatory birds, were classed as unclean. Owls nesting in ruins are a common image of desolation (Ps. 102:6; Isa. 34:11,15; Zeph. 2:14).

OWNERSHIP Possession of property. Two general principles guided Israelite laws of ownership: (1) all things ultimately belong to God, and (2) land possession is purely a business matter. After the division of the land among the 12 tribes, individual plots were given to family groups or clans. If the occasion demanded it, the land could be redivided at a later time. Land sales and transfers were recorded by scribes on leather or papyrus scrolls, on clay tablets, or in the presence of witnesses with the symbolic removal of a sandal (Ruth 4:7) or the stepping onto the land by the new owner. Land passed from father to son but could be given to a daughter. Private lands ultimately reverted to the king if not used for several years (2 Kings 8). The law of the kinsman-redeemer (Lev. 25:25) was developed to assure that land belonging to a particular clan did not pass out of its hands despite the death of an heirless husband. The next-of-kin was required to purchase the land and provide an heir to the name of the deceased. The impoverished widow would not be forced to sell her land to outsiders, thus diminishing the tribal area of the clan.

While it is true that the king did purchase lands from his subjects, private lands were subject to seizure by the ruler. Royal land was given as revenue-producing gifts by the ruler to members of his family or men who gained his favor. Often the land was tenant farmed for the king who continued to hold the ultimate right of its disposal. When economic times were difficult, kings exchanged their lands for other services, such as Solomon's gift of land to Hiram of Tyre for gold and laborers in the building of the temple (1 Kings 9:11). Priestly families and local shrines also owned land, especially that surrounding the Levitical cities, where the priests farmed their own fields (Josh. 21). With the consolidation of worship in the Jerusalem temple, many of the priestly lands were sold.

Private ownership continued in much the same fashion during the NT era. Bills of sale and land deeds written on papyrus scrolls from this period have been discovered, attesting to the exchange of private lands. Often the sale of private land was subject to royal approval. The Romans oversaw the control of lands in Palestine, requiring heavy taxes from owners. The early Christian community existed through the generosity of those members who sold many of their possessions to help poorer believers. See Economic Life.

OX Large, often domesticated, bovine. In the OT it was extremely valuable as a work animal. Important in the economy of Israel, oxen were essential for farm work. They were often yoked in pairs to do farm work and were used to transport burdens. Permitted as food, they were also offered as sacrifices (Deut. 14:4-6; Lev. 17:3-4).

The wild ox was a large beast believed to be the ancestor of domestic cattle. It symbolized ferocious strength. The Hebrew word translated “unicorn” in Num. 23:22 (KJV) has been identified as the word for wild ox (NASB, NIV, NRSV; cp. Pss. 22:21; 92:10). See Cattle.

OXGOAD See Goad.

OZEM (O' zēm) Personal name meaning “irritable” or “strength.” 1. Sixth son of Jesse (1 Chron. 2:15). 2. Fourth son of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:25).

OZIAS (Ō zī' ás) Greek form of Uzziah used by KJV (Matt. 1:8-9).

OZNI (Ōz' nī) Personal name meaning “my hearing” or “attentive.” Ancestor of a Gadite family, the Oznites (Num. 26:16).

OZNITES (Ōz' nīts) See Ozni.

The lush green fronds of a date palm tree in Haifa, Israel.

PAARAI (Pa' a-ri) Personal name meaning “revelation of Yahweh.” One of David's 30 elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:35) designated an Arbite, a resident of Arbah (Josh. 15:52). The parallel list has the name “Naarai” (1 Chron. 11:37).

PADAN-ARAM (KJV) or PADDAN-ARAM (Pād dan-ā' rām) Place-name, perhaps meaning “way of Syria,” “field of Syria,” or “plow of Syria.” The land from where Abraham journeyed to Canaan. One of the principal cities was Haran. Later Abraham sent his steward to Paddan-aram (Gen. 25:20) to seek a wife for Isaac (Gen. 24:1-9), and Jacob fled there and married into Laban and Rebekah's branch of the patriarchal family (28:2-5). It may be modern Tell Feddan near Carrhae. Hosea 12:13 calls it the field or country of Syria.

PADDLE KJV term for a digging tool (Deut. 23:13). Modern translations render the term as something to dig with (NIV), spade (NASB), stick (RSV, TEV), or trowel (NRSV, REB). The Israelites were required to respect God's presence in their camp by burying their excrement.

PADON (Pa' dōn) Personal name meaning “redemption.” Ancestor of a family of post-exilic temple servants (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47). See Nethinim.

PAGANS Those who worship a god or gods other than the living God to whom the Bible witnesses. NIV, REB, and RSV sometimes use pagans as the translation of the Greek ethnoi (1 Cor. 5:1; 10:20), which is generally translated “Gentiles” (so KJV, NASB). In English, Gentile relates to ethnic background while pagan refers to religious affiliation. See Gentiles; Gods, Pagan.

The altar of Zeus, the highest god in the Greek pantheon.

PAGIEL (Pa' gī ēl) Personal name meaning “fortune of God.” “God is entreated,” or “God meets.” Wilderness leader of the tribe of Asher (Num. 1:13; 2:27; 7:72,77; 10:26).

PAHATH-MOAB (Pa hāth-Mō' āb) Title meaning “governor of Moab.” A family of returned exiles likely descended from the Hebrew governor of Moab in the time of David (2 Sam. 8:2; Ezra 2:6; 8:4; 10:30; Neh. 7:11; 10:14).

PAI (Pa' ī) Place-name meaning “groaning.” Alternate form of Pau used at 1 Chron. 1:50 (cp. Gen. 36:39). See Pau.

PAINT Mixture of pigment and liquid used to apply a closely adhering, colorful coat to a surface. Most scriptural references are to painting the eyes. The sole exception is Jer. 22:14 which refers to Jehoiakim's plans to paint his palace vermilion. The prohibition of making images (Exod. 20:4) perhaps curtailed development of painting in Israel. Archaeologists have uncovered numerous tomb and palace paintings in both Egypt and Mesopotamia. See Cosmetics.

PALACE Residence of a monarch or noble. KJV often used “palace” in passages where modern translations have substituted a term more appropriate to the context. Terms designating a strongly fortified section of the king's residence often replaced “palace”: citadel (1 Kings 16:18; 2 Kings 15:25); tower (Ps. 122:7 NRSV; Song 8:9 NIV); stronghold (Isa. 34:13; Amos 1:4 NRSV); fortress (Amos 1:4 NIV); battlement (Song 8:9 NRSV; parapet, REB). At Amos 4:3 modern translations replace “palace” with the proper name Harmon. The KJV uses “palace” twice for the Greek aule (Matt. 26:3; Luke 11:21). The crowd in Matt. 26 gathered in the courtyard of the high priest's residence. Modern translations rendered aule variously: palace (NIV, NRSV, TEV); court (NASB); house (REB). The strong man of Luke 11 guarded the open courtyard of his home. Modern translations are again divided on the translation of aule: castle (NRSV); homestead (NASB); house (NIV, TEV); palace (REB, RSV). The KJV also used “palace” to translate the Latin loanword praetorium (Phil. 1:13). Modern translations replaced “palace” with “praetorian guard” (NASB, RSV) or an equivalent expression (imperial guard, NRSV, REB; palace guard, NIV, TEV).

Palaces served not only as royal residences but as a means of displaying the wealth of a kingdom. Esther 1:6-7 describes the palace of King Ahasuerus (Xerxes I) of Persia which featured fine curtains, marble pillars, and ornate mosaic floors. David's palace was built by workers sent by King Hiram of Tyre and featured cedar woodwork (2 Sam. 5:11). The palace must have been large to accommodate David's growing number of wives, concubines, and children (2 Sam. 3:2-5; 5:13-16), as well as store booty, such as the golden shields which David seized (2 Sam. 8:7). Solomon's palace complex required 13 years for completion (1 Kings 7:1). His palace complex included the “house of the forest of Lebanon” (7:2), an immense hall featuring 45 cedar pillars and Solomon's golden shields (10:16-18), the “porch of pillars” (7:6), the “Hall of Justice” (7:7 NRSV), featuring an ivory and gold throne (10:18-20), and private dwellings for both king and Pharaoh's daughter (7:8). Builders used costly hewn stone and cedar throughout the palace (7:9,11). Portions of this palace complex survived the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (Neh. 3:25). King Ahab's palace in Samaria was decorated with ivory panels, some of which have been recovered by archaeologists (1 Kings 22:39).

An example of a wall fresco, a major art form of the Roman period that utilized types of paints.

The prophets, particularly Amos, condemned the rich for building palaces at the expense of the poor. Amos' announcements of doom refer to summer and winter residences, ivory furniture and palaces, and great houses of hewn stone (Amos 3:15; 5:11; 6:4,11). Jeremiah offered a similar critique of Jeroboam's building program in Jerusalem (22:13-15).

PALAL (פַּלְאֵל) Personal name meaning “God comes to judge.” One of those assisting in Nehemiah's repair of the wall (Neh. 3:25).

PALANQUIN (Pāl ən kēn') REB, RSV term for an enclosed seat or couch carried on servants' shoulders (Song 3:9). Other translations include: carriage (NIV), chariot (KJV), and sedan chair (NASB).

PALESTINA (Pāl əs tī' nā) KJV alternate name for Philistia (Exod. 15:14; Isa. 14:29,31). See Palestine; Philistines.

PALESTINE (Pāl' ɛs tīne) Geographical designation for the land of the Bible, particularly land west of Jordan River that God allotted to Israel for an inheritance (Josh. 13-19). Various terms have been used to designate that small but significant land known in the early OT era as “Canaan” (Gen. 12:5) and often referred to as the promised land (Deut. 9:28). The area was designated “Israel” and “Judah” at the division of the kingdoms in 931 B.C. By NT times the land had been divided into provincial designations: Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and others. Generally the region was considered to be a part of Syria.

Palestine is derived from the name Pelishtim or “Philistines.” The Greeks, familiar primarily with the coastal area, applied the name “Palestine” to the entire southeastern Mediterranean region. Although the word “Palestine” (or “Palestina”) is found four times in the KJV (Exod. 15:14; Isa. 14:29,31; Joel 3:4), these are references to the territory of the Philistines and so properly designate only the strip of coastland occupied by that people. See Philistines.

For the purposes of this article, Palestine extends to the north 10 to 15 miles beyond the ancient site of Dan and NT Caesarea Philippi into the gorges and mountains just south of Mount Hermon. To the east it extends to the Arabian steppe. To the south Palestine extends 10 to 15 miles beyond Beer-sheba. On the west is the Mediterranean Sea. It therefore includes western Palestine—between the Jordan River and the Sea, and eastern Palestine—between the Jordan and the Arabian steppe.

Palestine west of the Jordan covers approximately 6,000 square miles. East of the Jordan an area of about 4,000 square miles was included in the land of Israel.

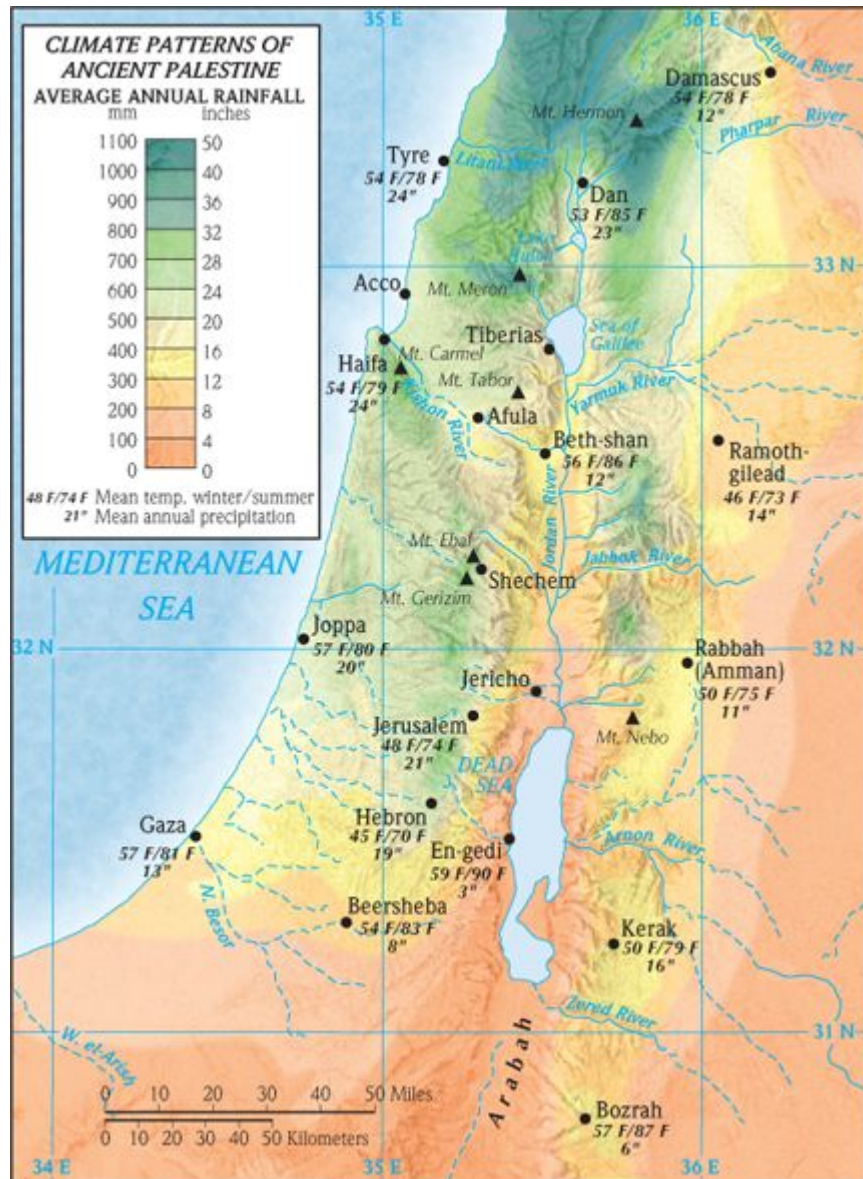

Geographical Features Palestine is naturally divided into four narrow strips of land running north and south.

Coastal Plain This very fertile plain begins 10 to 12 miles south of Gaza, just north of the Egyptian border, and stretches northward to the Sidon-Tyre area. Usually it is divided into three sections: the Plain of Philistia, roughly from south of Gaza to Joppa (Tel Aviv); the Plain of Sharon, from Joppa north to the promontory of the Carmel chain; and the detached Plain of Acco, which merges with the Plain of Esdraelon, the historic gateway inland and to the regions to the north and east. The Plain of Sharon varies from a width of a few hundred yards just south of Carmel to more than 12 miles wide near Joppa. Covered with fertile alluvial soil and well watered by springs, the area was once covered with extensive forests.

Further south is the Plain of Philistia. Here were located the Philistine strongholds of Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath. Salt marshes—the Serbonian bog—located at the southern end of the Philistine plain have been known as breeding grounds of disease.

Forming the southwestern end of the Fertile Crescent, the coastal plain has been the highway of commerce and conquest for centuries. This was the route followed by the Hittites and the Egyptians, by Cambyses, Alexander, Pompey, and Napoleon.

The coastal plain lacked an outstanding natural harbor. Joppa had roughly semicircular reefs that formed a breakwater 300 to 400 feet offshore and, consequently, was used as a port. Entrance from the south was impossible, however, and the north entrance was shallow and treacherous. Herod the Great developed Caesarea Maritima into an artificial port of considerable efficiency. See Caesarea.

Central Hill Country The second strip of land is the mountainous ridge beginning just north of Beer-sheba and extending through all of Judea and Samaria into upper Galilee. Actually, the rugged terrain running the length of the land is a continuation of the more clearly defined Lebanon Mountains to the north. The only major break in the mountain range is the Plain of Esdraelon also called the Valley of Jezreel. Three divisions are evident: Judea, Samaria, and Galilee.

Judea Rising from the parched Negev (Negev means “parched” or “dry land”), the Judean hills reach their highest point, 3,370 feet, near Hebron.

Jerusalem is located in the Judean hills at an elevation of 2,600 feet. The eastern slopes form the barren and rugged “wilderness of Judea,” then fall abruptly to the floor of the Jordan Valley. The wilderness is treeless and waterless. Deep gorges and canyons cut into the soft sedimentary formations. See Negeb or Negev.

The western foothills of Judea are called the “Shephelah,” meaning “valley” or “lowland.” The name has been inaccurately applied to the Plain of Philistia, but the towns assigned by the OT to the Shephelah are all situated in the low hills rather than the plain. The Shephelah is a belt of gently rolling hills between 500 and 1,000 feet in height. Five valleys divide the region, from the Wadi el Hesy in the south to the Valley of Ajalon in northern Judea. These passes have witnessed the conflicts between Saul and the Philistines, the Maccabees and the Syrians, the Jews and the Romans, Richard I and Saladin. Here Samson grew to manhood. Here David encountered Goliath.

The Shephelah had great military importance. It formed a buffer between Judea and the enemies of the Hebrew people—Philistines, Egyptians, Syrians. Formerly heavily wooded with sycamores, the region served to impede an attack from the west.

Samaria The hills of Samaria descend gently from the Judean mountains, averaging just over 1,000 feet in height. Several notable mountains such as Gerizim (2,890 feet), Ebal (3,083), and Gilboa (1,640 feet) dominate the area. This land of mountains is marked by wide and fertile valleys. Here the majority of the people lived during the OT era, and here significant events of Hebrew history took place. The openness of Samaria is a prominent feature of the land, making movement much easier than in Judea and thus inviting armies and chariots from the north.

The valley between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim was a central location, apparently providing the perfect point from which a united nation could have been governed. Roads went in all directions—to Galilee, the Jordan Valley, south to Jerusalem. Here Shechem was located, important to the patriarchs and in the day of the judges. Shechem, however, had no natural defenses and was consequently rejected by the kings of Israel as their capital.

From this region the main range of mountains sends out an arm to the northwest that reaches the coast at Mount Carmel. Carmel reaches a height of only 1,791 feet, but it seems loftier because it rises directly from the coastline. It receives abundant rainfall, an average of 28 to 32 inches per year, and consequently is rather densely covered with vegetation, including some woodland.

The Carmel range divides the Plain of Sharon from the narrow coastal plain of Phoenicia. It forms the southern side of the Plain of Esdraelon, with the ancient fortress of Megiddo standing as one of its key cities. This natural barrier caused the passes in the Carmel chain to achieve unusual importance, lying as it does on the historic route between Egypt and Mesopotamia.

Galilee North of the Plain of Esdraelon and south of the Leontes River lies the region called Galilee. The name comes from the Hebrew galil, meaning literally “circle” or “ring.” In Isa. 9:1 the prophet refers to it as “Galilee of the Gentiles.” The tribes of Asher, Naphtali, and Zebulun were assigned to this area. There is evidence of mixed population and racial variety from early times. In the day of Jesus, many Gentiles were in Galilee.

The region is divided into upper Galilee and lower Galilee. Lower Galilee is a land of limestone hills and fertile valleys. Most of the region is approximately 500 feet above sea level—but with mountains like Tabor reaching a height of 1,929 feet. Grain, grass, olives, and grapes were abundant. Fish, oil, and wine were common exports. Several major international roads crossed the area, and caravan traffic from Damascus through Capernaum to the south was heavy. Josephus spoke of Galilee as “universally rich and fruitful.”

Some of the most important cities of Galilee were on the shore of the Sea of Galilee. Those on the northwestern shore, such as Capernaum, were more Jewish than those to the south. Tiberias, built in A.D. 25 by Herod Antipas and named after the reigning Caesar, became the capital and the most important city during the NT era.

The terrain of upper Galilee is much more rugged than lower Galilee, an area of deeply fissured and roughly eroded tableland with high peaks and many wadis. The highest peak is Mount Meron at 3,963 feet, the highest point in Palestine. The basic rock is limestone, in the eastern sections often covered with volcanic rock. In the east Galilee drops off abruptly to the Jordan, while farther south, near the Sea of Galilee, the slopes become much more gradual and gentle.

Jordan Rift Valley As a result of crustal faulting, the hills of Palestine drop into the deepest split on the surface of the earth. The fault is part of a system that extends north to form the valley between the Lebanon and the Anti-Lebanon chains, also extending south to form the Dead Sea, the dry Arabah Valley, the Gulf of Aqaba, and, eventually, the chain of lakes on the African continent.

The Jordan River has its source in several springs, primarily on the western and southern slopes of Mount Hermon. Several small streams come together near Dan, then flow into shallow, reedy Lake Hula, (Huleh). From its sources to Hula the Jordan drops somewhat less than 1,000 feet over a distance of 12 miles, entering Lake Hula at 230 feet above sea level (not seven feet, as reported by some older publications). In recent years the Jordan bed has been straightened after it leaves Hula, the swamps of the valley have been drained, and the size of the lake has been greatly reduced. Most of the area is now excellent farmland. Over the 11 miles from Hula to the Sea of Galilee, the Jordan drops 926 feet, flowing in part through a narrow canyon. From Galilee to the Dead Sea there is an additional drop of 600 feet.

The Sea of Galilee is a significant part of the upper Rift Valley and is formed by a widening of it. It has several names—Lake of Gennesaret, Sea of Tiberias, Lake Chinnereth—but it is best known as the Sea of Galilee. Around it most of the ministry of Jesus took place. Here He could rest, escape crowds, find cool relief from the heat. Shaped much like a harp, it is 13 miles long and seven miles wide. The hard basalt environment has given the lake an almost constant level and size. In NT days the lake was the center of a thriving fishing industry. The towns around the lake testify to this fact: Bethsaida means “fishing place,” and Tarichea is from a Greek term meaning “preserved fish.”

As the Jordan flows south out of the Sea of Galilee, it enters a gorge called the Ghor, or “depression.” The meandering Jordan and its periodic overflows have created the Zor, or “jungle,” a thick growth of entangled semitropical plants and trees. Although the distance from the lower end of the Sea of Galilee to the upper end of the Dead Sea is only 65 miles, the winding Jordan twists 200 miles to cover that distance. The Ghor is about 12 miles wide at Jericho.

Seven miles south of Jericho the Jordan flows into the Dead Sea, one of the world's most unique bodies of water. The surface of the water is 1,296 feet below sea level, the lowest point on the surface of the earth. Forty-seven miles long and eight miles wide, the Dead Sea has no outlet. It has been calculated that an average of 6.5 million tons of water enters the sea each day. The result of centuries of evaporation is that now 25 percent of the weight of the water is mineral salts. Magnesium chloride gives the water a bitter taste, and calcium chloride gives it an oily touch. Fish cannot live in Dead Sea water. Indeed, it destroys almost all organic life in it and around it.

Thirty miles down the eastern side, a peninsula, the Lisan, or the “Tongue,” juts into the sea. North of it the sea is deep, reaching a maximum depth of 1,319 feet to 2,650 feet below sea level. South of the peninsula the sea is very shallow with a maximum depth of 13 feet. It is thought that this area is the location of “the cities of the Plain” (Gen. 13:12), Sodom and Gomorrah.

Transjordan Plateau East of the Jordan is an area where the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh settled. In NT times Decapolis and Perea were located there. The ministry of Jesus took Him to limited parts of these provinces. Transjordan is divided into sections by several rivers—the Yarmuk, the Jabbok, the Arnon, and the Zered.

Across from Galilee and north of the Yarmuk River is Bashan (Hauron), an area of rich volcanic soil with rainfall in excess of 16 inches per year. The plateau averages 1,500 feet above sea level. To the east of Bashan lies only desert that begins to slope toward the Euphrates. In the NT era it was a part of the territory of Philip, the Tetrarch, son of Herod the Great.

South of the Yarmuk, reaching to the Jabbok River, was Gilead. During the Persian rule the boundaries were rather rigid. Both before and after Persian domination, Gilead reached as far south as Rabbah (Philadelphia, modern Amman). Formerly heavily wooded with many springs and with gently rounded hills, Gilead is one of the most picturesque regions of Palestine. Olive groves and vineyards are found on the hillsides. Jerash and Amman, the capital of the Heshemite Kingdom of Jordan, are located here.

South of Gilead lies Moab. Originally, its northern border was the Arnon River, but the Moabites pushed north, giving their name to the plains east of the spot where the Jordan enters the Dead Sea (Ammon attempted to establish herself between Gilead and Moab using Rabbathammon as her stronghold. This succeeded only under the infamous Tobiah during the years of the exile.) Moab's southern border was the Zered River, Wadi al Hasa.

Still farther south is Edom, with the highest mountains of the region. The area is arid and barren. Fifty miles south of the Dead Sea lies the ancient fortress of Petra, “rose-red...half as old as time.”

Climate Palestine lies in the semitropical belt between 30 degrees 15 feet and 33 degrees 15 feet north latitude. Temperatures are normally high in the summer and mild in the winter, but these generalizations are modified by both elevation and distance from the coast. Variety is the necessary word in describing Palestinian weather, for in spite of its relatively small size, the geographical configuration of the area produces a diversity of conditions. Because of the Mediterranean influence, the coastal plain has an average annual temperature of 57 degrees at Joppa. Jerusalem, only 35 miles away, has an annual average of 63 degrees. Its elevation of 2,500 feet above sea level causes the difference. Jericho is only 17 miles further east, but it is 3,400 feet lower (900 feet below sea level), consequently having a tropical climate and very low humidity. Here bitterly cold desert nights offset rather warm desert days. Similarly, much of the area around the Sea of Galilee experiences temperate conditions, while the Dead Sea region is known for its strings of 100 degrees-plus summer days.

Palestine is a land of two seasons, a dry season and a rainy season, with intervening transitional periods. The dry season lasts from mid-May to mid-October. From June through August no rain falls except in the extreme north. Moderate, regular winds blow usually from the west or southwest. The breezes reach Jerusalem by noon, Jericho in early afternoon, and the Transjordan plateau by mid afternoon. The air carries much moisture, but atmospheric conditions are such that precipitation does not occur. However, the humidity is evident from the extremely heavy dew that forms five nights out of six in July.

With late October the “early rain” so often mentioned in Scripture begins to fall. November is punctuated with heavy thunderstorms. The months of December through February are marked by heavy showers, but it is not a time of unrelenting rain. Rainy days alternate with fair days and beautiful sunshine. The cold is not severe, with occasional frost in the higher elevations from December to February. In Jerusalem snow may fall twice during the course of the winter months.

All of Palestine experiences extremely disagreeable warm conditions occasionally. The sirocco wind (the “east wind” of Gen. 41:6 and Ezek. 19:12) blowing from the southeast during the transition months (May—June, September—October) brings dust-laden clouds across the land. It dries vegetation and has a withering effect on people and animals. On occasion the temperature may rise 30 degrees Fahrenheit and the humidity fall to less than 10 percent.

Along the coastal plain, the daily temperature fluctuation is rather limited because of the Mediterranean breezes. In the mountains and in Rift Valley the daily fluctuation is much greater.

PALLET Small, usually straw-filled, mattress light enough to be carried. All biblical references are found in accounts or summaries of the healing of invalids (Mark 2:4-12; John 5:8-12; Acts 5:15). The “bedridden” man of Acts 9:33 was one who had lain on a pallet for eight years.

PALLU (Pal'loo) Personal name meaning “conspicuous,” “wonder,” or “distinguished.” Second son of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; Num. 26:5,8; 1 Chron. 5:3). KJV used the alternate spelling Phallu in Genesis.

PALLUITES (Pal'lootes) Descendants of Pallu (Num. 26:5).

PALMERWORM Caterpillar stage of a species of locust (Joel 1:4; 2:25; Amos 4:9). See Insects.

PALMS Date palm (Phoenix dactylifera) was among the earliest cultivated trees. Five thousand-year-old inscriptions from Mesopotamia give instruction for their cultivation. Palms are characteristic of oases and watered places (Exod. 15:27; Num. 33:9). The fruit of the date palm is highly valued by desert travelers since it may be consumed fresh or else dried or made into cakes for a portable and easily storable food. Jericho was known as the city of palms (Deut. 34:3; Judg. 1:16; 3:13). The judge Deborah rendered her decisions under a palm bearing her name (Judg. 4:5). The palm was a symbol of both beauty (Song 7:7) and prosperity (Ps. 92:12). Thus, images of palms were used in the decoration of the temple (1 Kings 6:29,35; 7:36) and were part of Ezekiel's vision of the new temple (Ezek. 40:16,22,26). Palms were used in the construction of the booths for the festival of booths (Lev. 23:40; Neh. 8:15). In John 12:13 the crowd used palm branches to welcome Jesus to Jerusalem. PALMS, CITY OF Alternate name for Jericho (Deut. 34:3; Judg. 1:16; 3:13; 2 Chron. 28:15). See Jericho

PALSY KJV term for paralysis (Matt. 4:24; 9:2; Luke 5:18; Acts 8:7). The descriptions of the Gospel writers do not permit identifications with specific forms of paralysis. The Gospel writers were rather concerned to present Jesus as the One to whom God had entrusted the authority to forgive sins (Matt. 9:6) and whose healing ministry was a cause for glorifying God (Matt. 9:8).

PALTI (Pal' ti) Personal name meaning "my deliverance." 1. Benjamin's representative among the 12 spies sent to survey Canaan (Num. 13:9). 2. Second husband of Michal, King Saul's daughter who had previously been given in marriage to David (1 Sam. 25:44; KJV, Phalti). Michal was later returned to David in consequence of Abner's defection from Ishbosheth (2 Sam. 3:15-16). The fuller form Paltiel, meaning "God delivers," is used in 2 Samuel (KJV, Phaltiel).

PALTIEL (Pāl' tî ēl) Personal name meaning "God is (my) deliverance." 1. Leader of Issachar whom Moses appointed to assist Joshua and Eliezer in distribution of land to the tribes west of the Jordan (Num. 34:26). 2. Fuller form of the name of Saul's son-in-law (2 Sam. 3:15-16). See Palti.

PALTITE (Pāl' tî) Title meaning "resident of Beth-pelet," given to Helez, one of David's 30 elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:26). The parallels in 1 Chronicles read Pelonite (11:27; 27:10).

PAMPHYLIA (Pām phīl' yā) One of the provinces of Asia Minor. Located in what is now southern Turkey, Pamphylia was a small district on the coast. It measured about 80 miles long and 20 miles wide. One of the chief cities was Perga, where John Mark left Paul and Barnabas during the first missionary journey (Acts 13:13). Other important cities were the ports of Side and Attalia. The NT records no other significant events for the early church in Pamphylia, perhaps because of the concentration of non-Hellenized people in the region. This would make the spread of the gospel slower and harder to achieve.

PAN Shallow, metal cooking utensil. Pans were used for baking bread for family use (2 Sam. 13:9) or as an offering (Lev. 2:5; 6:21; 1 Chron. 23:29).

Deeper pans were used for boiling meat (1 Sam. 2:14). NASB used pans to refer to dishes for incense (Num. 7:14,20,26). NIV mentioned silver pans among Cyrus' gifts for rebuilding the Jerusalem temple (Ezra 1:9). In the KJV an iron pan (NRSV plate) serves as symbol of the coming siege of Jerusalem (Ezek. 4:3).

PANNAG (Pān' ag) Hebrew term, perhaps meaning “pastry,” which the KJV took as a place-name (Ezek. 27:17). NASB, NIV readings (cakes, confection) are supported by an Akkadian cognate and the Targum. RSV follows variant manuscripts in reading “early figs.” REB, NRSV read “millet.” TEV reads “wheat.” The Greek term chartes, translated “paper” in 2 John 12, designates a sheet of papyrus.

PAPER, PAPYRUS (Pā pi' rūs) Popular writing material invented by the Egyptians and used by scribes from 2500 B.C. to A.D. 700.

The English word “paper” is derived from the word papyrus. The papyrus plant once grew in abundance along the Nile delta (“Can the papyrus grow tall where there is no marsh?” [Job 8:11 NIV]), providing the Egyptians with an inexpensive writing material which was exported throughout the Mediterranean world. The papyrus plant is a tall, aquatic reed that grows as high as 15 feet and becomes as thick as a person's wrist. Its triangular stalk was cut into 12-inch sections. The center section of each stick of papyrus, the pith, would be sliced into thin one-inch strips. A sheet of paper was made by arranging these one-by-twelve-inch strips vertically and overlaying them with another layer of strips horizontally. The two layers of green fibrous strips were then mashed together and dried by the sun, which bonded the double-layered sheet of papyrus. The horizontally lined side of the papyrus sheet was scraped smooth, obviously providing the best writing surface for horizontal script. Several sheets were glued together to form a papyrus roll, which was called a biblos (Gk. for “scroll” or “book”).

A modern variety of the ancient papyrus plant from whose stalks writing material was made.

By A.D. 100 papyrus was used to make a codex (Latin for “book”). The codex—a stack of papyrus sheets, bound at one end—proved to be more economical than the roll since a scribe could write on both sides of the paper. A codex was also less cumbersome, considering the transportation of rolls and the difficulty of cross-referencing. Eventually, papyrus was replaced by the more expensive and yet more durable “parchment” (animal skins). Aged papyrus became brittle, literally causing words to fall off the page. Furthermore, unlike papyrus, parchment could be erased and used again. The only biblical reference to papyrus paper is found in 2 John 12, where the Elder writes: “Though I have many things to write to you, I don’t want to do so with paper (Gk. chartes) and ink” (HCSB).

New Testament manuscripts produced before the fourth century were written exclusively on papyrus; after the fourth century almost all NT documents were preserved on parchment. See Bible Texts and Versions; Library; Writing.

PAPHOS (Pá' phōs) Town on the southwest side of Cyprus and capital of the island during NT times. Paul, Barnabas, and John Mark came to the city on their first missionary journey and possibly led the proconsul, Sergius Paulus, to Christ (Acts 13:6-12). See Cyprus.

PARABLES Stories, especially those of Jesus, told to provide a vision of life, especially life in God's kingdom. Parable means a putting alongside for purposes of comparison and new understanding. Parables utilize pictures such as metaphors or similes and frequently extend them into a brief story to make a point or disclosure. Nevertheless, a parable is not synonymous with an allegory.

The difference between a parable and an allegory turns on the number of comparisons. A parable may convey other images and implications, but it has only one main point established by a basic comparison or internal juxtaposition. For example, the parable of the mustard seed (Mark 4:30-32; Matt. 13:31-32; Luke 13:18-19) compares or juxtaposes a microscopically small seed initially with a large bush eventually.

An allegory makes many comparisons through a kind of coded message. It correlates two areas of discourse, providing a series of pictures symbolizing a series of truths in another sphere. Each detail is a separate metaphor or what some call a “cryptogram.” If you are an insider who knows, you receive the second or intended message. Otherwise, you can follow only the surface story. Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels is an allegory as is John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. In the OT Ezekiel recounts an incident in nature about great eagles and vines (17:3-8) and then assigns a very allegorical application to each of the details (17:9-18).

The word “allegory” never appears in the Gospels. Parable is the basic figure Jesus used. Though no parable in the Synoptic Gospels is a pure allegory, some parables contain subordinated allegorical aspects, such as the parable of the wicked tenants (Mark 12:1-12; Matt. 21:36-46; Luke 20:9-19). Even in the parable of the mustard seed the passing reference to the birds of heaven nesting in the branches (Mark 4:32) may be an allegorical detail, but the distinction of the parable establishing a basic, single comparison remains and aids interpretation. See Allegory.

Parables Prior to Jesus Though Jesus perfected the oral art of telling parables, their background can be found in the OT and in secular sources. The OT employs the broader category of mashal, which refers to all expressions that contain a comparison. A mashal can be a proverb (1 Sam. 10:12), a taunt (Mic. 2:4), a dark riddle (Ps. 78:2), an allegory (Ezek. 24:3-4), or a parable. The stories of Jesus are linked with the heritage of the prophetic parables in the OT (Isa. 28:23-29; 5:1-7; 1 Kings 20:39-43; Eccles. 9:13-16; 2 Sam. 12:1-4).

Perhaps the most interesting antecedent of the parables of Jesus comes from Nathan's word to David. Nathan told the unsuspecting David the seemingly harmless story of a rich man and a poor man living in the same city (2 Sam. 12:1-4). The poor man owned only a single little ewe lamb he loved as a household pet while the rich man possessed large flocks; yet when the wealthy farmer had a guest to serve, he seized the poor man's single lamb for the dinner! The teller of the story was living dangerously as he seized a teachable moment to confront the life of the most famous king of Israel. He sought to get inside David's guard and cut the iron bonds of his self-deception to strike a moral blindness from his eyes. In a sense it was a well-laid trap since David responded with moral outrage, thus condemning himself. Nathan then applied the parable to the king's affair with Bathsheba

(2 Sam. 12:5-14). This eventful parable and others in the OT belong to the same tradition in which our Lord stood.

The parable was also recognized as a literary type before the time of Jesus in the writings of the Greeks concerning rhetoric. The famous writer Homer included 189 parables in The Illiad and 39 more in The Odyssey. Plato's poetic speech was rich in similitudes interwoven into his speech but not so much independent unities like those of Jesus. Some of the illustrations of Socrates were parabolic. Aristotle recognized the place of parable in his writings.

Bible students disagree about whether the rabbis prior to Jesus used parables. Scholars like C. A. Bugge and Paul Fiebig pointed to numerous rabbinic parables derived from the beginning of the first century A.D. Others, such as Jeremías, found almost none until after the days of Jesus. We do know of parables from the rabbis soon after the time of Jesus, and we do recognize that the parables of Jesus are not only far more compelling but center in the coming kingdom of God rather than in exposition of the Law or Torah as the rabbinic parables.

Jesus' Special Use of Parables Many of the parables grew out of the conflict situations when Jesus answered His religious critics. These answering parables, usually for Pharisees and sinners simultaneously, expose and extol. Jesus exposed the self-righteousness of His critics and extolled the kingdom of God. When John the Baptizer was accosted for being too serious and Jesus for being too frivolous, Jesus came back with the parable of the playing children (Matt 11:16-19; Luke 7:31-35) to expose the inconsistency of the criticism. In His most famous parable He extolled the forgiving love of the father and exposed the hostile criticism of the unforgiving elder brother (Luke 15:11-32).

In fact Jesus interpreted His ministry and its place in salvation history by means of parable. He addressed different audiences such as the crowds, the disciples, and the critics with definite purposes. Indeed, the teller as well as the tale is important. That is, the fact that Jesus was the author affects the meaning. As Jesus interpreted His ministry through parables, these sometimes have a “Christological penetration.” Jesus Himself appears indirectly in the story (Mark 3:23-27). The parables are not merely clever stories but proclamation of the gospel. The hearer must respond and is invited by the story to make a decision about the kingdom and the King. The parable of the wicked tenants (Mark 12:1-12) represented a blatant confrontation.

These stories got Jesus in trouble as He made veiled claims of kingliness and exposed the hypocrisy regnant in the religious hierarchy. One of the reasons they crucified Jesus was because of His challenging parables and the claims of His kingdom.

Jesus' Different Kinds of Parables Jesus could turn people's ears into eyes, sometimes with a still picture and then again with a moving picture. He uttered parabolic sayings referring to the salt of the earth (Matt. 5:13) or throwing pearls before swine (Matt. 7:6). These parable germs or incipient parables were generally one liners with a picturesque appeal to the imagination. Remarkably, the Gospel of John has no parables as such; it does include 13 parabolic sayings.

Jesus also spoke simple parables that represent a picture elaborated into a story. These extended pictures portray a general situation growing out of a typical experience and appealing to common sense. They are often specifically concerning the kingdom of God and are introduced with the saying, “The kingdom of God is like....” Examples are the paired parables of the treasure and the pearl (Matt. 13:44-46), the tower builder and the warring king (Luke 14:28-32), and the lost sheep and lost coin (Luke 15:3-10). They are extended similes.

Additionally, Jesus told His famous narrative parables that represent a specific situation and often include in the first sentence reference to a certain person. While Matthew reported a great many parabolic sayings, Luke contains numerous narrative parables, such as the parable of the unjust steward (16:1-8), the compassionate Samaritan (10:30-37), and the rich fool (12:16-21). A narrative parable is a dramatic story composed of one or more scenes, drawn from daily life yet focused on an unusual, decisive circumstance.

Special Literary Considerations Narrative parables and the simple parables total more than 40 examples. Certain metaphors recur in the different parables. For example, seed parables such as those of the sower, the seed growing of itself, and the mustard seed in Mark 4 focus on the nature of the coming kingdom. Master/servant parables reflect a time of critical reckoning. Kingly parables, especially in Matthew, portray the sovereignty of the divine judgment and grace. Householder parables feature an authoritative figure whose purpose is resisted or rejected yet whose will is finally achieved. This latter category points to the realism of rejection of the will of God fully allowable on the one hand by the divine provision of freedom while on the other hand the divine insistence of the eventual triumph of His loving purpose.

Attention to parable form also brings up the prominence of the question format, the refusal parables, and the place of direct discourse. Jesus intended to involve His hearers, and so He constructed many parables that amount to one big question. The parable of the servant and his wages moves by means of two questions (Luke 17:7-10). The parable of the unjust steward (Luke 16:1-8) includes four questions. These interrogatives within parables often define a dilemma (Luke 12:20; Mark 12:9) or call for an agreeing nod in one area of life that carries over to another.

The refusal parables are those that express the intention of a character not to do what is requested. The elder brother refused to enter the festivities in honor of the prodigal son (Luke 15:28), and wedding guests rejected the invitation to attend the festivities of a wedding (Matt. 22:3). These and other examples of the refusal to do the will of God recognize the reality of human pride, stubbornness, hypocrisy, and rejection that Jesus encountered during His proclaiming ministry.

Direct discourse is also immensely important in many of the parables because it brings the stories to life. Through the human conversation the parable often makes its point, especially in the last speech. Surely Jesus delivered these lines from each of the parabolic characters in a most animated fashion and even interpreted His parables by the tone of His voice.

Common Theme of Jesus' Parables Jesus' great thesis centers on the kingdom of God (Mark 1:15). Each parable explores and expands the theme. The kingship of God or Yahweh may be found first in the OT (Ps. 24:9-10; Isa. 6:5). Daniel 4 proclaims the divine sovereignty over the secular kingdoms, and the Ten Commandments require full obedience to God.

Jesus lifted the theme to new heights and through His parables portrayed the nature of the kingdom (Mark 4:26-29), the grace of the kingdom (Luke 18:9-17), the crisis of the kingdom (Luke 12:54-56), and the conditions of the kingdom such as commitment (Luke 14:28-30), forgiveness (Matt. 18:23-35), and compassion (Luke 10:25-37).

The parables further proclaim the kingdom as ethical, experiential or existential, eschatological, and evangelistic. Several parables accentuate ethical concerns such as attitude toward one's fellows (Luke 18:9-14; 15:25-32; Matt. 18:23-35). Jesus insisted on being religious through relationships. The rousing call to repentance embodied in many parables requires a moral and spiritual reorientation of life around the kingdom.

Many parables reach the water table of common experience and illumine existence or life. Jesus could expose a pale or petrified life. He could convey the moving experience of being lost in the far country and then to come to oneself and go home (Luke 15:17). His parables exposed the inauthentic life aggressively as self-centered and greedy (Luke 12:13-21; 16:19-31).

As Jesus proclaimed through parables, God was bursting into history, the hinge of history had arrived. He announced it with urgency. He brought an otherworldly perspective to bear in the parable of the rich fool (Luke 12:13-21). He foresaw the full future coming of the kingdom (Matt. 13:8,30,32,39).

The parables are evangelistic because they sought to stimulate a decision and change a life. They invited the audience to repent and believe. The parables intended to awaken faith. The teller's faith was contagious. The segment about the elder brother (Luke 15:25-32) is unfinished and open-ended. He could choose to swallow his pride, activate his own forgiving spirit, put on his dancing shoes, and join the party.

Unspoken Parables Like the prophets, Jesus enacted some of His intended message. His parabolic acts were boldly done. For example, He chose from His larger following a special group of 12 disciples (Mark 3:13-19), symbolizing His creation of a new Israel. Throughout His ministry Jesus graciously received spiritual and social outcasts as the friend of sinners, indicating the Father's loving grace. He cursed the fig tree (Mark 11:12-14,20-21), pointing to the divine judgment on Israel. He rode into Jerusalem in regal humility on the first Palm Sunday, calling forth Zechariah's expectation. He cleansed the temple (Mark 11:15-19), enacting God's will for Israel to be a light to the nations. At the Last Supper as He broke the bread and poured the wine, He enacted with mini parables the loving sacrifice of Calvary.

Parables' Perspective on Life Some of the stories carry a pastoral and others a prophetic relevance. They have both sugar and steel. The parable of the mustard seed speaks pastorally about ending despair, and the parable of the persistent widow (Luke 18:1-8) encourages one to hang in there. The parable of the barren fig tree (Luke 13:6-9) speaks prophetically concerning national priorities; the parable of the wicked tenants accosts arrogant religious leaders; and the parable of the rich fool confronts false confidence in materialism. Through the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector, grace peers down on two people praying in the temple, and appearances take a pounding. Grace shines on worship, and revelation happens! PARACLETE Transliteration of the Greek word literally meaning “called beside or alongside to help.” John exclusively used the term in the NT. He described the Spirit as another “Paraclete” who teaches (John 14:16), reminds the disciples of what Jesus taught (John 14:26), testifies (John 15:26), and convicts of sin (John 16:7-8). John also described Jesus as the first “Paraclete” (John 14:16) or advocate (1 John 2:1). See Advocate; Comforter; Counselor; Holy Spirit.

PARADISE Old Persian term which means literally “enclosure” or “wooded park,” used in the OT to speak of King Artaxerxes' forest (Neh. 2:8) and twice of orchards (Eccles. 2:5; Song 4:13). All three NT occurrences (Luke 23:43; 2 Cor. 12:4; Rev. 2:7) refer to the abode of the righteous dead (heaven). The Greek OT (Septuagint) used “paradise” to translate the Hebrew words for the garden of Eden in Gen. 2-3. Over the years the terms became synonymous, and eventually paradise came to refer to heaven. Jewish theology then developed an opposite place for wicked persons, gehenna, a burning furnace. See Future Hope; Heaven.

PARAH (Pá' rah) Place-name meaning “heifer” or “young cow.” Village in territory of Benjamin about five miles northeast of Jerusalem, identified with modern Khirbet el-Farah (Josh. 18:23). The Hebrew parat, often translated Euphrates (KJV, NASB, NRSV), may refer to the spring 'Aln Farah at Jer. 13:4-7 (cp. NASB, NRSV margin, “Paran”). NIV, REB simply transliterate the term.

PARALLELISM See Poetry.

PARALYSIS See Disabilities and Deformities; Palsy.

PARAMOUR Illicit sexual partner (Ezek. 23:20 KJV, NASB, NRSV; Hos. 3:1 RSV). Other translations read: lovers (NIV); male prostitutes (REB); and oversexed men (TEV).

PARAN (Pá' rán) 1. Wilderness area south of Judah, west of Edom, and north of Sinai. Israel camped there after leaving Sinai during the exodus and sent spies to scout out the promised land from Kadesh, a location in Paran (Num. 10:11-12; 13:3,26). Chedorlaomer turned back his military campaign at El-paran (Gen. 14:5-7). Ishmael made his home there after Abraham was forced to send Hagar and him away (Gen. 21:21). King Hadad of Edom eluded Joab by going through Paran to Egypt (1 Kings 11:17-18). 2. Mount Paran appears as a poetic parallel to Mount Sinai (Deut. 33:2; cp. Hab. 3:3) as the place of revelation. If not the same place as Sinai, the location is unknown.

PARBAR (Pār' bār) Hebrew term of uncertain meaning used only at 1 Chron. 26:18. Some translations (KJV, NASB, RSV) merely transliterate the term. Others offer plausible translations: (western) colonnade (NRSV, REB), western pavilion (TEV), and court to the west (NIV). Suggested renderings of the plural of parvar (or a related term) in 2 Kings 23:11 include: precincts (NASB, NRSV), court (NIV), and suburbs (KJV). It was apparently a road, an open area, or a room near the temple.

PARCHED GRAIN Common food prepared by roasting grains in a pan or by holding heads of grain over a fire (Lev. 23:14; Josh. 5:11; Ruth 2:14; 1 Sam. 17:17; 25:18; 2 Sam. 17:28). Parched grain served as food for harvest workers, soldiers, and refugees. Mosaic law prohibited the eating of parched grain before the firstfruits of the grain had been offered to God. The exact type of grain is not indicated by the Hebrew term; probably barley or wheat was meant.

PARCHED PLACES Expression some translations (KJV, NIV, NRSV) use for “arid land” (Jer. 17:6). Other translations include “stony wastes” (NASB) and “among the rocks” (REB).

PARCHMENT See Paper, Papyrus.

The parched land and places of the Wadi Arabah south of the Dead Sea.

PARDON Authoritative act reversing a sentence given under a guilty verdict. Prayer for God's pardon for sin is based on the greatness of God's covenant love and on the long history of God's acts of forgiveness (Num. 14:19; Mic. 7:18). The OT believers were already aware that the condition for seeking pardon was a repentant heart rather than ritual exactness (1 Chron. 29:18). God's willingness to abundantly pardon serves as an incentive to repentance (Isa. 55:7). See Atonement; Forgiveness; Reconciliation.

PARE To trim or shave off. The paring of nails served as a sign of mourning for lost parents (Deut. 21:12 KJV, REB, NRSV). An Israelite desiring to marry a female prisoner of war was required to allow her to cut her hair and pare her nails first. These actions perhaps symbolized purification on entering the covenant community.

PARENTS, PARENTING See Family.

PARLOUR British variant of “parlor.” The KJV used “parlour” in three passages. In each case modern translations replace parlor with a term more suitable to the context: (1) inner chambers (NRSV), courts (REB), or rooms (NIV) of the temple (1 Chron. 28:11); (2) dining hall (REB) or hall (NIV, NRSV) in which Saul shared a sacred meal with Samuel (1 Sam. 9:22); (3) the upper room (NIV) or roof chamber (NRSV, REB) of a palace (Judg. 3:20,23-25).

PARMASHTA (Pär mǎsh' tá) Personal name, probably of Persian origin, possibly meaning “strong-fisted” or “the very first.” One of Haman's 10 sons (Esther 9:9).

PARMENAS (Pär' mə nās) Personal name meaning “faithful” or “constant.” One of the seven chosen by the Jerusalem congregation to distribute food to the Greek-speaking widows of that church (Acts 6:5).

PARNACH (Pär' nāk) Persian personal name of uncertain meaning. Father of Elizaphan (Num. 34:25).

PAROSH (Pä' rōsh) Personal name meaning “flea.” 1. Ancestor of a post-exilic family (Ezra 2:3; 8:3; KJV, Pharosh; 10:25; Neh. 7:8). 2. One of the witnesses to Ezra's renewal of the covenant (Neh. 10:14), possibly the father of Pedaiah (Neh. 3:25). This Parosh was likely the chief member of the family above.

PAROUSIA (Pär ü se' á) Transliteration of Greek word which means “presence” or “coming.” In NT theology it encompasses the events surrounding the second coming of Christ. See Day of the Lord; Eschatology; Future Hope; Kingdom of God.

PARSHANDATHA (Pär shǎn dǎ' thá) Personal name, probably of Persian origin, possibly meaning “inquisitive.” One of Haman's 10 sons (Esther 9:7).

PARSIN (Pär' sīn) See Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin.

PARTHIANS (Pär' thī áns) Tribal people who migrated from Central Asia into what is now Iran. Their homeland was an area southeast of the Caspian Sea. They spoke an Aryan dialect very close to Persian and worshiped the Persian god, Ahura Mazda. The Parthians adopted Greek culture following their fall to Alexander the Great. About 250 B.C. they revolted against the Seleucid rule and reached a height of power under King Mithradates who ruled from 171 to 138 B.C. In 53 B.C. the Romans invaded but were defeated on several occasions. They did not gain control of Parthia until

A.D. 114. Some Parthians were among those in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost who heard the gospel in their own language (Acts 2:9-11).

PARTIES, JEWISH See Jewish Parties in the New Testament.

PARTRIDGE Stout-bodied, medium-size game bird with variegated plumage. David likened his life as a fugitive from Saul to a hunted partridge (1 Sam. 26:20). The translation of the proverb of the partridge (Jer. 17:11) is difficult; the Hebrew is extremely terse, and one of the verbs is of uncertain meaning (brood, gather, or lay). Various translations understand the action in the following ways: a partridge sits on eggs which will not hatch (KJV); a partridge gathers chicks it did not hatch (RSV); a partridge sits on eggs it did not lay (REB); a partridge hatches eggs it did not lay (NASB, NIV, NRSV TEV). The KJV interpretation is an apt picture of riches that come to nothing. In other interpretations the partridge that steals eggs or chicks is no less fortunate than any bird whose chicks grow and leave the nest.

PARUAH (Pá ru' ah) Personal name meaning "blossoming," "joyous," or "increase." Father of Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 4:17).

PARVAIM (Pär vá' im) Source of gold for Solomon's decoration of the temple (2 Chron. 3:6). The place is perhaps el Farwaim (Farwa) in Yemen, or else a general term for the East.

PASACH (Pá' sák) Personal name, perhaps meaning "divider." Member of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:33).

PASCHAL Adjective expressing relation to the Passover. From the Greek pascha, which is the Hellenized spelling of the Aramaic pascha (or pischa) for the Hebrew pesach, "Passover." The paschal meal was the supper prepared and eaten during the Passover celebration (Exod. 12; Matt. 26:17,19; Mark 14:14,16; Luke 22:8,11,13; John 18:28, where the "Passover" meal is specifically in view). By metonymy, pascha is sometimes used in particular of the paschal lamb found at the center of the paschal meal's observance and significance (Exod. 12:21; Ezra 6:20; Mark 14:12; Luke 22:7, e.g., where the literal "Passover" lamb is in view). Paul rightly sees in Christ the completion and fulfillment of the paschal sacrifice

(1 Cor. 5:7)—the unblemished Lamb of God slain “by” the people and yet “for” the people, whose blood protects everyone under it from the avenging hand of God's wrath and opens the way for God's full redemption (Rom. 3:25; 5:9; Eph. 1:7; Rev. 1:5). Interestingly most translations simply use the word “Passover” both as a noun and as an adjective, though “paschal” is found, for example, once in the RSV and NRSV (1 Cor. 5:7).

PASDAMMIN (Pās dām' mīn) Place-name meaning “boundary of blood.” Scene of David's victory over the Philistines (1 Chron. 11:13). The site is probably between Socoh and Azekah, the same as Ephes-dammin (1 Sam. 17:1).

PASEAH (Pā sē' ah) Personal name meaning “lame.” 1. Member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:12). 2. Ancestor of a family of temple servants (Neh. 7:51; KJV “Phaseah”). 3. Father of Joiada (Neh. 3:6).

PASHHUR (Pāsh' ūr) Personal name meaning “son of (the god) Horus.” 1. Chief officer in the Jerusalem temple in the last years before Nebuchadnezzar's victory over the city. He had Jeremiah beaten and imprisoned (Jer. 20:1-2). He or another Pashhur was the father of Gedaliah (Jer. 38:1). 2. Man in Zedekiah's court in Jerusalem (Jer. 21:1). As the Babylonian army approached, Pashhur asked Jeremiah for a word from the Lord. Jeremiah prophesied the destruction of the city (21:1-7; cp. 38:1-3). 3. Forebear of a priestly family (1 Chron. 9:12) who returned from the exile (Ezra 2:38) and who later gave up their foreign wives (10:22; cp. Neh. 10:3; 11:12).

PASSION 1. Any bodily desire which leads to sin (Rom. 6:12; Gal. 5:24; Eph. 2:3). Passion is especially used for strong sexual desire (Rom. 1:26-27; 1 Cor. 7:9; 1 Thess. 4:5). Unregenerate life is characterized by slavery to passions (Eph. 2:3; Titus 3:3; 1 Pet. 1:14). Those who belong to Christ have crucified fleshly passions (Gal. 5:24; cp. Rom. 6:5-14). In their frequent appeals to renounce passions, NT letters likely echo charges to baptismal candidates (Col. 3:5; 2 Tim. 2:22; Titus 2:12). 2. KJV twice used the phrase “like passions” (Acts 14:15; James 5:17) to mean “shared human nature.” 3. The suffering of Jesus during the last two days of His life. Luke uses a word translated “passion” only in Acts 1:3 (KJV, after His passion). The root is the Greek verb pascho, “to suffer.” Acts 17:3 and 26:23 use pathein to speak specifically of Christ's suffering—Jesus foretold His sufferings a number of times, and yet His disciples rejected this possibility (Matt. 16:21; Mark 9:12; Luke 17:25). His passion is reflective of the prophetic portrait of the Suffering Servant (Isa. 53).

Jesus was not presented as a victim. He suffered and died willingly in accordance with God's purpose (Matt. 20:28; Heb. 9:26). The sufferings of Jesus were for a specific purpose—the salvation of all who would believe. His passion became an atoning act for the sins of the world. KJV and RSV used “passion” once (Acts 1:3). HCSB, NASB, NIV, and NRSV replace “passion” with “suffering.” REB and TEV read “death.”

PASTOR Common translation of the Greek noun poimen (Eph. 4:11) and its verb form; also the Hebrew ra'ah (Jer. 3:15; 10:21; 12:10; 22:22 KJV). Literally, a shepherd or one who keeps animals (Gen. 4:2; 13:7; 46:32,34; Exod. 2:17; Isa. 13:20; Jer. 6:3; Luke 2:8,15,18,20) but used figuratively of those called by God to feed (Jer. 3:15; John 21:16), care for (Acts 20:28), and lead (1 Pet. 5:2) His people, who are His “flock” (Num. 27:17; 1 Kings 22:17; Jer. 3:15; 10:21; 12:10; 22:22; Ezek. 34:2,5,7-10; Zech. 10:3; John 21:16; Acts 20:28; Eph. 4:11; 1 Pet. 5:2). Much instruction directed toward such church leaders can be found in the Pastoral Epistles (1 and 2 Tim. and Titus). Preeminently, the idea is applied to and fulfilled in Christ (Isa. 40:11; Mic. 5:2; Zech. 13:7; Matt. 2:6; 25:32; 26:31; Mark 14:27; John 10:11,14; Heb. 13:20; 1 Pet. 2:25; Rev. 7:17) and God Himself (Pss. 23:1; 27:9; 47:5; Jer. 23:3; 31:10; Ezek. 34:12,23-24; Hos. 13:5). In the NT pastor (shepherd) appears to depict aspects, or functions, of the responsibilities of the overseer/ elder (1 Pet. 2:25, where the two are put together in Christ). See Minister, Ministry.

PASTORALS First and Second Timothy and Titus are called the Pastoral Epistles, a title first used by Anton in 1753. Paul wrote these letters to coworkers he had left in charge of the churches in Ephesus and Crete, respectively.

A theme of entrustment and stewardship of the gospel runs throughout these epistles. Paul composed 1 Timothy to instruct his young associate to stop the false teaching in Ephesus (1:3) and to inform Timothy how persons should conduct themselves within the church (3:14-15). The apostle directed Titus to set the Cretian churches in order (1:5). Paul penned 2 Timothy to “pass on the mantle” and encourage Timothy to remain a faithful steward of the gospel.

Only since the 19th century have scholars seriously questioned the authorship and setting of these letters. Defenders of the Pastorals' authenticity argue that Paul was released from his two-year imprisonment in Acts 28, traveled back to the East, engaged in further missionary work, and was later arrested and imprisoned in Rome again, from where he wrote 2 Timothy. Accordingly, the apostle wrote the Pastorals sometime after his first imprisonment around A.D. 62 and before A.D. 68. Many scholars argue that an admirer or associate of Paul composed these epistles in the second century.

Critics support the latter theory using these criteria. First, they stress that the vocabulary and style differ from the other Paulines. Such arguments are subjective. Variations in subject matter, occasion, purpose, and addressees may account for these differences. The use of a secretary by Paul may also explain the presence of many words in the Pastorals.

Second, defenders of pseudonymity contend that church structure is too advanced for Paul's time, and reflects a monarchical bishopric. Such objections overlook that the same type of church structure found in the Pastorals also is found in Paul's ministry (cp. Acts 20:17-28; Phil. 1:1).

Third, they date the heresy opposed in these letters later than Paul's lifetime and contend for a developed, second-century Gnosticism. An incipient first-century Gnosticism probably operated in Paul's day. The false teaching addressed also contained many Jewish elements (1 Tim. 1:7; Titus 1:10,14; 3:9).

Fourth, they contend that the Pastorals do not emphasize characteristic Pauline doctrines like the believer's union with Christ and the work of the Holy Spirit. Many also suggest that a concern for "sound teaching" and tradition reflects the end of the first century. However, the absence of typical themes is overstated. Moreover, the emphasis on doctrine does not require a later date. Paul stressed tradition (cp. 1 Cor. 11:2) and cited creedal sayings and hymns in his letters (cp. 1 Cor. 15:3-5; Phil. 2:6-8; Col. 1:15-17).

Finally, opponents of Pauline authorship argue that these letters contain historical allusions to Paul's life which cannot be placed within the book of Acts (cp. 1 Tim. 1:3; Titus 1:5; 2 Tim. 1:8,16-17; 4:16). Traditionally, defenders of authenticity have responded with the theory of a second Pauline imprisonment in Rome. A study of Acts 28 does indicate that Paul was likely released. Under this view references in the Pastorals cannot be placed within Acts because they happened at a later date. Also, the book of Acts does not record some details of Paul's life (cp. 2 Cor. 11).

A resort to pseudonymity and a date in the second century is not necessary for the Pastoral Epistles. These letters can be wholly relied upon as authentic and trustworthy. See Timothy, First Letter to; Timothy, Second Letter to; Titus, Letter to. Terry Wilder

PATH A walkway. Two contrasting paths are a common image for rival ways of life in Hebrew wisdom literature. The path of the wicked (Prov. 4:14) who forget God (Job 8:13) is crooked (Prov. 2:15). This approach to life contrasts with the path of righteousness (Ps. 23:3; Prov. 2:13,20). This alternate path is called the path of God (cp. Pss. 17:5; 25:4,10) and of light (Job 24:13). This life-path entails living by the commands or instruction of the Lord (Ps. 119:35,105; Prov. 10:17). The reward for following this path is life (Prov. 10:17; 12:28; cp. Ps. 16:11; Prov. 2:19; 5:6). The wise are those who follow this way (Prov. 15:24). The paths of justice (Prov. 2:8; 8:20), peace (Prov. 3:17), and righteousness refer to the practice of these qualities.

PATHROS (Pāth' rōs) Hebrew transliteration of Egyptian term for Upper (southern) Egypt. Upper Egypt included the territory between modern Cairo and Aswan. The NIV translates the term; other translations transliterate (Isa. 11:11; Jer. 44:1,15; Ezek. 29:14; 30:14).

PATIENCE Active endurance of opposition, not a passive resignation. Patience and patient are used to translate several Hebrew and Greek words. Patience is endurance, steadfastness, long-suffering, and forbearance.

God is patient (Rom. 15:5). He is slow to anger in relation to the Hebrews (Exod. 34:6; Num. 14:18; Neh. 9:17; Ps. 86:15; Isa. 48:9; Hos. 11:8-9). The Hebrews were frequently rebellious, but God patiently dealt with them. Jesus' parable of the tenants depicted God's patience with His people (Mark 12:1-11). God's patience with sinners allows time for them to repent (Rom. 2:4), especially in the apparent delay of the return of Christ (2 Pet. 3:9-10).

God's people are to be patient. The psalmist learned to be patient when confronted with the prosperity of the wicked (Ps. 37:1-3,9-13,34-38). Christians should face adversity patiently (Rom. 5:3-5). Patience is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). Christian love is patient (1 Cor. 13:4,7). Ministers are to be patient (2 Cor. 6:6).

Christians need patient endurance in the face of persecution. Hebrews stressed endurance as the alternative to shrinking back during adversity (Heb. 6:9-15; 10:32-39). Jesus is the great example of endurance (Heb. 12:1-3). Perseverance is part of maturity (James 1:2-4). Job's perseverance is another example for suffering Christians (James 5:11). John frequently highlighted the patient endurance of Christians (Rev. 2:2,19; 3:10; 13:10; 14:12). Christian patience is ultimately a gift from God (Rom. 15:5-6; 2 Thess. 3:5). PATMOS (Păt' mos) Small island (10 miles by six miles) in the Aegean Sea located about 37 miles southwest of Miletus. The Romans used such places for political exiles. John's mention of the island in Rev. 1:9 probably means that he was such a prisoner, having been sent there for preaching the gospel. Eusebius (an early church father) wrote that John was sent to Patmos by Emperor Domitian in A.D. 95 and released after one and one-half years. See Revelation, Book of.

PATRIARCHS Israel's founding fathers-Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the 12 sons of Jacob (Israel). The word "patriarch" comes from a combination of the Latin word pater, "father," and the Greek verb archo, "to rule." A patriarch is thus a ruling ancestor who may have been the founding father of a family, a clan, or a nation.

The island of Patmos on which John was probably exiled by the Romans.

The idea of a binding agreement between God and mankind antedated the patriarchs, being first expressed in the time of Noah (Gen. 6:18; 9:8-17). The growth of the Hebrew nation was promised specifically to Abraham in the patriarchal covenant (Gen. 15; 17), along with the provision of a land in which Abraham's offspring would dwell. Since several generations elapsed before this situation developed, the covenant with Abraham must be regarded as promissory. The promises made to Abraham established the concept of a people descended through Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who would be in a special historical and spiritual relationship with God. See Covenant.

Abraham, or Abram as he was called in the earlier chapters of Genesis, was a ninth-generation descendant of Shem, son of Noah. Abram's father Terah was born in Ur of the Chaldees, as were his brothers Nahor and Haran (Gen. 11:26,28). See Shem; Terah; Ur.

At an early period Abraham had testified that God was the Most High God (Gen. 14:22), the righteous Judge of mankind (Gen. 15:14), and the Guarantor of the covenant of promise. He experienced close communion with God (Gen. 18:33; 24:40) and worshiped Him consistently to the exclusion of all other gods. His fidelity and obedience were characteristic features of his personality and made this renowned forefather of Israel (cp. Rom. 4:1-4) an example of the way in which men and women are justified before God. See Abraham; Nuzi.

The line of descent by which the covenant was to be perpetuated consisted solely of Abraham's son Isaac; through him the covenant promises were continued. Isaac's name is generally thought to mean "laughter," but it possibly also conveys the more subtle sense of "joker." It commemorated the occasion when both Abraham and Sarah laughed at God's promise to provide them with a son in their old age (Gen. 17:17-19; 18:9-15).

We have very little information about the maturing years of Isaac except that he was used as the supreme test of Abraham's faith in the covenant promises. Under the patriarchal system the father had the power of life or death over every living person and thing in his household. At the very moment that Isaac's life was about to be taken, his position as covenant heir was safeguarded by the provision of an alternative sacrificial offering (Gen. 22:9-13). The circumstances attending his marriage to Rebekah afforded Isaac great comfort after the death of his mother (Gen. 24:67). Isaac prayed earnestly to God for covenant heirs, and in due time Rebekah became pregnant with twins when Isaac was 60 years old. Esau grew up to be a hunter, while Jacob followed the more sedentary lifestyle of his father by supervising the family's flocks and herds, moving with them when it was necessary to find fresh pasture (Gen. 25:27). Isaac unfortunately provoked sibling rivalry by favoring Esau above Jacob. The former brought his father tasty venison, whereas Jacob's culinary expertise seems only to have extended to preparing lentil soup (Gen. 25:28-29). In a moment of desperate hunger, Esau traded his birthright for some of Jacob's soup, thereby transferring to his brother a double portion of Isaac's estate as well as other rights.

In old age Isaac's sight failed, and, when it became apparent that Esau might inherit the extra birthright provision after all, Rebekah conspired with her favorite son Jacob to deceive Isaac into blessing him rather than Esau.

The success of the scheme made Esau extremely angry. To escape his vengeance Jacob fled to Mesopotamia on his mother's instructions. Before he arrived he received a revelation from God which confirmed his inheritance in the covenant. Jacob later encountered the family of Laban, son of Nahor, and in due course married two of Laban's daughters. After some years absence Jacob finally returned to Mamre, where his father was living, and along with Esau buried him when he died at the age of 180 years.

Isaac's life, though less spectacular than Abraham's, was nevertheless marked by divine favor. He was circumcised as a sign of covenant membership and owed his life to timely divine intervention when a youth (Gen. 22:12-14). He was obedient to God's will (Gen. 22:6,9), a man of devotion and prayer (Gen. 26:25), and a follower of peace (Gen. 26:20-23). He fulfilled his role as a child of promise (Gal. 4:22-23). See Isaac.

The life of Jacob, the last of the three great patriarchs, was marked by migrations, as had been the case with his ancestors. Although he lived successively at Shechem (Gen. 33:18-20), Bethel (Gen. 35:6-7), and Hebron (Gen. 35:27), Jacob was basically a resident alien who did not have a capital city.

Just before Isaac's death, God appeared again to Jacob (Gen. 35:9) and renewed the promise of his new name. Jacob resided in Canaan thereafter and only left when a famine overtook the land. Jacob and his sons were invited to live in Egypt by Joseph. As his life drew to a close, Jacob, like his father Isaac, became blind, but he blessed his sons by means of a spoken last will and testament, after which he died peacefully. His body was embalmed in the Egyptian manner, and he was buried subsequently in the cave of Machpelah along with his ancestors (Gen. 49:30-50:13). Despite his apparent materialism, Jacob was a person of deep spirituality who, like Abraham, was esteemed highly by his pagan neighbors. Despite his fears he behaved honorably and correctly in dealing with his avaricious father-in-law Laban and was equally consistent in fulfilling his vow to return to Bethel. Jacob trusted the God whom he had seen at Peniel to implement the covenant promises through him; and when he died, he left behind a clearly burgeoning nation. See Jacob.

The date of the patriarchal period has been much discussed. A time before 2000 B.C. (early Bronze Age) seems too early and cannot be supported easily by reference to current archaeological evidence. The middle Bronze period (2000-1500 B.C.) seems more promising because of contemporary archaeological parallels and also because many of the Negev irrigation systems date from that period. Some scholars have suggested the Amarna period (1500-1300 B.C.) as the one in which the patriarchs lived, but this presents problems for any dating for the exodus. The same objection applies to a late Bronze Age (1500-1200 B.C.) period for the patriarchs. The least likely date is in the Judges period or the time of King David. All such dates do not allow time for the patriarchal traditions to have developed and make it impossible for Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to be fitted realistically into an already known chronology. A date in the middle Bronze Age seems to offer the most suitable solution to a complex problem of dating.

PAUL Outstanding missionary, theologian, and writer of the early church. Paul is a very important figure in the NT and in the history of Christianity. He wrote 13 epistles that comprise almost one-fourth of the NT. Approximately 16 chapters of the book of Acts (13-28) focus on his missionary labors. Thus Paul is the author or subject of nearly one-third of the NT and the most important interpreter of the teachings of Christ and of the significance of His life, death, and resurrection.

Early Life and Training (A.D. 1-35) Birth and Family Background Paul was born in a Jewish family in Tarsus of Cilicia (Acts 22:3), probably sometime during the first decade of the first century. According to Jerome, Paul's family moved to Tarsus from Gischala in Galilee. Paul's family was of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil. 3:5), and he was named for the most prominent member of the tribe—King Saul. Paul probably came from a family of tentmakers or leatherworkers and, according to Jewish custom, was taught this trade by his father. Apparently the business thrived and Paul's family became moderately wealthy. Paul was a citizen of the city of Tarsus, “an important city” (Acts 21:39). According to one ancient writer, the property qualification for Tarsian citizenship was 500 drachmae, a year and a half's wages.

Roman Citizenship More importantly, Paul was born a Roman citizen. Many speculate that Paul's father or grandfather was honored with citizenship because of some special service rendered to a military proconsul. However, early Christian tradition preserved by Jerome and Photius stated that Paul's parents had been carried as prisoners of war from Gischala to Tarsus, enslaved to a Roman citizen, then freed and granted citizenship. Regardless of how Paul's parents received their citizenship, the book of Acts states three times that he possessed it, and his citizenship was accompanied by important rights that would benefit him in his missionary labors. The Roman citizen had the right of appeal after a trial, exemption from imperial service, right to choose between a local or Roman trial, and protection from degrading forms of punishment like scourging. Paul might have carried a wax tablet that functioned as a birth certificate or certificate of citizenship in order to prove his Roman citizenship. However, most people who claimed citizenship were trusted since the penalty for impersonating a Roman citizen was death.

Rabbinic Training Acts 22:3 shows that Paul grew up in Jerusalem. Paul used this fact to prove that he was no Diaspora Jew who was more influenced by Gentile culture than Jewish ways. He was educated in Jerusalem in the Jewish religion according to the traditions of his ancestors (Acts 22:3). The Mishnah taught: “At five years old [one is fit] for the Scripture, at ten years for the Mishnah, at thirteen [for the fulfilling of] the commandments, at fifteen for the Talmud, at eighteen for the bride-chamber, at twenty for pursuing a calling, at thirty for authority.” This is probably a fairly accurate description of the regimen of training that Paul experienced. Acts 22 says that Paul was trained by Rabbi Gamaliel I, the member of the Sanhedrin mentioned in Acts 5:33-39. Gamaliel was a leading Jewish teacher in Paul's day. The Mishnah mentions Gamaliel I frequently and expresses many of his opinions. Gamaliel was listed among 13 great rabbis whose deaths marked the decline of Judaism: “When Rabbi Gamaliel the Elder died, the glory of the Law ceased and purity and abstinence died.” The passage implies that Gamaliel was as renowned for his high moral standards as for his interpretation of the Scriptures. Paul quickly excelled as a Jewish rabbinical student. As Paul says in Gal. 1:14, “I advanced in Judaism beyond many contemporaries among my people, because I was extremely zealous for the traditions of my ancestors.” In Phil.

3 Paul describes himself as “circumcised the eighth day; of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew born of Hebrews; as to the law, a Pharisee; as to zeal, persecuting the church; as to the righteousness that is in the law, blameless” (HCSB). In Acts 26:5 Paul again identifies himself with the sect of the Pharisees. His father had also been a Pharisee (Acts 23:6).

Persecution of Christians As an ideal Pharisee Paul was probably active as a Jewish missionary winning Gentiles as proselytes. He may have been like the Pharisees Jesus described who traveled “over land and sea to make one convert” (Matt. 23:15 HCSB). Paul's words “If I still preach circumcision” may allude to his past as a Jewish missionary (Gal. 5:11). Paul, more than his mentor Gamaliel (Acts 5:34-39), recognized the serious threat that the followers of Jesus posed to the traditional Jewish religion. The Mishnah taught that a Jewish male was ready for a position of authority at age 30. Thus Paul was probably in his thirties when he, with authorization from the chief priest, began to imprison believers first in the synagogues of Jerusalem and then later in Damascus. Perhaps Paul's clearest description of persecution is found in Acts 26:9-11, “I myself supposed it was necessary to do many things in opposition to the name of Jesus the Nazarene. This I actually did in Jerusalem, and I locked up many of the saints in prison, since I had received authority for that from the chief priests. When they were put to death, I cast my vote against them. In all the synagogues I often tried to make them blaspheme by punishing them. Being greatly enraged at them, I even pursued them to foreign cities” (HCSB). Some believe this reference to casting a vote (literally “casting a pebble”—black for no or white for yes) implies that Paul was a member of the Sanhedrin. However, it is difficult to imagine that Paul would not have explicitly stated this especially on those occasions in which he highlights his devout Jewish pedigree. Most commentators thus take the statement as a metaphor implying that Paul consented to the execution of believers or suggest that he was a member of a committee appointed by the Sanhedrin and vested with this authority. Paul's initial and adamant rejection of Jesus as the Messiah may largely have been motivated by Jesus' ignoble death. Death by crucifixion was indicative of divine curse (Deut. 21:23). Certainly the Messiah could not have died under the curse of God. But when Paul wrote his first epistle, this death curse was recognized as the grounds for substitutionary atonement (Gal. 3:10-14). In 1 Cor. 1 Paul explained that the idea of a crucified Messiah was a stumbling block to the Jews. Probably Paul was speaking from his own past experience.

Paul's Conversion (A.D. 35) While Saul was on his way to Damascus to arrest and imprison believers there, the resurrected and glorified Christ appeared to him with blinding radiance. Christ's words "It is hard for you to kick against the goads" indicate that God had already begun His convicting work earlier. Like an ox kicking against a goad in the hand of the ox driver, Paul had been resisting divine guidance and leadership resulting in his own harm and pain. At the appearance of Christ, Saul immediately surrendered to His authority and went into the city to await further orders. There his blindness was healed and he received the Holy Spirit and accepted believer's baptism. No doubt Ananias shared with Paul the message that the Lord had given him in a vision: "This man is My chosen instrument to carry My name before Gentiles, kings, and the sons of Israel. I will certainly show him how much he must suffer for My name!" Paul spent a few days with the disciples in Damascus.

Paul's Missionary Travels (A.D. 35-61) Early Travels Soon after his conversion, Paul traveled to Arabia where he began evangelization of the Nabatean Arabs (Gal. 1:17; 2 Cor. 11:32-33) and probably experienced his first opposition to the gospel from political authorities. He then returned to Damascus where he began to go into the synagogues to preach the message that had been revealed to him on the Damascus road: Jesus is the Son of God and the promised Messiah. The Jews in Damascus watched the city gates in order to kill Paul, and he had to escape through a window in the wall by being lowered in a basket (Acts 9:22-25).

Paul then traveled to Jerusalem. Church leaders were initially suspicious of Paul, but Barnabas intervened in his behalf (Acts 9:26-30 and Gal. 1:18). After 15 days in Jerusalem, visiting with Peter and James, the Lord's brother, Paul returned to Tarsus, evangelizing Syria and Cilicia for several years. Doubtless he heard them describe Jesus' life and teachings, though Paul's gospel was already clearly defined even before this visit. While in Syria, Barnabas contacted Paul and invited him to become involved in the Antioch church, where large numbers of Gentiles were responding to the gospel. The church at Antioch collected money to carry to the believers who suffered in Judea during a period of famine. Barnabas and Paul were chosen by the church to carry the gift to Jerusalem (Acts 11:27-30). This probably was the occasion of the conference described by Paul in Gal. 2:1-10. Many equate this with the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15), but if Galatians were written after an official ruling by the apostles, Paul would only have to display the letter from the apostles to discredit the Judaizers. Furthermore, the conference in Gal. 2:1-10 appears to have been a private meeting rather than a public affair. The pillars of the Jerusalem church, Peter, John, and James the brother of Jesus, approved the no-Law gospel preached by Paul and his focus on Gentile evangelism.

First Missionary Journey Paul and Barnabas soon began their first missionary journey, traveling through Cyprus and Anatolia probably during the years A.D. 47-48. The missionary team carried the gospel to the cities of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. These cities were located in the Roman province of Galatia, and it is probably these churches in south Galatia to which the epistle to the Galatians is addressed. Galatians was probably written during this journey.

Jerusalem Council When Paul returned to Antioch from the first missionary journey, he found himself embroiled in controversy over requirements for Gentile salvation. Peter and even Barnabas were vacillating on the issue of Jew-Gentile relationships. Even worse, some false teachers from the Jerusalem church had infiltrated congregations in Antioch and were teaching, "Unless you are circumcised according to the custom taught by Moses, you cannot be saved." The church appointed Paul and Barnabas to go to Jerusalem and settle the matter. A council was convened in A.D. 49 that included the missionary team, those who insisted upon circumcision as a requirement for salvation, and the apostles. The Apostle Peter and James the brother of Jesus spoke in defense of Paul's Lawfree gospel, and a letter was sent to the Gentile churches confirming the official view. Paul returned to Antioch and remained there from 49 to 51.

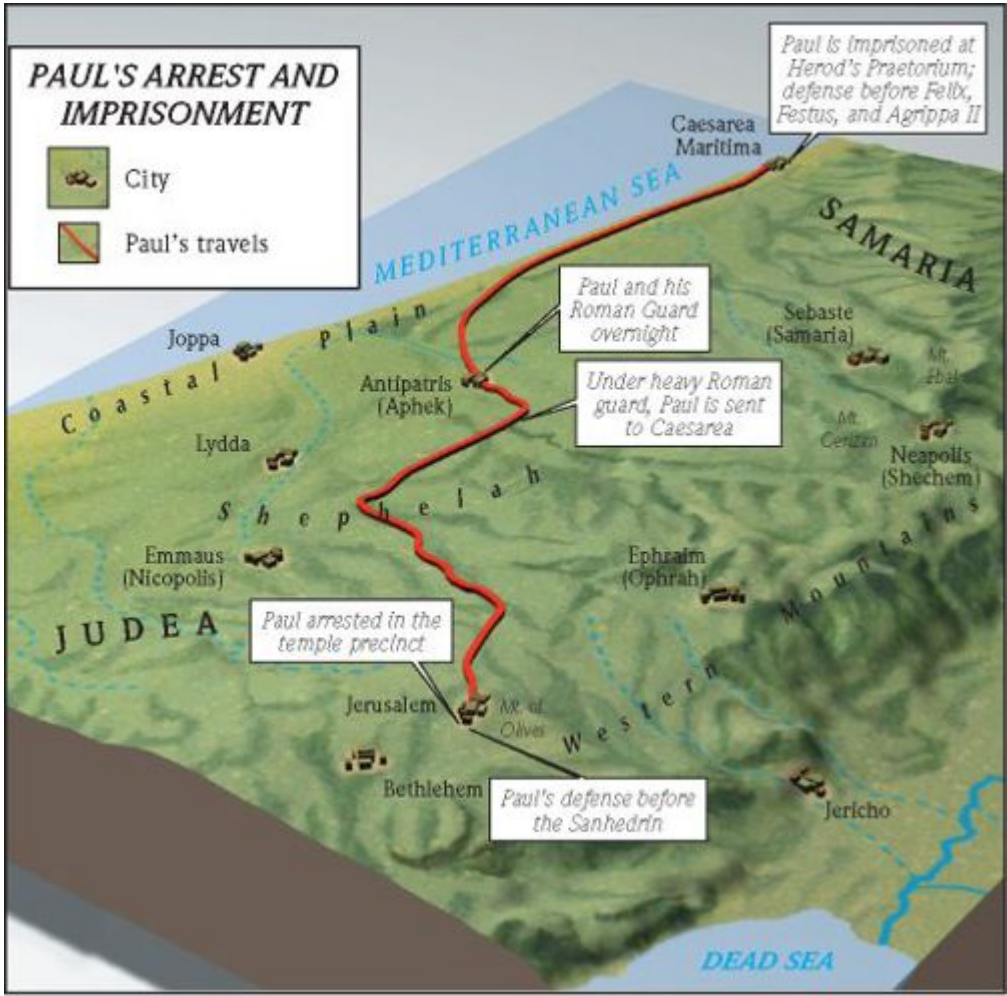

Second Missionary Journey The second missionary journey carried Paul through Macedonia and Achaia in A.D. 50-52. Paul and Barnabas parted company early in this journey in a disagreement about the participation of Barnabas' nephew John Mark. Mark had abandoned the team on the first journey (Acts 15:38). Paul took Silas and established churches in Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea. Barnabas went with John Mark. Paul also spent 18 months in Corinth strengthening a fledgling church there. Four of Paul's letters are addressed to churches known from this second journey. Most scholars believe that 1 and 2 Thessalonians were written during this journey.

Third Missionary Journey Paul's third missionary journey (A.D. 53-57) focused on the city of Ephesus where Paul spent the better part of three years. Toward the end of this journey, Paul worked hard to collect another relief offering for Jerusalem believers. Paul wrote 1 and 2 Corinthians and Romans during this journey.

Final Years Paul carried the relief offering to Jerusalem. While in the temple performing a ritual to demonstrate his Jewish faithfulness to some of the Jerusalem believers, Jewish opponents incited a riot, and Paul was arrested (A.D. 57). Paul was sent to Caesarea to stand trial before the procurator Felix. After two years of procrastination on the part of his detainers, Paul finally appealed to the Roman emperor for trial. After arriving in Rome, Paul spent two years under house arrest awaiting his trial. Paul wrote Philemon, Colossians, Ephesians, and Philippians during this first Roman imprisonment.

The record of Acts ends at this point, so information as to the outcome of the trial is sketchy. Early church tradition suggests that Paul was acquitted (ca. A.D. 63) or exiled and fulfilled the dream expressed in Rom. 15:23-29 of carrying the gospel to Spain (A.D. 63-67). Paul probably wrote 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus during the period between his acquittal and a second Roman imprisonment. According to church tradition Paul was arrested again and subjected to a harsher imprisonment. He was condemned by the Emperor Nero and beheaded with the sword at the third milestone on the Ostian Way, at a place called Aquae Salviae and lies buried on the site covered by the basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls. His execution probably occurred in A.D. 67.

Reconstruction of Caesarea Maritima where Paul was imprisoned for two years (Acts 23:31-26:32).

Paul's Appearance No biblical record of the appearance of Paul or his physical condition exists. We know that he must have been a hearty individual to endure the abuses and trials that he suffered as an apostle (2 Cor. 11:23-29). He was evidently the victim of some serious eye disease (Gal. 4:12-16). This may account for his characteristically large signature appended to letters which were penned by a secretary (Gal 6:11). The earliest description of Paul's appearance appears in a book from the NT Apocrypha which says that Paul was “a man small of stature, with a bald head and crooked legs, in a good state of body, with eyebrows meeting and nose somewhat hooked, full of friendliness; for now he appeared like a man, and now he had the face of an angel.” The writer attributes the description of Paul to Titus, and it may have some historical basis. Although it sounds unflattering to moderns, several of the physical features mentioned were considered to be traits of the ideal Roman.

Paul's Gospel Paul's gospel indicted all humanity for the crime of rejecting God and His rightful authority. Under the influence of Adam's sin, mankind plunged into the depths of depravity so that they were utterly unable to fulfill the righteous demands of God (Rom. 1:18-32; 3:9-20; 9:12-19) and deserved only the wrath of God (Rom. 1:18; 2:5-16). The sinner was alienated from God and at enmity with Him (Col. 1:21). Consequently, the sinner's only hope was the gospel which embodied God's power to save those who had faith in Christ (Rom. 1:16). The focus of Paul's gospel was Jesus Christ (Rom. 1:3-4). Paul affirmed Jesus' humanity and His deity. Christ was a physical descendent from the line of David (Rom. 1:2), came in the likeness of sinful man (Rom. 8:3), and had assumed the form of a humble obedient servant (Phil. 2:7-8). Yet He was the visible form of the invisible God (Col. 1:15), all the fullness of deity living in bodily form (Col. 2:9), the very nature of God (Phil. 1:6), and possessed the title "Lord" (Greek title for the God of the OT), the name above all names (Phil. 2:9-11). Paul believed that by virtue of His sinlessness, Jesus was qualified to be the sacrifice which would make sinners right with God (2 Cor. 5:21). In His death on the cross, Jesus became the curse for sin (Gal. 3:10-14), and the righteous died for the unrighteous (Rom. 5:6-8). Salvation is a free gift granted to believers and grounded solely in God's grace. Salvation is not dependent upon human merit, activity, or effort, but only upon God's undeserved love (Eph. 2:8-10; Rom. 6:23). Those who trust Jesus for their salvation, confess Him as Lord, and believe that God raised Him from the dead (Rom. 10:9) will be saved from God's wrath, become righteous in God's sight (Rom. 5:9), adopted as God's children (Rom. 8:15-17), and transformed by the Spirit's power (Gal. 5:22-24). At the coming of Christ believers will be resurrected (1 Cor. 15:12-57), will partake fully of the Son's righteous character (Phil. 3:20-21), and will live forever with their Lord (1 Thess. 4:17). By his union with Christ through faith, the believer participated spiritually in Christ's death, resurrection, and ascension (Rom. 6:1-7:6; Eph. 2:4-5). Consequently, the believer has been liberated from the power of sin, death, and the Law. He is a new, though imperfect, creation that is continually being made more Christlike (Col. 3:9-10; 2 Cor. 5:17). Although the believer is no longer under the authority of the written Law, the Holy Spirit functions as a new internal law which leads him naturally and spontaneously to fulfill the Law's righteous demands (Rom. 8:1-4). As a result, the Law-free gospel does not encourage unrighteous behavior in believers. Such behavior is contrary to their new identity in Christ. The union of believers with Christ brings them into union with other believers in the body of Christ, the church. Believers exercise their spiritual gifts in order to help one another mature, to serve Christ, and glorify Him, which is the church's highest purpose (Eph. 3:21; 4:11-13). Christ now rules over the church as its Head, its highest authority (Eph. 1:22). When Christ comes again, His reign over the world will be consummated, and all that exists will be placed under His absolute authority (Phil. 2:10-11; 4:20; Eph. 1:10). He will raise the dead: unbelievers for judgment and punishment; believers for glorification and reward (2 Thess. 1:5-10).

PAULUS, SERGIUS See Sergius Paulus.

PAVILION Large, often richly decorated tent. KJV used “pavilion” seven times: three times in the literal sense of tents used in military campaigns (1 Kings 20:12,16; Jer. 43:10), twice of the thick canopy of clouds surrounding God (2 Sam. 22:12; Ps. 18:11) which illustrates the mystery of God, and twice as an image of God's protection (Pss. 27:5; 31:20). NASB, NIV, and NRSV substituted various terms (booths, canopy, shelter, tabernacle, tent) in each of these passages. The NASB used “pavilion” in the literal sense of tent in Dan. 11:45. Elsewhere in modern translations “pavilion” appears in poetic passages: a pavilion for the sun (Ps. 19:4-5 NIV), God's pavilion of clouds (Job 36:29 NASB, REB, NIV, NRSV), and a pavilion protecting Jerusalem from heat and rain (Isa. 4:5, RSV).

PEACE OFFERING See Sacrifice and Offering.

PEACE A condition or sense of harmony, well-being, and prosperity. The biblical concept means more than the absence of hostility, and it is more than a psychological state.

Old Testament The Hebrew word shalom and its derivatives have been said to represent “one of the most prominent theological concepts in the OT.” (The word group occurs about 180 times in the OT.) It was not a negative or passive concept but involved wholeness and completeness. The related verb could mean to “repay” or “fulfill a vow” and so referred to completing or repairing a relationship. A related adjective could be used to describe something as “uninjured, safe, complete, peaceable.” Peace could refer to harmony between friends or allies, triumph in war, success in one's endeavors, good health, and security. The Hebrew equivalent of the English greeting “How are you?” is “Do you have 'peace'?” (cp. Gen. 29:6; 2 Sam. 18:29; 2 Kings 4:26; Esther 2:11).

A bilateral “treaty of peace” (Josh. 9:15; 10:1) would mean that both parties promised to refrain from hostilities against the other and furthermore would seek the other's welfare, including a pledge of aid if the treaty partner were attacked. To “go in peace” meant to go with an assurance of friendship and favor (Gen. 26:31; Exod. 4:18; 1 Sam. 20:42; Mark 5:34; Luke 7:50). God's “covenant of peace” with His people would involve the assurance of an enduring relationship with the One who is our peace (Isa. 9:6; Mic. 5:5) and a pledge to protect their welfare and to abundantly bless them by His divine grace, wisdom, and power (Num. 25:12; Isa. 54:10; Ezek. 34:25; 37:26; Mal. 2:5).

Walking with the Lord “in peace and uprightness” (Mal. 2:6 NIV) means to maintain harmony with Him by faith and obedience and so to enjoy His peace (cp. Num. 6:26; Job 21:25; Ps. 125:5; Prov. 3:17; Isa.

48:18; 57:2; 59:8; cp. Luke 1:79). Peace is the opposite of the ultimate experience of the wicked (Isa. 48:22; 57:21; 59:8).

The shelem offering, traditionally translated “peace offering” but more often today “communion” or “fellowship offering,” was an offering which celebrated the joy of having “peace” with God and all it involved. Finally, the term “peace” can refer to the sense of confident awareness that all is well (Gen. 15:15; 2 Kings 22:20; Ps. 4:8; Isa. 26:3).

In view of this it is not surprising that the term shalom is so often associated with the Davidic covenant and the prophetic promises of a coming messianic kingdom. The salvation of the Lord, spoken of so often in the OT, essentially amounts to a bringing of peace (1 Kings 2:33—“for David, his descendants, his house, and his throne, there will be peace forever from the LORD”; Isa. 9:7—“Of the increase of his government and peace there will be no end. He will reign on David's throne and over his kingdom, establishing and upholding it with justice and righteousness from that time on and forever”). That peace will be the result of God's coming and ruling in righteousness (Isa. 32:17; 60:17).

New Testament The term translated “peace” in the NT is eirene. It occurs in every NT book except 1 John (most frequently in Luke: 14 times; followed by Romans: 10 times; then Ephesians: 8 times.) Outside the Bible the Greek word was likely to mean just the opposite of war, but its use to translate shalom in the Septuagint may have been what broadened its usage. Like shalom, the term in the NT could refer not only to the absence of hostility, strife, and disorder (1 Cor. 14:33) but also to the condition and sense of being safe and secure (Acts 9:31). Christ made peace between believing Jew and Gentile by making them into one new man in Him (Eph. 2:14-15). The term could also describe a state of either physical or spiritual well-being. When Jesus used it as a blessing (Luke 24:36; John 14:27; 16:33; 20:19,21,26; cp. Col. 3:15) and the Apostle Paul used it at the beginning of his letters, they referred to more than a sense of confidence in

God. The term brought to mind all that Christ would do or had done through the cross and the resurrection to end the dominion of sin and to make peace between God and man (Rom. 5:1; Col. 1:20), peace between all who are in Christ (2 Cor. 13:11; Eph. 4:3), and a state of being spiritually whole again (Rom. 14:17; Gal. 5:22). The gospel message was called “the gospel of peace” (Eph. 6:15). “Peace” was the angelic promise at Jesus’ birth in Luke 2:14, “peace on earth to people He favors!” (HCSB; cp. Luke 19:38). The world cannot achieve or provide peace (Jer. 6:14; John 14:27; 1 Thess. 3:5) because it cannot deal with the problem of sin. Thus God’s peace that guards the Christian’s heart and mind “surpasses every thought” (Phil. 4:7; cp. 2 Thess. 3:16).

PEACEMAKERS Those who actively work to bring about peace and reconciliation where there is hatred and enmity. God blesses peacemakers and declares them to be His children (Matt. 5:9). Those who work for peace share in Christ’s ministry of bringing peace and reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:18-19; Eph. 2:14-15; Col. 1:20).

PEACOCK Male of any of several species of large pheasants, native to southeastern Asia and the East Indies, which are raised as ornamental birds. KJV translated two Hebrew words as “peacock.” Modern translations replaced “peacock” with “ostrich” at Job 39:13. NASB, NRSV read “peacock” with KJV at 1 Kings 10:22 and 2 Chron. 9:21. Other translations read “monkey” (REB, RSV) or “baboon” (NIV, NRSV margin).

PEASANTRY NASB and RSV translation of an obscure Hebrew term used only in Deborah’s song of victory (Judg. 5:7, 11). KJV, NIV, TEV followed the Targum (Aramaic paraphrase) and Syriac version in reading “villages.” REB reads “champion.” Various commentators have suggested “leading class,” “warriors,” and “strength” as possible meanings.

PEDAHEL (פֶּדַחֵל אֶחָזֵל) Personal name meaning “God delivers.” Leader of the tribe of Naphtali whom Moses appointed to assist Joshua and Eliezer in the distribution of land to the tribes living west of the Jordan (Num. 34:28).

PEDAHZUR (Pə dāh' zūr) Personal name meaning “(the) Rock redeems.” Father of Gamaliel (Num. 1:10; 2:20; 7:54,59; 10:23).

PEDAIAH (Pə dī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah redeems.” 1. Maternal grandfather of King Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:36). 2. Father (1 Chron. 3:18-19) or uncle (Ezra 3:2,8; 5:2; Neh. 12:1; Hag. 1:1,12,14; 2:2,23) of Zerubbabel. First Chronicles presents Pedaiah and Shealtiel as brothers. 3. Manassite father of Joel (1 Chron. 27:20). 4. Son of Parosh assisting in Nehemiah's repair of the wall (Neh. 3:25). 5. Witness to Ezra's renewal of the covenant (Neh. 8:4), perhaps identical with 4. 6. Benjaminite father of Joed (Neh. 11:7). 7. Levite whom Nehemiah appointed as temple treasurer (Neh. 13:13).

PEDDLER One who sells goods, usually on the street or door-to-door. Paul denied being a peddler of God's word (2 Cor. 2:17). Here Paul either emphasized that he did not preach for pay (1 Cor. 9:12,15) or that he did not use tricks to gain converts (2 Cor. 4:2; 12:16).

PEDIMENT NRSV term for the stone base upon which Ahab set the bronze sea after removing it from the 12 bronze oxen (2 Kings 16:17). Other translations for pediment include: base (NIV), foundation (TEV), pavement (KJV, NASB). Ahab's changes in the temple equipment were an attempt to gain favor with the Assyrians.

PEER PRESSURE Feeling need to follow course of action because friends and colleagues advise it or follow it; usually works negatively rather than positively (Prov. 18:24; Rom. 12:2; 1 Cor. 15:33; Heb. 3:13; 12:1). Instead of listening to the elder advisors of his father, Rehoboam submitted to pressure from his peers, “the young men who had grown up with him” (1 Kings 12:8; cp. 2 Chron. 13:7). In contrast, Solomon asked God for wisdom and knowledge so that he might reign well (2 Chron. 1:10).

PEG Small, cylindrical, or tapered piece of wood (or some other material). Pegs were used: to secure tents (Judg. 4:21-22; 5:26); to hang articles (Isa. 22:23,25; Ezek. 15:3); to weave cloth (Judg. 16:14); even to dig latrines (Deut. 23:13). Isaiah 22:23-25 used the image of a peg that gives way to picture false security in a leader. Zechariah 10:4 used the peg as one of several images for rulers. In Isa. 33:22 secure tent pegs symbolize that God keeps Jerusalem secure. The enlarged tent and strengthened tent pegs of Isa. 54:2 illustrate God's restoration of Jerusalem.

PEKAH (Pē' kah) Personal name meaning "open-eyed." Officer in Israel's army who became king in a bloody coup by murdering King Pekahiah (2 Kings 15:25). His reign of 20 years (15:27) probably is the total time he held military control in Gilead and Samaria. Pekah appeared to be the leader in Gilead during Menahem's reign but surrendered control there when Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria confirmed Menahem's rule. Pekah then was given a high office in the army, and the coup followed shortly after Pekahiah succeeded Menahem. Pekah reigned in Samaria 752-732 B.C. and was in turn assassinated by Hoshea (15:30). See Menahem.

PEKAHIAH (Pēk ā hi' ah) Personal name meaning "Yah has opened his eyes." King of Israel 742-740 B.C. He succeeded his father, Menahem, as a vassal of the Assyrian throne (2 Kings 15:23). The tense political situation he inherited was very hostile, as the loyalists and rebel zealots vied for control. Pehakiah's uneventful reign ended when he was assassinated by an army officer, Pekah (15:25), who was supported by Syria and opposed to the Assyrian domination. See Pekah.

PEKOD (Pē' kōd) Hebrew for "punishment" or "judgment" which plays on the name Puqadu, an Aramean tribe inhabiting the area east of the mouth of the Tigris (Jer. 50:21; Ezek. 23:23). Sargon II (722-705 B.C.) incorporated Pekod into the Assyrian Empire. Pekod formed part of the Babylonian Empire in the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

PELAI AH (Pē la' yah) Personal name meaning "Yahweh is wonderful (or performs wonders)." 1. Descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:24). 2. Levite assisting in Ezra's public reading of the Law (Neh. 8:7). 3. Levite witnessing Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:10), perhaps identical to 2.

PELALIAH (Pē la li' ah) Personal name meaning "Yahweh intercedes." Ancestor of a priest in Ezra's time (Neh. 11:12).

PELATIAH (Pĕl'ā tī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh delivers.” 1. Descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:21). 2. One of the Simeonites destroying the remaining Amalekites at Mount Seir (1 Chron. 4:42). 3. Judean prince who offered “wicked counsel,” perhaps appealing to Egypt for help in a revolt against the Babylonians (Ezek. 11:1,13; cp. Jer. 27:1-3; 37:5,7,11). 4. Witness to Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:22).

PELEG (Pĕ' lĕg) Personal name meaning “division” or “watercourse.” Descendant of Shem (Gen. 10:25), ancestor of Abraham (Gen. 11:16-19; 1 Chron. 1:19,25) and Jesus (Luke 3:35). Peleg's name is attributed to one of the many firsts recorded in Genesis, the “division” of the earth or land. Tradition associates this division with the confusing of languages and the consequent scattering of peoples from Babel (Gen. 11:8-9). Noting that peleg often refers to a stream of water (Job 29:6; Pss. 1:3; 46:4; 119:136; Prov. 5:16; 21:1; Isa. 30:25; 32:2), some suggest that the “division” of the land refers to irrigation ditches crisscrossing the landscape. According to this interpretation, Peleg's name commemorates the beginnings of organized agriculture. Though Peleg's descendants are only traced through Abraham, Peleg is recognized as the ancestor of all the Semitic peoples of Mesopotamia, while his brother Joktan was ancestor of the Arabian Semites. See Table of Nations.

PELET (Pĕ' lĕt) Personal name derived from a root meaning “escape.” 1. Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:47). 2. Benjaminite warrior who defected from Saul to David (1 Chron. 12:3).

PELETH (Pĕ' lĕth) Personal name meaning “swift.” 1. Father of On (Num. 16:1). The name is possibly a textual corruption of Pallu (Gen. 46:9; Num. 26:5,8), whose descendants are also associated with the Korah rebellion (Num. 26:9-10). 2. A Jerahmeelite (1 Chron. 2:33).

PELETHITES (Pĕ' lĕth itz) Family name meaning “courier.” Foreign mercenaries King David employed as bodyguards and special forces. Their leader was Benaiah (2 Sam. 8:18). The Pelethites are mentioned in conjunction with the Cherethites. These two groups probably were sea peoples who formed a loyalty to David during his days in the Philistine country while evading Saul. They remained with him until his death, fighting for him during the rebellions against his throne. Following his death they helped Solomon purge the kingdom of David's enemies. See Cherethites.

PELICAN Any member of a family of large, web-footed birds with gigantic bills having expandable pouches attached to the lower jaw. Pelicans are found in Palestine. The Hebrew term translated “pelican” in Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:17, however, suggests a bird which regurgitates its food to feed its young. Other passages (Ps. 102:6; Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14) associate the same Hebrew term with deserted ruins, an unlikely habitat for the pelican. Suggested identifications include the jackdaw (NASB margin), owl (NASB margin, NRSV), and vulture (RSV).

PELLA (Pĕl' lā) City just east of the Jordan River and southeast of the Sea of Galilee. It received a large part of the Jerusalem church when they fled there before the Roman destruction of the Holy City in A.D. 66. Pella became an important link in the church structure from that time. The site was inhabited as early as 1900 B.C. and is mentioned in the Egyptian Execration Texts (1850 B.C.) and the Amarna Letters (about 1400 B.C). Pella was destroyed shortly before the Israelite conquest and not rebuilt until about 350 B.C. Alexander the Great settled the city with Macedonians. In the early years of the first century B.C., it was destroyed again but rebuilt and greatly enhanced by Pompey.

PELONITE (Pĕ' lō nīt) Resident of Pelon, an unknown site. The title belongs to two of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:27,36; 27:10). Pelonite is perhaps a textual corruption for Paltite, the title of Helez in the parallel in 2 Sam. 23:26.

PELUSIUM (Pĕ luz' ŷ ūm) Egyptian military outpost near the mouth of the easternmost branch of the Nile, about 18 miles west of the Suez Canal, identified with modern el Farama. Some modern translations follow the Vulgate in reading “Pelusium” at Ezek. 30:15-16 (NIV, NRSV, TEV; also KJV and NASB margins). Pelusium was the site of the defeat of Pharaoh Psammetichus III by Cambyses of Persia in 525 B.C. KJV, NASB follow the Hebrew in reading “Sin.” Some Greek and Latin witnesses read “Sais,” the capital of the Twenty-sixth (Saite) Dynasty (663-525 B.C.), at 30:15. Sais was located on the westernmost branch of the Nile. The REB follows the earliest Greek translation in reading Syene (modern Aswan) at 30:16. See Sin, Wilderness of.

PENTATEUCH The expression derives from two Greek words penta, “five,” and teuchos, “vessel, container,” and refers to the first five books of OT. This designation dates to the time of Tertullian (ca. 200 A.D.), but Jewish canons label these books collectively as the Torah, which means “Teaching, Instruction.” In English Bibles these first five books are commonly called “Law.” This designation is misleading because it misrepresents the content of the Pentateuch. Large portions are not law at all; they are actually inspiring narratives (virtually all of Genesis; Exod. 1-11; 14-20; 32-34; Lev. 8-10; Num. 9-14; 16-17; 20-25; 27; 31-32; 36). Although Deuteronomium means “second law,” the book presents itself as preaching, Moses' final pastoral addresses.

The Structure and Contents of the Pentateuch The Pentateuch is one continuous narrative. For example, the first verb in Lev. 1:1 (“And He called”) lacks a subject, which must be supplied from the last verse of Exodus. Because of the physical limitations of scrolls, it was necessary, probably from the outset, to divide the narrative into five segments more easily manageable on leather or vellum scrolls. This division dates at least to the second century B.C. in the Septuagint. The partitioning creates the unfortunate impression that these are distinct compositions to be interpreted separately. This is wrong. The story that begins in Gen. 1:1 climaxes with the making of the covenant at Sinai and ends with Moses' theological exposition of the covenant in Deuteronomy.

In the Hebrew text the names derive primarily from the opening words of each scroll. Genesis is called bere'shith, “In [the] Beginning”; Exodus, we'elleh shemoth, “These are the Names”; Leviticus, wayyiqra, “And He Called”; Numbers, bemidbar, “In the Desert” [the fifth word]; and Deuteronomy, elleh haddebarim, “These are the Words.” The names of the books in our English Bibles came via the Latin Vulgate, which followed the Greek Septuagint. They are descriptive of the contents: Genesis, “generation, origin,” derives from the formula that occurs 11 times in the book, “These are the generations of” (Gk. geneseos; e.g., 2:4; 5:1; etc.); Exodus, “going out”; Leviticus reflects the Levitical cultic system; Numbers refers to the numbering of the tribes; and Deuteronomy means “second law” (cp. 17:18). Following Martin Luther, Germans and Scandinavians call them 1st Moses, 2nd Moses, 3rd Moses, 4th Moses, and 5th Moses, reflecting the Mosaic authorship of each book.

We do not know when the divisions originated, but the lines between the books are logical and substantive. The division between Genesis and Exodus occurs where the family history of the Patriarchs ends. The division between Exodus and Leviticus occurs where the narrative describing the construction of the Tabernacle ends (Exod. 35:1-40:18). The book of Numbers begins with the registration of Israel's fighting forces (Num. 1:1-2:34) and Levites (3:1-4:49) as Israel prepares to leave Sinai. Deuteronomy is most obviously a self-contained literary unit, consisting of Moses' final speeches prior to his death. However it may be argued that Deut. 32:48-34:12 represents a natural narrative conclusion to Numbers and that the speeches of Moses (Deut. 1:1-32:47) are a series of sermonic insertions.

In any case, the division of the Pentateuch is artificial. On the basis of style and content, it divides naturally into a series of smaller literary blocks: Gen. 1-11:26, primeval history from creation to Abraham; Gen. 11:27-50:26, the Patriarchal narratives; Exod. 1:1-18:27, Israel's exodus from Egypt; Exod. 20:1-Num. 10:10; Israel at Sinai; Num. 10:11-21:35, Israel in the desert; and Num. 22:1-Deut. 34:12, Israel on the Plains of Moab. Each of these sections consists of easily identifiable literary subdivisions.

It is conceivable that before the present form was cast the materials were preserved on a series of smaller scrolls. Genesis, for example, is punctuated by the formula "These are the generations of..." which occurs 11 times and divides the book formally into 12 sections (2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; 11:10; 11:27; 25:12; 25:19; 36:1; 36:9; 37:2). The Joseph cycle (Gen. 37; 39-48; 50) has its own literary style and may have been preserved separately as perhaps was the narrative of Israel's exodus from Egypt (Exod. 1:1-18:27). We know that the Decalogue (Exod. 20:2-17) was preserved from the outset as a separate document, "written by the finger of God" (Exod. 24:12; 31:18; cp. 32:15-16; 34:1,28; Deut. 4:13; 5:22; 10:2-4). Exod. 24:7 mentions "the covenant document" (Hb. seper berith, usually rendered "the book of the covenant," preserved in Exod. 21:1-23:3 (if not beginning in 20:22)). It appears likely Yahweh's speeches at Mount Sinai (e.g., the prescriptions for construction of the Tabernacle and the dressing of priests [Exod. 25:1-31:17]; instructions concerning the sacrifices [Lev. 1:1-7:38]; the so-called "Holiness Code" [Lev. 17-27]; etc.) were written down immediately, perhaps on separate scrolls and, that when Israel left Sinai, they carried the documents with them. The archaic flavor of the poetry in the pentateuchal narratives (the blessing of Jacob, Gen. 49; the Song of the Sea, Exod. 15:2-18; the Balaam Oracles in Num. 22-24; the Song of Yahweh, Deut. 32:1-43 [intended as Israel's "national anthem"]; Moses' blessing of the tribes, Deut. 33:2-33), suggests these were preserved in written form from the beginning. According to Num. 21:14 Israel possessed a "Book of the Wars of Yahweh," apparently containing records of and poems commemorating his triumphs over Israel's enemies (cp. Exod. 17:14). Numbers 33:1-3 reports that Israel kept a diary of their experiences wandering from place to place (the stopping places listed in 33:5-49. Deuteronomy contains numerous references to "the Torah" that Moses preached as a written text (e.g., 17:18; 27:3; 28:58; 29:21; 30:10). In fact, 31:9 suggests Moses wrote down his final speeches himself. It is plausible that genealogies and other statistical material derive from separate written documents. However the Pentateuch was composed, these documents represent the true origin of the Pentateuch.

The Samaritan Pentateuch at Nablus. Samaritans consider only the Pentateuch as canonical.

The Plot of the Pentateuch The pivotal event of the Pentateuch is God's revelation of himself at Sinai. Everything before is prologue, and all that comes after is epilogue. This is evident from the redundant highlighting of the place in Deut. 19:1-3, and also from the explicit anticipation of Exod. 3:12, where Yahweh told Moses that Israel's service to God at Mount Sinai would prove Yahweh had sent him. This is confirmed by Moses' demands to Pharaoh that he let Israel go to serve Yahweh in the desert (4:23; 5:1,3; 6:11; 7:16; 8:1,25-28; 9:13; 10:3,7,9,24-26). The Patriarchal narratives also look forward to Sinai. In Gen. 12:2 God promises Abraham that he would be a blessing to the whole world. Later we learn that this would involve being the recipient of the divine revelation (cp. Deut. 4:5-8), being a kingdom of priests, a holy nation, a special treasure "among all the peoples, for all the earth is mine" (Exod. 19:5-6). The narrative invites the reader to anticipate the Exodus to Sinai by Yahweh's self-identification in Gen. 15:7:

“I am Yahweh who brought you up from Ur of the Chaldees,” which echoes a phrase appearing dozens of times later, “I am Yahweh, who brought you up out of Egypt” (cp. Lev. 11:45); by citing God's prediction of Israel's enslavement, deliverance, and emergence with wealth (15:13-14), wealth needed to build the tabernacle; by citing Yahweh's promise to give Abraham's descendants the land of Canaan (Gen. 15:18-21), which becomes the expressed reason for the exodus (Exod. 3:7-8; 6:6-8); and by citing God's (El Shaddai's) announcement that He would be God to Abraham and his descendants after him (Gen. 17:7), with whom He would establish His covenant. At Sinai the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob formally became the God of Israel, binding Abraham's descendants to him by confirming the eternal covenant (Exod. 31:16-17; Lev. 24:8; cp. Judg. 2:1). Finally, Sinai is anticipated in Gen. 26:5, where Yahweh recognizes that Abraham “obeyed Me and kept My charge, My commandments, My statutes and My laws” (Gen. 26:5). The expressions echo the Sinai revelation; apparently Abraham fulfilled the requirements of the Sinai covenant without the benefit of the Sinai revelation.

The narratives describing Israel's journey from Sinai to the Plains of Moab are told against the backdrop of Yahweh's covenant with Israel and Israel's promise to do “all that Yahweh had told them.” Numbers 28:6 explicitly refers to the Sinai revelation. But the book of Deuteronomy, virtually in its entirety, represents Moses' exposition of the Sinai covenant. However, remember that the primary character is not human; this is a record of God's relationship with those He created in His own image, whom He elected, redeemed, and commissioned to be His agents on the earth.

The Themes of the Pentateuch The theological themes developed in the Pentateuch are virtually innumerable. These represent the theological skeleton of the narratives: God as Creator (Gen. 1-2); God as Judge of sinful humanity, who spared Noah (Gen. 3-11:26); God as the one who elected His agents of blessing the world, entered into covenant relationship with them, and promised to give the land of Canaan to their descendants as an eternal possession (Gen. 11:27-50:26); God as one who redeemed His people from slavery (Exod. 1-15:21); God as one Who accompanied His people during their desert travels, providing for their physical needs and punishing the faithless (Exod. 15:22-17:7; 18:1-27; Num. 10:11-20:29); God as one who entered into covenant relationship with and revealed His will comprehensively to Israel at Sinai (Exod. 19:1-Num. 10:10); God as one who fights for Israel against their enemies (Exod. 17:8-16; Num. 22:1-25:18); God as one who will give Israel their land and promises to be with them after the death of Moses (Num. 26:1-Deut. 34:12).

Literary Forms and Genres in the Pentateuch Although the Pentateuch is commonly called “The Law,” formal legislative material is limited. In fact this designation is misleading, as even a cursory reading of Ps. 1 suggests. If the Pentateuch were primarily “law,” it would scarcely be the psalmist's delight or a source of light and life (Ps. 1:2-3). The Pentateuch is dominated by “gospel,” good news of God's grace demonstrated through election, salvation, and the providential care of His people. Those who doubt this need only to read Exod. 34:6-7, where Yahweh defines His glory in immanent and gracious terms (ESV): “The LORD, the LORD, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness, keeping steadfast love for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, but who will by no means clear the guilty, visiting the iniquity of the fathers on the children and the children's children, to the third and the fourth generation.”

The Pentateuch is dominated by narratives developing this theme. In Gen. 1-4 God graciously spared a race that alienated itself from Him through sin and promised to solve the problem at its root; in Gen. 6-9 God graciously (6:8; 8:1) rescued Noah and his family from the fury of His own wrath; in Gen. 11:26-50:26 God graciously called Abraham and preserved His family to be the agent of blessing to a world under the curse of sin and death; in Exod. 1-18 God graciously redeemed His people from bondage; in Exod. 19-24 God graciously entered into covenant relationship with Israel; in Exod. 25-40 God graciously provided a way He might reside among His people; in Exod. 20-23, most of Leviticus, and large sections of Numbers, God graciously revealed His will to Israel (cp. Deut. 4:6-8); during Israel's desert wanderings God graciously cared for His people, feeding them and defending them against their enemies, ensuring they would enter the promised land; in Deuteronomy God graciously provided Israel with Moses to explain His will. Most of the prescriptive material of Exodus-Leviticus is divine speeches framed by narrative comments, “Then God/Yahweh said/spoke.” Even Deuteronomy is narrative with inserted addresses and poems by Moses. Narrative, not “law,” is the dominant genre of the Pentateuch.

“Law” is present, if by “law” we mean commandments prescribing human behavior. The Pentateuch contains hundreds of such prescriptions (Jewish Rabbis counted 613), referred to variously as tora (“teaching”), miswoth (“commands”), huqqoth (“statutes, ordinances, decrees”), mispatim (“judgments, regulations, laws”), edot (“covenant stipulations”), which may be characterized as constitutional regulations. With respect to form, the regulations tend to be of two types. “Apodictic” commands, cast in the second person (“You shall” or “You shall not”), are generally without qualification, condition, or motivation (most of the Decalogue). “Casuistic” regulations are cast in the third person, beginning with a conditional clause (“If a person”), and ending with a declaration of the consequences (“If A, then B”). Christians tend to divide the laws into moral, civil, and ceremonial, but the Pentateuch offers no such distinctions. On the contrary, texts like Lev. 19, mixing all three types, assume that all of life is sacred and that it is wrong to “compartmentalize” behavior.

Although prescriptive material is found elsewhere, for the sake of convenience we refer specifically to six prescriptive sections: the Decalogue (Exod. 20:1-17; Deut. 5:6-21); the “Book of the Covenant” (Exod. 21:1-23:33); the Tabernacle Prescriptions (Exod. 25-31); the “Manual on Ritual Worship” (Lev. 1-7); the so-called “Holiness Code” (Lev. 17-25); and the so-called “Deuteronomic Code” (Deut. 12-26). Leviticus and Numbers contain much additional prescriptive material, but the above are commonly recognized as self-contained units.

The Decalogue (Exod. 20:1-17; Deut. 5:6-21) Although the Decalogue contains divine commands, the Pentateuch never refers to “the Ten Commandments.” They are consistently identified as “the Ten Words” (Exod. 34:28; Deut. 4:13; 10:4), captured in the precise Greek term decalogos, “ten words.” As “words,” the Decalogue encapsulates the principles of covenant relationship with easily memorized statements (one for each finger). That this is the fundamental covenant document is clear because Yahweh Himself provided the first copy (Exod. 24:12; 34:1-24; Deut. 4:13; 5:22; 10:1-5) and from Moses' use of them in Deuteronomy. The Decalogue is more a worship document than a legal code, as confirmed by the fundamental opening statement: "I am Yahweh your God Who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery." Obedience to these 10 principles represents the worship response to salvation received as a gift from Yahweh (cp. Lev. 19:6). The preamble provides background and motivation for worship. Without it the call for obedience is a legalistic demand.

The "Book of the Covenant" (Exod. 21:1-23:33; some add 20:22-26)

The name derives from 24:7, according to which Moses read the seper habberit ("covenant document") in the hearing of all the people assembled prior to the ratification ritual. The Book of the Covenant subdivides into six parts arranged chiastically:

(a) Introduction (20:22) Placing Israel's response to covenant in the present context of divine revelation

(b) Principles of Worship (20:23-26) Highlighting Israel's cultic expression of devotion to Yahweh

(c) Casuistic Laws (21:1-22:20) Highlighting Israel's ethical expression of devotion to Yahweh

(c') Apodictic Laws (22:21-23:9) Highlighting Israel's ethical expression of devotion to Yahweh

(b') Principles of Worship (23:10-19) Highlighting Israel's cultic expression of devotion to Yahweh

(a') Conclusion (23:20-33) Placing Israel's response to covenant in the future context of divine action

Prescriptions for Israel's worship frame prescriptions governing daily life. The purpose of worship is to inspire devotion to Yahweh and to create an ethical community of faith

The Tabernacle Prescriptions (Exod. 25-31) Patterned after the days of creation are seven divine speeches, climaxing in the provision of the Sabbath as a sign of the eternity of God's covenant with Israel. Although the instructions have long-range implications, for the most part they concern one event: the construction of the tabernacle as a sacred residence for Yahweh. Through the tabernacle God graciously provided a means of constant communion with His people. This communion was severely threatened by the apostasy of worshipping the golden calf, but Yahweh graciously renewed the covenant (Exod. 32-34). Exodus 35-40 is a narrative description of the construction of the tabernacle according to God's specifications, climaxing in His visible affirmation by the movement of His radiant glory into the structure.

The “Manual on Ritual Worship” (Lev.1-7) This material prescribes permanent practices “throughout your generations” (Lev. 3:17) and is in imperative form like legislation. However it is motivated not only by God's desire for obedience but by human well being, that Israelites “may be forgiven” (4:35) and may enjoy communion with God.

The “Holiness Code” (Lev. 17-25; some add 26-27) This section derives its name from the statement, “You shall be holy; for I the LORD your God am holy” (19:2; 20:7,26), and from the overall emphasis. The Lord identified Himself as the Holy One (19:2; 20:26; 21:8); the one who makes Israel holy (20:8; 21:8,15,23; 22:9,16,32), and separates her from the other people (20:24,26); He challenges the Israelites to sanctify themselves (20:7) and “be holy” (19:2; 20:7,26; 21:6; cp. vv. 7-8). Many articles and persons are described as holy—the Lord's name (20:3; 22:3,32), sacrificial food (19:8), ordinary food (19:24), sacred bread (21:22; 24:9), food dedicated to the Lord (22:1-6,10-16); convocations (23:2-8,21-27,35-37); a place (tabernacle, 24:9); and a time (year of jubilee, 25:12).

Outline: Instructions in Holy Living (The “Holiness Code”) (17:1-25:55)

1. The Sanctity of Life (17:1-18:30)
2. The Sanctity of the Community (19:1-20:27)
3. The Sanctity of Worship (21:1-24:23)
 - a. The Sanctity of the Priesthood (21:1-24)
 - b. The Sanctity of Gifts for God (22:1-33)
 - c. The Sanctity of Holy Days (23:1-44)
 - d. The Sanctity of the Tabernacle (24:1-9)
 - e. The Sanctity of the Divine Name (24:10-23)
4. The Sanctity of the Land (25:1-55)

The “Deuteronomistic Code” (Deut. 12-26) This section begins with the announcement, “These are the ordinances and laws that you shall be careful to obey in the land which the LORD, the God of your fathers has given you to possess as long as you live on the earth” (12:1). However, Deut. 12-26 represent a part of Moses' second address to the tribes just before they crossed the Jordan to go into Canaan. He set the stage with an extended presentation of the nature of covenant relationship and by repeated appeals to exclusive love and service for Yahweh (5:1-11:32). The commandments in chapters 12-26 derive from the revelation at Sinai but have a pronounced sermonic (cp. 26:16-19), as opposed to legal, flavor. So the designation of this section as a legal “code” is misleading. Moses' role is pastoral rather than legislative, applying laws given at Sinai to the new situation facing the Israelites. Accordingly, the instructions are laced with motive clauses, warnings of divine judgment for disobedience and promises of blessing and long life for covenant fidelity. This difference accounts for the Deuteronomistic instructions' divergence from those in the “Book of the Covenant” or the “Holiness Code.” In keeping with Moses' concern for exclusive allegiance to Yahweh (as formalized in the Shema, “Hear O Israel, Yahweh is our God, Yahweh alone” [6:4]) and total, unreserved love for him (6:5), he declared that once established in the land, Yahweh would identify the place He has chosen to establish His name, the place where all Israel would come to worship (e.g. 12:1-14).

General Theme: The Specific Stipulations of the Covenant (12:1-26:15)

1. The Religious Life of the Holy People (12:1-16:17)
 - a. The Unity and Purity of Worship (12:1-14:21)
 - b. Institutional Regulations (14:22-16:17)
2. The Government of the Holy People (16:18-21:9)
 - a. The Structures of Theocratic Government (16:18-18:22)
 - b. The Conduct of Government (19:1-21:9)
3. Family Law (21:10-22:30)
 - a. Female Prisoners of War (21:10-14)
 - b. The Rights of Firstborn (21:15-17)
 - c. Rebellious Sons (21:18-21)
 - d. Miscellaneous Laws (21:22-22:12)
 - e. The Sanctity of Marriage and Sex (22:13-30)
4. The Sanctity of the Holy Assembly (23:1-8)
5. Miscellaneous Regulations of Israelite Life (23:9-25:15)
6. Two Special Offerings (26:1-15)
 - a. The First Fruits (26:1-11)
 - b. The Tithe of the Third Year (26:12-15)
7. The Concluding Covenantal Oath (26:16-19)

Although generally interpreted as law codes, one should realize that none are legislation simply for the sake of legislation. Nor is the obedience demanded simply for the sake of obedience. Each involves conduct to be followed by God's people in response to His gracious salvation and as an expression of fidelity to Him. In no case should the laws be viewed as a way of salvation; on the contrary, grateful and willing obedience is the expression of love for God in response to His provided salvation and the privilege of covenant relationship with Him. God's primary expectation was always a disposition of love (covenant commitment) and fear to be demonstrated by observable ethical behavior (Deut. 10:12-11:1).

In addition to historiographic narrative and constitutional prescriptions, other literary genres are represented in the Pentateuch. These include poetic texts in the narrative (including "Jacob's Blessing of His Sons," Gen. 49:1-27; The "Song of the Sea," Exod. 15:1-18; "Balaam's Oracles," Num. 23:7-10,18-24, and 24:3-9, 15-24; Israel's "National Anthem," Deut. 32:1-43; and "Moses' Blessing of the Tribes," Deut. 33:2-29; statistical material (genealogies, Gen. 5; 10; 11:1-26; 25:1-4; 36; 46:8-27; Exod. 6:14-27; military registration lists, Num. 1:1-3:51; 26:1-65; booty lists, Num. 31:32-47; a journey itinerary, Num. 33:1-49; boundary descriptions, Num. 34:1-12; and personnel lists, Num. 34:16-29), proverbial sayings (Gen. 2:23; 3:19; 10:9; Exod. 33:19), aetiologies (explanations of the origins of practices or names, Gen. 2:25; 21:31, and 26:33 [Beer-sheba]; Exod. 2:10 [Moses]; etc.) and treaty/covenantal forms. The Decalogue itself is presented as a covenant document, complete with preamble, historical prologue, and stipulations. Covenantal forms extend to Numbers and Leviticus as well (note especially the covenant curses in Lev. 26) and in particular to the book of Deuteronomy. Although Deuteronomy consists of Moses' farewell addresses, they are arranged to reflect ancient near eastern (second millennium B.C. Hittite) treaty forms.

The Historical Significance of the Pentateuchal Narratives Prior to the enlightenment the historicity of the patriarchal and exodus narratives was not questioned. However, this changed dramatically in the past centuries. The first casualty to higher critical scholarship was the opening chapters of Genesis. Because creation in Gen. 1-3 apparently disagrees with some modern scientific conclusions, because events of Gen. 4-11 involve prehistoric and preliterate events, and because texts like 2:7 and 6:1-8 describe divine and semi-divine beings relating directly to human beings, these texts are interpreted as mythological, akin to Babylonian creation and flood accounts rather than as a historical record. The second casualty was the patriarchs. Because these stories present idealized pictures of Israel's ancestors and deal with preliterate times, they are largely dismissed as legendary retrojections of later Israel, created to explain the existence and unity of Israel. The third casualty was Moses and the exodus. Although until recently many critical scholars recognized a historical core in the exodus narratives (the memory of a handful of slaves who escaped from Egypt to Palestine, now even this reduction is rejected as theological historicizing. The fact that archaeology has failed to give evidence validating the characters or events in the Pentateuch is accepted as proof that none of this is true.

However, the issue is not that simple. Concerning the archaeological record, we accept the axiom, “Absence of evidence is not evidence of absence.” Furthermore, while doubtful that archaeology can prove the Bible, the discoveries of the past century allow us to reconstruct patterns of life and a “skeleton” of ancient Near Eastern history, in which the events described in the Pentateuch are quite at home. As for the historicity of the exodus, just as it is impossible to explain the existence of the church without reference to the historical incarnation and resurrection of Christ, so it is impossible to explain the existence of Israel without the dramatic intervention of God on her behalf, the memory of which underlies the entire OT. With respect to the patriarchal narratives, the authors of these texts did not consider themselves to be writing fiction. Based upon ancient stories handed down in oral or written form, these narratives preserve the ancient memory of God's gracious intervention for the purpose of bringing blessing and life to a world under the curse of death. Genesis 1:1—2:4a is composed in a lofty and elegant style, appropriate for text to be used in worship, but this does not mean that it is the product of human imagination. This text not only celebrates God as the Creator of all things, but humanity as the climax of His creation. The generic, stylistic, and substantive links between the early chapters of Genesis and the later narratives, including Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, suggest a continuous historical story line from the creation of the universe to the rise and fall of Israel.

The Date and Authorship of the Pentateuch Although Jewish and Christian tradition almost unanimously recognize Moses as author of the Pentateuch, few issues relating to the OT now are debated as hotly, and in few is the gulf between critical and evangelical scholarship so wide. Many conservative scholars continue to believe that Moses wrote virtually all of the Pentateuch with his own hand. So long as critical scholars recognized Moses as a historical figure, in principle his involvement in the composition of the Pentateuch was not excluded—unless, of course literacy was denied him. However, from the middle of the 19th century A.D., especially following Julius Wellhausen, most critical scholars have rejected Moses having a significant role in the origin of the Pentateuch.

The questioning began early with doubts whether Moses recorded his own death and burial (Deut. 34), or knew of a place in northern Israel called Dan (Gen. 14:14; cp. Josh. 19:47; Judg. 18:28b-29), or referred to the conquest of Canaan as past (Deut. 2:12). Thus scholars developed an alternative explanation for the origins of the Pentateuch known as the Documentary Hypothesis. According to the classical form of the theory, the Pentateuch is the product of a long and complex literary evolution, specifically incorporating at least four major literary strands composed independently over several centuries and not combined in the present form until the time of Ezra (fifth century B.C.). These sources are identified as J, E, D, and P. J represents a ninth-century B.C. (ca. 850) document that originated in Judah, distinguished by its preference for the name Yahweh (Jehovah). The E source preferred the divine title Elohim and theoretically was composed in Israel in the eighth century B.C. D stands for Deuteronomy, supposedly written around 621 B.C. to lend support to Josiah's reforms. The priestly document, P, assumedly was composed about 500 B.C. by priests seeking to preserve their own version of Israel's history. According to the theory, these sources were compiled and combined in the middle of the fifth century B.C. Nehemiah 8 recounts the moment when Ezra publicly read the Pentateuch as a unit for the first time. Because Joshua describes the fulfillment of the promises of land to the patriarchs and because of stylistic links to Deuteronomy, Gerhard von Rad added Joshua to the pentateuchal corpus, calling the six books the Hexateuch.

Variations of the Documentary Hypothesis prevailed for more than a century. However, due to advances in literary studies, today the state of pentateuchal scholarship is confused, with new theories or radical modifications appearing often. The new theories push the dates for pentateuchal origin ever later. Martin Noth created the term Tetrateuch ("four books"), arguing that Deuteronomy was originally composed as a theological foreword to the "Deuteronomistic History," consisting of Joshua, Judges, 1-2 Samuel, and 1-2 Kings. However many scholars now are going in the opposite direction, recognizing more Deuteronomistic features in Genesis Numbers. Because of the link between Deuteronomy and Josiah's reform, some assert that the earliest sources underlying the Pentateuch were composed in the sixth century B.C. during the exile. It is commonly recognized that some of the law “codes” may be earlier, but as literary documents, they are said to be late. R. N. Whybray argued that the Pentateuch is a unitary composition written in the fourth century B.C., inspired perhaps by the Greek Histories of Herodotus.

The bewildering variety of theories fosters little confidence in critical scholarship. However the fact remains that nowhere does the Pentateuch specifically name its author. As was common in the ancient Semitic world, it is anonymous. On the other hand, the internal evidence suggests that Moses kept a record of Israel's experiences in the desert (Exod. 17:14; 24:4,7; 34:27; Num. 33:1-2; Deut. 31:9,11). Furthermore, many statements in the OT credit the Pentateuch to Moses (e.g., Josh. 1:8; 8:31-32; 1 Kings 2:3; 2 Kings 14:6; Ezra 6:18; Neh. 13:1; Dan. 9:11-13; Mal. 4:4), and the NT identifies the Torah very closely with him (Matt. 19:8; John 5:46-47; 7:19; Acts 3:22; Rom. 10:5). A series of additional features within the text point to an early date for its composition: (1) the forms of the names and many of the actions of the patriarchs make best sense in a second millennium B.C. environment; (2) the narratives suggest a thorough acquaintance with Egypt; (3) Egyptian loanwords appear with greater frequency in the Pentateuch than anywhere else in the OT; (4) the name Moses itself suggests an Egyptian provenance for the story; (5) the general viewpoint of the narrative is foreign to Canaan; (6) the seasons are Egyptian; the flora and fauna are Egyptian and Sinaitic; (7) in some instances the geography reflects a foreign viewpoint (e.g., a comment like that found in Gen. 33:18, “a city of Shechem, which is in the land of Canaan,” is unlikely after the exile because by then Israel had been in the land for 900 years); (8) and archaisms in the language (like the use of the third-person singular pronoun, hi', for both genders), all point to an early date.

Moses could very well have written most of the Pentateuch himself. Having been raised in the court of Pharaoh, and given the new 22-let-ter alphabet, Moses' own literary qualifications for writing should not be dismissed.

It is unlikely that all these considerations establish that Moses wrote all the Pentateuch as we have it. It is doubtful he wrote the account of his death in Deut. 34. Frequently the text provides explanatory notes updating facts for a later audience (e.g., “Esau, that is Edom,” Gen. 36:1; the aboriginal inhabitants of the Transjordan, Deut. 2:10-12). Furthermore, the form of the cursive Canaanite script that Moses probably used was still in its infancy and was replaced with the square Aramaic script in the post-exilic period, and the vowels were added a millennium later. The archaic qualities of the poems (Gen. 49; Exod. 15; etc.) in contrast to the surrounding narrative suggests the latter may have been updated periodically in accordance with the evolution of the Hebrew language. This may explain why the grammar and syntax of Deuteronomy in its present form reads much like Jeremiah, who lived long after Moses. At the same time Moses could have used a scribe or secretary.

There is no reason to doubt that Moses wrote down the speeches he delivered (Deut. 31:9-13), or that when he came down from Mount Sinai, he arranged for the transcription of the revelation he had received on the mountain, if he did not write it all himself. It is equally plausible that he authorized the written composition of many of the stories and genealogies of the patriarchs that had been transmitted orally or in rudimentary written form. Just as the pieces of the tabernacle were constructed and woven by skilled craftsmen and finally assembled by Moses (Exod. 35-40) so literary craftsmen may have composed some bits and pieces of the Pentateuch, submitted them to Moses, who then approved them. When exactly the Pentateuch achieved its final form we may only speculate (Deuteronomy suggests some time after the death of Moses), but it seems likely that by the time David organized for temple worship, the contents of the Torah were fixed. The Pentateuch is fundamentally and substantially Mosaic, and later Israelites accepted it as bearing the full force of his authority.

The Pentateuch was the Torah that priests were to teach and model (Deut. 33:10; 2 Chron. 15:3; 19:8; Mal. 2:6,9; cp. Jer. 18:18; Ezek. 7:26; Ezra 7:10), that psalmists praised (Pss. 19:7-14; 119; etc.), to which the prophets appealed (Isa. 1:10; 5:24; 8:20; 30:9; 51:7), by which faithful kings ruled (1 Kings 2:2-4; 2 Kings 14:6; 22:11; 23:25), and the righteous lived (Ps. 1). PENTATEUCH, SAMARITAN See Bible Texts and Versions; Samaritan Pentateuch.

PENTECOST One of three major Jewish feasts also called the Feast of Weeks. The name “Pentecost” is derived from the Greek word meaning “fifty.” Pentecost occurs in the month of Sivan (May/June), 50 days after Passover, and celebrates the end of the grain harvest. The Pentecost that followed Jesus' death and resurrection was the occasion on which the Holy Spirit was given to believers in Jerusalem.

Believers were together celebrating Pentecost when suddenly unusual sights and sounds signaled an event that would have far-reaching implications. They heard the sound of “a violent rushing wind” (Acts 2:2 HCSB). They saw tongues of fire resting on believers, and each believer was able to communicate in languages they had never before spoken. They were able to speak with Jewish pilgrims of many languages from all over the Mediterranean world.

These phenomena got the attention of the Jewish faithful gathered in Jerusalem. Many thought the disciples were intoxicated. But Simon Peter got up and pointed out that it was too early in the day for people to be drunk. Peter then took this unusual opportunity to proclaim that this event was the fulfillment of Joel's prophecy that God would pour out His Spirit on all people. Peter linked the gift of the Spirit with the life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus.

Peter's message found its way into the hearts of over 3,000 who responded by repenting and being baptized in the name of Jesus and receiving the gift of the Holy Spirit. See Festivals; Spirit

PENUEL (פְּנֹאֵל) Name meaning “face of God.” 1. Descendant of Judah and founder (father) of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:4). 2. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. 8:25). 3. Site on Jabbok River northeast of Succoth where Jacob wrestled with the stranger (Gen. 32:24-32; cp. Hos. 12:4). The city was destroyed by Gideon because its inhabitants refused him provisions while he pursued the Midianites (Judg. 8:8-9,17). Jeroboam I built (perhaps rebuilt or fortified) the city (1 Kings 12:25). The site is identified with the easternmost of two mounds called Tulul edh-Dhahab, which commands the entrance to the Jordan Valley from the Jabbok gorge, about seven miles east of the Jordan.

PEOPLE OF GOD Group elected by God and committed to be His covenant people. Scripture repeatedly defines who is included in the people of God. The history of revelation shows God electing Israel by grace.

Election and Covenant The election of Israel as the people of God may be traced from Abraham (Gen. 12; cp. Gal. 3:29; Rom. 9:7-8). However, the relationship between Yahweh and Israel began in the exodus. Exodus 19 represents a special covenant form with both conditions (v. 5) and promises of the covenant (vv. 5b-6). The condition of the covenant was obedience; the promise was that “you shall be My own possession out of all the peoples.” This promise involves a God-people and people-God relationship that is the center of the OT. This promise was inherited by the church as the true Israel or the new Israel (Rom. 9:6-8; 1 Cor. 10:18-21; Gal. 6:16). Here is the unique position of the church as the people of God in the divine order (Rom. 9:25-26; 1 Cor. 6:14-17; Titus 2:14; Heb. 8:10; 1 Pet. 2:9-10; Rev. 21:3). See Church; Covenant; Election; Israel, Spiritual.

The faith of Israel became more concrete when the remnant idea was developed from corporate salvation out of the divine wrath and judgment. To the remnant fell the status and condition of God's long purpose for His people. Jesus explained the remnant as the chosen one in Matt. 22:14. Most of all, Jesus Himself is the remnant. Truly, the church carries the ideas from the OT that the remnant in the figure of the Servant is the witness of universal salvation and the agent of a final revelation. The servant of Yahweh represented by Israel would be a light to the nations. The universal character of Israel's vocation is most clearly expressed here. The idea of God's people in the OT culminates in the person of the Servant who is the idea of the remnant personified as an individual.

Christ claimed His servant-messiahship, for He is the Son of David, fulfilling the promise of God in the OT. Jesus is the King but rejected every political interpretation of His messianic vocation. His kingdom is not of this world (John 18:36). He is the Suffering Servant who gave His life as a ransom for many and thereby inaugurated the New Covenant.

The role of servant-messiah developed another dimension in its collectivity, that is, church. The servant idea is determinative for an understanding of the priesthood of the whole church. Christology (Christ) is related to ecclesiology (church) (2 Cor. 4:5). Christians are servants sharing that servanthood that the Servant par excellence creates. The call into peoplehood is a call into servanthood. The church is truly the people of God.

PEOPLE OF THE EAST See Kadmonites.

PEOPLE OF THE LAND Translation of the technical Hebrew term am ha'arets, used primarily in Jeremiah, Ezekiel, 2 Kings, and 2 Chronicles (Gen. 23:7; Exod. 5:5; Lev. 20:2; Num. 14:9; Hag. 2:4; Zech. 7:5; Dan. 9:6). In most cases, the term apparently refers to the male citizens who lived upon their own land and who had the responsibility as citizens to participate in judicial activities, cultic festivals, and army service. Nonetheless, the references are so diverse that we cannot be sure the same people were in mind each time the term appears. Some scholars think the "people of the land" represented a particular influential element in society such as a national council, influential aristocrats, free citizens and property owners, landless poor, or non-Jerusalemites. Such theories cannot be proven.

In preexilic Judah the “people of the land” first appear in association with the coronation of Joash (2 Kings 11:4-20). They appear slightly later in the avenging of Amon's murder and the elevation of Josiah to the kingship (2 Kings 21:24). They are depicted as being capable of liberating slaves (Jer. 34, especially vv. 18-20, where the “people of the land” both participated in the covenant making and were held responsible for breaking the same). They could also be agents of oppression (Ezek. 22:29). Second Kings 25:18-21 records that Nebuchadnezzar put to death at Riblah “sixty men of the people of the land,” along with others held responsible for the revolt against Babylon resulting in the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. Clearly, in these situations these are people who have social, economic, political, and religious significance.

The “people of the land” are also portrayed as “the poor of the land” who remained in Jerusalem during the Babylonian exile (2 Kings 24:14; 25:12). It is notable that when the exiles returned they distanced themselves from those who had remained in Judah by using “people of Judah” to characterize the returning exiles (Ezra 4:4). Disapproval is expressed in Ezra and Nehemiah for the pagan half-Jew and half-Gentile, essentially nonobservant Jews (Ezra 10:2,11; Neh. 10:28-31). In Ezra 9:1-2,11 the plural, the “people of those lands,” is used to designate the groupings with whom intermarriage had occurred, “the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Jebusites, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Egyptians, and the Amorites” (9:1).

There was considerable bad feelings between the “people of the land” and the Pharisees. In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus is portrayed as supporting the “people of the land” (Mark 7:1-5; Luke 6:1-5). The later post-exilic use as witnessed in Ezra and Nehemiah as well as in the Synoptic Gospels (John 7:49) is further reflected in the rabbinical classification of the “people of the land” as those ignorant of the law and non-observant in their daily lives. Because their condition was not dependent upon birth, however, the deficiencies could be remedied by a greater awareness of and adherence to the Torah.

PEOR (Pē' ōr) Name, perhaps meaning “opening.” 1. Mountain in Moab opposite the wilderness of Judah. Balak brought Balaam there to curse the camp of the Israelites which was visible from the site (Num. 23:28; 24:2). 2. Abbreviated form of Baal-Peor (lord of Peor), a god whom the Israelites were led to worship (Num. 25:18; 31:16; Josh. 22:17). See BaalPeor. 3. Site in Judah identified with modern Khirbet Faghur southwest of Bethlehem (Josh. 15:59 REB, following the earliest Greek translation).

PERATH (Pē' rāth) See Parath.

PERAZIM (Pēr' á zīm) See Baal-Perazim.

PERDITION Describes the eternal state of death, destruction, annihilation, or ruin. Old Testament Words of the family from which perdition is derived usually relate to a state of physical rather than moral or religious destruction. Perdition is held in contrast to the blessing of God. It is the penalty for disobedience (Deut. 22:24; 28:20). The OT sometimes links this term to the concept of Sheol (2 Sam. 22:5; Ps. 18:4).

New Testament Perdition is the fate of all that do not come to repentance. The way that leads to this destruction is broad in contrast to the narrow road which leads to life (Matt. 7:13). Perdition, as used in the NT, does not convey the idea of simple extinction or annihilation. Set into the context of eternity, the Gospel writers used it to mean an everlasting state of death and judgment. Just as surely as salvation expresses the idea of eternal life, so perdition designates a hopeless eternity of destruction. The phrase “son of perdition” describes the person who has fallen victim to this destruction (cp. Judas in John 17:12). The “man of lawlessness” is doomed to perdition (2 Thess. 2:3). A form of this word is used in Rev. 9:11 to describe the ultimate enemy of God—the Destroyer. See Death; Devil; Eternal Life; Everlasting Punishment; Hell; Sheol.

PEREA (Pě rē' á) Roman district in Transjordan which became a part of Herod the Great's kingdom. The capital was Gadara where Jesus drove demons out of a man. (Modern translations follow other manuscripts reading "Gerasenes.") Other important sites in the province were the fortress of Machaerus, where John the Baptist was beheaded, and Pella, where Christians from Jerusalem fled just before the Roman destruction of the Holy City in A.D. 66. Perea was the area through which the Jews traveled to avoid going through Samaria. Although not referred to by name in the NT, it is mentioned as "Judea beyond the Jordan" in several texts (Matt. 19:1; Mark 10:1 RSV). See Gadarene; Machaerus; Pella; Transjordan.

PERESH (Pě rēsh) Personal name meaning "separate." A Manassite (1 Chron. 7:16).

PEREZ (Pě rēz) Personal name meaning "breach." One of the twins born to the illicit affair between Judah and his daughter-in-law, Tamar (Gen. 38). After she was widowed and her brother-in-law, Onan, refused to fulfill his duties in levirate marriage (designed to carry on the name of the deceased through a son), she tricked her father-in-law, Judah, into an affair (vv. 13-30). "His descendents were called Perezites" (Num. 26:20).

PEREZ-UZZA (Pě rēz-Ūz' zá) (NASB, RSV) or PEREZ-UZZAH Place-name meaning "breach of Uzzah." Site of the threshing floor of Nacon (or Chidon) west of Jerusalem on the Kiriath-jearim road where the anger of the Lord "broke out" against Uzzah, who touched the ark to steady it (2 Sam. 6:8; 1 Chron. 13:11). The site is perhaps that of Khirbet el-Uz about two miles east of Kiriathjearim.

PERFECT To be whole or complete; also referred to as "mature." Throughout the Bible, especially in the OT, God is referred to as being "perfect" (Ps. 18:32). He is complete and lacks nothing. In addition, the "ways" of God are perfect, implying that not only is God perfect in His essence, but He is perfect in His actions (2 Sam. 22:31). God's law is also described as being perfect, indicating that it is complete and able to accomplish its purpose (Ps. 19:7). In the NT James reminded his readers that “every generous act and every perfect gift” originates from God (James 1:17 HCSB). Therefore, God also becomes the source of all that is “perfect” within this world.

God, in His perfection, likewise desires for His children to be “perfect.” In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus commanded, “Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Matt. 5:48). The perfection demanded of Christians is a state of spiritual maturity or completeness. Jesus was commanding His followers to strive towards a state of moral and spiritual Godlikeness in their lives. Specifically, He was encouraging His disciples to love their enemies in the same way that God loved them. By so doing they were demonstrating the perfection or maturity that He desired. Because of sin within the world, Christians will only realize true perfection in heaven, but the exhortations given in Scripture encourage all to continue to strive towards it in this life.

The journey towards perfection is not an individual accomplishment. First, and foremost, it is a gift from God. Isaiah reminded his readers that God is the one who provides “perfect peace” for those who remain committed to Him (Isa. 26:3). In addition, Paul revealed his understanding of the necessity of working together towards perfection when he stated that the goal of his ministry was to be able to “present everyone mature” (Col. 1:28 HCSB; NASB, complete). Therefore, all Christians are reminded that the goal is to help one another reach completeness as Paul was striving to do in his ministry. See Holy.

PERFUME, PERFUMER Modern translation of a word translated as “apothecary” by the KJV (Exod. 30:25,35; 37:29; 2 Chron. 16:14; Neh. 3:8; Eccles. 10:1). Perfumes mentioned in the Bible include aloes, balsam (or balm), bdellium, calamus (or sweet or fragrant cane), camel's thorn, cinnamon (or cassia), frankincense, galbanum, gum, henna, myrrh, nard (or spikenard), onycha, saffron, and stacte. PERGA (Pĕr' gá) Ancient city in the province of Pamphylia, about eight miles from the Mediterranean Sea. Settlement at Perga dates to prehistory. Alexander the Great passed through the town during his campaigns and used guides from there. A temple to Artemis was one of the prominent buildings. Paul, Barnabas, and John Mark came to Perga from Paphos (Acts 13:13). There young John left the team to return home.

PERGAMOS (Pĕr' gá mós) (KJV, Rev. 1:11; 2:12) or PERGAMUM (Pĕr' gá mŭm) Placename meaning “citadel.” A wealthy ancient city in the district of Mysia in Asia Minor. See Asia Minor, Cities of.

PERIDA (Pə rí' dá) Personal name meaning “unique” or “separated.” Head of a family of Solomon's servants, some of whom returned from exile (Neh. 7:57; cp. Peruda, Ezra 2:55).

PERISHABLE Term some translations (KJV; REB, NRSV) use to describe the present, mortal body (1 Cor. 15:42,50,53-54), which is subject to death and decay. Other translations render the underlying Greek as corruptible (NASB, NIV) or mortal (TEV). Paul contrasted the perishable reward champion athletes receive with the lasting reward for which Christians compete (1 Cor. 9:25). First Peter 1:7 compares the testing of lasting faith with that of perishable gold.

PERIZZITES (Pĕr' iz zits) Group name meaning “rustic.” One of the groups of people who opposed the Israelite occupation of Canaan (Josh. 9:1-2). They dwelled in the land as early as Abraham's time (Gen. 13:7). The name implies that the Perizzites probably dwelled in the open country while the Canaanites walled up their encampments.

PERJURY False statement given voluntarily under oath. Perjury involves either false witness to past facts or the neglect of what has been previously vowed. Mosaic law prohibited false swearing (Lev. 19:12; Exod. 20:7) and giving false witness (Exod. 20:16). False witness was punishable with the sentence that would have gone to the one falsely accused of guilt (Deut. 19:16-21). Vows and oaths to perform an act were to be fulfilled (Num. 30:2). See Oaths.

PERSECUTION Harassment and suffering which people and institutions inflict upon others for being different in their faith, worldview, culture, or race. Persecution seeks to intimidate, silence, punish, or even to kill people.

Old Testament Israel was the agent of persecution of nations (Judg. 2:11-23; Lev. 26:7-8). The Bible gives special attention to Israel's fate in Egypt (Exod. 1-3) and in the exile (Ps. 137). On an individual level Saul persecuted David (1 Sam. 19:9-12), and Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were persecuted because they refused to worship the image of the king (Dan. 3). Jezebel persecuted the prophets of the Lord, and the Prophet Elijah persecuted and killed the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18). Job felt persecuted by God himself (7:11-21). The Prophets—Amos (7:10-12), Jeremiah (Jer. 1:19; 15:15; 37-38), and Urijah (Jer. 26:20-23)—suffered persecution because they lived out the will of God in adverse circumstances. The Psalms speak of the righteous sufferer who felt persecuted as a result of faith in God, and who prayed to God for deliverance (7; 35; 37; 79; 119:84-87).

Intertestamental period This era witnessed the concerted attempt to make the Jewish people renounce their faith in God. In this conflict, persecution took place on both sides (1 and 2 Maccabees). See Intertestamental History and Literature.

The temple of Athena at ancient Pergamum.

New Testament Jesus was persecuted and finally killed by the religious and political establishments of His day (Mark 3:6; Luke 4:29; John 5:16; Acts 3:13-15; 7:52; passion stories). He lived out the liberating passion of God (Luke 4:16-29) and came into conflict with the religious institutions of the cult by healing on the Sabbath (Mark 3:1-6), criticizing the temple activities (Mark 11:15-18), and the law (Matt. 5:21-48).

Jesus pronounced God's salvation upon those who are persecuted for righteousness sake (Matt. 5:10-12). In an evil world disciples are to expect persecution (Matt. 10:16-23), just as was the case with the prophets in the OT (Matt. 5:12; Heb. 11:32-38). Paul (1 Cor. 4:11-13; 2 Cor. 4:8-12; 6:4-10; 11:24-27; Gal. 5:11; 1 Thess. 2:2; 3:4; Acts 17:5-10; 18:12-17; 21:30-36; 23:12-35), as well as Stephen (Acts 6:8-7:60), James (Acts 12:2), and Peter (Acts 12:3-5), together with many anonymous martyrs experienced the truth of the Johannine saying: "If they persecuted Me, they will also persecute you" (John 15:20 HCSB; Acts 4:3; 5:17-42; 8:1; 12:1; Rev. 2:3,9-10,13,19; 3:8-10; 6:9; 16:6; 17:6; 18:24; 20:4).

Whole epistles and books like 1 Peter, Hebrews, and Revelation were written to encourage Christians in a situation of persecution (1 Pet. 3:13-18; 4:12-19; 5:6-14; Heb. 10:32-39; 12:3; Rev. 2-3). Something like a theology of persecution emerged, which emphasized patience, endurance, and steadfastness (Rom. 12:12; 1 Thess. 2:14-16; James 5:7-11); prayer (Matt. 5:44; Rom. 12:14; 1 Cor. 4:12); thanksgiving (2 Thess. 1:4); testing (Mark 4:17) and the strengthening of faith (1 Thess. 3:2-3); experiencing the grace of God (Rom. 8:35; 2 Cor. 4:9; 12:10), and being blessed through suffering (Matt. 5:10-12; 1 Pet. 3:14; 4:12-14). For Paul, persecuting Christians could be a living and visible testimony to the crucified and risen Christ (2 Cor. 4:7-12).

There seems to be an element in religious fanaticism (Paul before his conversion: 1 Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13,23; Phil. 3:6; Acts 8:3; 9:1-2; 22:4), which breeds intolerance and can lead to persecution. Christians should repent of this element in their own history and must be radically committed to the abolition of all persecution. See Apocrypha; Disciple; Martyr; Prophecy; Prophets; Suffering.

PERSEVERANCE Maintaining Christian faith through the trying times of life. As a noun the term “perseverance” occurs in the NT only at Eph. 6:18 (proskarteresis) and Heb. 12:1 (hupomone). The idea is inherent throughout the NT in the great interplay of the themes of assurance and warning.

The background setting for the idea of perseverance blossomed out of the context of persecution and temptation. The believer was expected faithfully to endure and to remain steadfast in the face of opposition, attack, and discouragement. The NT writers were forthright in advising believers to be consistent in prayer (Eph. 6:18; Phil. 4:6), and they employed athletic imagery to remind Christians to be effectual as they trained in the ways of God (1 Cor. 9:24-27; Rom. 12:11-12; Heb. 12:1-12). Israel's failure of faithfulness in the exodus was also a haunting picture for Christians, and the inspired NT writers found it to be an important basis for warning (1 Cor. 10:1-14; Heb. 3:7-19). They were committed to making absolutely clear that the requirements of Christian living were recognized as an essential element of Christian believing. Authentic life and true belief are both necessary parts of being a Christian.

While the warnings are very stern, especially in Hebrews (2:3; 6:1-8; 10:26-31), the NT writers were firmly convinced that those who truly committed themselves to Christ should persevere to the end because they had gained a new perspective and become a people who would not treat lightly the biblical admonitions (cp. Heb. 6:9-12; 10:39). They believed Christians would finish the race because Christians would focus their attention on Jesus, the lead runner and model finisher of their faith (Heb. 2:10; 12:1-2).

In the early church Christians wrestled with the problem of the renouncers during and after periods of persecution. Christians found in the model of Peter's restoration (John 21) an important clue. Restoration for Peter was possible, but restoration still meant his death. Restoration for Christians, therefore, could be possible, but it demanded absolute seriousness for defectors. They would be expected to persevere thereafter, even in the face of death. As time passed, however, baptism became regarded by some Christians as a bath that would provide cleansing from all types of sin, including renunciation. Some would thus delay baptism almost to the time of death to guarantee that all sins in life would be expunged. The need was seen by these Christians for a final rite to care for such post-baptismal, unconfessed sins. Others found such views of baptism and extreme unction to be foreign to NT perspectives.

However, the perseverance of the saints is one of the great theological ideas that needs to be reaffirmed in this era. It is the human side of the salvation equation, and it deals with faithfulness of Christians in matters of God's will (James 1:25). It encompasses the taking seriously of human weakness, without denying the mysterious nature of God's patience with His people. It permits judgment concerning the way people live in this world, but it does not exclude God's abundant graciousness.

Persevering Christians take prayer seriously as a reflection of life. They recognize the way of love and forgiveness because they understand the nature of human weakness and divine help. They know they have experienced grace beyond their human capacities. Persevering Christians recognize that the warnings of the Bible are meant for them to obey and that Christ gave His life to transform their lives. Perseverance is thus a call to faithfulness, but it is also an affirmation that somehow, in spite of our failures, God will bring His committed people through the difficulties and concerns of life to their promised destiny in Christ.

PERSIA As a nation Persia corresponds to the modern state of Iran. As an empire Persia was a vast collection of states and kingdoms reaching from the shores of Asia Minor in the west to the Indus River Valley in the east. It reached northward to southern Russia and in the south included Egypt and the regions bordering the Persian Gulf and the Gulf of Oman. In history the empire defeated the Babylonians and then fell finally to Alexander the Great.

The nation was named for the southernmost region of the area called Parsis or Persis. It was a harsh land of deserts, mountains, plateaus, and valleys. The climate was arid and showed extremes of cold and heat. Gold and silver and wheat and barley were native to the area.

The region was settled shortly after 3000 B.C. by people from the north. An Elamite culture developed which, at its peak in 1200 B.C., dominated the whole Tigris River Valley. It lasted until 1050 B.C. After its destruction other northern groups entered the area. Among these groups were tribesmen who formed a small kingdom in the region of Anshan around 700 B.C. It was ruled by Achaemenes, the great, great-grandfather of Cyrus II, the Great. (Thus, the period from Achaemenes to Alexander is called the Achaemenid Period.) This small kingdom was the seed of the Persian Empire.

When Cyrus II came to his father's throne in 559 B.C., his kingdom was part of a larger Median kingdom. The Medes controlled the territory northeast and east of the Babylonians. In 550 B.C. Cyrus rebelled against Astyages, the Median king. His rebellion led to the capture of the king and gave Cyrus control over a kingdom stretching from Media to the Halys River in Asia Minor. Soon Cyrus challenged the king of Lydia. Victory there gave Cyrus the western portion of Asia Minor. Then in 539 B.C. Babylon fell to Cyrus due to his skill and internal dissension in the Babylonian Empire. See Babylon.

Cyrus died in 530 B.C.; however, the Persian Empire continued to grow. Cambyses II, Cyrus' son, conquered Egypt in 525 B.C. Cambyses' successor Darius I expanded the empire eastward to the Indus and attempted to conquer or control the Greeks. Darius lost to the Greeks at Marathon in 490 B.C. This was the greatest extension of the empire. Later emperors did little to expand the empire. They even had difficulty holding such a far-flung empire together.

The Persian Empire is important to the history and development of civilization. It had major effects on religion, law, politics, and economics. The impact came through the Jews, the Bible, contacts with the Greeks, and through Alexander the Great's incorporation of ideas and architecture from the Persians.

Politically the Persian Empire was the best organized the world had ever seen. By the time of Darius I, 522-486 B.C., the empire was divided into 20 satrapies (political units of varying size and population). Satrapies were subdivided into provinces. Initially Judah was a province in the satrapy of Babylon. Later Judah was in one named "Beyond the River." The satrapies were governed by Persians who were directly responsible to the emperor. Good administration required good communications that called for good roads. These roads did more than speed administration, though. They encouraged contacts between peoples within the empire. Ideas and goods could move hundreds of miles with little restriction. The empire became wealthy and also gave its inhabitants a sense that they were part of a larger world. A kind of "universal awareness" developed. The use of minted coins and the development of a money economy aided this identification with a larger world. The emperor's coins were handy reminders of the power and privileges of being part of the empire. Also the Persians were committed to rule by law. Instead of imposing an imperial law from above, however, the emperor and his satraps gave their authority and support to local law. For the Jews this meant official support for keeping Jewish law in the land of the Jews.

The Persian Empire affected the Jews and biblical history a great deal. Babylon had conquered Jerusalem and destroyed the temple in 586 B.C. When Cyrus conquered Babylon, he allowed the Jews to return to Judah and encouraged the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 1:1-4). The work was begun but not completed. Then, under Darius I, Zerubbabel and the high priest, Joshua, led the restored community with the support and encouragement of the Persians. (Ezra 3-6 tells of some of the events while Haggai's and Zechariah's prophecies were made during the days of the restoration.) Despite some local opposition Darius supported the rebuilding of the temple, which was rededicated in his sixth year (Ezra 6:15). In addition, both Ezra and Nehemiah were official representatives of the Persian government. Ezra was to teach and to appoint judges (Ezra 7). Nehemiah may have been the first governor of the province of Yehud (Judah). He undoubtedly had official support for his rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem.

The Jews had trouble under Persian rule, too. Although Daniel was taken into exile by the Babylonians (Dan. 1), his ministry continued through the fall of the Babylonians (Dan. 5) into the time of the Persians (Dan. 6). His visions projected even further. Daniel 6 shows a stable government but one in which Jews could still be at risk. His visions in a time of tranquillity remind readers that human kingdoms come and go. Esther is a story of God's rescue of His people during the rule of the Persian emperor, Ahasuerus (also known as Xerxes I). The story shows an empire where law was used and misused. Jews were already, apparently, hated by some. Malachi, too, was probably from the Persian period. His book shows an awareness of the world at large and is positive toward the Gentiles and the government.

Throughout the period the Jews kept looking for the kind of restoration promised by prophets such as Isaiah (chaps. 40-66) and Ezekiel (chaps. 40-48). Prophets such as Haggai and Zechariah and Malachi helped the Jews to hope, but these men of God also reminded their hearers of the importance of present faithfulness and obedience to God. PERSIS (Pēr' sis) Personal name meaning "Persian woman." Leader in the Roman church whom Paul greeted and commended for diligent service (Rom. 16:12).

PERSON OF CHRIST See Christ, Christology; Jesus Christ.

PERSONALITY See Anthropology; Heart; Humanity; Mind.

PERVERSE Translation of one Greek and several Hebrew terms with the literal meaning "bent," "crooked," or "twisted," applied to persons involved in moral error. Most biblical references are in the book of Proverbs which mentions "perverse": persons (Prov. 3:32; 14:14); minds (11:20; 12:8; 23:33); tongues (10:31; 17:20); words or speech (10:32; 19:1); and perverse ways (28:6). Paul urged Christians to be moral "lights" witnessing to their "crooked and perverse generation" (Phil. 2:15; cp. Deut. 32:5). Jesus accused His generation of both faithlessness and perversity (Matt. 17:17; Luke 9:41; cp. Deut. 32:20).

PESHITTA (Pē shēt' tā) Common Syriac version of the Scriptures. The OT was likely translated between A.D. 100 and 300. The NT translation dates from before A.D. 400. The Peshitta lacked those books rejected by the Syriac-speaking churches (2 Pet.; 2 and 3 John; Jude; Rev.). See Bible Texts and Versions.

PESTILENCE Devastating epidemic that OT writers understood to be sent by God (Exod.

9:15; Jer. 15:2; Hab. 3:5; Amos 4:10), sometimes by means of a destroying angel (2 Sam. 24:16; 1 Chron. 21:15). God sent pestilence as punishment for persistent unbelief (Num. 14:12) and failure to fulfill covenant obligations (Deut. 28:21) as well as to encourage repentance (Amos 4:10). God withheld pestilence from Egypt to allow for survivors to witness to His acts of liberation (Exod. 9:16). Earnest prayer averted pestilence (1 Kings 8:37); fasting and sacrifice without repentance did not (Jer. 14:12). Pestilence is often associated with war and siege conditions (Exod. 5:3; Lev. 26:25; Amos 4:10; Luke 21:11).

PESTLE Small, club-shaped tool used to grind in a mortar (Prov. 27:22).

PETER Derived from the Greek petros, meaning “rock.” The name occurs 159 times in the NT. Simon was his personal name; Peter was given to him by Jesus (Matt. 16:18). Though Peter is dominant, there are three other names: the Hebrew Simeon (Acts 15:14), Simon, and Cephas (Aramaic for rock), used mostly by Paul (1 Cor. 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5; Gal. 1:18; 2:9,11,14) and one other time (John 1:42).

Church of St. Peter in Gallicantu that honors the traditional site of Peter's weeping after his denial of Jesus.

Peter's Family The Gospels provide information about Peter and his family. He was called Barjona (Aramaic for “son of Jona,” Matt. 16:17) or son of John (Gk. for Barjona, Luke 1:42). Peter and his brother Andrew came from Bethsaida (John 1:44) and were Galilean fishermen (Mark 1:16; Luke 5:2-3; John 21:3) in business with James and John (Luke 5:10). Peter was married (Mark 1:30) and lived in Capernaum (Mark 1:21-31). Peter and Andrew were associated with John the Baptist prior to becoming disciples of Jesus (John 1:40). Peter's Role Among the Disciples Peter was leader and spokesman for the 12 disciples (Mark 8:29; Matt. 17:24). Peter often posed questions to Jesus representing concerns of the others (Matt. 15:15; 18:21; Mark 11:21; Luke 12:41). Peter's name occurred first in listing the names of the Twelve (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:16; Luke 6:14) and the inner circle (Peter, James, and John, in Mark 5:35-41; 9:2-8; 14:33,43-50).

Peter sometimes had little faith. He was sometimes presumptuous (Matt. 16:22; John 13:8; 18:10) and timid (Matt. 14:30; 26:69-72). Sometimes he was self-seeking (Matt. 19:27), while at other times he was self-sacrificing (Mark 1:18). Sometimes he was spiritually perceptive (Matt. 16:16; John 6:68) and other times slow to understand spiritual matters (Matt. 15:15-16). Once he walked on water with Jesus, but his faith waned and he began to sink (Matt. 14:28-31). The greatest example of Peter's inconsistency was his confession, “You are the Messiah” (Matt. 16:16 HCSB), opposed to his denial, “I don't know this man” (Mark 14:71). After Pentecost (Acts 2:1) Peter was bold when persecuted. On two occasions Peter was arrested and warned to refrain from preaching about Jesus (Acts 4:1-22; 5:12-40). Herod imprisoned Peter with intent to execute him (Acts 12:3-5). Peter, however, was freed and delivered by an angel (Acts 12:6-11).

Peter's Role in the Early Church and His Legacy Though Peter led the disciples and took a prominent role in the early church (Acts 1-5), he did not emerge as the leader. Peter helped establish the Jerusalem church, but James the brother of Jesus assumed the leadership of the Jerusalem church (Acts 15). Though active in the spread of the gospel to the Gentiles (Acts 11-12), Paul became “the apostle to the Gentiles” (Acts 14; 16-28). Peter served as a bridge to hold together the diverse people of the early church (Acts 15). Peter became the “apostle to the Jews,” preaching throughout Palestine. Peter died as a martyr in Rome under Nero, probably in A.D. 64 or 65 (1 Clement 5:1-6:1). Tradition holds that Peter was crucified upside down because he felt unworthy to die in the same manner as Jesus.

Conservative scholarship maintains that Peter wrote 1 and 2 Peter with scribal assistance. Eusebius held that John Mark wrote the Gospel of Mark to preserve the preaching of Peter. Apparently devotees of Peter produced pseudonymously the noncanonical books, the Acts of Peter and the Gospel of Peter, assigning Peter's name to them. See Peter, First Letter from; Peter, Second Letter from.

PETER, FIRST LETTER FROM First Peter is addressed to churches in Asia Minor experiencing persecution. Peter reminded them of their heavenly hope and eternal inheritance so that they would be strengthened to persevere in the midst of suffering. He emphasized that believers are called to holiness and a life of love. Believers are called upon to glorify God in their daily lives and to imitate Christ who suffered on the cross for the sake of His people. Peter sketched what it means to live as a Christian, how believers relate to governing authorities, to cruel masters, and unbelieving husbands. He warned believers that suffering may be intense, but believers should rely upon God's grace, knowing there is a heavenly reward.

Author The letter claims to be written by the Apostle Peter (1:1), and there is no good reason to doubt Petrine authorship. The early church fathers also supported Petrine authorship, and there is wide and early evidence in the fathers to support such a view. Nevertheless, scholars raised a number of objections to Petrine authorship. (1) A Galilean fisherman could not have written the cultivated Greek. (2) The OT quotations stem from the Septuagint, and Peter, since he did not know Greek, would not have used the LXX. (3) The theology of 1 Peter is remarkably Pauline in character, demonstrating that it is not authentically Petrine. (4) The letter says very little about the historical Jesus. (5) The persecution in the letter is empire-wide and would be dated in the time of Domitian (A.D. 81-96) or Trajan (A.D. 98-117).

None of these arguments are compelling, and Petrine authorship is solidly established. (1) Significant evidence exists that Greek was spoken in Palestine and especially in Galilee. As a fisherman in Galilee, Peter would have engaged in business with other Greek speakers. The notion that Peter was uneducated or illiterate is a myth. Acts 4:13 merely means that he was not trained rabbinically and should not be used to say he was unable to read. (2) Since Peter knew Greek, it is not surprising that he used the Septuagint. In particular Peter quoted from the Bible that his readers used, like any good pastor. (3) The old Tübingen notion that the theology of Peter and Paul was at loggerheads should be laid to rest. Paul himself argued that the apostles agreed upon the gospel (Gal. 2:1-10; 1 Cor. 15:11). (4) More allusions to the teaching of Jesus exist in the letter than some claim. In any case, there is no reason to insist that Peter was compelled to refer to the historical Jesus often in an occasional letter written for a specific purpose. (5) The notion that the persecution is empire-wide and state sponsored is hardly clear from 1 Peter, and most scholars now reject such a theory. Instead, 1 Peter indicates that sporadic persecution was breaking out against believers. Indeed the letter says nothing about believers being put to death, though the latter is a possibility. Hence, there is no compelling reason to doubt that the letter was written while Nero was emperor (A.D. 54-68) and Peter was still alive. It should be noted that not even Nero instituted an empire-wide persecution of Christians. His punishment of Christians in Rome after the fire that destroyed much of Rome was not the beginning of a policy that reached to the edges of the empire. (6) It is also possible that Peter used a secretary (amanuensis) to write the letter. Many have argued that the secretary was Silvanus (1 Pet. 5:12), though the language used in the verse denotes the carrier of the letter rather than the secretary. Still it is possible that Silvanus or some other person functioned as a secretary.

Date/Destination If we accept Petrine authorship, the letter was likely written in the early 60s, before the composition of 2 Peter. The first verse of the letter indicates that the letter was written to various churches in the northern part of Asia Minor (present-day Turkey). The courier of the letter, presumably Silvanus, probably traveled in a circle in reading the letter to the various churches. The purpose of the letter was to fortify the churches and give them hope as they experienced persecution. We already noted that the persecution was sporadic and not state sponsored. Nor is there a clear indication that believers were being executed. Most likely, believers were being discriminated against in society and the work place and were subject to various forms of harassment.

PETER, SECOND LETTER FROM In his second epistle Peter wrote in response to false teachers who denied the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ and advocated a libertine lifestyle. Peter maintained that God's grace is the foundation for a godly life and that living a life of godliness is necessary to obtain an eternal reward. Such a claim does not amount to works righteousness, for such works do not merit salvation but are a result of God's transforming grace. Peter also vigorously defended the truth of Christ's second coming, which was anticipated in the transfiguration and promised in God's word. Those who reject Christ's coming deny God's sovereignty. They reject God's intervention in the world and remove any basis for ethical living. Peter urged his readers to grow in grace and knowledge until the day of salvation arrives. Author Many scholars deny that 2 Peter was written by the Apostle Peter, claiming the letter is pseudonymous. This view is defended by the following arguments: (1) Peter used Jude as a source in his second chapter, and the letter of Jude is too late to have been used by the historic Peter who died in the 60s. Further, some insist that Peter would have never borrowed from a writer like Jude. (2) The Hellenistic vocabulary and theology in the letter show that Peter, a Galilean fisherman, could not be the author. The style and syntax are quite different from 1 Peter, demonstrating a different author from the first epistle. (3) The false teachers in the letter are second-century gnostics, and obviously Peter could not have written the letter in the second century. (4) Paul's letters are considered to be Scripture (2 Pet. 3:15-16), but it is impossible that Paul's letters could have been collected together and viewed as Scripture while Peter was alive. (5) The letter lacks clear attestation in the second century, and even in the fourth century its canonicity was questioned. Some evangelicals, such as Richard Bauckham, argue that 2

Peter fits a testament genre, but the letter was a “transparent fiction,” and hence none of the original readers thought the letter was genuinely written by Peter. It follows, then, that the original readers were not deceived by the inclusion of Peter's name.

Despite the objections of many, Petrine authorship is still the most convincing view. (1) Most important, the letter claims to be written by Peter (1:1). He claimed that his death is imminent (1:14). Even more striking, he claims to have heard and seen Jesus' transfiguration (1:16-18). The author is obviously open to a charge of deception and fraud if he was not Peter. (2) The use of Jude as a source is not certain but only a theory. Furthermore, even if Peter used Jude, there is no problem. Jude likely wrote before Peter died. Nothing in Jude demands a late date, and there is no reason why an apostle would not use another source. (3) The idea that the opponents were second-century gnostics is not verified by the data of the letter. No evidence exists of the cosmological dualism that was typical of Gnosticism. Nor is it clear that the opponents rejected the material world. (4) It is unnecessary to conclude from 2 Pet. 3:15-16 that all of Paul's letters were collected and stamped as canonical. Peter obviously knows some of the Pauline letters and considers them to be authoritative, but that is not the same thing as a collected canon of Pauline writings. Those who think that such a commendation of Paul by Peter is impossible are overly influenced by the old Tübingen hypothesis. (5) The vocabulary and style of 2 Peter are distinct from 1 Peter, and the language has a Hellenistic flavor. But this is not an insuperable problem. We need to observe firstly that the corpus of Petrine writings is incredibly small. Hence, judgments about “Petrine style” should be made with humility. Second, Peter may have adapted his style to speak to the situation of his readers, just as Paul did in Athens (Acts 17:16-34). Finally, Peter may have instructed a secretary (amanuensis) to compose the writing, and this may account for some of the stylistic differences. (6) The argument that Peter uses a different theology does not stand either. We need to recall that the letter is occasional and hence is not a summary of all of Peter's theology. Furthermore, the differences between 1 and 2 Peter theologically have often been overemphasized. (7) Second Peter is not as strongly attested by external evidence as many other letters. Still, some evidence for the letter's use exists even in the second century, and we ought to remember that the letter was ultimately judged to be authentic and canonical. (8) The “transparent fiction” hypothesis of Richard Bauckham is an interesting attempt to solve the problem of authorship. But Bauckham's view ultimately fails. No historical evidence exists that the letter was viewed as “transparent fiction.” If it was transparent, how could it be forgotten so quickly, so that any trace of such a fictional device has vanished from the historical record? Furthermore, there is no good evidence that pseudonymous letters were accepted as canonical. Indeed, they were rejected because they were fraudulent.

Date/Destination/Opponents The date of 2 Peter depends upon one's view of authorship. Probably Peter wrote the letter shortly before his death in the mid 60s. The letter was most likely written to the same readers who received 1 Peter (cp. 3:2), and hence it was probably sent to churches in Asia Minor. We have already noted that the opponents cannot legitimately be identified as gnostics. Jerome Neyrey suggests some affinities to the Epicureans, but no specific identification has been successful. We do know that the opponents were libertines and denied Christ's second coming. Both of these features are eminently possible in Peter's lifetime.

PHARAOH Title meaning “great house” for the ancient kings of Egypt. Every ancient pharaoh had five “great names” which he assumed on the day of his accession. Since it was not deemed proper to use such powerful names in direct fashion, a polite circumlocution developed; he came to be called Pharaoh.

Egyptians applied “pharaoh” to the royal palace and grounds in the fourth dynasty (about 2500 B.C.). The title Pharaoh came to be applied to the king from about 1500 B.C. until the Persian domination, about 550 B.C.

The funerary mask of King Tut (Pharaoh Tutankhamun) of Egypt

An ancient pharaoh was an absolute monarch, supreme commander of the armies, chief justice of the royal court, and high priest of all religion. His absolute power may be seen in that justice was defined as “what Pharaoh loves”; wrongdoing as “what Pharaoh hates.” An example of his divine power was that he daily conducted “the Rite of the House of the Morning,” an early morning ritual in which he broke the seal to the statue of the sun god, waking him up with a prayer. This act brought the sun up and started every day for the people.

References to 10 pharaohs can be clearly distinguished in the OT: the pharaoh of Abraham, Gen. 12:10-20; of Joseph, Gen. 39-50; of the oppression, Exod. 1; of the exodus, Exod. 2:23-15:19; of 1 Chron. 4:18; of Solomon, 1 Kings 3-11 ; of Rehoboam, called Shishak, king of Egypt, 1 Kings 14:25; of Hezekiah and Isaiah, 2 Kings 18:21; Isa. 36; of Josiah, 2 Kings 23:29; of Jer. 44:30 and Ezek. 29:1-16. PHIBSETH (Phī' bə sēth) Place-name derived from the Egyptian, “house of Bastet,” a goddess represented as a cat (Ezek. 30:17). Bastet (Gk.

PHILEMON, LETTER TO (Phi' lē' mon) Personal name meaning “affectionate” and 18th book of the NT. Philemon owed his conversion to the Christian faith to the Apostle Paul (v. 19). This conversion took place during Paul's extended ministry in Ephesus (Acts 19:10). There is no evidence that Paul ever visited Colossae where Philemon lived. Paul and Philemon became devoted friends. Paul referred to Philemon as a “dear friend and coworker” (v. 1 HCSB).

Paul's only letter of a private and personal nature included in the NT was written to Philemon in A.D. 61. This letter concerned a runaway slave. The slave Onesimus had robbed Philemon and escaped to Rome. There Onesimus found the Apostle Paul who was imprisoned. Paul wrote to Philemon concerning Onesimus. Paul sent both the letter and Onesimus back to Colossae. The letter states that Onesimus was now a Christian. Paul requested that Philemon forgive and receive Onesimus not as a slave but as a brother (v. 16). This request was not made from Paul's apostolic authority but tenderly as a Christian friend. Paul wrote, “Accept him as you would me” (v. 17 HCSB).

Paul also stated that he was willing to pay any damages caused by Onesimus. Some scholars indicate that Paul may have been asking subtly that Philemon release Onesimus so that he could return and aid Paul in his evangelistic endeavors. Philemon had a judicial right to punish severely or even kill Onesimus. Paul's short epistle of some 355 Greek words challenged Philemon to apply Christian love in dealing with Onesimus. Paul's approach eventually caused the end of slavery. See Onesimus; Paul; Slave, Servant.

PHILETUS (Phī lē' tūs) Personal name meaning “beloved.” Heretical teacher who asserted that the (general) resurrection had already occurred (2 Tim. 2:17-18), perhaps in a purely spiritual sense.

PHILIP (Phīl' ip) Personal name meaning “fond of horses.” 1. A respected member of the church at Jerusalem who was chosen as one of the seven first deacons (Acts 6:5). Following Stephen's martyrdom, Philip took the gospel to Samaria, where his ministry was blessed (Acts 8:5-13). Subsequently, he was led south to the Jerusalem-Gaza road where he introduced the Ethiopian eunuch to Christ and baptized him (Acts 8:26-38). He was then transported by the Spirit to Azotus (Ashdod) and from there conducted an itinerant ministry until he took up residence in Caesarea (Acts 8:39-40). Then, for nearly 20 years, we lose sight of him. He is last seen in Scripture when Paul lodged in his home on his last journey to Jerusalem (Acts 21:8). He had four unmarried daughters who were prophetesses (Acts 21:9). See Acts of the Apostles; Deacon; Evangelism. 2. One of 12 apostles (Matt. 10:3). From Bethsaida he called Nathanael to “come and see” Jesus (John 1:43-51). Jesus tested Philip concerning how to feed the multitude (John 6:5-7). He and Andrew took inquiring Gentiles to Jesus (John 12:21-22). Philip asked Jesus to show them the father (John 14:8-9), opening the way for Jesus' teaching that to see Him is to see the Father. PHILIPPI (Phil' ip pi) City in the Roman province of Macedonia. Paul did missionary work in Philippi (Acts 16:12) and later wrote a letter to the church there (Phil. 1:1).

History In ancient times the site was in a gold mining area. After 400 B.C. Philip II of Macedon seized the mines, fortified the city, and named it for himself. Philippi, along with the rest of Macedonia, came under Roman control after 200 B.C. In 42 B.C. Philippi was the site of a decisive battle that sealed the fate of Rome as a republic and set the stage for the establishment of an empire. The forces of Octavian (later to be Augustus Caesar, the first emperor) and Antony defeated the army of Brutus and Cassius. In honor of the victory Antony settled some Roman soldiers there and made Philippi a Roman colony. After defeating Antony at the Battle of Actium in 31 B.C., the victorious Octavian dispossessed the supporters of Antony from Italy, but he allowed him to settle in places like Philippi. Octavian refounded Philippi as a Roman colony.

Paul and Philippi Paul first visited Philippi on his second missionary journey in response to his Macedonian vision (Acts 16:9). They and his companions sailed from Troas across the Aegean Sea to Neapolis, on the eastern shore of Macedonia (Acts 16:11). Then they journeyed a few miles inland to “Philippi, a Roman colony, which is a leading city of that district of Macedonia” (Acts 16:12 HCSB).

On the Sabbath Paul went to a prayer meeting on the riverbank. When Paul spoke, Lydia and others opened their hearts to the Lord (Acts 16:13-15). As a rule, Paul first went to the Jewish synagogue when he came to a new city. The fact that he did not do this in Philippi probably shows that Philippi had no synagogue.

The Roman character of the city is apparent from Paul's other experiences in Philippi. He healed a possessed slave girl whose owners charged that Jews troubled the city by teaching customs unlawful for Romans to observe (Acts 16:20-21). The city magistrates ordered Paul and Silas to be beaten and turned over to the jailer (Acts 16:20,22-23). After Paul's miraculous deliverance and the jailer's conversion, the magistrates sent the jailer word to release Paul (Acts 16:35-36). Paul informed the messengers that he was a Roman citizen. Since he had been beaten and imprisoned unlawfully, Paul insisted that the magistrates themselves come and release him (Acts 16:37). The very nervous magistrates went to the jail. They pled with Paul not only to leave the jail but also to leave town (Acts 16:38-40). See Paul; Philippians, Letter to the; Roman Law.

PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE (Phī līp' pī āns)

Eleventh book of the NT, written by Paul to the church at Philippi, the first church he established in Europe. It is one of the Prison Epistles (along with Eph., Col., and Phil.). The authenticity of the letter generally is accepted. The terminology and theology are thoroughly Pauline.

In spite of the negative circumstances from which Paul wrote, Philippians is a warm, personal, positive letter (except for chap. 3). Paul wrote to thank the church for a gift it had recently sent to Paul in prison and to inform them of his circumstances and of Timothy's and Epaphroditus' travel plans. The underlying theme that holds the letter together is a call for unity in the church.

The date of the letter depends on which imprisonment Paul was enduring. The traditional date and place of writing is A.D. 61/62 from Rome. If Philippians was written from Caesarea, we would assign a date in the late 50s; if from Ephesus, the mid 50s. See below.

Origin of Philippians Where was Paul when he wrote Philippians? The letter itself reveals only that he was in prison. Acts records Pauline imprisonments in Caesarea and in Rome. Some evidence indicates that Paul was also in prison in Ephesus (Acts 19; 2 Cor. 11:23; 1 Cor. 15:30-32).

The agora (marketplace) in the ancient city of Philippi in Macedonia.

Philippians is traditionally assigned to Rome. Reference to Caesar's household (Phil. 4:22), the praetorium or palace guard (1:13 NIV), as well as the ability to receive visitors (Acts 28:16,30-31) like Epaphroditus and the possibility of execution (Phil. 1:20-26) seem to mesh well with the imprisonment described in the closing verses of Acts.

An Ephesian origin for Philippians also has much in its favor. Ephesus was the capitol of Asia. A provincial governor's guard occupied a "praetorium," and the governor's residence was termed "Caesar's household." An Ephesian imprisonment and origin for Philippians makes sense of Paul's stated intent to visit Philippi upon his release (Phil. 2:24; from Rome Paul intended to go to Spain, Rom. 15:23-24). In addition, Phil. 2:25-30 implies that several trips, bearing news, had been made between Paul's locale and Philippi. A trip from Rome to Philippi took several weeks; from Ephesus to Philippi required only several days. The large number of trips implied in Philippians is difficult to fit into a twoyear Roman imprisonment but is less problematic even in a much shorter Ephesian imprisonment.

A Caesarean origin for Philippians has had fewer supporters over the years. Its detractors point out Paul's intent to go to Rome (not visit Philippi) upon his release and doubt that Paul ever feared execution in Caesarea, as Philippians implies, since he always had the option of appealing to Caesar.

Content of the Letter Philippians is structured much like a typical personal letter of that day. The introduction identifies the sender(s): Paul and Timothy, and the recipients: the saints, overseers, and deacons. This typical letter form, however, is filled with Christian content. The usual secular greeting and wish for good health is transformed into a blessing (v. 2), a thanksgiving for the Philippian church's faithful participation in the work of the gospel (1:3-8), and a prayer that they may be blessed with an ever growing, enlightened, Christian love (1:9-11). See Letter Form and Function.

The body of the letter begins with Paul explaining his current situation (1:12-26). In verses 12-18 Paul revealed that his primary concern (the proclamation of the gospel) was being accomplished in spite of his difficult circumstances. His captors were being evangelized (vv. 12-13). His compatriots have gained confidence through his bold example (v. 14). Even the brethren who were working with wrong motives were sharing the good news actively. (There is no hint that these were preaching a false gospel; Paul rejoiced in their work, vv. 15-18.) The severity of Paul's imprisonment is reflected in 1:19-26. His death appears to be a real possibility. Death would unite him with Christ. Life would give him the joys of continued productive ministry. He found cause for genuine rejoicing in both. Paul seemed confident, however, that he would eventually be released and reunited with the Philippians.

When Paul returned to Philippi, he hoped to find a church united in Christ. Philippians 1:27-4:9 is a multifaceted call for unity in the church. The great cause of the proclamation of the gospel calls for them to be united in spirit, in task, and in confidence (1:27-30). Their common Christian experience (2:1) and purpose (2:2) should also rule out a self-centered, self-serving attitude (2:3-4). Those who follow Christ must follow him in selfless service to others (2:5-11).

Philippians 2:6-11 is known as the kenosis passage (from the Greek word translated “emptied” in 2:7 RSV). The language and structure of the passage have convinced most commentators that Paul was quoting a hymn that was already in use in the church. The purpose of the pre-Pauline hymn was probably to teach the believer about the nature and work of Christ. Preexistence, incarnation, passion, resurrection, and exaltation are all summarized in a masterful fashion. In the context of Philippians, however, the kenosis passage is used to highlight the humility and selfless service demonstrated by Jesus, whose example the Christian is to follow. See Kenosis.

Paul was concerned that the Philippians demonstrate the reality of their Christian profession in action. Neither the grumbling so characteristic of Israel in the wilderness or the perversity of a world that does not know God should characterize the church. Paul had sacrificed himself to engender true faith in the Philippians. His desire for them and for himself was that he be able to rejoice that his sacrifice was not in vain (2:12-18).

An inscription from the Roman period at ancient Philippi.

Philippians 2:25-30 explained to the church why Epaphroditus was returning to Philippi. The church has sent him to take a gift to Paul (Phil. 4:10-20) and minister to him in his imprisonment. Paul probably feared that some would criticize Epaphroditus for returning earlier than planned.

The tone of the letter changes in chapter 3. The encouragement to rejoice (3:1) unexpectedly becomes a stern warning (3:2). (The change is so marked that some scholars think chap. 3 is a later addition to the letter.) A problem was threatening the church at Philippi that had the potential of destroying the foundation of unity and the basis of joy.

The exact nature of the problem is unclear. Jewish legalism (3:2-11), Christian or gnostic perfectionism (3:12-16), and pagan libertinism (3:17-21) are all attacked. What is clear, however, is that Paul countered the heretical teachings with Christian truths: Jesus Christ is the only avenue to righteousness (3:2-11); the stature of Christ is the goal of Christian maturity (3:12-16); and the nature of Christ and His kingdom is the standard by which the Christian must live (3:17-21).

Chapter 4 returns to a more positive instruction and affirmation of the church. Two women, Euodia and Syntyche (4:2-3), were exhorted to end their conflict, for personal disagreements may be as damaging to the unity of the church as false doctrine.

General exhortations to rejoice and to remain faithful (4:4-9) led to Paul's expression of gratitude for the Philippians' faithful support of him and of the ministry (4:10-20). The letter closes in typical Pauline fashion, with an exchange of greetings and a prayer for grace.

PHILISTIA (Phī līs' tī ā) Coastal plain of southwestern Palestine that was under the control of the Philistines (Exod. 15:14; Pss. 60:8; 87:4; 108:9; Isa. 14:29-31). KJV sometimes referred to Philistia as Palestina (Exod. 15:14; Isa. 14:29-31). See Philistim or Philistines.

PHILISTIM (Phī līs' tīm) (KJV, Gen. 10:14) or PHILISTINES (Phī līs' tēns) One of the rival groups the Israelites encountered as they settled the land of Canaan. References to the Philistines appear in the OT as well as other ancient Near Eastern writings. Philistine refers to a group of people who occupied and gave their name to the southwest part of Palestine. Ancient Egyptian records from the time of Merneptah and Ramses III referred to them as the prst. Ancient Assyrian records include references to the Philistines in the terms Philisti and Palastu.

The origin and background of the Philistines has not been completely clarified. Ancient Egyptian records include the prst as part of a larger movement of people known as the Sea Peoples, who invaded Egypt about 1188 B.C. by land and by sea, battling the forces of Ramses III, who, according to Egyptian records, defeated them. The Sea Peoples, a massive group that originated in the Aegean area, included the Tjeker, the Skekelesh, the Denyen, the Sherden, and the Weshwesh as well as the prst or Pelesti, the biblical Philistines. As they moved eastward from the Aegean region, the Sea Peoples made war with people in their path including the Hittites in Anatolia and the inhabitants at sites in North Syria such as those at the site of Ugarit. According to biblical references, the homeland of the Philistines was Caphtor (Amos 9:7; Jer. 47:4). See Caphtor.

Philistines are first mentioned in the patriarchal stories (Gen. 21:32,34), a reference that some suggest is anachronistic and others suggest refers to the migrations of an Aegean colony in the patriarchal period. The most dramatic phase of Philistine history begins in the period of the Judges when the Philistines were the principal enemy of and the major political threat to Israel. This threat is first seen in the stories of Samson (Judg. 13-16). The threat intensified as the Philistines encroached on the territory of the tribe of Dan ultimately forcing Dan to move north (Judg. 18:11,29). The threat reached crisis proportions in the battle of Ebenezer (1 Sam. 4:1-18), when the Israelites were soundly defeated and the ark of the covenant, brought over from Shiloh (1 Sam. 4:3-4), was captured. During the time of Samuel, the Israelites defeated the Philistines at times (1 Sam. 7:5-11; 14:16-23), but, generally speaking, their advance against the Israelites continued. Saul not only failed to check their intrusion into Israelite territory but in the end lost his life fighting the Philistines at Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. 31:1-13). David finally checked the Philistine advance at Baalperazim (2 Sam. 5:17-25).

Several features of Philistine life and culture are reflected in the OT. Politically, the Philistines had a highly organized city-state system comprised of five towns in southwest Palestine: Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron (1 Sam. 6:17). Each of the city-states was ruled by a “lord” (1 Sam. 6:18), a kinglike figure. Gath was perhaps the major city of this Philistine Pentapolis and, as such, served as the hub of the city-state system.

The Philistines were experts in metallurgy, the skill of processing metals (1 Sam. 13:19-23). Philistine expertise in this area put the Israelites at a decided disadvantage in their struggles with the Philistines (1 Sam. 13:22). See Minerals and Metals.

The Philistines had a highly trained military organization. Sea and land battles between the Egyptians and Sea Peoples are depicted on large panels at the temple of Ramses III at Medinet Habu in Thebes. The Philistines were in ships designed with a curved keel and the head of a bird on the bow. Philistine warriors wore a plumed or feathered headdress, a feature that added height to their physical appearance. On land the Philistines were equipped with horses and chariots, numerous foot soldiers, and archers (1 Sam. 13:5; 31:3). The armor of Philistine soldiers included bronze helmets, coats of mail, leg protectors, spears, and shields (1 Sam. 17:5-7). The story of Goliath indicates that at times the Philistines used individual combat (1 Sam. 17). Most likely the Philistine warrior went through a cursing ritual just prior to the confrontation (1 Sam. 17:43). David, who recognized the military expertise of the Philistines, selected Cherethites (Cretans) and Pelethites (Philistines) (2 Sam. 20:23) for his palace guard or mercenary army. This segment of the army provided protection for David and his family during times of revolt. See Arms and Armor.

While our information on Philistine religion is limited, three Philistine gods are mentioned in the OT—Dagon, Ashtoreth, and Baalzebub. Dagon appears to be the chief god of the Philistines. Temples of Dagon were located at Gaza (Judg. 16:21-30) and Ashdod (1 Sam. 5:1-7). Ashtoreth, the fertility goddess of the Canaanites, was most likely adopted by the Philistines. Apparently, the Philistines had Ashtoreth temples at Beth-shan (1 Sam. 31:10) and, according to Herodotus, at Ashkelon (Herodotus I.105). Baalzebub, the Philistine god whose name means “lord of the flies,” was the god of Ekron (2 Kings 1:1-16). Most likely the Philistines worshiped Baalzebub as a god who averted pestilence or plagues.

Archaeological excavations have brought to light many features of the material culture of the Philistines. The distinctive Philistine pottery that reflects styles and designs adopted and adapted from other cultures has been found at many sites. The major types of Philistine pottery are the so-called beer jugs with a spouted strainer on the side, the crater bowl, the stirrup jar, and the horn-shaped vessel. The pottery was often decorated with red and black painted designs including geometric designs often consisting of circles and cross-halving and stylized birds. Clay coffins were used by the Philistines for burials. These distinctive coffins, called “anthropoid coffins” because they were made in the shape of a human body, had lids decorated with the physical features of the upper part of a human being, features such as a head, arms, and hands.

Recent excavations especially at the sites of Ashdod, Tel-Qasile, Tel Jemmeh, and Tel Mor have added significantly to our understanding of the Philistine culture. The excavations at Tel Oasile revealed a Philistine iron smeltery, a Philistine temple, offering stands, and other vessels used in religious rituals as well as many other artifacts and installations. A new series of excavations is under way at Ashkelon. The current excavations will add yet a new dimension to our understanding of the Philistines. The political influence of the Philistines was most prominent between 1200 and 1000 B.C., but their influence continues through the use of the name Palestine, a name derived from “Philistine.” See Ashdod; Ashkelon; Ekron; Gath; Gaza; Palestine. LaMoine DeVries

PHILO JUDAEUS (Phī' lō Ju də ūs) Early Jewish interpreter of Scripture known for use of allegory. Also known as Philo of Alexandria, he lived about the same time as Jesus (about 20 B.C. to A.D. 50). A member of a wealthy Jewish family in Alexandria, Egypt, He was well educated in Greek schools and used the Greek OT, the Septuagint, as his Bible.

Philo's writings—particularly his commentaries on the Scriptures—influenced the early church. A literal interpretation was all right for the average scholar, but for the enlightened ones such as himself, he advocated an allegorical interpretation. See Bible Hermeneutics.

PHILOLOGUS (Phī lō' lō gūs) Personal name meaning “lover of words,” either in the sense of “talkative” or of “lover of learning.” Member, perhaps the head, of a Roman house church whom Paul greeted (Rom. 16:15). Philologus was perhaps the husband of Julia and father of Nereus and Olympas.

PHILOSOPHY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT Greek thinkers called themselves philosophers (“lovers of wisdom”) centuries before the NT era. Rejecting the myths of their culture, philosophers examined the world by means of reason, not religion. A. N. Whitehead recognized that philosophy's golden era had passed after Plato, thus since then philosophy has been “a series of footnotes.” By the NT period philosophy had sunk to its nadir. Christian thinkers recognize, however, that with the passing of philosophy's best but inadequate theories, God was providentially preparing the way for Christ and the gospel.

Major Philosophical Systems in the New Testament Era Two major philosophical systems (mentioned in Acts 17:18) vied for allegiance in the NT era. The Epicureans were essentially materialists, viewing reality as a random configuration of indivisible atoms. If gods exist, they are of no consequence. Life should be spent on simple pleasures. Stoicism was essentially pantheistic and stressed strength of character. Matter is animated and organized by the Logos or universal word, of which all humans are children.

Philosophy in the New Testament Two NT passages specifically use the words philosophy and philosopher. In Col. 2:8 Paul warns against being taken captive by “philosophy and empty deceit.” The specific heresy drawing this warning is still the subject of debate. But the apostle's readers would know that “philosophy” applies to all theories about God, the world, and life's meaning—and a Christian cannot surrender the gospel to any philosophy.

Few passages in Acts have been analyzed more than Acts 17:16-34, which details Paul's encounter with Epicurean and Stoic philosophers (v. 18). Paul quotes two Greek thinkers (v. 28) in his speech to the intellectuals at Athens. Paul takes ideas that originally allude to God as Zeus, the principal deity in Stoic tradition, only to illustrate that the true God is Father of all life and cannot be contained in temples. The apostle quickly moves from this point of contact to a presentation of the gospel. He likely would have told them more had they listened. Apparently Paul's evangelistic methodology was to establish contact with Jews via the OT but with Gentiles via creation. For example, in Acts 14:15-17, Paul had to stop the Lystrans from worshiping him and Barnabas as an incarnation of gods after they healed a lame man. Paul pointed them to the one, true God who left Himself a witness by blessing them with good gifts (rains, seasons, food, and gladness—cp. also Rom. 1:18-21). Students of Scripture should pause before assuming Paul was wrong in his approach at Athens.

Other NT passages are sometimes viewed as dependent upon Greek philosophy. The Gospel of John is often accused of allegorizing the OT by way of the first-century Jewish philosopher, Philo. Or else, John is charged with importing Stoic ideas (such as the Logos). But biblical scholars are increasingly recognizing that John is primarily based upon the first chapter of Genesis. If the Gospel makes any use of current philosophical ideas, they are not primary, only secondary points of contact. The book of Hebrews is also viewed by some as a handbook of Platonism, but this misses the mark. Hebrews does not posit the unreality of the material world as does Plato but instead emphasizes the transience of the OT priestly system and its final fulfillment in Jesus Christ. The early church was not afraid to think carefully but did shun speculative theorizing when it came at the expense of God's revelation. They were aware that the world knew not God through wisdom (1 Cor. 1:21).

PHINEHAS (Phīn' ə hās) Personal name meaning “dark-skinned” or “mouth of brass.” 1. Grandson of Aaron and high priest who, on several occasions, aided Moses and Joshua. See High Priest 2. One of Eli the priest's worthless sons. He engaged in religious prostitution (1 Sam. 2:22) and led the people to follow. He and Hophni died in a battle with the Philistines while attempting to keep the ark from being captured (4:11). When his pregnant wife heard of his death, she immediately delivered, naming the child Ichabod (“the glory has departed”).

PHLEGON (Phlē' gōn) Personal name meaning “burning,” perhaps in the sense of “zealous.” Member of a Roman house church whom Paul greeted (Rom. 16:14).

PHOEBE (Phē' bē) Personal name meaning “bright.” “Servant,” “minister” (REB), “deaconess” (NASB, NIV note), or “deacon” (NRSV) of church at Cenchræa whom Paul recommended to church at Rome (Rom. 16:1-2). See Deacon.

PHOENICIA (Phō nīsh' ī á) Place-name meaning “purple” or “crimson,” translation of Hebrew Canaan, “land of purple.” The narrow land between the Mediterranean Sea and the Lebanon Mountains between Tyre in the south and Arvad in the north. New Testament Phoenicia reached south to Dor. Great forest-land enabled the people to build ships and become the dominant seafaring nation. The forests also provided timber for export, Phoenician cedars being the featured material of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 5:8-10). Culture Phoenician religion was akin to that of the Canaanites, featuring fertility rites of Baal. Later Baal's Greek counterpart Adonis (“my lord”) was worshiped in similar fashion to Tammuz. The Phoenician princess Jezebel imported devotion to Baal to Israel. Phoenicia introduced the alphabet to the western world but little of their literature survived. See Canaan; Elijah; Fertility Cult; Jezebel.

History City-states rather than central government dominated Phoenicia. Leading cities were Tyre, Sidon, Byblos (Geba), and Berytos (Beirut). An early Neolithic race disappeared about 3000 B.C., being replaced by Semitic colonizers from the east. Invading armies from north (Hittites), east (Amorites and Assyrians), and south (Egyptians) dominated history until 1000 B.C. when King Hiram of Tyre established local rule (981-947 B.C.). They were able to take advantage of their location on the sea with natural harbors and their forests to establish far-flung trade (cp. Ezek. 27). Their sailors established trading colonies to the west and south all along the Mediterranean coast. The most notable colony was Carthage on the North African coast.

A relief depicting a Phoenician shepherd.

Growth of Assyrian power about 750 B.C. led to Phoenicia's decline. The Persian Empire gave virtual independence to Phoenicia, using the Phoenician fleet against Egypt and Greece. Alexander the Great put an end to Phoenician political power, but the great cities retained economic power. See Hiram.

New Testament Jesus' ministry reached Tyre and Sidon (Matt. 15:21). Persecution, beginning with Stephen's death, led the church to spread into Phoenicia (Acts 11:19; cp. 15:3; 21:2-3). See Sidon; Tyre.

PHOENIX (Phē' nīx) Place-name, perhaps meaning “date palm.” Port on the southeast coast of Crete where Paul and the ship's crew hoped to reach for winter harbor (Acts 27:12). Phoenix is often identified with Port Loutro, which, however, faces the wrong direction to offer shelter from winter storms. Phoenix is better identified with some point on Phinika Bay to the west of Loutro.

PHRYGIA (Phrīj' ē ā) Place-name meaning “parched.” In very ancient times the area immediately west of the Hellespont. Later the people migrated into Asia Minor. During Roman times Phrygia was a subregion of Galatia, and her people often were slaves or servants. The area remained relatively undefined but contained Antioch of Pisidia, Laodicea, and at times, Iconium. Some of the Phrygians were present in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost and heard the gospel in their native language (Acts 2:10; cp. 16:6; 18:23). See Asia Minor, Cities of.

PHUT (Phūt) (KJV, Gen. 10:6; Ezek. 27:10) See Put.

PHUVAH (Phū' vah) (KJV, Gen. 46:13) See Puvah.

PHYGELUS (Phī' gēl' us) Personal name meaning “fugitive.” Christian who deserted Paul (2 Tim. 1:15). The contrast with Onesiphorus, who was not ashamed of the imprisoned Paul (1:16-17), suggests that Phygelus abandoned Paul in prison.

PI-BESETH (Pi-bē' sēth) Egyptian city, name meaning “house of Bastet,” located on the shore of the old Tanite branch of the Nile about 45 miles northeast of Cairo; served as capital of the 18th nome (administrative district) and, during the 22nd and 23rd Dynasties (940-745 B.C.), as capital of a fragmented Egyptian Empire. The site is tell Basta. Ezekiel mentions this city in his oracle against Egypt (Ezek. 30:17).

PICTURE KJV term in three passages where modern translations use a term better suited to the context. 1. Carved stone figures (Num. 33:52). 2. Settings (NASB, NIV, NRSV) or filigree (REB) (Prov. 25:11). 3. Sailing craft or vessel (Isa. 2:16).

PIECE OF MONEY 1. Translation of the Hebrew qesitah, a coin of uncertain weight and value (Gen. 33:19; Job 42:11 KJV, NASB, NRSV). NIV reads “pieces of silver.” 2. KJV translation of the Greek term stater (Matt. 17:27). Modern translations read: stater (NASB); four drachma coin (NIV); shekel (RSV); coin (NRSV, REB). See Coins.

PIETY Translation of a Hebrew expression and several Greek terms. 1. NIV used “piety” to translate the Hebrew idiom “the fear [or reverence] of the Lord” (Job 4:6; 15:4; 22:4; cp. REB). 2. NRSV used piety to translate the Greek term meaning “righteousness” (Matt. 6:1), where the concern was with an external show of religion (Matt. 6:2-6). 3. Piety translates two Greek terms for fear or reverence for God (Acts 3:12 NASB, NRSV; Heb. 5:7 NASB). 4. Piety represents the religious duty of caring for the physical needs of elderly family members (1 Tim. 5:4 KJV, NASB).

PIG See Swine.

PIGEON “Pigeon” is a general term referring to any of a widely distributed subfamily of fowl (Columbinae). The term “pigeon” basically is employed when referring to the use of these birds for sacrificial offerings. In Leviticus pigeons serve as burnt offerings and as sin offerings (Lev. 1:14; 5:7,11). They also play a role in the rituals for purification following childbirth (Lev. 12:6,8) and for the cleansing of a healed leper (Lev. 14:22,30). Along with turtledoves, pigeons are the least expensive animal offerings. Mary offered a pigeon and two turtledoves after Jesus' birth (Luke 2:24). See Dove.

PIHAHIROTH (Pi há hí' rōth) Hebrew placename derived from the Egyptian, “house of Hathor” and interpreted in Hebrew as “mouth of canals.” Pihahiroth lay in the eastern Nile Delta to the east of Baal-zephon. The site is unknown. The Israelites encamped at Pihahiroth in the early days of the exodus (Exod. 14:2,9; Num. 33:7). The alternate form Hahiroth appears at Num. 33:8.

PILATE, PONTIUS (Pi' lát, Pōn' shūs) Roman governor of Judea remembered in history as a notorious anti-Semite and in Christian creeds as the magistrate under whom Jesus Christ “suffered” (1 Tim 6:13). The NT refers to him as “governor,” while other sources call him “procurator” or “prefect” (an inscription found in Caesarea in 1961). Pilate came to power about A.D. 26, close to the time when two of his contemporaries, Sejanus in Rome and Flaccus in Egypt, were pursuing policies apparently aimed at the destruction of the Jewish people. Pilate's policies were much the same. His procuratorship consisted of one provocation of Jewish sensibilities after another. He broke all precedent by bringing into Jerusalem military insignia bearing the image of Caesar in flagrant defiance of Jewish law. He removed them only when the Jews offered to die at the hands of his soldiers rather than consent to such blasphemy. He brutally suppressed protest by planting armed soldiers, disguised as civilians, among the Jewish crowds. Against such a backdrop it is not hard to understand the reference in Luke 13:1 to "the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mixed with their sacrifices" (HCSB). Pilate was finally removed from office as the result of a similar outrage against Samaritan worshipers who had gathered on Mount Gerizim, their holy mountain, to view some sacred vessels that they believed Moses had buried there. When the Samaritans complained to Vitellius, the governor of Syria, Pilate was ordered to Rome to account for his actions to the emperor and is not mentioned again in reliable contemporary sources.

In view of his record it is surprising that Pilate allowed himself to be pressured by a group of Jewish religious authorities into allowing Jesus to be executed. A possible explanation is that he already felt his position in the empire to be in jeopardy (note the threat implicit in John 19:12). Pilate seems to have had no personal inclination to put Jesus to death, and the NT writers are eager to show that he did not (Luke 23:4,14,22; John 18:38; 19:4,6; cp. Matt. 27:19). The Gospel writers sought to demonstrate that Jesus was innocent from the standpoint of Roman law and that consequently Christianity in their day was not a threat to the Roman political and social order. The fact that Jesus was brought to Pilate at all probably means that He had not been formally tried and convicted by the Sanhedrin, or Jewish ruling Council (if he had, he would probably have been stoned to death like Stephen, or like James the Just in A.D. 62). Instead a relatively small group of Jerusalem priests, including the high priest, wanted to forestall any kind of a messianic movement by the people because of the repression it would provoke from the Romans (John 11:47-50,53). They maneuvered Pilate into doing their work for them (cp. Luke 23:2). Pilate is represented in all the Gospels as questioning Jesus, especially on the subject of kingship, but he remained unconvinced that Jesus was in any way a serious claimant to Jewish or Roman political power. PILDASH (Pīl' dāsh) Personal and clan name, perhaps meaning “powerful.” Sixth son of Nahor (Gen. 22:22), probably the ancestor of an otherwise unknown north Arabian tribe.

PILEHA (Pī' lə hā) (KJV) See Pilha.

PILFER To steal secretly, usually little by little (John 12:6 NASB, REB; Titus 2:10 NASB, REB, NRSV).

PILGRIMAGE A journey, especially a religious trek to a site at which God has revealed Himself in the past. KJV used “pilgrimage” in the nontechnical sense of journeys (Exod. 6:4). KJV, NASB, RSV used pilgrimage in a figurative sense for life journey (Gen. 47:9 KJV; Ps. 119:54). The only explicit mention of religious pilgrimage occurs in the NIV of Ps. 84:5 (cp. REB).

In Israel's early history numerous local shrines were the goals of religious pilgrimage: Bethel (Gen. 28:10-22; 31:13; 35:9-15; Amos 4:4; 5:5); Gilgal (Josh. 4:19-24; Hos. 4:15; Amos 4:4; 5:5); Shiloh (Judg. 20:26-27; 1 Sam. 1:3,19); Beersheba (Amos 5:5; 8:14); Gibeon (1 Kings 3:3-5); even Horeb (1 Kings 19:8). Jerusalem was not the goal of religious pilgrims until David relocated the ark there (2 Sam. 6:12-19). Hezekiah's and Josiah's reforms attempted to destroy the pagan sites of pilgrimage and idol worship (2 Kings 18:4; 23:8) and make Jerusalem the exclusive focus of pilgrimage. Mosaic law required adult male Israelites to appear before the Lord (where the ark of the covenant rested) three times a year (Exod. 23:14-17; 34:18-23; Deut. 16:16). Crowds of pilgrims (Pss. 42:4; 55:14; Luke 2:44) sang on the way to Jerusalem (Isa. 30:29). The Psalms of Ascent (Pss. 24; 84; 118; 120-134) were likely sung as pilgrims climbed the ascent to the temple mount in Jerusalem. The prophets condemned the celebration of religious pilgrimages and feasts when not accompanied by genuine devotion to the Lord expressed in righteous lives (Isa. 1:12-13; Amos 4:4-5; 5:5-6,21-24).

The NT witnessed the continuing popularity of pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Matt. 21:8-11; Luke 2:41; John 2:13; 5:1; 7:2,10; 12:12,20; Acts 2:5-10; 20:16).

PILHA (Pīl' hā) Personal name meaning "millstone." Lay leader witnessing Ezra's covenant renewal (Neh. 10:24).

PILLAR Stone monuments (Hb. matstsevah) or standing architectural structures (Hb. amudim). 1. Stones set up as memorials to persons. Jacob set up a pillar on Rachel's grave as a memorial to her (Gen. 35:20). Because Absalom had no son to carry on his name, he set up a pillar and carved his name in it (2 Sam. 18:18). 2. Shrines both to the Lord and to false gods. Graven images often were pillars set up as gods. God commanded Israel to break down such "images" (Hb. matstsebot, Exod. 23:24). The Canaanites erected pillars at their places of worship and probably influenced Israelite practice. Archaeologists found pillars at Gezer. Jacob set up a pillar following his dream (Gen. 28:18) and again when God spoke to him at Bethel (35:9-15) as memorials of God's revelation. Moses set up 12 pillars to commemorate the giving of the law to the tribes of Israel (Exod. 24:4). 3. As structural supports pillars were used extensively. The tabernacle used pillars for the veil (Exod. 26:31-32), the courts (27:9-15), and the gate (27:16). The temple in Jerusalem used pillars for its support (1 Kings 7:2-3), and the porch had pillars (7:6). Figuratively, pillars were believed to hold up heaven (Job 26:11) and earth (1 Sam. 2:8). 4. God led Israel through the wilderness with a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night (Exod. 13:21; cp. 14:19-20). These pillars were symbols of God's presence with Israel as much as signs of where they were to go. 5. Solomon's temple had two freestanding brass pillars (1 Kings 7:15). PILLAR OF FIRE AND CLOUD Visible evidence of God's presence with Israel during the exodus and wilderness wanderings (Exod. 14:24; 33:9-10; Num. 12:5; Deut. 31:15). As a sign of God's presence, the pillar of fire and cloud was associated with divine actions: salvation (Exod. 14:19-20); revelation (Exod. 33:9-10; Ps. 99:7); judgment (Num. 12:5); commissioning (Deut. 31:15). Nehemiah used the pillar as a sign of God's faithfulness (Neh. 9:12,19). Psalm 99:7 reflects an otherwise unknown tradition that the pillar abided with Israel until the time of Samuel. Jesus' self-presentation as the incarnate Light of the World (John 8:12) recalls the guiding light of the wilderness wanderings. In Jesus' day the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles (John 7:2) included the lighting of great, golden lamps in the temple court as a reminder of the pillar of fire and cloud. Jesus as the living Light challenged persons to follow Him as Israel had followed God's earlier light.

PILLOW A support for the head. KJV and REB described the rock on which Jacob rested his head as a pillow (Gen. 28:11,18). The Hebrew term translated "pillow" at 1 Sam. 19:13,16 (KJV, RSV, TEV) is of uncertain meaning. Possible translations include "quilt" (NASB), "net" (NRSV), and "rug" (REB). KJV followed the earliest Greek translation in reading "pillows" at Ezek. 13:18,20. Modern translations render the underlying Hebrew as "magic bands" (NASB, REB, NRSV), "charms" (NIV), or "wristbands" (TEV). Jesus demonstrated His absolute trust in God by sleeping through a storm with his head on a pillow (Mark 4:38 KJV, TEV) or cushion (HCSB, NASB, NIV, REB, NRSV). See Magic Bands.

PILOT Helmsman. Ancient pilots steered by positioning a side rudder which was an oversized oar pivoted in a slanting position near the vessel's stern (James 3:4; KJV “governor”). Most translations used “pilot” in Ezek. 27:8,27-29 in parallel to terms translated “mariners,” “rowers,” or “sailors.” The NIV rendered the underlying Hebrew as “seaman.” See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

PILTAI (פִּילְטָי) Short form of personal name meaning “(Yah is) my deliverance.” Head of a family of post-exilic priests (Neh. 12:17).

PINE TREE See Plants.

PINNACLE Highest point of a structure. NRSV referred to the pinnacles of the temple or the city of Jerusalem (Isa. 54:12). The underlying Hebrew suggests a structure catching the sun's rays. Other translations include battlements (NASB, NIV, REB), towers (TEV), and windows (KJV). The pinnacle (literally “little wing”) of the temple (Matt. 4:5; Luke 4:9) is not mentioned in the OT, intertestamental literature, or rabbinic sources. Possible identifications include the southeastern corner of the royal colonnade that overlooked the Kidron Valley and a lintel or balcony above one of the temple gates. The account of the martyrdom of James the Lord's brother by Hegesippus relates that James was thrown from the pinnacle of the temple and then stoned and clubbed. This (likely conflated) account suggests a high structure overlooking the temple court. See Temple.

PIRAM (Pi' rām) Personal name, perhaps meaning “wild ass.” King of Jarmuth southwest of Jerusalem and member of a coalition of five Amorite kings who battled Joshua unsuccessfully (Josh. 10:3,23).

PIRATHON, PIRATHONITE (Pī rā' thōn, Pī rā' thōn īt) Place-name meaning “princely” or “height, summit” and its inhabitants. The town in the hill country of Ephraim was the home of the judge Abdon (Judg. 12:13,15) and of Benaiah, one of David's elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:30; 1 Chron. 11:31). The site is identified with Far'ata about five miles southwest of Shechem.

PISGAH (Pis' gah) Place-name, perhaps meaning “the divided one.” Mountain in the Abarim range across the Jordan River from Jericho. Some Bible scholars believe it was part of Mount Nebo; others think it could have been a separate rise, either en-Neba or near modern Khirbet Tsijaga. God allowed Moses to view the promised land from the heights of Pisgah (Deut. 34:1) but would not let him cross into Canaan. Israel had camped near Pisgah (Num. 21:20). Balak took Balaam to its height so the prophet could see Israel and curse them (Num. 23:14). It was a limit of Sihon's kingdom (Josh. 12:23; Ashdoth-pisgah in KJV) and also for the tribe of Reuben (13:20).

PISHON (Pi' shōn) Name meaning “freeflowing,” designating one of the rivers of Eden (Gen. 2:11). The identity of the river is unknown. Some suggest the “river” was a canal connecting the Tigris and Euphrates or another body of water, such as the Persian Gulf.

The snow-capped mountains of the ancient Roman province of Pisidia in Asia Minor (modern Turkey).

PISIDIA (Pī sīd' ī ā) Small area in the province of Galatia in southern Asia Minor bounded by Pamphylia, Phrygia, and Lyconia. The territory lay within the Taurus Mountain range and therefore resisted invasion by ancient peoples. Only in 25 B.C. did the Romans gain control over the region through economic diplomacy. Antioch was made the capital, although some historians contend that the city was not actually in Pisidia. Paul and Barnabas came through Antioch (Acts 13:14) after John Mark left them in Perga (v. 13). The NT does not record any missionary activity in Pisidia itself, probably because there were few Jews there with which to start a congregation. See Asia Minor, Cities of. PISPA, PISPAH (Pis' pá.) Personal name of unknown meaning. Member of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:38).

PISTACHIO NUTS See Plants.

PIT Translation of 12 Hebrew and two Greek words in KJV for water reservoir, ditch, or place of destruction. The most common use of “pit” is to refer to a well or cistern (Gen. 37:20-29; Exod. 21:33-34; Pss. 7:15; 55:23; Prov 26:27; 28:10). See Cistern; Well.

Sometimes “pit” refers to a ditch or a marsh (Jer. 14:3; Isa. 30:14). Many times the word was used as a synonym for a place of destruction (Ps. 55:23), corruption (Pss. 16:10; 49:9; Isa. 38:17), or death (Isa. 14:15; Jon. 2:6). Three times KJV translated the word Sheol as “pit” (Num. 16:30,33; Job 17:16). One Greek word is translated “bottomless pit” in Rev. 9:1,2 (cp. Ps. 88:6). See Everlasting Punishment; Hell; Sheol.

Ralph L. Smith

PITCH 1. Dark-colored, viscous mixture of hydrocarbons used for waterproofing sailing vessels (Gen. 6:14; cp. Exod. 2:3). Mineral pitch occurs naturally and is highly flammable (Isa. 34:9). 2. KJV used “pitch” as a verb meaning “to coat or cover with pitch” (Gen. 6:14).

PITCHER Vessel with a handle and either a molded lip or a spout. Clay pitchers served as symbols of mortality (Eccles. 12:6) and of the commonplace (Lam. 4:2). For literal uses, See Pottery.

PITFALL Trap or snare, especially a roughly camouflaged pit. RSV used “pitfall” four times (Job 18:8; Ps. 119:85; Lam. 3:47; Rom. 11:9; the latter changed by NRSV to “stumbling block”). All uses are figurative. “Pitfall” in the OT suggests hidden or unrecognized dangers.

PITHOM AND RAMESES (Pi' thôm, Rám' ə sēz) Egyptian cities located in northern Egypt (Nile Delta) in or near the Wadi Tumilat. They were built by the Israelites while in Egypt (Exod. 1:11) as supply hubs for royal, military, and religious purposes and were located near palaces, fortresses, and temples. Pithom (Temple of Atum) has been identified with Tell er-Retaba, Tell el-Maskhutah, or Heliopolis, and Rameses has been identified with Qantir. However, neither of the first two sites for Pithom has produced evidence from the 15th century B.C. and evidence for its identification with Heliopolis is lacking.

Rameses (Qantir) was first mentioned in Gen. 47:11 (as a synonym for Goshen) as the region where Joseph settled his father Jacob and his brothers. It was later the starting point for the Israelites' exodus from Egypt (Exod. 12:37; Num. 33:3,5). Rameses was the site of the Hyksos capital called Avaris (1638-1530 B.C.) before they were driven out by the Theban pharaoh Ahmose I (1540-1515 B.C.), the first pharaoh of the Eighteenth Dynasty, who established a fortress and settlement on the site. Ahmose I's successors, down to Thutmose III, built and used a large royal compound just south of this site, which was in use until the reign of Amenhotep II. However, Pharaoh Raamses II (pharaoh for the late-date exodus) also built near this site. See Egypt; Exodus.

PITHON (Pi' thōn) Personal name of unknown meaning. Descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:35; 9:41).

PITY Sympathetic sorrow toward one facing suffering or distress. Pity was expected of friends (Job 19:21), kin (Amos 1:11), and God (Ps. 90:13). Enemies lacked pity (Pss. 17:10; 69:20; Isa. 13:18; Jer. 21:7). Those guilty of idolatry, murder, or false witness were to be denied pity (Deut. 7:16; 13:8; 19:13). The images of the father and shepherd illustrate God's pity (Ps. 103:13; Isa. 49:10). God pities the penitent (Judg. 2:18), the weak and needy (Ps. 72:13), Jerusalem in ruins (Ps. 102:13), those who fear God (Ps. 103:13), and the exiles (Isa. 49:10). In judgment God withholds pity from God's people (Jer. 13:14; 20:16; Lam. 2:17; 3:43; Ezek. 5:11). Ezekiel pictured Jerusalem as an unpitied child denied the most basic postnatal care (Ezek. 16:5). Hosea illustrated the fate of Israel with Lo-ruchamah, a child's name meaning "not pitied" (1:6; 2:23).

Pleas for pity are a common feature of healing narratives (Mark 9:22; Luke 17:13). Pity moved Jesus to heal (Matt. 20:34). Jesus used a compassionate Samaritan as an unexpected example of active pity (Luke 10:33). Such active concern for those in need serves as evidence that one is a child of God (1 John 3:17).

PLACE OF THEM THAT BOIL See Kitchen.

PLAGUES Disease interpreted as divine judgment, translation of several Hebrew words. The 10 plagues in the book of Exodus were the mighty works of God that gained Israel's release and demonstrated God's sovereignty and were called "plagues" (Exod. 9:14; 11:1), "signs" (Exod. 7:3), and "wonders" (Exod. 7:3; 11:9). They showed the God of Moses was sovereign over the gods of Egypt, including Pharaoh who was considered a god by the Egyptians.

The primary reference to the plagues in the Bible is in Exod. 7:1-13:15 (cp. Deut. 4:34; 7:19; 11:3; Jer. 32:20). Two psalms (78; 105) contain detailed accounts of the plagues but neither includes all 10. Paul used the plagues to stress the sovereignty of God in the hardening of Pharaoh's heart (Rom. 9:17-18). The plagues of the book of Revelation reflect OT influence (Rev. 8; 16).

Natural or Supernatural Modern distinctions between the natural and the supernatural were not allowable considerations for the Israelites. For them, whatever happened, God did it. Everything was under God's immediate control. For the inspired writer the plagues were nothing more or less than the Lord's judgment upon the Egyptians and His saving actions for Israel. Most interpreters point out that the plagues depict events of nature that might occur in Egypt. Clearly the author of Exodus saw them as the product of a purposive, divine will. Since Egypt's magicians duplicated the first two events, the uniqueness of the plagues may rest in their timing, locale, intensity, and theological interpretation.

Purpose The plagues resulted in Israel's freedom. However, the central purpose was the revelation of God. Pharaoh and the Egyptians, as well as Moses and the Israelites, would come to know the Lord through the events of the plagues (Exod. 7:17; 8:10,22; 9:14,16,29). Paul acknowledged this purpose: "that My name may be proclaimed in all the earth" (Rom. 9:17 HCSB). See Exodus, Book of; Miracles, Signs, Wonders. Billy K. Smith

PLAIN See Palestine.

PLAISTER KJV variant form of plaster (Isa. 38:21). Here plaster refers to a fig poultice (cp. NIV, REB, NASB, NRSV).

PLAIT KJV term meaning "to braid" (1 Pet. 3:3). See Hair.

PLANE TREE See Plants.

PLANKS Long, flat pieces of timber, thicker than boards, used in shipbuilding (Ezek. 27:5; Acts 27:44) and for the flooring of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 6:15 KJV). The "thick planks upon the face of the porch" in Ezekiel's vision of the renewed temple (Ezek. 41:25 KJV) likely refers to some type of canopy (NRSV; overhang, NIV; covering, TEV; cornice, REB) or to a threshold (NASB).

PLANTATION KJV term (Ezek. 17:7) to designate a bed (NASB, REB, NRSV) or plot (NIV) where plants are planted.

PLANTS On the third day of creation, recorded in Genesis, God spoke to the land to produce vegetation: the seed-bearing plants and trees (Gen. 1:11-12; cp. 2:4-6). In Gen. 1:29-30 He gave the plants and trees to man and to the creatures He had created, every plant for food. Genesis 2:9 tells that the trees were “pleasing to the eye and good for food.” Trees, vines, shrubs, herbs, and even grasses are referenced throughout OT and NT. Adam and Eve “sewed fig leaves together” for their first clothing (Gen. 3:7). After the fall God cursed the ground that man would have to contend with unwanted plants that corrupted the fields he had to tend (Gen. 3:17-18).

Some of the plant life included in Scripture is not easily translated into familiar names; therefore categories of plants have been devised. Similarities in appearance and use have been noted. See Flowers.

Lily and Rose Red lips of Song 5:13 indicate a red-flowered “lily,” such as scarlet tulip or anemone. Other references, such as Song 2:1-2, may refer to the actual white madonna lily (Lilium candidum), now very rare in the area, or wild hyacinth (Hyacinthus orientalis), wild crocus (Crocus species), the rose of Isa. 35:1-2 (see NASB). It is impossible to be sure to which “lilies” Jesus referred (Matt. 6:28; Luke 12:27). It may have been the anemone or any of the conspicuous wild flowers such as crown daisy (Chrysanthemum coronarium).

The biblical “rose” is similarly difficult to identify. The “rose of Sharon” (Song 2:1) has been equated with anemone, rockrose, narcissus, tulip, and crocus.

Reeds Certain water plants may be distinguished from the several Hebrew words used. The following species are likely to be the ones referred to:

Common reed (Phragmites communis) forms great stands in shallow water or wet salty sand. The plumed flower head may have been given to Jesus in mockery (Matt. 27:29). Pens (3 John 13) were made from the bamboolike stems.

Papyrus sedge (Cyperus papyrus) also grows in shallow water in hot places such as in Lake Huleh and along the Nile, but it is now extinct in Egypt except in cultivation. Its tall, triangular, spongy stems were used for rafts (Isa. 18:1-2) and for making baskets (Exod. 2:3) and papyrus paper on which much of the Bible may have been written.

Cattail or reed mace (Typha domingensis) is often associated with the above-mentioned reeds, and it seems to have been the one among which Moses was hidden (Exod. 2:3). This is often referred to as bulrush, but the tree bulrush (Scirpus lacustris) is a sedge with slender stems, which also occurs in lakes and pools.

Thorns Jesus' crown of thorns has led to two shrubs known as Christ's-thorn (Ziziphus spina-christ, Paliurus spina-christi). The former grows near the Dead Sea not far from Jerusalem (Matt. 27:29; Mark 15:17; John 19:5), while the latter does not grow nearer than Syria. However it may have occurred on the Judean hills in biblical times. Some authors consider the common spiny burnet (Poterium or Sarcopoterium spinosum) to be the species concerned.

Even today nobody can walk far in the Holy Land without seeing prickly weeds. The ground is cursed with them (Gen. 3:18; Num. 33:55). Many different Hebrew words have been used to distinguish them, and some are identifiable. Thorns are usually woody plants, such as Acacia, Lycium, Ononis, Prosopis, Rubus, Sarcopoterium, while thistles are herbaceous, such as Centaurea, Notobasis, Silybum. The latter could have been the "thorns" that suffocated the grain in Jesus' parable (Matt. 13:7).

Fragrant Plants In biblical times strong-smelling plants included the following kinds:

Cassia and cinnamon are traditionally identified with the Far Eastern trees Cinnamomum cassia and C. zeylanicum. The ground bark was used in the holy anointing oil for priests (Exod. 30:24), and cinnamon was used for perfumery (Prov. 7:17; Rev. 18:13).

Calamus or sweet cane (Acorus calamus) was the dry rhizome of this water plant imported from temperate Asia used for perfume (Isa. 43:24 NRSV).

Galbanum, a very strong-smelling resin burnt as incense (Exod. 30:34), was obtained from the stem of Ferula galbaniflua, a relative of parsley growing on dry hills in Iran.

Henna (Lawsonia inermis) leaves were crushed and used both as a perfume (Song 1:14 NASB) and as a yellow dye for skin, nails, and hair. It is a subtropical shrub with white flowers.

Hyssop used for ritual cleansing (Lev. 14:4,49) and sprinkling of blood in the tabernacle (Exod. 12:22) was the white marjoram (Origanum syriacum or Majorana syriacu) which grows commonly in rocky places and is related to the mint. See Hyssop.

Myrtle (Myrtus communis) is a shrub with fragrant leaves and white flowers frequent in bushy places. It was especially favored for temporary shelters in the fields at the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:40; Neh. 8:15).

Rue (Ruta chalepensis) grows on the hills of the Holy Land as a low straggling shrub with pungent smelling leaves. Jesus referred to it being tithed (Luke 11:42).

Spikenard or nard, an expensive per fumed oil (Song 4:13-14; John 12:3), obtained either from the leaves of a desert grass (Cymhybopogon schoenanthus) or, traditionally, the valerian relative Nardostachys jatamansi from the Himalayas.

Stacte, one of the spices referred to in Exod. 30:34 to be used in the incense, may be the resin of the balm of Gilead (Commiphora gileadensis) from southern Arabia.

Culinary Herbs Bitter herbs for Passover are certain wild plants with sharp-tasting leaves. The desert plant wormwood (Artemisia) was also bitter and depicted sorrow and suffering (Prov. 5:4; Lam. 3:15,19).

Coriander (Coriandrum sativum) provides both salad leaves and spicy seeds (Exod. 16:31) which were likened by the Israelites to the manna in the desert (Num. 11:7).

Cummin (Cuminum cyminum) and dill (Anethum graveolens), like coriander, are members of the parsley family with spicy seeds (Isa. 28:25-27; Matt. 23:23).

Fitches or black cummin (Nigella sativa) is an annual plant with black oily seeds easily damaged in harvesting (Isa. 28:25-27).

Mint (Mentha longifolia), a popular seasoning herb, was tithed by Jewish leaders (Luke 11:42).

Mustard (Brassica nigra), well-known for its hot-flavored seeds, is referred to by Jesus for having small seeds which grow into a tree (Matt. 13:31-32).

Saffron (Crocus sativus), a yellow powder prepared from the stigmas, is used as a subtle flavor (Song 4:14) and also as a food coloring and a medicine.

Frankincense and Myrrh are resins produced by certain trees that grow in dry country in southern Arabia and northern Africa.

This large thistle plant is one of many varieties that grow in Israel.

Frankincense is a white or colorless resin yielded by several species of Boswellia, chiefly B. sacra, which is a shrub or small tree growing on both sides of the Red Sea. The resin is obtained by cutting the branches and collecting the exuding “tears” that are burnt as incense in religious rites or as a personal fumigant. In the Bible frankincense was prescribed for holy incense mixture (Exod. 30:31,34; Luke 1:9). It was also brought by the wise men to the infant Jesus, together with gold and myrrh (Matt. 2:11).

Myrrh is a reddish-colored resin obtained from a spiny shrub, Commiphora myrrha, in a similar manner to frankincense. This resin was not usually burnt but dissolved in oil and either eaten or used as a medicine and cosmetically (Ps. 45:8; Matt. 2:11).

Medicinal Plants Many medicinal herbs were gathered from the hills and valleys where the wild plants grew. Local people were well versed in plant lore, but these common weeds are not specially mentioned in the Bible. Some special imported medicines are referred to. See Frankincense and Myrrh above.

Aloes of the NT (Aloe vera) were succulent plants with long swordlike leaves with serrations and erect flower heads up to three feet high imported from Yemen. The bitter pith was used as a medicine and for embalming (John 19:39). In the OT, aloes refers to an expensive fragrant timber obtained from a tropical Indian eaglewood tree (Aquilaria agallocha).

Balm (Gen. 37:25) is a general term for medicinal ointment prepared from resin-bearing plants such as the rockrose (Cistus laurifolius) which produces ladanum. The balm of Gilead or opobalsam is yielded by Commiphora gileadensis, a nonspiny shrub of dry country in Southern Arabia and said to have been cultivated by Solomon at En-Gedi near the Dead Sea (Song 5:1, “spice”). Gum was imported with balm by the Ishmaelites (Gen. 37:25). It is extruded from cut roots of a spiny undershrub (Astragalus tragacanth) grown on dry Iranian hillsides.

Some plants, such as the gourd Citrullus colocynthis, could be medicinal purges in very small quantities but bitter poisons otherwise (2 Kings 4:39-40).

Cereal Grains for Bread Well-to-do citizens made bread primarily from wheat, but the poor man had to make do with coarse barley (2 Kings 4:42; John 6:9). No other cereals were grown, these being the OT “corn.” About NT times, however, sorghum was introduced. Rice came later still, and maize, not until America was opened up.

Wheat (emmer wheat Triticum dicoccum; bread wheat T. aestivum) is an annual crop that grows about three feet, though the primitive varieties were taller in rich soil, and with bearded ears.

Grains of wheat are hard and dry and easily kept in storehouses as Joseph did in Egypt before the time of famine (Gen. 41:49; KJV “corn”). It was important to retain seed for sowing (Gen. 47:24), but ancient tomb grain will not germinate. See Bread.

Barley (Hordeum vulgare) tolerates poorer soil than wheat, is shorter, has bearded ears, and ripens sooner (Exod. 9:31-32). It was also used for brewing beer and as horse and cattle fodder (1 Kings 4:28). Sometimes barley was eaten roasted as parched grain (Ruth 2:14).

Wheat and barley straw remaining after threshing was used for fuel (Isa. 47:14), and the fine chaff for instant heat in the oven.

Fruits Olive trees (Olea europaea) are small rounded orchard trees with narrow gray-green leaves and small cream-colored flowers in May. The stone fruits ripen toward the end of summer and are pickled in brine either unripe as green olives or ripe as black olives. However, the bulk of the crop was gathered for the sake of the olive oil. See Oil.

Grape vines (Vitis vinifera), grown either in vineyards or singly as shady bowers around houses and courtyards, have long flexible stems with tendrils and lobed leaves. Short flower heads grow among the new leaves in early summer, and the numerous tiny flowers develop into a cluster of round sweet grapes that ripen either as green or black fruits. The fruits are eaten fresh as grapes, or dried and stored as raisins (1 Sam. 30:12). Wine was prepared from the fermented juice. See Wine.

The common fig tree (Ficus carica) has a short stout trunk and thick branches and twigs bearing coarsely lobed rough leaves (Gen. 3:7). Rounded fruits ripen during the summer. These sweet fig fruits have numerous small seeds in their interior cavity. Fresh figs were favored as first fruits (Isa. 28:4; Jer. 24:2). Figs dry very well and were stored as cakes for future use (1 Sam. 25:18; 30:12). Jesus referred to figs and fig trees several times (Matt. 7:16; Luke 21:29-31).

Another kind of fig tree, the sycamore (Ficus sycomorus) grew in Egypt and in the warmer areas of the Holy Land. This large tree usually has low-growing branches such as would have enabled the short Zacchaeus to climb one to see Jesus passing along the streets of Jericho (Luke 19:4).

The juicy fruit of the pomegranate (Punica granatum), about the size of a tennis ball, is full of seeds and sweet pulp. It develops from beautiful scarlet flowers that cover the twiggy bush in spring. Pomegranate bushes were often grown in gardens and beside houses (Deut. 8:8; Song 6:11). Moses was instructed to embroider pomegranate fruits on the hem of the priests' robes (Exod. 28:33), and their form ornamented the columns of Solomon's temple in Jerusalem (1 Kings 7:18; 2 Chron. 3:16).

Only one palm, the date palm (Phoenix dactylifera), yielded fruit in biblical times. This very tall tree with a rough unbranched trunk bearing a terminal tuft of huge feather leaves, fruits best in hot conditions of the Dead Sea oases. Hence, Jericho was known as the city of palm trees (Judg. 1:16). The wandering Israelites reached Elim where there were 70 palm trees (Exod. 15:27). The psalmist considered it to be such a fine tree that he compared the righteous flourishing to one (Ps. 92:12). Revelation 7:9 refers to the symbolic use of palm leaves (as “branches”) denoting victory, as when Jesus entered Jerusalem and the people strewed the way with leaves (John 12:13).

It is doubtful whether the black mulberry (Morus niger) was present in the Holy Land until NT times as it originated in the Caspian Sea region. The only probable reference to it (as “sycamine”) is when Jesus spoke of believers having enough faith to destroy one (Luke 17:6)—perhaps because old trees are stout, gnarled, and long-lived.

Another questionable fruit is that referred to as “apple” (Prov. 25:11; Song 2:3,5; 7:8; 8:5; Joel 1:12), although some versions translate the word as “apricot.” Either could be possible, but it is unlikely that fine varieties of apples were available so early.

Nuts Popularly considered to be hard dry fruits and seeds, as distinct from the more succulent fruits described above.

The most important biblical nut was the almond (Prunus dulcis), which is a small tree with delightful whitish flowers in early spring before the leaves have sprouted. The nuts are well-known today either fresh or as marzipan; the kernel is contained in a very hard thick casing. Almonds were carried to Egypt by Joseph's brothers (Gen. 43:11). Aaron's walking stick budded and produced almonds overnight and proved that Aaron was God's man to assist Moses (Num. 17:8). The holy lampstand had cups like almond flowers (Exod. 25:33; 37:19).

The walnut tree (Juglans regia) originated in the Caspian region and may not have been commonly planted in the Eastern Mediterranean region until after the biblical period. However, it is possible that Solomon grew it in his garden (Song 6:11). The tree grows to a considerable size. The leaves are compound, and the oily edible nuts look like a miniature brain—hence the ancient name Jovis glans and the scientific adaptation Juglans.

True pistachio nuts [Pistacia vera] also arrived late. The pistachio nuts referred to in the Bible (Gen. 43:11 NIV) would be from the native terebinth trees (Pistachia terebinthus, P. atlantica) of the hillsides. One is a small shrubby tree, while the other is as large as an oak. Both yield small round edible fruits.

Vegetables The wandering Israelites longed for vegetables in the desert after they had left Egypt (Num. 11:5). Onions, leeks, and garlic are mentioned, as well as cucumbers and melons. Elsewhere, we read of lentils and other pulses (2 Sam. 17:28; Dan. 1:12).

Onions (Allium cepa) are the bulbs familiar to us today. They are white or purple and grow quickly from seeds in one season. Leeks (Allium porrum) do not form such a distinct bulb. They are cooked, or the leaves were chopped up. Garlic (Allium sativum) is a strongly flavored onion that produces a bulb composed of separate scales.

The cucumbers of biblical Egypt were most likely the snake- or muskmelon Cucumis melo, which has longitudinal lines on its exterior. The melons were the watermelon (Citrullus lanatus) and not the squash or honeydew melon which are of American origin and now widely grown in the Middle East.

Several beans or pulses were grown in biblical times, especially lentils (Lens culinaris) in the more arid areas. The red pottage or soup made of lentils enabled Jacob to obtain Esau's birthright (Gen. 25:29-34). Lentil plants are small and slender with pealike flowers and small flat pods containing two seeds. Of the other pulses the broad bean (Vicia faba) and the chickpea (Cicer arietinum) were important and may have been the vegetables Daniel and his friends ate in Babylon (Dan. 1:12).

Trees From Genesis to Revelation trees have a special place, both factually and symbolically. We can divide them into groups according to their natural habitats.

Trees of dry and desert areas Rainfall is erratic, and trees may be restricted to dry watercourses where residual water remains.

Several species of acacia (KJV shittim, using the Hb. word) occur in Sinai. Their timber was used for the construction of the tabernacle, the tent of meeting (Exod. 25). Acacias are usually flat-topped trees that possess strong thorns.

Tamarisk (Tamarix species) is a shrub or small tree with fine branchlets, scale leaves, and pink or white flowers, inhabiting salty places in the desert. Abraham planted one at Beersheba (Gen. 21:33 NIV).

Trees of streams, rivers and lakes Water is usually available throughout the year in these habitats.

Oleander (Nerium oleander) is an erect shrub with long, narrow poisonous evergreen leaves and beautiful pink flowers in summer. Although it may be found in streambeds in dry country, it is also in the marshes and streams such as those of Mount Carmel. It may be the “roses” at Jericho and the “roses” planted by the brook (Ecclesiasticus 24:14; 39:13). Even some of the references to willow trees may mean oleanders.

Plane (Platanus orientalis) is a large tree with flaking bark and digitate leaves. Its minute flowers are clustered in several hanging balls. The plane tree inhabits rocky streambeds. It was one of the rods Jacob peeled (Gen. 30:37; also Ezek.31:8, KJV, “chestnut”).

Poplar (Populus euphratica) is another of the trees Jacob peeled (Gen. 30:37). It grows beside water, especially the rivers Euphrates and Jordan. It is a tall tree with shaking leaves and numerous suckering shoots around its base. The white poplar (P. alba) or the storax (Styrax officinalis) were more likely to be the trees upon the mountains (Hos. 4:13).

Willows (Salix acynophylla), like poplars, root easily in wet places, but they are not as tall and usually have long narrow leaves (Job 40:22; Isa. 44:4; Ezek. 17:5).

Trees of hills and plains In biblical times certainly before the Israelite conquest of Canaan, the hills of the Holy Land were well wooded, while Lebanon was famous for its dense forests. Agriculture, terracing, sheep and goat grazing, and the constant demand for fuel and timber has left little woodland at the present day. Only isolated trees remain in many places. Even the plains between the Mediterranean and the hills were covered with oaks until recent times.

Cypress (Cypressus sempervirens) is a dense coniferous forest tree typically with spreading branches although often seen as a tall narrow tree planted beside cemeteries. References in the Bible to coniferous trees are confusing, but the cypress is evidently intended in Isa. 40:20; 60:13, among others.

Cedar (Cedrus libani), the famous cedar of Lebanon, grew in extensive coniferous forests which are now sadly depleted. The stout flattopped trees provide excellent timber which was used for David's house (2 Sam. 5:11) and Solomon's temple (1 Kings 5:6-10), as well as the later one (Ezra 3:7).

Oak (Quercus species) trees provide excellent timber for ships (Ezek. 27:6) and other construction, although the evergreen kermes oak often grows no more than a shrub. The deciduous oak still forms woodland on some hills of Palestine, such as Carmel, Naphtali, and Bashan (Isa. 2:13). Oaks were used to mark graves (Gen. 35:8) or as landmarks (1 Sam. 10:3) or for sacrilegious ceremonies (Hos. 4:13).

Pine (Pinus halepensis), especially the Aleppo pine, is a tall coniferous tree with long needle-leaves and cones containing winged seeds. Its timber is workable and used for construction; probably the tree referred to in Isa. 44:14 (KJV, ash; NRSV, cedar).

Terebinth (Pistacia terebinthus, P. atlantica) produced fruits used as nuts, but the timber of the large oaklike P. atlantica is also useful. The shade of terebinths was used for pagan sacrifices and offerings (Hos. 4:13 NIV).

Foreign trees Expeditions brought back rare timbers during the OT period, and, in NT times, foreign timbers entered through normal trade routes.

Almug wood, traditionally identified as sandal wood (Pterocarpus santalinus), was imported from Ophir to Judah by Hiram's fleet for Solomon (1 Kings 10:10-11). Whether almu and almug are synonymous is a matter of dispute, since almu is clearly stated to be from Lebanon (2 Chron. 2:8), in which case it could have been the Cilician fir (Abies cilicia) or the Grecian juniper (Juniperus excelsa).

Ezekiel 27:15 links ebony with imported ivory tusks. The black-red ebony of ancient Egypt was an African leguminous tree Dalbergia melanoxylon, while later the name was transferred to the tropical Asian Diospyros ebenum that has jet-black timber.

Thyine wood is timber from the North African sandarac tree (Tetraclinis articulata), a coniferlike cypress, which was used by the Greeks and Romans for cabinetmaking. It is dark, hard, and fragrant (Rev. 18:12).

PLASTER Pastelike mixture, usually of water, lime, and sand, which hardens on drying and is used for coating walls and ceilings. Mosaic law included regulations for treating homes in which mold or rot appeared in the plaster (Lev. 14:41-48). Writing was easy on a surface of wet plaster (Deut. 27:2-4).

PLATE 1. Shallow vessel from which food is eaten or served. See Pottery.
2. Sheet of metal (Exod. 28:36; Num. 16:38).

PLATTER Large plate. The platter bearing the head of John the Baptist was likely of gold or silver (Matt. 14:8,11 and parallels). Ceramic platters were in common use (Luke 11:39 NASB). See Pottery.

PLAY See Games.

PLEDGE Something given as down payment on a debt. The OT regulated this practice. An outer garment given in pledge was to be returned before night since it was the only protection the poor had from the cold (Exod. 22:26; Deut. 24:12-13). One was not permitted to take as a pledge what was required for someone to earn a living (Deut. 24:6). Creditors were prohibited from entering a house to seize a pledge (Deut. 24:10). Job denounced abuses in the taking of pledges from family (22:6), from orphans and widows (24:3), as well as the practice of taking children as pledges (24:9). Ezekiel warned repeatedly against failing to restore pledges. Amos rebuked those who coupled idolatry with holding garments in pledge (2:8).

PLEIADES (Ple' ə dēz) Brilliant grouping of six or seven visible stars located in the shoulder of the constellation Taurus (Job 9:9; 38:31 ; Amos 5:8). The derivation of the name has been traced to the seven daughters of Atlas and Pleione in Greek mythology, the adjective pleos, suggesting the “fullness” of the cluster, or to the verb pleo (to sail) from the cluster's usefulness in navigation.

PLOW To break up the ground to prepare it for sowing seed. Biblical writers often appealed to the image of a farmer plowing. Plowing served as an image of sin (Prov 21:4; Hos. 10:13) and of repentance (Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:11). Plowing served as a picture of oppression (Ps. 129:3) and destruction (Jer. 26:18; Mic. 3:12) but also of expectation of reward (1 Cor. 9:10). To plow with another's heifer meant to commit adultery with his wife (Judg. 14:18). To have one's hands on the plow and look back was to have reservations about discipleship (Luke 9:62). For literal uses of plow, See Agriculture.

PLUMB LINE Cord with a weight (usually metal or stone) attached to one end. The plumb line would be dangled beside a wall during its construction to assure vertical accuracy. Prophets spoke of the measurement God would use on the nation (Isa. 28:17; Amos 7:7-8). Israel had been built straight, but, because it was out of line, it would be destroyed.

POCHERETH-HAZZEBAIM (Pók' ə rəth-ház zə bā' im) Personal name signifying an official office, “binder (or hunter) of Gazelles.” Head of a family of Solomon's servants included in those returning from exile (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59). KJV takes “Zebaim” as a place-name.

PODS Dry coverings split in the shelling of beans and similar plants. The pods of Luke 15:16 (NASB, NIV, REB, NRSV; husks, KJV; bean pods, TEV) were likely the pods of the carob tree which served as a common feed for livestock. These sweet-tasting pods may reach one foot in length.

POET One who composes poetry or verse. In ancient times poets passed on the history and wisdom of their cultures. In witnessing to a sophisticated Greek audience at Athens, Paul appealed to poets familiar to his bearers. The line “For in Him we live and move and exist” (Acts 17:28 HCSB) is sometimes attributed to Epimenides of Crete (around 500 B.C.). The line “For we are also His offspring” is traced to the Phaenomena of Arastus (around 310 B.C.) or to Cleanthes' Hymn to Zeus.

POETRY “Poetry” calls to mind a Western pattern of balanced lines, regular stress, and rhyme. Hebrew manuscripts do not distinguish poetry from prose in such a clear-cut way. Hebrew poetry has three primary characteristics—parallelism, meter, and the grouping of lines into larger units called stanzas. Parallelism appears as two or three short lines connected in different ways. Meter may be reckoned in various ways. The most straightforward is a word count of the individual parallel lines. Stanzas may be recognized by a change of theme or the presence of a refrain. The distinction in Hebrew between poetry and prose is not so much a difference in kind as a difference in degree. Each of the three elements mentioned may be found to a lesser extent in prose.

One third of the OT is cast in poetry. Every OT book except Nehemiah, Esther, Haggai, and Malachi contains at least some poetry, though in some cases it is confined to a few verses or one or two chapters (Exod. 15:1-18,21; Lev. 10:3; Deut. 32:1-43; 33:2-29; Josh. 10:12-13; Ruth 1:16-17,20-21; 2 Kings 19:21-28; 1 Chron. 16:8-36; Ezra 3:11; Jonah 2:2-9). Some books are almost all poetry (Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Song, Isaiah, Lamentations, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah).

Parallelism The predominant feature of Hebrew poetry is parallelism. In parallelism two or three short lines stand in one of three relationships to one another: synonymous, antithetic, or synthetic.

In synonymous parallelism the succeeding line expresses an identical or nearly identical thought:

“My mouth speaks wisdom; my heart's meditation [brings] understanding.”

(Ps. 49:3 HCSB).

The lines are not synonymous in the sense that they express exactly the same meaning. To the contrary slight differences color the parallel lines expanding or narrowing the theme brought forward in the first line.

In antithetic parallelism succeeding lines express opposing thoughts:

“The wicked borrows and does not repay, but the righteous is gracious and giving.”

(Ps. 37:21 HCSB).

Line two is a positive expression of line one, but the psalmist's choice of words does more than reflect a pair of mirrored images. Each line means something more as it is linked with the other.

In synthetic parallelism succeeding lines display little or no repetition:

“How good and pleasant it is when brothers can live together!”

(Ps. 133:1 HCSB).

There is no one-to-one correspondence between the word groups. Continuity joins the parallel lines. Synthetic parallel lines may describe an order of events, list characteristics of a person or thing, or simply modify a common theme.

Meter Various methods for determining meter have been developed. Attempts to establish a classical system of meter (iambic feet, for example) have failed. Other theories use letter counts, vowel counts, stress counts, and word counts. The last mentioned is one of the most effective methods. Hebrew word units may be illustrated by the use of hyphens:

“As-a-deer longs for-streams-of-water,
so-I long for-you, God.”

(Ps. 42:1 HCSB).

This example shows a 3+4 meter. Particles and other words which play minor roles in the syntax of Hebrew are generally excluded from the count. Individual lines range from two to four words each, even though these “words” may be translated as two or three words in English. 3+2 and 2+3 meter is common. Parallel lines may also be 3+3. Groups of three parallel lines may express a 2+2+2 pattern or 3+3+3. Numerous metrical systems are possible. Consequently Hebrew meter is described in terms of general patterns rather than absolute uniformity. Systems of meter, unlike parallelism, are apparent only in the Hebrew language and not in English translations.

Stanzas Sets of parallel lines are often, but not always, divided into larger units. Such stanzas may be set off by identical lines or by parallel lines expressing similar thoughts. These introductions may take the form of a refrain not unlike a musical refrain. Sections separated in this way may be dissimilar in theme, form, and vocabulary. Psalms 42-43 present a good example of clear-cut stanzas. The two psalms together form a single poem.

A refrain is repeated three times: 42:5,11; 43:5. The refrain subdivides the poem into three sections.

Poetry provides imagery and tone for inspired writers to bring God's word home to His people. Awareness of poetic form alerts the reader to listen for the images and moods of a passage.

POISON Chemical agent causing ill health or death when in contact with or ingested by an organism. Poison served as a frequent image for wickedness, especially lying speech (Deut. 32:32-33; Job 20:16; Pss. 58:4; 140:3). Poisonous weeds illustrated lawsuits springing up from broken oaths and covenants (Hos. 10:4). In Amos 6:12 poison served as an image of injustice. Poisoned water pictured God's judgment on sin (Jer. 8:14).

POKERETH-HAZZEBAIM (Pōk' ə rēth-Hāz zə bā' im) (NIV) See Pochereth-Hazzebaim.

POLICE, POLICEMEN NASB, NRSV used police (HCSB) and policemen to refer to those Roman officials who attended the chief magistrates (Acts 16:35,38).

POLL 1. KJV term for “to cut off” or “to trim” hair (2 Sam. 14:26; Ezek. 44:20; Mic. 1:16). Priests were permitted to “poll” their hair but not to shave their heads. Polling one's hair could be understood as a sign of mourning. 2. KJV term for “the head,” especially that part on which hair grows. To count every male “by their polls” (Num. 1:2; cp. 1 Chron. 23:3,24) is to count “heads.”

POLL TAX Tax levied on a person, usually as a prerequisite for voting. NASB used poll tax sometimes when other translations read either taxes or tribute (Matt. 17:25; 22:17; Mark 12:14). Poll tax is perhaps misleading. The Roman Empire was not a democracy in which the Jewish people participated by voting. “Head tax” is the meaning the NASB translators had hoped to convey. See Poll.

POLLUTE See Clean, Cleanness.

POLLUTION Things of an inferior quality (Mal. 1:7, 12) or things fouled by sin (Ezra 6:21; Acts 15:20; Rev. 21:8). In modern parlance pollution refers to things that befoul the natural environment. As a result of the fall, the environment, which was created clean and pure, has become subject to all manner of pollution, making the land (Deut. 29:22-28; cp. Jer. 4:23), rivers and streams (Exod. 7:20-24; Prov. 25:26; Ezek. 32:2; 34:18-19; Rev. 8:9-10; 16:4), and the sea (Rev. 8:8-9; 16:3) unfit for life as God intended it. The earth and its resources belong to God (Ps. 24:1) yet have been entrusted to people (Gen. 1:28-29; 9:1-4), who have a sacred responsibility to care for the earth with the same diligence that God cares for it (Deut. 11:12). Paul H. Wright POLLUX (Pŏl' lŭx) One of the twin brothers in the constellation Gemini (Acts 28:11). See Castor and Pollux; Figurehead.

POMEGRANATE Small tree, the fruit of which has a thick shell, many seeds, and a red pulp. See Plants.

POMMELS KJV term for the bowl-shaped capitals topping the temple pillars (2 Chron. 4:12-13).

The pomegranate is one of the many fruits found in the Middle East.

POND At Exod. 7:19; 8:5, “pond” renders the Hebrew agam meaning “marsh” or “muddy pool.” The term is usually translated “pool.” The Hebrew underlying “ponds for fish” (Isa. 19:10) is rendered grieved (in soul) or sick at heart by modern translations, based on a Hebrew homonym apparently occurring only in this passage.

PONTIUS PILATE See Pilate, Pontius.

PONTUS (Pŏn' tŭs) Province just south of the Black Sea in Asia Minor. The terrain varies from fertile plains along the shore to rugged mountains farther inland. The Greeks colonized the plains shortly after 700 B.C., but the mountains remained free of their influence. Mithradates founded the kingdom of Pontus in about 302 B.C., and it remained in his dynasty until 63 B.C. when Rome took over. Christianity spread to Pontus early. First Peter was addressed to the elect there (1:1-2). Citizens of Pontus were in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:9). See Asia Minor, Cities of.

POOL Collection of water, natural or artificial. Small pools were commonly seen as a place to collect rainwater from the roof that was used for irrigation or drinking. These reservoirs were important sources of water supply in the arid climate of the Middle East.

The following are some of the principal pools mentioned in Scripture: pool of Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:20), upper and lower pools of Gihon (Isa. 7:3; 22:9), old pool (Isa. 22:11), King's pool at Jerusalem (Neh. 2:14), pool of Bethesda (John 5:2,4,7), and pool of Siloam (John 9:7,11). Solomon also made pools to water his nursery (Eccles. 2:6).

Most of the pools near the cities were carved from stone, fed by rainwater channeled into them by channels cut in the rock. Pools were natural meeting places (John 9:7). Pools are used metaphorically to illustrate God's power to transform the barren into something fruitful (Isa. 41:18), judgment (Isa. 42:15), and the beauty of a woman's eyes (Song 7:4). POOR IN SPIRIT Not those who are spiritually poor, that is, lacking in faith or love, but those who have a humble spirit and thus depend on God (Matt. 5:3). Luke's parallel speaks simply of the poor (Luke 6:20). That God has “chosen those who are poor in the eyes of the world to be rich in faith and to possess the kingdom” was regarded as a well-established fact (James 2:5 REB).

A pool in the Baths of Faustina from the Roman ruins of Miletus (in modern Turkey).

POOR, ORPHAN, WIDOW Three groups of people of the lower social classes in need of legal protection from the rich and powerful who sometimes abused them (Job 24:3-4). God's promise of care for the poor, the fatherless, and the widows was a tremendous source of hope during times of severe difficulty.

Condition and Hope of the Poor The words used to describe the poor have the underlying meaning of “humble, oppressed, needy, weak, dependent.” The contexts where these words are used suggest that the poor were those who had been wrongfully oppressed and impoverished (Job 24:14; 29:12; Ps. 10:9; Isa. 3:14); those who begged for food (Deut. 15:7-11; Job 31:16-21); or those who had no economic or social status (2 Sam. 12:1-4; Prov. 14:20; Eccles. 9:13-18). Ideally, there should be no poor people among the covenant people of God because of the blessings of God and the generosity of the people toward those in need (Deut. 15:7-11). In actuality, God's blessings did not always come to His sinful people, and the rich did not always share with the poor. To provide for the poor God allowed them to glean the remains of the fields and vineyards and harvest the corners (Lev. 19:10; 23:22). If poor people were forced into slavery, they were to be treated like hired servants (Lev. 25:39-43). The courts were to see that the poor received just, not favorable or unfavorable, treatment (Exod. 23:3,6-7).

The hope of the poor was based on their status before God. Because they were part of the people God redeemed from the slavery of Egypt, they inherited God's blessings of freedom, protection, and a portion of the land (Lev. 25:38,42,55). The psalms picture God as the refuge and deliverer of the poor (Pss. 12:5; 14:6; 70:5). In some passages the poor are identified as the righteous (Ps. 14:5-6). The prophets predicted the destruction of Judah and Israel in part because of the oppression of the poor by fellow Israelites (Amos 2:6-8; 4:1-3; 5:10-13; 8:4-6). The prophets encouraged the people to defend the poor and instructed the kings to rule with equity (Prov. 29:7,14; Isa. 1:17; Jer. 22:3). God brought judgment on Sodom (Gen. 18:16-19:29) and on Judah because the people did not care for the poor (Ezek. 16:46-50).

Jesus was particularly concerned with the poor, and He preached a message of good news to the poor (Matt. 11:5; Luke 4:18) and told parables that encouraged generosity toward the poor (Luke 14:13-24). The first Christians provided for the needs of poor widows (Acts 6:1-6), and Paul exerted great effort to collect funds for the poor in Jerusalem (Rom. 15:26). This positive attitude toward the poor was not present among all the early believers (James 2:1-6). Condition and Hope of the Orphan and Widow Among the poor, the fatherless, and the widow were the most vulnerable. The Hebrew word (yatom) often translated “orphan” (NASB, NJV, NLT, NRSV) refers more precisely to a fatherless child (the mother could still be alive; cp. Ps. 109:9). The widow, of course, was a woman whose husband had died. In both cases no mature male figure could defend against unscrupulous persons who would wish to defraud these individuals out of their inheritance. Consequently biblical (and nonbiblical) legal codes provide for the protection of the rights of the fatherless and the widow (Exod. 22:22; Deut. 10:18; 24:17-22). The prophets were particularly concerned with the injustice done to the fatherless and widow (Isa. 1:17; Jer. 5:28; Mic. 2:9; Mal. 3:5). God declared that He would be a Father to the fatherless and provide justice for the widow (Deut. 10:18; Ps. 68:5).

The NT measured true religious character by a person's care for the fatherless and the widow (James 1:27). The early Christians cared for the widows (Acts 6:1-8), but Paul limited these provisions because of abuses on the part of some (1 Tim. 5:3-16). Jesus condemned the Pharisees for devouring widows' houses (Matt. 23:14). See Ethics; Family; Fatherless; Humble; Inheritance

POPLAR See Plants.

PORATHA (Pō rā' thá) Persian personal name meaning “bounteous.” One of Haman's 10 sons (Esther 9:8).

PORCH In English “porch” designates a covered entrance to a building, usually having a separate roof. English translations vary greatly in their use of “porch” for several Hebrew and Greek terms. KJV and NASB used “porch” freely (41 and 40 times, respectively); NIV and RSV used “porch” sparingly (2 and 3 times, respectively). The vast majority of OT references concern the “porch” of the Jerusalem temple as in 1 Kings 6:3. This reflects a view of a two-room temple with an attached porch. REB and NRSV translation, “vestibule,” reflects a view of a three-room temple. The terms translated “porch” in Matt. 26:71 and Mark 14:68 can refer to a gateway or forecourt. The “porches” in John 5:2 and Acts 3:11 were likely freestanding porticoes or colonnades. See Arch.

PORCIUS FESTUS (Pōr' shūs Fēs' tūs) See Festus.

PORCUPINE Large rodent, sometimes called a hedgehog, that has stiff, sharp bristles mixed with its hair. Disagreement exists about the translation of the Hebrew word. Some feel “porcupine” is the correct translation (Isa. 14:23; 34:11 NKJV, NLT). NASB uses “hedgehog” in Isaiah and Zeph. 2:14. Others have various translations (NIV, owl; KJV, bittern; NEB, bustard).

PORPHYRY Rock composed of feldspar crystals embedded in a dark red or purple groundmass (Esther 1:6; KJV, “red marble”).

PORPOISE Any of several species of smalltoothed whales. NASB uses porpoise skins for a covering over the tabernacle (Exod. 25:5; Num. 4:6; KJV, NKJV, badger; NIV, sea cow) and “sandals of porpoise skin” in Ezek. 16:10. See Sea Cow.

PORTER KJV term for a gate or doorkeeper. Such persons served at city gates (2 Sam. 18:26; 2 Kings 7:10), temple gates (1 Chron. 9:22,24,26), the doors of private homes (Mark 13:34), and even the gate of a sheepfold (John 10:3). See Doorkeeper.

PORTICO See Arch.

PORTION Allotment, allowance, ration, share. Portion is frequently used in the literal sense of a share in food, clothing, or property as well as in a variety of figurative senses. Wisdom writings often designate one's lot in life as one's portion (Job 20:29; 27:13; Eccles. 9:9). God's chosen people are termed God's portion (Deut. 32:9; Jer. 21:10). The Levites did not receive tribal territory with the other tribes but had the Lord for their special portion (Num. 18:20). To have a portion in the Lord is to share the right of joining the community in worship of God (Josh. 22:25,27; cp. Neh. 2:20). The psalms often speak of the Lord as the portion of the faithful (Pss. 16:5; 73:26; 119:57).

POT See Pottery; Vessels and Utensils.

POTENTATE KJV term in 1 Tim. 6:15 meaning “ruler” (NIV) or “sovereign” (NASB, NRSV, REB), used as a title for God.

POTIPHAR (Pöt' ī phär) Personal name meaning “belonging to the sun.” Egyptian captain of the guard who purchased Joseph from the Midianite traders (Gen. 37:36; 39:1). He saw great potential in Joseph's abilities and appointed him as steward over his household. Potiphar's wife tried to seduce Joseph, but he refused her advances. Because of this rejection, she told her husband that Joseph tried to rape her. Potiphar had Joseph thrown in prison.

POTIPHERA or POTIPHERAH (Pō tī' phērah) Priest in the Egyptian city of On (Heliopolis) where the sun god, Re, was worshiped. Joseph married his daughter, Asenath, at the pharaoh's command (Gen. 41:45). Potipherah and Potiphar are the same in Egyptian, leading some to believe that one name was slightly changed in Hebrew to distinguish between the captain of the guard and the priest.

POTSHERD (Pōt' shērd) Fragment of a baked, clay vessel, “potsherd” (more commonly called a “sherd” by archaeologists) is used in the OT with both a literal and symbolic or figurative meaning. Job used a potsherd (2:8) to scrape the sores that covered his body; the underparts of the mythological monster Leviathan are said to be “Jagged potsherds” (41:30 NIV). The latter is a particularly arresting image for anyone familiar with the Jagged, sharp sherds always encountered in archaeological excavations where clay vessels were in use, as in the Near East.

Isaiah (30:14) used the image of a sherd as a sign of the worthlessness of ancient Judah. The psalmist (22:15) used the image of a dry potsherd as a simile for some physical illness he was experiencing.

Pile of pottery sherds at Banias.

Since the Hebrew word translated “potsherd” in the above passages can also mean “earthen vessel” in other contexts (cp. Lev. 14:5,50; Num. 5:17), it is not always clear as to which meaning is to be preferred. Such is the case in Prov. 26:23 where a comparison of the NRSV translation (“earthen vessel”) with the KJV (“potsherd”) highlights the problem. Elsewhere, textual confusion compounds the problem. In Isa. 45:9, the Hebrew text literally reads: “a potsherd (or “earthen vessel”) with potsherds (or “earthen vessels”) of ground.” In neither case is the text clear, though the symbolism of the futility of a person striving with God is obviously intended.

Finally, the obscure text in Ezek. 23:24 assigned Judah the same fate as her sister, Samaria. She would not only drink the cup of wrath but also “gnaw its sherds” (NRSV). See Archaeology and Biblical Study; Pottery.

POTSHERD GATE See East Gate 1.

POTTAGE Thick soup usually made from lentils and vegetables and spiced with various herbs. Jacob served pottage and bread to the famished Esau in return for the birthright (Gen. 25:29-34). Elisha added meal to a tainted recipe of pottage at Gilgal (2 Kings 4:38-41).

POTTER'S FIELD Tract of land in the Hinnom Valley outside Jerusalem used as a cemetery for pilgrims to the Holy City since the interbiblical era. The field was bought with the money paid for betraying Jesus (Acts 1:18). Matthew 27:3-10 records that the priests bought the field with the money Judas returned. Their reasoning was that the money had been used to bring about bloodshed and could not be returned to the temple treasury.

POTTERY Everyday household utensils whose remains form the basis for modern dating of ancient archaeological remains. Relatively few Bible texts refer to the methods and products of the potter even though the industry formed a vital part of the economic structure of the ancient world. The few statements about the preparation of the clay, “the potter treads clay” (Isa. 41:25), and the potter's failure and success on the wheel (Jer. 18:3-4) hardly hint at the importance and abundance in antiquity of “earthen vessels” (Lev. 6:21; Num. 5:17; Jer. 32:14), the common collective term for pottery in the Bible. However, the work of the potter in shaping the worthless clay provided the imagery the biblical writers and prophets used in describing God's creative relationship to human beings (Job 10:8-9; Isa. 45:9).

The pottery sherds (Job 2:8), those indestructible remnants of the potters' skill, are recovered in abundance at every archaeological site. They have not only clarified the pottery industries but have also shed light on the migration of peoples, their trade, and commerce. They have become the key to establishing a firmer chronological framework for other cultural data, especially in those periods for which few or no written remains are available. This begins in the Neolithic period, before 5000 B.C. when pottery first appeared.

The Bible specifically identifies only two vessels as pottery: earthen pitchers (Lam. 4:2) and earthen bottles (Jer. 19:1). An additional series of vessels probably came from the potter's workshop: "jar" for water (Gen. 24:14 NRSV); "pot" (Exod. 16:3); "bowl" (Num. 7:85); "bowl" (Judg. 6:38); "vial" (1 Sam. 10:1); "cruse" for oil and "jar" for flour (1 Kings 17:14 NRSV); another type of "jar" (2 Kings 4:2 NRSV); "bowl" and "cup" (Song 7:2; Isa. 22:24); "cup" (Isa. 51:17,22); and "cup" and "pitcher" (Jer. 35:5 NRSV). Similar English words represent different Hebrew terms.

Pottery Production Two factors appear to have contributed to the late appearance of fired pottery: early nomads found pottery too cumbersome to transport and a lengthy trial-and-error process in discovering and understanding the firing process.

Clay for the production of pottery may be divided into two types: pure aluminum silicate ("clean" clay), not found in Israel, and aluminum silicate mixed with iron oxides, carbon compounds, and other ingredients (sometimes referred to as "rich" clay). The potter prepared the dry clay by sifting and removing foreign matter and letting it stand in water to achieve uniform granules. Having achieved the desired texture, the potter mixed it by treading on it or hand-kneading it. Then the potter was ready to shape the vessel.

The earliest pottery from the Neolithic period was handmade. Clay was coiled into the desired shape on a base or stand. These earliest efforts of the potter's trade were coarse and badly fired. Other vessels were hand shaped from a clay ball. Innovations soon led to refinement of method and technique. During the Chalcolithic and early Bronze periods (5000-2000 B.C.), turning boards or stones ("tournettes") formed the prototypes of the potter's wheel. A refinement of the wheel came with the production of two horizontal stone disks with corresponding cone and fitting socket lubricated with water or oil. While the lower stone with the socket served as a stationary base, the upper stone allowed for easy, smooth rotation to enhance the quality and productivity of the potter. Extensive use of the wheel came during the middle Bronze Age (about 1900-1550 B.C.), though a few examples have been identified belonging to the early Bronze Age.

The potter rotated the wheel and used both hands to “draw” the moist clay from base to rim into the shape of desired curvature, diameter, and height. The vessel was set aside to dry to a leather-hard consistency. At this point the vessel received its distinctive modifications such as base, handles, projecting decorations, and spout adjustment. Coloration and ornamentation followed with a variety of options such as slips and paint, burnishing, incisions, impressions, and reliefs. A second drying period further reduced water content to about three percent. Then the vessel was fired in an open or closed kiln at temperatures between 450 and 950 degrees Celsius.

The best wares obviously were achieved at the highest and most consistent temperatures, a result determined by the nature of the kiln. Firing may have begun by accident when people noticed the quality of clay vessels left near or in a fireplace or recovered after a building or town burned. First combustible materials were burned over the pottery in open pits. Later the pottery appears to have been stacked above the firebox. Ultimately the need to equalize the distribution of heat led to the closed kiln. The introduction of bellows and forced air firing provided the desirable higher temperatures.

Importance of Pottery Analysis for Historical Studies Each culture produced its own distinctive, durable pottery. That distinctiveness has enabled archaeologists to trace each culture's “fingerprints” through time. The archaeologist can describe the movement of a race from one place to another, the influence of new people in a particular region or area, and the commercial activity of the people. Archaeologists have used changes in pottery forms, shapes, decorations, and materials from one period to the next to establish a relative chronological framework for dating purposes. The type pottery in an excavated layer or strata provides the key for dating, at least in a relative way, all other cultural artifacts and architectural remains within the strata.

A modern Middle Eastern potter fashioning pottery in the same manner used in biblical times.

Developments in Pottery Production in Palestine The significance of pottery analysis may be highlighted in a general way by recognizing the major developments of pottery production in Palestine throughout biblical history period by period.

Neolithic Period (7000-5000 B.C.) Neolithic pottery, the earliest attempts at this important industry, were poorly handmade and badly fired, although some types including bowls and storage jars were decorated elaborately with red slip, burnished, painted (triangular and zigzag lines, herringbone design), and incised (herringbone). Jericho, Sha'ar ha-Golan, and other sites in the Jordan Valley have provided the best examples of these early cultural developments.

Chalcolithic Period (5000-3000 B.C.) The Ghassulian (in the Jordan Valley) and Beersheba (in the Negev) cultures have provided the best assemblages for this period of pottery advancement. Rope ornamentation on this handmade pottery clearly suggests the practical strengthening of the clay vessels with various rope netting or binding. A wide variety of shapes and sizes suggests the proliferation of household and commercial uses for storage and transport of both dry and liquid products and merchandise.

Early Bronze Age (3000-2000 B.C.) This period has been divided into three and possibly four distinct cultural periods on the basis of the distinctive pottery. The first period (EB I) is characterized by grey burnished ware, band-slip ware, and burnished red-slip ware. The second period (EB II) is identified with “Abydos” ware (pitchers and storage jars with burnished redslips on the lower half and brown-and-blackpainted triangles and dots on the upper half), first found in Egyptian royal tombs of the First Dynasty at Abydos in Upper Egypt and most important in the chronological correlation of Egyptian and Palestinian history. The third period (EB III) includes kraters (large storage or mixing bowls), bowls, pitchers, and stands, first identified at Khirbet Kerak (Beth Yerak) at the southern end of the Sea of Galilee, which has a distinctive combination of highly burnished red and black slip. This culture appears to have originated in eastern Anatolia. The fourth period (EB IV) with innovations may be a cultural continuation of the previous period.

Fourteenth-century B.C. pottery found at Hazor in Israel.

Middle Bronze Age (about 2000-1500 B.C.) A transitional phase (first identified MB I, and now mostly EB-MB) resulted from nomadic or seminomadic tribes who destroyed the final phase of EB culture. They produced a distinctive pottery with globular and cylindrical shapes. These combined hand-shaped bodies and wheelmade necks and out-flared rims.

The period introduced the pinching of the rim of a small bowl to produce a four-wicked lamp. The patriarchal period usually is identified with the next period (MB Ha). The pottery reflects the arrival of a highly developed culture that results in a prosperous, urbanized, sedentary population with rich cultural ties to the upper Euphrates region from which Abraham migrated, according to the biblical text. The pottery exhibits excellent workmanship and, in many instances, suggests metal prototypes. Possibly the earliest Semitic wheel-made vessels were the beautiful carinated bowls and vessels of this period. Skilled potters, with the advent of the new fast wheel, were able to produce elegant new shapes with wide bodies, narrow bases, and flaring rims, all with refined details. During the MB IIb an unusual group of juglets indicate pottery exchange with Egypt which during this period was politically joined to Syria-Palestine.

Late Bronze Age (about 1550-1200 B.C.) This period generally coincides with the vibrant New Kingdom period in Egypt when Palestine primarily was under Egyptian control, a rule that became more concentrated and demanding toward the end of the period. Canaan also maintained extensive trade connections with Aegean and northeastern Mediterranean powers. Cypriot pitchers called “bilbils” and shaped as poppyseed heads (upside-down), were among the most popular Palestinian imports. They may have been used to transport opium in wine or water from Cyprus to other Mediterranean sites.

Clear pottery distinctives again suggest a three-period division. The late Bronze I (about 1550-1400) reflects a continuation of the vitality of the earlier middle Bronze culture. The pottery of the late Bronze IIa (about 1400-1300) shows a deterioration of forms and quality during a period of political instability associated with the el-Amarna Period. That deterioration becomes more evident during the late Bronze IIb (about 1300-1200) as Egypt's Nineteenth Dynasty established a firmer control over the affairs of the economy and urban centers of Canaan. An abundance of Mycenaean and Cypriot pottery throughout the country would seem to suggest a growing commercial interest in the Levant for export and trade.

The Iron Age basically runs from the conquest of Canaan to the demise of the Judean Kingdom and usually is divided into two distinct periods. The distinguishing elements in pottery and other cultural elements for making the archaeological divisions of this period are not overly clear. Iron Age I (1200-925) pottery from the settlement to the division of the kingdom begins with a continuation of late Bronze traditions, as Israel borrowed industrial techniques from the local Canaanite population. Iron Age (about 1200-587/6 B.C.)

The arrival of the Philistines after 1200 B.C. brought a distinctively decorated pottery with Mycenaean shapes and motifs. The deterioration of the quality and design of this pottery tends to reflect the eclectic nature of these "Sea Peoples." By 1000 B.C. the distinctive nature of the pottery in the Philistine plain had basically disappeared.

Philistine ware made its debut during this period. Some of the liquid containers had strainers in the spouts to prevent the dregs (pulp and debris that usually settled to the bottom) from coming out with the liquid. Philistine ware is an amalgamation of Mycenaean types with clear influences from Egypt and Canaan. Red and black decorations, especially people and animals, are typical of this type pottery.

Storage jars from the palace complex of Knossos on the Island of Crete.

During the Iron II period (925-587/6), from the division of the United Monarchy to the fall of the Judean Kingdom to the Babylonians, the political separation produced clear distinctions in the regional pottery types, generally known as “Samaria” and “Judean” ware. During most of this period the northern pottery exhibits the higher standard of workmanship. Most prominent in imported ware up to 700 B.C. is the Cypro-Phoenician ware. From 700 to 500 B.C. imports of Assyrian origin resulted in local potters copying Assyrian prototypes.

Persian Period (586-330 B.C.) The deterioration of the pottery with inferior clay, firing, and general workmanship appears to reflect the general economy disruption throughout the region, a situation that seems to prevail throughout the Near East. In Palestine a growing number of Greek imports appeared, especially toward the end of the period.

Hellenistic Period (330-63 B.C.) While the local pottery was basically crude and uninspired, imported wares include a wide range of luxury items from molded Megarian bowls to impressed and roulette decorated black-glazed and red-glazed ware. The maritime trade connections further are evident, for example, in widespread appearance of Rhodian amphorae.

Alexander the Great brought to the Middle East the Hellenistic culture and its large variety of ceramic ware. Large, heavy vessels mark this period. They show a uniformity of style owing to the Greek dominance of all major production centers.

Roman Period (63 B.C.-A.D.325) Only Herodian pottery is of particular interest for an understanding of the biblical period. Local pottery basically followed earlier traditions with the dominant innovation a ribbing of many vessel surfaces. The most common imported ware is both eastern and western red-glazed terra sigillata, noted for its outstanding finish and general workmanship. The Nabateans who controlled the trade routes of the Negev/Sinai and the Transjordan produced the finest local varieties, emulating the skills and export products of the Roman potters of the period.

By the time Rome conquered Palestine in 63 B.C., a new type of cylindrical jar with angular to rounded shoulders appeared. It had a ring base and a rim made to receive a lid. This type vessel made an excellent storage jar for solids, especially scrolls. The famous Dead Sea Scrolls were kept in these finely crafted containers for almost 2,000 years.

POWER Ability to act or produce an effect; the possession of authority over others. These two aspects of power are often related in Scripture. Because God has revealed His power in the act of creation, He has authority to assign dominion to whomever He wills (Jer. 10:12; 27:5). God revealed His power by miraculously delivering Israel from Egyptian slavery (Exod. 4:21; 9:16; 15:6; 32:11) and in the conquest of Canaan (Ps. 111:6). God's acts are foundational for His claim on Israel. God's power includes not only the power to judge but also the power to forgive sin (Num. 14:15-19; Jer. 32:17-18). Second Kings 3:15 links the onrush of the power of God with prophecy. Here power approximates God's Spirit (cp. Mic. 3:8; Luke 1:35).

Christ's miracles evidenced the power of God at work in His ministry (Matt. 14:2; Mark 5:30; 9:1; Luke 4:36; 5:17). Luke highlighted the role of the Holy Spirit in empowering the ministry of Jesus (Luke 4:14; Acts 10:38) and the ongoing ministry of the church (Acts 1:8; 3:12; 4:7,33; 6:8). Paul stressed the paradox that the cross— what is apparently Jesus' greatest moment of weakness—is the event in which God's power to save is realized (1 Cor. 1:17-18; cp. Rom. 1:16). This scandal of God's power revealed in Christ's death continues in God's choice to work through the powerless (1 Cor. 1:26-29; 2:3-4; 2 Cor. 12:9). In some texts “powers” refer to angelic powers (Rom. 8:38; Eph. 3:10; Col. 2:15; 1 Pet. 3:22).

PRAETORIAN GUARD Roman military branch assigned to personal security for the imperial family and to represent and protect the emperor's interests in the imperial provinces. A related Greek term (praetorion) may refer to the imperial high court. “Praetorium” referred to the residence of a Roman governor in the Gospels and Acts. The term is used in Phil. 1:13 with regard to a unit of the Praetorian guard. Greetings from “those from Caesar's household” (Phil. 4:22 HCSB) do not prove Paul was in Rome when he wrote Philippians. The term “Caesar's household” was applied often to the Praetorian guard, and units were dispersed throughout the Roman Empire. Paul may have been in Caesarea, Ephesus, or Antioch, though Rome seems most likely. Praetorium is used in Mark 15:16 in reference to the headquarters where Jesus was taken and subsequently mocked by Roman soldiers prior to His crucifixion. The NT locates the praetorium in Jerusalem as the palace of the Roman governor, the Tower of Antonia, located adjacent to the temple on the northwestern corner (Matt. 27:27; Mark 15:16; John 18:28,33; 19:9) of Temple Mount.

PRAETORIUM This term is used in reference to the emperor's palace in noncanonical literature. Herod's praetorium in Caesarea (Acts 23:35 NASB, RSV; judgment hall, KJV) was the residence of Felix, the Roman procurator of Judea, though the Greek praetorium does not occur in this verse.

Praetorium was formerly the headquarters or barracks of a Roman camp; however, in the provinces as well as in Rome, praetorium came to be used in reference to the governor's or emperor's official residences. The Romans accommodated themselves with such buildings by seizing and appropriating the palaces of conquered royalty of the local area. See Praetorian Guard. Steven L. Cox

PRAISE One of humanity's many responses to God's revelation of Himself. The Bible recognizes that men and women may also be the objects of praise, either from other people (Prov. 27:21; 31:30) or from God Himself (Rom. 2:29), and that angels and the natural world are likewise capable of praising God (Ps. 148). Nevertheless, human praise of God is one of Scripture's major themes.

“Praise” comes from a Latin word meaning “value” or “price.” Thus, to give praise to God is to proclaim His merit or worth. Many terms are used to express this in the Bible, including “glory,” “blessing,” “thanksgiving,” and “hallelujah,” the last named being a transliteration of the Hebrew for “Praise the Lord.” The Hebrew title of the book of Psalms (“Praises”) comes from the same root as “hallelujah” and Pss. 113-118 have been specially designated the “Hallel” (“praise”) psalms.

The modes of praise are many, including the offering of sacrifices (Lev. 7:13), physical movement (2 Sam. 6:14), silence and meditation (Ps. 77:11-12), testimony (Ps. 66:16), prayer (Phil. 4:6), and a holy life (1 Pet. 1:3-9). However, praise is almost invariably linked to music, both instrumental (Ps. 150:3-5) and, especially, vocal. Biblical songs of praise range from personal, more or less spontaneous outbursts of thanksgiving for some redemptive act of God (Exod. 15: Judg. 5; 1 Sam. 2; Luke 1:46-55,67-79) to formal psalms and hymns adapted for corporate worship in the temple (2 Chron. 29:30) and church (Col. 3:16).

While the Bible contains frequent injunctions for people to praise God, there are also occasional warnings about the quality of this praise. Praise is to originate in the heart and not become mere outward show (Matt. 15:8).

Corporate praise is to be carried on in an orderly manner (1 Cor. 14:40). Praise is also firmly linked to an individual's everyday life (Amos 5:21-24). See Music, Instruments, Dancing; Psalms, Book of; Worship.

PRAYER Dialogue between God and people, especially His covenant partners. Old Testament Israel is a nation born of prayer. Abraham heard God's call (Gen. 12:1-3), and God heard the cries of the Hebrew children (Exod. 3:7). Moses conversed with God (Exod. 3:1-4:17) and interceded for Israel (Exod. 32:11-13; Num. 11:11-15). By prayer Joshua discerned sin in the conquest community (Josh. 7:6-9) but was tricked when he did not discern God's opinion by prayer (Josh. 9). God also spoke to the judges to deliver His people when the people called out to Him for deliverance. David's spiritual acumen is seen in his prayers of confession (2 Sam. 12:13; Ps. 51). Solomon fulfilled the promises made to David after praying for wisdom (1 Kings 3:5-9) and dedicated the temple in prayer (1 Kings 8). God worked miracles through the prayers of Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 17:19-22; 18:20-40). The writing prophets noted that genuine prayer calls for accompanying moral and social accountability (Hos. 7:14; Amos 4:4-5).

Isaiah's call reflected the intense cleansing and commitment involved in prayer (Isa. 6). Jeremiah's dialogue and intercession frequently voiced reservation and frustration (Jer. 1; 20:7-18), teaching honesty in prayer. The book of Psalms teaches that variety and honesty in prayer are permissible; the psalms proclaim praise, ask pardon, seek such things as communion (63), protection (57), vindication (107), and healing (6). Psalm 86 provides an excellent pattern for prayer. Daily patterned prayer becomes very important to exiles denied access to the temple (Dan. 6:10).

New Testament Jesus' example and teaching inspire prayer. Mark emphasized that Jesus prayed in crucial moments, including the disciples' appointment (3:13), their mission (6:30-32), and the transfiguration (9:2). Jesus displayed a regular and intense prayer life (Matt. 6:5; 14:23; Mark 1:35). Luke taught that Jesus was guided by the Holy Spirit (Luke 3:22; 4:1,14,18; 10:21; Acts 10:38). John reported that Jesus sometimes prayed aloud for the benefit of those present (John 11:41-42). He also reported Jesus' prayer of intercession for the first disciples and future believers (John 17). Both prayers display Jesus' unity with the Father and desire to give Him glory (John 11:4; 17:1).

Modern orthodox Jews pray in old Jerusalem in a manner similar to the Hebrews of the OT.

The Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:9-13; Luke 11:2-4) is taught to disciples who realize the kingdom is present but still to come in all its fullness. Significantly the disciples asked Jesus to teach them to pray after watching Him pray (Luke 11:1). The prayer also provides a contrast to hypocritical prayers (Matt. 6:5). Although it is permissible to repeat this prayer, it may be well to remember Jesus was emphasizing how to pray, not what to pray. See Lord's Prayer.

Jesus also corrected some abuses and misunderstandings regarding prayer. First, prayer is not to be offered to impress others. Disciples should rather seek a storage closet or a shed and pray in private. Jesus did not reject group prayer, but his warning might apply to a believer who prays to impress a congregation (Matt. 6:5-6). Second, Jesus also prohibited long-winded attempts that try to manipulate God. While Jesus prayed for long periods of time (Luke 6:12; Mark 1:35) and repeated Himself (Mark 14:36-42), He called for people to trust their Father and not their own eloquence or fervor.

Jesus' teaching on persistence in prayer is linked to the inbreaking kingdom (Luke 11:5-28; 18:1-8). God is not like the reluctant neighbor, even though Christians may have to wait for answers (Luke 11:13; 18:6-8). The ironies of prayer are evident: God knows our needs, yet we must ask; God is ready to answer, yet we must patiently persist. Children of the kingdom will have their requests heard (Matt. 6:8; 7:7-11 ; 21:22; John 14:13; 15:7,16; 16:23; cp. 1 John 3:22; 5:14; James 1:5), particularly believers gathered in Jesus' name (Matt. 18:19).

In Hebrew thought the name was mysteriously linked to the person's character and prerogatives. Thus prayer in Jesus' name is prayer that is seeking His will and submissive to His authority (John 14:13; 1 John 5:14).

The church remembered Jesus' teaching regarding the Spirit, prayer, and the kingdom mission. The disciples prayed awaiting the Holy Spirit's outpouring (Acts 1:14). The early church is characterized by prayer (Acts 2:42). They prayed regarding selection of leaders (Acts 1:24; 6:6; 13:3), during persecution (Acts 4:24-30; 12:5,12), and in preparing to heal (Acts 9:40; 28:8). Calling upon God's name—prayer—is the first act and true mark of a believer (Acts 2:21; 9:14,21; 22:16).

Paul's ministry reflected his constant prayer of intercession and thanksgiving (1 Tim. 2:1;

Jewish men praying at the Walling Wall—a point close to the probable site of the ancient temple.

Eph. 1:16; 5:4; Acts 9:11). The Lord spoke to Paul in prayer (Acts 22:17). Prayer is crucial to continuing in the Christian life (Rom. 12:12). The indwelling Spirit enables a believer to call God “Abba” (Rom. 8:15); that is, the Spirit's work within the believer prompts him or her to address God with the confidence of a child (Rom. 8:14). The Spirit must intercede because our prayers are weak; apart from the Spirit Christians pray without discernment. He takes up our petitions with an earnest pleading beyond words (Rom. 8:26-27; Gal. 4:6).

Answered Prayers—Unanswered Petitions Not every petition is granted. Job's demand for answers from God was eclipsed by the awesome privilege of encountering Him (Job 38-41). Modern believers must also cherish communion with the Father more than their petitions.

Jesus, with His soul sorrowful to the point of death, prayed three times that His cup of suffering might pass, but He was nevertheless submissive to God's will (Matt. 26:38-39,42,45). Both the boldness of the petition to alter God's will and the submission to this “hard” path of suffering are significant.

Paul asked three times for deliverance from his “thorn in the flesh.” God's answer to Paul directed him to find comfort in God's sufficient grace. In addition, God declared that His power is best seen in Paul's weakness (2 Cor. 12:8-9). God gave him the problem to hinder his pride. Ironically, Paul claimed that God gave the problem, and yet he called it a messenger of Satan. Paul learned that petitions are sometimes denied in light of an eventual greater good: God's power displayed in Paul's humility.

Faith is a condition for answered petitions (Mark 11:24). Two extremes must be avoided concerning faith. (1) With Jesus' example in mind we must not think that faith will always cause our wishes to be granted. (2) We must not go through the motions of prayer without faith. Believers do not receive what they pray for because they pray from selfish motives (James 4:2-3). Prayers are also hindered by corrupted character (James 4:7) or injured relationships (Matt. 5:23-24; 1 Pet. 3:7).

Theological Insights Dialogue is what is essential to prayer. Prayer makes a difference in what happens (James 4:2). Our understanding of prayer will correspond to our understanding of God. When God is seen as desiring to bless (James 1:5) and sovereignly free to respond to persons (Jon. 3:9), then prayer will be seen as dialogue with God. God will respond when we faithfully pursue this dialogue. Prayer will lead to a greater communion with God and a greater understanding of His will. Randy Hatchett

PREACHING Human presentation, through the Holy Spirit's power, of God's acts of salvation through Jesus Christ. This proclamation of God's revelation functions as God's chosen instrument for bringing us to salvation by grace, although its message of a crucified Messiah seems to be foolishness to people of worldly wisdom and a scandalous offense to Jews (1 Cor. 1:21-23). True Christian preaching interprets the meaning of God's acts into contemporary contexts. A sermon becomes God's word to us only as God's servant reconstitutes the past realities of the biblical revelation into vital present experience.

Old Testament Traditions The great prophets of the OT heralded God's direct messages against the sins of the people, told of coming judgments, and held out future hope of the great Day of the Lord. God's revelation to families, regularly shared as private instruction (Deut. 11:19), became the foundation of the public reading of the law every seven years to all the people (Deut. 31:9-13). During periods of special revival, natural leaders traveled about sharing the revelation in great assemblies (2 Chron. 15:1-2; 17:7-9; 35:3). Nehemiah 8:7-9 records that Ezra and his associates interpreted the "sense" of what was read in such gatherings. The continuing need for such public interpretation and instruction led in the faith gave rise to an expository tradition of OT revelation. This continued after the exile in the regular services of the local synagogues that arose in dispersed Judaism as substitutes for temple worship.

New Testament Practice Jesus began His ministry in the synagogue by announcing He was the Herald who fulfilled Isaiah's prophecy concerning the preaching of the kingdom and its blessings (Luke 4:16-21). By the time Peter and the other apostles preached, their emphasis focused on the person and work of Christ as the central point of history certifying the presence of God's kingdom on earth today. In the NT this message concerned a summation of the basic facts about the life, character, death, burial, resurrection, and coming again of Christ. It continues today as the main word of revelation to the world through the church. Although the NT uses some 30 different terms to describe the preaching of John the Baptist, Jesus, and the apostles, those most commonly used can be grouped under either proclamation (to herald, to evangelize) or doctrine (to teach). Many scholars define these emphases as either gospel preaching (proclaiming salvation in Christ) or pastoral teaching (instructing, admonishing, and exhorting believers in doctrine and lifestyle). In practice each function melds into the other. Thus 1 Cor. 15:1-7 not only represents the “irreducible core” of the gospel message, but it also includes clear doctrinal teaching on the substitutionary atonement and the fulfillment of messianic prophecies. The same passage forms a foundation for the exposition of the extensive doctrine of general resurrection and its Christian dimensions taught in the following verses. Stephen's address in Acts 7:1-53 represents the best of the OT tradition, weaving narrative and historical portions of Scripture together with contemporary interpretation and application to the present situation. Peter's sermon in Acts 2 affirms the atoning nature of Jesus' death and the reality of His resurrection together with a clear call to faith and repentance forming a balanced argument framed around the central proposition that “Jesus Christ is Lord.”

Special Perspectives Paul firmly believed that proclaiming the full glory of Christ not only warns men and women of the need for salvation but that through this preaching believers can grow towards spiritual maturity (Col. 1:28). He wrote that the ministry of God-called leaders equips believers in each local assembly for service through mutual ministries to one another and leads to the healthy up building of Christ's body (Eph. 4:11-16). He defined his content as including “the whole plan of God” and his practice as being “to Jews and Greeks,” and “from house to house,” as well as “publicly,” and “in all seasons” (Acts 20:17-21,27).

Homiletics Paul underlined the need for careful attention to principles of communication in preaching. While he refused to adopt some of the cunning word craftiness of the secular rhetoricians of his day (2 Cor. 4:2; 1 Thess. 2:3,5), nevertheless, he adapted his preaching well to a variety of audiences and needs. In the synagogue Paul spoke to Jews about the special dealings God has with His people (Acts 13:16-41) but to the Greek philosophers he presented a living God as a challenge to their love for fresh ideas, quoting from their own writers as he did so (Acts 17:22-31). To Agrippa and Festus Paul molded the gospel message in lofty and legal terms (Acts 26:2-23). When meeting a charge of apostasy from the Jewish faith, he addressed the people in their own tongue concerning his origins and his experiences in Christ (Acts 21:40-22:21). Paul also counseled young pastor Timothy to be conscientious about himself as well as his teaching (1 Tim. 4:16). Paul advised the need for diligent practice to improve Timothy's skills in the public reading of the Scriptures and in motivational teaching (1 Tim. 4:13-15). Paul noted that such responsibilities involved "hard labor" (1 Tim. 5:17). Craig Skinner

PREDESTINATION God's purposes in grace directed toward those whom He will ultimately save to the uttermost.

The word "predestine" as a verb with God as its subject is used six times in the NT (Acts 4:28; Rom. 8:29, 30; 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 1:5, 11). The English word comes from the Latin praedestino, which is used in the Vulgate to translate the Greek word proorizo, which means essentially, "to decide upon beforehand." Other words convey a similar idea: to determine, to elect, to foreknow. ("Election" and "Foreknowledge" are treated as separate articles in this volume.)

Major Texts In both Rom. 8 and Eph. 1 Paul makes strong claims about the priority of God's grace in salvation. "For those He foreknew He also predestined to be conformed to the image of His Son, so that He would be the firstborn among many brothers" (Rom. 8:29 HCSB). The Father determined that He would fashion those whom He foreknew into the image of Christ. He predestined them fully sanctified. To make clear just how this predestination fits into God's overall plan of salvation, Paul then lists a sort of "chain of grace": "And those He predestined, He also called; and those He called, He also justified; and those He justified, He also glorified" (v. 30 HCSB). In each link in the chain, God is the one acting, and persons are the objects of the action. God foreknew persons, not, incidentally, something about those persons, i.e., that they would believe; rather He foreknew the persons themselves. The ones He foreknew are the same ones He predestined, and the same ones He called, and the same ones He justified, and the same ones He glorified. There is no break in the link at any point. That is, there is no possibility that someone initially predestined would fail to be finally glorified. In this Paul is in full agreement with Jesus, who in John 6:37-40 makes clear that all of the ones given to Him by the Father (predestination) will believe on Him and will finally be raised up on the last day (glorification). None will fail to be saved to the uttermost.

In Eph. 1:3-6,11 Paul takes up the issue of predestination again. Here he makes several points that are easily seen in the text. He uses both the term “predestine” and the term “chosen” (eklegomai) here, in a synonymous fashion. First, in verse 4 he notes that God chose “us” (believers) before the foundation of the world. Second, Paul says this election was “in Him” (Christ). Third, this election has the goal “to be holy and blameless in His sight.” Fourth, He predestined us “in love” (vv. 4-5). Fifth, this predestination was unto our adoption as children. Sixth, the predestining was “according to His favor and will” (v. 5 HCSB). Seventh, it causes us to praise “His glorious grace” (v. 6). In verse 11 the apostle reemphasizes one or two points he made in the earlier verses: “In Him we were also made His inheritance, predestined according to the purpose of the One who works out everything in agreement with the decision of His will.” Here Paul links believers' predestination with their being adopted children (hence, the inheritance), and he notes again that this election was done according to God's own purposes, who does everything in accordance with His own will. These are strong statements to the effect that God is a gracious God and that the only hope anyone has in this world is that God would bestow that grace on him.

Two final texts use the word proorizo. In 1 Cor. 2:7 Paul tells his readers that God “predestined” the mystery of His hidden wisdom. This mystery is God's purpose in salvation through Christ, which is given to both Jew and Gentile, based on God's grace and received through faith alone (cp. 1 Cor. 2:1; 4:7; Rom. 11:25; 16:25; Eph. 1:9; 3:3,4,9; 6:19-20; Col. 1:25,27; 2:2; 4:3). Here Paul tells us that God has predestined Christ and His atoning work as the only hope for salvation. In Acts 4:27-28 the Jerusalem church prays, “For, in fact, in this city both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the peoples of Israel, assembled together against Your holy Servant Jesus, whom You anointed, to do whatever Your hand and Your plan had predestined to take place” (HCSB). These believers are affirming that wicked men were used by God to carry out His plan of salvation, for by crucifying Jesus, they were putting into action the predestined plan of God.

The reader of Scripture ought not to be surprised that it presents a God who is truly sovereign and powerful. His plans will always be fulfilled (Ps. 33:10-11; Job 9:12; Dan. 4:35). He is in control of all of history so that even minor details are part of His work (Prov. 21:1; 16:1,9,33). Nothing can prevent the fulfillment of His predictions (Isa. 14:24-27; 44:24-45; Prov. 19:21).

Theological Considerations Theologically this teaching presents a challenge for some Christians. Along with these passages which emphasize God's priority in grace, there are many texts which affirm the importance of repentance and faith (Rom. 10:9-14; Acts 2:38), and the need of the sinner to “come” to Christ (Rev. 22:17). Though the concept of predestination seems to conflict with the responsibility of the individual to answer the Gospel call, the two must be compatible, since the same inspired teachers in Scripture emphasize both. Paul can say that Christians are predestined by God, and yet on the next page or so urge, “If you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised Him from the dead, you will be saved. With the heart one believes, resulting in righteousness, and with the mouth one confesses, resulting in salvation. Now the Scripture says, 'No one who believes on Him will be put to shame,' for there is no distinction between Jew and Greek, since the same Lord of all is rich to all who call on Him. For 'everyone who calls on the name of the LORD will be saved'” (Rom. 10:9-13 HCSB). He who wrote that we are predestined according to the good pleasure of God's will, a few sentences later noted, “For by grace you are saved through faith, and this is not from yourselves; it is God's gift” (Eph. 2:8 HCSB). For Jesus and Paul the two ideas are complementary, not contradictory (cp. John 10:25-30).

Various attempts have been made to “reconcile” God's sovereignty in predestination with the human response. Some have claimed that God predestines believers based on His foreknowledge of who will one day believe the gospel. The problem is that no text teaches this. The passage in Rom. 8:29 does not say, “Whom He foreknew would believe, these He predestined to salvation.” As noted earlier, the word “foreknew” refers to the people whom God foreknew, not something about those people (that they would one day believe). In addition, Eph. 1:11 makes clear that predestination is not based on something God sees in those persons. That is, it is not based on foreseen works, foreseen faith, foreseen perseverance, or anything else. It says predestination is based on God's purposes, though it does not specify just what that might mean. On the other end of the spectrum, some have argued that God began by planning to save some, then reprobate others, to His own glory, and then set about to create the world in order to make that happen. Both of these “solutions” to the logical difficulty share something in common—they are philosophical solutions, not based on sound study of the text.

It is important to adhere to the Bible and its teachings on this subject. It says this about predestination: God predestined persons out of His love to adoption in Christ before the world was made that those persons might become holy and blameless, conformed to the image of Christ, that they might be about the task of praising Him for His grace and serving Him out of gratitude. He did this not based on anything He saw in them, but according to His own purposes, unknown to human wisdom, so that a great multitude might be in His eternal kingdom (Rom. 8:29-30; Eph. 1:3-6,11). God planned this redemption through the preordained work of Christ on Calvary, whom the Father determined to have crucified from before time. Though it was His will for Christ to be so killed, those who killed Him did it of their own free and wicked purposes, not constrained by God, and so are culpable before Him for their crime (Acts 4:28; 2:22-23; Rev. 13:8). We also know that the God who predestines also sends out His laborers into the harvest to carry out His purposes in mission. There is not one iota of reason for the church to grow slack in evangelism, for without one preaching to them, sinners will never be saved. It is the church's task to testify to the truth and believe that the Lord will open the hearts of unbelievers (Acts 16:14), so as in the case of the Gentiles who heard Paul and Barnabas, “all who had been appointed to eternal life believed” (Acts 13:48 HCSB).

Though Christians today may not be able to understand how all of that works, they can affirm it as true, and they certainly must obey the call of God to the work of ministry. See Anthropomorphism; Election; Foreknowledge; Salvation; Sovereignty of God.

PREEXILIC Period in Israel's history before the exile in Babylon (586-538 B.C.). See Israel Land of.

PREEXISTENCE OF SOULS The idea that the immaterial human soul exists prior to the body. As the Bible teaches physical death is not the end of personal existence, some have suggested that conception is not the beginning.

Plato maintained historical events are realization of preexisting realities within an ideal world of the divine mind. He taught that the soul exists prior to its bodily incarnation in this ideal world. Other thinkers similarly have explanations.

Pagan ideas of preexistence of the soul were introduced into Christian thought at certain points in church history. The arguments of early Christian theologian Origen (ca. A.D. 185-254) suggested that human bodies are inhabited by souls who sinned in some prior incorporeal state and have been consigned to the material realm as punishment. Christian orthodoxy, however, has consistently repudiated such a doctrine. Instead, the soul is created directly by God and united with the body at conception or birth (creationism) or that the soul is begotten along with the body through the reproductive process (traducianism).

The concept of the soul's preexistence is alien to the Bible. From the moment God “breathed the breath of life into his (Adam's) nostrils” (Gen. 2:7 HCSB), Scripture never severs the creation of material and spiritual parts of any individual. Indeed, the Bible allows no concept of a disembodied existence, except the intermediate state between death and the resurrection of the body (Phil. 1:21-23).

David references the beginning of his existence as taking place in his mother's womb (Pss. 51:5-6; 139:13-16). God declares that He knew Jeremiah before he was formed in the womb (Jer. 1:5), but this points not to spiritual antiquity, but to God's sovereign omniscience and foreknowledge. The NT speaks of God knowing believers before the foundation of the world but always in the context of His kind intention to save them in Christ (Rom. 8:29).

The preexistence of Jesus (John 1:1-2) in no way argues for preexistence of human souls. Scripture ties Jesus' preexistence not to human experience but to His identity as the eternal, uncreated, and self-existent God (John 8:58), who took on human nature to serve as Mediator between God and sinners.

The Bible, unlike philosophy and mysticism, does not dismiss the body as a container for the soul. Instead, the Bible speaks of both creation and redemption of the whole person, body and soul (Rom. 8:11). The Bible affirms creation of the body by God as integral to human existence, as is bodily resurrection from the dead (John 6:39). The purposes of God do not end in restoring humanity to some preexistent state but in redeeming the material cosmos into a glorious new creation (2 Pet. 3:13). Russell D. Moore PREMARITAL SEX Engaging in sexual intercourse prior to marriage. The Song of Songs is an extended poem extolling the virtue of sexual fidelity between a king and his chosen bride. Sexual desire runs strong throughout the song as the king and his beloved anticipate their union together. At intervals the poet repeats a refrain counseling sexual restraint: “Young women of Jerusalem, I charge you, by the gazelles and the wild does of the field: do not stir up or awaken love until the appropriate time” (Song 2:7 HCSB; 3:5; 8:4). To the church in Corinth, a city well-known for profligate sexual activity, Paul wrote that Christians must control their sexual desires and that those who cannot do so ought to marry (1 Cor. 7:2,8-9,36-37). Paul counseled Timothy to flee youthful passions and pursue instead things that make for pure living (2 Tim. 2:22). Although the temptation to gratify one's passions can be strong, Paul taught that God promises strength to overcome greater than the temptation (1 Cor. 10:12-13).

God chose the marriage relationship as a means to express to people the intimacy He shares with believers (Hos. 1-3; 2 Cor. 11:2; Rev. 21:2). Anything that cheapens or lessens the union of a husband and wife in marriage, such as pre- or extramarital sex, also tarnishes God's relationship with His people. PREPARATION DAY Sixth day of week in which Jews prepared life's necessities to avoid work on the Sabbath (cp. Exod. 20:8-11 ; Matt. 12:1-14; John 9:14-16). Preparation of food, completing work, and spiritual purification were included. The Hebrew day began and ended at 6:00 p.m., so the day of preparation extended from 6:00 p.m. on Thursday until the beginning of the Sabbath at 6:00 p.m. Friday.

The Feast of Passover was immediately followed by the holy convocation of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:1-7). No one worked on either of these holy days, so a day of preparation was set aside to prepare for the holiday period (John 19:14). John explicitly identified the day of preparation as the day of Jesus' execution (John 19:14,31,42) and placed the Last Supper before Passover (John 13:1). The Synoptic Gospels, however, dated the Last Supper on the day of Passover (Matt. 26:17; Mark 14:12; Luke 22:7). This apparent contradiction in dating may depend on whether the Gospel writers were referring to the preparation day for the Sabbath or to the preparation day for the Passover.

PRESENCE OF GOD God's initiative in encountering people. Biblical words for the presence of God usually relate to the “face” of God.

Old Testament During the patriarchal period God used a variety of means of revelation to communicate with the people (Gen. 15:1; 32:24-30). These are often described as theophanies, appearances of God to humanity. Moses had a close relationship with God. He encountered God in the burning bush and knew God “face to face” (Deut. 34:10). The presence of God was also closely related to the tabernacle, the place for ancient Israel to encounter God in worship. The tabernacle was the place of the Lord's name or glory, a manifestation of God's presence and activity in the world (Exod. 40:34,38). The cloud and fire symbolized the presence of God leading on the journey to Canaan.

Perhaps the primary tangible symbol of God's presence with the people was the ark of the covenant, the container for the tablet of the law and the seat of God's throne. It led the people in the journey to Canaan and into battle (Josh. 3:1-6). The ark was associated with the sanctuary and eventually came to rest in the temple, the place of the presence of God. Here Isaiah had a powerful vision of the holy God (Isa. 6).

God also manifested Himself in other ways: in fire (1 Kings 18) and in a still small voice (1 Kings 19), both to Elijah. The Psalms speak of God's presence with the worshiping community (Ps. 139) and of the apparent absence of this present God (Ps. 13). In either case, God is still addressed. Ezekiel spoke of the exile in terms of the glory (presence) of God leaving ancient Israel but then returning at the end of the exile in Babylon (Ezek. 43:1-5). Much of the OT discussion of the presence of God centers on the fact that God is utterly free to be where God wills but constantly chooses to be with His people to give them life.

New Testament The primary NT manifestation of the presence of God is in Jesus Christ, Immanuel, “God with us” (Matt. 1:23; John 1:14; Heb. 1:1-3). This presence did not end with the death of Christ. The risen Christ appeared to the disciples (John 21:1-14) and to Paul. Through the apostles, Paul, and the disciples, Christ's work continued (Acts 1:8; 26:12-18). The Holy Spirit is an important manifestation of the presence of God and continues the redemptive work of God. The return of Christ will bring permanence to the presence of God with His people.

The church is called to be a manifestation of God's presence. That community is fed by the presence of God found in communion between worshiper and God.

PRIDE Undue confidence in and attention to one's own skills, accomplishments, state, possessions, or position. Pride is easier to recognize than to define, easier to recognize in others than in oneself. Many biblical words describe this concept, each with its own emphasis. Some of the synonyms for pride include arrogance, presumption, conceit, self-satisfaction, boasting, and high-mindedness. It is the opposite of humility, the proper attitude one should have in relation to God. Pride is rebellion against God because it attributes to oneself the honor and glory due to God alone. Proud persons do not think it necessary to ask forgiveness because they do not admit their sinful condition. This attitude toward God finds expression in one's attitude toward others, often causing people to have a low estimate of the ability and worth of others and therefore to treat them with either contempt or cruelty. Some have considered pride to be the root and essence of sin. Others consider it to be sin in its final form. In either case, it is a grievous sin.

“Boasting” can be committed only in the presence of other persons (1 John 2:16; James 4:16). “Haughtiness” or “arrogance” measures self as above others (Mark 7:23; Luke 1:51; Rom. 1:30; 2 Tim. 3:2; James 4:6; 1 Pet. 5:5). This word refers primarily to the attitude of one's heart. First

Timothy 3:6; 6:4; and 2 Tim. 3:4 use a word literally meaning “to wrap in smoke.” It emphasizes the plight of the one who has been blinded by personal pride.

Pride may appear in many forms. Some of the more common are pride of race, spiritual pride, and pride of riches. Jesus denounced pride of race (Luke 3:8). The parable of the Pharisee and the publican was directed at those guilty of spiritual pride, the ones “who trusted in themselves that they were righteous and looked down on everyone else” (Luke 18:9 HCSB). James 1:10 warns the rich against the temptation to be lifted up with pride because of their wealth. Gerald Cowen PRIESTHOOD OF BELIEVERS Christian belief that every believer has direct access to God through Jesus Christ and that the church is a fellowship of priests serving together under the lordship of Christ.

The concept of priesthood is integral to both the OT and the NT and is fulfilled in Christ as Mediator and great high priest. The foundation of the priestly ministry is found in the OT where the priestly ministry is assigned to the Aaronic line of descent and the tribe of Levi (Exod. 40:13, Num. 1:47-54). According to the OT model, the priest fulfilled a representative function—entering the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement and making a sacrificial offering on behalf of the people.

This representational role was fulfilled by Christ, whose offices as Prophet, Priest, and King describe His accomplished and continuing work. As mediator, Christ fulfilled the representational role to which the Aaronic priesthood pointed. The letter to the Hebrews explains this fulfillment by describing Jesus Christ as the “great high priest” who, having accomplished His mediatorial work of substitutionary atonement, has now passed through the heavens (Heb. 4:14).

Christ's death on the cross is described as a priestly act that once for all paid the penalty for our sin. As priest, Christ did not take the blood of a representative animal into the Holy of Holies but instead entered “the greater and more perfect tabernacle” and shed His own blood to obtain “eternal redemption” (Heb. 9:11-12 HCSB).

Now that Christ has fulfilled the representational role of the priesthood, and since He is the one mediator between God and men (1 Tim. 2:5), there is no continuing need or role for a human priest. No longer does a human priest stand to represent other humans before God.

As the people of God, the church is now a “royal priesthood” (1 Pet. 2:9), ministering together in the name of Christ. Though we do not represent one another before the Father, believers are called to pray for one another, to encourage each other to good works, and to call one another to holiness.

Central to the doctrine of the priesthood of believers is the concept of the gathered church, or Congregationalism. Each church is comprised of believers who have been redeemed by Jesus Christ and now serve as priests together. In its purest sense this doctrine refers to believers gathered together under the lordship of Christ, not to individual believers standing alone. The doctrine does, however, rightly affirm that we need no human priest to stand between the individual believer and God. As mediator, Jesus Christ alone fulfills that role.

A graphic illustration of this was provided when the great veil in the temple separating the holy of holies from the larger temple was torn from top to bottom. Similarly, the Apostle Paul described Christ's atonement as breaking down the barriers that had separated and segregated persons by race and gender in the temple (Eph. 2:14-16).

As priests together, Christians are to offer “spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ” (1 Pet. 2:5). These spiritual sacrifices replace any notion of representational or sacramental ministrations. The doctrine of the priesthood of believers thus affirms the right of every believer to fellowship with God through Christ, and the obligation of every believer to be a fully functioning member of a congregation, exercising Christian discipleship among the fellowship of other believer-priests.

PRIESTHOOD OF CHRIST That work of Christ in which He offers Himself as the supreme sacrifice for the sins of humankind and continually intercedes on their behalf. See Atonement; Christ, Christology; Jesus Christ; High Priest.

PRIESTS Personnel in charge of sacrifice and offering at worship places, particularly the tabernacle and temple.

Functions Priesthood in the OT primarily involved sacrificing at the altar and worship in the shrine. Other functions were blessing the people (Num. 6:22-26), determining the will of God (Exod. 28:30), and instructing the people in the law of God (Deut. 31:9-12). This instruction included the application of the laws of cleanness (Lev. 11-15). Some of these functions, like blessing and teaching, would not be reserved for priests alone, but sacrificing and the use of the Urim and Thummim were theirs exclusively.

If the main characteristic of priesthood was sacrificing, the office is as old as Abel. Noah sacrificed and so did Abraham and the patriarchs. We may say that they were family priests. Jethro, the priest of Midian, brought sacrifices to God and worshiped with Moses, Aaron, and the elders of Israel (Exod. 18:12). God promised that Israel, if it were faithful, would be “a kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (Exod. 19:6). This may have meant that Israel was called to mediate God's word and work to the world—to be a light to the nations (Isa. 42:6).

Later, when God purposed to establish the nation, He chose Moses to organize the army, to set up a system of judges, to build a house of worship, and to ordain priests to serve therein. The formal priesthood goes with the formal worship of an organized nation of considerable size. On Mount Sinai God gave Moses instructions to build the tabernacle. On the mount God told Moses to appoint Aaron and his four sons to serve as priests, that is, to serve at the altar and in the sanctuary (Exod. 28:1,41). Their holy garments are prescribed in detail, and their consecration ritual is given in chapters 28-29. As to the work of these priests, most of Leviticus and some of Numbers and Deuteronomy give details. Aaron and his descendants of the tribe of Levi served in the tabernacle and temple as priests. Members of the tribe of Levi not related to Aaron assisted the priests but did not offer sacrifices. Priests were supported by offerings, and Levites were supported by tithes (Num. 18:20-24). PRINCE More frequently designates the position and authority of a ruler, not just the limited sense of a male heir of a sovereign or noble birth (see Zeph. 1:8, which distinguishes princes and king's sons). KJV used “prince” as a title for Israel's king (1 Sam. 13:14), a leading priest (1 Chron. 12:27), a Midianite tribal chief (Num. 25:18), the leading men of a city or province (Gen. 34:2; 1 Kings 20:15; Jer. 34:19), and for rulers in general (Matt. 20:25; 1 Cor. 2:6,8). By extension “prince” applies to supernatural beings. “Prince of Peace” (Isa. 9:6), “Prince of life” (Acts 3:15 KJV), and “Prince and a Savior” (Acts 5:31) are messianic titles. Daniel 8:25 refers to God as “Prince of princes.” Daniel 12:1 gives Michael, the angelic advocate of Israel, the title “prince.” Satan is often described as “the prince of this world” (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11; cp. Matt. 9:34; 12:24; Eph. 2:2).

PRINCE OF LIFE Word translated as “prince” (Acts 3:15; 5:31, “author” and “leader” respectively in some modern versions) is also translated as “captain” (Heb. 2:10; “pioneer” or “author” in some modern versions) and “author” (Heb. 12:2; “pioneer” in modern versions). All of these references are to Jesus as the founder of a new life that His followers now share with Him.

PRINCESS Two Hebrew constructions are translated “princess.” 1. “Daughter of a king.” Solomon's 700 wives were princesses married to seal political ties with their fathers (1 Kings 11:3). Lamentations 1:1 pictures the reversal of Jerusalem's fortune in the image of a princess turned servant. 2. Feminine form of the common word for leader or ruler applied to a king's wife (Ps. 45:13 NIV, NRSV) and to the leading women of Judah (Jer. 43:6 NRSV). See Prince.

PRINCIPALITIES Supernatural spiritual powers, whether good or evil. Principalities were created by and are thus subject to Christ (Col. 1:16). Neither principalities nor any other force can separate a believer from God's love found in Christ (Rom. 8:38).

PRISON GATE KJV designation for a gate in Jerusalem (Neh. 12:39). Modern translations refer to the Gate of the Guard or Guardhouse Gate. The gate is perhaps identical with the Miphkad (Muster) Gate (Neh. 3:31).

PRISON, PRISONERS Any place where persons accused and/or convicted of criminal activity are confined and the persons so confined or captured in war.

Old Testament Imprisonment as a legal punishment is not a feature of ancient law codes. The Mosaic law allowed for a place of custody until the case was decided (Lev. 24:12; Num. 15:34), but beginning only in the Persian period the Bible mentions incarceration as a penalty for breaking the religious law (Ezra. 7:26).

Prisons mentioned in the OT were under the control of the crown. Joseph was put in a royal prison in Egypt (Gen. 39:20), apparently attached to the house of the captain of the guard (40:3). Asa of Judah (2 Chron. 16:10) and Ahab of Israel (1 Kings 22:26-27) made use of prisons, probably associated with the palace. The experience of Jeremiah, however, provides the most interesting glimpses of prisons and prison life. The royal prisons were apparently not large, as the one in which Jeremiah was initially placed was a converted private house (Jer. 37:15). He was confined to an underground dungeon (Jer. 37:16), perhaps a converted cistern. Jeremiah later was placed under house arrest in the “court of the guard” (Jer. 37:20-21). There he was available for consultation with the king (Jer. 38:14,28), able to conduct business (Jer. 32:2-3,6-12), and able to speak freely (Jer. 38:1-4). Because the latter enraged the princes, Jeremiah was confined for a time to a muddy cistern in the “court of the guard” (Jer. 38:4-13).

Persons were confined in royal prisons for offending the king (Gen. 40:1-3), perhaps by political intrigue. In Israel prophets were jailed for denouncing royal policy (2 Chron. 16:10), predicting ill of the king (1 Kings 22:26-27), and suspected collaboration with the enemy (Jer. 37:11-15). Political prisoners in Assyrian and Babylonian prisons included former kings of rebellious nations (2 Kings 17:4; 24:15; 25:27; Jer. 52:11). Samson became a prisoner in a Philistine prison (Judg. 16:21). Prisoners of war were usually either killed or enslaved.

The lot of prisoners was pitiable, sometimes consisting of meager rations (1 Kings 22:27) and hard labor (Judg. 16:21). In some cases prisoners were restrained and tortured by the stocks or collar (2 Chron. 16:10; Jer. 29:26). Jehoiachin was clothed in special prison garments in Babylon (2 Kings 25:29). Prison life became a symbol of oppression and suffering (Ps. 79:11), and release from prison provided a picture of restoration or salvation (Pss. 102:20; 142:7; 146:7; Isa. 61:1; Zech. 9:11-12).

New Testament In NT times persons could be imprisoned for nonpayment of debt (Matt. 5:25-26; Luke 12:58-59), political insurrection and criminal acts (Luke 23:19,25), as well as for certain religious practices (Luke 21:12; Acts 8:3). For some of these offenses, public prisons were also employed (Acts 5:18-19). John the Baptist was arrested for criticizing the king (Luke 3:19-20) and seems to have been held in a royal prison attached to the palace (Mark 6:17-29). Later Peter was held under heavy security, consisting of chains, multiple guards, and iron doors (Acts 12:5-11).

Paul, who imprisoned others (Acts 8:3; 22:4; 26:10), was often in prison himself (2 Cor. 11:23). His experiences provide the most detail on prisons in the NT world. In Philippi he and Silas were placed under the charge of a lone jailer, who “put them into the inner prison and secured their feet in the stocks” (Acts 16:23-24 HCSB). Excavations at Philippi have uncovered a crypt revered by early Christians as the prison and adorned with frescoes depicting Paul and Silas in Philippi. If the identification is correct, the crypt's small size eliminates any doubt that when Paul and Silas sang hymns, “the prisoners were listening to them” (Acts 16:25 HCSB). Perhaps the crypt, originally a cistern, served only as the “innermost cell” (Acts 16:24) for maximum security or solitary confinement. In Jerusalem Paul was held in the barracks of the Roman cohort (Acts 23:16-18). After his transfer to Caesarea, he was confined with some freedom in the headquarters of Roman procurators and was allowed to receive visitors (Acts 23:35; 24:23). As he and other prisoners were transferred to Rome by ship, Paul was again given some freedom (Acts 27:1,3); but when shipwreck became imminent, the soldiers resolved to kill them all lest they should escape (27:42-43). While awaiting trial in Rome, Paul remained under constant guard in a kind of house arrest (28:16-17,30), met his own expenses, and was free to receive visitors and preach the gospel “with full boldness and without hindrance” (28:31 HCSB). Paul considered his imprisonment as for Christ (Eph. 3:1; 4:1; Phil. 1:13-14; Philem. 1,9).

Interior of the Mamertinum in Rome, the prison where tradition says both Peter and Paul were held prior to their executions.

The situation for prisoners remained dismal in NT times, and concern for such persons is a virtue expected by Christ of every disciple (Matt. 25:36,39,43-44). It is Satan who will be imprisoned during the millennium (Rev. 20:1-3,7).

PRIZE Award in an athletic competition. Paul used the image to illustrate the goal of the Christian life (Phil. 3:14; cp. 1 Cor. 9:24). The prize is sometimes identified as Paul's heavenly destination. More likely the “upward call” designates the total call to Christian maturity. The larger context uses multiple expressions (know Christ, 1 Cor. 2:8,10; gain Christ, 2:8; know the power of Christ's resurrection; share Christ's suffering and death, 2:10) to define the goal of Christian living. Though Paul used a competitive image, he was aware that the righteousness which matters was not the result of his own efforts but is God's gift through faith (3:9).

PROCONSUL Office in the Roman system of government. Proconsuls oversaw the administration of civil and military matters in a province. They were responsible to the senate in Rome. The NT refers to two proconsuls: Sergius Paulus in Cyprus (Acts 13:7) and Gallio in Achaia (Acts 18:12; cp. Acts 19:38). See Rome and the Roman Empire.

PROCORUS (Prōk' o rūś) (NIV) See Prochorus.

PROCURATOR Roman military office that developed into a powerful position by NT times. They had control over entire countries under the Roman system. The procurator could issue death warrants (a privilege often withheld from subject peoples) and have coins struck in his name. Three procurators are named in the NT: Pilate (Matt. 27:2; some question whether Pilate was a procurator), Felix (Acts 23:24), and Festus (Acts 24:27). See Rome and the Roman Empire.

PRODIGAL SON This term is used both as the title of Jesus' parable in Luke 15:11-32 and a description of the younger son's lifestyle. English translations do not use the term prodigal to describe this lifestyle but describe it by saying that he “wasted” or “squandered” his inheritance in “wild” or “loose” living. Unfortunately this title, focusing on the younger son, causes one to miss the point that both Jesus and Luke are making. The parable should be called “The Parable of the Gracious Father,” for he is the character who occurs in both halves of the story and is the main character of the parable. In addition, the parable's main point comes from the conversation between the older son and the father, through which Jesus defends the offer of salvation that God makes to the tax collectors and sinners (and other prodigals like them) and condemns the Pharisees and scribes for their opposition to this offer of mercy (Luke 15:1-2).

PROMISE God's announcement of His plan of salvation and blessing to His people, one of the unifying themes integrating the message and the deeds of the OT and NT.

Promise Embraces Both Declaration and Deed God's promise begins with a declaration by God; it covers God's future plan for not just one race but all the nations of the earth. It focuses on the gifts and deeds that God will bestow on a few to benefit the many. We may define God's promise this way: the divine declaration or assurance made at first to Eve, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and then to the whole nation of Israel that: (1) He would be their God, (2) they would be His people, and (3) He would dwell in their midst. The blessing of land and of growth as a nation as well as the call to bless the nations was part of the promise to Abraham. Added to these words of assurance were a series of divine actions in history. These words and deeds of God began to constitute the continuously unfolding divine plan by which all the peoples and nations of the earth would benefit from that day to this.

The OT did not use a specific Hebrew word for “promise.” It used quite ordinary words to encapsulate the pivotal promise of God: speak, say, swear. However the NT does use both the noun “promise” (51 times) and the verb (11 times).

“Promise” in these references can denote either the form or the content of those words. They could refer either to the words themselves as promissory notes on which to base one's confidence for the future, or they could refer to the things themselves which were promised. Since God's one promise-plan was made up of many specifications, the plural form of “promises” appears 11 times in the NT. Nevertheless, the singular form was greatly predominant.

Varying Formulations of the Promise in the Old Testament In Gen. 1-11 the promise of God is represented by the successive “blessings” announced both in the creative order and on the human family—even in spite of their sin. The promise of blessing, therefore, was both introductory to the promise and part of the promise itself.

The Promise and the Patriarchs For the fathers of Israel (Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob), we may speak of the promise in the singular even though it announced three significant elements. Each of the three elements is incomplete without the support of each other and without being interlocked into one promise-plan.

This triple promise included: (1) the promise of a seed or offspring (an heir; Gen. 12:7; 15:4; 17:16,19; 21:12; 22:16-18; 26:3-4,24; 28:13-14; 35:11-12), (2) the promise of land (an inheritance; Gen. 12:1,7; 13:17; 15:18; 17:8; 24:7; 26:3-5; 28:13,15; 35:12; 48:4; 50:24) (3) the promise of blessing on all the nations (a heritage of the gospel; Gen. 12:3; 18:18; 22:17-18; 26:4; 28:14).

To demonstrate the eternity and one-sidedness in the gracious offer of God, only God passed between the pieces in Gen. 15:9-21 thus obligating Himself to fulfill His promises without simultaneously and similarly obligating Abraham and the subsequent beneficiaries of the promise.

The Promise and the Law The promise was eternal, Abraham's descendants had to transmit the promise to subsequent generations until the final Seed, even Jesus the Messiah, came. They had to do more. God expected them to participate personally by faith. Where faith was present, already demands and commands were likewise present. Thus Abraham obeyed God and left Ur (Gen. 12:1-4) and walked before God in a blameless way (Gen. 17:1). His obedience to God's “requirements,” “commands,” “decrees,” and “laws” (Gen. 26:5 NIV) was exemplary.

The law extended these demands to the entire life of the people all the while presupposing the earlier promises as the very basis, indeed, as the lever by which such demands could be made (Exod. 2:23-25; 6:2-8; 19:3-8; 20:2). The Apostle Paul will later ask whether the promises have nullified the law (Rom. 3:31). He answered, “Absolutely not! On the contrary, we uphold the law” (Rom. 3:31 HCSB).

The monarchy, prematurely founded by the whims of a people who wished to be like the other nations, received a distinctive role through God's promise. A lad taken “from the pasture” (2 Sam. 7:8 NIV) would be given a name equal to “the greatest men of the earth” (2 Sam. 7:9 NIV); indeed, his offspring would be seated at God's “right hand” (Ps. 110:1) and inherit the nations (Ps. 2:8). The Promises and David

The Promise and the New Covenant The new covenant of Jer. 31:31-34 both repeats many of the elements and formulas already contained in the previously announced promise-plan of God and adds several new features. The new promise still contains the law of God, only now it will be internalized. It still pledges that God will be their God, and they will be His people. It still declares that He will forgive their sins and remember them no more. However, it also adds that it will no longer be necessary to teach one's neighbor or brother; for everyone, no matter what their station in life, will know the Lord.

In spite of Israel's future loss of its king, its capital, its temple, and its former glory, God would fulfill His ancient promises by founding new promises on “the former things [foretold] long ago” (Isa. 48:3). He would send His new David, new temple, new Elijah, new heavens and new earth—but all in continuity with what He had pledged long ago.

The New Testament Enlarges the Ancient Promises The NT promises may be gathered into these groups. The first, and most frequent, are the references to God's promises to Abraham about the heir he was to receive, even Jesus Christ (Rom. 4:13-16,20; 9:7-9; 15:8; Gal. 3:16-22; 4:23; Heb. 6:13-17; 7:6; 11:9,11,17). A second major grouping may be made around David's seed and the sending of Jesus as a Savior “according to the promise” (Acts 13:23,32-33 HCSB; 26:6). Perhaps we should connect with this group the gift of “the promise of life in Christ Jesus” (2 Tim. 1:1 HCSB), the “promise of the eternal inheritance” (Heb. 9:15), and the promise that “He Himself made to us: eternal life” (1 John 2:25). This promise is what was promised “by faith in Jesus Christ” (Gal. 3:22).

The third major group is the gift of the Holy Spirit. The promises appear after our Lord's resurrection (Luke 24:49; Acts 2:33,38-39).

There are other subjects related to God's promise: rest (Heb. 4:1); the new covenant with its prospect of an eternal inheritance (9:15); the new heavens and new earth (2 Pet. 3:13); the resurrection (Acts 26:6); the blessing of numerous descendants (Heb. 6:14); the emergence of an unshakable kingdom (12:28); and Gentiles as recipients of the same promise (Eph. 2:11-13).

The Promise Has Some Notable Differences from Prophecy While much of the promise doctrine is also prophetic in that it relates to the future, there are some notable differences between promise and prophecy. (1) Promises relate to what is good, desirable, and that which blesses and enriches. Prophecy, however, also may contain notes of judgment, destruction, and calamity when people and nations fail to repent. (2) Promises ordinarily implicate the entire human race in their provisions whereas prophecies more typically are aimed at specific nations, cultures, or peoples. (3) Promises deliberately have a continuous fulfillment for generation after generation while prophecies invoke promise when they wish to speak to the distant future. (4) The promise of God is unconditional while most prophecies are conditional and have a suppressed “unless” or “if” you repent attached to their predictions of judgment. (5) The promise of God embraces many declarations of God (“very great and precious promises,” 2 Pet. 1:4), whereas prophecies are usually directed to more specific events and particular individuals.

The promise-plan of God, then, is indeed His own Word and plan, both in His person and His works, to communicate a blessing to Israel and thereby to bless all the nations of the earth.

PROPHECY, PROPHETS Reception and declaration of a word from the Lord through a direct prompting of the Holy Spirit and the human instrument thereof.

Old Testament Three key terms are used of the prophet. Ro'eh and hozeh are translated as “seer.” The most important term, navi', is usually translated “prophet.” It probably meant “one who is called to speak.”

History Moses, perhaps Israel's greatest leader, was a prophetic prototype (Acts 3:21-24). He appeared with Elijah in the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1-8). Israel looked for a prophet like Moses (Deut. 34:10).

Prophets also played a role in the conquest and settlement of the promised land. The prophetess Deborah predicted victory, pronounced judgment on doubting Barak, and even identified the right time to attack (Judg. 4:6-7,9,14). Samuel, who led Israel during its transition to monarchy, was a prophet, priest, and judge (1 Sam. 3:20; 7:6,15). He was able to see into the future by vision (3:11-14) and to ask God for thunder and rain (12:18). Samuel led in victory over the Philistines (1 Sam. 7), and God used him to anoint kings. Gad and Nathan served as prophets to the king. Elijah and Elisha offered critique and advice for the kings. The prophets did more than predict the future; their messages called Israel to honor God. Their prophecies were not general principles but specific words corresponding to Israel's historical context.

Similarly the classical or writing prophets were joined to history. Israel's political turmoil provided the context for the writing prophets. The Assyrian rise to power after 750 B.C. furnished the focus of the ministries of Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah. The Babylonian threat was the background and motive for much of the ministry of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The advent of the Persian Empire in the latter part of the sixth century set the stage for prophets such as Obadiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. Thus the prophets spoke for God throughout Israel's history.

The prophets influenced almost every institution of Israel, despite the fact that they were often viewed with contempt; they were locked up (Jer.

37), ignored (Isa. 6:9-13), and persecuted (1 Kings 19:1-2). In addition to serving judges and kings, the prophets also addressed Israel's worship. They criticized vain worship (Amos 5:23-24) and priestly failures (Amos 7:10; Mal. 2). The word of the Lord was also spoken in worship (Pss. 50:5; 60:6; 81:6-10; 91:14-16; 95:8-11). The prophets' call to covenant faithfulness revealed an awareness of the law (Isa. 58:6-9; Ezek. 18; Mic. 6:6-8; Hos. 6:6; Amos 2:4; 5:21-24).

Prophets formed guilds or schools (2 Kings 4:38; 1 Sam. 10:5; 19:20). While most references to prophetic schools belong to the period of the monarchy, there is some evidence to believe the schools continued (Jer. 23:13-14). The mere existence of the books of prophecy is probably due in part to the prophets' helpers (Jer. 36:4). Perhaps their words were recorded because they provided a moral challenge to the entire nation and not merely to a king or individual. Surely once the prophet's words were written, they were not ignored but continually studied and reapplied.

The Experience of the Prophet Prophets generally shared several key experiences and characteristics. (1) An essential mark of a prophet was a call from God. Attempting to prophesy without such a commission was false prophecy (Jer. 14:14). The prophets were at times allowed to see into the throne room or heavenly court (Isa. 6:1-7; 1 Kings 22:19-23; Jer. 23:18-22; cp. Amos 3:7; Job 1:6-12; 2:1-6; 2 Cor. 12:1-4; Rev. 1:1-3; 22:18-19). (2) Prophets received a word from God through many means—direct declarations, visions, dreams, or an appearance of God. The great variety in prophetic experience prohibits any oversimplification; ecstatic experiences were not mandatory for receiving God's word. (3) Prophets spoke the word of God. They were primarily spokespersons who called His people to obedience by appealing to Israel's past and future. For example, God's past blessing and future judgment should provoke social justice and mercy for the disadvantaged. (4) Prophets relayed God's message by deed as well as by word. They worked symbolic acts that served as dramatic, living parables. Hosea's marriage taught about God's relationship with Israel (Hos. 2:1-13; Isa. 20:1-3; Ezek. 4:1-3; Jer. 19:10-11). (5) The prophets also performed miracles that confirmed their message. While some prophets like Moses (Exod. 4:1-9) and Elijah (1 Kings 17) worked many miracles, virtually all prophets occasionally saw a miraculous fulfillment of God's word (Isa. 38:8). This miracle-working capacity also included healing (1 Kings 17:17-22; 2 Kings 5; Matt. 12:22-29). (6) Prophets also conveyed the word of God by writing (Isa. 8:1; Ezek. 43:11). (7) Prophets were to minister to their people. They were to test God's peoples' lives (Jer. 6:27) and be watchmen for moral compromise (Ezek. 3:17). Particularly important was the role of intercessor—sometimes even for the prophet's enemy (1 Kings 13:6; 17:17-24; 2 Kings 4:18-37; Amos 7:2; Jer. 14:17-20,21; Isa. 59:16). (8) Throughout Israel's history genuine prophets had ecstatic experiences.

False Prophets Distinguishing between false and true prophets was very difficult, though several tests of authenticity emerge in the OT. The true prophet must be loyal to the biblical faith directing one to worship Yahweh alone (Deut. 13:1-3). A second test required that the words of a true prophet be fulfilled (Deut. 18:22; Jer. 42:1-6; Ezek. 33:30-33). We must remember that this is a difficult test to apply. There were often long lapses between predictions and fulfillment (Mic. 3:12; Jer. 26:16-19). Some predictions seemed very unlikely, and others were conditional—based upon the hearer's response (Jon. 3:4-5). Furthermore, prophets could behave inappropriately (Num. 12:1-2; 20:1-12; Jer. 15:19-21; 38:24-27). Prophets appeared ambivalent at times when simply delivering the word of God as it was given (2 Kings 20:1-6). Also one could predict correctly while not being loyal to Yahweh (Deut. 13:1-3). Accurate prediction was not a final test. Other tests included agreement with previous prophets' words (Jer. 28:8), good character (Mic. 3:11), and a willingness to suffer because of faithfulness (1 Kings 22:27-28; Jer. 38:3-13). Similarly, the NT believers had to distinguish true prophecy (1 John 4:1; 1 Cor. 14:29). See False Prophet

Hints for Interpretation Prophets intended to evoke faith by proclamation, not merely to predict the future. Thus reading the prophets with a lustful curiosity is inappropriate. Our primary desire must be to know God, not just the facts of the future.

The interpreter must remember the limited perspective of the prophet. The prophets were not all knowing but all telling—that is, they told what God had told them to tell. Prophecy has a progressive character. One must seek to read prophecy in light of its whole, deriving partial insight from different prophets. Prophecy must also be read in its historical context. Particular attention must be paid to the intention of the prophet. For example, a prophet may rebuke another country to offer assistance to Israel (Isa. 46-47), make Israel examine its own conduct (Amos 1-2), or bring a nation to repentance (Jon. 3:4,8-9).

Caution must be exercised when reading predictive prophecy because prophecy often has more than one fulfillment. Many prophecies have an immediate application to their own situation and are also applicable to another context. Thus the prediction that Christ is born of a virgin (Matt. 1:23) also had a fulfillment in Isaiah's day (Isa. 8:3). Similarly prophecies of "the day of the Lord" had several fulfillments (partial) which also foreshadowed a final fulfillment (Obad. 15; Joel 1:15; 2:1; Zeph. 1:7,14; Ezek. 30:3; cp. 2 Pet. 3:10).

Modern evangelicals understand predictive prophecies in several ways. (1) Some prophecies seem to have a direct, literal fulfillment: the Messiah was to be born in Bethlehem (Matt. 2:5-6; Mic. 5:2). (2) Not all predictions were fulfilled literally. Jesus taught that the prediction about Elijah's return was fulfilled by John the Baptist and not a literal Elijah (Matt. 11:13-15; Mal. 3:1-4). Similarly, Paul applied prophecies about literal, national Israel to the church (Rom. 9:25-26; Hos. 1:9-10; 2:23). The literal father of Israel, Abraham, was seen to be the father of the believing church (Rom. 4:11,16; Gal. 3:7). This distinctively Christian reading was thought to be legitimate because of Christ's fulfillment and interpretation of the OT (Luke 4:17-21). (3) This Christian reading of the OT often takes the form of typological interpretation. The NT authors believed OT events, persons, or things foreshadowed the later Christian story. Thus they used the images of the OT to understand the NT realities. Christ can be compared to Adam (1 Cor. 15:22-23; 10:11). (4) Some readers believe that OT words take on a "fuller sense" or meaning. Old Testament expressions may have a divine significance, unforeseen by the OT author, which comes to light only after God's later word or deed. See Typology.

New Testament The word prophetes means “to speak before” or “to speak for.” Thus it refers to one who speaks for God or Christ. Prophets were also called “pneumatics” (pneumatikos), “spiritual ones” (1 Cor. 14:37). The prophets played a foundational role in the early church (1 Cor. 12:28-31; Eph. 4:11; 2:20). Due to the presumed prophetic silence in the time between the Testaments, the coming of Jesus is seen as an inbreaking of the Spirit's work especially visible in prophecy. For example, in Luke the angel's visitation and prediction (1:11,26-27) provoked Mary and Zechariah to prophesy (1:46-79). After an angelic visitation to the shepherds, the prophet and prophetess declared Jesus to be the redemption Israel awaited (2:10-12,25,36-38). John the Baptist also predicted that Jesus would baptize in the Spirit (Matt. 3:11).

Jesus called Himself a prophet (Luke 13:33). His miracles and discernment were rightly understood as prophetic (John 4:19). He taught not by citing expert rabbis but with His own prophetic authority (Mark 1:22; Luke 4:24).

The early believers saw the outpouring of the Spirit (Acts 2:17) as a fulfillment of Joel's prediction that all God's people, young and old, male and female, would prophesy. These gifts may intensify at the end of time as will evil. While any Christian might occasionally receive a prophecy, some seem to have a special gift of prophecy (1 Cor. 12:29; 13:2). Prophets function primarily in the worship of the church (Acts 13:2). They predict (Acts 11:28; 20:23; 27:22-26), announce judgments (Acts 13:11; 28:25-28), act symbolically (Acts 21:10-11), and receive visions (Acts 9:10-11; 2 Cor. 12:1). Prophetic insights led to missionary efforts (Acts 13:1-3; 10:10-17; 15:28,32). While teaching and prophecy are different, they also can be related (Acts 13:1-2; Rev. 2:20). Some prophets “preached” lengthy messages (Acts 15:32) and gave exposition to biblical texts (Luke 1:67-79; Eph. 3:5; Rom. 11:25-36).

The prophets used phrases such as “the Lord says” or “the Holy Spirit says” as introductory formulas for prophetic insight into the future (Acts 21:11) or for inspired adaptation of an OT text (Heb. 3:7).

New Testament prophecy was limited (1 Cor. 13:9); it was to be evaluated by the congregation (1 Cor. 14:29; 1 Thess. 5:20-21). One may even respond inappropriately to prophecy (Acts 21:12). The supreme test for prophecy is loyalty to Christ (1 Cor. 12:3; Rev. 19:10). Some Christians have the gift of discernment (1 Cor. 12:10). Jesus said prophets could be known by their fruit (Matt. 7:15-20). Paul demanded orderly, Christ-honoring, upbuilding prophecy that submits to apostolic authority (1 Cor. 14:26-40). Thus prophecy is not without restraint. Circumstance may even demand that the dress of men and women prophets be stipulated (1 Cor. 11:5-7). Prophecy outside of apostolic authority can be safely ignored; thus prophecy is not a threat to Scripture's special authority (1 Cor. 14:38-39; 2 Tim. 3:16; 2 Pet. 1:20-21).

PROPHETESS 1. Female prophet; women serving as God's spokesperson. Five women are explicitly identified as prophetesses: Miriam (Exod. 15:20), Deborah (Judg. 4:4), Huldah (2 Kings 22:14), Noadiah, a "false" prophetess (Neh. 6:14), and Anna (Luke 2:36). Jezebel claimed to be a prophetess (Rev. 2:20). The ministries of prophetesses varied greatly. Miriam called upon Israel to celebrate God's deliverance. Deborah combined the offices of prophetess and judge, even accompanying Barak into battle. Huldah spoke God's words of judgment (2 Kings 22:16-17) and forgiveness (22:18-20) to King Josiah. Anna shared the good news of Jesus' birth with the temple crowds. The false prophetess Noadiah sought to frighten Nehemiah. Jezebel attempted to involve the church of Thyatira in idolatry. The Prophet Joel anticipated a time when all God's people, "male servants and female servants," would be filled with God's Spirit and prophecy (Joel 2:28-29). This prophetic hope was fulfilled at Pentecost (Acts 2:17-18) and in the ongoing life of the early church (Acts 21:9). Paul encouraged all believers to desire to prophesy (1 Cor. 14:1), that is, to offer speech which builds up the church (14:5). First Corinthians 11:5 presumes women were involved in prophesying and prayer in public worship. 2. The wife of a prophet (Isa. 8:3). See Prophet.

PROSELYTES Converts to a religion; non-Jews who accepted the Jewish faith and completed the rituals to become Jews. The NT attests to the zeal of the first-century Pharisees in proselytizing Gentiles (Matt. 23:15). The success of the Jewish missionary efforts is indicated by synagogue and grave inscriptions referring to proselytes and by Roman and Jewish literary references. Tacitus (History V.5) complains, for example, that proselytes despised the gods, disdained their kindred, and abjured their fatherland.

Gentiles were impressed by three features of Judaism. First, the concept of one God who created, sustains, and rules all things was clearly superior to polytheistic views. Second, Judaism stressed a lifestyle of moral responsibility with its monotheism. Third, it was a religion of ancient and stable tradition in contrast to the faddish cults of the time.

Proselytes usually embraced Judaism gradually because much needed to be learned, such as the proper observance of the Sabbath and the careful following of the dietary rules, before one could win acceptance into the Jewish community. Persons attracted to Judaism and keeping the Sabbath and food laws were termed fearers or worshipers of God. These terms appear in the NT where Cornelius (Acts 10:1-2) and Lydia (Acts 16:14) are so described (John 12:20; Acts 17:4; 18:7). Many God fearers went on to become proselytes or fully accepted and integrated members of the Jewish community. This involved fulfilling the Jewish demands of circumcision (males) which related one to the covenant (see Gal. 5:3), baptism (males and females) which made one ritually clean, and an offering (males and females) in the Jerusalem temple which atoned for sin. See God Fearer.

PROSTITUTION Trading of sexual services for pay. It is the result of a double standard whereby men insist on the sexual purity of their wives and daughters, while desiring access to other women. This dynamic is seen clearly in Gen. 38. Judah, thinking that his daughter-in-law Tamar was a prostitute, had intercourse with her; but upon hearing that she was pregnant as the result of “playing the harlot,” he demanded that she be burned. Hosea criticized the attitude which called for the punishment of prostitutes (and women committing adultery) while tolerating the men with whom these acts were committed (Hos. 4:14). Because of this double standard, the prostitute or harlot, as she is also called, has had an ambiguous status in society. She was tolerated in ancient Israel—as long as she was not married—but her profession was not socially acceptable. The children of harlots suffered from social biases against them (Judg. 11:2).

Although the OT records no laws prohibiting men from visiting prostitutes and making use of their services, there are strong counsels against such behavior (Prov. 23:27-28; 29:3). The apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus gives similar warnings (9:3-9; 19:2).

The Holiness Code prohibited Israelite fathers from turning their daughters into prostitutes (Lev. 19:29), which might have been a temptation during times when poverty was widespread. It may be that most prostitutes in Israel were foreign or Canaanite women. That would help explain why the book of Proverbs speaks of the harlot literally as a “strange” and “foreign” woman (translated in the RSV as “loose woman,” “evil woman”) (Prov. 2:16; 5:3; 6:24).

Jesus told the religious leaders of His day that harlots would go into the kingdom before they would (Matt. 21:31) not because He condoned prostitution but because harlots did not have the self-righteousness which kept the religious leaders from repentance. Paul reminded Corinthian Christians that their bodies were the temple of the Holy Spirit; therefore, they should refrain from immorality, including sexual relations with prostitutes (1 Cor. 6:15-20).

The term “cult prostitution” is frequently used to refer to certain practices in Canaanite fertility cults, including the cult of Baal. This practice and the beliefs on which it was based were incompatible with monotheism and with the nature of Israel's God. The terms qadash (masc.) and qedeshah (fem.), from the word meaning “holy,” are generally translated “cult prostitute” (or “sodomite”). The masculine term is probably also used in a generic sense to refer to both male and female cult prostitutes. Such prostitutes functioned in the temple in Jerusalem at various times in Israel's history and were removed during periods of religious reform (1 Kings 14:24; 15:12; 22:46; 2 Kings 23:7). Cult prostitution is outlawed by the Deuteronomic law code (Deut. 23:17-18). See Fertility Cult.

The presence of both “secular” and “cult prostitutes” provided the prophets with a powerful metaphor for the unfaithfulness of the people toward God. The covenant was imaged as a marriage between the Lord and the people; their continual interest in other gods, especially Baal, was seen as a form of harlotry. This idea is graphically presented in Ezek. 16 (cp. Ezek. 23). Because the Lord's bride has become a harlot, she will be punished as a harlot. Hosea also attacked the Israelite attraction to the fertility religion of Canaan as harlotry. He felt called of God to marry a harlot (Hos. 1:2), a symbolic action (or object lesson) representing God's relationship with Israel. Hosea's love for his unfaithful and harlotrous wife was analogous to God's love for unfaithful Israel.

The book of Revelation applies the image of harlot to Rome, which is likened to a woman in scarlet and jewels, to whom the kings of the earth go (Rev. 17:1-6). See Harlot.

PROVERBS, BOOK OF The book of Proverbs contains the essence of Israel's wisdom. It provides a godly worldview and offers insight for living. Proverbs 1:7 provides the perspective for understanding all the proverbs: “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge; fools despise wisdom and instruction.” “Fear of the LORD” is biblical shorthand for an entire life in love, worship, and obedience to God.

Date and Composition Though the title of Proverbs (1:1) seems to ascribe the entire book to Solomon, closer inspection reveals that the book is composed of parts and that it was formed over a period of several hundred years. It is difficult to know precisely the role Solomon and his court may have had in starting the process that culminated in the book of Proverbs.

This process may be compared to the way psalms of Davidic authorship eventually led to the book of Psalms. In Israel wisdom was considered Solomonic almost by definition. Thus the titles in 1:1 and 10:1 are not strictly statements of authorship in the modern sense. See Apocrypha, Wisdom of Solomon; Ecclesiastes, Book of; Song of Songs.

Proverbs as a collection of collections that grew over time is best seen from its variety of content and from its titles. These titles introduce the book's major subcollections and are found in 1:1; 10:1; 22:17 (“words of the wise”); 24:23; 25:1; 30:1; 31:1. For dating, 25:1 places the copying or editing of chapters 25-29 in the court of Hezekiah, thus about 700 B.C., some 250 years after Solomon. The process of compilation probably extended into the post-exilic period.

Because wisdom writings have almost no historical references, they are very difficult to date. Most scholars place chapters 10-29 sometime in the period of kings. Chapters 1-9 are in a different genre (see below) from the Solomonic sayings of chapters 10:1-22:16, and their date is disputed. Some say it may be as early as Solomon. Others say it is post-exilic, that chapters 1-9 were added to 10-29 to give later readers a context from which to understand the short sayings in the latter chapters. The date of chapters 30-31 is also uncertain. One scholar has argued there is a play on the Greek word for wisdom (sophia) in 31:26. This would date chapter 31 after the conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C.

Literary Character and Forms The book of Proverbs uses a variety of wisdom forms or genres. The Hebrew word for proverb (mashat), found in the book's title, can refer to a variety of literary forms beside the proverb: prophetic “discourse” (Num. 23:7,18), “allegory” (Ezek. 17:2; 24:3), “taunt song” (Mic. 2:4). Different sections of the book specialize in characteristic forms. Long wisdom poems, which scholars call “Instructions” after their Egyptian counterpart, dominate 1:8-9:18. These usually begin with a direct address to “son/children” and contain imperatives or prohibitions, motive clauses (reasons for actions), and sometimes narrative development (7:6-23). The setting of these instructions may be a school for young aristocrats.

This section also contains public speeches by personified Wisdom (1:20-33; 8:1-36; 9:1-6).

“Sayings” which express wise insights about reality are the primary forms in 10:1-22:16 and 25:1-29:27. Sayings are characterized by extreme brevity. In Hebrew they usually have two lines with only six to eight words in contrast to their much longer English translations. These sayings may simply “tell it like it is,” and let readers draw their own conclusions (11:24; 17:27-28; 18:16). They can also make clear value judgments (10:17; 14:31; 15:33; 19:17). Mostly “antithetical sayings,” which contrast opposites, appear in 10:1-15:33, but mixed in are a few “better...than” sayings (“Better is a meal with vegetables where there is love than a fattened calf with hatred,” 15:17 HCSB; cp. v. 16) which are also scattered in other sections (16:8,19; 17:1; 19:1; 21:9; 25:24; 27:5,10b; 28:6). The section 25:1-25:27 is especially rich in comparative proverbs which set two things beside one another for comparison: “Good news from a distant land is like cold water to a parched throat,” (25:25 HCSB; cp. 25:12-14,26,28; 26:1-3,6-11,14,20 among others). Such sayings also occur elsewhere, “A beautiful woman who rejects good sense is like a gold ring in a pig's snout” (11:22).

“Admonitions” characterize 22:17-24:34. Similarity with Egyptian wisdom marks this section. These short wisdom forms contain imperatives or prohibitions, usually followed by a motive clause which gives a reason or two for doing that which is being urged: “Don't move an ancient property line, and don't encroach on the fields of the fatherless, for their Redeemer is strong, and He will take up their case against you” (23:10-11 HCSB). Admonitions are a shorter relative of the instruction.

The words of Agur (chap. 30) specialize in numerical sayings (30:15-31). The epilogue of the book (31:10-31) presents an alphabetic poem on wisdom embodied in the “valiant woman.” This brief sketch of wisdom forms presents only the basic types. Even within the types here presented, a great deal of subtle variation occurs.

Themes and Worldview In spite of being a collection of collections, Proverbs displays a unified, richly complex worldview. Proverbs 1-9 introduces this worldview and lays out its main themes. The short sayings of Proverbs 10-31 are to be understood in light of the first nine chapters.

The beginning and end of wisdom is to fear God and avoid evil (1:7; 8:13; 9:10; 15:33). The world is a battleground between wisdom and folly, righteousness and wickedness, good and evil. This conflict is personified in Lady Wisdom (1:20-33; 4:5-9; 8; 9:1-6) and Harlot Folly (5:1-6; 6:23-35; 7; 9:13-18). Both “women” offer love and invite simple young men (like those in the royal school) to their homes to sample their wares. Wisdom's invitation is to life (8:34-36); the seduction of Folly leads to death (5:3-6; 7:22-27; 9:18).

Mysteriously Lady Wisdom speaks in public places, offering wisdom to everyone who will listen (1:20-22; 8:1-5; 9:3). Wisdom does not hide but stands there for all who seek her. Some scholars consider Wisdom to be an attribute of God, especially shown in creation (3:19-20; 8:22-31). More accurately stated, however, Wisdom is “the self-revelation of creation.” That is, God has placed in creation a wise order that speaks to mankind of good and evil, urging humans toward good and away from evil. This is not just the “voice of experience” but God's general revelation that speaks to all people with authority. The world is not silent but speaks of the Creator and His will (Pss. 19:1-2; 97:6; 145:10; 148; Job 12:7-9; Acts 14:15-17; Rom. 1:18-23; 2:14-15).

This perspective eliminates any split between faith and reason, between sacred and secular. The person who knows God also knows that every inch of life is created by God and belongs to Him. Experiences of God come only from experiences in God's world. Experiences in the world point the person of faith to God.

Thus the wise person “fears God” and also lives in harmony with God's order for creation. The sluggard must learn from the ant because the ant's work is in tune with the order of the seasons (Prov. 6:6-11; cp. 10:5).

Thinking Proverbially The short proverbs in chapters 10-29 cover a wealth of topics from wives (11:22; 18:22; 25:24) to friends (14:20; 17:17-18; 18:17; 27:6), strong drink (23:29-35; 31:4-7), wealth and poverty, justice and injustice, table manners and social status (23:1-8; cp. 25:6-7; Luke 14:7-11).

One cannot just use any proverb on any topic, for proverbs can be misused: “A proverb in the mouth of a fool is like lame legs that hang limp” (Prov. 26:7 HCSB; cp. v. 9). Proverbs are designed to make one wise, but they require wisdom to be used correctly. Proverbs are true, but their truth is realized only when they are fitly applied in the right situation. Job's friends misapplied proverbs about the wicked to righteous Job. Many things have more than one side to them, and the wise person will know which is which. Wives can be a gift from the Lord (18:22), but sometimes singleness seems better (21:9,19). Silence can be a sign of wisdom (17:27) or a cover-up (17:28). A “friend” (Hb. rea^c) can be trusted (17:17) but not always (17:18; “neighbor” = rea^c)!

Wealth can be a sign of God's blessing (3:9-10), but some saints suffer (3:11-12). Wealth can result from wickedness (13:23; 17:23; 28:11; cp. 26:12). It is better to be poor and godly: “Better a little with righteousness than great income with injustice” (16:8 HCSB; cp. 15:16-17; 17:1; 19:1; 28:6). In the end God will judge: “The one who shuts his ears to the cry of the poor will himself also call out and not be answered” (21:13 HCSB; cp. 3:27-28; 22:16; 24:11-12; 10:2; 11:4).

The problem of fittingness is most sharply put in 26:4-5:

“Don't answer a fool according to his foolishness, or you'll be like him yourself.

Answer a fool according to his foolishness, or he'll become wise in his own eyes” (HCSB).

Such dilemmas force us to confront the limits of our wisdom (26:12) and to rely upon God (3:5-8).

Proverbs generally operate on the principle that consequences follow acts: you reap what you sow. In a fallen world, however, God's justice is sometimes delayed. The “better...than” proverbs, in particular, show the disorder of the present world, the “exceptions to the rule.” The righteous thus works and prays, like the psalmist, for the day when God will make all things right.

Outline

- I. Proverbs Is Designed to Impart Divine Wisdom Concerning Life (1:1-6).
- II. Wisdom's Contribution to Life Is to Be Praised (1:7-9:18).
 - A. The goal of all wisdom is that people “fear...the LORD” (1:7).
 - B. Wisdom identifies sin and calls sinners to repentance (1:8-33).
 - C. Wisdom enables the sinner to be set free and experience meaningful life (2:1-22).
 - D. Wisdom produces a sense of divine presence, joy, and peace in the believer (3:1-26).
 - E. Wisdom admonishes believers to share God's love with others (3:27-35).
 - F. Wisdom helps a father instruct his son how to obtain a meaningful life (4:1-27).
 - G. Wisdom calls for purity and honesty in all marriage relationships (5:1-23).
 - H. Wisdom admonishes the believer to work hard and spend wisely (6:1-19).
 - I. Wisdom warns against the peril of adultery (6:20-7:27).
 - J. Through divine wisdom God offers Himself to humankind (8:1-36).
 - K. Wisdom presents us with two choices, life or death (9:1-18).
- III. One's Response to Wisdom Brings about Earthly Consequences (10:1-22:16).
 - A. The righteous find blessings, but the wicked suffer greatly (10:1-32).
 - B. The deceitful pay a terrible price, but the honest find God's favor (11:1-31).

- C. The righteous are open to instruction, but the wicked are not (12:1-28).
 - D. The righteous are obedient to God's will; however, the wicked rebel (13:1-25).
 - E. The foolish will be judged, but the righteous will be accepted by God (14:1-35).
 - F. The Lord watches over all humankind and judges each accordingly (15:1-33).
 - G. The Lord is the fountain of life for the faithful (16:1-33).
 - H. The foolish thrive on bribery, but the wise are honest yet merciful (17:1-28).
 - I. The foolish are haughty, but the righteous are humble (18:1-24).
 - J. The poor are to be pitied, but the wealthy are honored by God (19:1-29).
 - K. The wise work hard and treat both friend and foe with love (20:1-30).
 - L. God requires holy lives and not just holy rituals (21:1-31).
 - M. The wise discipline themselves to follow God in everything (22:1-16).
- IV. Wisdom Provides Prudent Counsel for Both the Present and the Future (22:17-24:34).
- A. Wisdom tells one when to speak and when to be silent (22:17-21).
 - B. The wise ones care for and protect the poor (22:22-29).
 - C. Wisdom warns one not to fall into the trap of another's craftiness (23:1-11).
 - D. Youth need instruction and correction to become what they should be (23:12-28).
 - E. The drunkard destroys his life and that of others (23:29-35).
 - F. Wisdom leads to a meaningful life, but wickedness leads to destruction (24:1-9).
 - G. The wise ones steadfastly trust God in both the good and bad times (24:10-22).
 - H. Wisdom promotes true justice (24:23-34).
- V. Wisdom Constantly Reminds People of Their Past Heritage (25:1-29:27).

- A. The king shares in the responsibility for promoting wisdom (25:1-14).
 - B. The righteous exercise self-discipline and love in all of life (25:15-28).
 - C. The foolish fail the test of life and face God's judgment (26:1-28).
 - D. Life's quest for meaning is brief and frustrating at times (27:1-22).
 - E. People should learn to live as responsible stewards (27:23-27).
 - F. God expects justice from His followers (28:1-28).
 - G. Discipline is an essential part of life (29:1-27).
- VI. The True Source of Meaningful Existence Can Be Found Only in God (30:1-31:31).
- A. Human beings cannot fully discover or understand God's wisdom (30:1-33).
 - B. Humans can practice righteousness and show loving-kindness (31:1-9).
 - C. The key to meaningful existence is found in one's faith relationship to God (31:10-31).

PROVIDENCE God's benevolent and wise superintendence of His creation. Of this superintendence, the Westminster Confession of Faith (1647) states, “God, the great Creator of all things, doth uphold, direct, dispose, and govern all creatures, actions, and things, from the greatest even to the least, by his most wise and holy providence, according to his infallible foreknowledge and the free and immutable counsel of his own will, to the praise of the glory of his wisdom, power, justice, goodness, and mercy.” As this indicates, God—from whom nothing is hidden (cp. Pss. 33:13-15; 139:1-16; Isa. 40:27-28) and whose power is surpassingly great (cp. Job 42:2; Jer. 32:17)—wisely oversees and sovereignly controls all creation. In so doing He attends not only to apparently momentous events and people but also to those that seem both mundane and trivial. Thus, while He holds the lives of both kings and nations in His hand (cp. Isa. 40:21-26; Jer. 18:1-6), God also concerns Himself with the welfare of the lowly and meek (cp. Pss. 104:10-30; 107:39-43). Indeed, so all encompassing is God's attention to events within creation that nothing—not even the casting of lots—happens by chance (cp. Prov 16:33).

With regard to God's role in the course of earthly events, one must avoid the error of Deism on the one hand and that of fatalism on the other. Deism is the view that God created the universe as a sort of colossal machine, set in motion according to various natural laws (which, perhaps, He Himself established), and now simply sits back and watches events unfold in accordance with those laws. The view that God occasionally intervenes in earthly affairs is itself a version of Deism. And, since God involves Himself in everything that happens, Deism is false.

Fatalism is the view that every event that happens had to happen. So, on the fatalist's view, anything that happens is unavoidable in the sense that it could not have failed to happen. Since it implies that one could do nothing other than what one actually does and thus that one has no real choice—or control—over what one does, such a view undermines personal responsibility. And, since Scripture clearly indicates that humans do face real choices and are in general responsible for their actions (cp. Deut. 30:11-20), fatalism is false.

So, while Deism unbiblically minimizes God's role in the course of history, fatalism unbiblically minimizes human responsibility for human actions. To be true to the biblical witness, one's account of providence must provide both for the very active role which God plays in directing events toward ends which He chooses and for the responsibility which humans have for the way in which they contribute toward those ends. So, for instance, God uses the actions of Joseph's brothers to bring him to Egypt (cp. Gen. 37:12-28; 45:1-8; 50:15-21) as well as the actions of the religious leaders in Jerusalem to bring about Christ's death (cp. Matt. 26:1-5,47-68; 27:1-26; John 18:1-19:16; Acts 2:22-24). But, while God worked through their actions for His own purposes, this does not negate the responsibility of either Joseph's brothers or those religious leaders for those actions.

An important corollary of providence is divine foreknowledge. Since He sovereignly directs whatever happens, God has complete knowledge of those events yet to occur (cp. Isa. 42:8-9). In short, God never need revise His plans in light of some surprising or unexpected event. His knowledge of the future extends even to what His creatures will choose to do in ages yet to come. Of course, this raises two potentially troubling questions: First, if God foreknows what a creature will choose to do at some point in the future, does it not follow that the creature could not have failed to make that choice and thus is not responsible for making it? Second, if God controls history to such an extent that He foreknows the future in every detail, does this not mean that He could have foreseen—and thus could have forestalled—the evil in the world? The former question gives rise to what is known as the problem of freedom and foreknowledge, the second to the problem of evil.

Perhaps the best known response to the problem of freedom and foreknowledge involves the suggestion—made by Augustine, Boethius, and others—that God exists timelessly (i.e., He exists “outside” of time) and thus suffers no temporal limitations. On this suggestion, what is future from a merely human point of view is present from the divine point of view. Thus, for those who take this suggestion seriously, God's timeless knowledge of one's future actions does not make one any less able to refrain from doing them than does the knowledge of an observer in the present time.

In response to the problem of evil, a couple of points deserve mention. First, given God's character, it must be that He has good reasons for allowing the evil that He allows. Second, in response to Job's questions about his own suffering, God points out to Job that he is in no position to understand His reasons for allowing him to suffer (cp. Job 38:1-7; 40:6-14). Job resembles a baby in need of surgery who faces suffering for which he cannot understand the reasons. So, while God presumably has good reasons to allow evil, no mere human can presume even to be able—let alone actually—to understand those reasons. Even so, like the parent of the baby needing surgery, God can—and does—make His love evident even in the midst of evil and suffering. Of course, in making Himself known, He has promised one day to conquer evil (cp. 1 Cor. 15:24-28) and to eliminate pain and sorrow (cp. Rev. 21:3-4). Thus, in His providence, God ultimately will deliver His people from evil.

Still, it would be a mistake to think that the only comfort to be found in providence involves the blessed hope of the new heaven and earth. For, of course, God now works for the good of those who love Him (cp. Rom. 8:28) and invites them to cast their cares upon Him (cp. 1 Pet. 5:6-7) in faith that He will provide (cp. Matt 6:26-33). PROVINCE Roman political region. During NT times there were three types of provinces. Imperial districts were governed directly by the emperor. Senatorial provinces answered to the senate. Special type provinces were those composed of rugged terrain or newly conquered people. These demanded more strict control and were under the control of an imperial procurator. Judea was a special province because the Jews so fiercely hated the Roman domination.

Israel practiced a type of provincial system during Ahab's reign (1 Kings 20:14-15). Later the Babylonians and Persians used such districts in Palestine (Esther 4:11). The Romans refined the system dramatically and used it to maintain control over their vast empire. See Government; Rome and the Roman Empire.

PROVOCATION In Heb. 3:8,15 that which aroused God's anger. Provocation corresponds to the place-name "Meribah," meaning "contention" (Exod. 17:1-7; Num. 20:1-13; Ps. 95:7-11; Heb. 3:7-11). See Massah.

PSALMIST Writer of psalms or hymns. Second Samuel 23:1 calls David the “sweet psalmist of Israel.” Superscriptions ascribe about one half of the psalms to David. See David; Psalms, Book of.

PSALMS OF SOLOMON See Pseudepigrapha.

PSALMS, BOOK OF The Hebrew title of the book means “praises.” The English title (Psalms) comes from the Septuagint, the ancient Greek translation of the Hebrew Old Testament. The Greek word psalmoi means “songs,” from which comes the idea, “songs of praises” or “praise songs.”

The individual psalms of the book came from several authors. David, the sweet psalmist of Israel (2 Sam. 23:1), wrote approximately half of the 150 psalms in the book. David's psalms became the standard followed by others, thereby, imprinting a Davidic character to the entire book. Other authors include Asaph (12), the sons of Korah (10), Solomon (two), Moses (one), Heman (one), and Ethan (one). Approximately 48 psalms are anonymous.

The book of Psalms contains individual psalms covering a thousand-year period from the time of Moses (15th century B.C.) to the post-exilic period (fifth century B.C.). Most of the psalms were written in the time of David and Solomon (1010-930). The final editor of the work was probably Ezra (450).

The titles or superscriptions to the psalms are very old, and the author of the psalm, in many cases, may have written the title. The obscure words and phrases of the titles and the absence of titles with certain psalms (the rabbis refer to these psalms as “orphan” psalms) strongly suggest the reliability and antiquity of the titles. If later scribes were arbitrarily adding these, why not add them to all without obscurities?

Outline Traditionally the book has been divided into five sections corresponding to the five books of Moses, each section ending with a doxology (Book 1, Psalms 1-41; Book 2, Psalms 42-72; Book 3, Psalms 73-89; Book 4, Psalms 90-106; Book 5, Psalms 107-150). These divisions may suggest that the “books” were independent for a time. (Note that Pss. 14 and 53 are very similar and occur in different “books.”) Some psalms also may be grouped according to their function; for example, the Songs of Ascent (120-134) were probably sung by Israelites on their way to the three required feasts in Jerusalem. Another group of psalms (93; 96-99) celebrate the Lord's divine sovereignty over the universe.

Scholars have debated the forms and classifications of individual psalms for centuries. The book of Psalms contains hymns (145-150), laments (38-39), songs of thanksgiving (30-32), royal psalms (2; 110), enthronement psalms (96,98), penitential psalms (32; 38; 51), and wisdom or didactic psalms (19; 119).

A lament can be expressed by the community (e.g., 44; 74; 79) or the individual (22; 38; 39; 41; 54). Both types of laments are prayers or cries to God on the occasion of distressful situations. Differences are related to the types of trouble and the experiences of salvation. For the community the trouble may be an enemy; with an individual it may be an illness. The basic pattern includes an invocation of God, a description of the petitioner's complaint(s), a recalling of past salvation experiences (usually community laments), petitions, a divine response (or oracle), and a concluding vow of praise.

The thanksgiving psalms are also spoken by the community (106; 124; 129) and the individual (9; 18; 30). These psalms are related to the laments as they are responses to liberation occurring after distress. They are expressions of joy and are fuller forms of the lament's vow of praise.

The hymn (8; 19; 29) is closest in form to a song of praise as sung in modern forms of worship. These psalms are uniquely liturgical and could be sung antiphonally; some have repeating refrains (Ps. 8; 136). The hymn normally includes a call to praise. Then the psalm describes the reasons for praising God. The structure is not as clear-cut as other types of psalms.

Some psalms are considered royal psalms (2; 18; 20). These psalms are concerned with the earthly king of Israel. Again, these are usually understood as mixed psalms. They were used to celebrate the king's enthronement. They may have included an oracle for the king. In some cases (such as Ps. 72), prayers were made to intercede on behalf of the king.

Another mixed type is the enthronement psalms that celebrate Yahweh's kingship (Pss. 96-99). They are closely related to the hymns; the main difference is a celebration of Yahweh as king over all creation.

expressions of contrition and repentance. The psalmist pleads to be restored to a right relationship with God (Pss. 38; 51). Penitential psalms are

A final type of psalm is the wisdom psalm. This type has poetic form and style but is distinguished because of content and a tendency toward the proverbial. These psalms contemplate questions of theodicy (73), celebrate God's Word (the Torah, Ps. 119), or deal with two different ways of living—that of the godly person or the evil person (Ps. 1).

As the mixed psalms indicate, the psalms are not neatly or easily categorized. However, identification helps the reader to know what type of psalm is being read, with a possible original context or a fitting present context in worship. See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

These classifications, however, should not be taken too strictly. They are not rigid molds. The genuine religious feelings and expressions found in the Psalms may at times intersect with many of these classifications, or even transcend these classifications. A few psalms (25; 34; 37; 111; 112; 119; 145) are acrostically arranged according to the Hebrew alphabet, probably to aid in memorizing the psalm.

Interpreting the Psalms The Psalms represent the devout and inspired meditations of the heart upon God's law and His providential works. In fact, they are the religion of the OT internalized in the heart and life of the believer. They have always been, as divinely intended, the model and pattern of acceptable worship and devotion to God, both privately and publicly. Although other psalms or songs are found in the Bible (for example, the Song of Moses in Deut. 32:1-43), they were not intended for Israel's permanent worship in the temple. The book of Psalms, therefore, has appropriately been known as the hymnbook of Israel and, of course, the church for many centuries. As the inspired hymnbook, the Psalms expand and develop the OT. The law is expanded by bringing forth the true spiritual application of the law to the heart of the individual and, at times, by interpreting significant events and practices in the law. Similarly, the Psalms at times interpret events in the historical books, furnishing spiritual insights and responses to many situations of life. The book of Psalms illuminates the writings of the prophets by showing the dangers of separating outward ritual (such as sacrifice) from true inward devotion and worship.

The book of Psalms covers a wide range of theological topics. Monotheism is clearly affirmed: idols are man's creation without power (115; 96). God's existence and attributes are frequently affirmed (omniscience and omnipotence, 139; righteousness and truth, 86; goodness, 103; holiness, 99): atheism, theoretical, and practical, is wickedness and foolishness (14; 53). The revelation of God in nature and in His Word is the theme of 19 and 119. The Lord's covenant relationship with His people is stressed in 89; 105; and 68. Man's natural sinfulness is affirmed in 51. The importance of repentance and restoration is the subject of 51; 32; 6; 143; 38. Although the evildoer may prosper at times, the righteous will be with God here and hereafter (37; 1). Moreover, the Lord will fulfill His promises, and, as the refuge of His people, He will deliver His people (40; 2). Perhaps one of the more controversial theological topics of the Psalter is the imprecatory prayer (35; 69; 109; 137). These prayers seek divine justice against the enemies of God (who are also the enemies of the writer) for wrongs and crimes committed. These prayers are not expressing individual revenge and vindictiveness; they are pleas for God to execute righteous justice, similar to certain prayers of the NT (Matt. 11:25; 2 Tim. 4:16; Rev. 6:10).

Most importantly, the Psalms focus on the Messiah, the hope and fulfillment of all Israelite history and religion. The Messianic teachings of the psalms are woven throughout the book. Messiah is often found, therefore, when human limits are removed or when man is represented in an ideal state (2; 8). When the Lord appears or comes in relations to man, He does so in the person of the Son (102; 97). Moreover, Messiah is often seen typologically through the experiences of David and Solomon (22), with the language sometimes going beyond the types and applying directly and exclusively to Messiah (Pss. 16:10; 110). The Psalms refer to Messiah's incarnation (Ps. 40; Heb. 10:5), His humiliation and exaltation (Ps. 8; Heb. 2:5-10), His eternal throne (Ps. 45; Heb. 1:8-9), His sufferings (Ps. 22; Matt. 27), His resurrection (Ps. 16; Acts 2:24-31), and His offices as prophet, priest, and king (Ps. 110). See Typology.

The book of Psalms has been a source of instruction, comfort, and blessing for the people of God by teaching His people how to worship, serve, and glorify God forever.

PSEUDEPIGRAPHA (sū dē pī' grā phá) Intertestamental literature not accepted into the Christian or Jewish canon of Scripture and often attributed to an ancient hero of faith. Ongoing discovery and research provide differing lists of contents. A recent publication listed 52 writings. They give much information about the development of Jewish religion and culture.

Pseudepigraphal Books Pseudepigrapha means “writings falsely attributed.” This is based on those books claiming to be written by Adam, Enoch, Moses, and other famous OT people. Some of the writings are anonymous; thus some scholars prefer the name “outside books” for all of these writings, emphasizing that they did not become part of canon. Some ancient Christians and the Roman church have used the term “Apocrypha,” since for them what Protestants call “Apocrypha” is part of their canon. See Apocrypha.

Both Palestinian and Hellenistic Jews authored books in the Pseudepigrapha. They used a variety of styles and literary types—legend, poetry, history, philosophy—but apocalypse was the dominant literary type. A review of the most important and representative books will show the significance of the Pseudepigrapha in understanding the background of the NT. See Apocalyptic.

First Enoch has been preserved in the Ethiopic language. It is a composite work of five sections, written at different times. The first section (chaps. 1-36) tells how Enoch was taken up into heaven and shown its secrets. The sons of God of Gen. 6 were seen as angels. They committed sin, and the children born to them were evil giants. Emphasis is placed upon judgment and punishment. Even the realm of the dead is divided into separate places for the righteous and the wicked. The second section (chaps. 37-71) is the most important for its relation to the Bible. It is the Parables or Similitudes. These chapters refer to the Son of Man. Opinions differ as to how such references form part of the background to the NT teachings about Jesus as the Son of Man. There is uncertainty about the date of this section and of chapters. The rest of the book comes from between 200 and 1 B.C., but the Similitudes may have been written later, shortly before A.D. 100. Fragments of all the other sections have been found in the caves of Qumran, but no fragments of this section have been discovered yet. The third section (chaps. 78-82) deals with the heavenly bodies. The author argues for a calendar based on the movement of the sun in distinction to the standard Jewish lunar calendar. The fourth section (chaps. 83-90) contains two dream visions dealing with the flood and the history of Israel from Adam to the Maccabean revolt. The final section (chaps. 91-108) gives religious instruction concerning the end time. The entire book is apocalyptic.

Second Enoch is also an apocalypse preserved primarily in the Slavonic language. It was written between 100 B.C. and A.D. 100. In it Enoch was taken up into heaven and commanded to write 366 books. He was allowed to return to earth for 30 days to teach his sons, after which he returned to heaven. This writing describes the contents of the seven heavens and divides time into seven one-thousand-year periods.

Second Baruch is apocalyptic and shows how some Jews responded to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70. It was written shortly before A.D. 100. Three visions seek to console the people by showing that even though destruction has come, God has prepared something better for them. The writings teach that the Messiah will be revealed to bring in a time of great plenty. Emphasis is placed on obedience to the Law.

The Sibylline Oracles were very popular apocalyptic writings in the ancient world. The Jews took over the originally pagan writings and modified them by inserting ideas about monotheism, Mosaic requirements, and Jewish history. Three of the 15 books in the collection are missing. Book 3, from between 200 and 100 B.C., is the most important and the most Jewish. It traces Jewish history from the time of Abraham to the building of the second temple. It pronounces God's judgment upon pagan nations but holds out hope that they may turn to God.

The Testament of Moses (sometimes called the Assumption of Moses) is also apocalyptic. The manuscripts are incomplete, and the missing portion may have contained an account of Moses' death and his being taken to heaven. Early Christian writers state that Jude 9 was to be found in the Assumption of Moses known to them. This book is a rewriting of Deut. 31-34. Moses is the chosen mediator of God, prepared from the beginning of time. The book traces the history of the people from their beginning to the author's own time. Since chapters 6 and 7 seem to refer to Herod the Great, the book was probably written shortly after A.D. 1. It emphasized that God has planned all things and keeps them under His control.

The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs are patterned after Gen. 49, the closing instructions of Jacob to his sons. Each of the sons of Jacob addressed his descendants, giving a brief survey of his life, with special attention to some sin or failure. For example, Reuben stressed his adultery with Bilhah (Gen. 35:22), and Simeon told of his jealousy of Joseph. Joseph, however, emphasized the maintaining of his purity. Using the confessed sin as a background, patriarchs urged their children to live in an upright manner. Special emphasis is given to love for the neighbor and sexual purity. In most of the testaments, the children are told to give honor to Levi and Judah. The book refers to two messiahs: one from Levi, one from Judah. The earliest portions of the testaments come from after 200 B.C.

The Book of Jubilees is a rewriting of Genesis and the opening chapters of Exodus from after 200 B.C. It traces the history of Israel from creation to the time of Moses, dividing time into jubilee periods, 49 years each. The calendar is based on the sun, not the moon. The writer strongly opposed the Gentile influences he found coming into Judaism urging Jews to keep separate from the Gentiles. In the Book of Jubilees, Abraham was the ideal righteous man. The book shows how a conservative, priestly Jew about 150 B.C. viewed the world.

The Psalms of Solomon is a collection of 18 psalms written about 50 B.C. They reflect the situation of the people in Jerusalem following its capture by the Romans under Pompey in 63 B.C. Psalms of Solomon 17 and 18 are of special importance because of their references to the Messiah. According to these psalms, the Messiah was to be a human figure, a descendant of David, wise and righteous, and without sin. The titles Son of David and Lord Messiah are used of Him.

Third Maccabees, written after 200 B.C., has nothing to do with the Maccabees. It tells about the attempt of Ptolemy IV to kill the Jews in Egypt. God foiled his efforts resulting in the advancement of the Jews. This book shows the vindication of the righteous.

Fourth Maccabees is based to some extent upon material found in 2 Maccabees 6-7. It is a philosophical writing stressing that pious reason can be the master of the passions. Reason is derived from obedience to the law. In the account of the seven sons who are martyred, the author greatly expanded the account but left out all references to resurrection. The book comes from the time shortly after A.D. 1.

The Life of Adam and Eve has been preserved in both Latin and Greek. The two versions are different in length and content. Blame for the fall is placed upon Eve. Sin entered human experience through her. This writing refers to Satan being transformed into the brightness of angels (9:1; 2 Cor. 11:14), and states that paradise is in the third heaven (cp. 2 Cor. 12:2-3). The Life of Adam and Eve was written after A.D.1.

The Letter of Aristeas was composed after 200 B.C., telling how the OT law was translated into Greek. Actually, it is more concerned about the table conversation at banquets in Alexandria than it is about the translation of the Septuagint. It seeks to show that the Jewish law was in conformity with the highest ideals of Greek thought and life. It indicates that it is possible for Jew and Greek to live together in peace. So far as its account of the translation of the Law into Greek is concerned, its only historical validity is that it was at this time (during the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 285-246 B.C.) that this translation was begun. See Apocalyptic; Apocrypha; Bible Texts and Versions. Clayton Harrop

PSEUDONYMITY Text is pseudonymous when it is not authored by the person whose name it bears. Such works are written after the purported author's death by another person or during his life by someone who is not commissioned to do so. Pseudonymous writings are not the same as anonymous texts. The former works make definite claims to authorship; the latter do not.

Many critical scholars believe that pseudonymity exists in the OT (e.g., Daniel) and the NT (e.g., the Pastoral Epistles). Several pseudonymous writings are certainly present outside the canon of Scripture (e.g., 1 Enoch, 4 Ezra, 3 Corinthians, the Epistle to the Laodiceans, and the Gospel of Peter). Evidence is lacking, however, to support the presence of such works in the Scriptures.

To promote the idea that pseudonymity exists within the canon, critics appeal to Greco-Roman (the Pythagorean and Cynic schools) and Jewish sources. Some pseudonymity seems to have been customary in such settings (cp. Iamblichus, de Vita Pythagorica § 198, 158). Authors of no reputation would often write using the pseudonym of an older, reputable figure in order to secure a hearing for their own works.

Specific attributions of authorship were not typically found within ancient Jewish writings. Nonetheless, pseudonymity can be found among the Jews. The phenomenon occurred mostly in apocalyptic writings after 200 B.C. and arguably was due to a general belief that prophetic inspiration had ceased (cp. Josephus, Against Apion 1.41; Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin 11a).

Jewish literature is generally not very helpful to a study of pseudepigrapha in early Christianity. The NT writings most often classified by critical scholars as pseudonymous are epistles. Thus, one should look to Jewish epistolary literature to establish a precedent. Only two pseudonymous letters have come down to us from Jewish sources: the Letter of Aristeas and the Epistle of Jeremiah. The former work, strictly speaking, is not a letter because it does not occur in epistolary form. It is an apologetic narrative providing an account of the translation of the Hebrew OT into Greek. The latter writing, a sermon warning the Jews against pagan idolatry, calls itself a letter and identifies its senders and addressees, but purports to be a copy of an epistle. Thus, it is not entirely comparable to NT epistles. Other pseudonymous Jewish letters exist (e.g., 1 Baruch, 2 Baruch 78-87, 1 Enoch 92-105, and some letters contained in 1 and 2 Maccabees), but such writings occur within composite, apocalyptic, or narrative frameworks. These letters had a different form and function than NT epistles and are not relevant to the latter.

Nonetheless, some pseudonymous letters can be found within Christian circles, though these are few in number and unremarkable (e.g., the Letters of Christ and Abgarus, the Letter of Lentulus, the Correspondence of Paul and Seneca, the Epistle of Titus, the Epistle to the Laodiceans, the Epistle of the Apostles, 3 Corinthians, and the pseudo-Ignatian letters). They also do not closely resemble any NT epistles and were written at a much later date.

The NT contains passages that have a tremendous bearing on the question of pseudonymity in early Christianity. For example, in 2 Thess. 2:2 Paul warned the church against accepting the false teaching that “the Day of the Lord has come.” He cautioned his readers that, no matter through what agency they had received this heresy—whether through “spirit, word, or letter”—he and his missionary associates had nothing to do with it. Paul would have objected to a pseudonymous letter being attributed to him that contained falsehood, wrong teaching, or material that he did not write. The apostle clearly puts a moratorium on pseudonymity in his name (cp. 2 Thess. 3:17).

The Pauline signatures in the NT (1 Cor. 16:21; Gal. 6:11; Col. 4:18; 2 Thess. 3:17; Philem. 19) indicated the apostle's use of a secretary and provided readers with a sign of his letters' authenticity and authority. Surely Paul would have frowned upon someone using a facsimile of his signature in a pseudonymous letter which purported to be his.

In Rev. 22:18-19 John warned that no one was to tamper with what he had written in the book by rewriting it in any way. One can extrapolate from this interpretation of these verses to somebody writing another book and falsely attributing it to him by means of pseudonymity. John would have objected to a pseudonymous letter being attributed to him that contained falsehood or material that he did not write. To write a pseudonymous work and attribute it to somebody is a sort of extension of tampering with an existing document. Thus, to enlarge pseudonymously an existing body of literature—for example, the Pauline corpus—by adding a few inauthentic works is to tamper with an author's actual corpus.

The NT also contains several appeals for truth that are difficult to reconcile with the thinking of an author who had deliberately used pseudonymity. For example, in 1 Tim. 4:1-2 Paul warned his readers not to embrace the doctrine of “deceitful spirits” and “the hypocrisy of liars.” In Eph. 4:15 he instructed his readers to speak “the truth in love.” In Eph. 4:25 he exhorted the church to “put away lying” and “speak the truth.” In Col. 3:9 he admonished his readers:

“Do not lie to one another.” Furthermore, the Holy Spirit, who indwells every believer (1 Cor. 6:19; 12:13) and is described as the “Spirit of truth” (John 14:17; 16:3), created an ethos in the Christian community in which pseudonymity would have been frowned upon and could not have flourished. A careful study of the terms for “deception” reveals that a concept of legitimate deception for the NT is difficult to support.

Known early Christian responses to pseudepigrapha do not affirm the practice as acceptable (cp. Tertullian's comments in de Baptismo 17 on the Acts of Paul; Serapion's remarks on the Gospel of Peter recorded in Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History 6.12; the reference in the Muratorian Canon to “forged” Pauline letters, etc.). The language used by early church leaders in reference to pseudonymous works clearly describes them as fraudulent and deceptive. Early Christians simply did not embrace pseudonymous works they viewed in such a pejorative manner. If discovered, they firmly rejected such writings.

Not all critics agree. Some scholars argue that the early church was really only concerned about the content of works and not pseudonymity. However this theory does not explain the exclusion from the church's canon of several pseudonymous writings which were orthodox in their content (e.g., the Preaching of Peter, the Apocalypse of Peter, the Epistle of the Apostles, the Correspondence of Paul and Seneca, the extant Epistle to the Laodiceans, etc.).

Other critics object that the evidence of later Gentile Christian attitudes towards pseudepigrapha is anachronistic and should not be used to judge the first-century Jewish-Christian phenomenon of pseudonymity. However, the fact that the Jews themselves rejected pseudonymous works like 1 Enoch and 4 Ezra from the Hebrew canon helps render the latter theory untenable. Undeniably, second-century orthodox Christians strongly disapproved of pseudonymity, and it is improbable that first-century Christians had a different opinion on the matter.

Even more scholars note that the church's rejection of pseudonymity took place in a period when a great deal of heretical literature attributed to the apostles was circulating. Thus, the latter phenomenon possibly colored the way that orthodox churchmen, who were concerned about heresy, looked at all pseudonymity. However, the early church could conceivably have responded differently—for example, by only screening the content of documents and not their authorship. Notably, the early Christians did no such thing; instead they utilized both standards when recognizing books as inspired of God and canonical.

To be sure, the inspired and inerrant books of the Holy Bible are accurate. They can be trusted to have been written by whom they say they are.

PTOLEMIES (tōl' ə mēz) Dynastic powers which emerged in Egypt in the aftermath of the conquests of Alexander the Great.

Ptolemy I Soter (323-283 B.C.) established the dynasty which bears his name and moved the capital of Egypt from Memphis to Alexandria, the city Alexander founded. He and his successors ruled an empire that included at times Cyrenaica, Palestine, Phoenicia, Cyprus, and some parts of western Asia Minor and the Aegean. Ptolemaic policies brought great wealth to the state through taxation and trade. The Ptolemies did not force Hellenization upon native populations, but the obvious commercial, cultural, and social benefits of Ptolemaic policies led to greater acceptance of Hellenistic ideas and customs. Land was farmed out under state control, and the reserves funneled to the central government. Payment of heavy yearly taxes, however, assured a measure of local autonomy. The Ptolemies introduced a ruler cult, but permitted native religions to continue unimpeded. In addition to Ptolemy I, the most energetic of these rulers were Ptolemy II Philadelphus (282-246 B.C.) and Ptolemy III Euergetes (246-221 B.C.).

The Ptolemies made Alexandria a center of learning and commerce. In particular the early Ptolemies supported a large group of scholars at the famous museum and developed the nucleus of the great library. The Ptolemies founded or refurbished several cities in Palestine and Transjordan giving them Greek names and often endowing them with Greek features. Examples included Acco renamed Ptolemais, Bethshan now termed Scythopolis, and ancient RabbothAmmon refounded as Philadelphia.

Ptolemaic rule directly impacted Jews both inside and outside of Palestine. During the campaigns to secure Palestine for Egypt, Ptolemy I transported large numbers of Jews from Palestine to Alexandria for settlement. This was the beginning of a large and influential Jewish community that prospered by maintaining good relations with the Ptolemies, frequently serving as mercenaries and merchants. Soon Alexandria became a major center of world Jewry. The Alexandrian Jews imbibed Hellenism much more deeply than their counterparts in Judea as evidenced by the need to translate the OT writings into Greek. This translation, known as the Septuagint, probably was begun in the reign of Ptolemy II but was not completed until about 100 B.C.

The forecourt of Ptolemy IX in the temple of Horus, the Egyptian falcon-god, at Edfu in Upper Egypt.

The Ptolemies treated Judea as a temple state given over by the king in trust to the high priest at Jerusalem. Authority in religious and most civil matters was granted the high priest in lieu of a yearly tax.

During the reign of Ptolemy II the first of five wars with the Seleucids over possession of Palestine broke out. Egypt successfully resisted the Seleucid challenge under the first three Ptolemaic rulers. However Ptolemaic power began to wane under Ptolemy IV Philopator (221-204 B.C.), a notorious womanizer. In 200 B.C. Antiochus III defeated the Egyptian army at Banyas (later Caesarea Philippi) and seized control of Palestine. Subsequently the Ptolemaic kingdom declined and increasingly came under the influence of Rome. Cleopatra VII was the last Ptolemaic ruler prior to the annexation of Egypt to Rome in 30 B.C. See Egypt; Intertestamental History and Literature. Thomas V. Brisco

PUA (Pu' a) (KJV, REB, Num. 26:23) See Puvah.

PUAH (Pu' ah) 1. Personal name meaning “girl.” Hebrew midwife who disobeyed Pharaoh's orders to kill male Hebrew infants (Exod. 1:15). 2. Personal name meaning “red dye.” Father of the judge Tola (Judg. 10:1) and an alternate form of Puvah (1 Chron. 7:1).

PUBLICAN Political office created by the Romans to help collect taxes in the provinces. Actually, the title “tax collector” is more correct than the older term “publican” in referring to the lowest rank in the structure. Zacchaeus is called a “chief tax collector” (Luke 19:2 HCSB), probably indicating one who contracted with the government to collect taxes, and who in turn hired others to do the actual work. In NT times people bid for the job of chief tax collector and then exacted the tax plus a profit from the citizens. Most of the offices were filled by Romans, although some natives got the bids. Publicans were held in the lowest esteem because of their excessive profits, being placed in the same category as harlots (Matt. 21:32). Jesus was accused of eating with and befriending them (Matt. 9:11).

PUBLIUS (Pūb' lī ūs) Personal name meaning “pertaining to the people.” The highest official, either Roman or local, on Malta (Acts 28:7-8).

PUDENS (Pū' dēnz) Personal name meaning “modest.” Roman Christian who greeted Timothy (2 Tim. 4:21). This Pudens is sometimes identified with the friend of the Roman poet Martial.

PUL (Pū) 1. Alternate name of the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser III (2 Kings 15:19; 1 Chron. 5:26). The name is perhaps a contraction of Pileser. See Assyria. 2. The Hebrew Pul in Isa. 66:19 is likely a textual corruption of Put.

PULPIT KJV, RSV term for a raised platform (NRSV, REB, NIV, TEV) on which a speaker stood (Neh. 8:4); not a lectern or high reading desk behind which a reader stands.

PULSE General term for peas, beans, and lentils (Dan. 1:12,16). Modern translations read “vegetables.” The Hebrew is literally “things which have been sown,” a designation including grains in addition to vegetables.

PUNITES (Pū nīts) Descendants of Puvah (Num. 26:23). Some manuscripts read “Puvanites” or “Puvites.”

PUNON (Pū' nōn) Place-name meaning “ore pit.” Edomite mining center located at the junction of the Wadi el-Gheweil and Wadi esh-Sheqer on the east side of the Araban about 25 miles south of the Dead Sea. The site was first occupied about 2200 B.C. The second occupation began shortly before the Israelites encamped there about 1200 B.C. (Num. 33:42-43). The site was perhaps home to descendants of the clan chief Pinon (Gen. 36:41). The site is identified with modern Feinan. Two ancient smelting sites, Khirbet en-Nahas and Khirbet Nqeib Aseimer, lie to the north-northeast.

PUR (Pūr) or PURIM (Pū' rīm) See Festivals.

PURAH (Pū' rah) Personal name meaning “beauty” or nickname meaning “metal container.” Gideon's servant (Judg. 7:10-11). KJV used the form Phurah.

PURGATORY Centuries-old dogma of the Roman Catholic Church. The term itself is derived from the Latin purgare, which means “to cleanse” or “to purify.” Several early Christian writers endorse the idea of purgatory, or prayers for the dead (which may not necessarily imply purgatory) to one degree or another (Origen, Cyprian, Ambrose, Tertullian, Jerome, and Augustine). The Council of Lyons in 1274 articulated the doctrine. The Council of Florence in 1439 defined it as both penal and purificatory in nature. In 1563 the Council of Trent recognized the validity of suffrages performed for the benefit of those in purgatory.

According to Roman Catholicism, souls of Christians who die burdened by venial or remitted mortal sins are translated to purgatory, where they undergo a process of cleansing for those sins. It is unclear whether purgatory is a place or a state. The sufferings of those in purgatory vary tremendously in intensity and duration, depending upon the degree to which the baptized but not fully cleansed Christian has sinned. Most agree that those in purgatory are purged by fire, but there is no consensus as to whether the fire is literal or figurative. Regardless of the intensity or duration of one's suffering, purgatory is temporary in nature, until the general resurrection of the dead, although individuals may be delivered from purgatory before then. This is accomplished through the actions of living Christians who perform good works on behalf of the dead. Such works include the Mass, prayers (for the dead), and the giving of alms. Those who are in a state of perfect grace will not need to go to purgatory—they will go immediately to heaven. Others will go immediately to hell. But the majority of the just will spend some time in purgatory, being purified. Related to purgatory there are two additional specialized abodes for the dead. Limbus infantium is reserved for infants who die before baptism. While they do not suffer in purgatory, they are forever denied the beatific vision. Old Testament saints were consigned to Limbus patrum prior to Christ's atoning work, after which they were translated to heaven.

Roman Catholics appeal to Matt. 12:32; 1 Pet. 3:18-20; 4:6; and 1 Cor. 3:15 for biblical support of the dogma. They also appeal to 2 Maccabees 12:38-45 in the OT Apocrypha for support. None of these texts explicitly articulates a doctrine of Purgatory; the doctrine is formed from extrabiblical tradition. Robert Stewart

PURGE To cleanse from impurity, frequently in the figurative sense of cleansing from evil (Deut. 13:5), guilt (Deut. 19:13), idolatrous worship (2 Chron. 34:3), and sin (Ps. 51:7). See Clean, Cleanness.

PURITY, PURIFICATION State of being or process of becoming free of inferior elements or ritual uncleanness. A basic goal of religion is to attain purity before the deity.

Old Testament Flawless The primary Hebrew root word for pure (tahar) often refers to pure or flawless gold (1 Kings 10:21; Job 28:19; Ps. 12:6). Tahar and other Hebrew words for “pure” are used to describe other objects such as salt (Exod. 30:35), oil (Exod. 27:20), and incense (Exod. 37:29). Thus, a basic OT meaning is that of “refined, purified, without flaw, perfect, clean” (cp. Lam. 4:7).

be ritually pure means to be free of some flaw or uncleanness which would bar one from contact with holy objects or places, especially from contact with the holy presence of God in worship. God is the ideal of purity, and those who are to come in contact with God's presence are also to be pure. Hab. 1:13 indicates that God's eyes are too pure to look upon evil.Ritual Purity To

The altar for sacrifice was purified so that it would be prepared for worship (Lev. 8:15; Ezek. 43:26). The objects of gold used in the tabernacle and temple were also pure in this sense; this would be true of the incense in Exod. 37:29. The Levites were to purify themselves for service in the tabernacle (Num. 8:21). When that which was unclean or impure came into contact with that which was holy, danger resulted and could even lead to death. This is probably the background for the preparation made for the theophany, a manifestation of God's presence, in Exod. 19 and for the death of Uzzah when he was unprepared (not purified) to touch the ark of the covenant, a most holy object (2 Sam. 6:1-11). Malachi 1:11-12 contrasts the pure offerings of Gentiles with blemished offerings given by God's people; such a state necessitated purification (Mal. 3:3-4).

Purity qualified one to participate in worship, an activity central to the life of ancient Israel. Breaking that purity was a serious matter. Ritual impurity came as a result of bodily emissions (Lev. 15) by way of disease or menstrual flow or discharge of semen. This chapter also shows that such impurity could be spread by contact, for anything coming into contact with the unclean person had to be purified. Leviticus 12 also discusses impurity associated with childbirth, probably because of the discharge of blood. Blood related to the mysterious power of life, and any loss of blood called for purification. Ritual impurity also came as a result of contact with a corpse since death was an enemy of God (Num. 19). Participation in war could thus cause impurity. Also impurity was brought on by contact with foreign gods. This was probably the background of the need for purification when the people returned from exile in Babylon. The priests and Levites purified themselves first and then the people and then the city gates and wall (Isa. 52:11; Ezra 6:20; Neh. 12:30). This also prepared them for worship.

Ethical Purity Thought and behavior befitting the people of God are pure (Pss. 24:4; 73:1; Prov. 15:26; 22:11; 30:12). Such purity of thought is to result in conduct which is appropriate for people (Ps. 119:9; Prov. 16:2; 20:9,11; 21:8). Notice also the pure prayer of Job 16:17.

Since Pss. 15 and 24 speak of qualifications for worship in terms of ethical purity, it is important not to distinguish sharply between ritual and ethical purity in the OT. God expects ethical purity, and sin results in uncleanness. Thus sin and ritual uncleanness stand together in the OT as unacceptable to the Lord. Their counterparts—ethical and ritual purity—also stand together.

Purification Rituals Since the OT assumes that the people would encounter sin and uncleanness, it provides a way to return to cleanness.

The purification ritual usually started with a waiting period beginning when the cause of the impurity stopped. Less serious causes brought a waiting period of one day. Contact with a corpse (Num. 19:11,14), birth of a male child (Lev. 12:2), the cure of leprosy (Lev. 14:8-9), and other discharges (Lev. 15:13,19,28) brought about a waiting period of seven days. The waiting period after the birth of a girl was 14 days (Lev. 12:5). The same period applied to the quarantine of a suspected leper (Lev. 13:4-6).

A cleansing agent was required: water, blood, or fire (Num. 31:23). Water, the most common purifying agent, symbolized cleansing and was used in the rituals related to a waiting period. The person was to wash the clothes and bathe the body (Lev. 15:7). Blood was used to cleanse the altar and the holy place (Lev. 16:14-19). It was mixed with other ingredients for cleansing from leprosy (Lev. 14) and contact with the dead (Num.19).

The final element of the ritual of purification is sacrifice. Purification from discharges required two pigeons or turtledoves, one for a sin offering and one for a burnt offering (Lev. 15:14-15,29-30). A lamb and pigeon or turtledove were offered after childbirth (Lev. 12:6). Sacrifice in the purification ritual for lepers was quite complicated, indicating the seriousness of leprosy as a cause of impurity (Lev. 14). The priest also touched the person's extremities with blood from the offering and with oil, cleansing and life-renewing agents. The poor were allowed to substitute less valuable animals for use in their sacrifices.

New Testament Most NT uses of words for purity relate to cleanness of some type. Old Testament meanings are often reflected. Perfection is the meaning in Mark 14:3; this is mixed with religious purity in Heb. 10:22; 1 John 3:3.

Ethical purity dominates in the NT. The person who is in right relationship with God is to live a life of purity (2 Tim. 2:21-22; Titus 1:15 and references to a pure heart—Matt. 5:8; 1 Tim. 1:5; Heb. 9:14; James 4:8; 1 Pet. 1:22). Purity is also listed among virtues (2 Cor. 6:6; Phil. 4:8; 1 Tim. 4:12; cp. Mark 7:15).

Purification through sacrifice is also mentioned in the NT and applied to the death of Christ, a purification which does not need repeating and thus is on a higher level than OT sacrifices (Heb. 9:13-14). The sacrifice of Christ brings purification; Christ cleansed as a part of the work of the high priest, and His blood cleanses from sin (1 John 1:7). PURSE KJV translation of a Greek term for a belt, girdle, or waistband (Matt. 10:9; Mark 6:8). Travelers could tuck the loose ends of their garments into such a belt to allow freer movement. The folds of such waistbands were frequently used for storing money. Jesus encouraged His disciples to trust God and depend on the generosity of others as they shared the gospel. See Girdle.

PURSLANE Fleshy-leafed, trailing plant used as a potherb or in salads, which the RSV of Job 6:6 used as an illustration of tasteless food. Other translations follow the Targum in reading “white of an egg” (KJV, NASB, NIV) or find reference to another plant, the mallow (NRSV REB).

PUT (Pūt) Personal name and a geographic designation, perhaps derived from the Egyptian pdy meaning “foreign bowman.” 1. Son of Ham (Gen. 10:6; 1 Chron. 1:8) in “Table of Nations” and thus ancestor of inhabitants of Put. 2.

Designation for a region of Africa bordering Egypt (Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 27:10; 30:5; 38:5; Nah. 3:9; and, by emendation, Isa. 66:19). Put is generally identified with Libya, perhaps with the city of Cyrene. All references to the men of Put involve mercenaries, that is, soldiers for hire.

PUTHITES (Pū' thīts) Family of Judahites (1 Chron. 2:53; KJV, Puhites).

PUTIEL (Pū' tī ēl) Personal name meaning “he whom God gives” or “afflicted by God.” Father-in-law of the priest Eleazar (Exod. 6:25).

PUVAH (Pū' vah) Personal name spelled differently in Hebrew text and in various manuscripts and versions; thus rendered differently by translators. NASB (Num. 26:23) and NRSV (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:23) form of the name of a son of Issachar. Other renderings include: Pua (KJV, REB); Puah (NIV, TEV); and Phuvah (KJV).

PUWAH (Pūv vah) (NASB, Gen. 46:13) See Puvah.

PYGARG KJV term for a white-rumped antelope (Deut. 14:5). Most modern translations identify the underlying Hebrew term with the ibex. The REB has “white-rumped deer.” See Antelope; Deer; Ibex.

PYRAMIDS Four-sided structures have captivated visitors to Egypt for centuries. The present name apparently originated with some ancient Greek tourists who jokingly called the monuments “wheat cakes.” This may describe the first “step pyramid,” built by Djoser (Zoser) at Saqqara, but it was an injustice to those erected at Giza which represent one of the Seven Wonders of the World. The fourth dynasty (about 2520-2480 B.C.) reflected the zenith of pyramid construction.

The smallest of the three pyramids at Giza, built by Mycerinus (Menkaure).

A large stone quarry in the area of Baalbak (in modern Lebanon) on the Orontes River.

The best known of these artificial mountains rises majestically on the edge of the Nile near Cairo (at Giza). The “Great Pyramid” stands 481 feet high with a base of 755 feet. This was constructed by Cheops (Khufu) about 2580 B.C. His son, Chephren (Khafre), and grandson, Mycerinus (Menkaure), followed in their father's footsteps literally building in his shadow. Although not as grand, pyramids were constructed at various other places along the Nile including the distinctive “Bent Pyramid” at Dashur.

The step-pyramid of King Djoser (Zoser) of the Third Dynasty located at Saqqara.

The famous Sphinx of Giza, built by Chephren (Khafre), measures 240 feet from front to back.

The purpose of these edifices was to entomb and immortalize the rulers. They actually act as focal points for a whole complex of buildings including a funerary temple, a causeway to a valley building near the Nile, and buried barges to carry the deceased to their eternal abode. They were not meant to be, however, astro-observatories or generators of mystical power. See Archaeology and Biblical Study; Egypt.

PYRE Pile of material to be burned, especially that used in burning a body as part of funeral rites (Isa. 30:33 NASB, NRSV; pile, KJV; fire pit, NIV, REB). God's preparation of a funeral pyre for the Assyrian king highlights the certainty of God's judgment.

PYRRHUS (Pir' ūs) Personal name meaning "fiery red." Father of Paul's companion Sopater (Acts 20:4).

PYTHON 1. Large constricting snake. 2. A spirit of divination (python, Gk., Acts 16:16). The word "Python" is not used in the Bible, but the Greek word does occur. Greeks believed the Python was first the dragon guarding the oracle at Delphi, later slain by Apollo. The dragon's spirit influenced the shrine's priestess who gave revelations. Those who possessed the diviner's or soothsayer's spirit (ventriloquists) exhibited what many called demon possession as noted in Mark 1:23-26. Paul encountered this in Acts 16:16-26 where he cast the spirit out of a slave girl. See Divination and Magic.

Q Abbreviation of the German Quelle, meaning "source," used to designate the hypothetical common source of over 200 verses found in Matthew and Luke but not in Mark. According to the two-document hypothesis, Matthew and Luke inserted sayings of Jesus stemming from Q into Mark's narrative framework of the Jesus story (cp. Luke 1:1 for evidence of previous sources). Verbatim agreements in the double tradition (material shared by Matthew and Luke but not Mark), common sequence of sayings within blocks of materials, and doublets (repetition) of sayings found but once in Mark point to the common source. A common version of the Q hypothesis regards Q as written in Greek in Palestine, perhaps Caesarea, between A.D. 50-60. Luke is held to have preserved the overall order of the Q sayings better, while Matthew felt free to rearrange much of the shared material to form his five major discourses. Some scholars are so confident in their ability to decipher Q that they have written commentaries and theologies of the alleged source. Others prefer to think of Q as an "oral" source. Still others remove any need for a common source for the double tradition by arguing for the priority of Matthew. See Harmony of the Gospels.

QOHELETH (kō hēl' ēth) See Koheleth.

QUAIL The Hebrew term translated “quail” in the OT is found only in connection with God's provision of food for Israel in the wilderness (Exod. 16:13; Num. 11:31-32; Ps. 105:40).

The quails mentioned in the OT differ from the North American bobwhite quails. Besides being migratory, the quails of the Bible are mottled brown in color and are smaller than the bobwhite quails. The quails mentioned in the OT have short wings and weak powers of flight.

QUARRY Area of land where stones were extracted for building various objects and buildings. Good stone lay close to the surface. In most places it was broken out of its bed by cracking the stones along lines of cleavage. Cutting these stones was obviously a dangerous business (Eccles. 10:9). KJV refers to quarries in Judg. 3:19-26. The Hebrew term pesalim usually refers to images of gods. Thus most modern translations read “idols” or “sculpted stones,” the latter possibly referring to Joshua's stones of commemoration (Josh. 4). Modern translations use “quarry” in 1 Kings 6:7 to make explicit the intention of the more literal KJV reading. See Masons.

QUARTERMASTER Officer charged with receipt and distribution of rations and supplies (Jer. 51:59 NASB, NRSV, REB). Quartermaster reflects the Hebrew “tribute-prince.” The KJV reading “quiet prince” reflects a different vocalization of the Masoretic text. The NIV reading “staff-officer” likely reflects a slight change in the consonantal text to read “prince of the camp.” See Prince.

QUARTUS (kwär' tūs) Latin personal name meaning “fourth.” Christian, most likely from Corinth, who sent greetings to the Roman church through Paul (Rom. 16:23). Quartus and Tertius, whose name means “third” (Rom. 16:22), were possibly the third and fourth sons of the same family.

QUATERNION (kwə tēr' nī ōn) KJV term for a squad composed of four soldiers (Acts 12:4; cp. John 19:23). By translating the underlying Greek as simply “squad,” NASB and RSV failed to convey the size of the guard.

QUEEN Wife or widow of a monarch and the female monarch reigning in her own right. Queen mother refers to the mother of a reigning monarch. Female regents were known in the ancient Near East (1 Kings 10:1-13, the queen of Sheba; Acts 8:27, the Ethiopian Candace). No queen ruled Israel or Judah in her own right, though Athaliah usurped power (2 Kings 11:1-3). The wives of monarchs varied in their influence. Since marriages often sealed political alliances (2 Sam. 3:3; 1 Kings 3:1; 16:31; 2 Kings 8:25-27), daughters of more powerful allies such as the Egyptian pharaoh or king of Tyre enjoyed special privileges (1 Kings 7:8) and influence (1 Kings 16:32-33; 18:19; 21:7-14). The mother of the designated heir also enjoyed special status. Nathan enlisted Bathsheba rather than Solomon in his plan to have Solomon confirmed as king (1 Kings 1:11-40). Queen mother was an official position in Israel and Judah. Great care was taken in preserving the names of the queen mothers (1 Kings 14:21; 15:2,13; 22:42; 2 Kings 8:26). Asa's removal of his mother from the office for idolatry (1 Kings 15:13) points to its official character.

Famous bust of Queen Nefertiti (from about 1356 B.C.), wife of Pharaoh Akhenaton of Egypt.

On her son's death Athaliah murdered her own grandsons, the legitimate heirs, in order to retain the power she had enjoyed as queen mother (2 Kings 11:1-2). The queen mother likely served as a trusted counsel for her son (Prov. 31:1). As queen mother, Jezebel continued as a negative force after the death of Ahab (1 Kings 22:52; 2 Kings 3:2,13; 9:22).

QUEEN OF HEAVEN Goddess that women in Judah worshiped to ensure fertility and material stability (Jer. 7:18; 44:17). Forms of worship included making cakes (possibly in her image as in molds found at Mari), offering drink offerings, and burning incense (Jer. 44:25). Exactly which goddess was worshiped is not certain. The words could be translated “stars of heaven” or “heavenly host.” However, “queen of heaven” appears to be the best rendering. The major influence could have been Ishtar, the Mesopotamian goddess called there the “queen of heaven” (imported to Israel by Manasseh), or the Canaanite Ashtarte. Archaeologists have uncovered many images of nude goddesses from Israelite sites, showing why Jeremiah protested against such worship.

Excavations at the site of the Qumran community on the northwestern edge of the Dead Sea.

QUMRAN (Qum' rān) Archeological site near the caves where Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered and center of Jewish Essene community.

Location The ruins called Khirbet Qumran are located eight miles south of Jericho and threefourths of a mile west of the northwestern edge of the Dead Sea. After the first discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in 1947, Qumran became the focus of archaeological investigation and was thoroughly excavated between 1953 and 1956. Among the areas excavated (a cemetery, extensive water system, refectory, kitchen, and prayer and study rooms), a room was discovered complete with the ruins of plaster benches and inkwells from the Roman period demonstrating that this was probably the “scriptorium” where the scrolls were copied.

Qumran Community The Qumran site was inhabited from about 130 B.C. to A.D. 70 by a sect so similar in nature, theology, and practice to a Jewish sect known as Essenes that most scholars believe it was one variety of this sect. Ritual baptism, monastic life, and manual labor characterized the life of the Qumran Essenes. Although they allowed marriage, they shunned any contact with the outside world. Their main concern in life was complete and strict devotion to God. They expressed this through their scribal activity, the copying and studying of Scripture. In A.D. 70, with the Roman army posing a major threat to their existence, the Essenes of Qumran made a hasty exit, hiding their manuscripts in the surrounding caves as they left.

Scrolls and Their Value In 1947 a young Bedouin shepherd boy found an ancient scroll in a cave on the face of one of the sandstone cliffs in the Qumran area. In the following weeks and months a careful search of the area yielded 40,000 fragments of ancient manuscripts from 11 caves. Some 800 manuscripts are represented, of which 170 are fragments of OT books (including manuscripts of each OT book except Esther). The most important may be a nearly complete text of Isaiah. The rest of the scrolls include commentaries on Habakkuk and Micah, Jewish extrabiblical documents from the interbiblical and NT time periods, and extrabiblical writings specifically related to the community at Qumran such as the Genesis Apocryphon, Temple Scroll, and Manual of Discipline. Scrolls were found in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek, and the scroll material included both parchment and papyrus. (Two copper scrolls were also discovered.) While the content of many of the scrolls extends to a much earlier date, the scrolls themselves have been dated to about 200 B.C. to A.D. 70.

Ritual bath used for purification rites for the sect members at the site of the Qumran community.

The limestone cliffs of the Qumran region showing the caves in which the Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered.

The value of the Dead Sea Scrolls to biblical studies is twofold. First, they provide OT Hebrew manuscripts that are one thousand years older than any other extant OT manuscripts. Before 1947 the earliest Hebrew OT manuscripts known to exist dated to the late ninth century A.D. With the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, biblical scholarship now has access to OT manuscripts dating from about 200-100 B.C. The significance of this is heightened by the fact that these are copies, which presuppose originals, thus offering another verification of an early date for the actual writing of the OT. Second, the scrolls provide a glimpse into the Jewish theological and cultural milieu of the time of Christ and also provide examples of verbal expressions contemporary with the NT time period. RAAMA or RAAMAH (Rā' á nā) Son of Cush (Gen. 10:7) and ancestor of Sheba and Dedan. Arab tribes occupying southwest and west-central Arabia (1 Chron. 1:9). Raamah and Sheba were trading partners of Tyre (Ezek. 27:22). Raama is likely modern Negran in Yemen, though the earliest Greek translation identified Raamah with Regmah on the Persian Gulf.

RAAMIAH (Rā á mi' ah) Returning exile (Neh. 7:7). Variant form of Reelaiah (Ezra 2:2).

RAAMSES (Rā ām' sēz) Alternate form of place-name "Rameses" (Exod. 1:11).

RAB-MAG (Rāb'-māg) Title of the Babylonian official Nergal-sharezer (Jer. 39:3,13). The name derives from the Akkadian rab mugī. The first element (rab) means "chief." Unfortunately the meaning of the second element is unknown. If associated with the root for "magi," the Rab-mag was likely the officer in charge of divination (cp. Ezek. 21:21).

RABBAH (Rāb' bah) Place-name meaning "greatness." 1. Village near Jerusalem (Josh. 15:60) assigned to tribe of Judah but apparently in territory of Benjamin. Its location is uncertain. 2. Capital of Ammon that Moses apparently did not conquer (Deut. 3:11; Josh. 13:25), located about 23 miles east of the Jordan River. Inhabited in prehistoric times and again before 1500 B.C., the city became a fortified settlement early in its history. David besieged the city (2 Sam. 11:1) and captured it (12:28-29). It remained under Israelite control throughout the period of the united monarchy but regained its independence shortly after the Israelite division. Rabbah was destroyed during the Babylonian sweep through the area (590-580 B.C.) and not rebuilt for several hundred years. Rabbah was renamed Philadelphia by the Hellenists and later became Amman, the modern capital of Jordan. See Philadelphia.

RABBATH (Rāb' bāth) (KJV, Deut. 3:11; Ezek. 21:20) See Rabbah.

RABBI (Rāb' bi) Title meaning "my master," applied to teachers and others of an exalted and revered position. During the NT period the term "rabbi" came to be more narrowly applied to one learned in the law of Moses, without signifying an official office. In the NT the title “rabbi” is used in only three of the Gospels. In Matt. 23:7-8 scribes generally are addressed. In John 3:26 John the Baptist is called “Rabbi” by his disciples. In all other occurrences “rabbi” and an alternate form “rabboni” apply to Jesus in direct address (Mark 9:5; 11:21; Mark 14:45, John 1:49; 3:2; 4:31; 6:25; 9:2; 11:8; 20:16).

Luke never used the term “rabbi” but the word epistates, the equivalent of “school-master,” a term more meaningful to his predominantly Greek readers (Luke 17:13). A unique relationship existed between Jesus and His disciples, compared to the typical rabbi and his pupils. They were forbidden to call one another “rabbi” (Matt. 23:8), and in Matthew, particularly, Jesus' disciples call Him “Lord” (Kurie). For Matthew Jesus was not just a teacher to His followers; He was their Lord.

RABBIT (Oractolagus cuniculus) Small, longeared furry mammal related to the hare but differing in giving birth to naked young. NASB, NIV, and TEV use “rabbit” for an unclean animal in Lev. 11:6; Deut. 14:7 where other English translations use “hare.” See Hare.

RABBITH (Rāb' bīth) Unidentified site in territory of Issachar (Josh. 19:20). Rabbith is possibly a corruption of Daberath, a site included in other lists of Issachar's territory (Josh. 21:28; 1 Chron. 6:72) but missing in Josh. 19.

RABBONI (Rāb bō' nī) An Aramaic honorary title, and variant spelling of “rabbi,” meaning “teacher” that was used by blind Bartimaeus and Mary Magdalene to address Jesus (Mark 10:51; John 20:16). The term “Rabboni” possibly connotes heightened emphasis or greater honor than the almost synonymous expression “rabbi.” “Rabboni” is a more personal term, signifying a relationship between the teacher and the one speaking to the teacher. The force of the term is, “My teacher,” and it was used by Mary Magdalene to address Jesus after the resurrection (John 20:16). See Rabbi.

RABSARIS (Rāb' sà rīs) Assyrian court position with strong military and diplomatic powers. The Hebrew saris means “eunuch,” but the term here is a transliteration of Akkadian and should not be taken literally. The title literally means “he who stands by the king.” The OT records that the rabsaris was sent on two occasions to deal with the Israelite kings (2 Kings 18:17; Jer. 39:3). Hezekiah and Zedekiah each rebelled against the Assyrian rule and withheld tribute payment. The rabsaris was among the ambassadors who called on the kings to demand payment. See Eunuch.

RABSHAKEH (Rāb' shà kə) Assyrian title, literally, “chief cupbearer.” The position probably began as a mere butler but developed into a highly influential post by the time of its mention in the Bible. The official who dealt with Hezekiah spoke for the Assyrian king much as an ambassador would. He urged the people of Jerusalem to make peace with Assyria rather than believing King Hezekiah that God would protect Judah (2 Kings 18:17-32).

RACA (Ra' cá) Word of reproach, meaning “empty” or “ignorant,” that the Hebrew writers borrowed from the Aramaic language. Jesus used it in Matt. 5:22 as a strong term of derision, second only to “fool.” He placed it in the context of anger and strongly condemned one who would use it of another person.

RACAL (Rā' cal) Unidentified site in southern Judah (1 Sam. 30:29). Most commentators follow the reading of the earliest Greek translation, “Carmel,” and regard Racal as a textual corruption.

RACHAL (Ra' kâl) (KJV, REB, 1 Sam. 30:29) See Racal.

RACHEL (Rā' chēl) Personal name meaning “ewe.” Younger daughter of Laban, the second wife and cousin of Jacob, and the mother of Joseph and Benjamin. In flight from his brother Esau, Jacob met Rachel when she brought the sheep to water. She immediately became the object of his attention. See Jacob. Two OT passages outside Genesis mention Rachel. Ruth 4:11 calls her one who built up the house of Israel. Jeremiah 31:15 refers to her weeping over children being taken in exile. In the NT Matthew (2:18) cited Jeremiah's reference of weeping in connection with Herod's order to kill male children under two.

The traditional location of Rachel's tomb in Bethlehem.

RACIAL TENSION Unrest and division among people caused by differing racial origins. Personal identity in the ancient world was not primarily based on race but on family tribal, city, national, ethnic, or religious ties.

Shepherds (who were typically Semitic) were an abomination to the (non-Semitic) Egyptians (Gen. 46:34). When the Jews lived outside Palestine, racial differences became more significant (Esther 3:1-6; cp. Luke 4:25-28). Paul reports an accepted Greek maxim stigmatizing the Cretans as always being “liars, evil beasts, slow bellies” (Titus 1:12-13; “lazy gluttons” NIV). Because there is no racial distinction in Christ (Gal. 3:28-29; Eph. 2:19), the church was able to spread rapidly to the Gentile world to encompass persons of all races. Divisions and prejudice based on race are unacceptable for Christians.

RADDAI (Rād' dā ī) Personal name meaning “Yahweh rules.” Son of Jesse and brother of David (1 Chron. 2:14).

RAFT King Hiram's means of transporting timber for the temple by lashing logs together and floating them down the coast from Tyre to Joppa (1 Kings 5:9; 2 Chron. 2:16). See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

RAHAB (Rā' hāb) Name meaning “arrogant, raging, turbulent, afflicter.” 1. Primeval sea monster representing the forces of chaos that God overcame in creation (Job 9:13; 26:12; Ps. 89:10; Isa. 51:9; cp. Ps. 74:12-17). 2. Symbolic name for Egypt (Ps. 87:4). Isaiah 30:7 includes a compound name Rahab-hem-shebeth. Translations vary: “Rahab who sits still” (NRSV); “Rahab who has been exterminated” (NASB); “Rahab the Do-Nothing” (NIV); “Rahab the Subdued” (REB). 3. The plural appears in Ps. 40:4 for the proud, arrogant enemies. 4. Personal name meaning “broad.” Harlot in Jericho who hid two Hebrew spies that Joshua sent there to determine the strength of the city (Josh. 2:1). When the king of Jericho learned of the spies' presence, he sent men to arrest them. Rahab outsmarted the king and hid the men on her roof, sending the arresting officers on a false chase toward the Jordan River. In return for her help Joshua spared her and her clan when the Hebrews destroyed Jericho (Josh. 6:17-25). Matthew named Rahab as Boaz's mother (1:5) in his genealogy of Christ, making her one of the Lord's ancestors. Some interpreters think, however, that the Rahab in Matthew was a different woman. Hebrews 11:31 lists Rahab among the heroes of faith.

RAIN Moisture from heaven providing nourishment for plant and animal life. Palestine was a land dependent upon the yearly rains to ensure an abundant harvest and an ample food supply for the coming year. Thus, the presence or absence of rain became a symbol of God's continued blessing or displeasure with the land and its inhabitants. Rain fell in two seasons: the early rains during October and November, and the later rains in February and March (James 5:7). Rarely did rain of any significance fall outside these two periods. Westerly winds from the Mediterranean Sea brought wet storms during the winter, most of the rain falling along the coastal plain, in the north, and in the central hills. Lower elevations, the Jordan Valley, and the south received less rain during the year. Long droughts often were followed by flash floods that quickly filled the seasonal creeks and riverbeds. The runoff was captured in cisterns for drinking water. In the Negev farmers plowed during the rains to allow the fine desert dust to absorb the little rain that was available. The coming of the rain was viewed as God's continued pleasure with His people. The lack of rain in spring proclaimed His judgment for sin and disobedience. The Canaanites worshiped Baal as the god of rain and thunder, and sexual orgies were enacted to provoke his presence in the land.

RAINBOW Caused by the reflection and refraction of sunlight by droplets of rain, a rainbow often appears after the passing of thunderstorms, marking its end. The bow is colored by the division of sunlight into its primary colors. The rainbow served to remind Israel and her God of His covenant with Noah never again to destroy the earth by flooding (Gen. 9:8-17). The Mesopotamian epic of Gilgamesh, another ancient flood account, does not include the sign of the rainbow. The rainbow and its beauty became a symbol of the majesty and beauty of God. While having a vision, Ezekiel compared the brightness of the glory of God with the colors of the rainbow (1:28). Habakkuk also used the bow to describe the scene of God's final deliverance of His people (3:9). The book of Revelation records John's vision of the throne of Christ as surrounded by “a rainbow that looked like an emerald” (4:3 HCSB). Later Revelation 10:1 pictures a descending angel with the rainbow shining upon his head and having a face as the sun.

RAISIN CAKES Food prepared by pressing dried grapes together. David gave raisin cakes (“flagon,” KJV) to those who accompanied the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:19; 1 Chron. 16:3 NRSV). Hosea 3:1 (NRSV) links raisin cakes with the worship of pagan deities (cp. Jer. 7:18).

RAKEM (Rá' kēm) Personal name meaning “variegated, multicolored.” Grandson of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:16).

RAKKATH (Rāk' káth) Place-name meaning “spit,” “narrow,” or “swamp.” Fortified town in the territory of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35), either at Tiberias or else at Tell Eqlatiyeh about one and one-half miles northwest of Tiberias. Artifacts spanning the Bronze Age have been recovered from the latter site.

RAKKON (Rāk kon) Place-name possibly meaning “swamp” or “narrow place.” Village in the vicinity of Joppa allotted to Dan (Josh. 19:46). The site is perhaps Tell er-Reqqeit, two miles north of the mouth of the Jarkon River (Nahr el-'Auja). The omission of the name in the earliest Greek translation suggests that Rakkon may result from a scribe having copied Me-jarkon and then started over in the middle of the word, copying the last half twice.

RAM (Rām) Personal name meaning “high, exalted.” 1. Ancestor of David (Ruth 4:19; 1 Chron. 2:9) and Jesus (Matt. 1:3-4). 2. Jerahmeel's eldest son (1 Chron. 2:25,27), the nephew of 1. 3. Head of the family to which Job's friend Elihu belonged (Job 32:2).

RAM, BATTERING See Arms and Armor.

RAM'S HORN See Shophar.

RAMA (Rá' má) (KJV, Matt. 2:18) or RAMAH Place-name meaning “high,” applied to several cities located on heights, especially military strongholds.

1. Border town in tribal territory of Asher (Josh. 19:29). The precise location of the city is unknown, although most scholars would place it in the vicinity of Tyre. 2. Fortified city of tribal territory of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36); this town is probably to be identified with present-day er-Rameh. Ramah of Asher and Ramah of Naphtali could have been the same community since the boundaries of Asher and Naphtali join. 3. Ramah of Gilead usually called Ramothgilead (cp. 2 Kings 8:28-29; 2 Chron. 22:6). See Ramoth-gilead. 4. City in the inheritance of Benjamin listed along with Gibeon, Beeroth, Jerusalem, and others (Josh. 18:25). It is to be identified with modern er-Ram five miles north of Jerusalem. In ancient times this location placed the city between the rival kingdoms of Israel and Judah, which led to dire consequences (1 Kings 15:16-22; 2 Chron. 16:1,5-6). The traditional site of Rachel's tomb was connected with Ramah (1 Sam. 10:2; Jer. 31:15). Deborah, the prophetess, lived in and judged Israel from the Ramah vicinity (Judg. 4:4-5). Hosea mentioned Ramah (Hos. 5:8), and Isaiah prophesied that the approaching Assyrian army would march through Ramah (Isa. 10:29). The Babylonians apparently used Ramah as a prisoner-of-war camp from which captives of Jerusalem were processed and sent into Babylonian exile. There Jeremiah was released from his chains and allowed to remain in Judah (Jer. 40:1-6). People returning from captivity settled there (Ezra 2:26; Neh. 7:30). 5. City of the Negev, the arid desert south of Judea, in the tribal inheritance of Simeon (Josh. 19:8). David once gave presents to this town following his successful battle with the Amalekites (1 Sam. 30:27). 6. Birthplace, home, and burial place of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:19; 2:11; 7:17; 8:4; 15:34; 25:1). In 1 Sam. 1:1 the long form, Ramathaim-zophim, is used. Samuel built an altar to the Lord at Ramah. From there he “judged” Israel and went on a yearly circuit to other cities (1 Sam. 7:15-17). Some have argued that Ramathaim-zophim is identical with Ramah of Benjamin. It may also be the town, Arimathea, hometown of Joseph, in whose tomb Jesus was buried (Matt. 27:57-60).

RAMATH (Rā' mǎth) Place-name meaning “height, elevated place.” An element of several names: Ramath-lehi meaning “height of the jawbone,” site of Samson's victory over the Philistines (Judg. 15:17); Ramath-mizpeh (alternately Ramath-mizpah) meaning “height of lookout or watchtower” (Josh. 13:26); Ramath-negev meaning “Ramath of the South” (Josh. 19:8; 1 Sam. 30:27). See Rama.

RAMOTH-GILEAD (Rā möth-gil' ə ád)

Place-name meaning “heights of Gilead.” One of the cities of refuge Moses appointed for unintentional killers (Deut. 4:43; cp. Josh. 20:8) and Levitical cities (Josh. 21:38). It probably was located in northeastern Gilead, east of the Jordan. Solomon made Ramoth-gilead a district capital (1 Kings 4:13). After the division of the kingdom about 922 B.C., the city fell to Syria (1 Kings 22:3) and remained there for almost 70 years. Ahab attempted to retake the city but was mortally wounded in the battle (1 Kings 22:29-40). Joram did recapture the city (2 Kings 9:14; cp. 8:28). In Ramothgilead Elisha anointed Jehu as king over Israel (2 Kings 9:1-6). In 722 B.C. the region was taken by Assyria.

RAMPART Outer ring of fortifications, usually earthworks. The underlying Hebrew term is literally “encirclement” and can be applied to moats and walls as well as earthworks (2 Sam. 20:15; Ps. 122:7; Lam. 2:8). Because Jerusalem was ringed by steep valleys, only its north side had extensive ramparts.

RANGE KJV term for a rank or row of soldiers (2 Kings 11:8,15; 2 Chron. 23:14).

RANSOM Payment, usually of money required to release someone from punishment or slavery.

Old Testament The term is used to translate words related to the concept of redemption or atonement, as in Exod. 21:30; 30:12; Num. 35:31; Job 33:24; Ps. 49:7; Prov. 6:35 (Hb. kopher); Lev. 27:29; Ps. 69:18 (Hb. padah). Sometimes the deliverance is in view more than the price paid, as when God is said to have “ransomed” Israel in delivering the nation from foreign domination (Jer. 31:11; Hos. 13:14).

New Testament The word “ransom” is used in the NT to translate various words related to the Greek verb lutroo, which means “to ransom, redeem.” These words occur about 20 times in the NT (though they occur over a hundred times in the Gk. translation of the OT). The three main passages in which the term “ransom” is found in many English translations are Mark 10:45, “For even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give His life—a ransom for many” (HCSB), with the parallel in Matt. 20:28, and 1 Tim. 2:5-6, “For there is one God and one mediator between God and man, a man, Christ Jesus, who gave Himself—a ransom for all, a testimony at the proper time.” The point of these passages is that Jesus' sacrificial death on the cross was the price paid to secure the release from the guilt and bondage of sin for all who would believe. The term was metaphorical, perhaps intended as an analogy to the ancient practice of paying for the release of slaves or prisoners. Although Heb. 2:14 says the devil held the power of death, nowhere does the Bible say that Jesus' death was a ransom paid to him. It rather was the price paid to satisfy divine justice (Rom. 3:25-26). See Atonement; Expiation, Propitiation; Redeem, Redemption, Redeemer; Salvation. E. Ray Clendenen

RAPE Crime of engaging in sexual intercourse with another without consent, by force and/ or deception. Mosaic law required a man who had seduced a virgin to pay the bride price and offer to marry her (Exod. 22:16-17). The rape of an engaged woman was a capital offense (Deut. 22:25-27). In other cases of rape, the offender was required to marry his victim and was not permitted to divorce her (Deut. 22:28-29). Lot's daughters made their father drunk and then raped him (Gen. 19:30-35). Shechem raped Dinah by force (Gen. 34:1-2). The men of Gibeah gang raped a Levite's concubine and so brutalized her that she died (Judg. 19:25). Amnon's rape of his half sister Tamar was a premeditated act involving both deception and force (2 Sam. 13:1-22). This account reveals the mind of the rapist whose uncontrolled desire quickly turned to fierce hatred for his victim (13:15). Rape was one horror associated with the fall of Jerusalem (Lam. 5:11; Zech. 14:2).

The Mosaic code highlighted the victim's rights, both to monetary compensation and to recovery of dignity. This quest for dignity was a driving force behind acts of retaliatory violence recorded in the narrative texts. These texts, however, suggest the ease with which the victim is forgotten in the spiral of vengeful violence. See Sex, Biblical Teaching on. Chris Church

RAPHA (Ra' phá) Personal name meaning "He has healed." 1. Fifth son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:2). The parallel in Gen. 46:21 gives the name "Naaman." 2. KJV form of Raphah(1 Chron. 8:37).

RAPHAH (Ra phah) Personal name from a root meaning "heal." A descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:37). Raphah is identified with Rephaiah of 1 Chron. 9:43.

RAPHU (Ra' phu) Personal name meaning "healed." Father of the Benjaminite representative among the 12 spies sent to survey Canaan (Num. 13:9).

RAPTURE God's taking the church out of the world instantaneously. The Latin term rapió, which means to "snatch away" or "carry off," is the source of the English word. While there are differing views of the millennium (Rev. 20:2-7) in relation to Christ's second coming (e.g., premillennial, postmillennial, and amillennial), nevertheless, all evangelicals affirm a literal return of Christ to the earth preceding the eternal state. In premillennialism, however, the distinct event of the rapture is often emphasized.

The main biblical passage for the rapture (Gk. harpazo) of the church is 1 Thess. 4:15-17. Other texts often used to support the doctrine of the rapture are John 14:1-3 and 1 Cor. 15:51-52. There are three main approaches to understanding the rapture in premillennialism: (1) In the pretribulational view Christ raptures the church before any part of the seven-year tribulation begins (Dan. 9:24-27; Matt. 24:3-28; Rev. 11:2; 12:14). Upon Christ's coming in the air, which is distinct from and that precedes His coming to the earth, believers will be "caught up together...in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air" (1 Thess. 4:17 HCSB). In this view believers are delivered "from the coming wrath" (1 Thess. 1:10; Rev. 3:10) by being taken out of the world. (2) A midtribulational view also sees the rapture as a distinct event that precedes Christ's second coming and delivers believers from the last half of the seven-year period, the "great tribulation"

(Matt. 24:15-28; Rev. 16-18). (3) A posttribulation view holds that the rapture and the second coming occur at the same time. Therefore, the church remains on earth during “the time of Jacob's distress” (Jer. 30:7 NASB). Unlike the world, however, believers who go through the tribulation will be protected from the devastating outpouring of God's wrath and judgment (1 Thess. 5:9). RAT Large rodent listed among the unclean animals (Lev. 11:29), but they were eaten by a disobedient people (Isa. 66:17). See Rodents.

RAVEN The raven, conspicuous because of its black color (Song 5:11), is a member of the crow family. The raven acts as a scavenger and is listed among the unclean birds (Lev. 11:15; Deut. 14:14). Biblical writers cite the raven as an example of God's care for His creation (Job 38:41; Ps. 147:9; Luke 12:24).

The raven was the first bird Noah sent forth from the ark following the flood (Gen. 8:7). He may have selected the raven for several reasons. It can fly without rest for long spans of time. Also the raven makes its home in the rocky crags, and thus it would scout out mountain peaks emerging from the flooded earth. Finally, the raven is a resourceful bird with a remarkable memory.

God sent ravens to sustain Elijah by the brook Cherith (1 Kings 17:4-6). Ravens often store surplus food beneath leaves or in rocky crevices. Although ravens often have been viewed as birds of evil omen, in the Elijah story they serve as symbols of God's love for His servant and of His mighty sovereignty over nature.

Egyptians were known for their fastidious attention to personal cleanliness. Their normal custom was to shave both their heads and beards except in times of mourning. The pictures and statues of pharaohs show them with beards that we now know were fake.

The custom of shaving the face and head was less common among the Hebrews. Among them, in parallel with most Western Asiatics including the Assyrians, the beard was considered as an ornament and point of pride and was not shaven, only trimmed (2 Sam. 19:24; Ezek. 44:20). The beard was cherished as the badge of dignity of manhood. Shaving was done with a sharp cutting instrument (made from a variety of materials, usually flint, obsidian, or iron; Isa. 7:20; Ezek. 5:1), but only in unusual circumstances. The razor could be a simple knife, probably elongated with a rounded end, or an elaborate instrument, sometimes decorated. Shaving was practiced as a sign of mourning (Job 1:20; Jer. 7:29), as a sign of subservience to a superior (Num. 8:7; Gen. 41:14), and as a treatment for a person with leprosy (Lev. 14:9).

RE (Ra) Chief Egyptian god, worshiped at his temple in Thebes, credited with creating the universe and believed to have been the first pharaoh. In images he is depicted usually as the sun disc. See Egypt; Gods, Pagan.

REIAIA (Ra' a) (KJV, 1 Chron. 5:5) or REIAIAH Personal name meaning "Yahweh has seen." 1. Member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:1-2). 2. Member of the tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:5). 3. Head of a family of temple servants returning from exile (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:50).

REAP To harvest grain using a sickle (Ruth 2:3-9). Reaping is used as a symbol of recompense for good (Hos. 10:12; Gal. 6:7-10) and evil (Job 4:8; Prov. 22:8; Hos. 8:7; 10:13), of evangelism (Matt. 9:37-38; Luke 10:2; John 4:35-38), and of final judgment (Matt. 13:30,39; Rev. 14:14-16).

REBA (Re' ba) Personal name from a root meaning "lie down." Midianite king whom Israel defeated in the time of Moses (Num. 31:8). Joshua 13:21 connects the defeat of the Midianite kings with that of the Amorite king Sihon (Num. 21:21-35).

REBECCA (Re' bek' a) New Testament form of "Rebekah," Rom. 9:10; Greek transliteration used by KJV, NKJV, NRSV, RSV, REB, NJB, TEV.

REBEKAH (Re' bek' a) Personal name, perhaps meaning "cow." Daughter of Bethuel, Abraham's nephew (Gen. 24:15); Isaac's wife (24:67); and mother of Jacob and Esau (25:25-26). Rebekah was a complex character. She is introduced as a beautiful virgin (24:16), willing servant (24:19), and as hospitable to strangers (24:25). In obedience to God's will, she left her home in Paddan-aram to be Isaac's wife (24:58). Rebekah comforted Isaac after the death of Sarah (24:67). When distressed by her problem pregnancy, she turned to God for counsel (25:22-23). Less favorable is Rebekah's favoritism towards Jacob (25:28), especially as evidenced in the plan she concocted to enable Jacob to steal Esau's blessing (27:5-17).

Rebekah was forced to send her favorite son to her brother's household to save Jacob from Esau's vengeance (27:42-46).

RE CAB, RECABITES (Rē' cāb) NIV form of Rechab, Rechabites.

RECAH (Rē' cah) Unidentified site in Judah (1 Chron. 4:12). Early Greek manuscript has Rechab in place of Recah.

RECHAB (Rē' kāb) Personal name meaning “rider” or “charioteer.” 1. Leader, together with his brother, of a band of Benjaminite raiders. He and his brother murdered Saul's son Ish-bosheth, thinking to court David's favor. His response was their execution (2 Sam. 4:1-12). 2. Father or ancestor of Jehonadab, a supporter of Jehu's purge of the family of Ahab and other worshipers of Baal (2 Kings 10:15,23). 3. Father or ancestor of Malchijah, who assisted in Nehemiah's repair of Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 3:14), possibly identical with 2.

RECHABITES (Rē' kā bits) Descendants of Jehonadab ben Rechab, who supported Jehu when he overthrew the house of Ahab (2 Kings 10:15-17). About 599 B.C. the Rechabites took refuge from Nebuchadnezzar in Jerusalem (Jer. 35). At that point the Lord commanded Jeremiah to take them to the temple and give them wine to drink. When he did so, they refused, saying that their father Jonadab (Jehonadab) had commanded them not to drink wine, or to live in houses, or to engage in agriculture. These regulations may have been intended as a protest against Canaanite religion or settled life in general, but more likely they protected the Rechabites' lifestyle and trade secrets as itinerant metalworkers. Jeremiah contrasted their faithfulness to the commandments of their ancestor with the faithlessness of the people of Judah to the Lord. Ricky L. Johnson

RECONCILIATION Bringing together of two parties that are estranged or in dispute. Jesus Christ is the one who brings together God and man, with salvation as the result of the union. Reconciliation basically means “change” or “exchange.” The idea is of a change of relationship, an exchange of antagonism for goodwill, enmity for friendship. Attitudes are transformed and hostility ceases.

In the ancient world the initiative for reconciliation was usually made in one of two ways. A third party could seek reconciliation, or an alienated party could take the first step. The latter is what is found in the Bible. The NT has two instances of person-to-person reconciliation. In each case the person who caused the break of relationship took the initiative, the brother who wronged another (Matt. 5:24) and the woman who left her husband (1 Cor. 7:11). The person seeking reconciliation is said to “be reconciled” to the other person—the effects of the reconciliation are upon the injured party. In these instances the offenders can only confess their fault, offer reparation, and seek forgiveness. The final decision rests with the injured party, who will either grant a reprieve or continue the estrangement.

In the restoration of relationship between God and humanity, reconciliation occurs with an unexpected twist. God, the injured party, takes the initiative (2 Cor. 5:19). This initiating, reconciling action from God is contrary to expectations. The removal of alienation, created by man's sin, is the work of God. The Bible never portrays man as reconciling himself to God or God being influenced by humans to reconciliation. When Paul admonishes his readers in 2 Cor. 5:20 to “be reconciled to God,” he is telling them to receive humbly and gratefully the reconciliation that God has already achieved in Christ.

A debated issue is whether reconciliation is double; that is, in some sense, are human beings only reconciled to God or is God also reconciled to human beings. Those reconciled to God were “once alienated and hostile in mind because of your evil actions” (Col. 1:21 HCSB). Paul elsewhere asserts, “The mind-set of the flesh is hostile to God” (Rom. 8:7). Sinful man is opposed to God and to everything that is of God. The sinful nature disobeys God's law and disbelieves the gospel. Unredeemed human beings are in rebellion against God; they are at enmity with their Creator. Although human beings are hostile toward God, is God likewise at enmity with humanity? The Bible seems to indicate that, to some degree, God is at enmity with sinners. Paul states in Rom. 5:10 that Christ died for sinners “while we were enemies.” The word “enemies” is not a mere description of moral character. It is also a statement of the relation of sinners to God. They are objects both of God's love and His displeasure (Matt. 5:43-48). Sinners work contrary to God's purposes, and He works contrary to their purposes. God not only extends His grace, mercy, and patience to sinners, but He also expresses His displeasure through His wrath (Rom. 1:18-32). As Paul reminded the Ephesians, “We too all previously lived among them in our fleshly desires, carrying out the inclinations of our flesh and thoughts, and by nature we were children under wrath” (Eph. 2:3).

Several themes are essential to a biblical understanding of reconciliation. First is a recognition of the need for reconciliation (Rom. 5:10; Eph. 2:12; Col. 1:21). Sin has created the separation and alienation between God and man. Reconciliation assumes there is a need for separation to be bridged and for God and humanity to be restored in right relationship. Second, God is the Reconciler; reconciliation is His work. The incarnation is God's declaration that the initiative for reconciliation resides exclusively with Him (2 Cor. 5:19). Third, the death of Jesus Christ is the means by which God accomplishes reconciliation (Rom. 5:10). Fourth, reconciliation is a completed work but is still being fulfilled. Although the substitutionary sacrifice of Christ has already procured reconciliation, human beings still receive God's reconciling work and gracious gift by grace through faith in Jesus Christ. Fifth, the divine-human act of reconciliation serves as the basis for authentic person-to-person reconciliation. Finally, God's reconciling work is in large measure the ministry of the church. Believers have been commissioned by the resurrected Lord to have a message and ministry of reconciliation. In this sense reconciliation is not only a reality of life for believers, but it is also a purpose of their kingdom ministry. RECORDER Government post with unidentified responsibilities (as in 2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24). The REB identified the recorder as the secretary of state. The TEV identified the recorder as the official in charge of [court] records. The term possibly refers to a court herald or court historian. Most translations use “recorder,” thus leaving the function open.

RED KJV used “red” as the translation of several Hebrew terms where modern translations substitute another meaning: “foaming” or “blended” (Ps. 75:8); “pleasant” or “delight” (Isa. 27:2); and “porphyry” (Esther 1:6). See Colors.

RED HEIFER Function of the red heifer ceremony was production of ash for the water used to remove ritual impurity contracted through contact with a corpse, bones, or a grave (Num. 19). The rite involved: slaughter of a sacrificially acceptable heifer outside the camp; sprinkling blood toward the tent of meeting seven times; burning the entire heifer, including its blood and dung, together with cedarwood, hyssop, and scarlet thread (cp. Lev. 14:4); and storing the ash in a clean place outside the camp. The water for removing the impurity contracted through contact with the dead was prepared by mixing running water with the ash. Impure persons and objects were sprinkled on the third and seventh days after contamination to remove uncleanness. Hebrews 9:14 uses the image of the red heifer ceremony to picture Christ's cleansing believers of the effect of “dead works.” Dead works refer either to acts that lead to death (NIV), “useless rituals” in view of salvation (TEV), or works produced prior to being made alive in Christ (cp. Heb. 6:1).

RED SEA (REED SEA) Body of water God divided in the exodus. Red Sea is a common translation of two Hebrew words yam suph. Yam means “sea,” but suph does not normally mean “red.” Suph often means “reeds” (Exod. 2:3,5; Isa. 19:6) or “end,” “hinder part” (Joel 2:20; 2 Chron. 20:16; Eccles. 3:11). Yam suph could be translated “Sea of Reeds” or “Sea at the end of the world.” The earliest known translation of the Hebrew Bible (the Gk. Septuagint about 200 B.C.) translated yam suph consistently with Erthra Thalassa “Red Sea.” Jerome continued the process in the Latin Vulgate (A.D. 400) by using Mare Rubrum “Red Sea” for yam suph. Most English translations have followed the Vulgate and use “Red Sea” in the text with a footnote indicating the literal translation is “Reed Sea.” TEV uses various terms to translate yam suph: “Gulf of Suez” (Exod. 10:19); “Red Sea”; and “Gulf of Aqaba”(1 Kings 9:26).

The Red Sea.

We do not know who first suggested the translation “Reed Sea.” In the 11th century the French Jewish scholar Rashi spoke of yam suph in terms of a marsh overgrown with weeds. In the 12th century Ibn Ezra, a Spanish Jew, commented that yam suph in Exod. 13:18 may be so named because reeds grow around it. Martin Luther translated yam suph as Schilfmeer, “Reed Sea.” Although the name “Reed Sea” has been widely accepted by many scholars, there have been many recent attempts to prove the term “Sea of Reeds” is not a legitimate reading for yam suph.

The OT uses the term yam suph to refer to more than one location. In Exod. 10:19 it refers to the Gulf of Suez as the place where the locusts were driven and destroyed. In 1 Kings 9:26 it refers to the Gulf of Aqaba where the ships of Solomon's navy were stationed. The same location may be indicated in Jer. 49:21 where the cries of Edom could be heard. The “Way of the Red Sea” (yam suph) is part of the name of a highway out of Egypt (Exod. 13:18; Num. 21:4; Deut. 1:40; 2:1; Judg. 11:16). The “Red Sea” was the name of a camp along the way from Egypt (Num. 33:10-11). Yam suph marked the ideal southern border of Israel (Exod. 23:31), but the most significant reference of “Red Sea” in the OT was to the place where God delivered Israel from Pharaoh's army (Exod. 15:4,22; Num. 21:14; Deut. 11:4; Josh. 2:10; 4:23; 24:6; Neh. 9:9; Pss. 106:7,9-11,22; 136:13-15).

No one knows the exact location of the place where Israel crossed the “Red Sea” on the way out of Egypt. Four primary theories have been suggested as to the place of the actual crossing of the isthmus of Suez: (1) the northern edge of the Gulf of Suez; (2) a site in the center of the isthmus near Lake Timsah; (3) a site at the northern edge of the isthmus and the southern edge of Lake Menzaleh; and (4) across a narrow stretch of sandy land which separates Lake Sirbonis from the Mediterranean Sea. Although no one knows the exact site of the crossing, the weight of the biblical evidence is on the side of suggested site number two. See Exodus. Ralph L. Smith

REDEEM, REDEMPTION, REDEEMER To pay a price in order to secure the release of something or someone. It connotes the idea of paying what is required in order to liberate from oppression, enslavement, or another type of binding obligation. The redemptive procedure may be legal, commercial, or religious.

In the OT two word groups convey the idea of redemption. The verb ga'al and its cognates mean “to buy back” or “to redeem.” In the book of Ruth (Ruth 2:20), Boaz acts as kinsmanredeemer to secure the freedom of Ruth from poverty and widowhood. Boaz purchases the land of Elimelech and, in so doing, “redeems” Ruth and takes her to be his wife (Ruth 4:1-12). In another account God commands the Prophet Jeremiah to buy family land; he redeems the family estate by paying the redemption price (Jer. 32:6-15). Jeremiah depicts that God will one day redeem Israel from oppression of the Babylonians (Jer. 32:16-44).

When ga'al is used of God, the idea is redemption from bondage or oppression, typically from one's enemies. In the Exodus account Yahweh declares to Moses: “I am the LORD...and I will redeem you with an outstretched arm and with mighty acts of judgment” (Exod. 6:6 NIV). Some uses of ga'al and its cognates speak of redemption from oppression by enemies (Pss. 69:18; 72:14; 106:10; 107:2; Isa. 48:20). Ga'al rarely refers to redemption from sin (Isa. 44:22) or from death (Ps. 103:4; Hos. 13:14).

Padah is primarily used with regard to the redemption of persons or of living things. Since God spared the firstborn Israelites when the last plague was sent upon Egypt, God required that all firstborn sons or animals be redeemed (Exod. 13:13-15; 34:20; Num. 18:15). If a negligent owner did not properly secure an ox, and the ox gored the child of a neighbor, both ox and owner would be stoned. The father of the slain person could, however, accept a redemption price for the lost child, thereby permitting the owner of the ox to live (Exod. 21:29-30). Padah and its cognates could refer to a general deliverance from trouble or distress (2 Sam. 4:9; 1 Kings 1:29; Ps. 25:22), or they could speak of redemption from sin (Pss. 26:11; 49:7; 103:8; 130:8; Isa. 1:27; 59:20) or from death (Job 4:20; Pss. 44:26; 49:15).

The notion of redemption from sin is also implicitly revealed in the OT. The sacrificial system was a constant reminder to the Israelites that a price had to be paid in order to have redemption from their sins. Every offering sacrificed depicted the notion of the price of sin and the need for the price to be paid. Additionally, the Israelites viewed liberation from oppressive circumstances, such as the Babylonian captivity, essentially as redemption from sin, since it was their sin that brought about their captivity (Isa. 40:2).

In the NT two word groups convey the concept. The first consists of lutron and its cognates. They mean “to redeem,” “to liberate,” or “to ransom.” The idea of ransom suggests the heart of Jesus' mission (Mark 10:45). His life and ministry culminated in His sacrificial death. His death served as the ransom to liberate sinners from their enslaved condition.

Another word family, agorazein, means “to buy at the market,” or “to redeem.” This group is used several times to express God's redemptive activity in Christ. For example, God's redemption of fallen humanity is costly (1 Cor. 6:20). Believers are liberated from the enslaving curse of the law (Gal. 3:13, 4:5). God's redemptive mission among the nations is cause for eschatological worship (Rev. 5:9; 14:3-4).

Paul provides the fullest explanation in the NT, connecting the redemptive work of Christ with the legal declaration of the sinner's pardon (justification) and the appeasement of God's wrath against sin (propitiation, Rom. 3:24; 1 Cor. 1:30). Paul also interpreted the redeeming activity of Christ from two perspectives. Based on the ransom price paid by Christ's shed blood, forgiveness can be presently applied to the believer (Eph. 1:7). This redeeming work of Christ also has a future aspect. There will be a final deliverance of the physical body from the present decay and corruption (Rom. 8:23). This final redemptive act will occur at the resurrection of the body. This is not, however, as the first expression of redemption of believers. Rather, the earlier "redeeming" that occurred within the believer will culminate in the final redemption of the body from sin and the grave (Eph. 4:30). REFORMATION Translation of the Greek diorthosis (Heb. 9:10). The term refers either to the new order for relating to God established by Christ (NIV) or else to the process of establishing the new order (NRSV, TEV). See Covenant.

REFUGE, CITIES OF See Cities of Refuge.

REFUSE GATE See Dung Gate.

REGEM (Re' gēm) Personal name meaning “friend.” Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:47).

REGEM-MELECH (Re gēm-mē' lek) Personal name meaning “friend of the king.” Delegate whom the people of Bethel sent to Jerusalem to inquire about continuing to fast in commemoration of the destruction of the Jerusalem temple (Zech. 7:2). The prophet repeated the word of previous prophets: God desires moral lives rather than fasts (7:9-10).

REGENERATION Special act of God in which the recipient is passive. God alone awakens the person spiritually through the power of His Holy Spirit. Both the OT and NT also speak of the renewing of the individual. In a technical sense the act of regeneration takes place at the moment of conversion as the individual is spiritually awakened.

The term “regeneration” is the Greek word palingenesia (used only in Matt. 19:28 of creation and Titus 3:5). The Titus text refers to the regeneration of the individual, “He saved us—not by works of righteousness that we had done, but according to His mercy, through the washing of regeneration and renewal by the Holy Spirit” (HCSB). The Bible expresses the concept in numerous places with other terms like born again, renewed, remade, and born of God. For instance, in John 3:3-8 Jesus tells Nicodemus that in order to enter the kingdom of God, he must be born again. This thought is echoed in 1 Pet. 1:23, “Since you have been born again—not of perishable seed but of imperishable—through the living and enduring word of God.” The Bible clearly teaches that man must undergo a spiritual re-creation in order to have a relationship with God or enter His kingdom.

Paul provides further explanation in Eph. 2:1 : “You were dead in your trespasses and sins.” Clearly Paul does not mean physical death but instead is referring to man's spiritual state. Sin has left man dead spiritually, unable to respond to God. However, regeneration reawakens or resurrects man's spiritual capacity so that he can have relationship with God. Paul explained in Eph. 2:4-5, “Because of His great love that He had for us, [God] made us alive with the Messiah even though we were dead in trespasses” (HCSB).

Regeneration gives man the ability to commune with God, thus making man “a new creation” (2 Cor. 5:17).

This same idea is expressed in the OT. For example, God told Israel in Ezek. 36:26, “I will give you a new heart and put a new spirit within you; and I will remove the heart of stone from your flesh and give you a heart of flesh” (NASB). This need for a new heart was expressed by the psalmist: “God, create a clean heart for me and renew a steadfast spirit within me” (Ps. 51:10 HCSB). Jeremiah 31:31-34 also speaks of God establishing a new covenant where His law will be written on men's hearts. These verses clearly speak of a change in man's heart resulting in an improved response to God and His will, which is reflective of the NT concept of regeneration.

Several church traditions, like the Roman Catholic, have associated the regenerative act with the baptism. However, the Bible clearly teaches that baptism is a testimony that regeneration has taken place and not a means to attain it. The Bible is clear that regeneration is brought about by the Holy Spirit alone (Titus 3:5; 1 Cor. 2:6-16).

Regeneration is the catalyst that allows the Christian to interact with his creator. It is the beginning step of an eternal walk with God. Regeneration allows the individual to have a relationship with God and thus stands at the beginning of the Christian life. Scott Drumm REGIMENT NIV term for “cohort,” a tenth of a legion (Acts 10:1; 27:1). See Cohort.

REGISTER KJV term for a record of names, a genealogical registry (Ezra 2:62; Neh. 7:5,64). Modern translations use “register” more often in the verbal sense, to record in formal records (NASB: Num. 1:18; 11:26; 2 Sam. 24:2,4; Neh. 12:22-23; Ps. 87:6). See Census.

REHABIAH (Rè há bí ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh has made wide.” Son of Eliezer and ancestor of a group of Levites (1 Chron. 23:17; 24:21; 26:25).

REHOB (Rē' hōb) Personal and place-name meaning “broad or open place.” 1. Father of a king of Zobah, an Aramean city north of Damascus (2 Sam. 8:3,12). 2. Witness to Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:11). 3. Town in the vicinity of Laish in upper Galilee (Num. 13:21) See Beth-rehob. 4. Town in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:28,30). Asher was not able to drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. 1:31). Elsewhere, Rehob in Asher is assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:31; 1 Chron. 6:75). The site is perhaps Tell el-Gharbi about seven miles east-southeast of Acco.

REHOBAM (Rē hō bō' am) Personal name meaning “he enlarges the people.” One of Solomon's sons and his successor to the throne of the united monarchy (1 Kings 11:43). He reigned about 931-913 B.C. While at Shechem for his crowning ceremony as king over Israel (1 Kings 12), the people asked Rehoboam if he would remove some of the tax burden and labor laws which his father had placed on them. Instead of taking the advice of the older men, he acted on the counsel of those who wanted to increase the burden further. The Northern tribes revolted and made the rebel Jeroboam their king. Rehoboam was left with only the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. He continued the pagan ways which Solomon had allowed (1 Kings 14:21-24) and fought against Jeroboam and Shishak of Egypt. Some of his fortifications may be those at Lachish and Azekah.

REHOBOTH (Rē hō' bōth) Place-name meaning “broad places.” 1. Rehoboth-Ir, “broad places of the city,” likely denotes an open space within Nineveh or its suburbs (Gen. 10:11) rather than a separate city between Nineveh and Calah. 2. Site of a well dug and retained by Isaac's men in the valley of Gerar (Gen. 26:22). The name affirms that God had made room for them following confrontations over rights to two previous wells. 3. Unidentified Edomite city (Gen. 36:37; 1 Chron. 1:48). KJV, NIV, and TEV distinguish this city as Rehoboth by the river. NASB, NRSV, and REB identify the river as the Euphrates. Edomite dominion reaching the Euphrates is improbable. Thus some suggest the Zered Brook, the principal stream in Edom, as the site of Rehoboth.

REHUM (Rē' hūm) Personal name meaning “merciful, compassionate.” 1. One returning from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2); the parallel (Neh. 7:7) reads “Nehum.” 2. Persian official with oversight of the Trans-Euphrates territory, including Judah. His protest of the rebuilding of the Jerusalem temple and city walls resulted in suspension of the project (Ezra 4:8-24). 3. Levite engaged in Nehemiah's repair of the wall (Neh. 3:17). 4. Witness to Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:25). 5. Priest or priestly clan (Neh. 12:3), perhaps a corruption of Harim.

REI (רֵי) Personal name meaning “friendly.” David's officer who sided with Solomon in his succession struggle with Adonijah (1 Kings 1:8).

REINS KJV term for kidneys, used both in a literal anatomical sense and in a figurative sense for the seat of the emotions. The substitutions made by the NRSV are illustrative of those of other modern translations: literal sense as “kidneys” (Job 16:13), “inward parts” (Ps. 139:13), and “loins” (Isa. 11:5); figurative sense as “heart” (Job 19:27; Pss. 7:9; 16:7; 26:2; 73:21; Jer. 11:20) with the exception of Prov 23:16 (“soul”).

REKEM (רֵקֵם) Personal and place-name meaning “maker of multicolored cloth.” 1. One of five Midianite kings whom Israel defeated in Moses' time (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21). Rekem was apparently the earlier name of Petra. See Reba. 2. Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:43-44). 3. Ancestor of a family living in Gilead (1 Chron. 7:16). 4. Unidentified site in Benjamin (Josh. 18:27).

RELEASE, YEAR OF Hebrew expression that occurs only twice (Deut. 15:9; 31:10 KJV, RSV), both times in reference to the Sabbatical Year as a year of release from debt. Some confusion results from modern translations using the verb “release” in connection with both the Sabbatical Year and the Year of Jubilee. See Jubilee, Year of; Sabbatical Year.

RELIGION Relationship of devotion or fear of God or gods. 1. The cognate terms translated “religious” and “religion” (Acts 17:22; 25:19) can indicate positive reverence for the gods or else negative fear of the gods. The pejorative translations “superstitious” (KJV) and “superstition” (KJV, RSV) is unfortunate. Paul hardly alienated the Athenians at the outset of his speech. He rather pointed to their outward expressions of piety (Acts 17:22). Though a monotheist (believer in one God) would not use “fear of the gods” to describe Judaism, the expression is natural on pagan Roman lips (Acts 25:19). 2. The cognate terms translated “religion” and “religious” in Acts 26:5 and James 1:26-27 point to the “fear of God” as evidenced in religious conduct, particularly ritual practice. In Acts 26:5 Paul referred to Judaism as “our” way of evidencing reverence for God. According to James 1:26-27, one who thinks himself religiously observant but who cannot control the tongue will find religious observance worthless. James continued that the religious observance God cares about is not a cultic matter but an ethical matter, care of the helpless of society. 3. Several terms derived from sebomai (to fear) are translated religious or religion. The term in Acts 13:43 is rendered “religious” (KJV), “devout” (HCSB, NRSV), and “God-fearing” (NASB). The term RSV translated “religion” in 1 Tim. 2:10 is literally “God-fearing,” here in the sense of obedient to God's commands (cp. John 9:31). The NIV translation “who profess to worship God” highlights the connection between fear and reverence. The KJV and NASB translation “godliness” accentuates the linkage of fear with an obedient life. The term RSV translated as “religion” (1 Tim. 3:16; 2 Tim. 3:5) and “religious duty” in 1 Tim. 5:4 is generally translated “godliness” or “piety.” The emphasis is again on conduct. 4. The meaning of the term the NASB translated as “self-made religion” is uncertain (Col. 2:23). The Greek roots suggest freely chosen worship (KJV, “will worship”; NIV, “self-imposed worship”; RSV, “promoting rigor of devotion”). Similar constructions with thelo suggest the meaning “alleged worship.” 5. KJV translated Ioudaism (Judaism) as the “Jews' religion” (Gal. 1:13-14). 6. NIV frequently inserts the adjective “religious” into its paraphrase to clarify the nature of feasts (Amos 5:21; 8:10; Col. 2:16) or service (Heb. 10:11) when there is no corresponding term in the Greek or Hebrew text. Chris Church

REMALIAH (Rēm ā li' ah) Personal name meaning “may Yahweh be exalted” or “Yahweh adorned.” Father of Pekah who murdered King Pekahiah of Israel and reigned in his stead (2 Kings 15:25; Isa. 7:1).

REMETH (Rē' mēth) Place-name meaning “height.” Town in Issachar's territory (Josh. 19:21), likely identical with Ramoth (1 Chron. 6:73) and Jarmuth (Josh. 21:29).

REMISSION Release, forgiveness. RSV used “remission” only in the sense of refraining from exacting a tax (Esther 2:18). Other modern translations avoided the term. KJV frequently used the expression, “remission of sins,” to mean release from the guilt or penalty of sins. Modern translations generally substitute the term “forgiveness.” With the exception of Rom. 3:25, the underlying Greek term is aphesis. Remission of sins is often linked with repentance, both in the preaching of John the Baptist (Mark 1:4; Luke 3:3) and the early church (Luke 24:47; Acts 2:38; 5:31). Remission of sins results from Christ's sacrificial death (Matt. 26:28; cp. Heb. 10:17-18) and from Christ's exaltation (Acts 5:31). Remission of sins is available to all who believe in the name of Jesus (Acts 10:43; cp. Luke 24:47; Acts 2:38). Because Christ's sacrifice has freed believers from the guilt and penalty of sin, no additional sacrifices are needed (Heb. 10:18). The term rendered “remission” in Rom. 3:25 [paresis] refers to God's letting sin go unpunished in anticipation of the work of Christ. See Forgiveness.

REMMON (Rēm mōn) KJV variant of Rimmon (Josh. 19:7). RSV reads “En-rimmon.” Other modern translations follow the KJV in understanding two cities: Ain and Rimmon.

REMMON-METHOAR (Rēm' mōn-mē thō' ār) KJV took Remmon-methoar as a proper name (Josh. 19:13). Modern translations take the second element (Methoar) to mean “bends toward” (NRSV), “stretches to” (NASB), or a similar expression. See Rimmon.

REMNANT Something left over, especially the righteous people of God after divine judgment. Several Hebrew words express the remnant idea: yeter, “that which is left over”; she'ar, “that which remains”; she'rit, “residue”; pelitah, “one who escapes”; sarid, “a survivor”; and, sherut, “one loosed from bonds.” In the NT “remnant” or left over is the equivalent of the Greek words: kataleimma, leimma, and loipos.

Several activities of everyday life are associated with these words. Objects or people may be separated from a larger group by selection, assignment, consumption (eating food), or by destruction. What is left over is the residue, or, in the case of people, those who remain after an epidemic, famine, drought, or war.

Noah and his family may be understood as survivors, or a remnant, of a divine judgment in the flood (Gen. 6:5-8; 7:1-23). The same could be said of Lot when Sodom was destroyed (Gen. 18:17-33; 19:1-29), Jacob's family in Egypt (Gen. 45:7), Elijah and the 7,000 faithful followers of the Lord (1 Kings 19:17-18), and the Israelites going into captivity (Ezek. 12:1-16). They were survivors because the Lord chose to show mercy to those who had believed steadfastly in Him and had been righteous in their lives.

About 750 B.C. Amos found that many people in Israel believed that God would protect all of them and their institutions. With strong language he tore down their mistaken ideas (3:12-15; 5:2-3,18-20; 6:1-7; 9:1-6). Divine judgment would be poured out on all Israel. He corrected the tenet that everyone would live happily and prosper (9:10) with the doctrine that only a few would survive and rebuild the nation (9:8b-9,11-15). This new life could be realized if one and all would repent, turn to the Lord, and be saved (5:4b-6a,14-15).

Hosea's book does not use the remnant terminology, but the concept of the Lord's mercy extended to those experiencing judgment is present in several places (2:14-23; 3:4-5; 6:1-3; 11:8-11; 13:14; 14:1-9) including calls to repentance and descriptions of what the remnant may enjoy in life.

The book of Micah has much the same emphasis. After announcements of judgment, the Lord proclaimed that people would be assembled like sheep and led by the Lord (2:12-13) as their king (4:6-8). The Messiah would give special attention to them (5:2-5,7-9). The climax of the book is an exaltation of God as the one who pardons and removes sin from their lives after the judgment had passed (7:7-20).

The remnant doctrine was so important to Isaiah that he named one of his sons Shearjashub, meaning "a remnant shall return" (7:3). The faithful would survive the onslaughts of the Assyrian army (4:2-6; 12:1-6) as illustrated by the remarkable deliverance of the few people in Jerusalem from the siege of the city by the Assyrians (chaps. 36-38).

Many remnant passages are closely tied with the future king, the Messiah, who would be the majestic ruler of those who seek his mercies (9:1-7; 11:1-16; 32:1-8; 33:17-24). These passages have a strong eschatological thrust, expecting future generations to be the remnant. Other passages looked to the generation of Isaiah's day to provide the remnant. Numerous statements in the latter part of the book have an evident futuristic orientation. In that future there would be a new people, a new community, a new nation, and a strong faith in one God. This remnant would be personified in the Suffering Servant (chap. 53).

Amos, Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah thus raised a chorus. Only a few would survive judgment events, basically because they repented and rested their future on the compassion of their Lord. An important segment of the remnant would be those who were afflicted (Isa. 14:32). Later, Zephaniah spoke of the humble and the lowly as the ones who would find refuge among the remnant (2:3; 3:12-13).

Jeremiah announced that Judah would be destroyed for rebelling against the Lord of the covenant. The political, religious, and social institutions of the state would be eliminated; many would lose their lives; others would be taken into exile for 70 years. In the exile those who believed in the one true God would be gathered for a return to the promised land. God would create a new community. Statements of hope and promise for the remnant are concentrated in chapters 30-33.

Ezekiel agreed with Jeremiah that the remnant of Judah taken to Babylon would be the source of people fit for the Lord's new community. These few would participate in a new exodus and settle in the promised land around a new temple (chaps. 40-48).

Zechariah spoke in glowing terms of how the remnant, the returned exiles to Jerusalem, would prosper (8:6-17; 9:9-17; 14:1-21). Ezra recognized the people who had returned to Jerusalem as members of the remnant, in danger of reenacting the sins of the past (9:7-15).

In the NT Paul quoted (Rom. 9:25-33) from Hosea and from Isaiah to demonstrate that the saving of a remnant from among the Jewish people was still part of the Lord's method of redeeming His people. There would always be a future for anyone among the covenant people who would truly turn to the Lord for salvation (chaps. 9-11). George Herbert Livingston

REMPHAN (Rêm' phăn) (KJV) See Rephan.

RENDING OF GARMENTS Tearing or pulling garments apart, often as a sign of mourning (Gen. 37:34; Lev. 10:6; 21:10; 1 Sam. 4:12; 2 Sam. 3:31), repentance (Gen. 37:29; Josh. 7:6; 2 Chron. 34:27; Joel 2:13), or as a response to the rejection of God's plan (Num. 14:6) or (perceived) blasphemy (Matt. 26:65; Mark 14:63; Acts 14:14). See Blasphemy; Grief and Mourning.

REPENTANCE Change of mind; also can refer to regret or remorse accompanying a realization that wrong has been done or to any shift or reversal of thought. In its biblical sense repentance refers to a deeply seated and thorough turning from self to God. It occurs when a radical turning to God takes place, an experience in which God is recognized as the most important fact of one's existence. Old Testament The concept of a wholehearted turning to God is widespread in the preaching of the OT prophets. Terms such as "return," "turn," or "seek" are used to express the idea of repentance.

In Amos 4-5 the Lord sends judgment in order for the nation to return to Him. Corporate repentance of the nation is a theme in Hosea (Hos. 6:1; 14:2) and the result of Jonah's preaching to Nineveh (Jon. 3:10). Classic calls to repentance are found in Ezek. 18 and 33 as well as Isa. 55. The shift toward an emphasis on individual repentance can be seen in Ezek. 18. New Testament Repentance was the keynote of the preaching of John the Baptist, referring to a complete turn from self to God. A note of urgency is attached to the message, "The kingdom of heaven has come near!" (Matt.

3:2 HCSB). Those who were prepared to make such a radical reorientation of their lives demonstrated that by being baptized (Mark 1:4). This complete redirection of their lives was to be demonstrated by profound changes in lifestyle and relationships (Luke 3:8-14).

The emphasis upon a total life change continues in the ministry of Jesus. The message of repentance was at the heart of His preaching (Mark 1:15). When describing the focus of His mission, Jesus said, "I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance"(Luke 5:32 HCSB).

The call to repentance is a call to absolute surrender to the purposes of God and to live in this awareness. This radical turning to God is required of all people: "Unless you repent, you will all perish" (Luke 13:3). Those who had witnessed the ministry of Jesus, the reality of God, and His claims on their lives faced serious jeopardy if they failed to repent. Jesus warned of serious consequences for those where His ministry had been rejected: "He proceeded to denounce the towns where most of His miracles were done, because they did not repent" (Matt. 11:20 HCSB). On the other hand, for the one sinner who repents, there is great "joy in heaven" (Luke 15:7). In His final words to the disciples, Jesus demanded that the same message of repentance He had preached would be preached to all nations (Luke 24:47).

The term remained in use as the early church began to take shape. The preaching in the book of Acts contains the call to repentance (Acts 2:38; 3:19; 8:22). On the one hand, Paul's discourse at Athens reveals God as the one who "commands all people everywhere to repent" (17:30 HCSB). On the other hand, repentance is shown to be the result of the initiative of God: "God has granted repentance resulting in life to even the Gentiles" (Acts 11:18; 2 Tim. 2:24-26). The abundance of NT references makes clear that repentance is an essential element in the salvation experience. In response to the call of God in one's life, there must be repentance, that is, the willful determination to turn from a life of sin and self-rule to a life ruled by God and lived in His righteousness. Repentance can be said to have occurred when someone has been convicted of the reality of their personal sinfulness, rejects and renounces that life of sin, and turns to God through faith in Jesus Christ. Repentance is so central that when Paul summarized his ministry he could say, “I testified to both Jews and Greeks about repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus” (Acts 20:21 HCSB). The experience of repentance precedes salvation (2 Pet. 3:9).

While the majority of calls to repentance are directed to unbelievers, repentance sometimes refers to believers. Paul wrote of a letter sent to the Corinthians which caused them grief but which ultimately led them to repentance (2 Cor. 7:8-13). Several times in the letters to the churches in Revelation, repentance is called for (Rev. 2:5,16,21-22; 3:3,19), in order that these believers and churches might bring their lives into greater conformity to the will of God. Individual believers, as well as churches, must constantly engage in self-examination, allowing the Spirit of God to point out areas where change is needed. Repentance is more than just remorse. REPENTANCE OF GOD Old Testament description of God's reaction to human situations. The Hebrew verb (nacham) expresses a strong emotional content, perhaps with a reference to deep breathing of distress or relief. It should be noted that “repent” is not always the best translation for nacham but was the translation used by the KJV. The scope of possible translations includes “repent” (Jer. 18:8,10 RSV), “grieve” (Gen. 6:7 NIV), “pity” (Judg. 2:18 NASB), “change of mind” (Ps. 110:4 REB), and “relent” (Ps. 106:45 NASB). Therefore, the concept of the repentance of God would also include God's grieving, pitying, changing His mind, and relenting.

The concept of God's repentance is not limited to one section of the OT but can be found throughout the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings. The repentance of God became Israel's creed alongside other attributes of God like “gracious,” “merciful,” “slow to anger,” and “great in covenant-love” (cp. Joel 2:13; Jon. 4:2).

The repentance of God was usually in response to His creation, such as human disobedience (Gen. 6:6-7), intercessory prayer (Amos 7:1-6), or repentance (Jon. 3:6-10). In many instances God is said to have changed His mind about some evil that He had planned to do (Exod. 32:12,14; Jon.

3:10). In one instance God is said to change His mind (Jer. 18:10) about His good intentions.

God's repentance plays an important role in our understanding about the role of prayer and about certain attributes of God, such as immutability, timelessness, and impassability. The God who repents is free to answer prayer and to interact with people. This freedom is part of His being the same forever.

REPHAEL (Rēph' a ēl) Personal name meaning "God heals." Temple gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:7).

REPHAH (Rē' phah) Personal name meaning "overflow." An Ephraimite (1 Chron. 7:25).

REPHAIAH (Rə phī' ah) Personal name meaning "God healed." 1. Descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:21). 2. Simeonite living at Mount Seir (1 Chron. 4:42). 3. Warrior from the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2). 4. Descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 9:43). 5. One helping with Nehemiah's repair of the wall who had oversight of one-half of the administrative district embracing Jerusalem (Neh. 3:9).

REPHAIM (Rēph' a im) 1. Residents of Sheol, often translated, "shades" or "the dead" (Job 26:5 NRSV; Ps. 88:10; Prov. 9:18; 21:16; Isa. 14:9; 26:14,19). See Sheol. 2. Ethnic designation of the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Palestine, equivalent to the Anakim, the Moabite term Emim (Deut. 2:10-11), and the Ammonite term Zanzummim (2:20-21). Despite their reputation for might and height, the Rephaim were defeated by a coalition of eastern kings (Gen. 14:5) and were later displaced by the Israelites (Deut. 3:11,13; cp. Gen. 15:20) and their distant kin, the Moabites (Deut. 2:10-11) and the Ammonites (2:20-21). KJV regularly translated Rephaim as "giants" (except Gen. 14:5; 15:20, and some references to the valley or land of the Rephaim). NASB and RSV used the translation "giants" only in reference to individual giants in 2 Samuel and 1 Chronicles. NIV avoided the translation "giant" completely, using "Rephaim" when referring to the valley or land, “Rephaites” when referring to the pre-Israelite inhabitants, and “descendant of Rapha” for individuals in 2 Samuel and 1 Chronicles. The artificial distinction between Rephaites and descendant of Rapha apparently attempts to ease the tension between the designation of King Og of Bashan as the last of the Rephaim (Deut. 3:11; Josh. 12:4) and the mention of later descendants in 2 Sam. 21:16,18,20,22; 1 Chron. 20:6,8. See Giants; Nephilim.

REPHAITES (Rēph' ā its) NIV alternate translation for the Hebrew Rephaim when applied to the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan. See Rephaim.

REPHAN (Rē' phān) Term for a foreign, astral deity (Acts 7:43; NASB, Rompha). Acts 7 follows the earliest Greek OT translation reading at Amos 5:26. The Hebrew Masoretic text reads “Kaiwan,” the Babylonian name for Saturn.

REPHIDIM (Rēph' ī dīm) Site in the wilderness where the Hebrews stopped on their way to Canaan just prior to reaching Sinai (Exod. 17:1; 19:2). There the people complained of thirst, and God commanded Moses to strike the rock out of which would come water. While the Hebrews were encamped at Rephidim, the Amalekites came against them and were defeated by Israel under Joshua's leadership. Moses' father-in-law, Jethro, came to Rephidim and helped the leader delegate his authority over the people (18:13-26). The exact location is unknown.

REPROACH Term used to indicate disgrace or dishonor, or to discredit someone or something. In the KJV the word or its derivative occurs more than 130 times. Reproach can be incurred in various circumstances. Its sources include a woman's barren condition (Gen. 30:23; 1 Sam. 1:6-10; Luke 1:25), rape (Gen. 34:14), singleness (Isa. 4:1), uncircumcision (Josh. 5:9), physical mutilation (1 Sam. 11:2), widowhood (Isa. 54:4), fasting (Ps. 69:10), mistreatment of parents (Prov. 19:26), famine (Ezek. 36:30), sin (Prov. 14:34), military defeat (Ps. 79:4), illness (Ps. 31:11), or the destruction of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:17; Ps. 89:41). Second, it can refer to a state of shame, disgrace, or humiliation (Neh. 1:3; Job 19:5; 27:6; Ps. 15:3).

Third, it can be an expression of blame, taunt, or disapproval (1 Sam. 11:2; 2 Kings 19:4,16; Neh. 4:4; 5:9; Jer. 23:40). Fourth, it expresses an upbraid or rebuke (1 Sam. 17:26; Job 19:3; Zeph. 2:8; Luke 11:45). Fifth, it can indicate scorn or disappointment (Ruth 2:5; Neh. 6:13; Jer. 6:10; 29:18; 42:18; 44:8). Christ Himself suffered reproach in His earthly ministry (Rom. 5:13; Heb. 13:13). Christians are called upon to suffer reproach for God's name (Pss. 69:7; 89:50) or for the sake of Christ (Luke 6:22; 2 Cor. 12:10; Heb. 10:33; 11:26; 1 Pet. 4:14). See Shame and Honor. William Chandler REPROBATE KJV term used in two senses: that which fails to meet a test and is thus rejected as unworthy or unacceptable, as impure silver (Jer. 6:30) or persons (2 Cor. 13:5-7; Titus 1:16); and that which is depraved or without morals (Rom. 1:28; 2 Tim. 3:8). NASB and RSV used “reprobate” to mean “one rejected by God” (Ps. 15:4; cp. HCSB, REB, TEV).

REPTILES Animals that crawl or move on the belly or on small short legs. This category of animals includes alligators, crocodiles, lizards, snakes, and turtles. It is generally agreed that in many instances the reptiles in the Bible cannot be specifically determined. Many times the same Hebrew word is translated in different ways. Leviticus 11:30 is a case in point. The same Hebrew word translated “lizard” in a number of translations is translated “crocodile” here in the RSV. There does, however, seem to be a grouping of reptiles in this verse, even though the specific names may be difficult to determine. See Creeping Things.

Adder Venomous snake. See Serpent below.

Asp Venomous snake. Modern translations often use “cobra.” See Isa. 11:8 in various translations. See Serpent below.

Chameleon Kind of lizard that changes color according to its surroundings. The unique design of its eyes characterizes the chameleon. Each eyeball moves independently; thus, it can look two ways at the same time. Feeding mostly on insects, the chameleon is harmless. In Palestine it lives in trees and bushes and hangs onto branches with its long tail.

Cobra Deadly poisonous snake with loose skin on its neck that forms a hood when the cobra is excited. See Asp.

Cockatrice Venomous snake. Cockatrice is the name for a legendary serpent. As used in the KJV, however, it is a venomous snake. Later versions translate the Hebrew word “adder” (RSV) and “viper” or “venomous snake” (NIV).

Crocodile Large, thick-skinned, aquatic reptile. See Lizard below.

Gecko Wall lizard, a common type of lizard in the Holy Land. Sucking-disc toes enable it to run over walls and ceilings. Early versions translated the Hebrew word “ferret,” while later scholars believe “gecko” is the correct translation (NASB, RSV, NIV). It is chiefly nocturnal and harmless.

Lizard Long-bodied reptile that is distinguished from the snake by two sets of short legs. Several kinds of lizards are mentioned in Lev. 11:30: gecko, monitor lizard, wall lizard, skink, and chameleon (NIV). One traveler identified as many as 44 different species in Palestine.

Serpent General name for long-bodied reptiles, specifically snakes such as the adder and viper. The serpent is mentioned numerous times. At least 33 different species may be found in Palestine. Translators use various terms to translate the eight Hebrew terms. The serpent—usual name for snake—has been a continuing symbol of evil and of the evil one.

Skink Small lizard listed among the unclean animals (Lev. 11:30 NIV). Other translations render “sand reptile” (NASB), “snail” (KJV), “sand lizard” (NRSV).

Large cistern (water reservoir) with column in center at ancient Pergamum.

Snake See Serpent above.

Tortoise Land turtle listed among the unclean animals (Lev. 11:29 KJV). Other versions have “great lizard” (RSV; NASB; NIV) instead of tortoise.

Viper Venomous snake. See Serpent above.

REPUTATION Term used in the KJV to indicate “an opinion” (dokeo) of someone or something. It can be used as a term of great esteem or regard such as was attributed to Gamaliel (Acts 5:34), the Jerusalem apostles (Gal. 2:2), and Epaphroditus (Phil. 2:29). It can, however, carry negative implications in reference to individual character (Eccles. 10:1). In Phil. 2:7 the word is translated as “emptied Himself” (HCSB, NASB, NRSV) in reference to Christ's taking on the human form of a bondservant. See Kenosis.

RESEN (Re' sən) Place-name meaning “fountain head.” City that Nimrod founded between Nineveh and Calah (Gen. 10:12). Probably modern Salemijeh (in Iraq), two and a half miles northwest of Nimrud.

RESERVOIR Place for catching and storing water for later use, either agricultural (2 Chron. 26:10; Eccles. 2:6) or as an urban supply in anticipation of a siege (2 Kings 20:20; Isa. 22:8b-11). Reservoirs were a necessity in most of Palestine where seasonal rains were the major water source. See Water.

RESH (Rāsh) Twentieth letter in the Hebrew alphabet, which the KJV used as heading for the eight verses of Ps. 119:153-160 that each begin with this letter.

RESHEPH (Re' shēph) Personal name meaning “flame.” An Ephraimite (1 Chron. 7:25).

RESIN NIV translation of “bdellium” (Gen. 2:12; cp. Num. 11:7). See Bdellium.

RESPECT OF PERSONS Honor and partiality. Respect or honor is to be shown to older men (Lev. 19:32; cp. Lam. 5:12), public officials (Rom. 13:7), parents (1 Tim. 3:4), masters (1 Pet. 2:18), and Christian leaders (1 Thess. 5:12). Christians are to live in such a way that they command the respect of neighbors and thus serve as effective witnesses (1 Thess. 4:12). Scripture repeatedly affirms that God is no respecter of persons, that is, that God does not show partiality; thus God's people are to refrain from prejudice.

RESTITUTION Act of returning what has wrongfully been taken or replacing what has been lost or damaged and the divine restoration of all things to their original order.

Human Restitution The Law required “trespass offerings” to be made for sins against a neighbor (theft, deception, dishonesty, extortion, keeping lost property, or damaging property). Such crimes involved “unfaithfulness” toward God and disrupted fellowship and peace among the people. They were to be atoned for by a guilt offering to God and restitution to the wronged neighbor. Atonement and forgiveness of the sin were received after restitution had been made to the victim. The sin offering to God always followed the act of restitution. Old Testament law established a principle of “punishment to fit the crime” (life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, wound for wound). Restitution was consistent with this concept of equity. The stolen property was to be returned, or “full” compensation was to be made. The guidelines for making complete restitution also included a provision for punitive damages (up to five times what had been lost), justice that moved beyond “an eye for an eye.” Provisions were made for complications in this process (Exod. 22:3). The act of making restitution to a victim was so closely identified with the atoning sacrifice made to God that the two expressions could be seen as elements of the same command. Neither could stand alone. Specific examples of this law in operation are not found, but the principle in action is found (1 Kings 20:34; 2 Kings 8:6; Neh. 5:10-12). There is no legal or ritual application of this command in the NT; however, the principle of restitution is clearly pictured in the story of Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1-10). Jesus implicitly validated the practice when He admonished followers to “be reconciled” to a brother before offering a gift to God (Matt. 5:23-24).

Divine Restitution The NT (Gk.) word is found only once (Acts 3:21) and is sometimes translated “restoration.” It describes the future work of God that will reestablish all “things” to their pristine order and purpose. The implication here is not the restoration of persons but of the created order, that is, the universal renewal of the earth. This divine restoration will accompany the return and triumph of Christ (1 Cor. 15:25-28). Ken Massey RESURRECTION Future, bodily rising from the dead of all persons. Believers in Christ rise to eternal life and bliss with God; unbelievers to eternal torment and separation from God.

Old Testament Though not prominent, OT passages demonstrate belief in bodily resurrection. Prophets used the idea to express hope of national rebirth for Israel (Ezek. 37; Isa. 26:19). Psalm 16:10 views resurrection in a messianic framework; God will not abandon His “Holy One” to the grave. Believers may be confident facing death because God will not leave them destitute; He will “redeem” them from the grave and take them to Himself (Ps. 49:14-15). Death was not final; God would renew the body and the individual could “see God” (Job 19:26). Daniel 12:2 provides the clearest OT statement on resurrection: “Multitudes who sleep in the dust of the earth will awake: some to everlasting life, others to shame and everlasting contempt” (NIV). Both righteous and wicked will be resurrected. Thus eternal consequences are tied to actions and decisions made in life.

New Testament The NT provides clear and extensive treatment of the resurrection. The Gospels foreshadow a future, bodily resurrection. In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus twice resuscitates deceased persons: the son of a widow (Luke 7:11-17) and the daughter of Jairus (Mark 5:22-43). Further, Jesus instructed the Twelve to “raise the dead” (Matt. 10:8). These revealed that the kingdom of God had come in the person and mission of Jesus and pointed forward to the raising from the dead of Jesus' followers, never to die again. Jesus taught the resurrection and reward of the righteous in the parable of a dinner (Luke 14:12-14). The resurrection provides background for a discussion with the Sadducees. Answering their question of the woman with seven husbands, Jesus replied that resurrection life is different; marriage will no longer be needed (Mark 12:18-23). Jesus used the occasion to assert that the patriarchs still lived (Mark 12:26-27).

Resurrection is prominent in John, who portrays resurrection as a present, spiritual reality and a future eschatological event. The dead will be raised to eternal life; resurrection life also can now be experienced in part. Jesus' underscored this at the death of Lazarus: “I am the resurrection and the life. The one who believes in Me, even if he dies, will live. Everyone who lives and believes in Me will never die” (John 11:25-26 HCSB). The resurrection life is a present reality of life in the Son (John 5:25-26). The resurrection of the body is a future promise awaiting fulfillment (John 6:35-40). John also connects the believer's bodily resurrection to the reality of Jesus' bodily resurrection (John 20:17).

The concept of resurrection was pivotal in the early church. The message of the apostles was closely tied to the resurrection of Jesus (Acts 3:14). Because of Jesus' resurrection, the apostles were able to do mighty works (Acts 4:10). The persistent witness to the resurrection of Jesus and the promise of believers' resurrection produced hostility, opposition, and persecution (Acts 4:1-21; 5:29-32; 23:6).

For Paul the resurrection was a historical event and a supernatural act of God. The goal of salvation is full possession of the inheritance (a resurrection body) at the resurrection (Eph. 1:14). Christ will descend with all believers who have died, the immaterial will be reunited with the material, and souls will be joined to resurrected, glorified bodies (1 Thess. 4:13-18). The resurrection will provide a resurrection body suitable for life in the consummated kingdom of God (1 Cor. 15:35-56). For Paul the resurrection was of such paramount importance that to deny the resurrection of the believer was essentially to deny the resurrection of Christ. Without the resurrection of Christ, believers had no hope, and their faith is vain (1 Cor. 15:12-34). To deny the reality of the resurrection (1 Cor. 15) or to teach that the resurrection had already occurred (2 Tim. 2:17-18) was destructive of the faith.

Biblical Teaching First, resurrection is different from resuscitation. A resuscitation, like that of Lazarus, is a return to life, but eventually physical death comes again. Those resurrected will not die again. Resurrection is to eternal life, perfect peace, joy, and bliss in God's kingdom forever. Second, resurrection is bodily. Bodily resurrection is essential to receive the full redemptive, atoning work of God. Salvation is not complete until the body experiences full redemption. Conversely, eternal damnation is not complete until unbelievers experience the pain and anguish of hell in body and soul. The resurrection of the body re-proclaims the Edenic pronouncement of the goodness of Creation (Gen. 1:31) and underscores the importance of the body in the purposes of God. Third, the nature of the resurrection body remains somewhat mysterious. Some aspects, such as personal identity, carry over to the resurrected state. But life in a resurrected body will be different from that previously known (1 Cor. 15:37-44). "For we know that if our earthly house, a tent, is destroyed, we have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (2 Cor. 5:1 HCSB).

RESURRECTION OF JESUS THE CHRIST Historical event whereby Jesus came back from physical death to newness of life with a glorified body, never to die again. The bodily resurrection of Jesus is one of the central tenets of the Christian faith. His bodily resurrection validates the claim that He is both Lord and Christ. It substantiates the proposition that His life and death were not just the life and death of a good man but that He indeed was God incarnate and that by His death we have forgiveness of sin.

The four Gospels are selective in the events they report surrounding the resurrection. Each emphasizes the empty tomb, but each is somewhat different in the postresurrection appearances recounted.

Mark's Gospel Mark's account is the briefest, containing only eight verses, if the shorter ending of Mark is accepted as authentic. The focus of his account is on the women's discovery of the empty tomb (Mark 16:1-4), the announcement of the resurrection by a young man wearing a white robe, and Jesus' promise to meet them in Galilee (16:5-7). The women's response is one of fear and awe (16:8).

Matthew's Gospel Matthew's report is 20 verses long. He emphasizes three aspects: the empty tomb, his answer to the false accusation that the disciples stole the body, and the Great Commission. Matthew recounts only two resurrection appearances: first, to the women as they fled the empty tomb, and then to the Eleven in Galilee. His account is in four scenes. The first takes place at the empty tomb and involves Mary Magdalene, the "other Mary," a violent earthquake, the appearance of an angel, the paralyzing fear of the guards, and an admonition to tell the disciples that Jesus is alive (Matt. 28:1-7). The second describes Jesus' encounter with the women after they fled the tomb (28:8-10). The third is a description of the religious leaders' attempt to cover up the events at the tomb (28:11-15). The fourth takes place in Galilee and concludes with Jesus giving the Great Commission (28:16-20).

Luke's Gospel Luke's record is 53 verses in length. His account consists of a series of resurrection appearances of Jesus ending with Jesus' ascension. All resurrection appearances in Luke are in Jerusalem. Luke has at least three aims: first, presenting the historical facts (cp. Luke 1:1-4), describing how the unbelieving disciples came to believe in the resurrection by emphasizing the physical nature of Jesus' resurrected body (24:30,37-43); second, to show that Jesus' death and resurrection fulfill OT prophecy (24:25-27,32); and third, to show that the disciples are to preach the gospel in the power of the Spirit to all the nations (24:46-49). The material is in four vignettes. The first involves the women's discovery of the empty tomb and the investigation of the tomb by Peter and John (24:1-12). The second, the longest, is Jesus' appearance to two disciples on the road to Emmaus. The third is Jesus' appearance to the disciples during the evening of resurrection Sunday. The fourth is Jesus' final instructions to His followers at His ascension (24:50-53; cp. Acts 1:9-11).

John's Gospel John's resurrection account is the longest, extending two full chapters. John records three appearances in Jerusalem: the first to Mary Magdalene at the empty tomb (20:1-18) and the other two appearances to the disciples, once with Thomas absent (John 20:19-25) and once with Thomas present (20:26-29). Jesus' Jerusalem appearances conclude with Thomas' great confession, "My Lord and my God" (John 20:28). Like Luke, John focuses on the corporeality of Jesus (20:17,20,25-27). The appearance in chapter 21 takes place in Galilee. His purpose seems to be to describe the reestablishing of Peter's leadership (21:15-19) and to expel the rumor that John, the disciple "whom Jesus loved" (13:23 HCSB) would not die before Jesus' return.

A cursory reading of the resurrection accounts in the four Gospels reveals a wide variety of material. Admittedly, any attempt at harmonization of the accounts is speculative, and dogmatism must be avoided. It is impossible to know which, if any, of them is correct, but each shows a possible arrangement of events in a credible sequence. The problem of varying accounts, however, is not confined to events surrounding the resurrection; problems arising from differences in details from various sources have attended almost every event in history. The variances in the scriptural accounts suggest independent witnesses rather than the repetition of an "official" party line.

Paul's Account The oldest account of the resurrection is found in 1 Cor. 15. In that passage Paul recounted a number of postresurrection appearances. He established that the believer's future resurrection is based on the historicity of Christ's bodily resurrection. However, the authenticity of Christ's resurrection is greatly debated.

Response of Critics Since the 19th century scholars have questioned the historicity of the resurrection of Jesus. Some have argued that the women and disciples went to the wrong tomb. The problem with this argument is that the Jewish leadership could have presented the corpse of Jesus in response to the proclamation of the resurrection. Surely they knew the location of the tomb. Another proposed alternative is that the disciples stole the body of Jesus. It is unlikely that the disciples would have stolen the body and thereby invented a story for which they were willing to suffer persecution and martyrdom. Still others contend that Jesus never really died on the cross but He merely “swooned” and later in the coolness of the tomb revived enough to escape. This proposal fails to take seriously the severe beatings Jesus endured, the horrific process of crucifixion, the recognition by a centurion that He was dead (Mark 15:39), as well as the piercing of His side to confirm His death (John 19:32-34). Another suggestion by skeptics is that Jesus continued to live after His crucifixion in some “spiritual” sense but that this did not involve a bodily resurrection. However, the biblical evidence for corporeality is very strong (Luke 24:40-43; John 20:27). Finally, some scholars have compared the resurrection appearances to hallucinations. However, the NT gives evidence of appearances in various places to numerous people, even 500 at one time (1 Cor. 15:6). This proposal also fails to acknowledge that the disciples were psychologically unprepared for the resurrection and actually disbelieved the initial reports.

The evidence in favor of the historicity of the bodily resurrection of Jesus is very strong. The evidence for the empty tomb is weighty. First, the story of the empty tomb is found in all four Gospels and is implicit in the early church's proclamation of the resurrection. How could they preach the bodily resurrection of Jesus if everyone in Jerusalem knew that His body was still in the tomb? Second, it is difficult to believe that the early church would have fabricated the story of the resurrection and then made women the first witnesses to the empty tomb and the resurrection, since women were not considered reliable witnesses in Jewish culture (illustrated by the disciple's response to them). Third, something incredible must have taken place on that Sunday to cause Jewish believers to begin worshiping on the first day of the week instead of the Sabbath (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2; Rev. 1:10). Finally, nothing short of the miracle of the resurrection can explain the postresurrection transformation in the disciples. The biblical record indicates that at the time of Jesus' arrest they all fled (Mark 14:50). When the women reported that they had seen Jesus, the men did not believe (Luke 24:11), yet these same men were later willing to suffer persecution and martyrdom in order to preach Jesus as the resurrected Lord. REU (Re' u) Personal name meaning "friend, companion." Descendant of Shem (Gen. 11:18-21; 1 Chron. 1:25), possibly the ancestor of a Semitic tribe associated with Ra'ilu, an island in the Euphrates below Anat.

REUBEN, REUBENITES (Ru' bën [its]) Eldest son of Jacob, born to Leah (Gen. 29:32) while the couple was living with her father, Laban, in Paddan-aram, and the clan or tribe descended from him. Among his acts recorded in the Bible, Reuben found mandrakes (out of which a love potion probably was made for his mother to use with Jacob, 30:14,16-17) and had sexual relations with one of his father's concubines (35:22), for which he later was chastised (49:4). Reuben felt compassion for young Joseph when his brothers wanted to kill the brash dreamer (37:21-22) and was willing to be responsible to his father for Benjamin's welfare when the unknown Joseph commanded that the youngest brother be brought to Egypt (42:37).

The tribe that was named for Reuben held a place of honor among the other tribes. The territory the tribe inherited was just east of the Dead Sea and was the first parcel of land to be bestowed (Num. 32).

REUEL (Ru' el) Personal name meaning “friend of God.” 1. Son of Esau and ancestor of several Edomite clans (Gen. 36:4,10,13,17; 1 Chron. 1:35,37). 2. Exodus 2:18 identifies Reuel as the “father” of Zipporah, Moses' wife. Numbers 10:29 presents Reuel as the father of Hobab, Moses' father-in-law. Elsewhere Moses' father-in-law is called Jethro. The tradition is also divided regarding the background of Moses' father-in-law, either Midianite (Exod. 2:16; 3:1) or Kenite (Judg. 1:16; 4:11). See Jethro. 3. A Gadite (Num. 2:14). 4. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. 9:8).

REUMAH (Ru' mah) Personal name meaning “coral.” Nahor's concubine, an ancestress of several Aramean tribes living northwest of Damascus (Gen. 22:24).

REVELATION OF GOD Content and process of God's making Himself known to people. All knowledge of God comes by way of revelation. Human knowledge of God is revealed knowledge, since God, and He alone, gives it. He bridges the gap between Himself and His creatures, disclosing Himself and His will to them. By God alone can God be known.

Modern thought often questions the possibility and/or reality of revelation. Biblical faith affirms revelation is real because the personal Creator God has chosen to let His human creatures know Him. The question remains, “How can a person know God?” The Bible appears to distinguish two ways of knowing God, general and special revelation.

Biblical emphasis points to Jesus Christ as God's final revelation. God has provided ongoing generations of believers a source of knowledge about Himself and His Son. That source is the Bible.

Definition The word “revelation” means an uncovering, a removal of the veil, a disclosure of what was previously unknown. Revelation of God is God's manifestation of Himself to mankind in such a way that men and women can know and fellowship with Him. Jesus explained to Peter:

“Blessed are you, Simon son of Jonah, because flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but My Father in heaven” (Matt. 16:17 HCSB). The knowledge of Jesus' sonship was not attained by human discovery, nor could it have been; it came from God alone.

All Christians recognize that God has acted and spoken in history, revealing Himself to His creatures. Yet a variety of opinions seek to define what constitutes revelation.

General Revelation God and His creation are distinct. Yet God might reveal Himself through His actions in that world. Besides saying or writing things, persons may reveal facts about themselves in other ways, such as physical gestures or facial expressions. Sometimes persons' actions communicate whether they are selfish or generous, clumsy or skillful. A grimace, a smile, or a frown can often be telling. Transferring these things to a theological context is not simple because God is not visible. He does not have facial features or bodily parts with which to gesture. To say God reveals Himself through nature means that through the events of the physical world God communicates to us things about Himself that we would otherwise not know.

What sort of things might God tell us in this manner? Paul explained, “From the creation of the world His invisible attributes, that is, His eternal power and divine nature, have been clearly seen, being understood through what He has made. As a result, people are without excuse” (Rom. 1:20 HCSB). The psalmist (Ps. 19:1) saw the glory of God through the spectacles of special revelation. What the psalmist saw was objectively and genuinely there. We can rephrase these observations to say that all that can be known about God in a natural sense has been revealed in nature. This is what we call natural or general revelation. General revelation is universal in the sense that it is God's self-disclosure of Himself in a general way to all people at all times in all places. General revelation occurs (1) through nature, (2) in our experience and in our conscience, and (3) in history.

In the wonders of the heavens and in the beauty of the earth, God manifests Himself. Jesus taught that God “causes His sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends rain on the righteous and the unrighteous” (Matt. 5:45 HCSB), thus revealing His goodness to all. “The living God, who made the heaven, the earth, the sea, and everything in them...did not leave Himself without a witness, since He did good: giving you rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, and satisfying your hearts with food and happiness” (Acts 14:15-17 HCSB). God makes Himself known in the continuing care and provision for mankind. The universe as a whole serves the Creator's purposes as a vehicle of God's self-manifestation.

God also reveals himself in men and women. They are made in the “image” and “likeness” of God (Gen. 1:26-27). Humans, as a direct creation of God, are a mirror or reflection of God. People are God's unique workmanship evidenced by their place of dominion over the rest of creation; in their capacity to reason, feel, and imagine; in their freedom to act and respond; and in their sense of right and wrong (Gen. 1:28; Rom. 2:14-15). Especially through this moral sense, God reveals Himself in the consciences of men and women. The fact that religious belief and practice is universal confirms the apostle's statements in Rom. 2. Yet the creatures who worship, pray, build temples, idols and shrines, and seek after God in diverse ways do not glorify God as God or give Him thanks (Rom. 1:21-23). Nevertheless, because each person has been given the capacity for receiving God's general revelation, they are responsible for their actions.

God manifests Himself in the workings of history. All of history, rightly understood, bears the imprint of God's activity and thus has a theological character. Primarily, God is revealed in history through the rise and fall of peoples and nations (cp. Acts 17:22-31).

God's general revelation is plain, whether in nature, in human conscience, or in history. Even though it is plain, it is often misinterpreted because sinful and finite humans are trying to understand a perfect and infinite God. What we have seen so far is compatible with the following:

- (1) Religious belief is a nearly universal human phenomenon.
- (2) Such religious belief is implanted by God.

(3) All people ought to acknowledge God on the basis of what they learned from the world around them.

(4) All people believe in God and show their belief even though they do not admit it.

(5) No one, no matter how seemingly insignificant or weak-minded, can be excused for missing God's revelation.

The light of nature is not sufficient to give the knowledge of God necessary for salvation. For God's power (Rom. 1:20), goodness (Matt. 5:45), and righteousness (Rom. 2:14-15) have been revealed but not His salvific grace. That is revealed only through special revelation. Special revelation is necessary to instruct people how to worship God rightly. God in His general revelation reveals Himself, but, because of our sinfulness, humans pervert the reception of His general revelation, a revelation so plain it leaves all without excuse. It is as if a lawyer were offered the information necessary to solve a case yet chose perversely to ignore it.

In summary, humans lack the willingness to come to a pure and clear knowledge of God. Men and women suppress God's truth because they do not like the truth about God. They do not like the God to whom the truth leads them, so they invent substitute gods and religions instead. The universality of religion on earth is evidence of truths discussed above. According to Paul, the act of suppressing the awareness of God and His demands warps our reason and conscience. Because of this rejection of God, He righteously reveals His wrath against mankind. God's general revelation does not bring one into a saving relationship with God; it does reveal God to His creatures, and they are, therefore, responsible for their response. This view of general revelation can only be accepted through special revelation.

Special Revelation God has revealed Himself in nature, human experience, and history, but sin's entrance into the world has changed the revelation as well as the interpretation of it. What is needed to understand God's self-disclosure fully is His special revelation. Divine truth exists outside of special revelation, but it is consistent with and supplemental to, not a substitute for, special revelation.

In contrast to God's general revelation, which is available to all people, God's special revelation is available to specific people at specific times in specific places; it is available now only by consultation of sacred Scripture. Special revelation is first of all particular. God reveals Himself to His people. These people of God are the children of Abraham, whether by natural (Gen. 12:1-3) or spiritual descent (Gal. 3:16,29). Does this mean that God confines knowledge of Himself to a particular people? Not necessarily, because God's general revelation has been given to all, though perverted and rejected by the universal wickedness of mankind. He now chooses to whom and through whom He will make Himself known. As with Abraham, God said: "All the peoples on earth will be blessed through you" (Gen. 12:3 HCSB). God manifests Himself in a particular manner to His people so they will be a channel of blessing to all others.

Special revelation is also progressive. Biblical history witnesses to a developing disclosure of God, His will, and His truth in the OT and NT. The development is not contradictory in any fashion. It is complementary and supplementary to what had been previously revealed. We should not think of the progress from untruth to truth but from a lesser to a fuller revelation (Heb. 1:1-3). The revelation of the law in the OT is not superseded by the gospel but is fulfilled in it.

Special revelation is primarily redemptive and personal. In recognition of the human predicament, God chose at the very beginning to disclose Himself in a more direct way. Within time and space God has acted and spoken to redeem the human race from its own self-imposed evil. Through calling people, miracles, the exodus, covenant making, and ultimately through Jesus Christ, God has revealed Himself in history.

The ultimate point of God's personal revelation is in Jesus Christ. In Him the Word became flesh (John 1:1,14; 14:9). The OT promise of salvation as a divine gift to people who cannot save themselves has been fulfilled in the gift of His Son. The redemptive revelation of God is that Jesus Christ has borne the sins of fallen humanity, has died in their place, and has been raised to assure justification. This is the fixed center of special revelation.

Special revelation is also propositional. It includes not only those personal, redemptive acts in history but also the prophetic-apostolic interpretation of those events. God's self-disclosure is propositional in that it made known truths about Him to His people. Knowledge about someone precedes intimate knowledge of someone. The primary purpose of revelation is not necessarily to enlarge the scope of one's knowledge. Yet propositional knowledge is for the purpose of personal knowledge.

We can thus affirm that special revelation has three stages: (1) redemption in history, ultimately centering in the work of the Lord Jesus Christ; (2) the Bible, written revelation interpreting what He has done for the redemption of men and women; (3) the work of the Holy Spirit in the lives of individuals and the corporate life of the church, applying God's revelation to the minds and hearts of His people. As a result, men and women receive Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior and are enabled to follow Him faithfully in a believing, covenant community until life's end.

The content of special revelation is primarily God Himself. Mystery remains even in God's self-revelation. God does not fully reveal Himself to any person. God does, however, reveal Himself to persons to the degree they can receive it. Special revelation is the declaration of truth about God, His character, and His action and relationship with His creation to bring all creation under Christ, the one head (Eph. 1:9-10).

The proper setting of special revelation is Christian faith. God makes Himself known to those who receive His revelation in faith (Heb. 11:1,6). Faith is the glad recognition of truth, the reception of God's revelation without reservation or hesitation (Rom. 10:17).

For today the Bible is of crucial importance. Through the Bible the Spirit witnesses to individuals of God's grace and the need of faith response. In the Bible we learn of God's redemption of sinners in Christ Jesus. Our faith response to God's Word and acts, recorded and interpreted by the prophets and apostles, calls for us to embrace with humility and teachableness, without finding fault, whatever is taught in Holy Scripture.

In summary we can say that God has initiated the revelation of Himself to men and women. This revelation is understandable to mankind and makes it possible to know God and grow in relationship with Him. God's self-manifestation provides information about Himself for the purpose of leading men and women into God's presence. For believers today the Bible is the source of God's revelation. In the written word we can identify God, know and understand something about Him, His will, and His work, and point others to Him. Special revelation is not generally speculative. The Bible primarily speaks on matters of cosmology and history where these issues touch the nature of faith. God has manifested Himself incarnately through human language, human thought, and human action as ultimately demonstrated in the incarnation of Jesus Christ. David S. Dockery

REVELATION, BOOK OF Last book in the Bible. Its title is from its first word, apokalupsis, meaning to “unveil,” “disclose,” or “reveal.” Revelation 1:1 gives the theme of the book: it is a revelation “of,” “from,” and “about” Jesus Christ. Revelation is apocalyptic literature, though actually a combination of three literary types: (1) apocalyptic—a heightened or intensified form of prophecy which uses cryptic, richly symbolic language to portray the dramatic end-time vindication and victory of God and his people (1:1); (2) prophecy—God's direct word of proclamation to his people through his servants, both foretelling and forth telling (1:3); (3) epistle—a letter addressing needs of particular churches (1:4-7; 2-3; 22:21). Revelation points to future hope and calls for present faithfulness and perseverance.

To encourage faithfulness Revelation points to the glorious world to come, a world where “death will exist no longer; grief, crying, and pain will exist no longer” (21:4 HCSB; cp. 7:16) at the reappearing of the crucified and risen Jesus. The enthroned Lord will return to conclude world history with the destruction of God's enemies, the final salvation of His people, and creation of a new heaven and a new earth (21-22). The intensity of John's experience is matched only by the richness of the apocalyptic symbolism employed to warn his readers of impending disasters and temptations that would require steadfast allegiance to the risen Lord. To be sure, the Lord will come in power and glory but not before His enemies have exercised a terrible but limited (by divine mercy) attack on those who “hold to the testimony of Jesus” (cp. 1:9; 6:9; 12:11).

Author Four times the author identifies himself as John (1:1,4,9; 22:8). Early Christian traditions attribute the Gospel, the three letters, and the book of Revelation to the Apostle John. Revelation is the only one claiming to be written by someone named John. Though the author does not claim to be the Apostle John, it seems unlikely that any other first-century Christian leader would have had the authority or was associated closely enough with the churches of Asia Minor to have referred to himself simply as John. There are some differences in style and language between the Gospel, the Johannine epistles, and the Revelation, but there are also significant similarities. For example, only the Gospel and Revelation refer to Jesus as the Word of God (John 1:1; Rev. 19:13) and the Lamb. The theme of “witness” is also particularly prominent in all five books. The best view is that the John of the Revelation was in fact John the apostle, brother of James, son of Zebedee. See John

Setting The author's situation was one of suffering. He was a “brother and partner in the tribulation” which is “in Jesus” and, because of his testimony to Jesus, was exiled to the island of Patmos (1:9 HCSB). The situations of the recipients varied, though all were experiencing difficulties. A faithful Christian in Pergamum suffered death (2:12-13), and the church in Smyrna was warned of impending persecution (2:10). Ephesus had left its first love (2:4), Pergamum and Thyatira tolerated false teaching (2:14-15; 20), Sardis was spiritually dead (3:1), Philadelphia faced Jewish opposition (3:9), and Laodicea was lukewarm (3:16). These seven churches are the immediate destination of the book. The representative character of the seven churches and the prophetic message of the book indicates, however, that it was for a much wider audience, the church at large.

Date Revelation was written late in the first century. Early tradition dated the book during the reign of the Roman emperor Domitian (A.D. 81-96). An alternative view dates it shortly after the reign of Nero (A.D. 54-68). Scholars who favor the time of Nero argue that the repeated references to persecution in the book (1:9; 2:2-3,10,13; 3:9-10; 6:10-11; 7:14-17; 11:7; 12:13-13:17; 14:12-20; 19:2; 21:4) fit better during his reign, when persecutions clearly took place. The allusion to the temple in 11:1 seems to imply it is still standing, requiring a pre A.D. 70 date. Those who argue for the time of Domitian note that this was the view of Irenaeus, Victorinus, Eusebius, and Jerome. The letters to the seven churches presuppose development and decline, while these churches (not founded until the late 50s) seem to be doing well when Paul was imprisoned in the 60s. By the time of Domitian, a second generation might not exhibit the convictions of the first, especially facing intensified opposition and challenges to compromise (cp. the background to the letters from John). Most scholars affirm the time of Domitian as better and set the date ca. A.D. 90 to 96. Whichever date is correct, it was a time of growing persecution, doctrinal challenge, and moral compromise.

Literary Structure of the Book Several approaches have been offered, of which two have special appeal. First, the book may be outlined around the phrase “in the Spirit” used at four strategic locations when John moves to a different location (1:10; 4:2; 17:3; 21:10). A second approach sees 1:19 as the interpretive key. John is told to write “what you have seen” (chap. 1), “what is” (chaps. 2-3), “and what will take place after this” (chaps. 4-22) (HCSB).

Interpretive Approaches to Revelation Interpreters can usually be placed in one of four categories:

1. Preterist The book is about and for the first century. Most, if not all, of the events described in the book were fulfilled in John's day.

2. Historicists The book is a panorama of church history with attention focusing on its development in the West.

3. Idealist The book is symbolic of timeless truth and the conflict between good and evil. No specific persons or events are in view. The message to be proclaimed and received is that in the end God is victorious.

4. Futurist Beginning with chapter 4 (or 6) the book describes what will take place at the end of history just before the second coming of Jesus Christ and the establishment of His kingdom.

Introduction (1:1-8) Written to “the seven churches” of the Roman province of Asia Minor, John's work is a “revelation” about and from Jesus Christ of “what must quickly take place.” The theme is clear: the Lord God Himself has guaranteed the final vindication of the crucified Jesus (1:7-8). A blessing (the first of seven) is promised to those who hear and heed its message (1:3).

John's Vision on the Island of Patmos (1:9-20) While in exile on Patmos, John saw the risen Lord (1:9-20). Appearing clothed in power and majesty (1:9-20), the Living One revealed Himself as the Lord of the churches and instructed John to send not only the seven letters but also an account of the things which he had seen and would see, a revelation of “what will take place after this” (1:19 HCSB).

Letters to the Seven Churches (2:1-3:22) The letters to the churches of Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea have a fairly consistent format. First, after designating the recipients, the risen Lord describes Himself using a portion of the description in 1:9-20. Then follows an “I know” section of commendation and/or criticism. Next, typically, is some form of exhortation: to those receiving criticism, an exhortation to repent; however, to the churches of Smyrna and Philadelphia, for whom the Lord had only praise, the exhortation is one of assurance (2:10; 3:10-13). Each letter concludes with both an exhortation to “listen to what the Spirit says to the churches” and a promise of reward to the “victor,” the one who conquers by persevering in the cause of Christ. Each promise finds its source in the glorious consummation (Rev. 19-22). The church at Ephesus (2:1-7) is told to return to her first love; the church at Smyrna (2:8-11) to be faithful unto death; the churches of Pergamum (2:12-17) and Thyatira (2:18-29) must beware of false teaching and immoral deeds accompanying erroneous theology. The church at Sardis (3:1-6) is told to wake up and complete her works of obedience. The church at Philadelphia (3:7-13) is promised, in the face of persecution, that faith in Jesus assures access to the eternal kingdom; and the church at Laodicea (3:14-22) is told to turn from self-deception and repent of lukewarmness.

The Sovereignty of the Creator God Committed to the Crucified and Now Enthroned Lamb (4:1-5:14) Chapters 4 and 5 are pivotal, tying the risen Lord's exhortations to the churches (chaps. 2-3) and to the judgments and final triumph of the Lamb (chaps. 6-22). These chapters provide the historical and theological basis of the risen Lord's authority over both the church and the world by depicting His enthronement and power to carry out the judging and saving purposes of God. Chapter 4 asserts the sovereign authority of God the Father as Creator. Chapter 5 depicts the sovereign authority of God the Son as Redeemer. By creation and redemption God is righteous in exercising authority over all things. In Rev. 5 is a book of retribution, redemption, and restoration. This book, containing the remainder of the revelation (chaps. 6-22), is related to Ezekiel's book of woes (2:9-10) and the sealed book of Daniel (12:4,9-10). The crucified Lord Jesus is the risen and exalted Lion and Lamb of God who is allpowerful, all knowing, and present everywhere (5:6). He and He alone is worthy to take the book and open its seven seals. When the Lamb begins to break the seals, the climactic events of history begin to unfold.

The Enthroned Lamb's Judgments via the Seven Seals (6:1-8:5) The breaking of the first four seals brings forth the four horsemen (6:1-8). These riders, paralleling the chaos predicted in Matt. 24 (cp. Mark 13; Luke 21), represent God's judgments through war and its devastating consequences (violence, famine, pestilence, and death). The fifth seal (Rev. 6:9-11) is the plea of martyred saints for divine justice upon their oppressors. For now they must wait.

The sixth seal is important for understanding the literary structure and episodic sequence of Revelation. When broken, it brings forth the typical signs of the end: a great earthquake, blackening of the sun, ensanguining of the moon, and falling of the stars of heaven (cp. Matt. 24:29). At this point we are at the end of world history. The mighty and the lowly of the earth realize that the great day of God's (and the Lamb's) wrath has come, and nothing can save them (6:14-17). The description of the judgments initiated by the first six seals would overwhelm John's audience, so he interrupted the sequence, leading to the seventh seal to remind them that the people of God need not despair, for as the "slaves of our God" (7:3 HCSB), they have the promise of heaven.

A careful reading of Revelation shows that both the seventh seal and the seventh trumpet are empty of content. Some suggest that the three series of judgments (seals, trumpets, and bowls) have a telescopic relationship, so that the seventh seal contains the seven trumpets, and the seventh trumpet contains the seven bowls, accounting for the intensity and rapidity of the judgments toward the end. This also explains being brought to the close of history at the end of each series of judgments, at least in some respect.

Chapter 7 is two visions (7:1-8,9-17) and is something like a parenthesis. The sealing of the 144,000 (7:1-8) is understood by many to be a reference to actual Jewish persons who come to Christ and perform a unique and special service during the tribulation period (cp. Rom. 11:25-29). Others believe John employs Jewish symbolism to represent all believers who have put their trust in Christ. The latter view is unlikely because in the second vision (7:9-17) John sees a great multitude and makes no distinctions among them. Using descriptions of heaven (21:3-4,23; 22:1-5), John tells us they are “coming out of the great tribulation,” now to experience the joys of heaven and relief from tribulations (cp. 7:14-17 with 21:1-6; 22:1-5). To come “out of the great tribulation” (7:14) indicates these are most likely martyred saints who suffered death as witnesses to Jesus (cp. 6:9-11; 12:10-12; 20:4-6). In heaven they now enjoy the presence of God (7:15; 21:3). Christians (“the slaves of our God,” 7:3) have the seal of God. Refusing the mark of the beast (13:16-17; 14:11), they bear testimony to Jesus (14:12) in spite of persecution (12:17; 13:7) and therefore have the promise of final deliverance from great tribulation (7:14).

Revelation 8:1-5 gives the seventh seal and the sign of the very end of human history and the coming of the Lord, but the prophet is not yet ready to describe the Lord's return. Still more must be fulfilled, additional judgments of God, the mission of God's people, and the persecution of the beast. The seventh seal contains the seven trumpets. Using this symbolic vehicle, John reveals the second major series of judgments that move ever closer to the end.

The Enthroned Lamb's Judgments via the Seven Trumpets (8:6-11:19)

The first four trumpets describe partial judgments (“one-third”) upon the earth's vegetation, the oceans, fresh waters, and the heavenly lights (8:6-13). The last three trumpets are grouped together and are described as three “woes” upon the earth, emphasizing God's judgment. These judgments have no redemptive effect, for the “rest of the people” not killed by plagues do not repent of their immoralities (9:20-21).

The interlude between the sixth and seventh seals reminded us that the people of God are safe from the eternally destructive effects of God's wrath, so also between the sixth and seventh trumpets we are reminded of God's protective hand on His people (10:1-11:14). In the trumpet interlude we learn also that God's protection during days of tribulation does not mean isolation, for the people of God must bear a prophetic witness to the world.

In 10:1-8 John's call (cp. Ezek. 2:1-3:11) is reaffirmed. The note of God's providence, protection, and witness is again struck in 11:1-13 with the measuring of the tribulation temple (11:1-2). Persecutions will last "42 months," but His people cannot be destroyed, for the "two witnesses" (11:3-13) must bear witness to the mercy and judgment of God. The "two witnesses" (two suggests confirmed, legal testimony) are also called "two lampstands" (11:4). Some believe they symbolize testifying believers (cp. 1:20). Others think they are two actual persons who will bear witness and be martyred. Like Moses and Elijah, they maintain a faithful prophetic witness to the world, even unto death. Though the earth rejoices when their testimony is brought apparently to an end, the temporary triumph of evil ("three-and-a-half days," 11:9,11) will turn to heavenly vindication as the two witnesses are raised from the dead (11:11-12).

With the seventh trumpet (and third woe) comes the end of history again, the time "for the dead to be judged," and the saints to be rewarded (11:18). Yet John is not ready to describe the actual coming of the Lord. Sadly, he has more to relate regarding "the beast that comes up out of the abyss" to "make war" with the people of God (11:7). John now unfolds the "42 months," the period of persecution, protection, and witness.

The Dragon's Persecution of the Righteous (12:1-13:18) Chapter 12 is crucial for understanding John's view of the sequence of history. Christians and Jews associated the number "three and a half" with times of evil and judgment. John variously referred to the three and a half years as either "42 months," or "1,260 days," or "a time, times, and half a time." During this time, a period when the powers of evil will do their works, God will protect His people (12:6,14) while they bear witness to their faith (11:3) and simultaneously suffer at the hands of evil powers (11:2,7; 12:13-17; 13:5-7). This terrible period of tribulation will end with the coming of the Lord. The critical question, however, is when the three-and-a-half-year period of persecution and witness begins. Some scholars locate the "three-and-a-half years" to some time in the future. Others pinpoint its beginning with the ascension and enthronement of Christ (12:5). When the woman's (Israel's) offspring is “caught up to God and to His throne” (12:5), there is war in heaven, and the dragon is cast down to the earth.

Heaven rejoices because the offspring has been rescued from Satan, but the earth must mourn because the devil has been cast down to earth, and his anger is great. He knows he has been defeated by the risen and exalted Christ and that he has but a short time (12:12). The woman, who (as Israel) brought forth the Christ (12:1-2) and also other “offspring,” those who “have the testimony about Jesus,” now receives the brunt of the frustrated dragon's wrath (12:17). As the enraged dragon seeks to vent his wrath upon the woman, she is nonetheless nourished and protected for “1,260 days” (12:6), for a “time, times, and half a time” (12:14).

The dragon then brings forth two henchmen (chap. 13) to help in pursuit of those who believe in Jesus. Satan is embodied in a political ruler, the beast from the sea (13:1), who will blaspheme for “42 months” (13:5). This is Paul's man of lawlessness (2 Thess. 2:3-12) and the antichrist of John (1 John 2:18,22; 4:3; 2 John 7). He is both a person and the head of a political power. He will “wage war against the saints” (13:7), while the second beast (or false prophet, 19:20) who comes up from the earth (13:11), seeks to deceive the earth so that its inhabitants worship the first beast.

Chapter 12 may be viewed as something of a panorama of redemptive history. Chapter 13 is to be understood in connection with Dan. 7 at the coming of the eschatological antichrist. In the dragon (Satan), the beast and the false prophet will encounter nothing less than a counterfeit trinity, as well as a counterfeit resurrection (13:3). Revelation is clear that Satan is the master deceiver and counterfeiter.

Summary of Triumph, Warning, and Judgment (14:1-20) After depressing news of ongoing persecutions by the unholy trinity, John's readers need another word of encouragement and warning. Chapter 14 employs seven “voices” to relate again the hopes and warnings of heaven. First is another vision of the 144,000, the Jewish remnant. Faithful in their worship of the one true God through Jesus Christ and not seduced by the satanic deceptions of the first beast and his ally, the false prophet, they will be rescued and taken to heaven's throne (14:15).

An angel announces the eternal gospel and warns the earth of coming judgment (14:6-7). The remaining “voices” (or oracles) follow in rapid succession. The fall of “Babylon the Great,” an OT symbol for a nation opposed to the people of God, is announced (14:8). The people of God are warned not to follow the beast lest those who follow him suffer separation from God (14:9-12). Finally, two voices call for harvest (14:14-20).

The Enthroned Lamb's Judgments via the Seven Bowls (15:1-16:21)

Another dimension of His judgment is the seven bowls of wrath, similar to the seven trumpets and the seven seals but also different. The wrath of God is no longer partial or temporary but complete and everlasting, final and irrevocable. The partial Judgments (“one-third”) of the trumpets suggest that God uses sufferings and evil to draw mankind toward repentance and faith; but such tribulations also foreshadow the final hour of judgment when God's wrath is finished.

The seven bowls have no break between the sixth and seventh outpourings of judgment. Only wrath is left with no more delay. Babylon the Great, the symbol for all who have vaunted themselves against the most high God, will fall. The end has come (16:17).

The Fall and Ruin of Babylon (17:1-18:24) Chapter 17 retells the sixth bowl, the fall of Babylon the Great, and chapter 18 gives a moving lament for the great city.

The Marriage Supper of the Lamb (19:1-10) Although John has withheld a description of the coming of the Lord on at least three earlier occasions (8:5; 11:15-19; 16:17-21; cp. 14:14-16), he is now prepared to describe the glories of the Lord's appearance. All of heaven rejoices over the righteous judgment of God upon evil (19:16). The Lamb's bride, the people of God, has made herself ready by her faithfulness to her Lord through the hour of suffering (19:7-8).

The Second Coming of the Lord Jesus (19:11-21) Heaven is opened, and the One whose coming has been faithfully anticipated from ages past appears to battle the enemies of God, a conflict whose outcome is not in doubt (19:11-16). The first beast (the antichrist) and the second beast (the false prophet) are thrown into the lake of fire from which there is no return (19:20), a place of everlasting punishment and torment, not annihilation.

The Millennial Kingdom (20:1-6) The dragon (Satan) is cast into the abyss, a prison for the demonic, which is shut and sealed for a thousand years (20:1-3). Christ will reign for a thousand years on the earth as King of kings and Lord of lords. The dead in Christ are raised to govern with Him (20:4-6), and God's rightful rule over the earth is vindicated.

Satan's Final Rebellion and the Great White Throne Judgment (20:7-15) At the end of the thousand years, the final disposition of Satan will occur (20:7-10). Though Satan will have one last deception, his final insurrection will be short. In one final battle Satan and his followers are overcome, and the devil joins the beast and the false prophet in the lake of fire where “they will be tormented day and night forever and ever” (20:10). Then the final judgment takes place, at which all not included in “the book of life” are thrown into the lake of fire (20:11-15).

The Rejoicing of Heaven, the Revelation of the Lamb, and the Advent of the Bride, the Holy City (21:1-22:5) Chapter 21 refers to the eternal state ushered in by the great white throne judgment and describes the new heaven, new earth, and in particular, the new Jerusalem. It describes the glorification of the bride of the Lamb (21:1-22:5). To be the bride is to be the holy city, the new Jerusalem, to live in the presence of God and the Lamb, and to experience protection, joy, and the everlasting, life-giving light of God (21:9-27). The throne of God and of the Lamb is there, and there His bondservants shall serve Him and reign with Him forever and ever (22:1-5). The new Jerusalem is both a people and a place.

Conclusion (22:6-21) John concluded his prophecy by declaring the utter faithfulness of his words. Those who heed his prophecy will receive the blessings of God. Those who ignore the warnings will be left outside the gates of God's presence (22:6-15). Solemnly and hopefully praying for the Lord to come, John closed his book (22:17,20). The churches must have ears to hear what the Spirit has said (22:16). The people of God must, by His grace (22:21), persevere in the hour of tribulation, knowing their enthroned Lord will return in triumph.

REVELRY Noisy partying or merrymaking. English translations vary greatly in use of revel and its cognates (revelers, reveling, revelry). KJV used “revellings” twice, as a work of the flesh (Gal. 5:21) and as behavior associated with Gentiles (1 Pet. 4:3). RSV used “revelry” once, as a characterization of the behavior of the rich of Samaria (Amos 6:7). NASB and NIV used cognates of “revel” more often (four and eleven times, respectively). In their use “revel” often means little more than rejoice or exult. Of special interest is the association of revelry and idolatry (Exod. 32:6; 1 Cor. 10:7).

REVENGE, REVENGER See Avenger.

REVERENCE Respect or honor paid to a worthy object. In Scripture reverence is paid: to father and mother (Lev. 19:3; Heb. 12:9); to God (1 Kings 18:3,12; Heb. 12:28); to God's sanctuary (Lev. 19:30; 26:2); and to God's commandments (Ps. 119:48). The failure to revere God (Deut. 32:51) and the act of revering other gods (Judg. 6:10) have dire consequences. Reverence for Christ is expressed in mutual submission within the Christian community (Eph. 5:21). Christian persecution takes on new meaning as suffering becomes an opportunity for revering Christ (1 Pet. 3:14-15). See Awe, Awesome; Fear.

REZEPH (Rē' zēph) Place-name meaning “glowing coal.” Town the Assyrians conquered, most likely under Shalmaneser III (about 838 B.C.), and which the Assyrians used as a warning to King Hezekiah of Judah in 701 B.C. against relying on God to deliver him from them (2 Kings 19:12; Isa. 37:12). The site is possibly Rezzafeh about 100 miles southeast of Aleppo.

REZIA (Rē zi' á) (KJV) See Rizia.

REZIN (Rē' zīn) King of Syria about 735 B.C. during the reigns of Pekah in Israel and Ahaz in Judah. When Ahaz refused to join Rezin and Pekah in fighting against Assyria, Rezin persuaded Pekah to ally with him against the Judean king (2 Kings 15:37; 16:5). Ahaz appealed for help to Tiglath-pileser of Assyria, who came against Rezin and Pekah and destroyed their kingdoms. Rezin died in 732 B.C. when Damascus fell to the Assyrians.

REZON (Rē' zōn) Personal name meaning “prince.” An Aramean leader who led a successful revolt against Solomon and established an independent state with its capital at Damascus (1 Kings 11:23-25). See Damascus.

RHEGIUM (Re' gī ūm) Place-name either derived from the Greek rhegnumi (rent, torn) or from the Latin regium (royal). Port located at the southwestern tip of the Italian boot about seven miles across the Strait of Messina from Sicily. Paul stopped there en route to Rome (Acts 28:13). Rhegium was settled by Greek colonists and retained Greek language and institutions into the first century.

RHESA (Re' sá) Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:27).

RHETORIC Art of communicating persuasively and memorably. Scriptural authors employed various rhetorical devices to communicate effectively. Understanding these methods of expression enables students of the Bible to understand their messages more clearly and to share them more effectively with others.

Some rhetorical devices connect words, ideas, or events because of some similarity. Sometimes the similarity was a shared concept. In Heb. 1:5-13 the author used six OT passages that demonstrated the supremacy of the Messiah using a method the rabbis called “pearl-stringing.” Sometimes words or ideas were placed together to highlight differences. Matthew 7:24-27 offers an illustration of what an obedient hearer is like and then contrasts him with a disobedient hearer.

Sometimes the similarity between words is due to sound or spelling rather than meaning. The Greek text of Rom. 1:31 is an example of alliteration, each word begins with the same letter. The first two words are an example of assonance. They rhyme and differ in spelling by only one letter. Similarly, in Rom. 1:29 the words envy and murder differ in spelling by only one letter. Psalm 119 is an acrostic in which the verses of each stanza begin with the same letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Each new stanza begins the next consecutive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. These devices were interesting and made the text easier to remember.

Sometimes ideas were linked because of logical relationships such as cause and effect, problem and resolution, or question and answer. Paul proceeded from cause to effect in Rom. 1:18-32 by showing how sin results in greater corruption and eventually death. Throughout Romans he introduced rhetorical questions, then provided answers and supporting evidences (Rom. 2:21-24; 3:1-4; 6:1-2).

Rhetoric includes literary devices like hyperbole, an intentional exaggeration used to make a powerful point (Matt. 5:29-30), and simile, a comparison using “like” or “as” (“the kingdom of heaven is like”). Rhetoric also involves carefully organizing speech or writing to have a greater impact. Sometimes an account or argument is organized so as to build to a climax. In Phil. 3:2, for example, Paul repeats three times the warning to beware of opponents to the gospel of grace. With each repetition description of his opponents becomes more severe. In a chiasm words were arranged to correspond to one another in the order A B C followed by a reversal CBA (Isa. 6:10).

In the late 20th century a new tool for biblical study developed called rhetorical criticism. The approach was based upon recognition that an understanding of the use of rhetoric in Scripture may provide a useful guide for interpretation. This approach involves studying ancient handbooks on rhetoric in order to understand the models that educated people, particularly during the NT era, used to communicate. Then one compares these models to sections or entire books of Scripture. The method may help one understand the writer's message, its structure and purpose, and even how the original readers might have responded. Charles L. Quarles

RHODA (Rōdā) Personal name meaning “rose.” Rhoda's relationship to the household of Mary, the mother of John Mark, is not clear. She was most likely a servant, though it is possible that she was a family member or a guest at the prayer service. In her great joy at finding Peter at the door, Rhoda failed to let him in. Her joy in rushing to tell the disciples and their response accusing her of madness recall details of Luke's resurrection narrative (Acts 12:13; cp. Luke 24:9-11).

RHODES (Rōdz) Island off the southwest coast of Asia Minor in the Mediterranean Sea associated with the Dodanim (NASB, KJV; Gen. 10:4; Ezek. 27:15). Rhodes was founded as a Minoan trading colony about 1500

B.C. and came under the control of a single government around 407 B.C. A wealthy shipping center, Rhodes developed navies that controlled the eastern Mediterranean. Standing with one foot on either side of the harbor entrance was the 105-foot-tall brass Colossus, one of the “Seven Wonders of the World.” Set up in 288 B.C., it fell during an earthquake about 64 years later. Disloyalty to Roman rule met with stiff economic sanctions against the city and threw it into decline. While enjoying some popularity as the center of the cult of Helios, the sun god, Rhodes could not rise above Roman economic pressure. When the Apostle Paul stopped over on his voyage from Troas to Caesarea (Acts 21:1), Rhodes was only a minor provincial city. See Dodanim.

RIBAI (Ri' bá1) Personal name meaning “Yahweh contends.” Father of Ittai, one of David's 30 elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:29; 1 Chron. 11:31).

RIBBAND KJV form of ribbon (Num. 15:38). Modern translations read “cord” (NASB, NIV, NRSV) or “thread” (REB).

RIBLAH (Rib' lah) 1. Syrian town located near Kadesh on the Orontes near the border with Babylonia. There Pharaoh Neco imprisoned King Jehoahaz of Judah after the young monarch had reigned only three months (2 Kings 23:31-33). Later, when Zedekiah rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, he was taken to Riblah as a prisoner and viewed the execution of his sons before having his eyes put out (25:4-7). See Diblah. 2. Otherwise unknown town on eastern border of Canaan (Num. 34:11). Earliest translations read “Arbelah.”

RICHERS See Wealth and Materialism.

RIDDLE Enigmatic or puzzling statement, often based on the clever use of the ambiguities of language. The classic biblical example of a riddle is that posed by Samson to the Philistines. The riddle is in poetic form (Judg. 14:12-14), and the question, “What is it?” is implied. The Philistines reply is in the form of another riddle (v. 18a) whose original answer was probably “love.” Samson's retort may reflect yet another commonly known, and rather risqué, riddle (v. 18b).

The city and harbor area of the island of Rhodes.

Temple ruins in the area of Lindos on the island of Rhodes.

The Hebrew word for “riddle” also appears elsewhere in the OT. The Lord spoke with Moses directly, not in “riddles” (Num. 12:8 NIV, REB, NRSV) or “dark speech” (KJV, NASB). The Queen of Sheba tested Solomon with “hard questions” or riddles (1 Kings 10:1-13). Riddles were a form of poetic expression (Ps. 49:4); a mark of wisdom was the ability to solve them (Prov 1:6). Daniel had such wisdom (Dan. 5:12). Daniel C. Browning, Jr.

The streets of Rhodes have remained basically unchanged for centuries.

RIGHT MIND Sound mind, mentally healthy (Mark 5:15; Luke 8:35). Elsewhere, the underlying Greek term is rendered “sober judgment” (Rom. 12:3 NRSV) or “self-controlled” (Titus 2:6 NRSV).

RIGHTEOUSNESS Biblical terminology used to denote the term “righteousness” is from one basic word group. The Hebrew tsadiq is translated by the Greek dikaiosune and its various forms in both the LXX and the NT.

Old Testament Objects are considered righteous in the Torah. Leviticus 19:36 and Deut. 25:15 speak of “just weights and measures.” Similarly, Deut. 4:8 and 33:19 speak respectively of right statues and sacrifices. Persons are often referred to as righteous. Noah (Gen. 6:9), Jezreel (1 Kings 10:9), and with some qualifications Ish Bosheth (2 Sam. 4:11-12) are all considered righteous. Abraham (Gen. 15:6) and Phinehas (Ps. 106:31) are both credited righteous by God. In the OT righteousness is used in a comparative moral sense (Gen. 38:26; 1 Sam. 24:17). The individuals (Tamar and David) are not righteous because of innocence but in comparative virtue to their counter-parts (Judah and Saul).

Righteous as a forensic theme is present in the OT. Absalom seeks to usurp his father's authority by becoming a seditious judge (2 Sam. 15:4), while his father is seemingly fulfilling the obligations of a righteous king (2 Sam. 8:5). The phrase “just and right” that describe David's actions in 2 Sam. 8:5 is used elsewhere (Isa. 9:7; 32:16; Jer. 4:2; 9:24; 33:15; Ezek. 18:5, 19,21,27; 45:9; Amos 5:7,24).

In the Prophets righteousness often represents the idea of socio-covenantal justice. Amos 5:24 sets forth the Day of the Lord as bringing about “justice” and “righteousness.” In Isaiah the presence of righteousness results in peace (Isa. 9:2-7; 32:16-17; 60:17). Isaiah also describes righteous in an eschatologically salvific sense (56:1; 59:4; 62:1-2; 64:5). Hosea views righteousness in the context of Israel's lack of faithfulness to God (2:19; 10:12; cp. 14:9). Jeremiah, Habakkuk, and Ezekiel all speak of righteousness as covenant obligation, whether to the king (Jer. 22:15; 23:5) or any Israelite (Ezek. 3:20-21; 14:12-20; 18:5-32; 33:12-20). Habakkuk 2:4 asserts the just will live by faith (cp. Rom. 1:16-17). Malachi and Zechariah picture righteousness as an eschatological theme (Mal. 3:17-18; Zech. 3:7-8).

Wisdom literature presents a multifaceted picture of righteousness. The driving question for Job 3-41 is “Can a mortal be more righteous than God?” (Job 4:17 NIV). This question gives the context for the ensuing discussion. In Proverbs the righteous person is characterized as honest (10:20; 13:5), generous (21:26), steadfast and courageous (11:8-10; 12:7; 18:10), merciful and just (12:10; 29:7; cp. 31:9), and his ways lead to life (10:16; 11:19; 12:28; 21:21). While neither Proverbs nor Job articulates a specific standard of righteousness, the righteous person is pictured as the quintessential covenant keeper; one committed to God and living justly among His people.

In Psalms righteousness sometimes denotes what is right (4:5; 23:3; 52:3). The righteous person might experience God's blessing (Ps. 18:20,24) or afflictions, some of which are divine in their origin (34:19; 69:26; 119:75; 146:8). Psalms 111-112 provide a holistic picture of the righteousness of God and the righteous man. Righteousness itself is grounded in the character of God (Exod. 9:27; Deut. 32:4; Judg. 5:11; 1 Sam. 12:7; Mic. 6:4; cp. Ps. 103:6; Dan. 9:16; 2 Chron. 12:6; Ezra 9:15; Neh. 9:8; Pss. 119:137; 129:4). He is righteous, His law is righteous, and He alone credits righteousness to man.

New Testament In the NT, like the OT, God and all that comes from Him is righteous. His judgments are righteous (2 Thess. 1:5-6; Rev. 16:7; 19:2; 2 Tim. 4:8), as He Himself is as a judge (John 5:30). All God's revealed will in Jesus' teachings is righteousness (Matt. 6:33; John 16:8-10).

In the Gospels and Acts, the idea of righteousness is applied to Christ (Matt. 27:19,24; Luke 23:47; Acts 3:14; 7:52; 22:14). Mark describes John the Baptist as righteous (6:20). The Holy Spirit is described as righteous in John 16:8.

Paul utilizes the idea of righteousness more than other writers in the NT. God demonstrates His righteousness perfectly in the propitiatory death of His Son (Rom. 3:21,25-26). Jesus' death on the cross was ordained by God, is in conformity with His character, and accomplishes God's righteous purposes with sinners (Rom. 5:16,18). Righteousness is revealed clearly in the gospel (Rom. 1:16-17). Therefore God's indignation towards sin and His covenant love in justifying sinners are both realized in Jesus' death. Romans 3:6 parallels God's righteousness with His love and faithfulness (cp. Pss. 116:5; 145:17). The resurrection of Christ vindicates Christ (Act. 3:14-15; 1 Pet. 2:23; 3:18; 1 Tim. 3:16) and completes God's transaction between fallen humanity and Jesus. "He made the One who did not know sin to be sin for us, so that we might become the righteousness of God in Him" (2 Cor. 5:21 HCSB). God is shown to be both just and the justifier of those who believe in Christ (Rom. 3:26). Thus, the righteous live no other way but by faith (Hab. 2:4; cp. Rom. 1:16-17), for through faith they are granted the righteousness of God.

Man is not naturally righteous (Pss. 14:1; 53:1, cp. Rom. 3:10-18). Righteousness is not native to him but to God. In Jesus' teaching the righteousness of the Pharisees is not enough to gain entrance into the kingdom of God (Matt. 5:20; cp. 23:13-36). Paul argues in Rom. 3 that no man is naturally righteous. Even after conversion Paul speaks of the struggle to follow the law of righteousness and not the law he finds in his "body of death" (Rom. 7:14-8:1). God credits righteousness to those who exercise faith in Him (Rom. 4:5). In Christ one becomes all that God requires (2 Cor. 5:21; cp. Rom. 4:6,14). The result of becoming the righteousness of God is a life of righteousness before God. Paul urges believers to continue to offer up the members of their bodies as instruments of righteousness to God (Rom. 6:13). The Christian is urged to put on the breastplate of righteousness (Eph. 6:14). Timothy is exhorted to flee youthful lusts, call on God from a pure heart, and pursue righteousness (2 Tim. 4:8). Those trained through discipline produce the peaceful fruit of righteousness (Heb. 12:9-11).

In James the anger of man does not achieve the righteousness of God (1:2), but the prayer of a righteous man does achieve much (5:16). In Revelation Jesus comes back to judge in righteousness (Rev. 16:7; 19:2). See Ethics; Grace; Law; Mercy; Salvation. Jeff Mooney

RIMMON (Rim' mon) Place-name and divine name meaning "pomegranate."
1. Chief god of Syria, also called Hadad. Naaman worshiped Rimmon in Damascus (2 Kings 5:18). 2. Town allotted to tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:32) but then given to Simeon (19:7; cp. 1 Chron. 4:32). Early translations and many modern interpreters read En-rimmon in all occurrences. It is modern Khirbet er-Ramamin two miles south of Lahav. Zechariah 14:10 described it as the southern boundary of God's new exalted kingdom. See En-rimmon. 3. Levitical city in Zebulun (Josh. 19:13; 1 Chron. 6:77), probably an alternative reading for 'Dimnah' (Josh. 21:35). It is present Rummaneh, six miles northeast of Nazareth. See Dimnah. 4. Rock near Gibeah to where the people of Benjamin fled from vengeful Israelites (Judg. 20:45-47), modern Rammun four miles east of Bethel. 5. Father of Rechab and Baanah, who killed Saul's son Ish-Bosheth (2 Sam. 4:2,9).

RIMMON-PAREZ (Rīm mon-Pā' rēz) (KJV) or RIMMON-PEREZ (Rīm mon-Pē' rēz) Place-name meaning "pomegranate of the pass." Campsite during Israel's wilderness wanderings (Num. 33: 19-20).

RIMMONO (Rīm mōn' ō) Place-name meaning "his Rimmon." NIV, NASB, NRSV reading of Rimmon in 1 Chron. 6:77 (cp.Josh. 19:13; 21:25).

RINNAH (Rīn' nah) Personal name meaning "ringing cry." Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

RIPHATH (Rī' phāth) Personal name of foreign origin. Son of Gomer, likely the ancestor of an Anatolian tribe (Gen. 10:3). The name is likely a scribal corruption of Diphath (1 Chron. 1:6).

RISHATHAIM (Rīz' pah) Mesopotamian king, Cushan-rishathaim, who conquered and oppressed Israel (Judg. 3:8). Cushan may relate to Guzana or Tell Halaf. KJV uses Chushan-rishathaim. See Cushan-Rishathaim.

RISSAH (Rīsh á thā' ĩm) Place-name possibly meaning "dewdrop," "rain," or "ruins." Campsite during Israel's wilderness wanderings (Num. 33:21-22), modern Sharma, east of Gulf of Aqaba.

RITHMAH (Rīs' sah) Place-name meaning "broom plant." Campsite during Israel's wilderness wanderings (Num. 33:18-19), possibly valley called er-Retame, east of Gulf of Aqaba.

RIVER OF EGYPT See Brook of Egypt.

RIVERS AND WATERWAYS From the earliest efforts at permanent settlement in the ancient Near East, people were attracted to the rivers and streams that ultimately would dictate population distribution between the mountains, deserts, and the seas. The flood plains of many of these rivers originally were inhospitable with thick, tangled jungles, wild beasts, and unpredictable flooding and disease. However, within the areas of plain and lowland that provided a more constant food supply and ease of movement, the need for a permanent water source attracted settlers to the riverbanks. Thus the early river civilizations of the Nile, the Tigris, and Euphrates starting about 3000 B.C., and the Indus civilization slightly later, resulted in response to the challenges and benefits these important waterways presented. Flood control, social and economic organization, and invention of writing as a means of communication developed. Trade was facilitated by means of navigable waterways. Since roads followed the lines of least resistance, the pattern of early trade routes conformed closely, especially in more rugged terrain, to channels and courses of the rivers and streams, and along the shoreline where the earliest fishing villages developed.

Rivers and Streams Each of the biblical rivers was developed to meet distinct human needs. A study of rivers helps understand the culture near the river.

Nile River The name “Nile” is not explicitly mentioned in KJV, but modern translations most often translated the Hebrew ye 'or as the Nile. The Nile plays a prominent role in the early events in the life of Moses in Exodus (Moses, Exod. 2:3; the 10 plagues, Exod. 7:15,20). The Nile is alluded to in many other passages as “the river” (Gen. 41:1), the “river of Egypt” (Gen. 15:18), the “flood of Egypt” (Amos 8:8), Shihor (Josh. 13:3), river of Cush among other names. The “brook of Egypt” mostly is a reference to Wadi el-Arish, the drainage system of the central Sinai. The Prophets Amos (8:8; 9:5) and Jeremiah (46:8) used the Nile as the symbol of Egypt, a concept that is readily understood in terms of the river's historical importance to the survival and well-being of the country.

For the Egyptians the predictable annual flooding of the Nile with the depositing of the fertile black alluvial soil meant the enrichment of the flood plain and the difference between food and famine. From the central highlands of East Africa, the Nile with a watershed of over one million square miles is formed by the union of the White and Blue Niles and flows a distance of nearly 3,500 miles. From its low ebb at the end of May, the flow of the river gradually rises to its maximum flood stage at the beginning of September. Historically, approximately 95 percent of Egypt's population depended upon the productivity of the 5 percent of the country's land area within the flood plain of the Nile. In the Delta at least three major branches facilitated irrigation in the extensive fan north of Memphis, the ancient capital of lower Egypt. See Egypt; Nile River.

Euphrates First mentioned in Gen. 2:14 as one of the four branches of the river that watered the garden of Eden, the Euphrates flows 1,700 miles to become the longest river in Western Asia. From the mountainous region of northeastern Turkey (Armenia), it flows southward into northern Syria and turns southeasterly to join the Tigris and flows into the Persian Gulf. On the Middle Euphrates, Carchemish, originally the center of a small city-state, became the important provincial capital of the Mitanni kingdom, later of the Hittite and Assyrian Empires. At Carchemish in 605 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar II defeated Pharaoh Necho as he began his successful drive to claim the former Assyrian Empire for Babylon (2 Kings 24:7; Jer. 46). Two important tributaries, the Belikh and Khabur, flow into the Euphrates from the north before it continues on to the ancient trade center at Mari. The Lower Euphrates generally formed the western limits of the city-states that made up the early Sumerian civilization. From the river plain to the delta, both the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers regularly have formed new branches and changed their courses. About 90 percent of their flow mysteriously is lost to irrigation, evaporation, pools and lakes, and the swamps and never reaches the Persian Gulf. Lost as well in this region are the vast amounts of sediment that the Tigris and Euphrates bring from the mountainous regions. Sediment deposits along the lower courses of these rivers average 16 to 23 feet with 36-foot deposits in some regions. It has been calculated that the Tigris alone removes as much as three million tons of eroded highland materials in a single day. In the extreme south the two rivers join in a combined stream that today is known as the Shatt el-Arab.

The flooding of the Mesopotamian rivers in March and April differs from the Nile schedule, which during that season is at its low ebb. The melting snows and rains at their sources create sudden, disastrous torrents that, along the Tigris especially, must be controlled by dams during such periods before they can supply a beneficial irrigation system. See Euphrates and Tigris Rivers.

The course of the Upper Euphrates was described as the northern border of the promised land (Gen. 15:18; Deut. 1:7; 11:24; Josh. 1:4). David, in fact, extended his military influence to its banks during the height of his power (2 Sam. 8:3; 10:16-18; 1 Kings 4:24). The terms “the river,” “the flood,” “the great river,” and “beyond the river” (Josh. 24:2-3; Ezra 4:10-13; Neh. 2:7-9) refer to the Euphrates, historically a significant political and geographical boundary.

Tigris From its source in a small lake (Hazar Golu), about 100 miles west of Lake Van, in Armenia, the Tigris flows in a southeasterly direction for about 1,150 miles before joining the Euphrates and emptying into the Persian Gulf. It achieves flood stage during March and April from the melting mountain snows and subsides after mid-May. While its upper flow is swift within narrow gorges, from Mosul and Nineveh southward its course was navigable and was extensively used in antiquity for transport. A series of tributaries from the slopes of the Zagros emptied into the Tigris from the east, including the Greater and Lesser Zab and the Diyala. The Diyala flows into the Tigris near Baghdad. In antiquity its banks were inhabited by a dense population maintained and made prosperous by an excellent irrigation system. The Euphrates, flowing at a level nine meters higher than the Tigris, permitted the construction of a sequence of irrigation canals between the two rivers that resulted in unusual productivity. South of Baghdad where their courses again separated, a more complicated system of canals and diversions were necessary.

The banks of the Tigris were dotted by some of the most important cities of antiquity: Nineveh, the capital of Assyria during the Assyrian Empire; Asshur, the original capital of Assyria; Opis (in the vicinity of Baghdad), the important commercial center of Neo-Babylonian and later times; Ctesiphon, the capital of the Parthians and Sassanians; and Seleucia, capital of the Seleucid rulers of Mesopotamia.

Rivers of Anatolia Several rivers water this part of modern Turkey. See Asia Minor, Cities of. its sources in the Armenian mountains, the Halys begins its 714-mile flow to the southwest only to be diverted by a secondary ridge into a broad loop until its direction is completely reversed into a northeasterly direction through the mountainous regions bordering the southern shore of the Black Sea. As the longest river in Anatolia, the Halys, like the other principal rivers in Turkey, is the result of heavy rainfall in the Pontic zone. Because of their winding courses within the coastal mountain chains, none of these rivers is navigable. Within this loop of the Halys in the northern Anatolian plateau, the Hittites established their capital Boghazkoy. The course of the Halys generally formed the borders of the district of Pontus.Halys River

Rivers of the Aegean Coast The broken Aegean coastline boasted a series of sheltered havens and inlets that prompted Greek colonization and the establishment the great harbor cities of the later Greek and Roman periods. The mouths of the Aegean rivers deemed ideal for maritime centers during colonization ultimately proved disastrous. The lower courses of these rivers, relatively short and following a meandering course over their respective plains, are very shallow and sluggish during the summer months. Their upper courses, however, of recent formation, carry enormous quantities of alluvium from the highlands that tended to fill the estuaries and gulfs. Constant dredging was required to maintain the harbor's access to the sea and to avoid the formation of malaria-infested swamps. Thus the Hermus (155 miles) was diverted to prevent the destruction of the harbor of Smyrna (Izmir). To the south at Ephesus, the original town site on the disease-ridden marshlands was abandoned about A.D. 400 for the construction of a new harbor on the Cayster River. During the days of Ephesus' prosperity, the constant dredging was adequately maintained. However, with the decline of the Roman Empire after A.D. 200, the silting of the harbor brought the rapid decline of the city. Miletus, on the alluvial plain of the Maeander

River (236 miles), was originally established on a deep gulf well sheltered from the prevailing winds. The great Ionian city had possessed four harbors, but the silting of the harbors by the alluvial deposits of the Maeander ultimately brought about the decline and abandonment of the city. Though these Aegean rivers were not navigable, the alluvial plains that bordered them provided convenient and vital access and communications to the interior.

Rivers of Syro-Palestine In Syria and Palestine rivers often separated peoples rather than providing economic power.

Orontes and Litani High within the Beqa Valley that forms the rift between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon mountain ranges, a watershed (about 3,770 feet above sea level) forms the headwaters of the Orontes and Litani Rivers. The rains and snow on the mountain summits at heights of over 11,000 feet course down into the six- to 10-mile-wide Beqa which is a part of the great Rift (“Valley of Lebanon,” Josh. 11:17). From the watershed the Orontes flows northward and bends westward to empty into the Mediterranean near Antioch. The Litani flows southward and ultimately escapes to the sea north of Tyre. Unfortunately its lower course has formed such a deep, narrow gorge that it is useless for communication. See Palestine.

Jordan River A series of springs and tributaries, resulting from the rains and snows on the heights of Mount Hermon (up to 9,100 feet above sea level) at the southern end of the Anti-Lebanon mountains east of the Rift Valley, converge in Lake Huleh to form the headwaters of the Jordan River. Along the eastern edge of the Huleh Valley, it flows southward into Lake Kinnereth (the Sea of Galilee). Only about eight miles wide and 14 miles long, the fresh waters of the Galilee and its fishing industry sustained a dense population during most historical periods. At the Galilee's southern end the Jordan exits and flows 65 miles on to the Dead Sea (about 1,300 feet below sea level). The Jordan flows 127 miles with a drainage area of about 6,380 square miles. The Yarmuk River joins the Jordan five miles south of the Sea of Galilee. The Jabbok River reaches the Jordan from the east 25 miles north of the Dead Sea.

At the Jordan's end the Dead Sea extends another 45 miles between high, rugged cliffs of Nubian sandstone and limestone between the arid wilderness bordering the Judean watershed on the west and the Transjordanian plateau on the east. The sea and the inhospitable terrain along its shoreline discouraged regular travel and transport within the area.

The Jordan appears never to have served as a waterway for travel or transport but rather as a natural barrier and a political boundary that because of its steep banks and the densely wooded fringe that lined its devious route (“thickets of the Jordan,” Jer. 49:19, NASB, NRSV; cp. 2 Kings 6:4) could be crossed without difficulty only at its fords (Josh. 3). Control of the fords during military confrontations in biblical times constituted a critical advantage (Judg. 3:28; 12:5-6). The Jordan's role as a political boundary appears to have been established already shortly after 2000 B.C. when the eastern frontier of the Egyptian province of Canaan followed the Jordan. Even though Israelite tribes were given special permission to settle in the Trans jordan, it was always clear that, beyond the Jordan, they actually were residing outside the promised land (Josh. 22). Even in postbiblical times the eastern boundary of the Persian and Hellenistic province of Judea followed the Jordan. Apart from the fertile oases that dotted the Jordan Valley, agricultural prosperity was assured during the Hellenistic and Roman times when irrigation was developed along the gradual slopes on either side of the Jordan within the Rift Valley. See Jordan.

Kishon River The Kishon River forms the drainage system of the Jezreel Plain and the southern portion of the Accho Plain. While a number of its small tributaries have their sources in springs at the base of Mount Tabor, in southern Galilee and in the extension of the Carmel in the vicinity of Taanach and Megiddo, the Kishon is rarely more than a brook within relatively shallow and narrow banks except during the heavy rains of the winter months. During those times its course becomes a marshy bog and impassable. From the Jezreel it passes along the base of Mount Carmel through the narrow pass formed by a spur of the Galilean hills and into the Accho Plain, where some additional tributaries join before it empties into the Mediterranean. Its total length from the springs to the sea is only 23 miles. In biblical history it is best known for its role in the Barak-Deborah victory over the Canaanite forces of Sisera (Judg. 4-5) and Elijah's contest with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18:40).

Yarkon River The Yarkon is formed by the seasonal runoff from the western slopes of the Samaritan and Judean hills that flows into the Brook Kanah, its major tributary, and the rich springs at the base of Aphek about eight miles inland from the Mediterranean shoreline. Though anchorages and small harbors, such as Tel Qasile, a Philistine town, were established along its course and the cedar timbers from Lebanon were floated inland to Aphek for transport to Jerusalem for the construction of Solomon's palace and temple, the Yarkon historically formed a major barrier to north-south traffic because of the extensive swamps that formed along its course. The profuse vegetation that bordered its banks probably suggested its name that was derived from the Hebrew yaroq, meaning "green." The Yarkon, in biblical times, formed the border between the tribes of Dan and Ephraim to the north. Farther inland the Brook Kanah formed the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. 16:8; 17:9).

Major Bodies of Water Two major seas heavily influenced Israel's political, economic, and cultural history.

Mediterranean Sea The Mediterranean Sea had a width of 100 to 600 miles and stretched over 2,000 miles from the Straits of Gibraltar to the Palestinian coast.

Formed by the movement of the European and North African continental plates, the greater Mediterranean consists of a series of basins and extended shoreline that historically contributed to the vitality of maritime commerce and trade. The unusually straight coast along the south portion of its eastern shoreline and the lack of natural coves and harbor facilities limited Israelite opportunities for direct involvement in Mediterranean maritime commerce. While limited port facilities existed at coastal towns such as Joppa, Dor, and Accho, they were hardly adequate to facilitate more than a local fishing fleet and an occasional refuge during a storm for the larger merchant ships that frequented the great harbors established farther to the north along the Phoenician coast. As a result the treaties established between the Israelite kings and the Phoenicians provided for an exchange of agricultural and horticultural produce in exchange for lumber and imports (2 Chron. 2:16), and a mutually beneficial cooperation in maintaining a monopoly on both land and sea routes of commerce and trade (1 Kings 9:26-27). The Mediterranean became the “Roman” sea when the peaceful conditions of Roman control of land masses along most of the Mediterranean shoreline fostered a dramatic movement of products, merchandise, and people to satisfy the diverse needs of the provinces and Roman policy in them. See Mediterranean Sea.

Red Sea The Red Sea (Hb. yam suph, lit. “Sea of Reeds”) is a long narrow body of water separating the Arabian Peninsula from the northeastern coast of Africa (Egypt, Sudan, and Ethiopia). At its southern end its narrow straits (21 miles wide) open to the Indian Ocean. With a length of about 1,240 miles and a width that varies from 124 to 223 miles, the total surface area is just over 176,000 square miles. While its average depth is about 1,640 feet, as a part of the great rift or fault that runs northward from Lake Victoria to the base of the Caucasus Mountains in southern Russia, the Red Sea plunges to 7,741 feet near Port Sudan. It is the warmest and most saline of all the open seas. Though the shores of the Red Sea historically have been sparsely settled and its ports have been few, its waterway provided access to the distant ports of the Indian Ocean and the eastern shoreline of Africa where the Phoenician merchant fleets under lease to Solomon bartered for the luxury goods that graced the royal courts of the Levant (1 Kings 9:26).

In the north the Gulf of Suez and the Gulf of Elath (Aqaba) form the western and eastern arms making up the shorelines of the Sinai Peninsula. The Egyptian pharaohs used the Gulf of Suez as the shortest route to the Mediterranean. It was linked with the Bitter Lakes and the Nile by a canal that existed before 600 B.C. and was maintained by the Persians, the Ptolemies, and the Romans.

With the expansion of David's empire, the Gulf of Elath (Aqaba) provided the vital maritime trade outlet that the kings of Israel and Judah and the Phoenician allies exploited to fill the coffers of Jerusalem. After the demise of the Judean kingdom, the Nabateans established a similar monopoly over the same marine commerce and the overland caravan routes through Petra to Damascus and Gaza for transshipment on the Mediterranean. Again in Hellenistic times, the Indian trade routes were reestablished and maintained throughout Roman times. See Red Sea.

Conclusion Apart from the significant roles played by the Nile in Egypt and the Tigris and Euphrates in Mesopotamia, the rivers of the biblical world were small and mostly unnavigable. As a result, apart from the alluvial plains that bordered their banks, these rivers played a more meaningful role as barriers and boundaries than as waterways for travel and transport. In terms of early biblical history, the Mediterranean and the Red Seas played the more dominant roles in intercultural and commercial exchange. As the Greek and Roman Empires developed, the western seas—the Aegean, Ionian, Adriatic, and Tyrrhenian—grew in importance. In the north and east, the Black Sea, the Caspian Sea, and the Persian Gulf with the mountain ranges that linked them basically formed the limits of the biblical world. George L. Kelm RIZIA (RĪth' mah) Personal name meaning “delight.” Head of a family within the tribe of Asher who was a renowned warrior (1 Chron. 7:39-40).

RIZPAH (RĪ' zī ă) Personal name meaning “glowing coals” or “bread heated over coals or ashes.” Saul's concubine whom Abner took as wife in what amounted to a claim to the throne (2 Sam. 3:7; cp. 1 Kings 2:22). Rizpah is best known for her faithful vigil over the bodies of her executed sons (2 Sam. 21:10-14) until David commanded their burial.

ROBBERY Taking another person's property without the person's consent. The basic biblical law concerning robbery is the prohibition of the Ten Commandments, "You shall not steal" (Exod. 20:15; Deut. 5:19). Such an absolute statement makes it irrelevant whether the robber acquires property by force, duplicity, or oppression (Gen. 31:31; Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:14-15; Mal. 3:5; John 10:1). Remarkably little concerning robbery is written in the law of Moses. Unlike Assyrian and Babylonian law, no specific penalty is prescribed. Instead, the emphasis is upon restoration of the stolen property to its lawful owner (Exod. 22:1,4,7,9; Lev. 6:1-7; Num. 5:5-8). If a thief could not return or replace it, the thief could be sold into slavery until restitution was made (Exod. 22:3).

During the NT period robbery was the jurisdiction of Roman law. Captured robbers, on occasion, were crucified (Matt. 27:38; Mark 15:27). Robbery could be political. Palestine contained various groups called Zealots, famous for zeal in Judaism and opposition to Rome. The more militant groups, such as the Sicarii, resorted to murder and robbery.

First-century robbers frequently operated together in bands, attacking travelers (Luke 10:30). The surprise of such an attack is analogous to the suddenness of Christ's return (Rev. 3:3). Robbery threatens material possessions; therefore, Jesus commanded faith in spiritual things (Matt. 6:19-20). LeBron Matthews

ROCK Use of rocky sites as places of refuge (Num. 24:21; Judg. 15:8; 20:47) led to the frequent image of God as a rock, that is, a source of protection. Titles of God include: the "Stone of Israel" (Gen. 49:24 NASB); the Rock (Deut. 32:4); the Rock of salvation (32:15); the Rock who begot Israel (32:18); "a rock that is high above me" (Ps. 61:2 HCSB). Isaiah 8:13-14 pictures the Lord of Hosts as a "rock to stumble over" (NASB) to the unholy people of Israel and Judah. Paul identified Christ as the spiritual Rock which nourished Israel in the wilderness (1 Cor. 10:4). Other texts apply to Christ, the Isaiah image of a rock which causes persons to fall (Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:8). Jesus' teaching is the rock-solid foundation for life (Matt. 7:24-25). The identity of the rock upon which Christ promised to build the church (Matt. 16:18) is disputed. Possible identifications include: Peter (whose name means “rock”), the larger group of disciples, Christ Himself, and Peter's confession of faith. The different Greek terms employed (Petros and petra) argue against a quick identification of Peter as the foundation. Both Christ (1 Cor. 3:11) and the larger circle of apostles (Eph. 2:20; Rev. 21:14) are pictured as the foundation of the church elsewhere. It seems unlikely that Matthew presents Christ as both builder and foundation of the church. Application of the foundation image to evangelistic work (Rom. 15:20; 1 Cor. 3:10) suggests that Peter's God-revealed confession of faith in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God (Matt. 16:16), is the foundation of the church which lays siege to the gates of Hades. ROD, STAFF “Rod” designates a straight, slender stick growing on (Jer. 1:11) or cut from (Gen. 30:37-41) a tree. “Rod” is sometimes used interchangeably with “staff” (Isa. 10:5; Rev. 11:1). Elsewhere, rod designates a shorter, clublike stick (Ps. 23:4). Rods and staffs were used as walking sticks (Gen. 32:10), for defense (Ps. 23:4), for punishment (Exod. 21:20; Num. 22:27; Prov. 13:24; 1 Cor. 4:21), and for measurement (Rev. 11:1). Rods and staffs were also used as symbols of prophetic (Exod. 4:2-4; 7:8-24; Judg. 6:21), priestly (Num. 17:1-10), and royal (Gen. 49:10 NRSV; Judg. 5:14 NRSV; Jer. 48:17; Rev. 2:27) offices.

RODANIM (Rōd' á nīm) Inhabitants of Rhodes (1 Chron. 1:7 NRSV). The parallel in Gen. 10:4 (KJV) reads “Dodanim” which should be preferred as the more difficult reading. Rhodians, however, fits well in the general geographic context.

RODENTS All small rodents are designated by the Hebrew akbar, a generic word including both mice and rats. The Mosaic prohibition against eating rodents (Lev. 11:29) reveals their presence in the Holy Land. As a guilt offering for stealing the ark of the covenant, the Philistines were advised to send “five golden mice” to the Israelites when they returned the ark to them (1 Sam. 6:4, KJV; rats, NIV). More than 20 varieties of small rodents have been identified in the Holy Land today.

ROMAN LAW The Roman Empire dominated the first-century A.D. Mediterranean world, including Palestine. Roman law developed over a period of 1,000 years, from the publication of the XII Tables in 451 to 450 B.C., to Justinian's codification in A.D. 529 to 534. The major points of the relevance of Roman law were for interpreting the parts of the NT centered on Roman criminal jurisprudence, Roman citizenship, and adoption. The sources of Roman law were the laws and statutes passed by the citizens of Rome in legal assembly, resolutions made by the senate, edicts of magistrates and governors, legal interpretations made by jurists, edicts, and judicial decisions of emperors, and the consultation of jurists. Provincial laws and customs also contributed to the codification of laws during the Roman era. Imperial decisions could have been invalidated (for example, those laws of crazed rulers such as Caligula and Nero), unless these laws were renewed by the emperor's successor. Beginning in the second century, jurists collected and organized the laws, judicial decisions, and other components of the legal system of various venues that served as guides for future jurisprudence. The collection and organization of laws reached its climax in the codes of Theodosius and Justinian in the fourth and sixth centuries respectively.

By the early part of the first century A.D., a considerable legal system, known as ordo, had developed which covered offenses against persons, society, and the government and applied to all citizens. The ordo contained a list of crimes and punishments with the maximum and minimum penalties that could be exacted against Roman citizens. The ordo referred to prescribed procedures and punishments for breaking certain statutes and was binding in Rome. Crimes not covered in the ordo were left to the jurisdiction of governors and magistrates. Public law in Rome and Italy did not automatically apply to subjects in the provinces. Offenses of noncitizens were left to the local magistrate (a chief judicial official of a city) to judge based on his own discretion whether to follow local law, to follow the regular Roman law, or to delegate the judgment to others. The magistrate was free to adopt the guidelines of the ordo, if appropriate, but he was also free to be as harsh and arbitrary as he desired. In most circumstances governors would leave matters to local law and local jurisdiction. The exceptions would be crimes involving Roman citizens and crimes that posed a threat to Rome itself.

The governor was not a legal expert; therefore, this placed great importance on those who were experts in the law for their consultation. Those who argued a case were rhetoricians. Minor cases were usually left to local courts; whereas governors became involved primarily in matters affecting public order (e.g., Acts 18:12-16; 19:40; 21:31-40). A Roman governor could enforce public order at his own discretion without reference to specific legislation. On different levels both governors and magistrates took whatever action they deemed just and proper. Though Roman citizens possessed the right of appeal to Caesar, provincial subjects had little to protect them against abuses of life-and-death power.

The judicial process was initiated by the drawing up of charges, penalties, and the formal act of accusation by an interested party. The enforcement of the law depended on private initiative, for the Roman system had no public prosecutor. Magistrates functioned in the roles of prosecuting attorney, judge, and jury. In a trial heard by a magistrate, the case would be heard by the magistrate in person (John 19:13; Acts 18:12), perhaps assisted by his council of friends and/or officials. The principle of the accused meeting the accusers face-to-face (Acts 25:16) was a deterrent of false charges being made. Roman law held those who made charges and then abandoned them (false accusations) responsible to pay the penalty that the charged would face.

Governors were Roman “knights” of nonsenatorial rank and were invested with the same powers as higher officials. The Roman provincial governors had almost unlimited power of life and death over provincials and were restricted only by cases concerning extortion and treason. The governor could not delegate this power of life and death. The governor was accountable only to the emperor and senate. The administration of justice was highly personal, and major cases were heard wherever the governor was.

The provincial governor held the total power of Roman administration, jurisdiction, defense, and maintenance of law and order in the province he ruled over. The governor's primary responsibility was to maintain public order; whereas the execution of justice was his secondary role. The governor's authority extended over both the Roman and non-Roman citizens living in an occupied province.

The Roman system of criminal justice distinguished between public and private penalties. Private penalties consisted of the sum of money a person paid to the victim of his actions or public beatings for minor crimes. In the later empire banishment to hard labor appeared as a penalty for breaking the law, usually associated with confiscation of one's property. The Apostle John was sentenced to exile on the island of Patmos (to work in mines) because of his Christian faith (Rev. 1:9). The death penalty was rarely given to a citizen unless found guilty of treason. The customary manner of execution for citizens was decapitation, though some chose to commit suicide. Roman law prescribed more cruel methods for those who were not Roman citizens, such as burning, being thrown to beasts, crucifixion, or drowning. The long-term incarceration of a prisoner for a crime was not common during the Roman era.

The NT describes the trials of both Jesus and Paul before Roman governors and magistrates. Roman trial proceedings were normally public and before a tribune. As noted above, interested parties brought formal charges, which had to be specific (Matt. 27:12). The Jewish Sanhedrin lacked the authority to condemn a person to death, as John 18:31 indicates. Jesus was charged before Pilate with a political crime (Matt. 27:12); the Romans would never execute Jesus or anyone else simply on the basis of religious grounds.

It was not uncommon for governors to transfer cases to the local authorities as Pilate did by sending Jesus to Herod (Luke 23:6-7). The trial of Jesus took place early in the day, at the time of day when ancient Roman officials were normally extremely busy (John 18:28). Roman criminal trials included the questioning of the accused. After A.D. 50 it was common for the accused person to receive three opportunities to respond to charges made against them. Pilate apparently did this in the trial of Jesus (John 18:33-37), following the judicial rules of the day. The failure of the accused to respond to the charges resulted in conviction by default. When Jesus remained silent and made no defense, Pilate had no other option but to pronounce judgment on Him. Following the questioning, the governor would then render his verdict and sentence to a particular punishment. According to Matt. 27:19 Pilate received a message from his wife concerning the trial of Jesus. Roman women normally assisted their husbands by serving as career diplomats or advisors.

Chapters 24-26 of Acts demonstrate some aspects of Roman law and trials. Since Paul was a Roman citizen, procedure and custom allowed that he could be tried only in a Roman court. In Acts 24:18-19 a group of Jews made charges against Paul, but they subsequently disappeared from the trial scene. Roman law required that formal accusations be made, as Tertullus did (Acts 24:5-8); however, later Paul objected to Felix that his accusers should be present to bring their charges before the defendant face-to-face (Acts 25:16-19). Paul's appeal to Caesar demonstrated the right of appeal that every Roman citizen possessed. The right of appeal went back to the laws of the Roman Republic, where a citizen had the guarantee of a trial by a jury of peers. During imperial times the emperor replaced the jury as this court of appeal. However, emperors probably did not personally hear all cases, but they often delegated this responsibility. Acts closes (28:30) with Paul under "house arrest" in Rome, and some speculate that there was some delay in Paul's trial. Such an apparent delay in a trial could be explained by a variety of things, including a congested court list, the failure of his accusers to appear to file their charges, or the political chaos that was typical of Nero's reign.

The book of Acts identifies Paul as a Roman citizen from birth (Acts 16:39; 22:28), whose citizenship proved beneficial during his missionary travels. The NT does not reveal how Paul's family had acquired citizenship; however, Roman citizenship could be obtained by several means: by inheriting it at birth from parents who were citizens; it could be bought (Acts 22:28); it could be attained by doing one of several types of service to the empire, either civil or military; or by being a citizen of a captive city that was pronounced as an imperial city by the emperor.

It is not clear as to how citizens documented their citizenship, but it is probable that Roman citizens carried credentials that certified their citizenship, made either of small metal or wooden diptychs, which were normally kept in the family archives. False claims to citizenship resulted in the death penalty. Paul's claim of citizenship appears to have sufficed without having to produce official documents (Acts 22:27).

Citizenship granted rights that include: the right to vote for magistrates or be elected as a magistrate; the right of legal marriage; the right to own property; and the right to appeal a case to the emperor (Acts 25:10-12), seeking to reverse the verdict of officials of lower rank. Likewise, citizens could not be legally bound or scourged (cp. Acts 22:24-29).

Adoption was recognized by Roman law and was a common practice in Roman society (cp. the law of adoption with Rom. 8:15,23; 9:4; Gal. 4:5; Eph. 1:5). Adoption was more common in Roman society than it is today. The person adopted was taken out of his previous condition to begin a new life, with all old relations and debts cancelled. He started a new life in the relation with the new father and family in which he received the new family name and inheritance. The new father took possession of the adoptee's property and controlled his personal relationships. The new father had the right of discipline, while assuming responsibility for the adoptee's support and liability for his actions. ROMANS, LETTER TO THE Longest and most intensely theological of the 13 NT letters written by Paul. This letter is also the most significant in the history of the church. Martin Luther was studying Romans when he concluded that a person becomes righteous in the sight of God through faith alone. His discovery led to the Reformation battle cry, sola fide, “by faith alone.”

Who Wrote the Book of Romans? Although Paul's authorship of several letters has been contested, the evidence for his authorship of Romans is so strong that only the most radical have challenged it. Contemporary scholars do debate, however, the role of Tertius in penning the letter (Rom. 16:22). Some suspect that Paul communicated only general themes to Tertius, but that Tertius was responsible for the composition of the letter. However, Romans is so similar to other letters written by Paul without Tertius' involvement, Paul probably dictated the letter.

The interior of the Colosseum at Rome showing the area beneath the arena.

Where and When Did Paul Write Romans? Romans 15:25-29 indicates Paul wrote Romans shortly before a trip to Jerusalem. He went to Jerusalem to present money collected by Gentile churches in Macedonia and Achaia for poor believers in Jerusalem (15:26). Paul hoped to travel from Jerusalem through Rome to Spain to “evangelize where Christ has not been named” (HCSB). This fits well with Luke's description of Paul's travels at the close of the third missionary journey (Acts 19:21; 20:16). Acts 20:3 shows that Paul spent three months in Greece during his trip from Macedonia to Jerusalem. Paul wrote Romans at this time. Although Luke did not specify the location, several clues suggest Corinth. First, 1 Cor. 16:5-6 shows that Paul intended to visit Corinth after leaving Ephesus and possibly to winter there. Second, Rom. 16 serves as a commendation to the Roman church for Phoebe from Cenchrea, a town near Corinth. Third, Paul sent greetings from Gaius and Erastus (Rom. 16:23) who were probably residents at Corinth (1 Cor. 1:14; 2 Tim. 4:20).

Most significant for dating is his appearance before Gallio, the proconsul of Achaia (Acts 18:12-17), during his stay in Corinth on the second missionary journey. Ancient inscriptions indicate that Gallio was proconsul of Achaia from July 51 to July 52. This suggests that the second missionary journey ended in late summer or autumn of A.D. 51. Paul's third missionary journey included a three-year stay in Ephesus, which probably extended from mid or late 52 to mid or late 55. We cannot determine the precise amount of time that Paul spent in Macedonia between departing from Ephesus and beginning his three-month stay in Greece (Acts 20:1-3). However, we may reasonably estimate that Paul penned Romans from Greece in 56 or 57. Tacitus described unrest in Rome over excessive taxation early in Nero's reign (A.D. 56-58), and Rom. 13:1-7 may indicate that Paul was aware of this, confirming the proposed date.

Why Did Paul Write Romans? Some interpreters have felt that Romans was a “theological treatise.” While Romans is intensely theological, it is still written to address the particular situation of a particular church. The letter does not present some important aspects of Paul's theology such as his doctrine of the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:17-24) or the second coming (1 Thess. 4:13-5:11). Paul also gives much attention to matters like the wrath of God (Rom. 1:18-32) and the Jews' rejection of Jesus (Rom. 9-11), which are not discussed extensively in other letters. Several aspects of Romans, like the discussion of the weak and the strong (Rom. 14:1-15:6) and the discussion about how believers should relate to the government, seem to reflect the struggles that this particular congregation faced. Thus Romans was not a textbook of theology written to strangers.

Paul had several reasons for writing Romans. First, Paul wanted to remind the Roman believers of some fundamental truths of the gospel, fulfilling his duty of proclaiming the gospel to the Gentiles (Rom. 15:14-16). Paul was well aware of many ways his message might be misunderstood or misapplied. He wrote to clarify important aspects of his message to people who had only heard about him. Romans 16:17-20 shows that Paul was concerned about false teachers infiltrating the church. In the face of this danger, an articulation of the essentials of Paul's gospel was needed particularly.

Second, Paul wanted to address several problems the Roman church was facing. In particular he wanted to call the church to unity. He was aware that some of the differences in outlook between Gentile and Jewish believers had produced disunity in the congregation. These differences emerged in arguments about diet and observance of Jewish holy days. Perhaps at the heart of the debate was the larger question, "Did the inclusion of the Gentiles in the people of God mean that God had abandoned His promises to Israel?" (see especially Rom. 9-11). Paul stresses the equality between Jewish and Gentiles believers. Jews and Gentiles alike are condemned as sinners (Rom. 2:9; 3:9,23) and are saved by grace through faith apart from the works of the Law (Rom. 3:22,28-30).

Third, Paul wanted to formally introduce himself to the Roman church and solicit support for his Spanish mission. Paul had fully proclaimed the gospel through the eastern half of the Roman Empire, "from Jerusalem all the way around to Illyricum." Now he was planning to introduce the gospel in Spain in the extreme west of the empire. After Paul left Jerusalem, he would travel to Spain by way of Rome. Paul hoped to receive a gift from the Roman church to assist his endeavors in Spain (Rom. 15:21).

What Is the Key Concept in Romans? Interpreters of Romans have searched for a single theme that unifies the epistle. During the Reformation the tendency was to focus on the first section of the book and single out "justification by faith" as the theme of the letter. Later interpreters argued that Rom. 6-8 was the heart of the epistle and the central theme was the believer's union with Christ and the work of the Spirit. Others replied that

Rom. 9-11 was the centerpiece of the letter and that the real focus was the relationship of Jews and Gentiles in God's saving plan. Still others insisted that the practical section, Rom. 12-15, expressed the central theme of the book. Paul's main intention was to call the church to unity and promote harmony between Jewish and Gentile believers. Each of these views tends to emphasize one section of the letter and neglect the rest.

Recent scholars generally agree that the one theme that may encapsulate the entire book is “the righteousness of God.” Unfortunately, the precise meaning of this phrase is disputed. First, traditionally Protestant interpreters have argued that the phrase refers to a gift that God grants. God judges sinners to be righteous if they believe in Christ (Rom. 3:21-22; 4:1-8; 10:3). Catholic interpreters, still acknowledging that righteousness is a gift, have argued that it refers to an actual righteousness that God produces in believers by His transforming power (Rom. 6-8). Perhaps the most commonly held view today is that “righteousness of God” refers to a power that God exercises, God's saving power. This interpretation emphasizes the OT concept of divine righteousness (Ps. 98:2; Isa. 46:13; 51:8). Finally, others see the phrase as expressing a quality that God possesses. God is righteous. This righteousness is expressed both in His just condemnation of sinners and in His declaring and then actually making believers righteous (Rom. 3:3-5,25-26). The fact is one cannot isolate any of these definitions as the single meaning of the phrase. Each definition is applicable in various contexts. The fourth and final definition, however, is probably the one that Paul has in mind in Rom. 1:17.

“The righteousness of God” is probably too narrow to serve as a theme for the entire book. A better approach recognizes “the gospel” or “the gospel of the righteousness of God” to be the theme of the book. The word “gospel” and related terms appear frequently in the introduction and conclusion to the letter. The word is also most prominent when Paul announces the theme in Rom. 1:16-17.

What Is the Message of Romans? The introduction includes a brief summary of the gospel that highlights its foundation in the OT and its focus on Christ. Christ's Davidic lineage confirms His right to rule as Messiah-

King. By virtue of His resurrection, Jesus is also “Son of God in power.” Since the next occurrence of “power” in Romans refers to God's saving power (Rom. 1:16), the title signifies that Jesus possesses the power to save because of His resurrection (Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 15:14,17,20). Finally, Jesus is called “our Lord,” a title that clearly denotes deity (Rom. 10:9,13; Joel 2:32).

Romans 1:16-17 expresses the theme of the letter. Paul is not ashamed to proclaim the gospel because the gospel is God's saving power that accomplishes salvation for all who believe whether they are Jews or Gentiles. The gospel reveals God's righteousness, both His justice and His activity of justifying sinners (Rom. 3:21-26). Salvation by faith was not new but was the message of the OT prophets (Rom. 1:17; Hab. 2:4).

Gentiles deserve God's wrath because their sins are not committed in ignorance but involve suppression of the truths about God that are apparent to all. Man's chief sin is failure to give God the glory that He deserves. God has expressed His wrath by releasing humanity to the corrupting power of sin so that man's sinful behavior is progressively more heinous and repulsive despite his clear understanding that sin results in death.

Condemning others does not prevent God from noticing our own guilt. God will judge each person fairly and give him either the punishment or reward that his deeds deserve. God will judge both Jews and Gentiles equally, fairly, and justly, because God's judgment is not based on favoritism.

Jews as well as Gentiles deserve God's wrath. Though they preach and teach the law, they have failed to obey the law, thereby dishonoring God and blaspheming His name. Circumcision grants no protection against divine judgment. The true Jew whom God will praise is a person who has been internally transformed. Jews do possess certain advantages. God chose to grant them the OT Scriptures, and God remains faithful to His promises to Israel. Still, God's justice is not compromised by His punishment of the sins of Jews but would be compromised if He failed to punish their sins. The Law that Israel possessed was not a means of salvation. Rather it demonstrated man's sinfulness so that he would despair of trying to save himself by his own righteousness.

The famous Colosseum at Rome was built in the latter years of the first century A.D.

Both the Law and the Prophets testify that God declares sinners who have failed to keep the law to be righteous in His sight if they believe in Jesus Christ. This righteous standing is granted freely by divine grace and based on the atoning sacrifice of Christ. This gracious declaration of righteousness eliminates all human boasting and places both Gentiles and Jews on equal footing. Righteousness through faith rather than law-keeping does not dispense with the Law. On the contrary, it affirms what the Law said about salvation all along. The Law says plainly that Abraham, the father of the Jews, was declared righteous in God's sight through faith (Gen. 15:6). This righteousness was a gift that he received. Thus God credits this righteousness to a person based on faith alone, apart from circumcision.

This righteousness was also credited to Abraham before the Mosaic law was given, further demonstrating that God grants this righteousness on the basis of faith and not law-keeping. The promises to Abraham's offspring (which include receiving a righteous standing and life in the world to come) are granted to believers, both Jews and Gentiles, fulfilling the promise that Abraham would be the father of many nations. Abraham believed God could bring life out of death, a little child out of aged people as good as dead. Christians likewise believe that God raised Jesus from the dead, thereby exhibiting Abraham's faith and receiving the promise of imputed righteousness.

Because of justification, believers are at peace with God and joyfully anticipate full and final transformation. Through Jesus' sacrificial and substitutionary death, believers who were formerly God's enemies and deserved His wrath have been reconciled to God. The impact of Adam's disobedience on the human race offers a negative parallel to the impact of Christ's obedience on believers. Due to Adam's sin, all people die. Even those who lived before the giving of the law and who had no explicit commandment to defy died. Clearly a single act by one person can have a universal and eternal impact. However, the obedience of Jesus Christ has the power to cancel the consequences of Adam's disobedience. If the disobedience of one man can cause the death of many, Christ's obedience can likewise grant righteousness and life to many. Just as the effects of Adam's disobedience were universal, the effects of Christ's obedience are also universal. The law did not introduce death into the world. It did offer Adam's descendants explicit commandments to defy just as Adam had done. This made sin more rampant and more heinous. This only served to magnify the abundance and greatness of God's grace.

One should not conclude from this that sin should be continued. The believer's union with Christ in His death, burial, and resurrection is inconsistent with a sinful lifestyle. The old person that the believer was died with Christ. Now the believer has been liberated from sin's mastery. Eventually, the believer's union with Christ will result in his resurrection and complete liberation from sin. Believers should live now in light of the fact that sin's mastery has been broken. They should offer themselves to God as instruments for righteousness. The believer has a new spiritual master, righteousness. Slavery to sin granted no benefits to the sinner and condemned him to die. Slavery to righteousness produces holiness and results in eternal life.

The believer has been liberated from the law. Death nullifies covenants so that they are no longer legally binding. When a spouse dies, the surviving spouse is liberated from the law of marriage and free to marry. In a similar way, death nullifies the power of the law. By union with Christ in His death, the believer is liberated from the law and free to devote himself to God. Liberation from the law, union with God in Christ, and empowerment by the Spirit enable the believer to live a righteous life, which the law could not accomplish.

The law aggravates and arouses sin in unbelievers, but this does not mean the law is bad. The law is holy, righteous, and good, but the sinful nature used the law to destroy sinners. The law still served a positive function. It demonstrated man's utter corruption and slavery to sin. However, it could not liberate him from that slavery. Paul illustrated this by describing his own frustration in trying to fulfill the law's demands. Paul had been caught in a tug-of-war between delighting in God's law and being dominated by sin. Paul confessed that this conflict would end only through the bodily resurrection.

Yet the believer can enjoy victory over sin. The Spirit accomplishes for the believer what the Law could not. The Spirit liberates the believer from slavery to sin and moves him to fulfill naturally and spontaneously the law's righteous demands. The Spirit exercises the same power that He used to raise Jesus from the dead in order to produce new life in the believer. Those who live by God's Spirit are God's children and thus heirs who will share in God's glory. The whole creation longs for this glory. The believer longs for their adoption through the redemption of the body.

God presently works through every circumstance for the spiritual good of the believer. God's eternal purpose will not be thwarted, and he will unfailingly make those whom He loved from eternity past become like His Son. The completion of the believer's salvation through justification at final judgment and his glorification is certain because it is grounded in God's undying love.

The rejection of Christ by Israel, God's chosen people, might seem to contradict the infallibility of God's promises and shake the believer's hopes. However, God's promises to Israel have not failed. Not all physical descendants of Abraham are true Israelites. God's promises apply to those whom He has chosen. This choice is based not on human character or behavior but God's mysterious purpose.

One cannot charge God with injustice. God is free to show mercy to whomever He wills because the Creator has complete authority over His creatures. One cannot challenge God's character if He glorifies Himself by expressing wrath against some and lavishing mercy on others. God would have been just if He had saved no one. He is certainly just if He chooses to save a great portion of humanity.

Still, Israel is fully responsible for its spiritual condition. Gentiles obtained true righteousness by faith. Israel sought righteousness but attempted to establish her own righteousness through obedience to the law rather than faith in Christ. Israel did not find true righteousness despite all her efforts because the law is fulfilled only through faith in Christ. Salvation comes only through faith in Christ as the OT demonstrates.

Israel did not fail to confess faith in Christ because she was uninformed. All Israel heard the message about Christ, but most rejected the message in stubborn disobedience. Yet God has not rejected Israel entirely. God has chosen a portion of Israel by His grace for salvation. This remnant will obtain the righteousness that Israel sought. God hardened the rest.

God used Israel's rejection of the gospel for gracious purposes, to bring salvation to the Gentiles. Now God will use the Gentiles' reception of the gospel to make them envious and move some of them to faith in Christ. The Gentiles should not boast over Israel. Their salvation rests in God's promises to Israel and upon faith. God is ready to accept the rest of Israel when they repent of unbelief.

Gentiles should not assume they have favored status with God. After all elect Gentiles have been saved, God will shift His focus to national Israel again. Great masses of Jews will be saved because God's gifts and call are irrevocable. God has displayed His mysterious wisdom by using Gentiles and Jews to prompt one another to believe in Christ.

Believers respond to God's mercy by devoting themselves completely to Him and by renewed minds that know God's will. The renewed mind recognizes the interdependency of the members of the church and does not establish a hierarchy based on spiritual gifts. The renewed mind is characterized by love. This love expresses itself through forgiveness, sympathy, harmony, humility, and kindness.

Believers should submit themselves to governing authorities. Governmental authority is appointed by God, preserves order, and thwarts lawlessness. For this reason, believers pay their taxes and show respect for political leaders.

Believers should fulfill the law by expressing love for others. Expressing love to others and living righteously are especially important since we are approaching Christ's return. Believers should accept one another in love even when they disagree over issues of conscience, even as they follow their own consciences. They should be careful not to allow their behavior to disturb other believers who hold different convictions. They should be especially careful not to encourage other believers to do something they do not believe is right. It is wrong to eat, drink, or do anything that disturbs one's conscience.

Jewish and Gentile believers, the weak and the strong, should live in unity and try to build up one another. They should learn to glorify God with one heart and one voice. Jesus Himself came into the world as a servant to the Jews, fulfilling the promises to the Jews, and yet including Gentiles in God's plan so that they might glorify God like the OT foretold. Outline

I. Introduction (1:1-15).

- A. Jesus Christ is the focus of the gospel, and Paul is qualified to proclaim the gospel (1:1-7).
- B. Paul thanks God for the Roman Christians and expresses his love for them (1:8-15).
- II. Theme: The Gospel Reveals God's Power for Salvation and His Righteousness (1:16-17).
- III. The Promise Offered by the Gospel: Justification by Faith (1:18-4:25).
 - A. Man's need for justification (1:18-3:20).
 - 1. All Gentiles are sinners (1:18-32).
 - 2. All Jews are sinners (2:1-3:8).
 - 3. All people are sinners (3:9-20).
 - B. God's gift of justification (3:21-4:25).
 - 1. God provides justification through Christ by faith (3:21-26).
 - 2. Justification of both Jews and Gentiles is based upon faith rather than works (3:27-4:25).

This bas-relief of Rome's symbol of power, the Roman imperial eagle, was found at Jerusalem.

IV. The Benefits Conferred by the Gospel (5:1-8:39).

- A. The believer has peace, righteousness, and joy (5:1-11).
- B. The believer escapes the consequences of Adam's transgression, the reign of sin in death (5:12-21).
- C. The believer is liberated from slavery to sin (6:1-23).
- D. The believer is liberated from bondage to the Law (7:1-25).
- E. The believer lives a righteous life through the power of the Spirit (8:1-17).
- F. The believer will ultimately enjoy complete victory over corruption (8:18-39).

V. Israel's Rejection of the Gospel (9:1-11:36).

- A. Israel has rejected Christ (9:1-5).

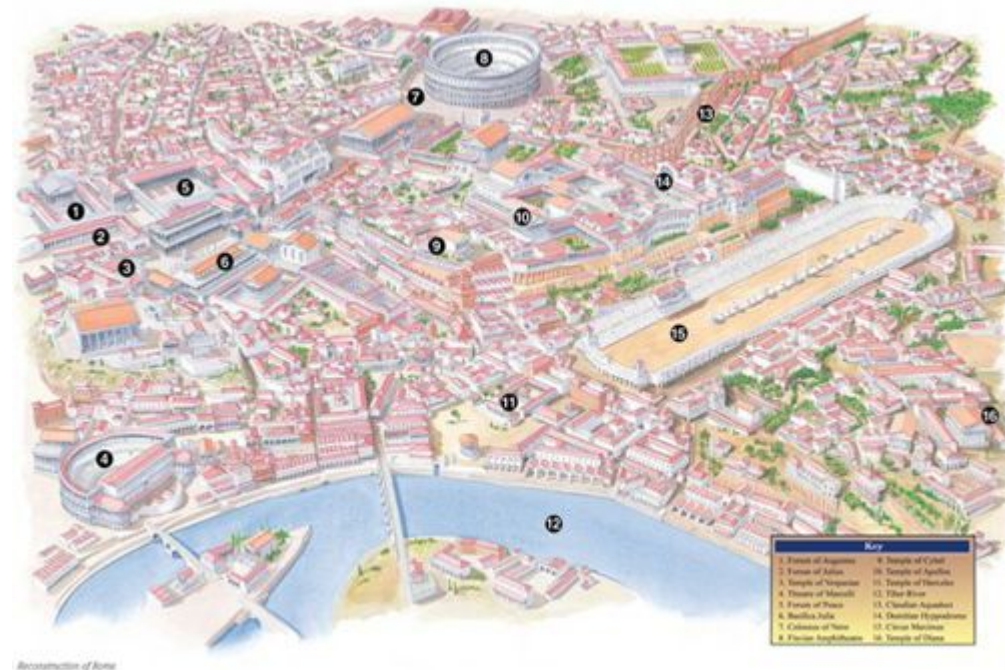

- B. Israel's temporary rejection of Christ is consistent with God's eternal plan (9:6-29).
 - C. Israel's temporary rejection of Christ is due to her own stubborn pursuit of self-righteousness (9:30-10:21).
 - D. God has chosen a present remnant of the Jews for salvation and has hardened the rest (11:1-10).
 - E. God will ultimately save the nation of Israel (11:11-32).
 - F. God's plan is mysterious and wise (11:33-36).
- VI. The Practical Implications of the Gospel (12:1-15:13).
- A. Christians should respond to God's mercy by living transformed lives (12:1-2).
 - B. Transformed living will impact relationships within the church (12:3-21).
 - C. Transformed living will affect relationships with political authorities (13:1-7).
 - D. Transformed living is urgent because of the nearness of Christ's return (13:8-14).
 - E. Transformed living will lead to mutual acceptance of stronger and weaker Christians (14:1-15:13).
- VII. Conclusion (15:14-16:27).

ROME AND THE ROMAN EMPIRE International rule that the government in Rome, Italy, exercised after 27 B.C. when the Republic of Rome died and the Roman Empire was born. The reasons for the fall of the republic are not anymore clearly demonstrable than those surrounding the later fall of the empire. They were the product of a complicated interaction of numerous components that included: changes in the values, wealth, and education of the upper classes; innovations in finances, agriculture, and commerce; expansion of the senate; enormous increases in citizenship; unrest among the classes; problems in maintaining order in the districts in and around Rome, and difficulty in recruiting sufficient personnel for the army. The major factor in its demise seems to have been political. The senate lost political control of the state, and into that vacuum Julius Caesar stepped with ambitions of control that the senate found intolerable. His declaration of himself in early 44 B.C. as perpetual dictator provoked his assassination on the Ides of March by a group of senatorial assassins led by Brutus and Cassius. Caesar's generals, Antony and Lepidus along with Caesar's heir Octavian, formed a temporary ruling triumvirate. They defeated Caesar's assassins in the battle at Philippi in 42 B.C. This finally resulted in the exclusion of Lepidus and the division of the empire into the West, controlled by Octavian, and the East, controlled by Antony. Antony's military failure against the Parthians led to his excessive reliance on Egyptian resources and created a correspondingly inordinate influence of Egypt's Queen Cleopatra on the Roman ruler. Octavian was able to use Antony's reliance on Egypt against him, persuading the senate that Antony wanted to make Alexandria the capital of the empire. The two led their armies against each other in 31 B.C. at Actium in Greece, resulting in the defeat of Antony and the eventual suicide of both Antony and Cleopatra. Octavian became sole ruler and in 27 B.C. took the name Augustus Caesar. The republic became the empire, and Octavian became what Julius had only dreamed of becoming—the first emperor of Rome.

Augustus was extremely efficient as an administrator and corrected many of the problems that plagued the old republic. He, unlike Julius, treated the senate with respect and gained theirs in return. He, as the adopted son of the previous ruler, inherited the affection of his army. The relationship proved so popular that, after Augustus, every emperor had to be either the real son or the adopted son of the previous emperor to command the allegiance of the army and of the people of the empire. Augustus reduced the senate gradually from 1,000 to 600 and made membership in it hereditary, although he reserved the privilege of nominating new senators.

Reconstruction of Rome

A major achievement involved sharing power over the empire's provinces. Senatorial provinces were created, over which the senate had jurisdiction and to which they appointed governors or proconsuls. These were peaceful provinces requiring no unusual military presence. Gallio, the brother of Seneca, was made proconsul over the southern Grecian province of Achaia in A.D. 51 during the time Paul was in Corinth (Acts 18:12). Imperial provinces were controlled by the emperor. He appointed procurators over these potentially volatile areas, where the Roman legions or armies were stationed. Pontius Pilate was such a procurator or governor over Judea (Luke 3:1).

Augustus inaugurated an extensive program of social, religious, and moral reform. Special benefits were given to those couples who agreed to have children. Adultery, which previously was widely condoned, was made a public crime entailing severe penalties. Traditional religion was stressed, and 82 pagan temples were renovated. Many ancient cults were revived, further accentuating the time-honored view that the peace and prosperity of the republic was dependent upon the proper observance of religious duty.

Augustus became pontifex maximus in 12 B.C., establishing him as both political and religious head of state.

An extensive building program was undertaken. Augustus added another forum to the already existing Roman Forum and Forum of (Julius) Caesar. The forum served as a judicial, religious, and commercial center for the city, containing basilicas, temples, and porticoes. Later, other fora were built by Vespasian, Nerva, and Trajan, all of them just north of the old Roman Forum. The great variety of other new structures included theaters, libraries, temples, baths, basilicas, arches, and warehouses. For entertainment purposes the first permanent amphitheater in Rome's history was built. Extensive water systems were constructed that included artificial lakes, canals, aqueducts, and flood control. The sewage system was renovated. A police force of 3,000 men was created along with a fire-fighting force that numbered 7,000.

The first several emperors ruled at the time of the beginning of the Christian movement in the Roman Empire. Jesus was born during the reign of Augustus (27 B.C. to A.D. 14) and conducted His ministry during the reign of Augustus' successor, Tiberius (A.D. 14 to 37; cp. Luke 3:1). The latter's image was stamped on a silver denarius that Jesus referred to in a discussion about taxation (Luke 20:20-26). In about A.D. 18 Herod Antipas, the son of Herod the Great, built his capital on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee and named it Tiberias after the emperor. Tiberius was an extremely able military commander and a good administrator, leaving a large surplus in the treasury when he died. He followed Augustus' example of not expanding the borders of the empire and thus avoiding war. The pax Romana (peace of Rome) which Augustus had inaugurated was preserved, providing easy, safe travel throughout the empire. Paul undoubtedly referred to this in Gal. 4:4 when he wrote: "When the completion of the time came, God sent His Son" (HCSB). Tiberius was never popular with the senate and chose to leave Rome at the first opportunity, choosing after A.D. 26 to rule the empire from his self-imposed seclusion on the Isle of Capri. In this year Pontius Pilate was appointed governor of Judea, a post he held until A.D. 36, just prior to the death of Tiberius in A.D. 37.

Tiberius was succeeded by his mentally unbalanced grandnephew, Gaius (Caligula), who proved to be a disaster. During his reign (A.D. 37 to 41) and that of his successor, his aging uncle Claudius (A.D. 41 to 54), most of the ministry of the Apostle Paul took place. Claudius is reported to have expelled from Rome Jews who were creating disturbances because of Christ (cp. Acts 18:2). Initially, his contemporaries viewed Claudius as inept, but he proved to have considerable hidden talents of administration and turned out to be one of Rome's more proficient emperors. He was responsible for the conquest of southern Britain in A.D. 43-47, although it took another 30 years to subjugate northern Britain and Wales. His fourth wife, Agrippina, is mentioned on a recently discovered sarcophagus in the Goliath family cemetery on the western edge of Jericho. She poisoned Claudius in A.D. 54 to speed up the succession of Nero, her son by a previous marriage.

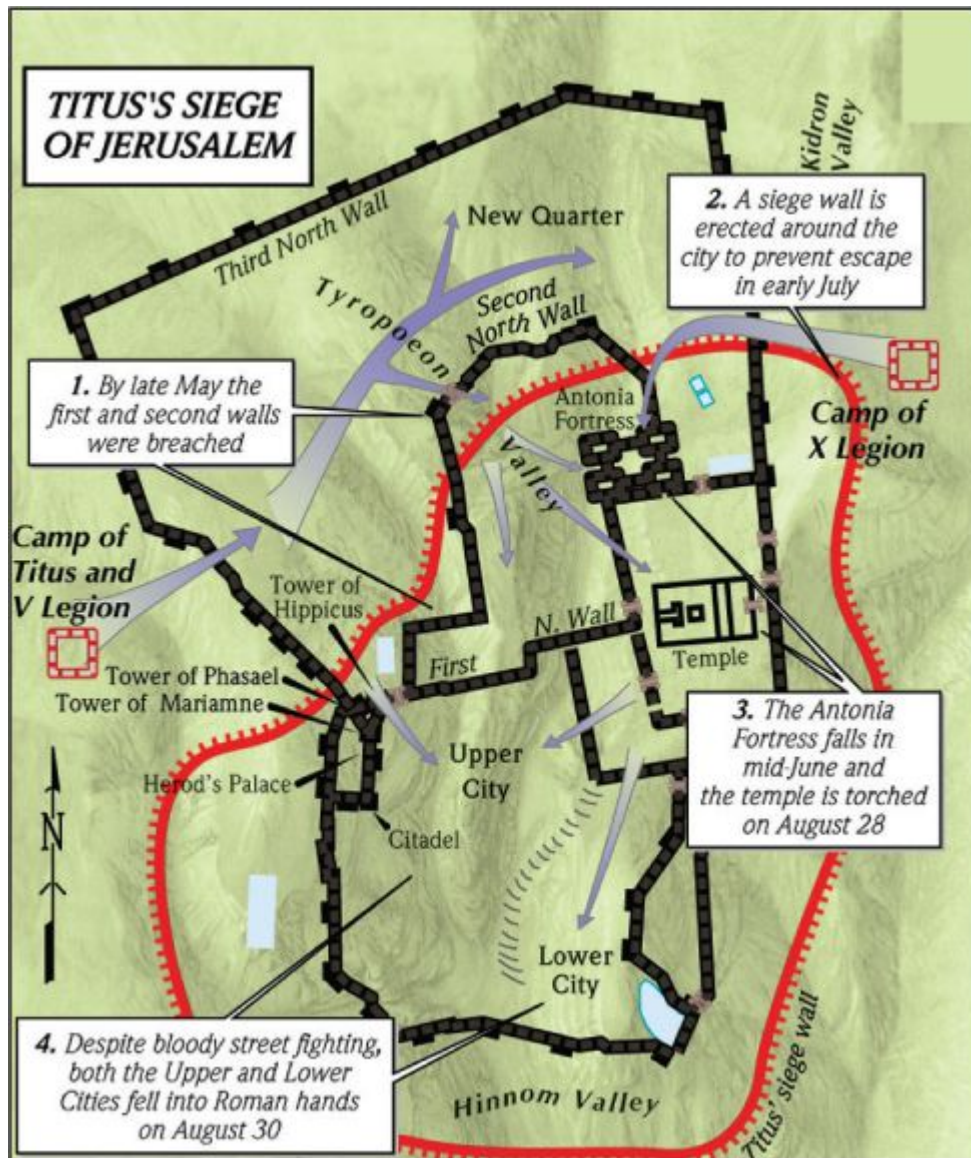

Nero (A.D. 54-68) was in some respects worse than Caligula. He was a man without moral scruples or interest in the Roman populace except for exploitation of them. Both Paul and Peter seem to have been martyred during Nero's reign, perhaps in connection with the burning of Rome by Nero in A.D. 64, an event that he blamed on Christians. The Roman historian Tacitus wrote that when the fire subsided, only four of Rome's 14 districts remained intact. Yet Paul wrote, “All the saints greet you, but especially those from Caesar's household” (Phil. 4:22 HCSB). Nero's hedonism and utter irresponsibility led inevitably to his death. The revolt of Galba, one of his generals, led to Nero's suicide.

Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, three successive emperor-generals, died within the year of civil war (A.D. 68-69) that followed Nero's death. Vitellius's successor was Vespasian, one of the commanders who had taken Britain for Claudius and who was in Judea squelching the first Jewish revolt. He was declared emperor by the Syrian and Danube legions and returned to Rome to assume the post, leaving his son Titus to finish the destruction of Jerusalem with its holy temple in the next year (A.D. 70). This event was prophesied by Jesus toward the end of His life when He said: “When you see Jerusalem surrounded by armies, then know that its desolation has come near” (Luke 21:20 HCSB).

The aristocratic Julio-Claudian dynasties that had reigned until the death of Nero were happily replaced by the Flavian dynasty, which issued from the rural middle class of Italy and reflected a more modest and responsible approach to the use of power. Vespasian's reign (A.D. 69-79) was succeeded by the brief tenure of his son Titus (A.D. 79-81), who at his death gave way to the rule of his brother Domitian (A.D. 81-96). The fourth century historian Eusebius reported that the Apostle John was exiled to Patmos (cp. Rev. 1:9) in the reign of Domitian. Eusebius also claimed that in Nerva's reign the senate took away Domitian's honors and freed exiles to return home, thus letting John return to Ephesus.

Nerva's reign was brief, lasting little more than a year (A.D. 96-98). He was succeeded by Trajan (A.D. 98-117), who bathed the empire red in the blood of Christians. His persecution was more severe than that instituted by Domitian. Irenaeus wrote in the second century that John died in Ephesus in the reign of Trajan. The persecution of the church, depicted in the book of Revelation, probably reflects the ones initiated by Trajan and Domitian. Trajan, the adopted son of Nerva, was the first emperor of provincial origin. His family roots were in the area of Seville, Spain. Marcus Aurelius, a later emperor of Spanish descent (A.D. 161-180), also persecuted the church.

Trajan adopted Hadrian, his nephew by marriage, who succeeded him (A.D. 117-138) and quickly abandoned his predecessor's only partially successful attempts to conquer the East. More than half of Hadrian's reign was spent in traveling throughout the empire and involving himself deeply in the administration of the provinces, an activity for which he was especially talented. He left evidence of his propensity for building all over the Mediterranean world including the arch at the entrance to the precincts of the Athenian temple of Jupiter, the Ecce Homo Arch in Jerusalem, his villa near Rome, and the magnificent Pantheon in Rome, whose perfectly preserved construction continually awes the visitor. Hadrian will be best remembered by those of the Judeo-Christian tradition, however, because of his attempt to Hellenize Jerusalem by changing the name of the city to Aelia Capitolina, by erecting a temple to himself and Zeus on the site of the previous temple of Solomon and by prohibiting circumcision. The brutal way in which he put down the unavoidable revolt from A.D. 132-135 was consistent with Hadrian's declaration of himself as another Antiochus Epihanes (the second-century B.C. Hellenizer who, while king of Syria, also desecrated the Jewish temple and precipitated the Maccabean Revolt). See Intertestamental History and Literature.

A Roman milestone with latin inscription at Caesarea Maritima.

The success of the Roman Empire depended upon the ability of the legions to keep peace throughout the world. Pax Romana was the key to prosperity and success. Greek and Latin were universal languages; nevertheless, most of the conquered countries retained their own languages as well, including Celtic, Germanic, Semitic, Hamitic, and Berber. Not since that time has the world been able to so effectively communicate in common languages. If the Mediterranean Sea is included, the Roman Empire was roughly the size of the continental United States, reaching from Britain to Arabia and from Germany to Morocco. One could go from one end of the Mediterranean to the other by boat in three weeks. Less effectively, one could travel 90 miles a day on the fine network of roads that interlaced the empire, including the Appian Way and the Egnatian Way.

The quality of the Greco-Roman culture disseminated by Rome was strongest in the areas bordering the Mediterranean and weakest in those farthest removed from major routes of communication. The most effective resistance to the culture was, as might be expected, among the eastern countries such as Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia, and the Levant (Syria-Palestine) which had the longest history of civilization. Western Europe, with a comparatively recent and uncivilized history, was no opposition and was soon thoroughly and permanently immersed in the phenomenon of western civilization.

Education in the empire was the prerogative of the wealthy. The poor had neither the time, the money, nor the need for an education that was designed to prepare the upper classes for positions of public service. The goal of education was to master the spoken word. Successful civic life was tied to proficiency in the language. Oratory was indispensable. Grammar and rhetoric were the primary subjects of study with emphasis on style over content. Among Latin authors, Virgil, Terence, Sallust, and Cicero were studied most while Homer, Thucydides, Demosthenes, and the Attic tragedians were the favorite Greek writers.

In the beginning of the empire, religion was diverse and almost chaotic. Both politicians and philosophers attempted to bring the same order to religion that they achieved in other aspects of Roman life. The Roman emperor was the head of the state religion, which included worship of the emperor and the traditional gods of Rome. The emperor functioned as semidivine while alive and as a god after his death. John may refer to emperor worship in Pergamum, where the first Asian temple to a Roman emperor was erected, in his references to the place “where Satan's throne is” (perhaps meaning the altar of Zeus; Rev. 2:13 HCSB). Mystery religions such as Mithraism, and the worship of Cybele and Isis were abundant. Philosophical systems, such as Epicureanism and Stoicism, functioned virtually as religions for agnostic intellectuals. Judaism, with its monotheistic emphasis, and Christianity, with its Judaistic origin and equally high code of ethics and morals, were anomalies. The inevitable clash between Judeo-Christians and the Romans was a clash between monotheism and polytheism, between morality and immorality. John McRay

ROOSTER See Cock.

ROOT Part of a plant buried in and gaining nourishment through the ground. In Scripture “root” generally appears in a figurative sense. Root indicates source as when the unrighteous are pictured as a root bearing bitter and poisonous fruit (Deut. 29:18; Heb. 12:15) or when the love of money is described as the root of all kinds of evil (1 Tim. 6:10). Deep-sinking roots picture stability (Ps. 80:9; Prov. 12:3) and prosperity (Prov. 12:12; cp. Ps. 1:3). Exile is termed being uprooted (1 Kings 14:15; Jer. 24:6), while taking root again pictures return from exile and the renewal of God's blessing (2 Kings 19:30; Isa. 27:6; 37:31).

Seed that fails to take root pictures those whose commitment to Christ is not firm enough to withstand trouble or persecution (Matt. 13:6,21). To be rooted in Christ is to be established in faith (Col. 2:6). Root of Jesse (Isa. 11:10; Rom. 15:12) and root of David (Rev. 5:5; 22:16) serve as titles of the Messiah. In Paul's allegory of the grapevine, Israel is the root of the plant, the church is the branches (Rom. 11:16-18).

ROSH (Rōsh) Personal name meaning “head” or “chief.” Seventh son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21). The earliest Greek translation regards Rosh as a son of Bela, hence Benjamin's grandson. The name is absent in parallel lists of Benjamin's sons (Num. 26:38-39; 1 Chron. 8:1-5).

ROUND TIRES KJV translation of a Hebrew term which modern translations render as “crescent necklaces” or “ornaments” (Isa. 3:18). The KJV rendered the same Hebrew term as “ornaments” at Judg. 8:21,26. See Jewels, Jewelry.

RUDDY Having a healthy, reddish color (1 Sam. 16:12; 17:42; Song 5:10; Lam. 4:7; cp. Gen. 25:25).

RUDIMENTS See Elements, Elemental Spirits.

RUE (Ruta graveolens) Strong-smelling shrub used as a condiment, in medicines, and in charms (Luke 11:42). Dill appears in the Matthean parallel (Matt. 23:23).

RUFUS (Rū' fūs) Personal name meaning “red haired.” 1. Son of Simon of Cyrene and brother of Alexander (Mark 15:21). 2. Recipient of Paul's greetings in Rom. 16:13. If Mark was written from Rome, both references likely refer to the same person.

RUHAMAH (Ru há' mah) Personal name meaning “pitied.” Name Hosea used to symbolize the change in Israel's status before God following God's judgment (2:1; cp. 1:6). First Peter 2:10 applies Hosea's image to Christians who have experienced God's mercy in Christ.

RULER OF THE SYNAGOGUE See Synagogue.

RUMAH (Rú' mah) Place-name meaning “elevated place.” Home of Jehoiakim's mother (2 Kings 23:36), possibly identified with Khirbet Rumeh near Rimmon in Galilee or with Arumah.

RUN, RUNNING Serves as common metaphor for the struggle to live out the Christian life (1 Cor. 9:24-26; Gal. 5:7; Heb. 12:1). At Gal. 2:2 “running” applies specifically to Paul's struggle to evangelize.

RUNNERS Messengers (2 Chron. 30:6,10; Esther 3:13; Jer. 51:31) and royal bodyguards (1 Sam. 8:11; 22:17; 2 Sam. 15:1; 1 Kings 1:5; 2 Kings 10:25; 11:4).

RUNNING SORES Disqualified a man from service as a priest (Lev. 21:20 NIV) and animals from serving as sacrifices (Lev. 22:22 NASB, NIV). The curse placed on Joab's descendants included affliction with running sores (2 Sam. 3:29 NIV).

RUSH, RUSHES English terms used to translate several types of reedlike plants. See Plants.

RUST Coating produced by the corrosive effects of air and water on metal, especially iron. Rust on a copper cooking pot symbolized Jerusalem's persistent wickedness in Ezek. 24:6,12-13. Jesus highlighted the folly of relying on earthly treasures subject to rust (Matt. 6:19-20). In the style of an OT prophet, James outlined God's future judgment on the wealthreliant rich as if it were already accomplished (James 5:1-6). James' mention of riches, moths, and rust (vv. 2-3) suggests that he was applying Jesus' words. The scientific observation that gold and silver do not rust should not obscure James' primary emphasis: one is a fool to rely on riches that will not survive God's coming judgment. Ill-gotten riches will serve as evidence and witness for God's prosecution. The very riches relied on for security will provide the corrosive rust effecting God's judgment.

RUTH, BOOK OF OT book whose principal character is a Moabite woman named Ruth, an ancestor of David and Jesus. Given the nature of later Judaism with its denigration of women and its contempt for outsiders, it is remarkable that a biblical book was named for a Moabite woman. This is all the more striking since Ruth is not as important as Boaz and Naomi, and that the book's significance is linked directly to Boaz, as shown in the concluding genealogy.

In the liturgical canon represented by the Leningrad Codex, the book of Ruth is the first of the five Megilloth (scrolls read at Jewish festivals) and is placed immediately after Proverbs. Those responsible for this probably viewed Ruth as the supreme example of a virtuous woman, as described in Prov. 31, a conclusion reinforced by Boaz's characterization of Ruth as an eseth hayil ("noble woman," Ruth 3:11), the same epithet found in Prov. 31:10 (the heading to the acrostic description of the noble woman in 31:10-31). The placement of the book in English Bibles follows the Septuagint. This placement was based on a concern to locate the events described in the book in their historical and chronological contexts. In another Jewish tradition Ruth precedes Psalms, recognizing its significance as a testimony to the role of David in Israelite history.

After reading the book of Judges, which paints a dark and depressing picture of Israel, the reader is relieved to encounter Ruth. One learns that while Israel was in a state of severe moral and spiritual decline, Bethlehem represented an oasis of covenant loyalty in an otherwise barren landscape. Many have recognized in Ruth a supreme literary masterpiece, a delightful short story with a classical plot that moves from crisis (famine and death threaten the existence of a family), to complication (the introduction of a primary but less desirable candidate to resolve the crisis), to resolution (the desirable candidate rescues the family line). With great skill the narrator draws the reader into the minds of the characters (successively Naomi, Ruth, and Boaz), inviting us to identify with their personal anxieties and joys and in the end to celebrate the movement from emptiness and frustration to fulfillment and joy. In the course of the narrative, each of the main characters proves to be a person of extraordinary courage and covenant love (chesed, “lovingkindness, faithfulness, loyalty,” is the key word in the book: 1:8; 2:20; 3:10). These are people whose spiritual commitment is demonstrated clearly in godly living.

As admirable and psychologically fascinating as the characters appear, Ruth is not primarily a tale of interesting human personalities. In the end this book is a glorious statement of the providence of God. Although the narrator attributes events to the direct action of God only twice (1:6; 4:13), the human characters repeatedly express their faith in God through their accusations (1:13,20-21), but especially through the blessings they pronounce on one another and their pleas for divine favor (1:8-9; 2:4, 12, 19-20; 3:10; 4:11-12,14-15). The hand of God is evident to all who read the book with the eyes of faith: (1) in apparently natural meteorological events (Famine, in light of the covenant curses of Lev. 26:19-20 and Deut. 28:23-24, must be interpreted as a divine act. When there is bread in Bethlehem, people attribute this to God); (2) in apparently random events (Ruth's arrival at the field of a man who “just happened” to be both gracious and related. The key phrase in 2:3 translates literally “her chance chanced upon,” or in contemporary English, by “a stroke of luck” she came to the field of Boaz); (3) the delicate and daring schemes of humans (Naomi's ethically questionable scheme in 3:1-7); (4) the legal procedures of the court (the disposition of Elimelech's estate in 4:1-10); (5) natural biological events (a woman who unable to conceive in 10 years of marriage immediately gets pregnant with Boaz, 4:13). In every one of these cases, the outcome could and perhaps from a natural perspective should have been different. But God's hand superintends everything so that in the end peoples' needs are met, and, more importantly, His goals are accomplished.

What are those goals? Although many dismiss the genealogy in 4:18-22 as secondary and virtually irrelevant, these verses are the key to the book. From the perspective of the author, these events have significance, primarily because of the critical place these events have in the history of the Davidic line. One of the questions the book answers is, “How can David, the man after God's own heart, emerge from the dark and demoralized period of the judges (cp. 1:1)?" The answer is, "Because of the providential hand of God on this family in Bethlehem." Like the genealogies in Gen. 5 and 11, this genealogy consists of 10 names in linear relationship. And like those genealogies, a critical moment occurs in the seventh generation (Boaz compares with Enoch (Gen. 5:21-24), who walked with God, and with Peleg (Gen. 11:16-17), in whose time the earth was divided (Gen. 10:25).

Primarily Ruth is about David. With this story the author declares not only that God set His sights on David from the beginning but also that David is an unlikely candidate for the most significant position in Israel's history, that of the divinely anointed king. In his veins flows the blood of Moabites (hence the significance of the eightfold reference to Ruth as a Moabite), who were despised by the Israelites because of their incestuous origin (Gen. 1:30-38), their hostility to the Israelites when they came out of Egypt (Num. 22-24; cp. Deut. 23:3-6), and their seduction of the Israelites into physical and spiritual adultery (Num. 25:1-9). No alert reader will miss the irony: at a time when the Israelites were behaving more like Canaanites than like the people of Yahweh (the period of the judges), a despised Moabite provides the model of covenantal loyalty and kindness (see Boaz' testimony concerning Ruth in 3:10-11).

But ultimately the book of Ruth is about the Messiah. Although the author may not have recognized the full significance of these events, when Matthew begins his Gospel with a long genealogy of Jesus the Messiah, the son of David and Abraham, the names of Boaz and Ruth appear (Matt. 1:5). Three other women in this genealogy (Tamar, v. 3; Rahab, v. 5; Bathsheba, v. 6) are also tainted. The theological significance of these women in this list of men is obvious: Jesus the Messiah represents all the peoples of the earth, and if God can accept Gentiles like Ruth, and incorporate them into His plan of salvation, then there is hope for all (cp. Matt. 28:18-20). Through Boaz and Ruth not only was a threatened family rescued from extinction, but through them God prepared the way for David, and ultimately David's greatest son, Jesus the Messiah.

Although the book of Ruth is generally classified as a short story, it is helpful also to interpret it as a drama in four acts, whose flow may be captured with an outline like the following:

Theme: The Preservation of Israel's Royal Line

Outline

Act I: The Crisis for the Line (1:1-21)

1. The setting for the crisis (1:1-2)
2. The nature of the crisis (1:3-5)
3. The response to the crisis (1:6-18)
4. The interpretation of the crisis (1:19-21)

Act II: The Ray of Hope for the Line (1:22-2:23)

1. The new setting (1:22-2:1)
2. The initiative of Ruth (2:2-3)
3. The grace of Boaz (2:4-16)
4. The results (2:17-23)

Act III: The Complication for the Line (3:1-18)

1. The scheme of Naomi (3:1-5)
2. The implementation of the scheme (3:6-15)
3. The results of the scheme (3:16-18)

Act IV: The Rescue of the Line (4:1-17)

1. The legal resolution (4:1-12)
2. The genealogical resolution (4:13-17)

Epilogue: The Royal Genealogy (4:18-22)

SABAOTH (Sá bá' oth) Transliteration of Hebrew, meaning "hosts, armies, heavenly bodies." Part of a divine title, "Lord of Hosts," variously interpreted as Lord of Israel's armies (cp. 1 Sam. 17:45); the stars; members of Yahweh's heavenly court or council; a comprehensive title for all beings, heavenly and earthly; an intensive title describing God as all powerful. Interestingly, the title does not appear in Genesis through Judges. The earliest Greek translation at times translated "Sabaoth" as a proper name, sometimes as "Almighty," and sometimes not at all. The title was apparently closely tied to Shiloh and the ark of the covenant (1 Sam. 1:3,11; 4:4; 6:2). When David brought the ark to Jerusalem, he also introduced the title "Yahweh of Hosts" to Jerusalem worship (2 Sam. 6:2). Yahweh Sabaoth seems to have emphasized God's place as divine king enthroned on the cherubim with the ark as His footstool ruling over the nation, the earth, and the heavens (Ps. 24:10). He is the God without equal (Ps. 89:8) who is present with His people (Ps. 46:7,11; cp. 2 Sam. 5:10). See Army; Lord of Hosts; Names of God.

SABBATH Day of rest, considered holy to God by His rest on the seventh day after creation and viewed as a sign of the covenant relation between God and His people and of the eternal rest He has promised them.

Old Testament The word "sabbath" comes from the Hebrew shabbat, meaning "to cease" or "desist." The primary meaning is that of cessation from all work. Some persons have traced the origin of the concept to the Babylonian calendar that contained certain days, corresponding to phases of the moon, in which kings and priests could not perform their official functions. Such days bore an evil connotation, and work performed on them would have harmful effects. The 15th of the month, the time of the full moon in their lunar calendar, was shapattu, the "day of pacifying the heart" (of the god) by certain ceremonies.

Although one can show similarities to the Babylonian concept, the Hebrew Sabbath did not follow a lunar cycle. It was celebrated every seven days and became basic to the recognition and worship of the God of creation and redemption. Regulations concerning the Sabbath are a main feature of the Mosaic laws. Both reports of the Ten Commandments stated that the Sabbath belonged to the Lord. On six days the Israelites should work, but on the seventh, they, as well as all slaves, foreigners, and beasts, must rest. Two reasons are given. The first is that God rested on the seventh day after creation, thereby making the day holy (Exod. 29:8-11). The second was a reminder of their redemption from slavery in Egypt (Deut. 5:12-15).

The day became a time for sacred assembly and worship (Lev. 23:1-3), a token of their covenant with God (Exod. 31:12-17; Ezek. 20:12-20). Death was the penalty for desecration (Exod. 35:1-3). The true observance of not following one's own pursuits on that day would lift a person to God's holy mountain and bring spiritual nourishment (Isa. 56:1-7; 58:13-14), but failure to keep the Sabbath would bring destruction to their earthly kingdom (Neh. 13:15-22; Jer. 17:21-27).

Interbiblical The Sabbath became the heart of the law, and the prohibitions were expanded. Thirty-nine tasks were banned, such as tying or untying a knot. These in turn were extended until ingenious evasions were devised that lost the spirit but satisfied the legal requirement.

New Testament The habit of Jesus was to observe the Sabbath as a day of worship in the synagogues (Luke 4:16), but His failure to comply with the minute restrictions brought conflict (Mark 2:23-28; 3:1-6; Luke 13:10-17; John 5:1-18). At first, Christians also met on the Sabbath with the Jews in the synagogues to proclaim Christ (Acts 13:14). Their holy day, the day that belonged especially to the Lord, was the first day of the week, the day of resurrection (Matt. 28:1 ; Acts 20:7; Rev. 1:10). They viewed the Sabbath and other matters of the law as a shadow of the reality which had now been revealed (Col. 2:16-23), and the Sabbath became a symbol of the heavenly rest to come (Heb. 4:1-11). See Lord's Day. Barbara J. Bruce

SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY Distance a Jew in Jesus' day considered ritually legal to walk on the seventh day. This phrase appears only once in the Bible (Acts 1:12), describing the distance from the Mount of Olives to Jerusalem. Scholars have surmised that the expression came from God's instruction to the children of Israel as they prepared to cross the Jordan into Canaan (Josh. 3:4). As they followed the priests bearing the ark of the covenant, they were to maintain a distance of 2,000 cubits from it. Earlier, while in the wilderness, they had been told not to leave home on the Sabbath (Exod. 16:29). Rabbis eventually interpreted these commands as limiting Sabbath travel to 2,000 cubits. That was the farthest that a loyal Jew should be from his center of worship on the Sabbath. The length of the cubit depended on who was counting. Greeks said it was one foot, six inches; but Romans claimed it was one foot, nine inches. Thus, 2,000 cubits could be from 3,000 to 3,600 feet, somewhat more than a half mile. Anyone who wanted to “bend” the rule could carry a lunch sometime before the Sabbath to a place about half a mile from his home. Then, by eating it on the Sabbath, he could claim that place as a “legal” home and go another Sabbath day's journey. See Sabbath W.J. Fallis

SABBATICAL YEAR Every seventh year when farmers rested their land from bearing crops to renew the land and people of Israel. Mosaic law directed that every seventh year the land would not be planted in crops; food would come from what grew wild (Exod. 23:10-11; Lev. 25:1-7). Just as the law reserved the seventh day as holy unto God, so too was the seventh year set aside as a time of rest and renewal. This not only assured the continued fertility of the land by allowing it to lie fallow but also protected the rights of the poor. Peasants were allowed to eat from the natural abundance of the untended fields. It may be that only a portion of the land was allowed to rest each Sabbath year, the remainder farmed as usual. Hebrews sold into slavery were to be released in that year (Exod. 21:2). Loans and debts to Israelites were also to be forgiven (Deut. 15:1-3). It is doubtful that the Sabbath year was celebrated in early Israel. Jeremiah reminded the people that their fathers had ignored the observance of the law (Jer. 34:13-14; cp. Lev. 26:35). Although Israel renewed her dedication to practice the Sabbath year during Nehemiah's time, it is unclear whether it was carried out (Neh. 10:31). During the intertestamental period an attempt was made by Israel to observe the Sabbath year despite the political turmoil of the times (1 Macc. 6:49). The Sabbath year laws consistently pointed to helping the poor. David Maltsberger

SABEAN (Sá bē' an) Transliteration of two Hebrew national names. 1. Descendants of Seba, son of Cush (Gen. 10:7a), expected to bring gifts signifying loyalty to Jerusalem (Ps. 72:10; Isa. 45:14; cp. Ezek. 23:42). God could use the Sabeans to “pay for” Israel's ransom from captivity (Isa. 43:3). These are often identified with people of Meroe in Upper Egypt between the White and Blue Nile, thus the capital of Ethiopia. Other scholars locate it much further south, the territory east and southeast of Cush bordering on the Red Sea. Other scholars would identify at least some references here as identical with 2. following. 2. Descendants of Sheba, the son of Raamah (Gen. 10:7b) or Joktan (Gen. 10:28; cp. 25:3). The rich queen of Sheba visited Solomon (1 Kings 10). Sabeans destroyed Job's flocks and herds and servants (Job 1:15). They were known as “travelling merchants” (Job 6:19 REB; cp. Ps. 72:10,15; Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20; Ezek. 27:22; 38:13; Joel 3:8). This is usually equated with the city in southern Arabia, modern Marib in Yemen. Some scholars think this is too far south and seek biblical Sheba in northern Arabia near Medina on the Wadi esh-Shaba. Sabeans could have become a general term for foreign or nomadic merchants. Sheba in southern Arabia gained riches through trade with nearby Africa and with India, whose goods they transported and sold to the empires to the north. Sheba produced and traded incense.

SABTA or SABTAH (Sáb' tá) Son of Cush and apparently the ancestor of citizens of Sabota, capital of Hadramaut about 270 miles north of Aden. Others identify it with an Ethiopian ruler about 700 B.C. Josephus identified it with Astaboras, modern Abare.

SABTECA or SABTECAH (Sáb' te ká) Placename of uncertain meaning. Sometimes equated with Ethiopian ruler Sabataka (700-689 B.C.) but more probably with an Arabian city-state such as Ashshabbak near Medina or Sembrachate in northern Yemen.

SABTECHA (KJV, REB) or SABTECHAH See Sabteca.

SACAR or SACHAR (Sá' kār) (NRSV, TEV) Personal name meaning “salary.” 1. Man from Harar and father of one of David's heroes (1 Chron.

11:35), called “Sharar” in 2 Sam. 23:33. 2. Temple gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:4).

SACHIA (NASB, NRSV) or SACHIAH (REB) (šá kî' á) See Shachia.

SACK See Bag 5.

SACKBUT KJV term for musical instrument (Dan. 3:5), identified in modern translations as zither (TEV), lyre (NIV), trigon (NASB, NRSV), or triangle (REB). It is apparently an instrument of Asian origin, a triangular harp with four or more strings. The related Hebrew and Aramaic term refers to lattice work. Along with the other instruments in the list, it apparently was not used in worship but only in more popular settings, possibly representing a rebuke from the biblical writer for a pagan musical setting for worship.

SACKCLOTH Garment of coarse material fashioned from goat or camel hair worn as a sign of mourning or anguish, also marked by fasting and sitting on an ash heap (Isa. 58:5). Jonah 3:8 notes even animals mourned in sackcloth. The shape of the garment could have been either a loose fitting sack placed over the shoulders or a loincloth. The word “sack” is a transliteration of the Hebrew word rather than a translation. See Grief and Mourning.

SACRAMENT Religious rite or ceremony regarded as an outward sign of an inward, spiritual grace. The rite or ceremony was instituted by Jesus Christ. The Latin term sacramentum means an “oath of allegiance” and may have originally referred to a vow taken by soldiers entering the Roman army. Christian use apparently began with Tertullian and was the Latin translation of the Greek word “mystery” (1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:3; Col. 1:26).

The number of sacraments has varied in Christianity. Early Christians used the term to designate baptism. Later, this concept was extended to include the Lord's Supper. The Roman Catholic Church practices seven sacraments: confirmation, penance, ordination, marriage, last rites, baptism, and the Eucharist. Protestant churches recognize only two: baptism and the Lord's Supper.

The exact meaning of sacrament has varied in Christian history. Roman Catholic theology taught that the sacraments actually convey what they represent, saving grace. In Lutheran theology the promise of the word of God is conveyed through the sacraments. Reformed theologians underscore the significance of the sacraments in terms of “signs and seals” of the covenant. In all these confessional traditions, the ritual is connected with the spiritual truth and reality conveyed through the act.

Some sacramental rituals are considered by various Christian denominations to be ordinances. Ordinances, like sacraments, are considered established by Jesus Christ and are observed in obedience to His command. Unlike sacraments, ordinances are not understood to convey some type of grace. Ordinances are rites that commemorate the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ. Ordinances are performed as expressions of loving obedience to Christ. Two ordinances underscore various aspects of the Christian's life. The ordinance of baptism is a person's public profession of faith and serves as an initiatory rite of entrance into the community of faith. The Lord's Supper is a continuing ordinance denoting the person's ongoing commitment of the life to Christ.

The idea that outward signs convey spiritual realities is taught in the Bible. For example, believer's baptism is an outward, public demonstration of the believer's spiritual union with Christ. Non-sacramentalists would do well to emphasize the spiritual realities represented in the ritual as well as the commemoration of Christ's sufferings and death. The notion that sacraments convey grace, however, is contrary to Scripture. In its entirety the thrust of the Bible is that grace comes through faith, not works (Rom. 4:3; Gal. 3:6). The understanding that sacraments convey grace implies that a person can, through the performance of some ritual, receive grace as reward for effort. The biblical perspective is that genuine faith produces works. Sacraments are not the automatic or mechanical transmission of divine grace. Genuine faith issues forth in works of faith, but works do not result in the reception of grace. Stan Norman SACRIFICE AND OFFERING Physical elements the worshiper brings to the Deity to express devotion, thanksgiving, or the need for forgiveness.

Ancient Near East Israel was not unique among the nations of the ancient Near East in their use of sacrifices and offerings as a means of religious expression. Some type of sacrificial system characterized the many religious methodologies that the nations employed in their attempts to honor their gods. The presence of sacrifices and offerings in Israel, therefore, was not unique to Israel.

Many references to the offering of sacrifices exist in extrabiblical literature. The primary approach to the gods was through the sacrificial system. In Babylon part of the ritual of purifying the temple of Bel for the New Year festival involved the slaughter of a ram. The animal was decapitated and the priest, in turn, used the body in the purification ceremony. The ram's body then was thrown into the river. The ritual accompanying the replacing of the head of the kettledrum that was used in the temple required that a black bull be selected for sacrifice. After an elaborate ceremony that culminated in the sacrifice of the bull, its hide was dipped in and rubbed with two separate mixtures and then used to cover the kettledrum.

While the above sacrifices were performed on special occasions, a variety of rams, bulls, and birds were offered as meals to the idols on a daily basis. Barley beer, mixed beer, milk, and wine also were placed before the deities, as well as loaves of bread.

The sacrifices and offerings were designed to serve the gods by meeting any physical need that they might have had. The sacrifices were the food and drink of the gods. Faithfulness to the preparation and presentation of them was an act of devotion.

Old Testament From the earliest times of the OT, sacrifice was practiced. Cain and Abel brought offerings to the Lord from the produce of the land and from the first born of the flock (Gen. 4). Upon disembarking from the ark after the great flood, Noah immediately built an altar and offered burnt sacrifices. These were a soothing aroma to the Lord (Gen. 8). Other ancient Near Eastern flood stories have parallels to this act by Noah. The patriarchal stories in Gen. 12-50 are filled with instances of sacrifice to God. The most famous is that of Abraham and Isaac (Gen. 22).

An organized system of sacrifice does not appear in the OT until after the exodus of Israel from Egypt. In the instructions given for the building of the tabernacle and the establishment of a priestly organization, sacrifices were to be used in the consecration or ordination of the priests (Exod. 29). A bull was slaughtered as a sin offering. Other sacrifices provided Aaron and his sons a holy meal. These sacrifices were repeated each day for a week as a part of the “ordination” of the priests. The altar itself was consecrated through the offering of two lambs and a grain offering and a libation or “drink offering” (a misnomer, since it was never drunk but poured) of wine. This sacrifice also was carried out each day for a week.

Iron Age sacrificial altar located at the site of ancient Arad.

The sacrifices that constituted much of the worship of Israel at this time were burned on an altar that was made from acacia wood and overlaid with copper (Exod. 27). In addition to the sacrifices offered on this altar, incense was burned on a smaller altar (Exod. 30). While the sacrificial altar was placed in the courtyard, just before the door of the tabernacle, the incense altar was positioned inside the tabernacle, just before the ark of the covenant. See Altar.

Leviticus 1-7 gives the most detailed description of Israel's sacrificial system, including five types of sacrifices. The sacrifices and offerings that were brought by the people were to be the physical expression of their inward devotion.

1. Burnt offering (olah) Offered in the morning and in the evening, as well as on special days such as the Sabbath, the new moon, and the yearly feasts (Num. 28-29; 2 Kings 16:15; 2 Chron. 2:4; 31:3; Ezra 3:3-6). Rituals performed after childbirth (Lev. 12:6-8), for an unclean discharge (Lev. 15:14-15) or hemorrhage (Lev. 15:29-30), or after a person who was keeping a Nazirite vow was defiled (Num. 6:10-11) required a burnt offering, as well as a sin offering.

The animal for this sacrifice could be a young bull, lamb, goat, turtledove, or young pigeon, but it had to be a perfect and complete specimen. The type of animal chosen for this sacrifice seems to be dependent on the financial ability of the one who brings the offering. The one bringing the offering was to lay a hand on the animal, indicating that the animal was taking the person's place, and then he was to kill it. The priest then collected the blood and sprinkled it around the altar and the sanctuary, and the worshiper cut up and skinned the animal. If a bird was brought, the priest killed it. After the priest arranged the various parts on the altar, the entire animal was burned as a sacrifice. The only portion that remained was the hide, and the priest received it (Lev. 7:8). The one who made this sacrifice did so to restore the relationship with God and to atone for some sin. When Araunah offered to David his threshing floor, oxen, and wood without cost so that David could sacrifice, David refused. His explanation was that he could not offer burnt offerings that cost him nothing (2 Sam. 24:18-25).

2. Grain offering (minchah; "meat offering," KJV) Offering from the harvest of the land; the only type that required no bloodshed. It was composed of fine flour mixed with oil and frankincense. Sometimes this offering was cooked into cakes prior to taking it to the priest. These cakes, however, had to be made without leaven. Every grain offering had to have salt in it (Lev. 2:13), perhaps as a symbol of the covenant (Num. 18:19; 2 Chron. 13:5). Only a portion of this offering was burned on the altar, with the remainder going to the priests. While no reason is given for the grain offering, it may have symbolized the recognition of God's blessing in the harvest by a society based to a large degree on agriculture. The bringing of a representative portion of the grain harvest was another outward expression of devotion. Grain offerings as well as "drink offerings" or libations of wine accompanied all burnt offerings and peace offerings (Num.15:3-4).

3. Peace offering (zebach shelamim; "wellbeing," NRSV; "shared," REB; "fellowship," NIV) Consisting of the sacrifice of a bull, cow, lamb, or goat that had no defect. As with the burnt offering, the individual laid a hand on the animal and killed it. The priests, in turn, sprinkled the blood around the altar. Only certain parts of the internal organs were burned. The priest received the breast and the right thigh (Lev. 7:28-36), but the one who offered the sacrifice was given much of the meat to have a meal of celebration (Lev. 7:11-21). As part of the meal, various kinds of bread were offered (and ultimately kept by the priest). A "peace offering" was to be brought in response to an unexpected blessing (a "thank offering") or an answer to prayer (a "vow offering"), or for general thankfulness (a "freewill offering"). The idea of thanksgiving was associated with the peace offering. It often accompanied other sacrifices in celebration of events such as the dedication of the temple (1 Kings 8:63) or spiritual renewal (2 Chron. 29:31-36). The "wave offerings" (tenuphah, "consecrated gift") and the "heave offerings" (terumah, "contribution") were associated with the peace offerings. They were portions presented or lifted up before the Lord, mentioned first as part of the priestly ordination ceremony (Exod. 29:24-27). Whereas the wave offering was always offered in the sanctuary, the heave offering could be presented anywhere.

4. Sin offering (chatta't; "purification," REB) This was designed to purify the sanctuary from sin that was committed unintentionally, and thereby allow God to continue dwelling with His people. Its nature varied according to who committed the sin. If the priest or the congregation of Israel sinned, then a bull was required. A leader of the people had to bring a male goat, while anyone else sacrificed a female goat or a lamb. The poor were allowed to bring two turtledoves or two young pigeons. The one bringing the offering placed a hand on the animal and then slaughtered it. When the priest or the congregation sinned, the blood was sprinkled seven times before the veil in the sanctuary, and some of it was placed on the horns of the incense altar. The rest of the blood was poured out at the base of the sacrificial altar. For others who sinned, the sprinkling of the blood before the veil was omitted. The same internal organs that were designated for burning in the peace offering were likewise designated in this sacrifice. The rest of the animal was taken outside of the camp to the place where the ashes of the sacrifices were disposed, and there it was burned. These disposal procedures were not followed when the sin offering was made on behalf of a non-priestly person (Lev. 6:24-30). In this case, the priest was allowed to eat some of the meat.

5. Guilt offering (asham, “trespass,” KJV; “reparation,” REB) This offering seems to overlap somewhat with the sin offering (Lev. 4-5). In Lev. 5:6-7 the guilt offering is called a sin offering. The guilt offering was concerned supremely with restitution. Someone who took something illegally was expected to repay it in full plus 20 percent of the value and then bring a ram for the guilt offering. Other instances in which the guilt offering was prescribed included the cleansing of a leper (Lev. 14), having sexual relations with the female slave of another person (Lev. 19:20-22), and for the renewing of a Nazirite vow that had been broken (Num. 6:11-12).

The burnt, grain, peace, sin, and guilt offerings composed the basic sacrificial system of Israel. These sacrifices were commonly used in conjunction with each other and were carried out on both an individual and a corporate basis. The sacrificial system taught the necessity of dealing with sin and, at the same time, demonstrated that God had provided a way for dealing with sin.

Prophets' Attitude toward the Sacrificial System The prophets spoke harshly about the people's concept of sacrifice. They tended to ignore faith, confession, and devotion, thinking the mere act of sacrifice ensured forgiveness. Isaiah contended that the sacrifices were worthless when they were not accompanied by repentance and an obedient life (Isa. 1:10-17). Micah reflected the same sentiments when he proclaimed that God was not interested in the physical act of sacrifice by itself but in the life and heart of the one making the sacrifice (Mic. 6:4-6). Jeremiah condemned the belief that as long as the temple was in Jerusalem and the people were faithful to perform the sacrifices, then God would protect them. The symbol of the sacrifice must be reflected in the individual's life (Jer. 7:1-26). Malachi chastised the people for offering the lame and sick animals to God instead of the best, as the Levitical law required. In doing this, the people were defiling the altar and despising God (Mal. 1:7-14).

The prophets did not want to abolish the sacrificial system. They, instead, denounced the people's misuse of it. God wanted more than the physical performance of meaningless sacrifices. He desired the offerings to exemplify the heart of the worshiper.

New Testament During the time of the NT the people sacrificed according to the guidelines in the OT. In keeping with the Levitical law (Lev. 12), Mary brought the baby Jesus to the temple and offered a sacrifice for her purification. She sacrificed turtledoves or pigeons, indicating the family's low financial status. When Jesus healed the leper (Luke 5:12-14), He told him to go to the priest and make a sacrifice (cp. Lev. 14). The cleansing of the temple (John 2) came about because people were selling animals and birds for the various sacrifices within the temple precincts. These people had allowed the "business" of sacrifice to overwhelm the spiritual nature of the offerings. Jesus chided the Pharisees for neglecting family responsibilities by claiming that something was "corban," or offered to God, and thus unavailable for the care of their parents (Mark 7). Corban is the most common and general Hebrew word for sacrificial offering (Lev. 1:2). See Corban.

The NT consistently describes Christ's death in sacrificial terms. Hebrews portrays Christ as the sinless high priest who offered Himself up as a sacrifice for sinners (7:27). The superiority of Christ's sacrifice over the Levitical sacrificial system is seen in that His sacrifice had to be offered only once. The book ends with an encouragement to offer sacrifices of praise to God through Christ. This thought is reflected in 1 Pet. 2 where believers are called a holy and royal priesthood who offer up spiritual sacrifices.

Paul used the terminology of the OT sacrifices in teaching about the death of Jesus. His death was an offering and sacrifice to God and, as such, a fragrant aroma (Eph. 5:2). He associated Jesus with the Passover sacrifice (1 Cor. 5:7).

The first-century church lived in a culture that sacrificed to their gods. Paul and Barnabas at Lystra were thought to be the gods Zeus and Hermes. The priest of Zeus sought to offer sacrifices to them (Acts 14). The church at Corinth was embroiled in a controversy over whether or not it was permissible for Christians to eat meat offered to idols (1 Cor. 8-10). Paul's preaching of the gospel at Ephesus disrupted the business and worship of the goddess Artemis (Acts 19).

When the temple in Jerusalem was destroyed in A.D. 70, the Jews' sacrificial system ceased. By this time, however, the church had begun to distance itself from Judaism. The biblical view of sacrifice changed as well. In the OT and in the beginning years of the NT, sacrifice was the accepted mode of worship. With the death of Christ, however, animal sacrifice became unnecessary. As the temple and priest of God, the believer now has the responsibility for offering acceptable spiritual sacrifices (Rom. 12:1-2; 1 Pet. 2:5; Heb. 13:15). Paul also spoke of himself as a libation poured out (Phil. 2:17). He called the Philippians' gift a fragrant aroma and an acceptable sacrifice to God (Phil. 4:18; Rom. 15:16).

SAINTS Holy people, a title for all God's people but applied in some contexts to a small group seen as the most dedicated ones.

Old Testament Two words are used for saints: qaddish and chasid. Qaddish comes from the qadosh and means “holy.” To be holy is to separate oneself from evil and dedicate oneself to God. This separation and union is seen both with things and people. All the items of worship are separated for the Lord's use: altar (Exod. 29:37), oil (Exod. 30:25), garments (Exod. 31:10), and even the people are to be holy (Exod. 22:31). This separation reflects God's very character, for He is holy (Lev. 19:2). Holiness is clearly portrayed as an encounter with the living God, which results in a holiness of lifestyle (Isa. 6). Therefore, holiness is more than a onetime separating and uniting activity. It is a way of life. “Be holy because I, the LORD your God, am holy” (Lev. 19:2 HCSB). Saints are people who try to live holy lives (Dan. 7:18-28). See God; Holy.

Chasid means “to be kind or merciful.” These are qualities of God. Thus, chasid people are godly people because they reflect His character. Saints praise the Lord for His lifelong favor (Ps. 30:4), rejoice in goodness (2 Chron. 6:41), and know that God keeps their paths (1 Sam. 2:9). God's encounter with His people through the covenant enables them to walk as His saints.

New Testament One word, hagios, is used for saints in the NT. This word, like qadosh, means “holy.” Consequently, saints are the holy ones. There is only one reference to saints in the Gospels (Matt. 27:52). In this verse dead saints are resurrected at the Lord's crucifixion. The death of the Holy One provides life for those who believe in God. In Acts, three of the four references occur in chapter 9 (vv. 13,32,41). First Ananias and then Peter talk of the saints as simply believers in Christ. Paul continues this use in his Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Thessalonians, and Philemon. In each case, saints seem simply to be people who name Jesus as Lord. In the book of Revelation, however, where the word “saints” occurs more times than in any other single book (13 times), the meaning is further defined. Saints not only name Jesus as Lord, but they are faithful and true witnesses for Jesus.

Little wonder then that the early church considered witnesses who were martyred for their testimonies to be saints. In fact, soon these saints were accorded special honor and then even worship. Unfortunately, the term “saints” came to be applied only to such special people.

Biblically, though, the term “saint” is correctly applied to anyone who believes Jesus Christ is Lord. To believe in Jesus demands obedience and conformity to His will. A saint bears true and faithful witness to Christ in speech and lifestyle. To be a saint is a present reality when a believer seeks to let the Spirit form Christ within (Rom. 8:29; Gal. 4:19; Eph. 4:13). See Spirit; Witness, Martyr. William Vermillion

SALUTATION Act of greeting, addressing, blessing, or welcoming by gestures or words; a specific form of words serving as a greeting, especially in the opening and closing of letters.

In the ancient Near East a salutation covered a wide range of social practices: exchanging a greeting (“Hail”), asking politely about another's welfare, expressing personal regard, and the speaking of a parting blessing (“Go in peace”). Physical actions, such as kneeling, kissing, and embracing, were also involved. The salutation functioned to maintain close, personal contact and to foster good relations. Though the practice continued into the first century, Jesus and early Christians transformed the act of saluting. Jesus critiqued the Pharisees for practicing long, protracted deferential salutations (Mark 12:37b-40; Luke 20:45-47; cp. Matt. 23:1-36) and forbade His disciples from practicing such public displays (Luke 10:4). Instead, Jesus endorsed a salutation when it signified the long-awaited presence of messianic “peace” (Hb. shalom), that is the “peace” of the kingdom of God (Luke 10:5-13; 19:42; John 14:27; 20:21; cp. Luke 2:14,29). Paul, as do other NT authors, also transformed the salutation to speak of newness brought on by the cross and resurrection. The typical greeting in Greek letters was the infinitive “to rejoice” (chairein). Paul never opened his letters with this greeting; instead, the apostle fused the Greek word for the typical Hebrew blessing, “Peace” (eirene), with the noun form of the Greek blessing, “Grace” (charis), to yield the distinctly Christian salutation: “Grace and peace” [charis kai eirene]. By such a subtle change in the form of Greek letter writing, Paul was able to invoke the range of apostolic blessings found in Jesus: mercy from God (“grace”) and eternal well-being from God's presence (“peace”). See Letter Form and Function. Carey C. Newman

SALVATION One of the key concepts of God's revelation to humanity. The biblical idea of salvation involves three notions. First is the rescue from danger, harm, or even death of an individual, group, or nation. Most specifically salvation is the rescue from sin and death. Second is the renewing of the spirit. Scripture explains that humanity fell from the original condition of moral purity into the state of sin. God's salvation always renews the spirit of a person to lead a life that is morally pleasing to Him. Third is the restoration of a right relationship with God. One of the effects of sin is separation from God. The written word of God makes clear that salvation restores one's relationship with God, as Rom. 5:10 says, “For if, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son.” In both the OT and NT God's salvation includes rescue, renewal, and restoration and is accomplished through the person and work of His Son, our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

Old Testament The OT gives many examples of a type of physical salvation to teach about the more important spiritual salvation. This teaching about salvation begins in the first three chapters of Genesis. The first two chapters tell how God created the heavens and the earth, the fish of the sea, the birds of the air, the animals of the land, and the first man and woman. All that God created was very good (Gen. 1:31). Chapter three explains how sin entered into God's created order and God's promise of salvation through the seed of the woman (Gen. 3:15). Even though male and female were created in the image of God, now God's image is marred in all mankind. The results of sin include death and separation from God.

The eroding of human nature into godlessness is clearly evident in the story of Noah. Since God is holy, He cannot abide with or condone that which is unholy. God's judgment against sin and sinners is real and demonstrated by a worldwide flood. However, God revealed His grace and mercy by providing an ark of salvation for Noah and his family (Gen. 6-9). This is a living picture of the salvation God brought about for sinners in and through Jesus.

The Lord made a covenant with Abraham promising to bless all the nations of the earth through him (Gen. 12:1-3). This promise is another illustration of God's intent to provide salvation. Later in Israel's history Moses led the nation out of bondage into the promised land. God proved Himself stronger than the false gods of Egypt, wiser than the wisdom of Pharaoh, and more powerful than the Egyptian army. God provided salvation for His people.

Moses further instructed God's people in the need of blood sacrifices to atone for sin. The book of Leviticus gives the proper method and means of sacrifices and chapter 16 explains the Day of Atonement. The high priest enters the holy of holies with the blood of a bull to make atonement first for himself and then for the people. The lesson further illustrated God's holiness and the need for a sacrifice to experience His salvation.

While much of the OT deals with the salvation of the nation of Israel, the Psalms focus more on the salvation of the individual and the prophets extend God's plan of salvation to the nations (Pss. 13; 18; 51; Isa. 2:2-4; Mic. 4:1-4; Zech. 8:20-23). The OT lays the foundation for a biblical understanding of salvation. God is holy and cannot tolerate sin, human beings are fallen and sinful creatures, God initiates and provides a way of salvation, and finally people respond to God's offer of salvation. God is always the One who saves and redeems His people, and redemption usually comes with a blood sacrifice.

New Testament In the NT salvation by grace alone through faith in the person and work of Jesus Christ is the dominant theme. Salvation begins with the initiating love of God (John 3:16; Eph. 1:3-6). God's eternal purpose is to save sinners through Jesus' atoning death on the cross. Thus, Christology is a vital component of the NT and relates directly to the doctrine of salvation. Specifically Jesus' nature as the God-man and His substitutionary death on the cross are the key elements. The NT cannot be properly understood apart from a right view of who Jesus is and what Jesus did. As John says, "Jesus performed many other signs in the presence of His disciples that are not written in this book. But these are written so that you may believe Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God, and by believing you may have life in His name" (John 20:30-31 HCSB).

All the NT writers witness to the importance of the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus for salvation (Rom. 1:6; 1 Cor. 15:3-11; 1 Pet. 2:21-25). The preaching of both Peter and Paul in the book of Acts further attests to the centrality of the atonement and resurrection as the Gospel message (Acts 2:14-39; 3:11-26; 10:34-48; 13:26-43; 17:22-34; 24:2-21). In the NT salvation is found in no other name but the name of Jesus (Acts 4:12).

The NT identifies several other key doctrines or elements as part of a complete understanding of salvation. One is the work of the Holy Spirit in convicting of sin and bringing about the new birth. In the Gospel of John, Jesus explains that the ministry of the Holy Spirit involves conviction of sin, righteousness, and judgment (John 16:5-11). Earlier in John's Gospel Jesus has a conversation with Nicodemus in which Jesus instructs the Pharisee on the necessity of the new birth (John 3:3-8). Paul calls this new birth regeneration (Titus 3:5). He writes of the work of the Holy Spirit in convicting and convincing persons of their sin and need for a Savior in terms of "calling" (Rom. 11:29; 1 Cor. 1:26).

“Conversion” is often the term used to describe when someone actually receives salvation. This is the point when a person repents and believes. Faith and repentance are the conditions of salvation, according to the NT (Mark 1:15). Repentance means turning from self and sin to God and holiness while faith is believing the historic facts about Jesus and trusting Him alone to forgive one of sins and to grant eternal salvation (Heb. 11:1-6). The promise of salvation is eternal life with Jesus in heaven (John 3:16; 1 John 2:25).

The NT teaches that believing in the gospel results in justification before God. The doctrine of justification by faith is central to Pauline theology and has been very influential in the history of the Church. In Romans, Galatians, and Philippians Paul discusses justification by faith alone at length (Rom. 3:21-5:21; Gal. 3:1-4:31; Phil. 3:2-16). The essential point in relation to salvation is that at the moment of conversion the sinner is declared not guilty before God through the blood of Jesus. By trusting in Jesus alone for salvation, the righteousness of Jesus Christ is imputed to the sinner so that God now treats the sinner in light of the righteousness of Jesus (Rom. 3:21-26).

At the moment of conversion, the sinner becomes a saint, not free from actual sin in this life but free from the death penalty of sin. The Bible teaches that the Holy Spirit actually indwells the sinner at the moment of conversion. A lifelong process of growth in Christlikeness now begins and is called “sanctification.” Since salvation is a gift of God, the believer can never lose the gift of salvation. This is a testimony to the fullness of God's grace. The Christian's eternal future is secure because, not only does God initiate salvation, He also preserves the Christian through the indwelling presence of the Holy Spirit. Salvation is a free gift from God that rescues the believer from sin and its consequences, renews the believer to a holy life, and restores the believer to a right relationship with God for all eternity. SAMARIA, SAMARITANS (Sá má' rí á; Sá már' í táns) Place-name of mountain, city, and region, meaning “mountain of watching,” and the residents thereof. Forty-two miles north of Jerusalem and nine miles northwest of Nablus, a hill protrudes from the broad valley that cuts across the central highlands of Israel. There lie ruins of ancient Samaria near a small village called Sebastiya. Samaria was the capital, residence, and burial place of the kings of Israel (1 Kings 16:23-28; 22:37; 2 Kings 6:24-30). Following the Northern Kingdom's fall to Assyria (721 B.C.), exiles from many nations settled Samaria (Ezra 4:9-10). Later, the Greeks conquered the region (331 B.C.) and Hellenized the area with Greek inhabitants and culture. Then the Hasmoneans, under John Hyrcanus, destroyed the city (119 B.C.). After a long period without inhabitants, Samaria lived again under Pompey and the Romans (63 B.C.). Finally, Herod the Great obtained control of Samaria in 30 B.C. and made it one of the chief cities of his territory. Again, the city was resettled with people from distant places, this time mercenaries from Europe. Herod renamed the city Sebaste, using the Greek word for Augustus, the emperor. When the Jews revolted in A.D. 66, the Romans reconquered the city and destroyed it. The Romans later rebuilt Samaria, but the city never regained the prestige it once had.

Samaria is the only major city founded by Israel, the Northern Kingdom. Omri, the sixth king of Israel (885-874 B.C.), purchased the hill of Samaria for his royal residence. Shechem had been the capital of the Northern Kingdom until Jeroboam relocated it at Tirzah.

When Ahab, Omri's son, became king of Israel, he built an ivory palace at Samaria. Amos denounced him for doing this (Amos 6:1,4; 1 Kings 22:39). Jezebel influenced Ahab, her husband, to make the city the center for Baal worship (1 Kings 16:29-33). Jezebel also had many prophets of Yahweh killed in Samaria (1 Kings 18:2-4).

On two occasions Ben-hadad, the king of Syria, besieged the city of Samaria. However, both times he was unsuccessful (1 Kings 20; 2 Kings 6). Naaman, a Syrian leper, had come to Samaria to be healed by Elisha a short time prior to Ben-hadad's attack (2 Kings 5).

Long colonnaded street built by the emperor Severus at NT Sebaste, which was the OT city of Samaria.

Here Elijah destroyed the messengers of King Ahaziah, who were seeking the consultation of Baal-zebub. He, likewise, prophesied of King Ahaziah's death (2 Kings 1). Later, Jehu killed Ahab's 70 sons in Samaria (2 Kings 10). Finally, Samaria fell to Assyria in 721 B.C. after a three-year siege (2 Kings 17:5, 18:9-12). This destruction came after many prophecies concerning its sins and many warnings about its doom (Isa. 8:4; 9:8-14; 10:9; 28:1-13; 36:19; Jer. 23:13; Ezek. 23:1-4; Hos. 7; 13:16; Amos 3:12; Mic. 1:6). See Assyria.

While the term “Samaria” was first identified with the city founded by Omri, it soon became associated with the entire region surrounding the city, the tribal territory of Manasseh and Ephraim. Finally, the name “Samaria” became synonymous with the entire Northern Kingdom (1 Kings 13:32; Jer. 31:5). After the Assyrian conquest Samaria began to shrink in size. By NT times it became identified with the central region of Palestine, with Galilee to the north and Judea to the south.

The name “Samaritans” originally was identified with the Israelites of the Northern Kingdom (2 Kings 17:29). When the Assyrians conquered Israel and exiled 27,290 Israelites, a “remnant of Israel” remained in the land. Assyrian captives from distant places also settled there (2 Kings 17:24). This led to the intermarriage of some, though not all, Jews with Gentiles and to widespread worship of foreign gods. By the time the Jews returned to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple and the walls of Jerusalem, Ezra and Nehemiah refused to let the Samaritans share in the experience (Ezra 4:1-3; Neh. 4:7). The old antagonism between Israel to the north and Judah to the south intensified the quarrel.

The Jewish inhabitants of Samaria identified Mount Gerizim as the chosen place of God and the only center of worship, calling it the “navel of the earth” because of a tradition that Adam sacrificed there. Their Scriptures were limited to the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Bible. Moses was regarded as the only prophet and intercessor in the final judgment. They also believed that 6,000 years after creation, a Restorer would arise and would live on earth for 110 years. On the judgment day the righteous would be resurrected in paradise and the wicked roasted in eternal fire.

In the days of Christ, the relationship between the Jews and the Samaritans was greatly strained (Luke 9:52-54; 10:25-37; 17:11-19; John 8:48). The animosity was so great that the Jews bypassed Samaria as they traveled between Galilee and Judea. They went an extra distance through the barren land of Perea on the eastern side of the Jordan to avoid going through Samaria. Yet Jesus rebuked His disciples for their hostility to the Samaritans (Luke 9:55-56), healed a Samaritan leper (Luke 17:16), honored a Samaritan for his neighborliness (Luke 10:30-37), praised a Samaritan for his gratitude (Luke 17:11-18), asked a drink of a Samaritan woman (John 4:7), and preached to the Samaritans (John 4:40-42). Then in Acts 1:8 Jesus challenged His disciples to witness in Samaria. Philip, a deacon, opened a mission in Samaria (Acts 8:5).

SAMGAR-NEBO (Sām gār-nē' bō) or SAM-GARNEBU (Sām gār-nē' bū) (NASB) Personal name of Babylonian official who accompanied Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon in capturing Jerusalem in 587 B.C., according to Hebrew text (Jer. 39:3). Many modern scholars seek to reconstruct the original Akkadian name. Such reconstructions relate the name to a city—Sim-magir—known from other Babylonian records. This would mean the previous person in the list—Nergal-sharezer—was from the city (REB, cp. NIV). Other scholars see Samgar-Nebo as a title describing the position Nergal-sharezer held.

SAMLAH (Sām' lah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “coat.” Ruler of Edom (Gen. 36:36).

SAMOS (Sā' mōs) Place-name meaning “height.” Small island (only 27 miles long) located in the Aegean Sea about a mile off the coast of Asia Minor near the peninsula of Trogyllium. In the strait between Samos and the mainland, the Greeks defeated the Persian fleet about 479 B.C. and turned the tide of power in the ancient Near East. Traveling from Jerusalem to Rome, Paul's ship either put in at Samos or anchored just offshore (Acts 20:15).

SAMOTHRACE (Sām' ō thrās) or SAMOTHRACIA (Sām ō thrā' shā) (KJV, TEV) Placename, perhaps meaning “height of Thrace.” Mountainous island in northern Aegean Sea 38 miles south of coast of Thrace with peaks rising 5,000 feet above sea level. Paul spent a night there on his second missionary journey as he headed to Philippi (Acts 16:11). A famous mystery cult was practiced there.

SAMSON (Sām' son) Personal name meaning “of the sun.” Last of the major judges over Israel about 1100 B.C. (Judg. 13:1-16:31). The son of Manoah of the tribe of Dan, Samson was a legendary hero who frequently did battle against the Philistines, who at that time “were ruling over Israel” (14:4 HCSB).

Roman period additions to the Heraion (great sanctuary of Hera of Samos) on the island of Samos.

Before his conception, Samson was dedicated by his parents to be a lifelong Nazirite (13:3-7), a person especially devoted or consecrated. Part of the vow included letting the hair grow and abstaining from wine and strong drink. Samson's legendary strength did not come from his long hair. Rather, it came through the "Spirit of the LORD" who would take control of him to enable him to perform amazing feats of physical strength (14:6,19; 15:14; cp. 16:28-29). Although a Nazirite, Samson did not live a devoted life. More frequently, he was careless in his vow. He secretly disobeyed the prohibition of approaching a dead body (14:8-9) and had immoral relations with a Gaza harlot (16:1) and with Delilah (16:4-20).

Samson is portrayed as a headstrong young man with little or no self-control. None of his exploits show him as a religious enthusiast. In fact, every major crisis in his life resulting in clashes against the Philistines was brought on by his relationships with Philistine women. Samson's fascination with Delilah finally wrought his downfall. The lords of the Philistines offered her 1,100 pieces of silver from each of them to find out the source of Samson's strength. In her first three attempts, Samson gave her false answers. However, he did not seem to equate the Philistines binding him each time with betrayal by Delilah. Finally, she coaxed the truth from him, and Samson was captured.

Ultimately, Samson proved little more than a thorn in the flesh to the Philistines. He never really freed Israel from the dominion of the Philistines. In his death he killed more Philistines than the total he had killed during his life (16:30). He is listed with the heroes of faith in Heb. 11:32 because his strength came from God and because in his dying act, he demonstrated his faith. SAMUEL (Sām' ū ēl) Personal name in the ancient Near East meaning “Sumu is God” but understood in Israel as “his name is God,” or “name of God.” The last judge, first kingmaker, priest, and prophet who linked the period of the judges with the monarchy (about 1066-1000 B.C.). Born in answer to barren Hannah's tearful prayer (1 Sam. 1:10), Samuel was dedicated to the Lord before his birth (1:11); as the firstborn male to open Hannah's womb, he was “given to the LORD” for all his life (1:28 HCSB; 2:20). Eli raised Samuel at the Shiloh sanctuary (1 Sam. 2:11). As a child Samuel grew “in stature and in favor with the LORD and with men” (1 Sam. 2:26 HCSB; cp. Luke 2:52). Samuel met God and received his first prophetic mission as a young lad (1 Sam. 3:1,11-14). God's initial word to Samuel concerned God's rejection of Eli's family from service as priests as punishment for the sins of Eli's sons.

Samuel was responsible for a revival of the Shiloh sanctuary (1 Sam. 3:21). Psalm 99:6-7 relates that God spoke with Samuel from out of the pillar of cloud as God had previously with Moses and Aaron. God “was with him and let nothing he said prove false” (1 Sam. 3:19; 9:6). Jeremiah regarded Samuel and Moses as the two great intercessors of Israel (Jer. 15:1).

Following the deaths of Eli and his sons, Israel experienced 20 years (1 Sam. 7:2) of national sin and Philistine oppression. Samuel reemerged in the role of judge, calling Israel to repentance and delivering them from foreign domination. Samuel also exercised the judicial role of judge, administering justice at Bethel, Gilgal, Mizpah, and Ramah (1 Sam. 7:15-17).

Samuel served as the prototype for future prophets in tension with the kings of Israel and Judah. The sins of Samuel's sons and the Philistine threat led the elders of Israel to appeal to Samuel for a king “like all the nations” (1 Sam. 8:3,5,20). Samuel rightly understood this call for a king as rejection of God's rule (1 Sam. 8:7; 10:19). Samuel warned Israel of the dangers of a monarchy—forced labor, seizure of property, taxation (1 Sam. 8:10-18)—before anointing Saul as Israel's first king (1 Sam. 10:1). Samuel's recording of the rights and duties of kingship (1 Sam. 10:25) set the stage for later prophets to call their monarchs to task for disobedience to God's commands and for overstepping God's limits for kingship in Israel. Samuel foreshadowed Elijah in his call for rain during the wheat harvest, the usual dry season, as vindication of his word of judgment concerning Israel's demand for a king (1 Sam. 12:17-18).

Tel Rama (Ramah)—birthplace of Samuel the prophet.

Samuel's relations with Saul highlight the conditional nature of kingship in Israel. Israel's king was designated by God and served at God's pleasure. Saul's presumption in offering burnt sacrifice before battle with the Philistines (1 Sam. 13:8-15) and his disregard of God's command to leave no survivors among the Amalekites or their flocks (1 Sam. 15) occasioned Samuel's declaration of God's rejection of Saul's kingship. Obeying God's call to anoint another king amounted to treason in Saul's eyes, and Samuel had concerns for his life. Samuel was, however, obedient in anointing David as king over Israel (1 Sam. 16:13). Later when Saul sought David's life, David took refuge with Samuel and his band of prophets at Ramah (1 Sam. 19:18-24). Finally, Samuel's death brought national mourning

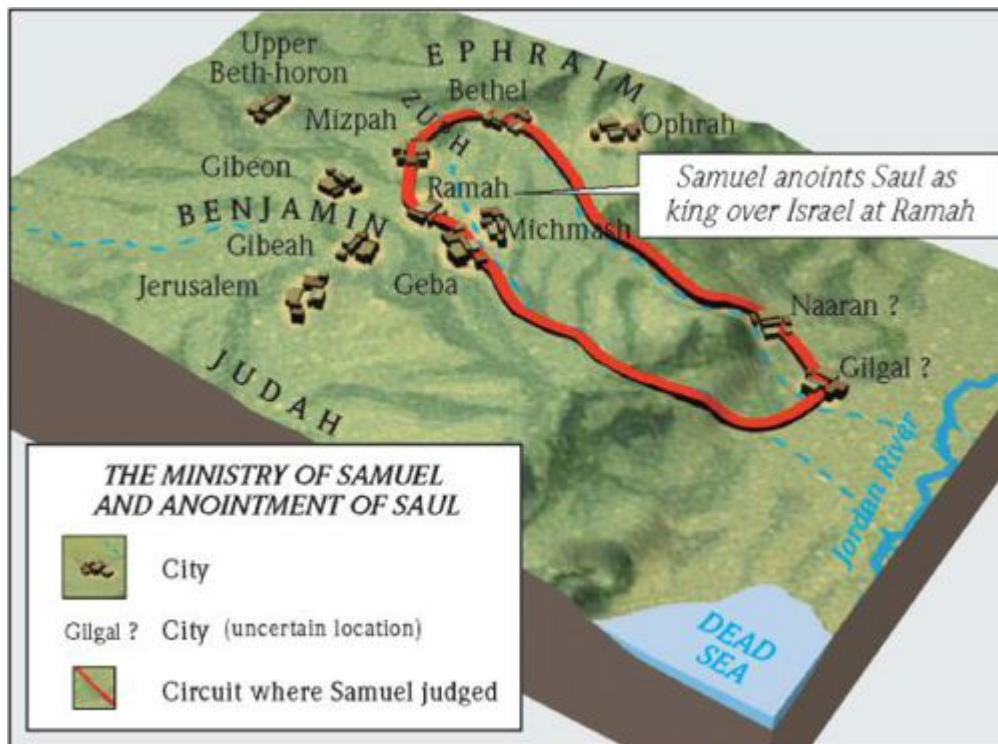

(1 Sam. 25:1; 28:3). It also left Saul without access to God's word. In desperation he acknowledged Samuel's power and influence by seeking to commune with Samuel's spirit (1 Sam. 28). Thus in life and death Samuel cast a long shadow over Israel's history of worship, rule, prophecy and justice. Chris Church

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF Ninth and tenth books of English Bible following the order of the earliest Greek translation but combined as the eighth book of the Hebrew canon named for the major figure of its opening section. Along with Joshua, Judges, and Kings, the books of Samuel form the "Former Prophets" in the Hebrew Bible. Many modern scholars refer to these four books as the Deuteronomistic History, since they show how the teaching of Deuteronomy worked itself out in the history of God's people.

The Bible does not say who wrote these books. Many Bible students think Samuel along with Nathan and Gad had major input, pointing to 1 Chron. 29:29 as evidence. Others think the books had a long history of composition with various narratives or narrative sources being composed from the time of the events until the time of the exile, when the "Former Prophets" were gathered into one collection. Such individual narratives would include Shiloh (1 Sam. 1-3), the Ark (1 Sam. 4:1-7:1), the Rise of Kingship (1 Sam. 9:1-11:15), Battles of Saul (1 Sam. 13-15), the History of David's Rise to Power (1 Sam. 16:14-2 Sam. 5:25), David's Reign (2 Sam.

9-20), and the Succession to the Throne of David (1 Kings 1-2). See Chronicles, Books of.

The books of Samuel arose as a reflection upon the nature of human kingship in light of Israel's tradition that Yahweh was their king. They answered a first generation's burning questions. Had God rejected David as He had rejected Saul? Why was the young Solomon named king rather than his older brothers? Could the violent measures Solomon undertook when he assumed the throne be justified? To answer the questions, the books tell the narrative of three major figures: Samuel, Saul, and David. The story of each combines tragedy, despair, and direction toward future hope. The dangers of kingship (1 Sam. 8) and the hope for kingship (2 Sam. 7) form the narrative tension for the books. The final chapter (2 Sam. 24) does not solve the tension. It points further ahead to the building of the temple, where God's presence and Israel's worship can be at the center of life leading the king to be God's humble, forgiven servant. See David; King, Kingship; Kingdom of God; Samuel; Saul.

The books of Samuel thus point to several theological themes that can guide God's people through the generations. Leadership is the guiding theme. Can God's people continue with a loosely knit organization as in the days of the judges, or must they have a king "to judge us the same as all the other nations have" (1 Sam. 8:5 HCSB)? Samuel does not explicitly answer the question. God does not wholeheartedly accept kingship as the only alternative. Kingship means the people have rejected God (1 Sam. 8:7; 10:19). Still, kingship can flourish if the people and the king follow God (1 Sam. 12:14-15, 20-25). Saul showed God's threats could be realized soon (1 Sam. 13:13-14). A new family from a new tribe would rule. This did not mean eternal war among tribes and families. A covenant could bind the two families together (1 Sam. 20; 23:16-18). Anger on one side does not require anger from the other as David's reactions to Saul continually show, summarized in 1 Sam. 24:17: "You are more righteous than I, for you have done good to me though I have done evil to you" (HCSB). David neither planned the demise of Saul and his family nor rewarded those who did (2 Sam. 4:9-12). David established his kingdom and sought to establish a house for God (2 Sam. 7:2). The king, however, gave in to God's plan to establish David's house and let his son build the house for God (2 Sam. 7:13). The king's response shows the nature of true leadership. He expresses praise for God, not pride in personal achievement (2 Sam. 7:18-29).

Working through His promise to David, God then worked to establish His own kingdom among His people. He could work through an imperfect king who committed the outlandish sin with Bathsheba (2 Sam. 11) because the king was willing to confess his sin (2 Sam. 12:13). The rule of God's king does not promise perfect peace. Even David's own household revolted against him. Human pride and ego did not determine history. God's promise to David could not be overthrown.

Other themes are subordinate to that of leadership for Israel. The call for covenant commitment and obedience, the forgiveness and mercy of God, the sovereignty of God in human history, the significance of prayer and praise, the faithfulness of God to fulfill prophecy, the need for faithfulness to human leaders, the holy presence of God among His people, the nature of human friendship, and the importance of family relationships all echo from these books.

Outline

- I. God Gives His People an Example of Dedicated Leadership (1:1-7:17).
 - A. A dedicated leader is the answer to parental prayers (1:1-28).
 - B. A dedicated leader comes from grateful, sacrificial parents who worship the incomparable God (2:1-10).
 - C. A dedicated leader is a priest who faithfully serves God rather than seeking selfish interests (2:11-36).
 - D. A dedicated leader is a prophet who is called by the word of God and who faithfully delivers the word of God (3:1-4:15).
 - E. Superstitious use of religious relics is not a substitute for dedicated leadership (4:16-22).
 - F. Only a dedicated priest, not foreign gods or disobedient persons, can stand before God (5:1-7:2).
 - G. A dedicated political leader is a man of prayer (7:3-17).
- II. Human Kingship Represents a Compromise with God by a People Who Have Rejected the Kingship of God (8:1-15:35).
 - A. Hereditary kingship is a rejection of God which hurts His people and separates them from God (8:1-22; cp. Judg. 8:22-9:57).
 - B. A dedicated king is a humble person from a humble family who knows he owes his position to God's choice (9:1-10:27).
 - C. The dedicated king is a Spirit-filled deliverer (11:1-15).
 - D. The dedicated leader is morally pure and uses the history of God's people to call them to obedience (12:1-25).
 - E. Kingship depends on obedience to God, not human wisdom (13:1-23).
 - F. A dedicated leader is used by God to unify and deliver His people (14:1-23).
 - G. God delivers His dedicated leader from inadvertent sins (14:24-46).

H. The king is responsible to defeat the enemies of the people of God (14:47-52).

I. A disobedient king is rejected by God (15:1-35).

III. God Raises Up New Leadership for His People (16:1-31:13).

A. God gives His Spirit to the chosen person meeting His leadership qualifications (16:1-13).

B. God provides unexpected opportunities of service for His chosen king (16:14-23).

C. God uses the skills and faith of His leader to defeat those who would defy God (17:1-58).

D. God provides His presence and the loyalty of friends to protect His chosen one from the jealous plots of an evil leader (18:1-20:42).

E. God's priests affirm the special position of God's chosen leader (21:1-9).

F. God protects His benevolent and faithful leader from the vengeance of evil enemies (21:10-22:23).

G. God heeds the prayer of His chosen and delivers him from treacherous enemies (23:1-29).

H. God honors the righteousness of His chosen leader (24:1-22).

I. God avenges His chosen against the insults of foolish enemies (25:1-39a).

J. God provides family for His chosen (25:39b-44).

K. God rewards the righteousness and faithfulness of His chosen leader (26:1-25).

L. The chosen leader cunningly begins building his kingdom even under adverse circumstances (27:1-12).

M. God fulfills His prophecy and destroys disobedient leaders (28:1-25).

N. God protects His chosen leader from compromising situations (29:1-11).

O. God restores the property taken from His chosen leader (30:1-20).

P. God's chosen leader shares his goods with the needy and with colleagues (30:21-31).

Q. God destroys disobedient leaders (31:1-7).

- R. God honors people who express loyalty to their chosen leaders (31:8-13).

 - C. God gives victory to His faithful servant (8:1-18).
 - D. God's servant shows kindness in memory of his departed friends (9:1-13).
 - E. Enemy coalitions cannot prevent God from taking vengeance (10:1-19).
 - F. Disobedience from God's leader displeases the Lord and brings judgment but also mercy (11:1-12:14a).
 - G. God brings honor to His penitent servant (12:14b-31).
- III. Lack of Attention to Family Relations Leads to National Problems for God's Leader (13:1-20:26).
 - A. The inattention of a godly father can lead to family feuds, shame, and vengeance (13:1-39).
 - B. Reconciliation, not anger and judgments, should mark the family life of God's servants (14:1-33).

- C. Unhealed family wounds lead to revolt (15:1-37).
 - D. Leaders need advisors whom God can use to accomplish His purposes (16:1-17:29).
 - E. The time of sorrow is too late to set family relationships right (18:1-33).
 - F. God's victorious servant deals kindly with those who helped and those who opposed him (19:1-40).
 - G. Victory cannot remove rivalries among God's people (19:41-20:26).
- IV. God's People Learn from the Experience and Example of God's Leader (21:1-24:25).
- A. God blesses the leader who is faithful to the tradition of His people (21:1-22).
 - B. God's leader praises God for His deliverance (22:1-51; cp. Ps. 18).
 - C. God's leader teaches what he has learned—his experiences with God (23:1-7).
 - D. God's leader depends on brave, faithful associates (23:8-39).
 - E. The leader's foolish decisions bring punishment, even on a repentant leader (24:1-17).
 - F. Proper worship brings God's mercy for His people (24:18-25).

SANBALLAT (Sān bāl' lāt) Akkadian personal name meaning "Sin (the god) has healed." According to the Elephantine Papyri from the reign of Darius I, Sanballat was governor of Samaria around 407 B.C. He had sons whose names included the term "Yahweh," for the God of Israel. Although addressed by his Babylonian name (probably acquired during the exile), Sanballat was a practicing Jew. His daughter was married to the grandson of Jerusalem's high priest (Neh. 13:28), indicating harmonious relations between Judah and Samaria at that time. Nehemiah referred to Sanballat as the "Horonite," suggesting a connection with Upper or Lower Beth-horon. (Neh. 2:10). These cities controlled the major highway between Jerusalem and the Mediterranean Sea. If Sanballat had influence with these towns, he could greatly affect Jerusalem's economy. Sanballat, in league with Tobiah and Shemaiah, opposed Nehemiah's rebuilding of Jerusalem. If the Holy City regained prominence, it would erode the powers of the surrounding cities. The struggle appears to have been more political than racial or religious. Papyri from Wadi Daliyeh appear to indicate two later Sanballats also served as governors of Samaria.

SANCTIFICATION Process of being made holy resulting in a changed lifestyle for the believer. The English word “sanctification” comes from the Latin sanctificatio, meaning the act or process of making holy, consecrated. In the Greek NT the root hag- is the basis of hagiasmos, “holiness,” “consecration,” “sanctification”; hagiosune, “holiness”; hagiotēs, “holiness”; hagiazō, “to sanctify,” “consecrate,” “treat as holy,” “purify”; and hagios, “holy,” “saint.” The root idea of the Greek stem is to stand in awe of something or someone. The NT usage is greatly dependent upon the Greek translation of the OT, the Septuagint, for meaning. The hag- words in the Septuagint mostly translated the Hebrew qadosh, “separate, contrasting with the profane.” Thus, God is separate; things and people dedicated to Him and to His use are separate. The moral implications of this word came into focus with the prophets and became a major emphasis in the NT. See Holy.

Old Testament In OT thought the focus of holiness (qadosh) is upon God. He is holy (Ps. 99:9); His name is holy (Pss. 99:3; 111:9) and may not be profaned (Lev. 20:3). Since God exists in the realm of the holy rather than the profane, all that pertains to Him must come into that same realm of holiness. This involves time, space, objects, and people.

Certain times are sanctified in that they are set apart especially to the Lord: the Sabbath (Gen. 2:3), the various festivals (Lev. 23:4-44), the Year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:12). By strictly observing the regulations governing each, Israel sanctified (or treated as holy) these special times of the year. Also the land of Canaan (Exod. 15:13), as well as Jerusalem (Isa. 11:9), was holy to the Lord and was not to be polluted by sinful conduct (Lev. 18:27-28). The tabernacle/temple and all the objects related to it were holy (Exod. 28:38; Ezek. 40-48). The various gifts brought in worship were sanctified. These fall into three groupings: those whose sanctity was inherent (e.g., firstborn males of female animals and human beings, Exod. 13:2,11-13; Lev. 27:26); objects whose sanctification was required (e.g., tithes of crops and pure animals, Lev. 27:30-33; Deut. 26:13); and gifts whose sanctification was voluntary (see partial list in Lev. 27). The dedication of these objects mostly occurred not at some ritual in the sanctuary but at a prior declaration of dedication (Judg. 17:3; Lev. 27:30-33).

Of course, the priests and Levites who functioned in the sanctuary, beginning with Aaron, were sanctified to the Lord by the anointing of oil (Exod. 30:30-32; 40:12-15). Additionally, the Nazirite was consecrated (Num. 6:8), although only for a specified period of time. Finally, the nation of Israel was sanctified to the Lord as a holy people (Exod. 19:6; Deut. 7:6; 14:2,21; 26:19). This holiness was closely identified with obedience to the Law of Holiness in Lev. 17-26, which includes both ritual and ethical commands. In the prophets especially, the ethical responsibility of being holy in conduct came to the forefront (Isa. 5; Jer. 5-7; Amos 4-5; Hos. 11).

New Testament The same range of meanings reflected by the Septuagint usage is preserved in the NT but with extension of meaning in certain cases. Objects may be made holy (Matt. 23:17,19; 1 Tim. 4:4-5) or treated as holy (Matt. 6:9; Luke 11:2), but, mostly, the word group stresses the personal dimension of holiness. Here, the two streams of OT meaning are significant: the cultic and the ethical. Sanctification is vitally linked to the salvation experience and is concerned with the moral/spiritual obligations assumed in that experience. We were set apart to God in conversion, and we are living out that dedication to God in holiness.

The link of NT thought to OT antecedents in the cultic aspect of sanctification is most clearly seen in Hebrews. Christ's crucifixion makes possible the moving of the sinner from the profane to the holy (that is, sanctifies, makes holy) so that the believer can become a part of the temple where God dwells and is worshiped (Heb. 13:11-16; 2:9-11; 10:10,14,29). Paul (Rom. 15:16; 1 Cor. 1:2; 6:11; Eph. 5:26-27; 2 Thess. 2:13) and Peter (1 Pet. 1:2) both affirmed the work of the Holy Spirit in conversion as a sanctification, making the believer holy so as to come before God in acceptance. Especially in Paul, justification and sanctification are closely related concepts. See Justification.

Hebrews also emphasizes the ethical aspect of sanctification. Sanctification/holiness is to be pursued as an essential aspect of the believer's life (Heb. 12:14); the blood of sanctification must not be defiled by sinful conduct (10:26-31). Paul stressed both the individual's commitment to holy living (Rom. 6:19-22; 1 Thess. 4:3-8; 2 Cor. 7:1) and the enabling power of God for it (1 Thess. 3:13; 4:8). The summation of the ethical imperative is seen in Peter's use (1 Pet. 1:15-16) of Lev. 11:44; 19:2; 20:7: "Be holy, because I am holy" (HCSB). See Ethics; Hebrews; Salvation. Lorin L. Cranford SANCTUARY Place set aside as sacred and holy, especially a place of worship. On sites where the patriarchs had erected altars, the people of Israel later built shrines and temples to commemorate the encounters with God. Specifically, the tabernacle and the temple in Jerusalem were revered as sanctuaries.

SANDALS, SHOES Items worn to protect the feet. Ancient shoes are well-known from paintings, sculptures, and carved reliefs. The shoe was considered the humblest article of clothing and could be bought cheaply. Two types of shoes existed: slippers of soft leather and the more popular sandals with a hard leather sole. Thongs secured the sandal across the insole and between the toes. Although shoes could be bought at a low price, they were often repaired by the poor. Shoes were removed at the doorway of the tent or house, or during a period of mourning. Shoes were also removed as evidence of humility in the presence of kings. The removal of the guest's sandals was the job of the lowliest servant who was also required to wash the dusty and soiled feet of the visitor. In early Israel legal contracts and oaths were often sealed with the removal and giving of a shoe by one party (Ruth 4:7). Going barefoot was a sign of poverty and reproach. Isaiah walked barefooted to symbolize the impending poverty of Israel before the judgment of God (Isa. 20:2). During NT times Jewish practice forbade the wearing of sandals with multilayered leather soles nailed together, as this was the shoe worn by Roman soldiers. See Footwashing.

SANHEDRIN (Sān hē' drīn) Highest Jewish council in the first century. The council had 71 members and was presided over by the high priest. The Sanhedrin included both of the main Jewish parties among its membership. Since the high priest presided, the Sadducean priestly party seems to have predominated, but some leading Pharisees also were members (Acts 5:34; 23:1-9).

The word “Sanhedrin” is usually translated “council” in the English translations of the Bible. Because of the predominance of the chief priests in the Sanhedrin, at times the words “chief priests” seem to refer to the action of the Sanhedrin, even though the name itself is not used.

According to Jewish tradition, the Sanhedrin began with the 70 elders appointed by Moses in Num. 11:16 and was reorganized by Ezra after the exile. However, the OT provides no evidence of a council that functioned like the Sanhedrin of later times. Thus, the Sanhedrin had its origin sometime during the centuries between the Testaments. See Intertestamental History and Literature; Jewish Parties in the New Testament.

During the first century the Sanhedrin exerted authority under the watchful eye of the Romans. Generally, the Roman governor allowed the Sanhedrin considerable autonomy and authority. The trial of Jesus, however, shows that the Sanhedrin did not have the authority to condemn people to death (John 18:31). Later, Stephen was stoned to death after a hearing before the Sanhedrin, but this may have been more of a mob action than a legal execution authorized by the Sanhedrin (Acts 6:12-15; 7:54-60).

The Gospels describe the role of the Sanhedrin in the arrest, trials, and condemnation of Jesus. The Sanhedrin, under the leadership of Caiaphas the high priest, plotted to have Jesus killed (John 11:47-53). The chief priests conspired with Judas to betray Jesus (Matt. 26:14-16). After His arrest they brought Jesus into the council (Luke 22:66). They used false witnesses to condemn Jesus (Matt. 26:59-60; Mark 14:55-56). They sent Him to Pilate and pressured Pilate into pronouncing the death sentence (Mark 15:1-15).

The book of Acts describes how the Sanhedrin harassed and threatened the apostles. The healing of the man at the temple and Peter's sermon attracted the attention of the chief priests. Peter and John were called before the council and warned not to preach anymore in the name of Jesus (Acts 4:5-21). When the apostles continued to preach, the council had them arrested (Acts 5:21,27). The wise counsel of Gamaliel caused the council to release the apostles with a beating and a warning (Acts 5:34-42). Stephen had to appear before the Sanhedrin on charges that sounded like the false charges against Jesus (Acts 6:12-15).

After Paul was arrested in Jerusalem, the Roman commander asked the council to examine Paul to decide what was Paul's crime (Acts 22:30; 23:28). Paul identified himself as a Pharisee who was on trial for his hope of resurrection. This involved the council in a debate of the divisive issue of the resurrection (Acts 23:1-9). The chief priests and elders were part of a plot to have Paul assassinated as he was led to another hearing before the council (Acts 23:13-15,20).

SANSANNAH (Săn sǎn' nah) Place-name, perhaps meaning “branch of the date palm.” Town in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:31). Modern Khirbet esh-Shamshaniyat, nine miles northwest of Beersheba. Apparently the same as Hazarsusah (Josh. 19:5) and Hazar-susim (1 Chron. 4:31), thus assigned to the tribe of Simeon.

SAPH (Săph) Personal name, perhaps meaning “threshold.” A giant the men of David killed (2 Sam. 21:18). See Giants; Rapha; Rephaim; Sibbechai.

SAPHIR (Să' phîr) Place-name meaning “beautiful town.” Town that Micah lamented over (Mic. 1:11). Location is unknown; suggestions include Khirbet el-Kom or Tell Eitun. It must be near Lachish.

SAPPHIRA (Să phi' rá) Personal name meaning “beautiful” or “sapphire.” See Ananias.

SAPPHIRE See Minerals and Metals.

SARA or SARAH (Săr' á) Variant Hebrew form of name Sarai. See Sarai.

SARAI (Săr' î) Personal name meaning “princess.” Wife and half sister of Abraham (Gen. 11:29-25:10). Sarah, first called Sarai, had the same father as Abraham. Marriages with half brothers were not uncommon in her time. Sarah traveled with Abraham from Ur to Haran. Then at the age of 65 she accompanied him to Canaan as Abraham followed God's leadership in moving to the land God had promised. During a famine in Canaan, Abraham and Sarah fled to Egypt. This was Abraham's first attempt to pass off Sarah as his sister rather than wife because he feared that he would be killed when the Egyptians saw Sarah's beauty. Consequently, the Pharaoh thought Sarah was Abraham's sister, took Sarah into court, and treated Abraham well. When the Lord sent serious disease on Pharaoh's household, he saw the deception and sent them away. The second trick about Abraham's relationship with Sarah was in the court of Abimelech, king of Gerar, who also took in Sarah. God intervened in Abimelech's dream and protected Sarah. He sent them away with the right to live there and with a gift for Sarah.

The building of the Cheops Pyramid at Giza, Egypt, predates Abram's and Sarai's Egyptian sojourn.

In her grief over her barrenness, Sarah gave her maid Hagar to Abraham in the hope of an heir, but she expressed resentment when Hagar conceived. When Sarah was almost 90 years old, God changed her name and promised her a son. A year later she bore Isaac.

At the age of 127, Sarah died at Hebron, where she was buried in the cave in the field of Machpelah near Mamre.

In the NT Rom. 4:19 refers to Sarah's barrenness as evidence of Abraham's faith; Rom. 9:9 cites her conception of Isaac as an example of God's power in fulfilling a promise. Galatians 4:21-31 contrasts her with Hagar without naming her, Heb. 11:11 lauds her faith, and 1 Pet. 3:6 describes her relationship with Abraham.

SARAPH (Sā' rāph) Personal name meaning “burning.” Member of tribe of Judah who exercised power in Moab (1 Chron. 4:22).

SARDIS (Sār' dīs) City of one of the seven churches addressed in Rev. 3:1-6. The church was condemned as being “dead,” perhaps a reference to its ineffectiveness in the world. However, some of its members were commended (v. 4). The city of the same name was the capital of the province of Lydia and was located in the Hermus River Valley northeast of Ephesus. An impressive acropolis overlooks the site. One of the major features there in NT times was a temple to Artemis, the goddess of love and fertility. See Asia Minor, Cities of.

SARDITE (Sār' dīt) Descendant of or member of clan of Sered (Num. 26:26).

SARGON (Sār' gōn) Akkadian royal name meaning “the king is legitimate.” An ancient throne name first taken by the king of Akkad about 2100 B.C. In 722 B.C. Sargon II of Assyria succeeded his brother, Shalmaneser V. His father was the famous king Tiglath-pileser III. Sargon finished the destruction of Samaria begun by his brother (Isa. 20:1). He deported the people of Israel to Media and other parts of the Middle East. Sargon then launched military campaigns against King Midas of Muski in southeast Asia Minor and against the kingdom of Urartu. He conquered both. Sargon was succeeded by his son, Sennacherib. See Assyria; Israel, Land of.

SARSECHIM (Sār' sə kīm) or SARSEKIM

(NASB) Babylonian personal name or title, possibly meaning “overseer of black slaves” or “overseer of the mercenary troops.” Often seen as SARUCH (Sā' rūk) Greek transliteration of Serug(Luke 3:35).

SATAN (Sā' tån) Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning “adversary.” The Hebrew term appears in Num. 22:22,32; 1 Sam. 29:4; 2 Sam. 19:22; 1 Kings 5:4; 11:14,23,25; Ps. 109:6, normally translated in English as adversary or accuser. SATRAP (Sā' trāp) , SATRAPHY (Sā' trāp ē)

Political office in the Persian Empire comparable to governor. A satrap's territory was called a satrapy. KJV translated the office “lieutenants” (Ezra 8:36). These officials aided the people of Israel in rebuilding Jerusalem and the temple. At the height of the Persian rule, there were at least 20 satrapies. See Persia.

SATYR Hairy, demonic figure with the appearance of a goat, translating a Hebrew term otherwise translated “hairy” or “male goat.” Bible students differ in interpreting passages as to whether a demonic figure or a normal animal is meant. Israelites apparently sacrificed to such desert-dwelling demons, since they had to have a law forbidding such sacrifice (Lev. 17:7). Some have even interpreted the scapegoat rites (Lev. 16:20-22) as sending Israel's sins back to their author, a desert demon with a different name from that translated “satyr.” Jeroboam I (926-909 B.C.) appointed priests to serve these demons (2 Chron. 11:15). Here idols in the forms of goats may be intended as parallel to the famous calves Jeroboam built. Isaiah promised that Babylon would become so desolate that the desert-dwelling demons would live in the ruins (Isa. 13:21; cp. 34:14). Some commentators read 2 Kings 23:8 to refer to worship places for these demons at a gate in Jerusalem (cp. REB). A similar reality is expressed by a different Hebrew word in Deut. 32:17 and Ps. 106:37 (cp. Matt. 12:43; Mark 5:13; Luke 11:24; Rev. 18:2). “Lilith” (Isa. 34:14 NRSV) may also be a name for the desert demons.

SAUL Personal name meaning “asked for.” First king of Israel and the Hebrew name of Paul, the apostle. See Paul.

Old Testament The Hebrew name Sha'ul is used of four persons in the OT. It is usually rendered “Shaul” for a king of Edom (Gen. 36:37-38), the last son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10), and a Levite of the Kohathites (1 Chron. 6:24). Saul, however, primarily refers to the first king of a united Israel, a tall and handsome son of Kish from the tribe of Benjamin (1 Sam. 9:1-2,21). Chosen by God (1 Sam. 9:15-17) and secretly anointed by Samuel (10:1), Saul was later selected publicly by lot (10:17-24). Despite some people's skepticism (10:27), he proved himself an able leader by delivering the city of Jabeshgilead and was acclaimed king at Gilgal (11:1-15).

The numbers in 1 Sam. 13:1 are incomplete in the Hebrew text, but Saul's reign is generally dated about 1020-1000 B.C. He made his capital at “Gibeah of Saul” (“Saul's hill,” 1 Sam. 11:4), probably Tell el-Ful, three miles north of Jerusalem where excavations have uncovered contemporary foundations of a modest fortresslike palace. From Gibeah Saul drove the Philistines from the hill country (13:19-14:23) and fought other enemies of Israel (14:47-48).

A tragic figure, Saul's heart was initially changed; he had even prophesied (1 Sam. 10:9-13). His presumptuous offering (13:8-14), however, and violation of a holy war ban led to his break with Samuel and rejection by God (15:7-23). The Spirit of the Lord left Saul and was replaced by an evil spirit that tormented him. David is introduced as a musician who soothed him by playing the lyre (16:14-23). After the Goliath episode, Saul became jealous and fearful of David (18:6-9,12), eventually making several spontaneous and indirect attempts on David's life (18:10-11,25; 19:1,9-11). Saul's fits of rage, his obsession with David, and the slaughter of the priests at Nob (22:17-19) make it appear as though he suffered from some sort of psychotic state. His final wretched condition is betrayed by his consultation of the witch at En-dor (28:7-8). The following day Saul and three sons were killed at the hands of the Philistines on Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. 31). Saul's body was beheaded and hung on the walls of Beth-shan; it was rescued and buried by the grateful inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead (31:8-13).

The enigma of Saul was sensed by David who refused to lift his hand against "the LORD'S anointed" (1 Sam. 26:9-11,23) and at his death provided a fitting elegy (2 Sam. 1:17-27). See Prophets.

SAVIOR One who saves by delivering, preserving, healing, or providing (2 Sam. 22:2-7). Unlike all other religions, Christianity is unique in portraying salvation completely by the grace of a savior. Salvation comes exclusively and completely from God. Salvation's source is grace from the savior. The means is faith in the savior. The Lord Jesus Christ is the only Savior (John 4:42).

In the OT God is portrayed as Savior (Isa. 43:3; 45:15,21-22). Categorically, God is the only Savior (Isa. 43:11; Hos. 13:4). This is the NT teaching also (Jude 25; James 4:12; Acts 4:12). Jesus is the Savior who provides eternal life (John 3:16; Matt. 1:21; Rom. 3:21-26; 5:1-11; 1 John 2:2; 4:14; 5:13).

Jesus is Savior because He is God (Rom. 10:9-10,13; cp. Joel 2:32). One must call on the name of the Lord (Yahweh in the OT, Kurios in the NT). Also note the close affinity between Jesus' deity and His stature as Savior (Titus 2:13; 2 Peter 1:1). Jesus is the Savior also because He is God incarnate, fully human and fully divine. Jesus stated, "If you do not believe that I am He, you will die in your sins" (John 8:24 HCSB). The phrase "I am He" is "I am" in Greek and is similar to "Before Abraham was, I am" (John 8:58). Clearly this is a self-attestation of Jesus Christ's essential deity, an appropriation of the personal name of God as His own. See Salvation.

SCALES Instrument for weighing materials. See Balances; Weights and Measures.

SCALL KJV term for a skin disease (Lev. 13:30-37; 14:54). The basic Hebrew term means "to tear away, pull loose." The disease produced head sores, itching, hair thinning, and hair turning yellow. Modern translations refer to a scale or itch. Some scholars think favus is the disease described; others speak of ringworm or eczema. See Itch.

SCAPEGOAT Animal that carried away the sins of the people into the wilderness on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:8,10,26). On the Day of Atonement, when the high priest went once a year into the holy of holies to offer sacrifices for the sins of his family and for all the people, two goats were brought before him. By lot, one was chosen to be “for the LORD.” This goat was slain as a sin offering, and its blood was sprinkled on the cultic objects to help cleanse the altar, the sanctuary, and the tent of meeting from defilements of the past year.

The second goat was said to be “for Azazel.” The word “Azazel” is usually interpreted to mean “the goat of removal,” or “scapegoat.” However, the term may also refer to a rocky place in the desert or to a demon of the desert. By laying his hands on the goat's head, the priest transferred the sins of the people to it and then had the goat led away into the desert, picturing the removal of the sins.

In the book of Enoch, Azazel is identified as the leader of the fallen angels who lies bound beneath rocks in the desert awaiting judgment. The goat is led to that area and thrown to its death from a cliff. See Intertestamental History and Literature; Pseudepigrapha; Sacrifice and Offering.

Although the scapegoat is not mentioned by name in the NT, Heb. 10:3-17 contrasts sanctification through the sacrifice of Christ with the blood of bulls and goats which can never take away sins. See Sanctification.

SCEPTER Official staff or baton of a king, symbolic of his authority. It probably was descended from the ancient club carried by the prehistoric rulers. Ancient Middle Eastern scepters were depicted in Scripture as the striking power of the king (Num. 24:17). As part of the royal regalia, the scepter was extended to a visitor or dignitary (Esther 5:2) to signal approval of the visit and allow the person to approach the throne. Scepters were decorated elaborately with gold and precious stones. The shapes varied from wide short maces to long slender poles, usually with ornate heads. The type of scepter usually differed from one kingdom to the next.

SCEVA (Sē'vā) Jewish "high priest" in Ephesus with seven sons who tried unsuccessfully to exorcise demons in Jesus' name as Paul had done (Acts 19:14). The evil spirit jumped on them instead. No such Jewish high priest is known from other sources, particularly not one living in Ephesus. The title may be the result of a copyist or a title Sceva took upon himself to impress leaders of other religions in Ephesus.

SCHOOL Place and agency for education, particularly of children. The word "school" is not mentioned in the OT and only once in the NT where the reference is to a Greek school (Acts 19:9). Until the exile in Babylon (586 B.C.), the education of children was like that of all ancient peoples: it was centered in the home. The main concern of the Jewish people was for religious education in the home.

A new stage in Jewish education came about due to the catastrophe of the Babylonian exile when the upper classes of Judea were transported to Babylon. The exiles assembled on the Sabbath for prayer and worship. As time went by, buildings were erected where the people could meet. These little gatherings were the origin of the synagogue, which ultimately became the center of Jewish religious life after the exile. In the synagogue the scribes taught the law to the people. Children were not taught in the synagogue until much later times. The father was responsible for transmitting what he had learned to his children.

The attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to eradicate Judaism by force brought about the fierce nationalistic revolt of the Maccabees (Jewish patriots) in 168 B.C. The Jews who had remained faithful learned a lesson. They saw that they needed schools for the young as well as adult classes for their fathers. Simon ben Shetah, the leader of the Pharisees, founded schools for boys of 16 and 17 to promote the study of the Scriptures. A century later, as an inevitable consequence, private schools for younger children appeared. After the destruction of Herod's temple by Titus in A.D. 70 and the disappearance of the Jewish state after the revolt of Bar-Kochba in A.D. 135, public instruction was instituted for all children. See Intertestamental History and Literature.

The elementary school, significantly called Beth-hasepher, the “house of the book,” was originally housed in some easily available room; but by A.D. 200, it had become firmly established in the synagogue. Boys entered at the age of six or seven and continued until 13. Here, study was wholly devoted to the written law. This involved the learning of Hebrew, since Aramaic had long before replaced Hebrew as the everyday language of the people. Knowledge of the written word, in school as in the home, had the religious goal of bringing about obedience to the law.

The school was not only a place of learning but also a house of prayer; its aims were not cultural but religious. A strong sense of community responsibility, evidenced by an education tax on all parents, had by A.D. 200 opened all schools to the children of the poor. However, the Jewish school, like the Greek school, remained an independent, fee-paying institution. See Education in Bible Times; Synagogue; Torah.

SCHOOLMASTER Law's role until coming of Christ (Gal. 3:24-25 KJV). Other translations use “guardian” (HCSB), “disciplinarian” (NRSV), “supervision” (NIV), “tutor” (NASB), “charge” (REB; TEV; cp. NIV), or “custodian” (RSV). See Custodian; Guardian.

SCIENCE KJV term (Dan. 1:4; 1 Tim. 6:20) for knowledge. Scripture describes Daniel's knowledge with admiration and approval but warns against meaningless debate of issues for the sake of human pride not leading to useful knowledge. See Gnosticism.

SCOFFER Person who shows contempt for others. Habakkuk predicted the Babylonians would be scoffers as they conquered the Near East (Hab. 1:10). Second Peter 3:3 warns that the last days will see scoffers laughing at the idea of Christ's return (cp. Jude 18). The wisdom writers repeatedly warned their students not to become scoffers (Job 11:3; Prov. 9:7-12; 13:1; 14:6; 15:12; 19:25; 21:24; 22:10; 24:9; cp. Ps. 1:1; Isa. 28:14,22). Still, God is a scoffer, jeering at the feeble efforts of those who oppose Him (Ps. 2:4; Prov. 3:34). Jesus endured scoffing (Luke 16:14; cp. Acts 13:41).

SCORN, SCORNFUL Dislike that turns to contempt and derision. “Scorn” often appears in some Bible translations where “scoff” appears in others. Scorn is often expressed by laughter (2 Kings 19:21; 2 Chron. 30:10). In deep trouble psalmists often felt themselves scorned (Pss. 22:6; 31:11; 39:8; 44:13; 80:6; 89:41; 119:22; 123:4). God scorns the wicked (Prov. 3:34), who, in turn, scorn Him (2 Sam. 12:14). When His people refuse to be faithful, God can scorn them and their worship, expressed in destruction (Lam. 2:7). See Scoffer.

SCORPION An order of arachnids known for the venom and sting in their narrow segmented tails. In the wilderness God protected Israel from scorpions (Deut. 8:15) and could protect His prophet from them (Ezek. 2:6). Scorpions gave their names to an insidious instrument of punishment with lashes and spikes. Rehoboam chose to use these to enforce his harsh policies (1 Kings 12:11,14).

SCORPION PASS See Akrabbim.

SCOURGE Severe form of corporal punishment involving whipping and beating, usually was done with the victim tied to a post or bench and administered by a servant of the synagogue (if for religious reasons) or by a slave or soldier. John 19:1 uses this word for the beating given Jesus before His crucifixion. Matthew and Mark use a word meaning “flog” (a lesser punishment), while Luke says that Pilate offered to have Jesus “whipped” (23:16 HCSB), which was a still lighter punishment. The number of blows was set in Deut. 25:3 at 40 but later reduced to 39. There were to be 13 strokes on the chest and 26 on the back. Often the victim died from the beating.

SCREECH OWL English translation used for different Hebrew terms by different translations. KJV uses it for “Lilith” (Isa. 34:14). NIV uses it for Hebrew qippod (Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14) but simply “owls” at Isa. 14:23. NRSV used “screech owl” at Zeph. 2:14. NIV also uses “screech owl” for Hebrew tachmas (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15). REB uses “screech owl” for Hebrew yanshuph (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:16; Isa. 34:11). Qippod may be Syrnium aluco or Scops giu. Others suggest the Arabian Desert fowl (Ammoperdrix heyi). Tachmas cannot be identified with any certainty. Yanshopf may be the eared owl (Asiootus) or the Merops apiaster. See Owl; Satyr.

SCRIBE Person trained in writing skills and used to record events and decisions (Jer. 36:26; 1 Chron. 24:6; Esther 3:12). During the exile in Babylon educated scribes apparently became the experts in God's written word, copying, preserving, and teaching it. Ezra was a scribe in this sense of expert in teaching God's word (Ezra 7:6). A professional group of such scribes developed by NT times, most being Pharisees (Mark 2:16). They interpreted the law, taught it to disciples, and were experts in cases where people were accused of breaking the law of Moses. They led in plans to kill Jesus (Luke 19:47) and heard His stern rebuke (Matt. 23). See Government; Jewish Parties in the New Testament; Sanhedrin; Secretary.

SCRIP See Bag 4.

SCRIPTURE Historic Judeo-Christian name for the specific literature that the church receives as divine instruction. Scripture means “a writing,” rendering the Latin scriptura and the Greek graphe. The term is used some 50 times in the NT for some or all of the OT.

In the history of the church, the divine character of Scripture has been the great presupposition for the whole of Christian preaching and theology. This is apparent in the way the NT speaks about the OT. New Testament writers often used formulas like “God says” and “the Holy Spirit says” to introduce OT passages. For the NT authors Scripture was the record of God speaking and revealing Himself to His people. Thus Scripture and God are so closely joined together that these writers could speak of Scripture doing what it records God as doing (Gal. 3:8; Rom. 9:17).

Because of their belief in the Scripture's divine origin and content, the NT writers described it as “strongly confirmed” (2 Pet. 1:19 HCSB), trustworthy “deserving of full acceptance” (1 Tim. 1:15), and “confirmed” (Heb. 2:3). Its word “endures forever” (1 Pet. 1:24-25). Those who build their lives on Scripture “will not be put to shame” (Rom. 9:33 HCSB). The Bible was written for “instruction” and “encouragement” (Rom. 15:4), to lead to “salvation through faith” (2 Tim. 3:15), to guide people toward godliness (2 Tim. 3:16b), and to equip believers for good works (2 Tim. 3:17).

The purpose of Scripture is to place men and women in right standing before God and to enable believers to seek God's glory in all of life's activities and efforts. It is above all a book of redemptive history.

Scripture is not only a divine book but also a divine-human book. It is important to recognize that the biblical writers employed the linguistic resources available to them as they wrote to specific people with particular needs at particular times. The human authors were not lifted out of their culture or removed from their contexts. They functioned as members of believing communities, aware of God's leadership in their lives.

Scripture, comprised of 66 books, written by over 40 authors spanning almost 1,500 years, reveals to God's people the unifying history of His redeeming words and acts. The ultimate focus of Scripture is the incarnation and redemptive work of Jesus Christ. He is the center to which everything in Scripture is united and bound together—beginning and end, creation and redemption, humanity, the world, the fall, history, and the future. SCROLL Roll of papyrus (a paperlike material made of the papyrus plant) or parchment (specially treated leather) used as a medium for writing (Ezra 6:2; Jer. 36:2; Ezek. 2:9; Zech. 5:1-2; Luke 4:17; Rev. 5:1). One of the most famous and best-preserved ancient scrolls is the “Isaiah scroll,” a complete copy of the book of Isaiah written on a parchment roll, dated to the second century B.C. See Diseases.

SCYTHIANS (SĪ' thē ənz) Nomadic, Indo-European people, speaking an Iranian dialect, who migrated from central Asia into southern Russia between 800 and 600 B.C. They were skilled horsemen who excelled in barbaric attack and plunder. Archaeologists have discovered abundant evidence of Scythian artistry in metalwork. Their forces, in pursuit of the Cimmerians, drove south through or around the Caucasus Mountains to the borders of Assyria. A Scytho-Assyrian alliance was formed about 680 to 670 B.C.

According to the Greek historian Herodotus, a Scythian attack forced the Medes to withdraw from an assault against Nineveh (apparently 626-620 B.C.). Later, the Scythians advanced southward along the Palestinian coast to the Egyptian border (611 B.C.), where the Egyptian Pharaoh bought them off. They were eventually driven back northward into southern Russia by the Medes.

Scythian power was dominant in the area northwest of the Black Sea until about 350 B.C. Eventually, new invaders, the Sarmatians, having confined them to the Crimean area, destroyed the Scythian remnants after A.D. 100.

The OT refers to Scythians as Ashchenaz (Gen. 10:3; Jer. 51:27). Earlier scholars identified the Scythians as Jeremiah's foe from the north and Zephaniah's threatened invader of Judah, but such theories rest on weak evidence. Colossians 3:11 uses Scythians to represent the most repugnant barbarian and slave, saying they, too, are accepted in Christ, all social and cultural barriers being abolished in His church. See Ashchenaz. Charles Graham

SEAL Signet containing a distinctive mark that represented the individual who owned it. The earliest seals found so far date before 3000 B.C. Seals varied in shapes and sizes. Some were round and were worn around the neck. Others were rings worn on the finger. The mark was made by stamping the seal into soft clay. Many cylinder seals have been found which contain scenes that communicate a message. These were rolled in the clay to form the impression. Tamar asked for Judah's signet as collateral on a pledge he made (Gen. 38:18). Joseph was given pharaoh's ring when he was placed in command of the country (Gen. 41:42), symbolizing Joseph's right to act with the ruler's authority. Jezebel used Ahab's seal to sign letters asking that Naboth be tried and stoned to death (1 Kings 21:8).

SEASON KJV translation of several Hebrew and Greek terms with different meanings. 1. Indefinite but somewhat extended period of time (Gen. 40:4; Josh. 24:7; Luke 4:13). 2. A regularly scheduled, recurring time (Exod. 13:10; Num. 9:2; John 5:4). 3. To add ingredients to food to improve the flavor (Lev. 2:13; Mark 9:50). See Salt; Spices. 4. A particular part of a year (Gen. 1:14; 2 Kings 4:16). 5. An indefinite part of a day (Job 30:17; Ps. 22:2). 6. Time appointed by God (Ps. 104:27; Matt. 24:45). 7. The proper time for an action (Isa. 50:4). SEBAM (Sē' bām) Place-name probably meaning "high" or "cold." Town east of the Jordan that the tribes of Reuben and Gad wanted to settle after God conquered it for them (Num. 32:3). Early versions agree with verse 38 in reading "Sibmah," which the tribes rebuilt. Its location is not certain.

SEBAT (Sē' bāt) Eleventh month in Babylonian calendar used to date Zechariah's vision (1:7). This would be February-March. See Calendars.

SECACAH (Sə kā' kah) Place-name meaning "covered." Town in tribal territory of Judah in the Judean wilderness (Josh. 15:61). It is modern SECHU (Sé' kū) Place-name, perhaps meaning “lookout.” Otherwise unknown site where Saul searched for David (1 Sam. 19:22). Many commentators follow the earliest Greek translation and change the Hebrew text to read “on the bare height” (NRSV note).

SECOND COMING Biblical teaching that Christ will return visibly and bodily to the earth to render judgment and complete His redemptive plan.

Old Testament The concept of the second coming originally derived from the OT teachings about a coming Messiah. Therein, the prophets foretold the Lord would send One from within the nation of Israel (Num. 24:17; Jer. 23:5-6) who would not only be God's anointed but would in fact be God Himself (Isa. 9:6; Mic. 5:2). As various descriptions of this Messiah developed, two portraits emerged. One described Him as a mighty redeemer who would destroy Israel's enemies, bring salvation, and restore peace (Jer. 33:15; Zech. 9:9-10) while the other portrayed Him as a servant who would suffer and be rejected (Isa. 53; Zech. 13:7). These contrasting descriptions of Messiah, however, would not be delineated into two separate comings until the NT.

New Testament The NT clearly distinguishes between two comings of Jesus Christ, the Messiah: the first in the incarnation and the second at the end of this present age. The earliest instructions of this second coming are recounted in the Gospels where Christ Himself explicitly claimed He would come again. For example, He urged people to be prepared because He would come unexpectedly, like a thief (Matt. 25:1-13; Mark 13:35-36; Luke 21:34-36). He also promised to return in order to claim His own and reward them (Matt. 25:31-46; John 14:1-3). Furthermore, at His ascension angels declared that He would return to the earth in the same manner in which He left (Acts 1:10-11).

Later, other NT writers explained Christ's teachings even further. They taught that He would come in glory to judge unbelievers, Satan, his hoards, and even the earth itself (2 Thess. 1:6-10; 2:8; 2 Pet. 3:10-12; Rev. 19:20-20:3). Likewise, He would come in the heavens to gather all believers unto Himself forever by resurrecting the dead, catching them up along with the living into the air to meet Him on His return, and then reward them all for their faithfulness (1 Cor. 15:51-57; 2 Cor. 5:10; 1 Thess. 4:13-17). Because the second coming promised both vindication and salvation, it acted as a motivation for godly living and became the blessed hope of the early church (Titus 2:13; 1 John 3:2-3).

The Time of His Coming Historically, Christians have differed on two major issues pertinent to the second coming. The first relates to the millennial era mentioned in Rev. 20:1-10. Many equate the millennium with the current church age or the time between Pentecost and Christ's return. Consequently, some propose that Christ's return will occur at the close of the church age to either bring an end to wickedness and sinful rebellion (i.e., Amillennialism) or as a climax to a gradual development of universal righteousness and peace on the earth (i.e., Postmillennialism). Others, who do not view the millennium as the present church age, believe it will be a period after Christ's return wherein He will establish a literal kingdom on earth (i.e., Premillennialism).

The second issue, which is a concern primarily among Premillennialists, regards the sequential relationship between the catching up of believers (i.e., the “rapture”) and a future time of worldwide judgment known as the Tribulation period (Jer. 30:7; Dan. 9:23-27; 2 Thess. 2:3-7). Many believe the rapture will occur prior to the Tribulation while Christ's return to the earth will occur afterwards (i.e., Pretribulationism). Others think the rapture will occur midway or towards the latter end of the Tribulation (i.e., Midtribulationism). Finally, some are convinced the rapture and His coming to the earth will both occur consecutively after the Tribulation (i.e., Posttribulationism). This latter group generally disdains the word “rapture,” since the “catching up” is at the same moment as the second coming.

All of the above interpretations affirm that there will be a literal, physical return of Jesus at the end of time as a prelude to final judgment and the redemption of creation. Although Christians embrace diverse views on many of the details, in the end the certainty of the second coming should bring hope and comfort to all believers (1 Thess. 4:18; Heb. 9:28; Rev. 22:20). SECOND DEATH Eternal separation from God. The concept is referred to in Rev. 2:11 ; 20:6,14; and 21:8. According to Rev. 20:15 it includes being “thrown into the lake of fire.” The first death would be physical death (see Matt. 10:28). Although the expression “first death” does not occur, the concept is implied in Rev. 20:6 which states that “the second death has no power” over “the one who shares in the first resurrection.” Sharing in the first resurrection would be impossible unless they had previously died. SECURITY OF THE BELIEVER Teaching that God protects believers for the completion of their salvation. Contemporary Christianity needs to deal forthrightly with the universal human problem of insecurity. The natural gulf between the invisible, infinite God and finite, fallible humanity makes the quest for assurance and security a very significant theological issue. Slogans such as “once saved, always saved” and “eternal security” often easily gain a reverential status normally reserved only for biblical texts and become symbols of “evangelical orthodoxy.” Indeed, it comes as a shock to some when they discover that their symbols are not actually biblical terms.

The Bible does teach that salvation does not depend merely upon human effort. God is the author of salvation (2 Cor. 5:18-19; John 3:16). God justifies or treats as acceptable sinners who receive Christ in faith (Rom. 3:21-26). The great message of the Reformation says: No one can earn assurance or security with God. Assurance of salvation is God's gift! Security does not come by absolutions, church attendance, good works, reciting Scripture, or performances of penance. God who has begun the work of salvation in Christians also provides the necessary assurance to bring His work to its completion in the day of Christ (Phil. 1:6). God in Christ protects and keeps Christians (John 10:27-29; 2 Thess. 3:3) just as Jesus took seriously the task of preserving the disciples while He was on earth (John 17:12-15). We do not possess the strength to secure ourselves.

The biblical view of security, however, is probably best epitomized in the Christian doctrine of perseverance (Eph. 6:18; Heb. 12:1; James 1:25). Christians must realize that their security does not lie in a fairy-tale approach to life where once a person becomes a Christian everything is a bed of roses forever and ever. Such a view fails to take seriously the traumas of human life. See Perseverance.

The biblical view of assurance or security is rooted in the conviction that when Jesus departed from the disciples, the Lord did not orphan them or leave them without support. He promised Christians that He would come to them and would provide them with a companion Spirit (the Comforter or Paraclete) who would not only be at their side but would be within them, as much a part of them as their very breath (John 14:16-18). The Spirit would be their sense of peace and security, their witness concerning Jesus, their attorney with the world, and their guide or teacher into all truth (John 14:25-30; 15:26-27; 16:8-15). See Advocate; Comforter; Helper.

Along with great promises of assurance, the Bible contains strong warnings that call Christians to consistent living, even as they have yielded to temptations and sin and capitulated to the hostile forces of evil (1 Cor. 10:1-12; Heb. 2:1-3; 3:12-19; 6:1-8; 10:26-31; James 5:19-20). These and many other warnings are not merely phantom warnings unrelated to Christian life. They are meant to be taken with great seriousness. They are no more a game with God than was the death of Christ.

These warnings appear in the NT within clear statements reminding believers that temptation is accompanied by God's presence. Christians are expected to resist temptations and flee ungodly activity (1 Cor. 10:13-14). Evil patterns of life are inconsistent with Christian transformation. The writers of the NT were convinced that Christians would heed these warnings and resist the devil (James 4:7; 1 Pet. 5:8-9). It is virtually unthinkable for a Christian to do otherwise. The Christian is anchored to the person of God. Evil has to be dealt with. The Christian can find in God an enduring security for the soul. Such is the meaning of Heb. 6:17-20. God's consistency is the basis for a Christian's security in the midst of the world's traumas.

The security of the believer is not merely focused upon this life on earth. It has a dynamic focus on the life to come. The NT writers are convinced that a Christian will take very seriously the warnings in this life because this life is related to the life with Christ in heaven. The Christian, therefore, is expected to persevere to the end (1 Pet. 1:5; 1 John 5:18; Rev. 3:10).

The confidence or secure sense of the believer with respect to the life hereafter is rooted in the united witness of the NT writers that the resurrection of Jesus Christ is the hinge point of the Christian faith. In raising His Son Jesus, God provided Christians with the sign of the destinies and the basis for their security. Without the resurrection the Christian proclamation would be empty (1 Cor. 15:14). Moreover, in the coming of the Holy Spirit, God provided the guarantee of our marvelous relationship with God (2 Cor. 1:22). In our identity with Adam, humanity experienced sin and, consequently, death. However, as we identify with the ultimate power of Christ in the resurrection, we, too, shall experience the effective meaning of the security of the believer in the triumph of God (1 Cor. 15:20-28). Gerald L. Borchert SEDITION Rebellion against lawful authority. Government officials in Persia's province headquartered in Samaria accused the Jews in Jerusalem of a history of rebellion as evidence against allowing Jerusalem and its temple to be rebuilt (Ezra 4:15). Barabbas had been imprisoned for sedition (Luke 23:19). Jewish leaders tried to convince Felix, the governor, that Paul had incited sedition (Acts 24:5). KJV uses "seditions" in Gal. 5:20 for one of the works of the flesh, but modern translations are more accurate in using "dissensions." Relationships among believers rather than to governments is the apparent meaning. See Barabbas.

SEGUB (Sē' gūb) Personal name meaning "He has revealed Himself as exalted" or "He has protected." 1. Second son of Hiel, whose death during rebuilding of Jericho showed power of God's prophesy through the centuries (1 Kings 16:34). 2. Son of Judahite father and Machirite or Manassehite mother (1 Chron. 2:21-22).

SEIR, MOUNT (Sā' īr) Place-name meaning "hairy" and thus "thicket" or "small forested region." A mountain range that runs the length of biblical Edom, leading at times to an equation of Edom and Seir. Parts of the range are almost impassable. The highest peak is about 5,600 feet above sea level. The region was home to Esau and his descendants (Gen. 32:3; Josh. 24:4). Some documents found in Egypt seem to make Seir and Edom two different tribal habitats, and it is possible that at times in its history the area was ruled over simultaneously by several local clans. The "sons of Seir" represented an early Horite clan from the region. See Edom; Horim or Horites.

SEIRAH (Sā' ī rah) Place-name meaning "toward Seir." Modern translations' reading for KJV "Seirath" (Judg. 3:26). The name would seem to point to Mount Seir in Edom, but the context seems to make that location impossible. Otherwise, the location is not known. It must be a forested place in the tribal territory of Benjamin.

SEIRATH (Sā' ī rāth) KJV transliteration of place-name in Judg. 3:26. See Seirah.

SELA (Sē' la) Place-name meaning "rock." Major fortified city in Edom. The biblical references lend themselves to varying interpretations, since Sela may also be read as a common noun referring to rocky country or wilderness. Judges 1:36 refers to a border of the Amorites, though some commentators change this to Edomites (REB). Amaziah of Judah (796-767 B.C.) captured Sela and renamed it Joktheel (2 Kings 14:7; cp. 2 Chron. 25:12 NRSV). Isaiah's oracle against Moab calls for action from Sela, which many commentators take to be the rocky wilderness bordering Moab rather than the more distant town of Sela (Isa. 16:1). Traditionally from the earliest Greek translation on, Sela has been identified with Petra, the capital of Edom, or the nearby umm-Bayyara in the Wadi Musa. More recent study has placed it at es-Sela, two and a half miles northwest of Bozrah and five miles southwest of Tafiheh. Modern translations include Sela in Isa. 42:11, God's call to joy at the coming salvation.

SELAH (Sē' lah) Term of unknown meaning appearing in psalms, outside the book of Psalms only in Hab. 3. Scholars have advanced various unprovable theories: a pause either for silence or musical interlude; a signal for the congregation to sing, recite, or fall prostrate on the ground; a cue for the cymbals to crash; a word to be shouted by the congregation; or a sign to the choir to sing a higher pitch or louder. The earliest Jewish traditions thought it meant "forever."

SELAH-HAMMAHLEKOTH (Sē lā-hām mäh' lə kōth) Place-name meaning "rock of hiding, haunt, refuge." David's hiding place in the wilderness of Maon while Saul pursued him (1 Sam. 23:28 KJV). Modern translations often translate the name rather than transliterate it: "Rock of Separation" (HCSB), "Dividing Rock" (REB), "Rock of Escape" (NRSV, NASB).

SELED (Sē' lēd) Personal name meaning "jumping." Member of tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:30).

SELEUCIA (Sə lū' shī ə) Syrian city on Mediterranean coast, five miles north of the Orontes River and 15 miles from Antioch. Paul stopped there on his first missionary journey (Acts 13:4). It was founded by Seleucus Nicator, the first Seleucid king, in 301 B.C. See Seleucids.

SELEUCIDS (Sē lū' sīds) Descendants of Seleucus, one of the generals of Alexander the Great. Following the death of Alexander, 323 B.C., his kingdom was divided among five of his leading commanders. Seleucus chose for himself the eastern part of the empire around the city of Babylon. During the next several years much confusion prevailed. Seleucus was forced to leave Babylon for a time and take refuge with his friend Ptolemy, ruler of Egypt. Later, with the help of Ptolemy, he was able to control Babylon again. The important date is 312 B.C. The Syrian calendar has its beginning at this time.

The overall situation remained unchanged until the battle of Ipsus, 301 B.C. In that battle four of the generals, including Seleucus, fought against Antigonus who had become the most powerful of the generals and claimed to be king over much of Asia Minor and northern Syria. Antigonus was slain in the battle, and his territory was given to Seleucus along with title to the land of Palestine. However, Ptolemy took control of Palestine, and his successors retained it for over a hundred years. This was a serious point of contention between the two empires throughout this period of time.

Seleucus was assassinated in 281 B.C. Antiochus I, his son, became ruler and made peace with the Egyptians. He sought throughout his reign to consolidate his rule, but the years were for the most part a time of intense struggle and warfare. At his death in 262 or early 261 B.C., his son Antiochus II became king (261-246 B.C.). During the early years of Antiochus II, conflict continued with Egypt. When peace between the two nations was reached in 253 B.C., Ptolemy offered his daughter to Antiochus as wife with the understanding that he would desert his first wife. The goal was that a son born to this marriage would become the ruler of the Seleucid Empire and cement relations between the two. However, it did not work out in this way, and Antiochus died in 246 B.C., perhaps murdered by his first wife.

The eldest son of Antiochus, Seleucus II, was named king. He ruled until his death in 226 B.C. However, some Syrians, along with Egypt, supported the infant son of the second wife of Antiochus. The Egyptian army could not reach the area quickly enough to defend the child, and Seleucus was able to regain control of the territory ruled by his father, some of which had been lost at the time of his father's death. In 241 B.C. peace was again reached between the Seleucids and Egypt. When Seleucus died as the result of falling from his horse, his son Alexander became king as Seleucus III. He was assassinated in 223 B.C. and was succeeded by his son Antiochus III, known as Antiochus the Great (223-187 B.C.).

With the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, the situation of the Seleucids fell into disarray. From this time on it seems that more than one strong individual was contending for the crown at all times. Lysias had been left with responsibility for the care of the young son of Epiphanes. He assumed that upon the death of the king the son would become king. However, before his death the king had evidently appointed Philip, a close friend with him in the East, to be king. Philip returned to Antioch, the capital in Syria, and this forced Lysias to cut off his efforts to quell the Jewish revolt. In his effort to bring peace, he granted religious freedom to the Jews. Lysias was able to thwart the effort of Philip, and the son, Antiochus V, reigned as king for a brief time (164-162 B.C.).

Demetrius, the young son of Seleucus IV, was a hostage in Rome. His desire to return home at the death of his father was denied. When Antiochus IV died, he managed to escape from Rome and fled to Syria, 162 B.C. He had himself proclaimed as king and had Lysias and Antiochus V put to death. He remained as king until 150 B.C. These years were involved in attempts to put down the Jewish revolt and to consolidate and expand his position in the East.

A strong rival appeared—Alexander Balas. He claimed to be the illegitimate son of Antiochus Epiphanes. In 153 B.C. the Roman senate acknowledged him as king of Syria although the senate was probably aware that his claim was false. The two rivals both made extensive offers to the Jews for their support. Jonathan, the Jewish leader, supported Alexander, who, in 150 B.C., gained victory over Demetrius, who was killed in battle. Alexander reigned until 145 B.C., supported at first by the ruler of Egypt, who gave Alexander his daughter in marriage. When Ptolemy learned that Alexander was plotting to kill him, he turned against Alexander, brought his daughter back, and offered her in marriage to the young son of Demetrius. Defeated in battle by Ptolemy, Alexander fled to Arabia, where he was killed. The young son of Demetrius, Demetrius II, was made king (reigning twice, 145-139 and 129-125 B.C.).

Needing their support, Demetrius granted political freedom to the Jews during the early years of his reign. One of his generals, Tryphon, supported Alexander Balas' young son, who claimed the throne as Antiochus VI (145-142 B.C.). Tryphon had Antiochus murdered and had himself proclaimed as king (142-139 B.C.). Demetrius II was taken prisoner in a campaign against the Parthians, and his brother Antiochus VII (139-128 B.C.) became king. He defeated Tryphon, who then committed suicide. Antiochus made one last effort to interfere in the life of the Jews. In 133 B.C. he invaded Judea and began a siege of Jerusalem that lasted for almost a year. Finally, peace was made between him and John Hyrcanus, guaranteeing the independence of the Jews from Syrian intervention. Antiochus made a campaign against the Parthians where he died.

With the death of Antiochus VII, the Seleucids ceased to be a major factor in the political life of the eastern Mediterranean world. Although Demetrius was released by the Parthians and resumed his role as king, neither he nor any other person was able to gain firm control of the empire. The following years were filled with internal conflict that drained the resources of the empire and saw at least 10 persons claim rule in less than 50 years. In 83 B.C. the king of Armenia took possession of Syria, and the rule of the Seleucids came to an end. See Intertestamental History and Literature. Clayton Harrop

SELF-CONTROL Modern translations' term for several Greek words indicating a sober, temperate, calm, and dispassionate approach to life, having mastered personal desires and passions. Biblical admonitions expect God's people to exercise self-control (Prov. 25:28; 1 Cor. 7:5; 1 Thess. 5:6; 1 Tim. 3:2; 2 Tim. 3:3; Gal. 5:23; 2 Tim. 1:7; Titus 1:8; 2 Pet. 1:6). Freedom in Christ does not give believers liberty to cast off all moral restraint as some members in Galatia and other churches apparently believed. Nor does it call for a withdrawal from life and its temptations. It calls for a self-disciplined life following Christ's example of being in the world but not of the world. See Ethics; Freedom.

SELF-ESTEEM Respect for and confident acceptance of oneself as a person created by and useful to God. Self-esteem must be based on an understanding that people are created by God to be highly exalted (Ps. 8:3-8; cp. Gen. 1:26-27) yet are miserably fallen sinners (Rom. 3:23; 7:24).

Every person, no matter how sinful, is of inestimable value to God (Luke 15:11-32; 1 Cor. 6:20) and supremely loved by Him (1 John 4:10; cp. Rom. 8:35-39). Christians possess a new nature that allows them to be self-confident, but only through Christ (1 Cor. 9:24; 2 Cor. 3:5; 10:7; Phil. 3:4-7; 4:13). Both self-elation and selfabasement ignore the work of Christ in a believer (2 Cor. 12:7-10; Col. 2:18,23). Paul taught that Christians should strive for a balanced selfesteem that is able to minister to the needs of others (Rom. 12:3; 2 Cor. 10:7-13; Gal. 6:1-3; Phil. 2:3).

SELF-WILLED To do something arbitrarily without divine permission; to act on one's own decision rather than considering the needs of others and the purpose of God. Jacob rebuked Simeon and Levi for wanton, undisciplined actions (Gen. 49:6). Titus 1:7 teaches that a bishop cannot be self-willed, that is, stubborn and arrogant. Such activity is presumptuous and marks the fleshly person (2 Pet. 2:10).

SEM (Sēm) KJV spelling of Shem, following the Greek (Luke 3:36).

SEMACHIAH (Sēm á kī' ah) or SEMAKIAH (NIV) Personal name meaning "Yahweh supports." Levitical gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:7), described as a valiant man or warrior, possibly a title of honor for public service.

SEMEI (Sē' mə ī) or SEMEIN (Sē' mə īn) Greek form of Hebrew personal name, Shimei, among Jesus' ancestors (Luke 3:26).

SEMEN See Discharge.

SEMITE (Sēm' īt) A person who claims descent from Noah's son Shem (Gen. 5:32; 10:21-31) or, more precisely as a linguistic term, those people speaking one of the Semitic languages. The racial list of Genesis and the list of linguists do not always include the same people groups.

Genesis 10:21-31 lists five sons and 21 descendants/people derived from Shem. These people spread geographically from Lydia to Syria, to Assyria, to Persia. Armenia formed the northern boundary while the Red Sea and Persian Gulf formed the southern boundary. The Elamites, Assyrians, Lydians, Arameans, and numerous Arab tribes are said to have been descendants of Shem.

The place of origin for the Semites is difficult to determine. The Fertile Crescent contains evidence of Semitic influence at the dawn of civilization. One unproven theory is that they migrated from northern Arabia in waves of nomadic movements into the Fertile Crescent.

Three major divisions exist in the Semitic family of languages. East Semitic would include Akkadian used in ancient Babylon and Assyria. Northwest Semitic involves Hebrew, Aramaic, Syrian, Phoenician, Samaritan, Palmyrene, Nabatean, Canaanite, and Moabite. South Semitic includes Arabic, Sabean, Minean, and Ethiopic. Approximately 70 distinct forms of Semitic languages are known. Some have large libraries of literature while others remain entirely unwritten or only small collections of literature exist. SENTRY Government official with responsibility for guarding a prison (Acts 5:23; 12:6) or possibly a captain over such a guard (Jer. 37:13).

SEORIM (Sə ō' rīm) Personal name, perhaps meaning “the shaggy-haired.” Head of fourth division of priests appointed under David (1 Chron.24:8).

SEPARATION Term used for period when a person is ritually unclean during menstruation (Lev. 12:2,5; 15:20,25-26) or for time of refraining from certain activities because of a vow (Num. 6). KJV term for water used to make one ritually pure or clean (Num. 19).

SEPHAR (Sē' phār) Place-name, perhaps meaning “numbering, census.” Eastern border of sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:30). The site is apparently in southern Arabia, perhaps the coastal town of Tsaphar in Oman or Itsphar south of Hadramaut.

SEPHARAD (Sēph' á rād) Place-name of uncertain meaning. Place where Jerusalem's exiles lived. Obadiah promised them new possessions in the Negev (v. 20). The location is disputed: possibly a country south of Lake Urmia and north and west of Media, beyond the Babylonian Empire, but more likely the capital city of the Persian satrapy of Sepharad or Sardis in Lydia near the Aegean Sea. Early Syriac (Peshitta) and Aramaic (Targum) evidence points to Spain, but this is improbable.

SEPHARVAIM (Sēph' ár vā' ím) Racial name of foreign origin. Peoples the Assyrians conquered and resettled in Israel to replace the Israelites they deported in 722 B.C. (2 Kings 17:24). The name may represent the two Sippars on the Euphrates River or Shabarain in Syria. It may be the same as Sibraim in Syria (Ezek. 47:16), a border in Ezekiel's promised restoration of Israel. Despite Assyria's claims, Sepharvaim's gods could not compare with Yahweh, the God of Israel (2 Kings 19:12-13; cp. 17:31).

SEPHARVITES (Sēph' ár vīts) Citizens of Sepharvaim (2 Kings 17:31).

SEPPHORIS Town in Galilee that served as the Roman capital of the region during Jesus' time. Four miles from Nazareth, Jesus probably knew it well and perhaps Jesus plied His trade as a carpenter there. Excavation has revealed Sepphoris to be a cosmopolitan Roman city with beautiful buildings, temples, an amphitheater, and other marks of sophistication. The character of Sepphoris contradicts the image of Galilee as a rural, unsophisticated environment and the image of Jesus as unsophisticated and ill at ease in an urban setting like Jerusalem. Charles W. Draper

SEPTUAGINT (Sēp tū' á gīnt) Title meaning “the 70.” Oldest Greek translation of the Hebrew OT It also contains several apocryphal books. Most NT quotations of the OT are from the Septuagint. See Apocrypha; Bible Texts and Versions.

SEPULCHRE (Sē' pəl kər) Tomb or grave (Gen. 23:6). It translates a Hebrew word that refers to a niche hewn out of a rock in which bodies were placed. In ancient Palestine sepulchres usually were carved out of the walls in existing caves. Families were buried together on the carved slabs of stone. After a body had decayed to the bones, the remains were placed in a hole farther back in the cave so that the next body could be placed in the sepulchre (tomb, HCSB). Jesus was buried in such a cave (Mark 15:46). See Burial.

SERAH (Sē' rah) Personal name meaning “progress, develop, overflow” or “splendor, pride.” Daughter of Asher (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:46, where KJV reads Sarah).

Inside the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, traditional site of Jesus' burial (tomb of Joseph of Arimathea).

SERAIAH (Sə ri' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah has proved Himself ruler.”

1. David's royal “scribe” and thus probably functioning as a modern secretary of state (2 Sam. 8:17). The Hebrew tradition has various spellings of the name: Sheva, Sheya (2 Sam. 20:25); Shisha (1 Kings 4:3) if this is not a Hebraic spelling of the Egyptian word for “scribe”; Shavsha (1 Chron. 18:16). 2. Chief priest taken into Babylonian exile in 587 B.C. (2 Kings 25:18; 1 Chron. 16:14; Jer. 52:24). 3. “Quiet prince” (KJV), “quartermaster” (REB, NASB, NRSV) that Zedekiah (597-586 B.C.) sent to Babylon with instructions from himself and from Jeremiah (Jer. 51:59-64). 4. Priest and father of Ezra (Ezra 7:1). 5. Army officer who reported to Gedaliah when he was named governor immediately after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (2 Kings 25:23; cp. Jer. 40:8). He may have been involved in rebellion Ishmael led. 6. Leader in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:13). 7. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:35). 8. Leader of returning exiles under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2); apparently the same as Azariah (Neh. 7:7). 9. Priestly family (Neh. 10:2; 12:12).

SERAPHIM (Sēr' á phīm) Literally, “the burning ones,” seraphim (a plural word) were winged serpents whose images decorated many of the thrones of the Egyptian pharaohs. In some cases, they wore the crowns of the Egyptian kingdoms and were thought to act as guardians over the king. Isaiah envisioned the seraphim as agents of God who prepared him to proclaim the Lord's message to Judah (Isa. 6:2). See Angels.

SERAPIS (Sə rā' pəs) Also known as Sarapis, this Egyptian-Greek sun deity was worshiped first at Memphis along with the bull-god, Apis. Serapis was introduced to Egypt by the Greeks and was worshiped originally as a god of the underworld. The temple to him at Alexandria was the largest and best known among several. Serapis came to be revered also as a god of healing and fertility, and his worship spread throughout the Roman Empire via the trade routes.

SERED (Sē' rēd) Personal name meaning “baggage master.” Clan leader in tribe of Zebulun (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26).

SEREDITE (Sē' rə dīt) Member of clan of Sered in modern translations (Num. 26:26).

SERGIUS PAULUS (Sēr' gī us Pō' lūs) Personal name of proconsul of Cyprus when Paul visited the capital of Paphos on his first missionary journey (Acts 13:6-12). Sergius Paulus was under the influence of a sorcerer named Barjesus when Paul and Barnabas arrived. Sergius Paulus asked to hear the gospel that the two missionaries were preaching, but the sorcerer tried to keep him from the appointment. Paul spoke directly to the sorcerer, who became blinded temporarily, and Sergius Paulus, seeing what had happened, was converted to Christ.

The bronze bust of the Egyptian-Greek god Serapis dates from the first century A.D. (See page 1473.)

SERJEANT KJV term for Roman “lictor,” a constable or policeman (Acts 16:35). See Prison, Prisoners.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT Matthew 5-7 is commonly known as the Sermon on the Mount, the first of five major discourses by Jesus in the Gospel of Matthew. An astute exposition of the law and how it meshes with the new covenant in Christ, the sermon also offers a stinging indictment of Pharisaic legalism and cold, formal selfrighteousness. Jesus stresses His demands for disciples and issues a call to demonstrate true righteousness, a righteousness of heart that the law cannot produce.

Interpretations Few passages of Scripture have such divergent interpretations. The sermon contains such lofty ethics and uncompromising demands that scholars have always differed greatly on its intent and application. No one can perfectly meet the strict demands of the sermon, and the disparity between expectations and behavior creates a perplexing problem. The following are some of the major approaches to the passage.

One common interpretation is the “interim ethic” view, that Jesus advocated such radical ethics in the sermon because He expected the consummated kingdom to begin immediately. The breaking in of that kingdom was so imminent that the disciples were to practice these rigid requirements for the brief period of time until it arrived. Because, however, the consummated kingdom did not arrive, the demands of the “interim” sermon must be dismissed. This view is not widely held.

Another approach, that of classic liberalism, was popular at the turn of the 1900s, and dismissed the need for personal redemption through the atoning work of Christ. Adherents said the sermon is essentially a roadmap to building a better, more progressive, society. Optimistic faith in the inherent goodness of mankind led them to replace the gospel with a secular philosophy. Major world conflicts and the continual unraveling of society have shown them to be wrong.

Another interpretation, one with more merit than the previous two, is the view of Lutheran orthodoxy. It holds that the sermon is an impossibly high ethic designed to show us the hopelessness of achieving on our own the righteousness that God demands. The sermon is really evangelistic, showing the need to turn to God for righteousness. The weakness is that it applies systematic theology to the sermon rather than interpreting it.

The “existential” approach views the sermon as a call to personal decision rather than as concrete ethical principles. The purpose of the sermon is to orient life to a heavenly perspective. These existentialists do not emphasize a literal, coming kingdom. Rather, the present life is compared with the ideal, “heavenly” conduct of what ought to be. The view fosters an attitude of self-reflection and openness to make the future better. This view has glaring weaknesses.

Another interpretation, most popular in North America, is the dispensational approach. In its classic form dispensationalism rigidly distinguished the period of law from the period of grace. It was the epitome of a “discontinuity” view of Scripture—that is, that God dealt with people differently during different periods. The extreme form of this system even held that people were saved by a different method in the OT than in the NT. It should be noted that dispensationalism has radically altered in recent years and reflects a more moderate theology. Dispensationalism still holds that when Jesus preached the sermon He was offering a millennial kingdom to the Jews. He offered to usher it in immediately after His death if the nation embraced Him. The Jews did not receive Him as their Messiah and King, and so the offer is temporarily rescinded. Rather than inaugurating the kingdom, Jesus resorted to “Plan B,” as it were, and ushered in the present age of grace. The sermon, in this model, has no immediate relevance for the “church age” but is reserved for the still future millennial kingdom when Christ returns. Many conservative Christians hold this view, but it is not the best interpretation.

Though several of the approaches above contain truth, it seems best to interpret the sermon in the straightforward way in which Jesus preached it. “Straightforward” does not necessarily mean “literal.” Some passages present real problems if taken literally rather than recognizing figurative language. Reading in a straightforward manner means recognizing the context and Jesus' intent. This discourse was to people who followed Him right then, people living in a sinful world waiting for the King to return and establish the kingdom. The sermon is the standard toward which disciples should strive. It describes the kind of life we should live because He owns us and we want to be like Him. He wants His followers to live a new kind of life, even though we will never fully attain this standard until He comes again.

Content The sermon opens with the beatitudes (Matt. 5:3-12) and then moves to describe the witness Christ's disciples are to bear in the world (5:13-16). Jesus' relationship to and interpretation of the law follows (5:17-48); then He enumerated some specific acts of righteousness-including the model prayer (6:1-18). The heart attitudes Jesus requires of His disciples comes next (6:19-7:12), and the sermon closes with a challenge to live as true disciples (7:13-27).

The introduction to the sermon (5:1-2) reveals that Jesus preached to a “mixed” congregation. Some were on the fringe, some were leaning toward Jesus, and others were committed to following Him. The sermon was addressed directly and primarily to His disciples, but the rest of the crowd heard it with much interest. They marveled at His teaching because, unlike their teachers of the law, He spoke with great authority (Matt. 7:28-29). See Beatitudes; Ethics; Jesus, Life and Ministry.

SERUG (Sê' rūg) Personal name and placename, perhaps meaning “offshoot, descendant.” Ancestor of Abraham (Gen. 11:20), and thus of Jesus (Luke 3:35), and city 20 miles northwest of Harran mentioned in Assyrian texts.

SERVANT OF THE LORD Title Jesus took up from the OT, especially Isa. 40-55. The term “the servant of the Lord” (“My servant” or “His servant” where the pronouns refer to God) is applied to many leaders of God's people: to Moses over 30 times, to David over 70 times, and to Israel as a nation a number of times.

In Isaiah the idea is introduced almost incidentally. Chapter 41 pictures a great crisis, as a powerful army moves westward from Persia, conquering many nations and filling all with terror. In contrast, God told Israel not to fear. “But you, Israel, My servant, Jacob whom I have chosen, descendant of Abraham My friend,...'You are My servant, I have chosen you and not rejected you” (Isa. 41:8-9b NASB). Israel had to be preserved because it was God's instrument to perform a task of worldwide importance.

Isaiah 42 gives a remarkable picture of the ideal Servant of the Lord and the great work that God intends Him to accomplish. He is to “bring forth judgment to the nations” (v. 1), “until He has established judgment in the earth,” and the “coastlands will wait expectantly for His law” (v. 4). The tasks He is destined to accomplish are almost beyond belief. He is to bring God's justice to all the nations (vv. 1,4).

Almost more remarkable than the immensity of the task that the Servant must perform is the description of the way He is to do it. He will move forward with absolute confidence, but nothing indicates strenuous effort will be needed. He will have such an understanding of His overwhelming power that He can be absolutely gentle as He does His work (vv. 2-4) even toward those whose efforts have failed. This first part of chapter 42 pictures the ideal Servant—the goal for which Israel was to be preserved.

As an Israelite read this prediction, he would think: “How can Israel even think of performing this great task that God's Servant must do?” Soon the Lord Himself called attention to the inability of the natural Israelite to fulfill the picture of the ideal Servant. In verse 19 He says, “Who is blind but My servant, or so deaf as My messenger whom I send?” Israel had a responsibility to fulfill this ideal, but to do so was far beyond its power. Still, the Lord says: “You are My witnesses, and My servant whom I have chosen” (43:10; cp. 44:1-2,21).

Israel had responsibility to do the work of the Servant. Yet not all Israel could be meant, for some were blasphemers and idolaters. Could part of Israel be the real Servant? Or might it really point to One who must come out of Israel—One who could represent Israel in accomplishing the task? Matthew 12:17-21 quotes Isa. 42:1-4 as fulfilled in Jesus Christ.

Chapter 49 presents the work of the Servant in more detail. The Servant tells the “islands” and the “peoples from afar” that God called Him before His birth, even mentioning His name: Israel (Isa. 49:3). Verse 4 describes the godly in Israel who know what God wants but feel their own inadequacy and provides assurance that the work belongs to God, and He will bring it to pass. Verses 5 and 6 distinguish between the One who will fulfill the work of the Servant and the nation of Israel, to which this One belongs and which He represents. Not only is He to bring judgment to all the world—He is “to bring Jacob back to Him” (v. 5) and “to restore the preserved ones of Israel” (v. 6). He is to be “a light of the nations” so “that My salvation may reach to the end of the earth” (v. 6). In 50:4-10 we hear of the sufferings to which He will voluntarily submit.

All this leads up to the triumphal picture in Isa. 52:13-53:12, showing the sufferings of the Servant (52:14; 53:2-5,7-8,10), their vicarious and redemptive nature (52:15; 53:4-6,8,10-12; cp. 1 Pet. 1:1-2). Chapter 54 shows the outreach of the Servant's work, and chapter 55 gives the glorious call to receive the salvation won by the Servant's redemptive work, “without money and without cost” (v. 1).

After chapter 53 Isaiah never again used “servant” in the singular; rather he spoke of the blessings that the followers of the Servant will receive, calling them “the servants of the LORD” (54:17); “His servants” (56:6; 65:15; 66:14); and “My servants” (65:8-9,13-14).

The NT pictures Jesus as the Suffering Servant fulfilling the glorious descriptions of Isaiah. In refusing to let disciples reveal His true identity, Jesus was the pleasing Servant who did not strive or cry out (Matt. 12:14-21). In the resurrection and ascension, God glorified Jesus the Servant (Acts 3:13; cp. v. 26 where the same Greek word for “servant” appears though KJV translates “Son.”). Gentile and Jewish leaders conspired to make Jesus, “Your holy Servant,” suffer as God “had predestined to take place” (Acts 4:27-28 HCSB). This led the early church to pray that as God's servants they would speak with boldness and perform miracles through the name of “Your holy Servant Jesus” (Acts 4:29-30). Jesus saw His mission as that of the Servant (Luke 4:18-19; cp. 22:37) and symbolized it for His disciples, calling on them to serve one another and the world (John 13:4-17). SERVICE Work done for other people or for God and the worship of God. Jacob worked for Laban seven years for each of his wives (Gen. 29:15-30). Service could be slave labor (Exod. 5:11; Lev. 25:39; 1 Kings 12:4; Isa. 14:3; cp. Lam. 1:3), farm work (1 Chron. 27:26), or daily labor on the job (Ps. 104:23). It could be service of earthly kingdoms (2 Chron. 12:8; cp. 1 Chron. 26:30), of God's place of worship (Exod. 30:16; cp. Num. 4:47; 1 Chron. 23:24), of God's ministers (Ezra 8:20), and of God (Josh. 22:27). Not only people do service; God also does service (Isa. 28:21). Even righteousness has a service (Isa. 32:17).

Service at its best is worship. This involves the service of temple vessels (1 Chron. 9:28), of worship actions (2 Chron. 35:10; cp. Exod. 12:25-26), of bringing offerings (Josh. 22:27), of priestly work (Num. 8:11). Interestingly, the OT never ascribes service to other gods.

The NT similarly speaks of forced service (Matt. 27:32), sacrificial living (Rom. 12:1; Phil. 2:17 with a play on words also indicating an offering), slave labor done for Christ's sake (Eph. 6:7; Col. 3:22; cp. Phil. 2:30), worship (Rom. 9:4; Heb. 12:28), offerings (Rom. 15:31; 2 Cor. 9:12), and personal ministry (Rom. 12:7; 1 Tim. 1:12; 2 Tim. 4:11). Hebrews 1:14 talks of the ministry of angels. Being in an army is also service (2 Tim. 2:4), and those who persecute Christ's followers think they do service for God (John 16:2).

SERVITUDE Hard labor done by servants or conscripted workers (Gen. 47:21; 2 Chron. 10:4; Neh. 5:18; Jer. 28:14; Lam. 1:3). The same Hebrew term is also translated “service.”

SETH (Sĕth) Personal name meaning “He set or appointed” or “replacement.” Third son of Adam and Eve, born after Cain murdered Abel (Gen. 4:25; 5:3). He was an ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:38).

SETHUR (Sĕ' thŭr) Personal name meaning “hidden.” Spy representing tribe of Asher in scouting out the promised land (Num. 13:13).

SEVEN CHURCHES OF ASIA Original recipients of book of Revelation (Rev. 1:4). See Asia Minor, Cities of.

SEVEN WORDS FROM THE CROSS Statements that Jesus made during six agonizing hours of His crucifixion. Being made during the central act of redemption gives these words great weight and significance. No single Gospel records all seven sayings but fit the remarks into a commonly accepted order.

Jesus' first three remarks were made between 9:00 a.m. and noon (Mark 15:25). First, He asked forgiveness for those who crucified Him (Luke 23:34). On the cross Jesus made forgiveness possible not only for those involved in His crucifixion, but also for all who would put their trust in Him. Second, Jesus promised the penitent thief he would meet the Lord in paradise that very day (Luke 23:43), giving us insight into what happens following believers' deaths. Third, Jesus made provision for the care of His mother by John (John 19:26-27).

The Church of St. John in Pergamum, a city where one of the seven churches of Asia was located.

Jesus' last four statements were spoken between noon and 3:00 p.m., the final hours before His death (Matt. 27:45; Mark 15:33; Luke 23:44). His fourth statement was a cry of isolation, quoting Ps. 22:1 in Aramaic (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34). This statement arose not so much from His own physical pain, but the anguish of solitarily taking upon Himself the sin of the world. His physical agony is expressed in the fifth statement, when Jesus acknowledged His thirst (John 19:28). After being given a sour drink, Jesus made His sixth statement, "It is finished" (John 19:30), a cry of victory, not defeat. Jesus was not finished, but redemption was complete. In

His final words Jesus quoted Ps. 31:5 as He committed His spirit to God (Luke 23:46). See Crucifixion. Steve W. Lemke

SEVEN, SEVENTH Number of completeness. See Number Systems and Number Symbolism.

SEVENTY WEEKS Time spoken of in Dan. 9:24-27, usually understood as 70 weeks of years or 490 years. The passage groups the weeks in three parts: seven weeks (49 years), 62 weeks (434 years), and one week (seven years). The 49 years are associated with rebuilding Jerusalem in “times of trouble” (v. 25 HCSB). The 434 years relate to the intervening time before a cutting off of the Anointed One (v. 26). The seven years are connected with the period of a covenant between a ruler and Jerusalem, which is violated in the middle of the seven years (v. 27).

The significance of the 70 weeks is variously understood. A historical approach relates these years to the period of history between the fall of Jerusalem and the restoration of the temple in 164 B.C. following the atrocities of Antiochus Epiphanes. See Intertestamental History and Literature.

A prophetic approach sees the reference to reach to the birth of Christ, His subsequent crucifixion (the cutting off of the Anointed One), and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70. At that time sacrifices under the old covenant ceased. The same dating without reference to Jesus has been the usual Jewish understanding since Josephus. They focus on the destruction of the temple.

The dispensational approach makes the 70 weeks a prophetic framework for end time events, rather than a prophecy of what took place in the work of Christ at His first coming. The 69th week is seen as completed at Christ's death, while the 70th week is yet to be fulfilled at a future Great Tribulation period. The interval between the two is seen as a parenthesis in the prophetic pattern that contains the present church age, a period said not to be revealed in OT prophecy. See Dispensation; Eschatology; Millennium, Tribulation. Jerry W. Batson

SEVENTY YEARS Prophetic and apocalyptic figure pointing to time of Israel's exile in Babylon and to the end of tribulation in Daniel's vision. Seventy years represented an even number of the normal human life span (Ps. 90:10). Isaiah 23:15 and the Babylonian Black Stone of Esarhaddon may indicate that 70 years was an expected time of punishment and desolation for a defeated city. Jeremiah predicted that Judah would serve Babylon 70 years (Jer. 25:11; cp. 29:10). Second Chronicles 36:21 saw the completion of the 70 years in the coming of Cyrus (538 B.C.). This apparently sees the years as from the first deporting of Judeans into Babylon (about 605 B.C.) until Cyrus came. Zechariah seems to have seen the 70 years ending in his own day with the rebuilding of the temple (Zech. 1:12). This would span the period from the destruction of the temple (586 B.C.) to the dedication in 516 B.C. Some interpreters see in the Chronicler's references to Sabbaths an indication of a second meaning for 70 years, that is, 70 Sabbatical Years (Lev. 25:1-7; 26:34-35) or 490 years. By this reckoning Israel had not kept the Sabbatical Year commandment since the period of the Judges, so God gave the land 70 consecutive Sabbatical Years during the exile. Daniel meditated on Jeremiah's prophecy (Dan. 9:2) and learned that 70 weeks of years were intended (v. 24). See Sabbatical Year; Seventy Weeks.

SEX, BIBLICAL TEACHING ON The Bible addresses human sexuality from a holistic perspective of God's intention and design. In contrast to both pagan sex rituals and modern obsession with sex, the Bible places sex within the total context of human nature, happiness, and holiness.

Gender and Relation God created human beings as male and female, both in His own image (Gen. 1:27). Thus, gender is not a mere biological accident or social construction. The contrast and complementarity between the man and the woman reveal that gender is part of the goodness of God's creation. Modern efforts to redefine or redesign gender are directly contrary to the Bible's affirmation of maleness and femaleness as proper distinctions. This pattern of distinction is affirmed and enforced by liturgical orders and restrictions on dress, hair length, etc. Any effort to confuse or deny gender differences is expressly forbidden and opposed by Scripture, especially as seen in OT legal codes.

Throughout the Bible a complementary pattern of relation between man and woman, particularly within the institution of marriage, is presented as the divine intention. Both are equal in dignity and status, but a pattern of male leadership in the home and in the church is enforced by both descriptive and prescriptive passages (1 Tim. 2:8-3:7; 1 Cor. 11:2-16; 14:34-38).

Sex as Gift and Responsibility The Bible places sex and sexual activity within the larger context of holiness and faithfulness. In this regard, the Bible presents an honest and often detailed explanation of God's design for sex and its place in human life and happiness.

First, the biblical writers affirm the goodness of sexuality as God's gift. The Song of Songs is an extended love poem with explicit erotic imagery and language. Sex is affirmed as a source of pleasure and shared intimacy between husband and wife.

Second, the gift of sexual activity is consistently located only within the context of the marital covenant. Joined to each other within this monogamous covenant, the man and the woman may be naked and not ashamed (Gen. 2:25). The consistent witness of the biblical writers is that sexual relations are limited to this covenant relationship. All forms of extramarital sexual activity are condemned, including premarital sex (fornication) and adultery (Exod. 20:14; Deut. 22:22; 1 Cor. 6:9-10). At the same time, the husband and wife are ordered to fulfill their marital duties to each other and not to refrain from sexual union (1 Cor. 7:2-5).

Third, though pleasure is one of the goods biblically associated with sexual union (Prov. 5:15-19), the Bible consistently links procreation with the marital act (Ps. 128:3). Sexual pleasure and procreation are linked in a healthy and natural approach that avoids the denial of either. Modern contraceptive technologies were unknown in the Bible, and the contemporary "contraceptive mentality" that champions sexual pleasure completely severed from procreation is foreign to the biblical worldview.

Fourth, the biblical writers address human sexuality honestly. Paul acknowledged the reality of sexual passions (1 Cor. 7:9) and admonished those who have not been given the gift of celibacy to marry, rather than to allow their passions to turn into sinful lust.

The reality of sexual brokenness is also addressed. The pain and shame of adultery, for example, are demonstrated in the account of David's sin with Bathsheba. Paul's horror in learning of sexual sin among the Corinthians occasioned some of his clearest teachings on sexuality and holiness.

Sex, Holiness, and Happiness The biblical writers affirm sexuality as a part of our embodied existence. As human beings we are sexual creatures, and as sexual creatures we are called to honor God with our bodies (1 Cor. 6:15-20). Within the context of the marital covenant, the husband and wife are free to express love for each other, experience pleasure, and join in the procreative act of sexual union. This is pleasing to God and is not to be a source of shame.

The biblical writers link holiness to happiness. True human happiness comes in the fulfillment of sexual holiness. The attempt to enjoy sexual happiness without holiness is the root of sexual deviance.

Sexual Deviance Just as the biblical writers present marital sex as holy and natural, all other forms of sexual activity are presented as condemned and sinful. In addition to adultery and fornication, the Bible expressly forbids homosexuality, bestiality, incest, prostitution, rape, pederasty, and all other forms of sexual deviance (Exod. 22:16-17,19; Lev. 18:6-18, 22-23; Prov. 7:1-27; Rom. 1:26-27; 1 Cor. 5:1-13).

The Bible presents sexual deviance as intentional rejection of God's authority as Creator and Lord (Rom. 1:18-25). As Paul warns, those who practice such sins will not inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6:9-10). Both OT and NT writers warn that the people of God are to remain untainted and uncorrupted by such sins. Interestingly, the sexual practices of the various pagan nations described in the OT and the sexual mores of the Roman Empire of the first century are remarkably like the obsessions of our own day.

Sexuality is one of God's good gifts, and the source of much human happiness. At the same time, once expressed outside its intended context of marital fidelity, it can become one of the most destructive forces in human existence.

Marital sexual love is expressed in the intimacy of sexual union and the marital act of conjugal union is the source of both pleasure and procreation. Both are goods of the marital act and relationship that are to be welcomed and accepted with thankfulness. The biblical writers instruct that true sexual happiness is inextricably linked to sexual holiness as believers live their lives before God. R. Albert Mohler, Jr.

SHAALABBIN (Shā á lāb' bīn) Place-name meaning “place of foxes.” Town in tribal territory of Dan (Josh. 19:42); apparently the same as Shaalbim.

SHAALBIM (Shā āl' bīm) Place-name meaning “place of foxes.” Spelled and interpreted differently in different texts and early Greek versions. Amorite stronghold eventually controlled by Manasseh and Ephraim (Judg. 1:35). Part of Solomon's second district for supplying provisions for the royal household (1 Kings 4:9). Its location is probably modern Selbit seven miles southeast of Lydda and three miles northwest of Ajalon. David's military hero Eliahba came from Shaalbim (2 Sam. 23:32). See Shaalabbin.

SHAALBON (Shā āl' bōn) RSV, NRSV, TEV, REB rendering of Shaalbonite, representing an alternative Hebrew spelling of Shaalbim.

SHAALBONITE (Shā āl' bō nit) See Shaalbon.

SHAALIM (Shā á līm) Place-name, perhaps meaning “caves, cavities.” Place where Saul sought his father's lost donkeys (1 Sam. 9:4). The place is sometimes equated with Shaalbim or the land of Shual.

SHAAPH (Shā āph) Clan name meaning “balsam.” Apparently two persons in Caleb's line, though some interpreters identify the two (1 Chron. 2:47,49).

See Madmannah.

SHAARAIM (Shā á rá´ ím) Place-name meaning “double doors.” 1. City in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:36). Place where David's soldiers pursued Philistine army (1 Sam. 17:52). Some would locate it at Khirbet esh-Sharia a mile northeast of Azekah. 2. Town where tribe of Simeon lived (1 Chron. 4:31), but the parallel texts read Shilhim (Josh. 15:32) and Sharuhén (Josh. 19:6). Many scholars think Sharuhén is meant in Chronicles.

SHAASHGAZ (Shā ásh´ gāz) Hebrew transliteration of Persian name of uncertain meaning. Eunuch in charge of Xerxes's harem of which Esther became a member before she was chosen queen (Esther 2:14).

SHABBETHAI (Shāb´ bə thī) Personal name meaning “belonging to the Sabbath.” Levite who explained the law to the people as Ezra read it (Neh. 8:7). He or a namesake opposed Ezra's plan of divorce for foreign wives (Ezra 10:15). He was in charge of “external business of the house of God” (Neh. 11:16 REB), either maintaining outward appearance of the temple or collecting the tithes.

SHACHIA (Shá kí´ á) Personal name meaning “Yahweh fenced in or protected.” Clan leader in tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:10), following different manuscripts than modern translations which read Sachia. Many manuscripts and early versions read “Shabia.”

SHACKLES See Bond; Fetter.

SHADDAI (Shá´ dī) Transliteration of Hebrew name for God, often translated “Almighty” following the earliest Greek translation. See Almighty; God of the Fathers; Names of God.

SHADES See Sheol; Rephaim.

SHADOW Dark image of an object created when the object interrupts rays of light. The Bible uses the term in both literal and figurative senses.

Old Testament The Hebrew tsel speaks of “shadow” as protection and as transitory, shortlived, and changing. The intensive heat, particularly in the summer, made shade and shadows important in Palestine. Travelers sought rest under a tree (Gen. 18:4; cp. Job 40:22) or in a house (Gen. 19:8). Especially at midday when shade virtually vanished, people looked for a shadow (Isa. 16:3; cp. Gen. 21:15; Jon. 4; Job 7:2). In the afternoon shadows lengthen (Jer. 6:4; cp. Neh. 13:19 NIV). In the evening cool, shadows disappear (Song 2:17). In the desert wilderness the traveler found little hope for shade but looked for shade or shadow from hills (Judg. 9:36), large rocks (Isa. 32:2), a cave (Exod. 33: 22; 1 Kings 19:9), or a cloud (Isa. 25:5).

Powerful people offer the shadow of protection and security (Song 2:3). So does a king (Lam. 4:20; Ezek. 31:6). Still, Israel knew the false claims of kings to provide such protection (Judg. 9:15; cp. Isa. 30:2; Ezek. 31). Biblical writers looked to the Messiah for needed shade or shadow (Isa. 32:2; Ezek. 17:23). God was the ultimate shadow of protection for His people (Pss. 36:7; 91:1; 121:5; Isa. 25:4; 49:2; 51:16).

Human life itself is only a brief shadow (Job 8:9; 14:2; Pss. 102:11; 144:4; Eccles. 6:12; 8:13).

New Testament The Greek skia can refer to a literal shadow (Mark 4:32; Acts 5:15). More often it refers to death or to an indication of something to come, a foreshadowing. References to death come from OT prophecy—Matt. 4:16 and Luke 1:79, picking up Isa. 9:2. Dietary laws and religious festivals were only a shadow preparing Israel for the reality made known in Christ (Col. 2:17; Heb. 8:5; 10:1). James used a related Greek word to say that God is not a fleeting, changing shadow (1:17) Trent C. Butler

SHADRACH (Shād' rāk) Babylonian name meaning “circuit of the sun.” One of Daniel's three friends taken to Babylon during the exile (Dan. 1:6-7). His Hebrew name was Hananiah. The three were cast into a fiery furnace for refusing to worship a graven image set up by King Nebuchadnezzar. The Lord miraculously delivered them, and they were given places of honor in the kingdom (Dan. 3:30). See Abednego; Daniel; Meshach.

SHAGE (Shā gə) or SHAGEE (Shā' gē) Father of one of David's military heroes (1 Chron. 11:34). The parallel text in 2 Sam. 23 has two similar names: verse 11, Shammah the son of Agee; verse 33, Shammah the Hararite. Shage may represent a combination of the two Hebrew words Shammah and Agee.

SHAHAR (Shā' hār) Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning “dawn.” Part of title of Ps. 22, translated by most modern translations. NASB transliterates “Hashshahar,” including the Hebrew definite article. See Aijelesh Shahar.

SHAHARAIM (Shā hā rā' im) Personal name meaning “double dawns.” Benjaminite who divorced his wives and lived in Moab (1 Chron. 8:8).

SHAHAZIMAH (Shā hā zī' mah) Place-name meaning “double peak.” Town or mountain marking tribal boundary of Issachar (Josh. 19:22). Its location is not known. Some have suggested it is a combination of two town names: Shahaz and Yammah.

SHAHAZUMAH (Shā hā zū' mah) Modern translation spelling of Shahazimah following the written Hebrew text rather than the notes of the earliest Hebrew scribes.

SHALEM (Shā' lom) Place-name meaning “peace, safety,” according to KJV translation (Gen. 33:18; cp. NIV text note). Modern translations read “safely.”

SHALIM (Shā' lim) (KJV) See Shaalim.

SHALISHA (Shāl'ī shā) or SHALISHAH Placename meaning “the third.” Territory where Saul sought his father's lost donkeys (1 Sam. 9:4); probably the same as Baal-shalishah. Its location has recently been questioned. See Baal-shalishah.

SHALLECHETH (Shāl' lə kēth) or SHALLEKETH (NIV) Place-name of uncertain meaning, sometimes thought on basis of earliest translations to have resulted from scribe's transposition of first two letters and thus to have read originally “chamber.” Jerusalem gate mentioned only in 1 Chron. 26:16.

SHALLUM (Shāl' lūm) Personal name meaning “replacer” or “the replaced.” 1. King of Israel (752 B.C.). He assassinated Zechariah and was, in turn, assassinated by Menahem a month later (2 Kings 15:10-15). 2. See Jehoahaz 3. 3. Husband of Huldah (2 Kings 22:14). 4. A gatekeeper (1 Chron. 9:17,19,31; cp. Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45). This may be the same as Shelemiah (1 Chron. 26:14) and Meshelemiah (1 Chron. 9:21; 26:1-14), since these names are closely related in Hebrew. 5. A chief priest (1 Chron. 6:13; Ezra 7:2). 6. Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 2:40). 7. Jeremiah's uncle (Jer. 32:7). 8. Temple doorkeeper (Jer. 35:4). 9. Descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:25). 10. Descendant of Naphtali (1 Chron. 7:13). 11. Father of Jehizkiah (2 Chron. 28:12). 12. Porter who agreed to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:24). 13. Israelite with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:42). 14. Supervisor of half of Jerusalem who helped Nehemiah rebuild the walls (Neh. 3:12).

SHALLUN (Shāl' lūn) Personal name, perhaps meaning “peaceful, carefree.” Man who helped Nehemiah by repairing the Fountain Gate (Neh. 3:15). NRSV, NASB, TEV follow some early version evidence and read “Shallum.”

SHALMAI (Shāl' mā ī) Personal name meaning “coat.” Manuscripts have several variant spellings. Servant (Nethanim) in temple (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:48).

SHALMAN (Shāl' mǎn) Personal name meaning “complete, peace.” Mysterious figure in Hos. 10:14, sometimes identified by scholars as an abbreviation of Shalmaneser V of Assyria and sometimes as a ruler of Moab listed by Tiglathpileser III among kings paying him tribute. His name became synonymous with violence and ruthlessness.

SHALMANESER (Shāl má nē' zēr) Personal name meaning “Shalmanu (the god) is the highest ranking one.” 1. Assyrian king who ruled 1274-1245 B.C. Records of his military exploits set a precedent which succeeding kings followed. 2. Shalmaneser III ruled Assyria 858-824 B.C. He fought a group of small kingdoms, including Israel, in the battle of Qarqar in 853 B.C. Despite claiming victory, Shalmaneser proceeded no farther. 3. Shalmaneser V ruled Assyria 726-722 B.C. He completed the attack on Samaria begun by his predecessor, Tiglath-pileser III. In 722 Israel fell to Shalmaneser (2 Kings 17:6), thus ending the Northern Kingdom forever. See Assyria; Israel, Land of.

SHAMA (Shā´mā) Personal name meaning “he has heard.” Military hero under David (1 Chron. 11:44).

SHAMARIAH (Shām á rī´ ah) KJV spelling of Shemariah (2 Chron. 11:19).

SHAME AND HONOR Honor and shame were values that shaped everyday life in biblical times. Honor, the primary measure of social status, was based upon ascribed honor and acquired honor. Inherited or ascribed honor was social standing due to being part of a social unit, principally the family. Those born to rulers and leaders were held in high esteem due to family honor. Jewish preoccupation with genealogies ensured inherited honor was secure. Matthew (Matt. 1:1-17) and Luke (Luke 3:23-38) give genealogies for Jesus that highlight the high status claimed for Him. In Matthew, Jesus' pedigree is right both as to Jewishness (direct link to Abraham) and His right to be king of the Jews (descended from David). Luke traces Jesus' lineage through Adam to God, claiming Jesus' right to be Savior of all of mankind.

Replica of the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III (858-824 B.C.). The obelisk was found in 1846 during excavations at Nimrud, an ancient site south of Baghdad, Iraq.

Acquired honor was gained through meritorious deeds or public performance. Family social position provided the honor base from which males launched out with hope of increasing family and personal honor. The public forum provided challenges for gaining or losing honor. A challenge might show the superiority of one person or group over another. A challenge could be ignored if not worthy of response due to social distance between the parties, but a true honor challenge required response. The party recognized as winning gained honor and the other lost honor or social standing. For example, when the Pharisees and Herodians observed Jesus to see if He would heal the man with the withered hand (Mark 3:1-6), an honor challenge took place. If Jesus violated Sabbath law, He would lose honor. If He did not heal the man, He also would lose honor. The trap looked perfect. In response to this unethical challenge, Jesus clarified the Sabbath's intent so He could lawfully heal the man. When the trap failed, they decided to collaborate to destroy Jesus and His rising social status (which came at their expense).

Constant competition in public for honor infected even religion. In both Testaments the tendency to use religion for gaining personal honor based upon a show of piety is denounced. In Matt. 6:1-18 Jesus decried misuse of religious acts (almsgiving, prayer, and fasting) for gaining personal honor.

Shame was not simply the opposite of honor, both positive and negative shame existed. Shame could be handled positively by knowing how to keep matters out of public awareness. For example, a woman could bear shame well by remaining covered in public and by avoiding male dominated arenas. Shame could also designate dishonor or loss of honor. When people claimed an undeserved place of honor, shame resulted (Luke 14:7-11).

Perhaps the most vivid honor/shame text is Phil. 2:5-11. Jesus had unquestionable inherited, ascribed honor; yet He gave it all up and took the most humble of all honor bases (a slave) and died the most shaming of all deaths, crucifixion. However, God gave Him the highest of all honor positions and a name above all names on the honor scale, causing all to bow before Him. The honor code is thus defined by God instead of men.

Women especially bore shame and were expected to do so in a positive manner. Women were also seen as threats to honor. An immoral woman tainted the honor of the entire family, and so women generally were kept away from things tending to dishonorable behavior. The veiling of women related to this concern.

“Shamelessness” described one who refused to abide by honor and shame codes. Such people did not respect social norms nor care about public opinion of their social status. In Luke 18:1-8 the unjust judge is a classic example of a shameless person, one who “didn't fear God or respect man” (HCSB). In the OT the “fool” is a “shameless” person who likewise neither feared God or respected social wisdom and norms.

SHAMED (Shá' mēd) Personal name meaning “destroyed, ruin.” KJV, REB reading following Hebrew of Benjaminite's name (1 Chron. 8:12). Other modern translations read “Shemed.” Many commentators follow early manuscripts and versions in reading “Shemer.”

SHAMER (Shá' mēr) Variant spelling of Shomer or Shemer (1 Chron. 6:46; 7:34).

SHAMGAR (Shām' gār) Hurrian name meaning "Shimig (the god) has given." A mysterious warrior who slew 600 Philistines with an oxgoad, a long metal-tipped pole (Judg. 3:31). His name is Hurrian, but whether that was his lineage is uncertain. In the song of Deborah (Judg. 5), Shamgar (the "son of Anath") is praised for clearing the highways of robbers, making travel once again possible. See Anath; Judges, Book of.

SHAMHUTH (Shām' hūth) Head of fifth division of David's army, serving during the fifth month (1 Chron. 27:8). Many commentators consider the name a scribal combination of Shammah (2 Sam. 23:25) and Shammoth (1 Chron. 11:27).

SHAMIR (Shā' mīr) Personal name and placename meaning "thorn" or "diamond." 1. Levite (1 Chron. 24:24), written Shamur in some manuscripts. 2. Town in hill country of Judah assigned to tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:48). Located either at modern el-Bireh near Khirbet Somera northeast of en-Rimmon or Khirbet es-Sumara about 12 miles west-southwest of Hebron. 3. Home of Tola, the judge from the tribe of Issachar, in Mount Ephraim (Judg. 10:1). Located possibly at Khirbet es-Sumara about seven miles south of Shechem. Some commentators would equate it with Samaria.

SHAMLAI (Shām' li) Written form of personal name in Hebrew text of Ezra 2:46. Scribal note has Shalmal and is followed by many translations. See Shalmal.

SHAMMA (Shām' má) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Leader of clan of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37).

SHAMMAH (Shām' ah) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps "frightful" or "astonishing" or "he heard." 1. Edomite tribe descended from Esau (Gen. 36:13). 2. Older brother of David (1 Sam. 16:9; 17:13) and father of Jonadab (2 Sam. 13:3,32) and Jonathan (2 Sam. 21:21) if the similar Hebrew spellings in 2 Samuel point to the same person mentioned in 1 Samuel. See Shimeah; Shimei. 3. David's military hero (2 Sam. 23:11,25; spelled Shammoth in 1 Chron. 11:27). 4. Another of David's military heroes (2 Sam. 23:33) or, with a slight change of the Hebrew text suggested by many commentators, the father of Jonathan, the military hero (REB, NRSV, NIV). 5. See Shamhuth.

SHAMMAI (Shām' mā ī) Abbreviated form of personal name, perhaps meaning "He heard." 1. Member of tribe of Judah and clan of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:28,32). 2. Descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:44). 3. Another descendant of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:17).

SHAMMOTH (Shām' ōth) Variant spelling (1 Chron. 11:27) for Shammah (2 Sam. 23:25).

SHAMMUA (Shām' mū á) or SHAMMUAH Personal name meaning "one who was heard." 1. Spy representing tribe of Reuben (Num. 13:4). 2. Son of David (2 Sam. 5:14; spelled "Shimea" in 1 Chron. 3:5). 3. Father of a Levite (Neh. 11:17; spelled "Shemaiah" in 1 Chron. 9:16). 4. Priest in days of Joiakim about 600 B.C. (Neh. 12:18).

SHAMSHERAI (Shām' shə rī) Personal name of uncertain meaning; some commentators regard it as a combination of Shimshai and Shimri. Benjaminite living in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:26).

SHAPHAM (Shā' phām) Personal name of unknown meaning. Leader of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:12).

SHAPHAN (Shā' phān) Personal name meaning "coney." Prominent court official during King Josiah's reign in Judah (2 Kings 22). Shaphan served as scribe and treasurer. During Josiah's religious reforms and refurbishment of the temple, Shaphan delivered the newfound book of the law (probably Deuteronomy) from Hilkiah the priest to the king's palace. He also was sent to Huldah the prophetess to confer concerning the book (22:14). Shaphan and his sons befriended Jeremiah on several occasions. See Ahikam; Elasah; Gedeliah; Jaazaniah.

SHAPHAT (Shā' phāt) Personal name meaning "He has established justice." 1. Spy from tribe of Simeon (Num. 13:5). 2. Father of Elisha (2 Kings 6:31). 3. Descendant of David and Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:22). 4. Supervisor of David's cattle herds (1 Chron. 27:29). 5. Member of tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:12).

SHAPHER (Shá' phēr) KJV for Mount Shepher. Place-name, perhaps meaning “lovely.” Stop on Israel's wilderness journey (Num. 33:23), somewhere on east of the Gulf of Aqaba.

SHAPHIR (Shá' phír) Modern translations' spelling of Saphir.

SHARAI (Shá' rí) Personal name, perhaps meaning “he loosed or redeemed.” Man with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:40).

SHARAIM (Shá-rá' ím) (KJV, Josh. 15:36) See Shaaraim.

SHARAR (Shá' rár) Personal name, perhaps meaning “he is healthy.” See Sacar.

SHARD Pottery fragment found in archaeological excavations and used for dating. See Archaeology and Biblical Study; Chronology of the Biblical Period; Potsherd; Pottery; Writing.

SHAREZER (Shá rē' zēr) Abbreviated form of Akkadian name meaning “may (god's name) protect the king.” 1. Son of Sennacherib who helped murder his father (2 Kings 19:37). Assyrian records report the death as occurring in 681 B.C. See Assyria. 2. Name open to several interpretations in Zech. 7:2. The full name may be Bethelsharezer, meaning “may the god Bethel protect the king” (REB). Sharezer may be a man sent to the house of God (Hb. beth-el) to pray (KJV). The town of Bethel may have sent Sharezer to pray (NASB, NIV, NRSV, TEV). The name probably indicates the person was born in Babylonian exile. He may have come with his questions from Babylon and have come as a representative of the people of Bethel.

SHARON, PLAIN OF (Shár' ón) Geographical name meaning “flat land” or “wetlands.” 1. Coastal plain which runs from near modern Tel Aviv to just south of Mount Carmel (about 50 miles). The area had abundant marshes, forests, and sand dunes, but few settlements during biblical days. Because of its fertility and low risk of flooding, the plain was used more by migrant herdsmen than settled farmers. Isaiah 35:2 parallels Sharon with Lebanon, which was known for its trees. Isaiah 65:10 speaks of the area as an excellent pasture for flocks, symbolic of the peace that God would one day grant to His people. See Palestine. 2. Area of uncertain location east of the Jordan inhabited by the tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:16) and mentioned by King Mesha of Moab. See Mesha.

SHARONITE (Shár' ó nít) Person who lived in Plain of Sharon.

SHARUHEN (Shá rú' hén) Place-name, perhaps meaning “free pasture land.” Town assigned to tribe of Simeon (Josh. 19:6) located in the territory of Judah (Josh. 15:32, spelling is Shilhim; 1 Chron. 4:31 spelling is Shaaraim; Egyptian spelling is apparently Shurahuna). The Hyksos withdrew there after the Egyptians defeated them about 1540 B.C. The traditional location is Tell el-Farah, but recent study has favored Tell el-Ajjul about four miles south of Gaza, though this has often been identified as Beth Eglayim. Excavations have shown this to have been a large, well-fortified, wealthy city. See Hyksos.

SHASHAI (Shá' shí) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Man married to a foreign wife (Ezra 10:40).

SHASHAK (Shá' shák) Personal name of uncertain meaning, perhaps of Egyptian origin. Leader of tribe of Benjamin living in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:14,25).

SHAUL (Shá' ul) Personal name meaning “asked of.” 1. Transliteration of Hebrew name of King Saul. 2. Grandson of Jacob and son of Simeon with a Canaanite mother (Gen. 46:10). 3. Early king of Edom from Rehoboth (Gen. 36:37; 1 Chron. 1:48). 4. Levite (1 Chron. 6:24).

SHAULITE (Shá' ul í) Member of clan of tribe of Simeon descended from Shaul (Num. 26:13).

SHAVEH (Shá' vèh) Place-name meaning “valley,” “plain,” or “ruler.” Place where the king of Sodom met Abraham on the latter's return from defeating the coalition of kings (Gen. 14:17). It is also called the king's valley or dale.

There Absalom raised a monument to himself (2 Sam. 18:18). The Genesis Apocryphon locates it in Beth-hakkerem, which is two and a half miles south of Jerusalem where the Kidron and Hinnom Valleys join. It has also been located north, east, and west of Jerusalem.

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM (Shā vēh-kīr ʾā thā' ʾim) Place-name meaning “waste land of Kiriathaim.” This valley is the high plain above the Arnon River. There Chedorlaomer and his coalition of kings defeated the Emim (Gen. 14:5). See Chedorlaomer; Emim; Kiriathaim.

SHAVING See Razors.

SHAVSHA (Shāḥv' shá) Spelling of Shisha (1 Kings 4:3) in 1 Chron. 18:16. See Shisha.

SHEAF Harvested grain bound together into a bundle. English translation of three Hebrew terms. Joseph's dream featured sheaves still in the field (Gen. 37:7). Laws of sacrifice called for the first harvested sheaves to be sacrificed (Lev. 23:10-15). Some sheaves were for gleaners (Deut. 24:19; Ruth 2:7). The prophets used sheaves as figures of judgment (Jer. 9:22; Amos 2:13; Mic. 4:12; Zech. 12:6). See Agriculture; Gleaning; Grain; Harvest; Sacrifice and Offering

An ancient shaving razor with a goat's leg handle.

SHEAL (She' al) Personal name meaning “ask.” Many commentators change the Hebrew text slightly to read “Yishal” or “Jishal,” meaning “he asks.” Israelite who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:29).

SHEALTIEL (She' al' ti el) Personal name meaning “I have asked of God.” Father of Zerubbabel, the governor of Jerusalem under the Persian regime following the exile (Ezra 3:2, Neh. 12:1; Hag. 1:1). First Chronicles 3:17 makes him Zerubbabel's uncle. This could involve the practice of Levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5-10). He was included in the genealogy of Christ (Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27).

SHEARIAH (She' a ri' ah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “Yah has honored” or “Yah knows.” Descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:38).

SHEARING HOUSE KJV translation (2 Kings 10:12,14) of what many modern translators take as place-name. REB reads, “shepherds' shelter.” See Beth-eked.

SHEAR-JASHUB (She' ar-ja' shub) Symbolic personal name meaning “a remnant shall return.” First son of the Prophet Isaiah, born probably around 737 B.C., near the beginning of his father's ministry in Jerusalem. Isaiah apparently named him (and his brother, Mahershalalhashbaz) as an embodiment of prophecy, that Judah would fall, but a remnant would survive. On one occasion Shear-jashub accompanied his father on a trip to assure King Ahaz that the alliance of Syria and Israel would not be allowed to harm Judah (Isa. 7:3-7). See Isaiah.

SHEATH Protective holder for sword attached to a belt. See Arms and Armor; Sword.

SHEBA (She' ba) 1. See Sabean. 2. Personal name meaning “fullness, completeness.” Name of a Benjaminite who led a revolt against David (2 Sam. 20) and of a member of the tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:13). 3. Personal name spelled in Hebrew like the nation of 1. above. The name of a son of Joktan (Gen. 10:28) and of Jokshan (Gen. 25:3).

SHEBA, QUEEN OF Ruler of Sabeans who visited Solomon (1 Kings 10) to test his wisdom, learn of his God, and enhance trade relations. See Sabean.

SHEBAH (Shē' bah) Place-name meaning “overflow” or “oath.” Name Isaac gave Beersheba (Gen. 26:33). See Beer-sheba.

SHEBAM (Shē' bām) (KJV) See Sebam.

SHEBANIAH (Shēb á nī' ah) Personal name appearing in short and long forms in Hebrew meaning “Yahweh came near.” A clan of Levites in which the name was used for several individuals (1 Chron. 15:24; Neh. 9:4-5; 10:4,10,12; 12:14).

SHEBARIM (Shēb' á rīm) Place-name meaning “the breaking points.” Place with symbolic name and uncertain location near Ai (Josh. 7:5), translated as “stone quarries” (NIV; cp. REB). Commentators have suggested “breaks” or “ravines.”

SHEBAT (Shē' bāt) See Sebat.

SHEBER (Shē' bē) Personal name, perhaps meaning “foolish one,” “lion,” or “fracture.” Son of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:48).

SHEBNA (Shēb' ná) or SHEBNAH Personal name meaning “He came near.” Royal scribe (2 Kings 18:18,37; 19:2; Isa. 36:3,22; 37:2) and “comptroller of the household” (Isa. 22:15 REB) under King Hezekiah about 715 B.C. See Scribe.

SHEBUEL (Shē bu' əl) Personal name meaning “return, O God.” 1. Grandson of Moses and head of a clan of Levites (1 Chron. 23:16; 26:24; sometimes equated with Shubael of 1 Chron. 24:20). 2. Levite, son of Heman (1 Chron. 25:4); apparently the same as Shubael (1 Chron. 25:20).

SHECANIAH (Shēk á nī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh has taken up dwelling.” Both long and short forms appear in the Hebrew text. 1. Clan leader (Ezra 8:3). 2. Leader of another clan (Ezra 8:5). 3. Israelite with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:2). 4. Father of man who helped Nehemiah repair Jerusalem wall and keeper of the east gate (Neh. 3:29). 5. Father-in-law of Nehemiah's enemy, Tobiah (Neh. 6:18). 6. Priest who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel about 537 B.C. (Neh. 12:3). 7. Descendant of David and Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:21). 8. Leader of priestly division under David (1 Chron. 24:11; may be equated with founder of priestly clan of Neh. 10:4; 12:14 spelling is Shebaniah). 9. Priest in time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:15).

SHECHANIAH (Shĕk á nî' ah) Abbreviated Hebrew form of personal name, Shecaniah.

SHECHEM (Shĕk' əm) Personal name and place-name meaning "shoulder, back." District and city in the hill country of Ephraim in north central Palestine. The first capital of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, the city was built mainly on the slope, or shoulder, of Mount Ebal. Situated where main highways and ancient trade routes converged, Shechem was an important city long before the Israelites occupied Canaan.

The city makes its earliest appearance in biblical history in connection with Abram's arrival in the land (Gen. 12:6-7). When Jacob returned from Paddan-aram, he settled down at Shechem and purchased land from the sons of Hamor (33:18-19). In Gen. 33-34 Shechem was the name of the city and also of the prince of the city. While Jacob was at Shechem, the unfortunate incident of Dinah occurred. Simeon and Levi, her full brothers, destroyed the city (Gen. 34). Later, the brothers of Joseph were herding Jacob's flock at Shechem when Joseph was sent to check on their welfare. Joseph was buried in the plot of ground that his father Jacob had purchased here (Josh. 24:32).

As the Israelites conquered Canaan, they turned unexpectedly to Shechem. Joshua built an altar on Mount Ebal and led the people in its building, renewing their commitment to the law of Moses (Josh. 8:30-35; cp. Deut. 27:12-13). Shechem lay in the tribal territory of Ephraim near their border with Manasseh (Josh. 17:7). It was a city of refuge (Josh. 20:7) and a Levitical city (21:21). Joshua led Israel to renew its covenant with God there (Josh. 24:1-17). Gideon's son Abimelech fought the leaders of Shechem (Judg. 8:31-9:49).

Rehoboam, successor to King Solomon, went to Shechem to be crowned king over all Israel (1 Kings 12:1). Later, when the nation divided into two kingdoms, Shechem became the first capital of the Northern Kingdom of Israel (1 Kings 12:25). Samaria eventually became the permanent political capital of the Northern Kingdom, but Shechem retained its religious importance. It apparently was a sanctuary for worship of God in Hosea's time about 750 B.C. (6:9).

The name "Shechem" occurs in historical records and other sources outside Palestine. It is mentioned as a city captured by Senusert III of Egypt (before 1800 B.C.) and appears in the Egyptian cursing texts of about the same time. "The mountain of Shechem" is referred to in a satirical letter of the 19th Dynasty of Egypt. Shechem also figures in the Amarna Letters; its ruler, Lab'ayu, and his sons were accused of acting against Egypt, though the ruler protested that he was absolutely loyal to the pharaoh.

At Shechem (sometimes identified with Sychar), Jesus visited with the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well (John 4). The Samaritans had built their temple on Mount Gerizim, where they practiced their form of religion. See Cities of Refuge; Levitical Cities. Rich Murrell SHECHEMITE (Shĕk' əm it) Resident of or native of Shechem.

SHEDEUR (Shĕd' ər ūr) Dialectical spelling (pronunciation) of a personal name meaning "Shaddai is light." Father of a leader of the tribe of Reuben (Num. 1:5; 2:10; 7:30,35; 10:18).

SHEEP Stocky mammal, larger than a goat but has no beard. A prominent animal in the sacrificial system of Israel, sheep are first mentioned in Gen. 4:2 where Abel is identified as a keeper of sheep. They were the primary wealth of pastoral people.

The sheep found in the Bible usually are the broad-tailed variety. The tail, weighing as much as 15 pounds, was sometimes offered as a sacrifice (Exod. 29:22; Lev. 3:9). Of this species only the male had horns; females of other species did have horns. Rams' horns were used as trumpets (shophars) (Josh. 6:4) and as oil containers (1 Sam. 16:1). Sheep were also a source for food and clothing. The Bible contains hundreds of references to sheep. Often, they are referred to as small cattle. These animals were important to the economy of ancient Israel and her neighbors.

Seven different Hebrew words and expressions are translated as sheep. Tso'n is a collective term for small domesticated animals, particularly sheep and goats. Seh is an individual member of the collective tso'n, one sheep or goat. Kebes is a young ram, as is the apparently related word keseb. Kibsah and kisbah are young lambs. Tsoneh is either a variant spelling of or the feminine of tso'n. The male sheep or ram is ayil, which served as a symbol of authority and rule (Exod. 15:15; Ezek. 17:13; 31:11).

Sheep symbolized people without leadership and unity, scattered like sheep without a shepherd (1 Kings 22:17), innocent people not deserving of punishment (1 Chron. 21:17), helpless, facing slaughter (Ps. 44:11,22) and death (Ps. 49:14). God's people are His sheep enjoying His protection and listening to His voice (Pss. 78:52; 95:7; 100:3; cp. Ps. 23). Sheep represent economic prosperity (Ps. 144:13) or poverty (Isa. 7:21). Straying sheep illustrate human sin (Isa. 53:6), but the silent lamb at the slaughter prepares the way for Christ's sacrifice (Isa. 53:7). Ezekiel 34 uses the life of sheep and shepherds to picture God's relationship with His people and their rulers. Human value is contrasted to that of sheep (Matt. 12:12). The shepherd's separating his tso'n into sheep and goats illustrates the final judgment (Matt. 25). The search for one lost sheep depicts God's love for His people (Luke 15). Jesus contrasted His care for His flock with other religious leaders, especially the Pharisees who behaved as thieves and robbers (John 10). His commission to Peter was to take care of the sheep (John 21). See Agriculture; Cattle; Economic Life; Lamb of God; Shepherd.

SHEEP GATE Entrance in northeastern corner of Jerusalem's city wall (Neh. 3:1,32; 12:39). Apparently sheep for temple sacrifice entered the city through it. It was close to the Pool of Bethesda (John 5:2). See Gates of Jerusalem and the Temple.

SHEEP MARKET KJV translation of Greek term meaning “pertaining to sheep” and referring to the Sheep Gate (John 5:2). See Sheep Gate.

SHEEPCOTE KJV translation of Hebrew term meaning “home.” Modern translations usually use “pasture” as the sheep's home (2 Sam. 7:8; 1 Chron. 17:7). In 1 Sam. 24:3 the Hebrew term refers to an enclosure and is usually translated “sheepfolds” or “sheep pens.”

SHEEPFOLD English translation of several Hebrew terms and one Greek term referring to a place where sheep were kept. The basic meanings range from “stone wall,” to “place of confinement,” and “home.” Related words appearing in Gen. 49:14; Judg. 5:16; Ezek. 40:43; and Ps. 68:13 are variously interpreted from the context and translated: “saddlebags,” “double-pronged hooks,” and “campfires” (NIV), “sheepfolds” and “pegs” (NRSV), “sheepfolds” and “double hooks” (NASB), “cattle pens,” “sheepfolds,” and “rims” (REB), “burdens,” “sheepfolds,” “pots,” and “hooks” (KJV), “saddlebags,” “sheep,” “sheep pens,” and “ledges” (TEV). The latest Hebrew dictionary completed in 2000 but published in parts over two decades gives differing meanings for the two related terms: “saddlebaskets” and “sheepfolds,” separating the Ezekiel passage out as a meaning unto itself.

Asian sheep grazing on the site of what was once the ancient city of Laodicea.

SHEEPSHEARERS Persons who cut wool from the sheep. Evidently, these are not professionals but the owners of the sheep (Gen. 31:19) or persons working for the owner (Gen. 38:12). The Hebrew does not distinguish between “sheepshearers” and “sheepshearing,” so that both translations are possible in several passages. The time of shearing sheep was a festive time of parties and inviting friends (1 Sam. 25; 2 Sam. 13). The word for shearing sheep was also used for cutting human hair (Jer. 7:29; Mic. 1:16).

SHEERAH (Sheh' ə rah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “blood kin.” Female member of tribe of Ephraim who established the two cities of Bethhoron and Uzzan-sheerah (1 Chron. 7:24).

SHEET English translation of Greek word meaning “a linen cloth” and usually used for ships' sails. Such a cloth held all the clean and unclean animals in the vision that taught Peter that God loved and offered salvation to people who were not Jews (Acts 10:11; 11:5).

SHEHARIAH (Sheh' ah ri' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah is the dawn.” Leader of tribe of Benjamin who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:26).

SHEKEL (Shek' əl) Hebrew weight of about four tenths of an ounce. This became the name of a silver coin with that weight. See Coins; Weights and Measures.

SHEKINAH (Shĕ kī' nah) Transliteration of Hebrew word not found in the Bible but used in many of the Jewish writings to speak of God's presence. The term means "that which dwells," and is implied throughout the Bible whenever it refers to God's nearness either in a person, object, or His glory. It is often used in combination with glory to speak of the presence of God's shekinah glory. See Glory.

SHELAH (Shĕ' lah) Personal name meaning "please" or "be still, rest." Son of Judah and original ancestor of clan in tribe of Judah (Gen. 10:25; 46:12; Num. 26:20; 1 Chron. 2:3; 4:21). At times Shelah is the transliteration for the Hebrew name otherwise transliterated Salah. See Sala or Salah.

SHELANITE (Shĕ' lán it) Member of clan of Shelah.

SHELEMIAH (Shĕ lĕ mī' ah) Personal name appearing in longer and shorter Hebrew forms meaning "Yahweh restored, replaced, repaid." 1. Father of a messenger of King Zedekiah about 590 B.C. (Jer. 37:3). 2. Father of the captain of the guard who arrested Jeremiah (Jer. 37:13). 3. Ancestor of an official of King Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:14). 4. Court official whom King Jehoiakim (609-597 B.C.) ordered to arrest Jeremiah and from whom God hid Jeremiah (Jer. 36:26). 5. Temple gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:14) and apparently called Meshelemiah in 1 Chron. 26:1,9.6. and 7. Two Jews who married foreign women (Ezra 10:39,41). 8. Father of man who helped Nehemiah rebuild Jerusalem's wall (Neh. 3:30). 9. Priest whom Nehemiah made treasurer (Neh. 13:13).

SHELEPH (Shĕ' lĕph) Tribal name, perhaps meaning "remove, take out of." Son of Joktan and original ancestor of Yemenite tribes living near Aden (Gen. 10:26).

SHELESH (Shĕ' lĕsh) Personal name, perhaps meaning "triplet." Leader of a clan in the tribe of Asher(1 Chron. 7:35).

SHELOMI (Shĕ ló' mī) Personal name meaning "my peace." Father of a leader of tribe of Asher (Num. 34:27).

SHELOMITH (Shə lō' mīth) Feminine form of Shelomoth. 1. Head of a family which returned from Babylonian exile with Ezra about 458 B.C. (Ezra 8:10). 2. Son of King Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:20). 3. Cousin of Moses and head of a Levitical group (1 Chron. 23:18); apparently the same as Shelomoth (1 Chron. 24:22). 4. Priest over the cultic treasury under David (1 Chron. 26:25-28, Hebrew scribes have interchanged Shelomith and Shelomoth). 5. Woman of tribe of Dan whose son cursed the divine name, thus being guilty of blasphemy. The Israelites followed God's orders and stoned him to death (Lev. 24:10-23). 6. Daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:19).

SHELOMOTH (Shə lō' mōth) Personal name meaning "peaces." Levitical leader under David (1 Chron. 23:9; Hb. scribal note has "Shelomith"). See Shelomith.

SHELUMIEL (Shə lū' mī ēl) Personal name meaning "God is my wholeness or health." Leader in tribe of Simeon (Num. 1:6; 2:12; 7:36,41; 10:19).

SHEM (Shēm) Personal name meaning "name." Noah's oldest son and original ancestor of Semitic peoples including Israel (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 7:13; 9:18-27; 10:1,21-22,31; 11:10-11). He carried God's blessing (9:26-27). Through his line came Abraham and the covenant of blessing.

SHEMA (Shə mā') Transliteration of Hebrew imperative meaning "hear" (Deut. 6:4) and applied to 6:4-9 as the basic statement of the Jewish law. The Shema became for the people of God a confession of faith by which they acknowledged the one true God and His commandments for them. Later worship practice combined Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21; Num. 15:37-41 into the larger Shema as the summary of Jewish confession. When Jesus was asked about the "greatest commandment," He answered by quoting the Shema (Mark 12:29).

SHEMA (Shē' mā) Personal name meaning "a hearing" and place-name, perhaps meaning "hyena." 1. Son of Hebron and grandson of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:43). 2. Member and clan ancestor of tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:8); possibly the same as Shemaiah (1 Chron. 5:4). 3. Benjaminite clan leader in Aijalon (1 Chron. 8:13); apparently the same as Shimhi (1 Chron. 8:21). 4. Man who helped Ezra teach the law (Neh. 8:4). 5. Town in tribal territory of Judah (Josh. 15:26) and apparently occupied by Simeon (Josh. 19:2; Sheba may be a scribe's repetition of previous word instead of similar sounding Shema). It may be the same as Jeshua (Neh. 11:26). See Jeshua 9.

SHEMAAH (Shə mā' ah) Personal name, perhaps meaning "a hearing." Father of Benjaminite military leaders who deserted Saul to join David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3).

SHEMAIAH (Shə mā' yá) Personal name meaning "Yahweh heard," with both long and short forms in Hebrew. 1. Prophet in the days of Rehoboam whose message from God prevented war between Israel and Judah about 930 B.C. (1 Kings 12:22). His preaching humbled Rehoboam and the leaders of Judah, leading God not to permit Shishak of Egypt to destroy Jerusalem (2 Chron. 12). 2. False prophet among Babylonian exiles who opposed Jeremiah's word (Jer. 29:24-32). 3. Descendant of David and Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:22). 4. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:37). 5. Member of tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:4); perhaps identical with Shema 2. (1 Chron. 5:8). 6. A Levite (Neh. 11:15; cp. 1 Chron. 9:14). 7. A Levite (1 Chron. 9:16) probably identical with Shammua 3. (Neh. 11:17). 8. Head of one of the six Levitical families under David (1 Chron. 15:8,11). 9. Levitical scribe who recorded the priestly divisions under David (1 Chron. 24:6). 10. Head of an important family of gatekeepers (1 Chron. 24:4-8). 11. Levite in time of Hezekiah about 715 B.C. (2 Chron. 29:14); possibly identical with the Levite of 2 Chron. 31:15. 12. Head of a family that returned with Ezra from Babylonian exile about 458 B.C. (Ezra 8:13). He may be the same man Ezra sent to get more ministers for the temple (Ezra 8:16). 13. Priest married to a foreign woman (Ezra 10:21). 14. Man married to a foreign woman (Ezra 10:31). 15. Keeper of east gate who helped Nehemiah repair Jerusalem's wall about 445 B.C. (Neh. 3:29). 16. Prophet Tobiah and Sanballat hired against Nehemiah (Neh. 6:10-12). 17. Original ancestor of a priestly family (Neh. 10:8; 12:6,18). 18. Leader of Judah who participated with Nehemiah in dedicating the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:34). 19. Priest who helped Nehemiah dedicate the walls (Neh. 12:42). 20. Priest whose grandson helped Nehemiah dedicate the walls (Neh. 12:35). 21.

Levitical musician who helped Nehemiah dedicate the walls (Neh. 12:36). 22. Father of the Prophet Urijah (Jer. 26:20). 23. Father of an official at Jehoikim's court about 600 B.C. (Jer. 36:12). 24. Levite in days of Jehoshaphat (873-848 B.C.) who taught God's law to the people (2 Chron. 17:8). 25. Levite in days of Josiah about 621 B.C. (2 Chron. 35:9).

SHEMARIAH (Shēm á rí' ah) Personal name in longer and shorter Hebrew forms meaning “Yahweh protected.” 1. Benjaminite who deserted Saul to join David's army at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5). 2. Son of King Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:19). 3. and 4. Men with foreign wives under Ezra (Ezra 10:32,41).

SHEMEBER (Shēm ē' bēr) Royal name meaning “powerful name.” King of Zeboiim who rebelled against Chedorlaomer, leading to Abraham's rescue mission of Lot (Gen. 14:2). The Genesis Apocryphon and Samaritan Pentateuch read his name as Shemiabad, “the name is lost.” See Zeboiim.

SHEMED (Shē' mēd) Personal name meaning “destruction.” Benjaminite credited with building or rebuilding Ono and Lod (1 Chron. 8:12). See Shamed.

SHEMER (Shē' mēr) Personal name meaning “protection, preservation.” See Shamed. 1. Modern translations' spelling of Shamer, the father of a temple musician under David (1 Chron. 6:46). 2. Head of clan of tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:34) with variant spelling Shomer (v. 32). 3. Original owner of the mount of Samaria for whom Samaria was named (1 Kings 16:24). See Samaria.

SHEMIDA (Shē mí' dá) or SHEMIDAH Personal name meaning “the Name has known” or “the Name troubles Himself for.” Clan head among the Gileadites in tribe of Manasseh (Num. 26:32; cp. Josh. 17:2; 1 Chron. 7:19). The Samaritan Ostraca lists Shemida as a territorial name in territory of Manasseh.

SHEMIDAITE (Shē mí' dá it) Member of clan of Shemida.

SHEMINITH (Shēm' ə nīth) Musical direction meaning “the eighth” used in titles of Pss. 6; 12; and 1 Chron. 15:21. It may mean on an eightstringed instrument, on the eighth string of an instrument, on a deeper octave than the Alamoth (1 Chron. 15:20), for the eighth and concluding rite of the fall New Year festival, or it may be referring to the tuning of the instrument or the scale of the melody.

SHEMIRAMOTH (Shə mīr' á mōth) Personal name of uncertain meaning. 1. Temple Levitical musician in David's time (1 Chron. 15:18,20; 16:5). 2. Levite under King Jehoshaphat (873-848 B.C.) who taught the law (2 Chron. 17:8).

SHEMUEL (Shēm' ū ēl) Personal name meaning “Sumu is god,” “the name is God,” “God is exalted,” or “Son of God.” 1. Precise transliteration of Hebrew for Samuel. See Samuel. 2. Leader of tribe of Simeon (Num. 34:20). 3. Clan chief in tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2).

SHEN (Shān) Place-name meaning “the tooth.” Locality used to locate Ebenezer (1 Sam. 7:12), translated and interpreted variously since the earliest translations. It may refer to a prominent hill or mountain shaped like a tooth. Early translations read it as “Jeshanah” (REB, NRSV), but that appears to be too far east for the context. Some early translators read “Bethshan.” The exact location is debated and uncertain.

SHENAZAR (Shə nā' zər) or SHENAZZAR

Babylonian personal name meaning “Sin (a god) protects” or “may Sin protect.” Son of King Jehoiachin (1 Chron. 3:18). He is often identified with Sheshbazzar as an alternate transliteration of a Babylonian name, but this has been denied recently. See Sheshbazzar.

SHENIR (Shē' nīr) (KJV, Deut. 3:9; Song 4:8) See Senir.

SHEOL (Shē' ol) Place of the dead, or more specifically, the place of the unrighteous dead according to the Hebrew Bible. It is one of a constellation of words and phrases that designate death, the dead, and the destiny of those who have passed beyond this life. Scripture speaks of God as the One who brings about a man's death (Job 30:23). Some of the patriarchs are said to have gone to their fathers (Gen. 15:15) or rested with their fathers (Deut. 31:16) at death. Old Testament persons were reminded that they were dust and would return to dust at death (Gen. 3:19; Eccles. 3:20).

The origins of the word she'ol are unknown, though some have linked it to a similarly named Akkadian deity of the underworld. Whether this is the case or not, biblical usage has no connection with Akkadian mythology. In a number of texts persons are spoken of as descending to Sheol or of going into a pit (Ps. 88:6,10; Amos 9:2). This likely indicates that the Hebrews saw Sheol as something beneath their feet. The dead, of course, were buried in graves or tombs, often in family ossuaries, so the language concerning a realm of the dead beneath the earth is easily understood. That is not to say that the OT writers simply borrowed their view from surrounding peoples. Though many other ancient Near Eastern cultures professed belief in some kind of underworld, the OT understanding is unique both in the language it employs and in the content of its teaching. It does not imply that the Hebrews believed in a three-decked universe, with gods above, demons under the ground, and humans on the surface of the earth. It is likely that they used language in a metonymic fashion, that is, where a word is substituted for the reality to which it points. It is not likely that they believed there existed some set of deep underground caverns in which the departed dead dwelled as denizens of some nether kingdom.

Sheol occurs 21 times in “psalmodic” type literature (Pss. 6:5; 9:17; 16:10; 18:5; 30:13; 31:17; 49:14-15; 55:15; 86:13; 88:3; 89:48; 116:3; 139:8; 141:7; 1 Sam. 2:6; 2 Sam. 22:6; Isa. 38:10,18; Jon. 2:2), 20 times in “reflective” literature (Job 7:9; 11:8; 14:13; 17:13,16; 21:13; 24:19; 26:6; Prov. 1:12; 5:5; 7:27; 9:18; 15:11,24; 23:14; 27:20; 30:16), 17 times in prophetic literature (Isa. 5:14; 7:11; 14:9,11,15; 28:15,18; 57:9; Ezek. 31:15-17; 32:21,27; Hos. 13:14; Amos 9:2; Hab. 2:5), and 8 times in narrative literature (Gen. 37:35; 42:38; 44:29,31; Num. 16:30,33; 1 Kings 2:6,9). From this list it seems clear that the word was used primarily in poetic contexts (whether prophecy, psalmody, or wisdom) and in speeches about death. It was a word that indicated a serious engagement with the reality of death, mortality, and the way one's life impacted one's destiny.

The Hebrew word is translated in various ways. The KJV often translated it as “hell,” presumably because it is “in the earth,” and because the wicked are the general inhabitants. But this is surely a bad translation, since hell as the “lake of fire” is no one's dwelling place until final judgment (Rev. 20:14). In other places the KJV translates the word as “the grave” or “the pit.” Recent translations often leave the word untranslated, and simply transliterate the Hebrew, “Sheol.” That is probably the best approach, as the word sometimes demands a literal interpretation and sometimes a metaphorical one.

Sheol is a place that is set over against the work of Yahweh. Those who dwell there are separated from Yahweh spiritually and morally (Isa. 38:18; Ps. 6:5-6), though not physically, since there can be no real escape from God, even in Sheol (Ps. 139:8; Amos 9:2). It is a place in which one is captive (Pss. 18:5; 116:3). It is a place of darkness (Ps. 88:6) and of silence (Ps. 115:17). It is also a place of demotion from rank and privilege. In Isa. 14 the prophet speaks of one who was a king but who has now been brought down to Sheol where others say to him, “Even you have been made weak as we, you have become like us. Your pomp and the music of your harps have been brought down to Sheol. Maggots are spread out as your bed beneath you and worms for your covering” (Isa. 14:10-11 NASB). Sheol is the leveler of men, especially those who exalted themselves in this life rather than humbling themselves before the true King (see also Ezek. 32).

Sheol is the destiny of those who end their lives in impenitence. The foolish rich will find themselves in Sheol (Ps. 49:14), as will the immoral (Prov. 5:5) and the ungodly (Isa. 5:14). The Egyptians will be there (Ezek. 31:15-17), as will some specific persons, such as Korah (Num. 16:30). Some texts seem to indicate that even the righteous will find themselves in Sheol. So Job laments that he is headed for that dread destination (Job 17:13-16), as do Jacob (Gen. 37:35) and Hezekiah (Isa. 38:10). If one carefully examines these texts, though, one will find that these persons were in the depth of sorrowful or tragic circumstances. In these texts Sheol takes on more of a metaphorical meaning, as if a modern person were to say, “I have been deep in a pit these past days.”

Two texts (Ps. 89:48-49 and Eccles. 9:7-10) seem on the surface to teach that all persons will end up in Sheol. But the former passage really teaches that humanity under sinful judgment is destined for Sheol. The latter text is in the section of Ecclesiastes where Solomon is lamenting the absurdity of all life, but of course, that is not his final word (see 12:14). It is simply inconceivable that Sheol is the abode of the righteous dead for several reasons. The fact that in Sheol there is no praise of Yahweh (Pss. 6:5; 115:17) indicates that it is not the abode of the righteous. It is a place of pain and distress (Ps. 116:3), of weakness (Isa. 14:10), helplessness (Ps. 88:4), hopelessness (Isa. 38:10), and destruction (Isa. 38:17).

The righteous had a different expectation. Though the OT does not speak with the clarity of the NT on the subject of life after death, it does speak in a complementary fashion. One scholar noted that the OT is like a room richly furnished but dimly lit. Many OT figures expected that after death they would remain in fellowship with God and not simply be consigned to darkness and emptiness. “For You will not abandon me to Sheol;...in Your right hand are eternal pleasures” (Ps. 16:10-11 HCSB). “Only goodness and faithful love will pursue me all the days of my life, and I will dwell in the house of the LORD (Beth Yahweh) as long as I live” (Ps. 23:6). Concerning the foolish rich, “Like sheep they are headed for Sheol; Death will shepherd them” (Ps. 49:14), but not so the righteous: “But God will redeem my life from the power of Sheol, for He will take me” (Ps. 49:15 HCSB). Other texts speak of the expectation of resurrection of the righteous unto eternal life (Deut. 32:39; Dan. 12:2; Isa. 26:19).

Sheol in the OT is roughly analogous to hades in the NT. Jesus spoke of the rich man as being tormented in hades, while Lazarus was in the bosom of Abraham, dwelling in joy and peace (Luke 16:19-31). Jesus told His disciples that the gates of hades would not prevail against His church (Matt. 16:18). Hades here again is that realm set over against God and His righteous kingdom—the dwelling place of the unrighteous and their “king.” Then we find at the end that death and hades are cast into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14). The final destiny of those who dwell in Sheol/hades is eternal separation from God's righteousness and love. As they sought to be separate from Him in life, so will they be in death and in eternity. Chad Brand SHEPHAM (She' phām) Place-name of uncertain meaning and location in northeastern Transjordan forming the northeastern border of the promised land (Num. 34:10).

SHEPHATIAH (Shēph á tí' ah) Personal name in longer and shorter Hebrew forms meaning “Yahweh has created justice.” 1. David's fifth son (2 Sam. 3:4). 2. King Zedekiah's (597-586 B.C.) official (Jer. 38:1). 3. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. 9:8). 4. Head of a family of exiles who returned with Ezra about 458 B.C. (Ezra 2:4; 8:8; Neh. 7:9). 5. Ancestor of family included among “Solomon's servants,” that is royal officials, perhaps with temple responsibilities (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59). 6. Member of tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:4). 7. Benjaminite who deserted Saul to join David's army at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5). 8. Leader of Simeon's tribe under David (1 Chron. 27:16). 9. Son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 21:2).

SHEPHELAH (Shē' phā lāh) Transliteration of Hebrew geographical term referring to the Judean foothills between the Philistine coastal plain and the highlands of Judah farther inland. It served as a battleground for Israel and Philistia during the period of the judges and early monarchy. Joshua 15:33-41 lists about 30 villages and towns located in the region. See Palestine.

SHEPHER, MOUNT (She' phēr) Place-name, perhaps meaning “beauty.” Stop on Israel's wilderness journey whose location is not known (Num. 33:23).

SHEPHERD Keeper of sheep. The first keeper of sheep was Adam's son Abel (Gen. 4:2). Shepherding was the chief occupation of the Israelites in the early days of the patriarchs: Abraham (Gen. 12:16); Rachel (Gen. 29:9); Jacob (Gen. 30:31-40); Moses (Exod. 3:1).

As cultivation of crops increased, shepherding fell from favor and was assigned to younger sons, hirelings, and slaves (cp. David in 1 Sam. 16:11-13). Farmers, such as in Egypt, even hated shepherds (Gen. 46:34).

The Bible mentions shepherds and shepherding over 200 times. However, the Hebrew word for shepherding is often translated “feeding.” Shepherds led sheep to pasture and water (Ps. 23) and protected them from wild animals (1 Sam. 17:34-35). Shepherds guarded their flocks at night whether in the open (Luke 2:8) or in sheepfolds (Zeph. 2:6) where they counted the sheep as they entered (Jer. 33:13). They took care of the sheep and even carried weak lambs in their arms (Isa. 40:11).

“Shepherd” came to designate not only persons who herded sheep but also kings (2 Sam. 5:2) and God Himself (Ps. 23; Isa. 40:11). Later prophets referred to Israel's leaders as shepherds (Jer. 23; Ezek. 34).

In Bible times the sheep cared for by shepherds represented wealth. They provided food (1 Sam. 14:32), milk to drink (Isa. 7:21-22), wool for clothing (Job 31:20), hides for rough clothing (Matt. 7:15), and leather for tents (Exod. 26:14). Furthermore, sheep were major offerings in the sacrificial system (Exod. 20:24). They were offered as burnt offerings (Lev. 1:10), sin offerings (Lev. 4:32), guilt offerings (Lev. 5:15), and peace offerings (Lev. 22:21).

The NT mentions shepherds 16 times. They were among the first to visit Jesus at His birth (Luke 2:8-20). Some NT references used a shepherd and the sheep to illustrate Christ's relationship to His followers who referred to Him as “our Lord Jesus—the great Shepherd of the sheep” (Heb. 13:20 HCSB). Jesus spoke of Himself as “the good shepherd” who knew His sheep and would lay down His life for them (John 10:7-18). Jesus commissioned Peter to feed His sheep (John 21). Paul likened the church and its leaders to a flock with shepherds (Acts 20:28). The Latin word transliterated “pastor” means shepherd. Elmer Gray

SHEPHERD'S BAG See Bag 4.

SHEPHI (Shē' p̄hī) (1 Chron. 1:40) or SHEPHO (Shē' phō) Tribal name, perhaps meaning “male sheep, ram.” Edomite tribe or clan (Gen. 36:23).

SHEPHUPHAM (Shə' phū' phām) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Leader of Benjaminite clan according to Hebrew text (Num. 26:39) but probably a scribe repeated a letter in Shupham (KJV, REB, NIV).

SHEPHUPHAN (Shə' phū' phān) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:5). Some commentators read “Shupham” on basis of early translations.

SHERAH (Shĕ' rah) (REB, KJV) See Sheerah.

SHERD Alternate spelling for “shard” often used by archaeologists. See Shard.

SHEREBIAH (Shĕr ă bî' ah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “Yah gave a new generation,” “Yah understands,” or “Yah made it hot.” Ancestor of a family of Levites (Ezra 8:18,24; Neh. 8:7; 9:4-5; 10:12; 12:8,24). He had responsibility for the temple gold that Ezra took back to Jerusalem from exile and helped Ezra teach the people the law.

SHERESH (Shĕ' rĕsh) Personal name meaning “sprout” or “sly, clever.” Descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:16) as well as the name of a city in the kingdom of Ugarit.

SHEREZER (Shĕ rĕ' zĕr) (KJV, Zech. 7:2) See Sharezer.

SHESHACH (Shĕ' shāk) Code word Jeremiah used to indicate Babylon (25:26; 51:41). The code uses the first word of the alphabet for the last, the second for the next to last, and so on. In English a would stand for z, b for y, and so on.

SHESHAI (Shĕ' shī) Probably a Hurrian name of uncertain meaning. A man or clan living near Hebron descended from the Anakim (Num. 13:22) and driven out by Caleb (Josh. 15:14) and the tribe of Judah (Judg. 1:10). They may have entered Palestine with the Sea Peoples to whom the Philistines are related. See Anak, Anakim.

SHESHAK (Shĕ' shāk) (NASB, Jer. 51:41) See Sheshach.

SHESHAN (Shĕ' shān) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of clan of Jerahmeel from tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:31-35).

SHESHBAZZAR (Shĕsh bāz' zār) Babylonian name probably meaning “may Shamash (sun god) protect the father.” Jewish leader who accompanied the first group of exiles from Babylon to Jerusalem in 538 B.C. (Ezra 1:8). King Cyrus of Persia apparently appointed Sheshbazzar governor of restored Judah and supplied his company of people with provisions and many of the treasures that the Babylonians had taken from Jerusalem. He attempted to rebuild the temple (Ezra 5:16) but got no farther than the foundation when he was replaced by Zerubbabel. His genealogy is not clear, but some believe the Shenazar of 1 Chron. 3:18 may be Sheshbazzar. If so, he was a son of Jehoiachin and uncle of Zerubbabel.

SHETH (Shĕth) Personal and tribal name of uncertain meaning. Moabite clan whose destruction Balaam prophesied (Num. 24:17). The Hebrew spelling is the same as Seth (Gen. 4:25). Egyptian and Babylonian texts point to a people called Sutu, seminomads in the Syrian and Arabian Deserts. Rather than a proper name, some commentators think the translation should be “sons of tumult.”

SHETHAR (Shĕ' thār) Persian name of uncertain meaning. Advisor of King Ahasuerus of Persia, an expert in the “law and custom” of Persia and possibly in astrology (Esther 1:13-14 NRSV).

SHETHAR-BOZENAI (Shĕ thār-bōz' ā nī) or SHETHAR-BOZNAI (KJV) Persian name, perhaps meaning “Mithra is deliverer.” Persian provincial official who questioned Zerubbabel's right to begin rebuilding the temple (Ezra 5:3,6) but responded to King Darius' answer by helping the Jews build (Ezra 6:13). The name appears in the Elephantine papyri.

SHETHITES (Shĕth' itz) NRSV reading of “sons of Sheth” (Num. 24:17). See Sheth.

SHEVA (Shĕ' vā) Personal name meaning “similarity.” 1. Scribe for David (2 Sam. 20:25), perhaps the transliteration of an Egyptian title meaning “writer of letters.” The name is Seraiah in 2 Sam. 8:17; Shavsha in 1 Chron. 18:16. See Scribe. 2. Descendant of Caleb and original ancestor of a clan (1 Chron. 2:49).

SHEWBREAD Sacred loaf made probably of barley or wheat that was set before the Lord as a continual sacrifice (Exod. 25:30). The old bread was then eaten by the priests (Lev. 24:5-9). David requested the bread for his hungry men as they fled from King Saul (1 Sam. 21:4-6). Jesus used this account to illustrate His teaching on the Sabbath, that the day was made to benefit people (Mark 2:23-28). See Bread of the Presence.

SHIBAH (Shīb' ah) Modern translation spelling of Shebah (Gen. 26:33; HCSB, “Oath”).

SHIBBOLETH (Shīb' o lĕth) Transliteration of Hebrew password meaning “ears,” “twigs” or “brook.” People of Gilead east of the Jordan used it to detect people of Ephraim from west of the Jordan since the Ephraimite dialect evidently did not include the sh sound, so Ephraimites always said, “Sibboleth,” a word not used elsewhere in Hebrew (Judg. 12:6).

SHIBMAH (Shīb' mah) (KJV, Num. 32:38) See Sibmah.

SHICRON (Shīk' rōn) Place-name meaning “henbane” (a type of nightshade plant). Border town of tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:11). It may be located at Tell el-Ful north of the Soreq River and three and a half miles northwest of Ekron.

SHIELD Protective device used in battle. See Arms and Armor.

SHIGGAION (Shī gā' ōn) Transliteration of a Hebrew technical term used in psalm titles (Ps. 7; Hab. 3). Suggested translations include “frenzied” or “emotional.” Some think the basic meaning is “to wander” in reference to a wandering style of thought or melody or to the unconnected expressions of a lament.

SHIGIONOTH (Shīg ı օ´ nōth) Hebrew plural of Shiggaion. See Shiggaion.

SHIHON (Shī´ hōn) Place-name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “worthless.” Some would locate it at modern Sirim, about 13 miles southeast of Mount Tabor. It was a border town of Issachar (Josh. 19:19).

SHIHOR (Shī´ hōr) Egyptian place-name meaning “pool of Horus (a god).” It formed the border of the promised land (Josh. 13:3), marking the widest extent of Israel's territorial claims (1 Chron. 13:5). In Isa. 23:3 and Jer. 2:18 the term apparently refers to one of the branches of the Nile River inside Egypt, but the border point places it outside Egypt, identical with the Brook of Egypt or extending Israel's claim to the Nile. The earliest translators did not understand the term in Josh. 13. See Brook of Egypt; Palestine.

SHIHOR-LIBNATH (Shī hōr-lib´ nāth) Placename, perhaps meaning “swamp of Libnath.” Border of tribal territory of Asher (Josh. 19:26), variously identified as the Nahr ez-Zerqa on the southern border of Asher; the swampy territory between the rivers Nahr ed-Difleh and Nahr ezZerqa, and Tell Abu Hawam at the mouth of the Kishon.

SHIKKERON (Shīk´ ֶ rōn) Modern translations' spelling of Shicron (Josh. 15:11). See Shicron.

SHILHI (Shīl´ hī) Personal name meaning “he sent me,” “Salach (underworld god or river) has me,” or “my offshoot.” A similar formation has been found at Tell Arad. Maternal grandfather of King Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 22:42).

SHILHIM (Shīl´ hīm) Alternative Hebrew spelling of Sharuhēn. See Shamhen.

SHILLEM (Shīl´ lēm) Personal name meaning “he has replaced or repaid.” Son of Naphtali and original ancestor of clan in that tribe (Gen. 46:24). First Chronicles 7:13 has “Shallum.”

SHILLEMITE (Shīl' lēm it) Member of clan of Shillem (Num. 26:49).

SHILOAH, WATERS OF (Shī lō' ah) Place-name meaning “being sent.” Waters supplying Jerusalem diverted from the Gihon spring and representing God's supply making reliance on foreign kings unnecessary (Isa. 8:6). It differs from the Siloam Tunnel Hezekiah built (2 Kings 20:20). The background may be anointing of kings at the Gihon (1 Kings 1:33-40), thus implying rejection of God's kingship represented through His anointed king.

SHILOH (Shī' loh) Place-name, perhaps meaning “tranquil, secure.” About 30 miles north of Jerusalem sat the city which would be Israel's religious center for over a century after the conquest, being the home of Israel's tabernacle (Josh. 18:1). See Tabernacle.

Judges 21:19 described Shiloh's location as “north of Bethel, east of the highway that goes up from Bethel to Shechem, and south of Lebonah.” Twelve miles south of Shechem, Shiloh was in a fertile plain at 2,000 feet elevation. This is apparently modern Seilun, where archaeologists have unearthed evidence of Canaanite settlement by 1700 B.C. Perhaps when Israel chose a spot for the tabernacle, Shiloh was available for Joshua to use as the place to allot land to the tribes (Josh. 18).

Tribal annual pilgrimages to the tabernacle set the scene for another incident in Shiloh. The tribe of Benjamin had a dilemma in that no other tribe would give them their daughters for wives (Judg. 21). Because of this, the men of Benjamin waited in the vineyards (v. 20) until the dancing women went out of Shiloh where they were then captured and taken as wives.

Samuel's early years provided another connection with Shiloh (1 Sam. 1-4). At the tabernacle Hannah vowed to the Lord that if He would give her a son she would give him back to God (1 Sam. 1). After the birth of Samuel, Hannah brought him to Shiloh in gratitude to God (1 Sam. 1:24-28). Thus, Shiloh became home for Samuel as he lived under the care of Eli, the high priest, and his two wicked sons, Hophni and Phinehas. Later, Samuel received the Lord's message that the priesthood would be taken from Eli's family (1 Sam. 3). Years later, following a defeat at Aphek, the Israelite army sent for the ark of the covenant from Shiloh. Mistakenly thinking that the ark would bring victory, the Israelites lost the second battle of Aphek to the Philistines. Results included losing the ark; the deaths of Hophni, Phinehas, and Eli; and the apparent conquering of Shiloh (1 Sam. 4).

Ruins of an ancient synagogue at the site of the city of Shiloh.

No explicit biblical reference was made to Shiloh's final fate. According to archaeological evidence, Shiloh apparently was destroyed about 1050 B.C. by the Philistines. Supporting this was the fact that when the Philistines finally returned the ark of the covenant, it was housed at Kiriathjearim rather than Shiloh (1 Sam. 7:1). Also, Jeremiah warned Jerusalem that it might suffer the same destructive fate as Shiloh (7:12).

Centuries later, Jeremiah used Shiloh and the tabernacle as illustrations to warn Jerusalem that it was not safe merely because it housed the temple (7:12-14). Hearing the same message again, the people sought to kill Jeremiah (26:6-9). Jeremiah mentioned some men from Shiloh as late as 585 B.C. (41:5), indicating some occupation at that time. See Eli; Joshua; Samuel.

SHILONI (Shī lō' nī) Transliteration of Hebrew for Shilonite, taken by KJV as personal name (Neh. 11:5).

SHILONITE (Shī' lō nīt) Resident of or native of Shiloh.

SHILSHAH (Shīl' shāh) Personal name, perhaps meaning “little triplet.” Original ancestor of clan in tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37).

SHIMEA (Shīm' ə á) Personal name meaning “hearing.” 1. Son of David (1 Chron. 3:5; 2 Sam. 5:14, “Shammuah”). 2. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:30). 3. Levite ancestor of Asaph (1 Chron. 6:39). 4. Older brother of David (1 Chron. 2:13; 20:7; 1 Sam. 16:9 and 17:13, “Shammah”). See Shammah 2. 5. See Shimeam.

SHIMEAH (Shīm' ə ah) Alternate Hebrew spelling of Shammah. See Shammah 2; Shimea 4.

SHIMEAM (Shīm' ə ām) Personal name, perhaps meaning “their hearing.” Benjaminite who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:38; 8:32, “Shimeah”).

SHIMEATH (Shīm' ə āth) Personal name meaning “hearing.” Parent of court official who murdered King Joash about 796 B.C. (2 Kings 12:21). Second Chronicles 24:26 takes the apparently feminine form of the Hebrew name and identifies the parent as an Ammonite woman.

SHIMEATHITE (Shīm' ə á thīt) Either a descendant of a person named Shimeath or, more likely, a native of the town of Shema (Josh. 15:26), perhaps settled by the clan of Shema (1 Chron. 2:43). See Shema 1 and 5.

SHIMEI (Shīm' ə í) Personal name meaning “my being heard.” 1. Grandson of Levi and head of Levitical family (Exod. 6:17; Num. 3:18; cp. 1 Chron.

6:42). 2. A Levite (1 Chron. 23:9 if the text does not represent duplication in copying as some commentators suggest; cp. v. 10). 3. Relative of King Saul who cursed and opposed David as he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. 16). When David returned after Absalom's death, Shimei met him and pleaded for forgiveness and mercy, which David granted because of the festive occasion (2 Sam. 19). Solomon followed David's advice and had Shimei slain (1 Kings 2). 4. Court personality who refused to support Adonijah against Solomon (1 Kings 1:8). 5. District supervisor in territory of Benjamin responsible for supplying Solomon's court one month each year (1 Kings 4:18); he could be identical with 4. above. 6. Ancestor of Mordecai, the cousin of Esther (Esther 2:5). 7. Brother of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:19). 8. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:26). 9. Member of tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:4). 10. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:29). 11. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. 8:21; apparently identical with Shema in v. 13). 12. Temple musician under David (1 Chron. 25:17; perhaps also in v. 3 with a Hebrew manuscript and some Greek manuscripts as in NRSV, REB, NASB, NIV, TEV). 13. Supervisor of David's vineyards (1 Chron. 27:27). 14. and 15. Two Levites under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:14; 31:12-13). 16. Levite married to a foreign woman under Ezra (Ezra 10:23). 17. and 18. Two Jews married to foreign women under Ezra (Ezra 10:33,38).

SHIMEITES (Shī' mē its) Members of the clan descending from Shimei (Num. 3:21; Zech. 12:13).

SHIMEON (Shīm ə ōn) Alternate English transliteration of Hebrew Simeon. Israelite with foreign wife (Ezra 10:31).

SHIMHI (Shīm' hī) Alternate English transliteration of Shimei (1 Chron. 8:21). See Shimei 11.

SHIMI (Shīm' ī) (KJV, Exod. 6:17). See Shimei 1.

SHIMITE (Shīm' īt) (KJV, Num. 3:21) See Shimeites.

SHIMON (Shi' mōn) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Original ancestor of clan in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

SHIMRATH (Shīm' rāth) Personal name meaning "protection." Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:21).

SHIMRI (Shīm' rī) Personal name meaning "my protection." 1. Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:37). 2. Father of one of David's military heroes (1 Chron. 11:45). 3. Levitical gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:10). 4. Levite in time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:13).

SHIMRITH (Shīm' rīth) Personal name meaning "protection." Moabite mother whose son murdered King Joash in 796 B.C. (2 Chron. 24:26). In the parallel passage Shomer is the parent and appears to be the father (2 Kings 12:21).

SHIMROM (Shīm' rōm) (KJV, 1 Chron. 7:1) or SHIMRON (Shīm' rōn) Personal name and place-name probably meaning "protection." 1. Son of Issachar and original ancestor of clan in that tribe (Gen. 46:13). 2. Canaanite city-state which joined Hazor's northern coalition against Joshua and met defeat (Josh. 11:1). Some commentators think the original name was Shimon and identify it with modern Khirbet Samuniyeh five miles west of Nazareth in the Esdraelon Valley. Others have suggested Marun er-Ras, 10 miles northwest of modern Safed above the Sea of Chinnereth, that is the Sea of Galilee. It was allotted to the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15).

SHIMRON-MERON (Shīm rōn-mē' rōn) Town in list of cities Joshua defeated (Josh. 12:20). Apparently a longer name of Shimron (11:1), though the earliest Greek translation and some commentators see two separate cities here.

SHIMRONITE (Shīm' rōn īt) Member of clan of Shimron (Num. 26:24).

SHIMSHAI (Shīm' shī) Personal name meaning "little sunshine." Scribe who penned letter of Samaritan officials opposing rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple about 537 B.C. (Ezra 4).

SHIN (Shên) Next to last letter of Hebrew alphabet used as title for Ps. 119:161-168 since each verse of the section begins with that letter.

SHINAB (Shi' nâb) Akkadian name meaning "Sin (a god) is father." King of Admah who joined coalition against Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:2), leading eventually to Abraham's rescue of Lot.

SHINAR, PLAIN OF (Shi' nâr) Place-name of uncertain meaning used in various ancient Near Eastern documents apparently with somewhat different localities in mind. Some evidence points to a Syrian district cited as Sanhara in the Amarna letters. Some scholars equate Shinar in Assyrian texts with modern Sinjar west of Mosul in Iraq. Others think a Kassite tribe was meant originally. Whatever its meaning outside the Bible, biblical texts use Shinar as a designation for Mesopotamia (Gen. 10:10). See Mesopotamia.

The tower of Babel was built in Shinar (Gen. 11:2-9). The king of Shinar opposed Abraham (Gen. 14:1). Isaiah prophesied that God would bring out a remnant of His people from Shinar (11:11). Daniel 1:1-2 and probably Zech. 5:11 equate Babylon and Shinar, thus limiting Shinar to its major city in the writers' day.

SHION (Shi' ðn) Modern translations' spelling of Shihon.

SHIPBUILDER See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

A felucca (Egyptian boat) on the Nile River near the city of Cairo, Egypt.

SHIPHI (Shi' phi) Personal name meaning “my overflow.” Member of tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:37).

SHIPMITE (Shiph' mit) Noun indicating either the hometown, native land, or clan from which Zabdi came. Some have suggested town of Shepham (Num. 34:10), but this is far from certain.

SHIPRAH (Shiph' rah) Personal name meaning “beauty.” Midwife for Israel in Egypt who disobeyed Pharaoh because they feared God (Exod. 1:15-21).

SHIPHTAN (Shiph' tán) Personal name meaning “process of justice.” Father of a leader from tribe of Ephraim (Num. 34:24).

SHIPMASTER Captain in charge of a ship (Jon. 1:6; Rev. 18:17).

SHIPS, SAILORS, AND NAVIGATION Travel by sea in biblical times. People first went down to the sea in anything that would keep them afloat. The early development of the two major centers of civilization along the major river systems of the Near Eastern world, the Tigris/ Euphrates and the Nile, was not coincidental. Even though the first boats were punted or towed along the shore, such waterborne transportation and movement of goods facilitated the exchange of local products in more distant markets, first along the riverbanks and then beyond the open seas. From very basic, crude beginnings before 3000 B.C., ship technology and seamanship persistently developed as people strove to overcome the barriers that rivers and seas imposed. Thus Assyrian reliefs depict fishermen afloat on inflated bladders and soldiers lying on them to paddle across the water. In wooded areas the single log or bundle of reeds to support one person soon developed into the raft of bound logs that could support additional personnel and produce. Along the marshy stretches of the Nile, Tigris, and Euphrates, rafts of reed bundles were refined into the reed canoe. The special requirements of rapids and swift waters of the Upper Tigris and Euphrates prompted the development of the buoyed raft, a wooden platform supported on inflated skins that continued in use until very recent times. At the destination downstream, the wooden parts could be disassembled and sold while the deflated skins were easily transported upstream for reuse.

True boats, in their earliest forms, probably consisted of sewn leather stretched and sewn over light frames of branches for ease of transport when necessary. Such boats, essential for river travel, are depicted in detail in Assyrian reliefs between 1000 and 600 B.C. In water free from rocks, such as the Nile Delta where adequate materials for branch frames were lacking, clay tublike boats made their appearance. Where wood was available, the bark canoe (a troughlike strip of bark with clay ends) was followed by the dugout that required a cutting tool or controlled use of fire in its production. Wherever forests supplied the logs from Europe to India, the dugout was familiar to waterways from the Stone Age into the late Roman period. Modified dugouts with heightened sides and interior reinforcements were the prototypes of the planked boats with keel, ribs, and strakes.

Inland Waterways Civilization arose along the two waterways that connected territories in major political units and provided internal transportation.

Boats on Egypt's Nile The Nile provided 750 miles of unobstructed waterway with a current that carried boats from Aswan and the First Cataract to its mouth and prevailing north winds that brought those boats under sail back again. Such ideal conditions that obviously contributed to the development of water travel and transport unfortunately were offset by a lack of lumber. Thus, the Egyptians turned to the abundant reeds along the Nile to create simple rafts. Before 3000 B.C. those Nile rafts had become long slender and pointed vessels outfitted with paddles and steering oars. Modifications included cabins and a growing number of oarsmen. The shape was bowed, or sickle-shaped, with squared prow and stern rising almost vertically from the water. A square sail was set well forward above the reed platform that served its passengers and cargo. The lightweight and shallow draft made such craft most useful in the canals and marshes of the Nile River system.

Shortly after 3000 B.C. these fragile reed boats, reinforced with planks, ferried the massive granite and stone blocks used for the impressive stone architecture that began to grace the Nile's banks. These planked reed boats provided the forms for Egypt's first true boats—flat-bottomed and square-ended. Soon, however, relieved of the bulky reed bundles, Egyptian boats were outfitted with rounded bottom, pointed prow, and rounded stern. Pictorial representations in paintings, reliefs, and models indicate that Nile River craft, primarily constructed of Asia Minor and Lebanon cedar, dramatically grew in size and diversity. Cargo boats 150 feet in length requiring 40 to 50 rowers, and, later, massive 200-by-70-foot barges towed by a fleet of oar-powered tugs, shuttled up and down the Nile to the massive building operations between Aswan and the Delta. Smaller vessels were poled, paddled, or rowed, with some also equipped with a sail.

For international maritime trade, Egypt enjoyed a distinct advantage as the only nation with direct access to both the Mediterranean and the Red Seas. As a result, two long-distance maritime routes to Syria and Punt (East Africa) already were established during the Old Kingdom period. The earliest route to Byblos soon was extended to Cyprus, Crete, and possibly other Aegean sites. The earliest seagoing vessel depicted in a relief dated about 2450 B.C. had a spoon-shaped hull with a long, slender overhanging bow and stern and a rope truss that could be tightened by twisting to compensate for any sagging of bow or stern. The ships of Queen Hatshepsut's fleet trading with the East African coast reflect considerable refinement of the general lines. A two-legged forward mast with a tall, narrow rectangular sail had been replaced by a low, wide sail on a pole mast amidships. A single, massive steering oar had replaced smaller steering oars on each quarter. Fifteen rowers a side (requiring a space of not less than 45 feet) would suggest a vessel about 90 feet in length. By the end of the New Kingdom period, the ships used by Ramses III against the invading Sea Peoples (about 1170 B.C.), as depicted in his reliefs, indicate radical changes in construction. See Egypt.

Mesopotamian Shipping Mesopotamian kings and merchants also operated long-distance maritime routes in the Red Sea and Indian Ocean from several inland cities that were accessible along the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers. By 3000 B.C. overseas trade was a thriving aspect of regional economy. Maritime ventures included royal and private efforts at supplying metals, timber, and luxury items that the Mesopotamian economy lacked.

A clay model of a bowl-like boat, with slight evidence of prow and stern, possibly made of skins and dated about 3400 B.C., is our earliest evidence of Mesopotamian vessels. The existence of a mast and use of sails was possible, though firm evidence of sailing boats comes much later. Earliest representations on seals suggest the use of squared reed crafts similar to Egyptian types. A prevailing north wind and rapids in the Upper Tigris and Euphrates Rivers diminished the development of commercial shipping and the need for larger vessels. As a result, early light craft propelled by paddles or oars gradually evolved into wooden craft with sail as well as oars. The largest vessels appear to carry less than 11 tons with most half that size, usually constructed of edge-joined planks with framing inserted for stability. Square-ended, these boats carried a single sail of cloth or reed matting with the largest powered by 11 oarsmen.

Between 3000 and 2000 B.C. overseas trade with East Africa and India flowed through the Persian Gulf on relatively small seagoing vessels, the largest known with a capacity of only about 28 tons.

International Travel and Trade Sea routes opened opportunities for evolving nations to gain wealth and explore the mysteries of far-off lands.

The Eastern Mediterranean: 3000-1000 B.C. Major developments of maritime travel between 2000 and 1500 B.C. must be attributed to the island world of the Aegean and the coastlines of the eastern Mediterranean. There the Minoans of Crete especially developed an impressive naval fleet and a merchant marine that linked their island world. Ultimately, however, the Mycenaeans—Greeks from the mainland—overpowered Crete, forming an Aegean confederacy. From 1500 to 1200 B.C. they claimed control over the waters of the Eastern Mediterranean.

Cretan ships with their rounded hulls, portrayed on seals about 1500 B.C., were quite distinct from the Aegean straight-lined angular-ended vessels. Though the engravings obviously are stylized, the slender rounded hull, in some cases almost crescent-shaped, supported a pole mast with stays fore and aft and a high square sail. These Cretan vessels with 10 or 15 oars to the side were about 50 and 75 feet in length, respectively. Passenger vessels were outfitted with a cabin or shelter on deck.

An Egyptian wall painting in a 1400 B.C. tomb depicts a Syrian fleet of merchant ships with spoon-shaped hulls, with straight stempost, deck beams through the sides, and a broad square sail very much like Egyptian vessels of the period. (The Egyptian vessels were braced with a rope truss.) The representation of the sailors (their beards, profile, and clothing) clearly suggests their Syrian origin. (It is unlikely, though the evidence comes from Egypt, that these are Egyptian vessels manned by Syrians.) The rounded hulls are best related to Crete from about 1600 B.C. onwards. These merchantmen with their deck and roomy hold grew in size. By about 1200 B.C. an Ugaritic tablet suggests their size in referring to a single shipment of grain of 450 tons.

The war fleets of the Levant in 1200 B.C. were impressive in number and design. The fighting craft lost their spoon-shaped hull that was elongated and rounded. They were undecked with the oarsmen protected behind a high bulwark. The mast with an adjustable sail was crowned with a lookout. The naval battle (depicted on the Medinet Habu temple walls) between Aegean (“Sea Peoples”) and Egyptian ships indicates the clear similarity of construction and design apart from ornamental or cultic aspects. The only offensive weapon appears to be the grappling irons for boarding enemy vessels. Aside from the tactical maneuvering of the vessels, sea battles were fought with bow, sword, and pike as on land. The modification of the bow for ramming appears to have been a later development.

The Eastern Mediterranean: 1000-500 B.C. During this period the Phoenicians gained a reputation as the ablest of seamen and maritime traders. Their primary challenge came from the Greek world where merchantmen and war vessels controlled the northern Mediterranean shoreline and the Black Sea. The low sleek “hollow” hull, with only a scant deck forward for the outlook and a slightly larger one aft for the captain and passengers, was constructed low and long primarily for speed. Several standard-sized galleys included the 20-oared dispatch and local transport, the 30-oared “triaconter” galley, the 50-oared “penteconter” for troop transport, and the 100-oared large transport. They were constructed of oak, poplar, pine, and fir, with the oars and masts of fir. A single, large-bladed steering car was replaced after 800 B.C. by doublesteering oars that became standard thereafter. A single square sail on a mast amidships could be raised and lowered. Sails of sewn patches of woven linen were controlled with lines of twisted papyrus and leather. Other equipment included stern-mooring lines, stone anchors, punting poles, long pikes for fighting, and bags and jars for holding provisions. Screens along the sides could be closed during heavy weather.

The introduction of the ram was a dramatic innovation that revolutionized ship construction. The pointed cutwater for puncturing the hull of the enemy vessel required construction with heavier materials to withstand contact, especially in the bow area. The open or latticed bow area gave way to a cumbersome superstructure for sustaining the ram. This represented the first period of specialization in the construction and class of vessel—the open galley with a lighter hull for carrying dispatches and personnel and the galley with superstructure, including relatively high platforms as fighting stations at bow and stern, for combat. The invention of the twobanked galley soon followed to increase the number of rowers and the speed of the vessel without increasing the length and reducing the seaworthiness of its hull. The Phoenician shipwrights should be credited with many of these important innovations.

The rigging for most war galleys during this period was standard—a single square sail amidships with a retractable mast. After 600 B.C. singlebanked and double-banked galleys appear in all sizes up to 100 oars.

The first Mediterranean merchant ships probably were oar driven. Plagued by calm waters during the summer months when maritime activity probably was at its peak, only oared ships could have provided the reliability and speed required for prompt delivery of merchandise. Later, as the volume of cargo grew, larger seaworthy sailing ships came into use. The merchantman was only slightly modified from the warship design to include a roomier and stronger hull and a sturdier mast for a bigger sail.

Ultimately, however, the sailing ship with a rounded hull and a single square sail became the primary cargo ship from Phoenicia to Italy.

The Age of the Trireme: 500-323 B.C. The galley rowed by three more or less superimposed banks of oarsmen came into vogue after 500 B.C. and maintained its prominence into the later Roman Empire. The additional power and speed required by the ram seemed to outweigh the relatively unseaworthy hull of this oar arrangement. As a result, sea battles were carefully scheduled near land during the mild summer months to avoid adverse weather conditions. While the first two lines of rowers worked their oars through ports in the hull and on a second line on or just below the gunwale, the third line worked from an outrigger projecting laterally above and beyond the gunwale. Corinth appears to have been the first to launch such a fleet sometime after 700 B.C., and a century later it appears to have been accepted generally. Athenian naval records suggest that such ships were built with great care and, despite their fragile construction, remained in service for an average of 20 years. The Phoenician shipwrights increased the height of their vessels to accommodate three-level rowing.

In both Phoenician and Greek navies of the period, the primary innovation was the construction of larger and larger vessels, though the exact nature of oaring is not clearly understood. Generally, the greater power and speed were achieved with longer oars and a double banking of the rowers, while the oversized ships relied on a variety of oaring arrangements. Ramming remained a standard naval tactic, though gradually subordinated to the firing of missiles, the heaving of grapnels, and boarding. Darts and grapnels were fired from catapults at longer range, while short-range battles included archers and the slinging of javelins and stones. Shortly after 200 B.C. the Rhodians introduced the fire pot, slung from long poles (extending over the bow) onto the enemy vessel.

Warships of the Hellenistic Period: 323-31 B.C.

A second- or third-century A.D. drawing of a ship inscribed in Latin, found in Jerusalem excavations.

To complement these larger ships, light vessels such as skiffs with speed and maneuverability made their appearance for express transport and the carrying of dispatches. Some were equipped with rams, while others were intended to disrupt the tactics and break the oars of the larger vessels. Later, the Roman imperial navy would not only add to the variety of vessels, but their architects would introduce significant defensive innovations.

Greek and Roman Shipbuilding The Greco-Roman shipwrights, aware of the ancient Egyptian method of edge-joining planks in the construction of the hull, created their own form of ship carpentry in which they locked the shell of planks together with mortises and then reinforced that hull with interior framing. This method was consistently used in the construction of all vessels from the smallest lake skiff to the largest seaworthy freighters. In larger vessels massive cables for undergirding the ship during emergencies were kept on board. It was usual to smear seams and sometimes the whole hull with pitch or pitch and wax as a protective coating. Though fir, cedar, and pine appear to have been preferred for planking and frames, local availability of lumbers finally determined the choice.

The ancient Mediterranean sailor knew only the side rudder, an oversized oar pivoted in a slanting position near the stern. The pushing or pulling of a tiller bar socketed into the upper part of the loom adjusted the blade of the oar at an angle to the hull and thus maneuvered the ship. A series of ropes with individual functions fitted the mast and sail. Navigational aids were limited and simple. Handbooks with brief notes on distances, landmarks, harbors, and anchorages were available. There are no historical references to the use of charts. Soundings were taken (see Acts 27:28-29). Flags and lights were used for signaling. Anchors were large and numerous.

The ideal sailing season in the Mediterranean was from May 27 to September 14 with an extension to outside limits from March 10 to November 10. As a result, sailing during the late fall and winter was reduced to bare essentials such as the carrying of vital dispatches, the transport of essential supplies, and urgent military movement. The severity of winter storms and the poor visibility due to fog and cloudiness made navigation before the compass most difficult (see Acts 27:12-20).

Mediterranean currents generally are too weak seriously to affect sea travel. However, prevailing wind direction produced a definite pattern with ships traveling in most southerly directions, from Italy or Greece to Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and Africa, anticipating a quick and easy voyage with the aid of northerly winds. The return, on the other hand, was difficult against the prevailing winds, and thus a course near the coastline at times provided quieter waters and periodic shelter. The ancient square-riggers were designed for traveling with the wind astern or on the quarters. Roman ships appear to have logged four and a half to six knots with the wind. Tacking, or using the familiar zigzag course, at best was difficult and slow. When rowing was unavoidable, the oarsmen were divided into squads for rotation or given regular short rest periods.

Organizational structure and rank on the earlier, smaller vessels of the Greek and Roman navy was limited to the commanding officer who manned the helm, the rowing officer who maintained the oarsmen's beat, and the bow officer ("lookout") who was responsible for the course and well-being of the ship. Around 400 B.C., when the Athenian trireme had a crew of 200, the officers numbered five: the executive officer or captain; the commanding officer; the rowing officer, responsible for the training and morale of the oarsmen; subordinate officer, with important administrative duties such as paymaster, purchasing, and recruiting officer; and officer of the bow. Other personnel included the ship's carpenter, flutist (to time the rowers' stroke) or time beater, side chiefs (to set the stroke), deckhands, oar tenders, and ship's doctor, among others. The number of fighting personnel (marines) varied according to strategy: the Athenian ships that relied primarily on the ram had as few as 10; others intent on boarding tactics had as many as 40. A few archers (four to six) usually were on board, together with some catapult operators.

A seagoing merchantman was controlled by its owner or charter, usually with a hired professional captain with total authority over the vessel and its crew (see Acts 27:11). Under way the "sailing master" was usually in command. Two officers were in charge of operations (first mate) and administration (maintenance). The large merchantmen also had quartermasters, carpenters, guards, rowers to man the ship's boats, and others. The sailors generally wore limited or no clothing when aboard ship and wore a tunic but no sandals when ashore.

A wide variety of smaller craft, usually driven by oars and a small auxiliary sail, were prevalent in every harbor to provide various services. River and coastal craft provided towing services and transfer of cargo and merchandise to harbor warehouses and points inaccessible to the larger ships. Man-made harbors with artificial sea walls to create protected anchorage appear before 700 B.C. Gradually, quays, warehouses, and defensive towers were added to create a secure commercial port. By 400 B.C. the Piraeus harbor was surrounded by an extensive covered emporium to facilitate the handling of import and export merchandise. By Roman times both sea and river were well endowed with harbors, with smaller ports benefiting from coastal shipping by becoming distribution centers for inland areas removed from major land routes. Unfortunately the decline of the late Roman Empire and political weakness with a recurrence of piracy on the high seas led to a marked decline of commercial shipping in the Mediterranean. With the ultimate fragmentation of the Roman Empire, barbarian invasions in the east, and the shift of the economic center to the west, the Mediterranean, devoid of large ships, slowly was reduced to small local craft with minimal economic impact beyond the patron port.

SHIRT Modern translation of “coat” in some passages, reflecting Greek chiton, garment that both sexes wore next to the skin. See Cloth, Clothing.

SHISHA (Shī' shā) Personal name or, more likely, an official title borrowed from Egyptian: royal scribe who writes letters. Apparently, “sons of Shisha” (1 Kings 4:3) refers to members of a scribal guild. Sheva (2 Sam. 20:25) and Shavsha (1 Chron. 18:16) may represent other ways to transliterate the Egyptian title into Hebrew.

SHISHAK (Shī' shāk) Egyptian royal name of unknown meaning. A pharaoh of Egypt known also as Sheshonk I. He ruled about 945-924 B.C. and founded the 22nd Dynasty. Just after Rehoboam began to reign in Judah, Shishak invaded Jerusalem and carted off the temple treasures (1 Kings 14:25-26). According to inscriptions on the walls of a temple to the god Anion in Karnak, Shishak captured over 150 towns in Palestine including Megiddo, Taanash, and Gibeon. Some equate him with the pharaoh whose daughter married Solomon (3:1) and who later burned Gezer and gave it to his daughter (9:16). See Egypt.

SHITRAI (Shīt' rā ī) Personal name, perhaps meaning “minor official.” Official in charge of David's grazing animals in Sharon (1 Chron. 27:29). Early Hebrew scribes noted the spelling as “Shirtai.”

SHITTAH TREE KJV spelling of Shittim tree (Isa. 41:19). See Shittim.

SHITTIM (Shīt' tim) Transliteration of Hebrew word for acacia trees. 1. Name of a large area in Moab directly across the Jordan from Jericho and northeast of the Dead Sea. Israel camped there for a long period before crossing into the promised land. While at Shittim, they were blessed by Balaam (whom Balak had hired to curse Israel; Num. 22-24; cp. Mic. 6:5), committed sin with the Moabite and Midianite women (Num. 25), and Joshua was announced as Moses' successor (Deut. 34:9). Joshua sent spies out from Shittim (Josh. 2:1; cp. 3:1). It is modern Tell el-Hammam es Samri about eight miles east of the Jordan. 2. In Joel 3:18 the symbolic meaning of acacias (note NASB) comes to the fore in the messianic picture of fertility for the Kidron Valley with a stream flowing from the temple.

SHIZA (Shi' za) Abbreviated personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of tribe of Reuben in time of David (1 Chron. 11:42).

SHOA (Sho' a) National name meaning “help!” Nation God used to punish His people (Ezek. 23:23). They are usually identified with the Sutu, a nomadic people from the Syrian and Arabian Deserts known from documents from Mari, Amarna, and Assyria. Some commentators see them mentioned in Isa. 22:5, where most translate “crying.”

SHOBAB (Sho' bab) Personal name meaning “one brought back” or “fallen away, rebel.” 1. Son of David (2 Sam. 5:14). 2. Son of Caleb and ancestor of clan in tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:18).

SHOBACH (Shō' bāk) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Commander of Syrian army under Hadad-ezer killed by David's troops in battle (2 Sam. 10:16,18). The name appears as Shophak in Chron. 19:16,18.

SHOBAI (Shō' bāi) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Head of family of gatekeepers (Ezra 2:42).

SHOBAL (Shō' bāl) Personal name probably meaning "lion." 1. Son of Seir and ruler in Edom (Gen. 36:20,23,29). 2. Son of Caleb and founder of Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron. 2:50), listed under sons of Judah (1 Chron. 4:1), possibly an indication of "son of" denoting belonging to a tribe.

SHOBEK (Shō' bēk) Personal name meaning "victor." Jewish leader who signed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:24).

SHOBI (Shō' bī) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Ammonite who helped David as he fled across Jordan from Absalom (2 Sam. 17:27).

SHOCHO or SHOCHOH Alternate spelling of Soco or Socoh.

SHOHAM (Shō' hām) Personal name meaning "gem." Levite in time of David (1 Chron. 24:27).

SHOMER (Shō' mēr) Personal name meaning "protector." 1. Father of one of the murderers of King Joash (2 Kings 12:21). See Shimrith. 2. See Shemer 2.

SHOPHAN (Shō' phān) KJV interpretation of separate town. Modern translations have compound name. See Atroth-shophan.

SHOPHAR (Shō' phār) Hebrew word for the ceremonial ram's horn used to call the people of Israel together (Exod. 19:16). The shophar was to be blown on the Day of Atonement in the Jubilee Year to signal the release of slaves and debt. It also was used as a trumpet of war as the Israelites were campaigning against their enemies. See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

SHOSHANNIM (Shó shǎn' ním) Transliteration of Hebrew word meaning “lotuses.” Technical term used in titles of Pss. 45; 60; 69; 80. It may be the title of a melody, a flower used in a ceremony seeking a word from God, designation of a love song later expanded in meaning, or indication of a six-stringed instrument. See Lily of the Covenant.

SHOSHANNIM-EDUTH (Shó' shǎn' ním-e' düth) Term in titles of Pss. 60; 80. “Eduth” means “witness” or “laws.” Its implication in the psalm titles is not clear. See Shoshannim; Lily of the Covenant.

SHOULDERPIECE Translation of Hebrew word meaning “shoulder, upper arm, side.” The straps were going over the shoulder so the high priest could wear the ephod (Exod. 28:7).

SHOVEL Instrument used to remove ashes from the altar (Exod. 27:3).

SHRINE Small building devoted to the worship of a particular deity, usually with an image of that god. Sometimes shrines were located in larger temples, set apart by a partition or niche in a wall. An Ephraimite, Micah, had a shrine in Israel during the days of the judges (Judg. 17:5). He hired a Levite to administer worship at the site. Later, shrines were seen as pagan (2 Kings 17:29). King Josiah had them demolished during his reign (2 Kings 23:19). The Apostle Paul confronted the silversmith Demetrius with his sin of selling shrines of the goddess Artemis (Acts 19:21-27). See Artemis; High Place.

SHROUD Linen burial cloth. Shrouds usually were very long pieces of cloth that were wound around the body. As the winding was done, spices were placed within the folds of the shroud. After His crucifixion, Jesus' body was so buried by Joseph of Arimathea and the women disciples (Matt. 27:59-61). In one recorded instance, a shroud was worn as a garment (Mark 14:51-52).

SHUA (Shū' ā) Personal name meaning “help!” 1. Father-in-law of Judah (Gen. 38:2; 1 Chron. 2:3). 2. Woman descended from Asher (1 Chron. 7:32), with slightly different Hebrew spelling.

SHUAH (Shū' ah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “sunken.” 1. Son of Abraham (Gen. 25:2) and possibly thought of as original ancestor of the Suhu mentioned in Assyrian sources as living on the Euphrates River below the mouth of the Chabur. 2. Home of Job's friend Bildad (Job 2:11), possibly to be identified with people mentioned in 1. or with an otherwise unknown tribe in the Syrian and Arabian Deserts, perhaps an offshoot of 1.

SHUAL (Shū' al) Personal name and placename meaning “jackal.” 1. Descendant of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36). 2. Territory that a biblical writer used to describe the path that a group of Philistines took against Saul (1 Sam. 13:17). Some would identify it with the land of Shaalim (1 Sam. 9:4). The location is uncertain.

SHUBAEL (Shū' bā ēl) See Shebuel.

SHUHAH (Shū' hāh) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Brother or, according to some manuscript evidence, the son of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:11). Some commentators connect the name to Suchati known from Egyptian sources and think of a forefather of a nomadic clan who lived in the Negev.

SHUHAM (Shū' hām) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Dan (Num. 26:42). See Hushim.

SHUHAMITE (Shū' hām īt) Member of clan of Shuham (Num. 26:42).

SHUHITE (Shū' hīt) Person from Shuah.

SHULAMITE (Shū' lām īt) or SHULAMMITE

Description of woman in Song 6:13, either as from Shunem through a copying change; or from Shulam, an otherwise unknown town; or Solomonite, referring to a relationship to Solomon; or a common noun meaning “the replaced one.”

SHUMATHITE (Shu' mǎth ít) Clan name of uncertain meaning descended from Caleb (1 Chron. 2:53).

SHUNEM, SHUNAMMITE (Shū' nēm, Shū' nām mīt) Place-name and clan name of uncertain meaning. Town in tribe of Issachar located southeast of Mount Carmel. The site was captured by the Egyptian pharaoh Thutmose III about 1450 B.C., again by Labayu of Shechem about 1350 B.C., and rebuilt by Biridya of Megiddo. The Israelites controlled it under Joshua (Josh. 19:18). The Philistines camped at Shunem while fighting with Saul (1 Sam. 28:4,7). About 920 B.C. the Egyptian pharaoh Shishak captured the town. See Shishak. As David lay dying, Abishag the Shunammite was hired to minister to the king (1 Kings 1:3; cp. 2:17). The Prophet Elisha stayed often at the home of a Shunammite couple, prophesied that a son would be born to them, and raised the boy from the dead after an accident in the field (2 Kings 4). It is modern Solem, about eight miles north of Jenin and three miles east of Affulah. See Abishag.

SHUNI (Shū' nī) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Gad and head of a clan in that tribe (Gen. 46:16).

SHUNITE (Shū' nīt) Member of clan of Shuni (Num. 26:15).

SHUPHAM (Shū' phām) Personal name of uncertain meaning reconstructed by scholars as son of Benjamin on basis of the clan name Shuphamite (Num. 26:39). The personal name in Hebrew is "Muppim" in Genesis and "Shephupham" in Numbers. In 1 Chron. 7:6 the name is absent, but in 7:12,15 "Shupim" occurs.

SHUPHAMITE (Shū' phām ít) Member of Benjaminite clan of Shupham or Shephupham. See Shephupham; Shupham.

SHUPPIM (Shūp' pīm) Personal name of uncertain meaning and plural form in Hebrew. Apparently a son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:12) but related to Machir in verse 15. The Chronicles texts apparently have experienced loss of words through copying. REB emends the text so that Shuppim is not included. See Shupham.

SHUR, WILDERNESS OF (Shur) Place-name meaning “wall.” Region on Egypt's northeastern border, perhaps named after wall that Egyptians built to protect their border, where Moses made first stop after crossing the Red Sea (Exod. 15:22). Earlier, Sarah's handmaid, Hagar, had come toward Shur after her expulsion from the clan of Abraham (Gen. 16:7). Abraham lived near Shur (Gen. 20:1). Saul smote the Amalekites in that area (1 Sam. 15:7). David and his men made forays as far as Shur while eluding King Saul (1 Sam. 27:8). Shur may be modern Tell el-Fara.

The Wilderness of Shur.

SHUSHAN (Shu' shān) Persian place-name transcribed in Hebrew with word borrowed from Egyptian meaning “lily” or “lotus.” City in southwestern Iran which served as the ancient capital of the nation Elam. The site was inhabited as early as 3000 B.C. It was located on the caravan routes between Arabia and points north and west, and therefore it became a very rich city. Archaeological evidence indicates that Shushan traded heavily with nations in Mesopotamia. In Esther 1:2 the city is identified as the throne city of Ahasuerus and called Susa by modern translations. The Achaemenean Dynasty between 500 and 300 B.C. took Shushan to its height politically and economically. It served as the king's winter residence; they moved to Ecbatana in summer. During periods of Seleucid and Parthian rule, it declined and finally was destroyed in the fourth century A.D. See Elam; Persia.

SHUTHALHITE (Shū thāl' hī) Member of clan of Shuthelah (Num. 26:35).

SHUTHELA(H)ITE (Shū thē' lā hī) Modern translations' spelling of ShuthalHITE.

SHUTHELAH (Shū' thə lah) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Original ancestor of clan in tribe of Ephraim (Num. 26:35).

SHUTTLE See Loom.

SIA (Sī' ā) Personal name meaning “helper.” Family of temple servants or Nethinim (KJV, Nethinims) (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47). See Nethinim.

SIAHA (Sī' ā hā) Personal name meaning “helpers of God.” Temple servants (Ezra 2:44). This is apparently a variant spelling of Sia.

SIBBECAI (Sīb' ə kī) or SIBBECHAI Personal name of uncertain meaning. Member of David's army who killed a giant or, more literally, a descendant of the Rephaim (2 Sam. 21:18 REB). First Chronicles 11:29 lists him among David's military heroes, leading many commentators to see Sibbecai as the original reading for Mebunnai in 2 Sam. 23:27 resulting from a confusion of Hebrew letters by early scribes. Sibbecai commanded David's forces for the eighth month (1 Chron. 27:11).

SIBBOLETH (Sīb' bō lēth) See Shibboleth.

SIBLING RIVALRY Tensions and fighting among brothers or sisters including Cain and Abel (Gen. 4:1-16); Shem, Ham, and Japheth (Gen. 9:20-27); Jacob and Esau (Gen. 25:22-28:9; 32:1-33:17; Mal. 1:2-3); Leah and Rachel (Gen. 29:16-30:24); Joseph and his brothers (Gen. 37; 39-45); Er and Onan (Gen. 38:1-10); Moses, Aaron, and Miriam (Num. 12:1-15);

Abimelech and Jotham (Judg. 9:1-57); David and Eliab (1 Sam. 17:28-30); Absalom and Amnon (2 Sam. 13:1-39); and Solomon and Adonijah (1 Kings 1:5-53). In each case one, or usually both, of the siblings attempts to gain status or favor over the other.

Families are given by God (Ps. 127:3) and are not, like friends, chosen by their members. The physical and emotional proximity of family members is characteristically quite close. The potential for sibling rivalry is built into the family dynamic, as the writer of Proverbs understood: “A friend loves at all times, and a brother is born for a difficult time” (Prov. 17:17 HCSB; 18:24; Matt. 10:21). The psalmist praised the goodness and pleasantness of brothers who are able to dwell together in unity (Ps. 133:1-3).

SIBMAH (Sib' mah) Place-name meaning “cold” or “high.” City tribe of Reuben rebuilt in Transjordan (Num. 32:38). It became part of their tribal inheritance (Josh. 13:19). Isaiah mentioned it in his lament over Moab (16:8-9; cp. Jer. 48:32). “Sebam” (Num. 32:3) is often seen as a copyist's change from Sibmah. It may be located at Khirbet al-qibsh about three miles east-northeast of Mount Nebo and three miles southwest of Hesban.

SIBRAIM (Sib' rä im) Place-name of uncertain meaning. Apparently the northern border between Damascus and Hamath. Some would identify it with Sepharvaim (2 Kings 17:24). The precise location is not known.

SICKLE Curved blade of flint or metal used to cut stalks of grain. Sickles varied in size and handle length but usually had a short wooden handle that required the user to bend near the ground to harvest the crop. They are among the oldest tools known by humans, dating to 8500 B.C. Biblical texts often used the sickle symbolically to speak of coming judgment. Revelation 14 uses the analogy of Christ reaping the harvest of mankind at the great judgment. See Agriculture.

SIDDIM (Sīd' dīm) Place-name, perhaps meaning “flats” or “fields.” A variant name for the Dead Sea where the coalition faced Chedorlaomer and his allies, leading to Abraham's rescue of Lot (Gen. 14). The reference is apparently to the land bordering the Dead Sea. Some think the Hebrew should be read “Shadim” and interpreted as a reference to the Valley of Demons.

SIDON AND TYRE (Sī' dōn, Tīr) Phoenician cities located on the coastal plain between the mountains of Lebanon and the Mediterranean Sea (Gen. 10:15). Sidon and Tyre were ancient cities, having been founded long before the Israelites entered the land of Canaan. Extrabiblical sources first mention Sidon before 2000 B.C. and Tyre just after 2000 B.C. While Sidon seems to have been the more dominant of the two cities during the early part of their histories, Tyre assumed this role in the latter times. Both cities were known for their maritime exploits and as centers of trade. One of Tyre's most coveted exports was purple dye. Joshua could not conquer the territory (Josh. 13:3-4).

Israel had relations with the two cities, but especially with Tyre. David employed Tyrian stonemasons and carpenters and used cedars from that area in building a palace (2 Sam. 5:11). The construction of the temple in Jerusalem during Solomon's reign depended heavily on the materials and craftsmen from Tyre. About 870 B.C. Ahab married Jezebel, the daughter of the Phoenician king, bringing Baal worship to Israel's court. Ezekiel 28 characterizes the king of Tyre as the ultimate example of pride. Under Roman rule the two cities were important ports of trade, but they did not enjoy the dominance they previously held. Jesus spent time in Tyre and Sidon and, differing with the prophets' attitude toward the cities, He contrasted them with the Jews as examples of faith (Matt. 11:20-22). Paul spent seven days in Tyre after his third missionary journey (Acts 21:3-4).

SIEGE Battle tactic in which an army surrounds a city and cuts off all supplies so that the enemy army is forced to surrender for lack of food and water. Deuteronomy 28:53-57 described the horrible actions to which siege leads (cp. Jer. 19:9). Ezekiel 4 describes the prophet's symbolic act of building a miniature city of Jerusalem under siege. Preparing for siege, a city stored water inside the city walls and repaired the walls (Nah. 3:14). One response was to “gather up your goods and flee the country” (Jer. 10:17 REB). To remain under siege was to “give yourselves over to die by hunger and by thirst” (2 Chron. 32:11 NASB). This was the major tactic used in Near Eastern wars. Judah suffered siege from Sennacherib (2 Kings 18-19) and from Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 24-25).

Hippodrome at Tyre, the largest hippodrome in the Roman Empire.

SIEGEWORKS Platforms or towers an army built around and above the city walls of a city under siege. This allowed the besieging army to shoot arrows and throw missiles of war down into the city. Israel's law did not allow fruit trees to be cut down to build such platforms (Deut. 20:19-20). Ramps built up to the city walls allowed soldiers to attack the walls and to shoot fire arrows and other weapons into the city. Scaling ladders lifted armies over the walls into the city. Battering rams destroyed city gates. Fires at the base of the walls weakened the sandstone bricks. Tunnels dug under the walls further weakened them. Thus the population's emotions were drained, its supplies were exhausted, and its defenses destroyed.

SIEVE Instrument used to remove unwanted materials from sand or grain. Pebbles or straw remain in the sieve, while the sand or grain passes through. God warned Israel He would place them in a sieve of judgment and none would fall through, for none of them were good grain (Amos 9:9). Another Hebrew word traditionally translated “sieve” in Isa. 30:28 refers to a swinging action. Precisely what is swung is not clear, the noun coming from the same root as the verb. In some manner Isaiah proclaimed God's judgment would swing over His people.

SIGN Symbol, action, or occurrence that points to something beyond itself. In the OT signs occasionally refer to celestial phenomena such as the lights God spoke into existence as “signs for festivals and for days and years” (Gen. 1:14 HCSB). Often signs refer to miraculous intervention by God. They can point observers to knowledge of God, such as the events of the exodus (Deut. 4:34). Signs can reinforce faith through remembrance of His mighty deeds, such as memorial stones from the Jordan that were to be “a sign among you” (Josh. 4:6). Signs can also point to God's covenant with His people. These include the rainbow (Gen. 9:12), circumcision (Gen. 17:11), the Sabbath (Exod. 31:13), and the wearing of phylacteries on the wrist and forehead (Deut. 6:8; 11:18).

One of the most significant OT uses of “sign” is an attestation that a prophetic message was from God. One example is the staff of Moses becoming a serpent and his hand becoming leprous, then whole again (Exod. 4:8-9). In Ezek. 12:6 the prophet himself is a sign to the house of Israel by carrying his baggage as a symbol of the prophesied exile. The presence of signs alone is not sufficient to guarantee that a prophet speaks God's word. Deuteronomy 13:1-5 states that after a sign is given, the prophet could still prophesy falsely. His message must be tested by its truth.

Of particular interest is the sign of the virgin's conception in Isa. 7:14. The fulfillment of this prophecy is apparently double, the first occurring with a conception and birth in Isaiah's time as a symbol of God's deliverance of Judah. The ultimate fulfillment is in the coming virginborn Messiah, Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:20-23).

In the NT “sign” is usually translated from the Greek word semeion. Semeion occurs over 70 times in the NT, mostly in the Gospels and Acts, seven times in Paul's letters, two in Hebrews, and six in Revelation. Semeion can refer to a natural event, but more often it refers either to a miraculous act authenticating God's activity or to an eschatological sign pointing to the final culmination of history.

Luke records signs at the birth of Jesus. The “baby wrapped snugly in cloth” (HCSB) was a sign to the shepherds that verified the angels' announcement (Luke 2:12), and Simeon prophesied that Jesus Himself was a sign, one to be opposed by many (Luke 2:34).

While signs can point to God's work, Jesus condemned the demand for signs to prove God was working through Him. When the scribes and Pharisees requested a sign from Jesus, He responded that signs were craved by “an evil and adulterous generation” (Matt. 12:39 HCSB). The only sign they would be given was the sign of Jonah, a reference to His death and resurrection. In the Gospel of John, Jesus tells those following Him after the feeding of the 5,000, “You are looking for Me, not because you saw signs, but because you ate the loaves and were filled” (John 6:26). They physically saw the signs Jesus performed but did not perceive their significance that He was the Son of God.

In John's Gospel semeion is used for the miracles of Jesus as well as other attestations of His deity. John's use of “sign” for miracle puts the focus on what the miracle signifies rather than upon the supernatural act itself. That significance is the identity of Jesus and the work of God through Him.

In Acts “sign” is used to refer to God's activity in the OT (Acts 7:36) and in Jesus (2:22; 4:30). Additionally, signs occur to attest God's activity in and through the apostles. After Pentecost “many wonders and signs were being performed through the apostles” (2:43, HCSB; 5:12; Heb. 2:4). The ministries of Philip (Acts 8:6; 8:13) and Paul (14:3; 15:12) were authenticated by signs.

Paul refers to Abraham's circumcision as a sign and seal of the righteousness of his faith (Rom. 4:11). Signs were also an indicator of God's presence in Paul's ministry (Rom. 15:19; 2 Cor. 12:12). He echoed Jesus: “Jews ask for signs and the Greeks seek wisdom, but we preach Christ crucified” (1 Cor. 1:22-23 HCSB). Tongues were identified as a sign to unbelievers (1 Cor. 14:22). He told the Philippians their firmness in persecution was a sign of destruction to persecutors and a sign of their salvation (Phil. 1:27-28). Paul warned that the “lawless one” will come “based on Satan's working, with all kinds of false miracles, signs, and wonders” (2 Thess. 2:9; cp. Deut. 13:2).

Jesus warned against signs produced by false prophets preceding His second coming (Matt. 24:24) but also spoke of signs of His coming and the end of the age (Matt. 24:30; Luke 21:11,25). Similarly, Peter quoted Joel at Pentecost, “I will display wonders in the heaven above and signs on the earth below” (Acts 2:19 HCSB). Revelation 12 includes the eschatological signs of the “woman clothed with the sun” (Rev. 12:1) and the “great fiery red dragon” (12:3). Over half the references to signs in Revelation are referring to those performed by the beast who comes out of the earth and the false prophet (13:13-14; 16:14; 19:20).

Signs can be a verification of the presence and power of God at work in circumstances or in His people. Signs can point to the second coming of Christ. Signs can also be counterfeited and be present with those who deceive. While signs can and do point to God and to Christ, they are inadequate to bring anyone to saving faith.

SIGNET Usually a ring with a seal carefully crafted upon it that an important or rich person used to authenticate a document. It was used much like a signature on a document today. The ring of kings would carry the highest authority in a land and empowered subordinates to act for the king. Examples of such rings in the Bible are: Pharaoh's ring given to Joseph (Gen. 41:42); Ahasuerus' ring given to Haman and then to Mordecai after Haman was hanged (Esther 3:10,12; 8:2); King Darius's sealing the den of lions after Daniel was thrown into it (Dan. 6:17). The signet could be worn on a chain around the neck. In an unusual use of the word, Zerubbabel is said to be “a signet” because the Lord had chosen him (Hag. 2:23). Zerubbabel was granted Yahweh's authority, and thus completion of the temple was guaranteed. Another unusual use of the word was the special engraving of the stones on the ephod of the high priest “as a gem cutter engraves a seal” (Exod. 28:11 HCSB). See Seal.

SIHON (Sī' hōn) Amorite personal name of unknown meaning. Amorite king whose capital was Heshbon (Deut. 2:26). He opposed Israel's passage through his country as they journeyed toward the promised land (Num. 21:23). Although he allied with Og, king of Bashan, neither could withstand the Hebrew migration. The tribes of Reuben and Gad settled in the area formerly held by Sihon, just east of the Jordan River.

SILAS, SILVANUS (Sī' lās, Sil vā' nūs) Apparently, the Greek and Latin forms of the same name, possibly derived from Aramaic or Hebrew name "Saul." Leader in the early Jerusalem church. He accompanied both Peter and Paul on separate missionary journeys. One of his first missions was to carry news of the Jerusalem conference to the believers at Antioch (Acts 15:22). He and Paul left Antioch together on a mission to Asia Minor (15:40-41) and later to Macedonia. In Philippi the two were imprisoned (16:19-24), but they later won the jailer and his family to the Lord after God delivered them from prison. Later in his ministry Silas teamed with Peter on missions in Pontus and Cappadocia. He also served as Peter's scribe, writing the first letter from Peter and perhaps other letters. Many believe that he composed and arranged most of the letter since Peter probably had little education. See Paul; Peter, First Letter from.

SILENCE Absence of sound. The Bible uses silence in several ways: as reverence to God (Hab. 2:20), as a symbol of death (Ps. 94:17), as a symbol of Sheol (Ps. 115:17), and as an expression of despair (Lam. 2:10). It is a way to shut up the opposition (Matt. 22:34). It is also used as a dramatic pause following the opening of the seventh seal in Rev. 8:1.

SILK Cloth made from thread that came from the Chinese silkworm. Very early China and India traded silk, and India also traded with Mesopotamia. Some think that Solomon may have gotten silk from India. Some feel that the Hebrew word translated "silk" should rather be "fine linen" or “expensive material” (Ezek. 16:10; Prov. 31:22), the Hebrew indicating something glistening white. Revelation 18:12 indicates that the rich in Babylon bought silk from merchants.

SILLA (SIL' lā) House of Millo in which King Joash was murdered by his servants was said to be “on the way that goes down to Silla” (2 Kings 12:20 NRSV). Silla is an unknown place, perhaps near Jerusalem. See Millo.

SILOAM (Sī lō' ūm) Greek place-name possibly derived from Hebrew “Shiloah,” meaning “sending.” Place easily confused with the waters of Shiloah mentioned in Isa. 8:6 through similarity of spelling. Siloam was the pool created by Hezekiah's tunnel that diverted the waters of Shiloah from the Siloam spring to a point less vulnerable to the Assyrian enemy. It was located on the southern end of the old Jebusite city of Jerusalem. Thus, Siloam is to be distinguished from the King's Pool mentioned in Neh. 3:15. Hezekiah's inscription preserved on the tunnel wall describes the meeting of tunnel builders boring through rock from each end of the tunnel.

John 9:7,11 uses the etymological significance of the term “Siloam” for a play on words to press the point that the blind man was “sent” to Siloam by one who was Himself the One who was “sent.” To gain his sight, the blind man went to and obeyed the One who was sent. Luke 13:4 is a reference more to an unknown tower at Siloam than to Siloam. The tower may have been an aborted effort to protect the water supply. The theological issue of Luke 13 does not hinge on the geographical issue of Siloam. The pool, created by Hezekiah and known by Jesus, is still a source of water today. See Jerusalem; King's Pool. John R. Drayer

SILVANUS (SIL vā' nūs) See Silas, Silvanus.

SILVER Comparatively scarce precious metal with a brilliant white color and remarkably resistant to oxidation. It melts at 960.8° C (1,861° F). Biblical references often refer to the process of refining silver (1 Chron. 29:4; Ps. 12:6; Prov. 17:3; Ezek. 22:20-22). It is so malleable that it is beaten into sheets as thin as 0.00025 mm. Until about 500 B.C., silver was the most valuable metal in the Near East. Thus, in most of the OT it is given a priority over gold. Only in Chronicles and Daniel is gold considered to have more worth. Hence the analogy that in Jerusalem silver was as common as stone (1 Kings 10:27; 2 Chron. 9:27) is reflective of the lavish wealth of Solomon's empire. Coins were first minted after 700 B.C., but weight continued to be the most common standard of determining value. In the NT period, the drachma, a silver coin, was required for the temple tax. Figuratively, refining silver is used in the Bible for testing human hearts (Ps. 66:10; Isa. 48:10; cp. 1 Cor. 3:10-15) and the purity of God's word (Ps. 12:6). Wisdom is declared to be of more value than silver (Job 28:10-15; Prov. 3:13-14; 8:10,19; 16:16). See Coins; Gold; Minerals and Metals; Money. LeBron Matthews

SILVERSMITH Person who works with silver. It could be in refining the silver from the ore or the making of the refined silver into the finished product. Silver was used for money and religious images (Judg. 17:4). It was used in making many of the utensils used in the tabernacle and temple (Num. 7:13). The only mention of silversmiths in the NT was a dispute with Paul where his preaching was threatening their livelihood (Acts 19:23-41). See Occupations and Professions.

SIMEON (Sim' ə ðn) Personal name meaning “hearing” or possibly, “little hyena beast.” 1. One of Jacob's 12 sons, the second by Leah (Gen. 29:33). He joined Levi in avenging Dinah's rape by Shechem (Gen. 34:25-31). Joseph kept Simeon bound in Egypt to ensure that he would see Benjamin (Gen. 42:24). See Jacob; Tribes of Israel. 2. Devout Jew who lived in Jerusalem during the time of Jesus' birth. He was seeking the fulfillment of messianic prophecy when Israel would be restored (Luke 2:25). God promised Simeon that he would not die before seeing the Christ. When Joseph and Mary brought Jesus to the temple for the purification rites, Simeon announced to them God's plan for the boy (2:34). 3. Ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:30). 4. Prophet and teacher in church at Antioch (Acts 13:1). 5. Alternate form in Greek for Simon, original Greek name of Peter. See Peter; Simon.

SIMEONITES (Sim' ə ðnɪts) People of the tribe of Simeon, the second son of Jacob and Leah (Gen. 29:33).

SIMILITUDE “Likeness” or “similarity.” 1. The OT used it of things being like God. Three words are translated “similitude” in the OT: demut (2 Chron. 4:3; Dan. 10:16), tabnit (Pss. 106:20; 144:12), and temunah (Num. 12:8; Deut. 4:12). 2. In the NT it is used to translate homoios or its derivative three times (Rom. 5:14; Heb. 7:15; James 3:9: “likeness” or “like,” HCSB).

SIMMAGIR See Samgar-Nebo.

SIMON (Si' mɔn) Greek personal name meaning “flat-nosed.” Used in NT as Greek alternative for Hebrew “Simeon.” 1. The father of Judas Iscariot (John 6:71). 2. One of Jesus' disciples; a son of Jonah (Matt. 16:17) and brother of Andrew. After he confessed Jesus as the Christ, the Lord changed his name to Peter (v. 18). See Peter; Simeon. 3. Pharisee who hosted Jesus at a dinner (Luke 7:36-50). Simon learned valuable lessons about love, courtesy, and forgiveness after a sinful woman anointed Jesus at this event.

4. Native of Cyrene who was forced to carry Jesus' cross to Golgotha (Mark 15:21). See Cyrene. 5. Tanner of animal skins who lived in the seaport of Joppa. Peter stayed at his house (Acts 9:43) and there received a visionary message from God declaring all foods to be fit for consumption (10:9-16). 6. Jesus' disciple also called "the Canaanite" (Matt. 10:4) or the Zealot (Luke 6:15). 7. Brother of Jesus (Matt. 13:55). 8. Leper who hosted Jesus and saw a woman anoint Jesus with costly ointment (Matt. 26:6-13; cp. 3. above). 9. Magician from Samaria who believed Philip's preaching, was baptized, and then tried to buy the power of laying on hands and giving the Holy Spirit to people (Acts 8:9-24).

SIMPLE, SIMPLICITY Very similar to sincerity. A simple person is one who is open, honest, and direct, without hypocrisy. Sometimes there is the idea of uneducated, inexperienced, or unsophisticated. Simplicity is associated with ideas like integrity (2 Sam. 15:11), without evil (Rom. 16:18), generosity (Rom. 12:8), a life of devotion to God (2 Cor. 1:12), and simply believing the gospel truth (2 Cor. 11:3). God is said to "preserve" the simple (Ps. 116:6). Proverbs is filled with sayings about the simple, both good and bad (1:22; 14:15,18; 21:11). See Sincerity.

SIN Actions by which humans rebel against God, miss His purpose for their life, and surrender to the power of evil rather than to God.

Sin as Rebellion One of the central affirmations throughout the Bible is humanity's estrangement from God. The cause for this estrangement is sin, the root cause of all the problems of humanity. The Bible, however, gives no formal definition for sin. It describes sin as an attitude that personifies sin as rebellion against God. Rebellion was at the root of the problem for Adam and Eve (Gen. 3) and has been at the root of humanity's plight ever since.

Sin is universal—we all sin. The Bible does not give a complete account of the origin of sin. God is in no way responsible for sin. Satan introduced sin when he beguiled Eve, but the Bible does not teach that sin had its origin with him either. Sin's origin is to be found in humanity's rebellious nature. Since Adam and Eve rebelled against the clear command of God, sin has infected humanity like a dread malignancy.

Some passages such as Ps. 51:5 and Eph. 2:3 could be interpreted to mean that this sinful nature is inherited. Other passages seem to affirm that sin is due to human choice (Ezek. 18:4,19-20; Rom. 1:18-20; 5:12). Humanity both inherits a sinful nature and every person is indeed responsible for his/her choice of sin.

Another possibility for understanding how sin has infected all of humanity may be found in the biblical understanding of the solidarity of the human race. This understanding of the human situation would say that when Adam rebelled against God, he incorporated all of his descendants in his action (Heb. 7:9-10 for a similar analogy). This view certainly does not eliminate the necessity for each individual to accept full responsibility for sinful acts.

Adam and Eve introduced sin into human history by their rebellious actions. The Bible affirms that every person who has lived since has followed their example. Whatever else one may say about sin's origin, this much is surely affirmed throughout the Bible.

The Bible Views Sin from Various Perspectives One concept of sin in the OT is that of transgression of the law. God established the law as a standard of righteousness; any violation of this standard is defined as sin. Deuteronomy 6:24-25 is a statement of this principle from the perspective that a person who keeps the law is righteous. The implication is that the person who does not keep the law is not righteous, that is, is sinful.

Another concept of sin in the OT is as breach of the covenant. God made a covenant with the nation of Israel; they were bound by this covenant as a people (Exod. 19; 24; Josh. 24). Each year on the Day of Atonement, the nation went through a covenant renewal. When the high priest consecrated the people by sprinkling them with the blood of the atoning sacrifice, they renewed their vows to the Lord to be a covenant-keeping people. Any breach of this covenant was viewed as sin (Deut. 29:19-21.)

The OT also pictures sin as a violation of the righteous nature of God. As the righteous and holy God, He sets forth as a criterion for His people a righteousness like His own (Lev. 11:45). Any deviation from God's own righteousness is viewed as sin.

The OT has a rich vocabulary for sin. Chits.' means "to miss the mark," as does the Greek hamartia. The word could be used to describe a person shooting a bow and arrow and missing the target with the arrow. When it is used to describe sin, it means that the person has missed the mark that God has established for the person's life.

Aven describes the crooked or perverse spirit associated with sin. Sinful persons have perverted their spirits and become crooked rather than straight. Ra' describes the violence associated with sin. It also has the connotation of the breaking out of evil. Sin is the opposite of righteousness or moral straightness in the OT.

The New Testament Perspective of Sin The NT picture is much like that of the OT. Several of the words used for sin in the NT have almost the same meaning as some of the Hebrew words used in the OT. The most notable advancement in the NT view of sin is the fact that sin is defined against the backdrop of Jesus as the standard for righteousness. His life exemplifies perfection. The exalted purity of His life creates the norm for judging what is sinful.

In the NT sin also is viewed as a lack of fellowship with God. The ideal life is one of fellowship with God. Anything that disturbs or distorts this fellowship is sin.

The NT view of sin is somewhat more subjective than objective. Jesus taught quite forcefully that sin is a condition of the heart. He traced sin directly to inner motives stating that the sinful thought leading to the overt act is the real sin. The outward deed is actually the fruit of sin. Anger in the heart is the same as murder (Matt. 5:21-22). The impure look is tantamount to adultery (Matt. 5:27-28). The real defilement in a person stems from the inner person (heart) which is sinful (Matt. 15:18-20). Sin, therefore, is understood as involving the essential being of a person, that is, the essential essence of human nature.

The NT interprets sin as “unbelief.” However, unbelief is not just the rejection of a dogma or a creed. Rather, it is the rejection of that spiritual light which has been revealed in Jesus Christ. Or, from another perspective, unbelief is the rejection of the supreme revelation as it is found in the person of Jesus Christ. Unbelief is resistance to the truth of God revealed by the Spirit of God and produces moral and spiritual blindness. The outcome of such rejection is judgment. The only criterion for judgment is whether or not one has accepted or rejected the revelation of God as found in Jesus Christ (John 3:18-19; 16:8-16).

The NT further pictures sin as being revealed by the law of Moses. The law was preparatory, and its function was to point to Christ. The law revealed sin in its true character, but this only aroused in humanity a desire to experience the forbidden fruit of sin. The law as such is not bad, but humanity simply does not have the ability to keep the law. Therefore, the law offers no means of salvation; rather, it leaves humanity with a deep sense of sin and guilt (Rom. 7). The law, therefore, serves to bring sin into bold relief, so that it is clearly perceptible.

The most common NT word for sin is hamartia (see above). Parabasis, “trespass” or “transgression,” literally, means to step across the line. One who steps over a property line has trespassed on another person's land; the person who steps across God's standard of righteousness has committed a trespass or transgression.

Anomia means “lawlessness” or “iniquity” and is a rather general description of sinful acts, referring to almost any action in opposition to God's standard of righteousness. Ponería, “evil” or “wickedness,” is even more inclusive than anomia. Adikia, “unrighteousness,” is just the opposite of righteous. In forensic contexts outside the NT, it described one who was on the wrong side of the law.

Akatharsia, “uncleanness” or “impurity,” was a cultic word used to describe anything which could cause cultic impurity. It was used quite often to describe vicious acts or sexual sins. Apistia, “unbelief,” literally refers to a lack of faith. To refuse to accept the truth of God by faith is to sin. Hence any action which can be construed as unfaithful or any disposition which is marked by a lack of faith is sinful.

Epithumia, often translated “lust,” is actually a neutral word. Only the context can determine if the desire is good or evil. Jesus said, “I have fervently desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer” (Luke 22:15 HCSB). Paul used this word with a modifier meaning “evil,” in Col. 3:5, where it is translated “evil concupiscence” or “evil desire.” When used in this way, the word could refer to almost any evil desire but was most often used to describe sexual sins (Matt. 5:28).

Sin's Consequences The Bible looks upon sin in any form as the most serious of humanity's problems. Though sinful acts may be directed against another person, ultimately every sin is against God, the Creator of all things. Perfect in righteousness, God cannot tolerate that which violates His righteous character. Therefore, sin creates a barrier between God and persons.

Sin also necessitates God's intervention in human affairs. Since humanity could not extricate itself from the entanglements of sin, it was necessary for God to intervene if humanity was ever to be freed from these entanglements. See Salvation.

The consequences of sin both personally and in society are far reaching. That person who constantly and consistently follows a sinful course will become so enmeshed in sin that for all practical purposes he or she is enslaved to sin (Rom. 6).

Another of the awful consequences of sin is spiritual depravity in society in general as well as in the lives of individuals. Some will argue that depravity is the cause of sin, and this surely is a valid consideration. However, there can be no escaping the fact that a continuance in sin adds to this personal depravity, a moral crookedness or corruption, eventually making it impossible to reject sin. Sin also produces spiritual blindness. Spiritual truths simply are not visible to that person who has been blinded by sin.

Moral ineptitude is another devastating consequence of sin. The more people practice sin, the more inept they become as far as moral and spiritual values are concerned. Eventually, sin blurs the distinction between right and wrong.

Guilt is certainly a consequence of sin. No person can blame another person for a sin problem. Each person must accept responsibility for sin and face the guilt associated with it (Rom. 1-3).

In the Bible sin and death are corollaries. One of the terrible by-products of sin is death. Continual, consistent sin will bring spiritual death to that person who has not come under the lordship of Christ through repentance and faith (Rom. 6:23; Rev. 20:14.) For those who have trusted Christ Jesus for salvation, death no longer holds this dread. Christ has negated the power of Satan in making death horrible and has freed the person from slavery to this awful fear (Heb. 2:14-15). See Death.

Another serious consequence of sin is that it brings separation from God, estrangement, and a lack of fellowship with God. This need not be permanent, but if a person dies not having corrected this problem by trusting Christ, then the separation does become permanent (Rom. 6:23). See Hell.

Sin produces estrangement from other persons just as surely as it produces an estrangement from God. All interpersonal problems have sin as their root cause (James 4:1-3). The only hope for peace to be achieved on either the personal or national level is through the Prince of peace. Billy E. Simmons

SIN, WILDERNESS OF Barren region somewhere west of the Sinai plateau on the Sinai Peninsula. The Hebrew people stopped here on their journey from Egypt to the promised land (Exod. 16:1). It was here that God first provided manna and quail for them to eat. The place sometimes has been confused with the Wilderness of Zin, which is located on the northwestern side of Sinai. See Zin, Wilderness of.

SINAI, MOUNT (Sī' nī) Mountain in the south central part of a peninsula in the northwestern end of Arabia. God made many significant revelations of Himself and His purposes to Israel there. The meaning of the name is unclear, but it probably means “shining” and was likely derived from the word sin, a Babylonian moon god.

The entire peninsula takes the shape of an inverted triangle whose base is 150 miles long and is bounded on the east by the north end of the Red Sea and on the west by the Gulf of Aqaba. The Gaza Strip lies directly north. This peninsula contains 23,442 square miles and has a population of approximately 270,000 at time of publication. The central and southern parts are extremely mountainous, ranging from 5,000 to about 9,000 feet, and the land today is valued for its oil fields and manganese deposits.

The desolate country of the Wilderness of Sin.

Jebel Musa, the traditional site of Mount Sinai, in the southern Sinai Peninsula.

The Bible uses the term “Sinai” for both the mountain and the entire wilderness area (Lev. 7:38). Sometimes Sinai is called “the mount” (Exod. 19:2), sometimes “the mountain of God” (Exod. 3:1), sometimes “the mount of the LORD” (Num. 10:33).

The term often used to refer to Sinai in such a way as to make the names synonymous (Exod. 3:1). Since Horeb means “waste” or “wilderness area,” it seems best to think of Horeb as the general term for the area and Sinai as the specific peak where God manifested Himself to Moses. Horeb is

The modern name for the traditional site of Sinai is Jebel Musa (the mount of Moses). Jebel is the Arabic word for “hill,” sometimes written Jabal or Gabel (French has Djebel).

Jebel Musa (7,500 ft.) is one of three granite peaks near the southern tip of the peninsula. The highest peak, Jebel Katarin (Mount Catherine, 8,652 ft.), lies immediately on the southwest, and Ras es-Safsafah (6,540 ft.) on the northnortheast of Jebel Musa. Many explorers think Ras es-Safsafah is the biblical Sinai because it has a plain, er Rahah, on its northwest base, which is two miles long and about two thirds of a mile wide. This plain was certainly large enough to accommodate the camp of the Israelites.

View from Jebel Musa (the probable location of Mount Sinai) of the surrounding rugged landscape.

Another suggested location for Mount Sinai is far north and east of Jebel Musa, near the top of the Gulf of Aqaba. The major argument for this view is that Sinai's phenomena indicate volcanic action—fire, smoke, quaking earth (Exod. 19:16-18)—and no volcano is found on the Sinai Peninsula. The nearest volcano lies far east of the Gulf. However, the phenomena that appeared at Sinai were undoubtedly supernatural in origin, for they were accompanied by the sounds of a trumpet and the voice of God (Exod. 19:19).

Another location for Sinai is sought far north of Jebel Musa, primarily because of historical references such as the battle with the Amalekites (Exod. 17:8-16). The Amalekites lived in Canaan proper (Num. 14:42-45) and would not, it is claimed, have met the Israelites in the Sinai Peninsula. However, the Amalekites could have followed the recently delivered Israelites to the south of their territory for the purpose of preying on the poorly organized refugees (Deut. 25:17-19). SINCERITY Personal quality of living life from a pure motive without deceit. Associated with words or ideas like “truth” (1 Cor. 5:8), “genuineness” (2 Cor. 8:8), “godliness” (2 Cor. 1:12), and preaching the gospel sincerely (2 Cor. 2:17). It is also contrasted with words like hypocrisy, deceit, and wickedness. See Holy; Truth.

SINEW Tendons and connective tissue that connect muscles to bone in the body. The literal use is seen in Scripture (Job 10:11; 30:17; Ezek. 37:6,8). Isaiah 48:4 uses it in a figurative way to show rebellion against God. Because of Jacob's wrestling with the angel that resulted in the angel's striking the sinew of his thigh, the Jews cut away this sinew and did not eat it (Gen. 32:24-32). See Body.

SINIM (Si' nīm) Land from which God promised to gather the Babylonian exiles (Isa. 49:12). Traditionally translated as China and treated variously by early translators as Persia or the south, the term received clarification from an Isaiah manuscript among the Dead Sea Scrolls, which reads “Syenites,” a reference to modern Aswan (cp. NIV, REB, NRSV).

SINITE (Si' mīt) People from a city-state controlled by Ugarit, the Hittites, and the Assyrians whose inhabitants descended from Canaan (Gen. 10:17). It is in northern Phoenicia near Arqa, either Siyanu, two and a half miles east of Gebala, or Shen, south-southeast of Halba.

SINNER Person who has missed God's mark for life, rebelling against Him. The Bible considers every person a sinner (Rom. 3:23). In the OT people who did not live by the law were considered sinners (Ps. 1). The NT uses anomia in a similar way (1 Tim 1:9). Jews regarded Gentiles as sinners (Gal. 2:15) as well as people who did not keep the tradition of the Pharisees, including Jesus (Matt. 11:19; Luke 15). Paul spoke of sinners as those separated from God (Rom. 5:8). See Law; Salvation; Sin.

SION (Sī' ōn) 1. KJV spelling of Sirion (Deut. 4:48). 2. KJV spelling of Zion (Ps. 65:1; Matt. 21:5; Rom. 11:26; Rev. 14:1). See Zion.

SIPHMOTH (Siph' mōth) Town in southern Judah that received booty of war from David for befriending him (1 Sam. 30:26,28). The location of Siphmoth is unknown. A man named Zabdi may have been a resident of the town (1 Chron. 27:27). See Shiphmite.

SIPPAI (Sip' pāi) Alternate rendering (1 Chron. 20:4) of the name "Saph" (2 Sam. 21:18), a son of a giant killed by Sibbechai the Hushathite. See Saph.

SIRAH (Sī' rah) Place-name meaning "thorn." A well ("cistern of Sirah" NRSV) where Joab and Abishai murdered Abner for killing their brother Asahel (2 Sam. 3:26-30). This well is probably the well named Ain Sarah, a little over a mile northwest of Hebron. See Wells.

SISAMAI (Sis' ā mi) (KJV) See Sismai.

SISERA (Sis' ə rā) Personal name meaning "mediation." 1. Military leader of Jabin, king of Canaan (Judg. 4:2) who was killed by Heber's wife, Jael (v. 21). 2. Nethinim descendant who returned to Palestine with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55). See Jabin.

SISMAI (Sis' mī) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Eleasah and father of Shallum (1 Chron. 2:40; "Sisamai" KJV).

SISTER Female sibling counterpart to brother (Gen. 29:13; 30:1,8). In patriarchal times it was permissible to marry a sister (Gen. 20:12). “Sister” was also used of people held in special esteem as a counterpart to brotherly affection (Song 4:9; 8:8). Christian women who proved helpful and assisted the church to live like family were called “sister” (Rom. 16:1-2). Martha and Mary, sisters of Lazarus, were well-known as friends and supporters of Jesus. Jesus said, “Whoever does the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother” (Mark 3:35 HCSB). See Family; Women.

SITHRI (Sith' ri) Personal name probably meaning “He is my protection.” A son of Uzziel in the genealogy of Levi (Exod. 6:22; “Zithri” KJV).

SITNAH (Sit' nah) Well that Isaac's servants dug in the area of Gerar (Gen. 26:21). The well was seized by the servants of Abimelech, therefore, the name means “hatred” or “opponent.” See Well.

SIVAN (Si' vān) Third month (May-June) of the Hebrew calendar, time of wheat harvest and Pentecost. See Calendars.

SKIN Outer part of the human body and of the body of animals. 1. The mention of human skin is often in relation to disease (Lev. 13). Human skin is also mentioned in relationship to hairiness (Gen. 27:11-12,16,22-23), to sickness (Job 7:5; Lam. 5:10), and to the color (Jer. 13:23). 2. Genesis 3:21 is the first mention of animal skins in the Bible; this is where God made garments of skin for Adam and Eve as clothing. Animal skins were used to make containers for various kinds of liquids: water, milk, wine (Judg. 4:19; Matt. 9:17). The most used hides probably came from the animals most in use: sheep, goats, oxen, and donkeys, although other animal skins certainly were used when available. 3. The sacrifice of animals sometimes called for the destruction of the entire animal (Lev. 4:11-12). At other times the skins were the property of the priests for their use (Lev. 7:8). 4. The skin was also used in several proverbial sayings: “Skin for skin” (Job 2:4), “the skin of my teeth” (Job 19:20), and “Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots?” (Jer. 13:23). See Diseases; Leprosy; Vessels and Utensils.

SKINK See Reptiles; Snail.

SKIRT Article of clothing. Three Hebrew words are translated “skirt.” 1. Kanaph refers to the four loose corners of a garment. David cut off one of these corners of Saul's robe to show he meant Saul no harm (1 Sam. 24:4,11). “To reveal a skirt” (literal reading of Deut. 22:30; 27:20) is a euphemism for sexual relationships, since placing the skirt over a woman of marriageable age was the same as claiming her for marriage (Ruth 3:7-14). 2. Peh, meaning “mouth,” is translated “skirts” in Ps. 133:2 (“collar” NIV, NRSV; “edge” NASB). 3. Shul refers to the part of a garment that hangs the closest to the ground. In some passages it refers to the loose garment of a woman. Several references to Jerusalem use this word figuratively to show her sin (Jer. 13:22,26; Lam. 1:9; Nah. 3:5). The lifting of the skirt brought shame because the nakedness of a person was seen (Isa. 47:1-3; Nah. 3:5). See Cloth, Clothing.

SKULL See Calvary.

SKY See Heaven.

SLANDER To speak critically of another person with the intent to hurt (Lev. 19:16). In a court of law it means to falsely accuse another (Exod. 20:16; Deut. 5:20). Jesus said, “I tell you that on the day of judgment people will have to account for every careless word they speak” (Matt. 12:36 HCSB). This should cause each person to be very careful what they say about others (Eph. 4:31; 1 Pet. 2:1). The Bible shows that slander is a mark of the unregenerate world (James 4:11-12; 1 Pet. 2:12; 3:16). Jesus spoke of Satan as one who “has not stood in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he tells a lie, he speaks from his own nature, because he is a liar and the father of liars” (John 8:44 HCSB). Diabolos can mean “slanderous” or “the slanderer” (the devil). See Devil, Satan, Evil, Demonic; Ethics.

SLAVE, SERVANT Person totally responsible to and dependent upon another person.

Slavery was prevalent and widely accepted in the ancient world. The economy of Egypt, Greece, and Rome was based on slave labor. In the first Christian century, one out of three persons in Italy and one out of five elsewhere was a slave. Huge gangs toiled in the fields and mines and on building projects. Many were domestic and civil servants. Some were temple slaves and others were craftsmen. Some were forced to become gladiators. Some were highly intelligent and held responsible positions. Legally, a slave had no rights; but, except for the gangs, most were treated humanely and were better off than many free persons. Domestics were considered part of the family, and some were greatly loved by their masters. Canaan, Aram, Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia had fewer slaves because it proved less expensive to hire free persons. Still, the institution of slavery was unquestioned. The Stoics insisted that slaves were humans and should be treated accordingly. Israel's law protected slaves in various ways. Christian preachers called upon masters to be kind, but only the Essenes opposed slavery. See Essenes; Freedom; Jewish Parties in the New Testament.

A person could become a slave as a result of capture in war, default on a debt, inability to support and “voluntarily” selling oneself, being sold as a child by destitute parents, birth to slave parents, conviction of a crime, or kidnapping and piracy. Slavery cut across races and nationalities.

Manumission or freeing of slaves was possible and common in Roman times. Masters in their wills often freed their slaves, and sometimes they did so during their lifetimes. Industrious slaves could make and save money and purchase their own freedom. By the first Christian century, a large class of freedmen had developed. There was even a synagogue of the Freedmen in Jerusalem (Acts 6:9).

Old Testament Slavery laws appear in Exod. 21:1-11; Lev. 25:39-55; and Deut. 15:12-18. Most of these concern humane treatment and manumission. A Hebrew sold to another Hebrew or a resident alien because of insolvency was to be released after six years of service and given provisions to start over. If he had come with a wife, she and any children were also released. If the master had given him a wife, she and the children were to remain. If, however, the slave wanted to stay with his wife and children rather than be free, he could enroll himself as a slave for life. A Hebrew who sold himself to another Hebrew or resident alien was to be released during the Jubilee Year. A slave could be redeemed at any time by a relative. A Hebrew girl sold by her father to another Hebrew to become his wife was to be released if that man or his son did not marry her. A slave permanently maimed by his or her master was to be freed (Exod. 21:26-27). A fugitive slave—presumably one who had escaped from a foreign owner—was not to be extradited (Deut. 23:15-16). Foreigners could be enslaved permanently, but they had the right to circumcision (Exod. 12:44-48), Sabbath rest (Exod. 20:10), and holidays (Deut. 16:11,14). One was to be punished for beating a slave to death (Exod 21:20-21). See Year of Jubilee.

New Testament Paul and Peter insisted that Christian slaves be obedient to their masters (Eph. 6:5-8; Col. 3:22-25; 1 Tim. 6:1-2; 1 Pet. 2:18-21) and not seek freedom just because of conversion (1 Cor. 7:20-22). Masters were urged to be kind (Eph. 6:9; Col. 4:1). Slave trading was condemned (1 Tim. 1:10). Paul claimed that in Christ human status was unimportant (Gal. 3:28). But neither Jesus nor the apostles condemned slavery. Slavery was so much a part of their society that to call for abolition would have resulted in violence and bloodshed. Rather, Jesus and the apostles set forth principles of human dignity and equality that eventually led to abolition.

Metaphorical Uses of Slavery In most ancient societies few things were more despicable than to be a slave. In Israel, however, the idea emerged that it was a great privilege to be a servant or slave of God (the various Hebrew and Greek words could be translated either). Many of the heroes of the OT are so called (Exod. 32:13; Deut. 34:5; 2 Sam. 7:5; 2 Kings 21:10). Very significant are the Servant Songs of Isa. 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; and 52:13-53:12, which originally referred to Israel but were reinterpreted by the early church to refer to Jesus. See Servant of the Lord.

Jesus adopted a servant's role (John 13:4-5; Mark 10:45; cp. Phil. 2:7) and indicated that His disciples should also (Matt. 6:24; 10:24; 24:45-46; Luke 17:10; John 13:12-16). Paul referred to himself as a slave or servant of Jesus Christ (Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:10; Phil. 1:1), as did James (1:1), Peter (2 Pet. 1:1), and Jude (1).

There are three other metaphorical uses of slavery in the NT. A life of sin is spoken of as slavery to sin (John 8:34; Rom. 6:6,16-20; Heb. 2:15). Legalism is a kind of slavery (Gal. 4:24-25; 5:1). Paradoxically, however, there is also a blessed slavery to righteousness (Rom. 6:16-22). See Servant of the Lord. James A. Brooks

SLEEP Natural state of rest for human beings and animals (Ps. 4:8). God causes “deep sleep,” sometimes for revelation (Gen. 2:21; 15:12; Job 4:13), and sometimes to prevent prophetic vision (Isa. 29:10; cp. 1 Sam. 26:12). It is also used as a sign of laziness (Prov. 19:15). Sleep is a figure of physical death (John 11:11-14; 1 Cor. 15:51). See Death; Eternal Life.

SLIME See Bitumen.

SLING, SLINGERS, SLINGSTONES Weapon of two long straps with a piece between them at the end to hold the stone. Shepherds and professional soldiers used slings, dating back to at least 4500 B.C. See Arms and Armor.

SLOTHFUL Loose, undisciplined. Hebrew term can refer to a bow not strung or equipped with an arrow for action (Ps. 78:57; Hos. 7:16). A similar or related Hebrew root describes a loose tongue or mind as deceitful (Job 13:7; 27:4; Pss. 32:2; 52:4; Mic. 6:12). The slothful person cannot lead but becomes subjected to another's rule (Prov. 12:24; cp. 10:4; 19:15). God's work must not be done in such a spirit (Jer. 48:10). A second Hebrew term refers to that which is difficult, heavy, or hindered and indicates foolish laziness or sluggishness. The tribe of Dan was encouraged to take the new territory and not be slothful or reluctant (Judg. 18:9). The wise, hardworking ant illustrates the opposite of sloth (Prov. 6:6), while the sloth wants only to sleep (Prov. 6:9; cp. 10:26; 13:4; 15:19; 19:24; 20:4; 21:25; 22:13; 24:30; 26:16). The virtuous woman is the opposite of slothful, not having to live with the results of idle slothfulness (Prov. 31:27). Ecclesiastes 10:18 says, “Because of utter laziness, the roof caves in, because of idle hands, the house leaks” (HCSB). Jesus condemned an evil, lazy slave (Matt. 25:26) but praised and rewarded the “good and faithful slave” (Matt. 25:23 HCSB). See Ethics.

SMELTING POT REB for crucible. See Crucible; Pottery.

SMYRNA (Smēr' ná) Major city on the west coast of Asia Minor, the modern city of Izmir, Turkey. It had good harbor facilities, was at the end of a major road, and was surrounded by rich farmland. It is the second of the seven churches addressed in Rev. 2:8-11, one of two churches of which the Lord spoke no negative word (Philadelphia was the other). Smyrna gave its loyalty to the Romans at an early stage (about 195 B.C.) and never wavered. The Romans often rewarded Smyrna for its loyalty. The city was headquarters for the imperial cult of emperor worship in that area of the empire. Christians were persecuted by Jews and Romans. Polycarp was a famous Christian martyr who was burned at the stake in Smyrna about A.D. 156. See Asia Minor, Cities of.

SNAIL Animal whose name apparently means “moist one.” It illustrates the quick end to life (Ps. 58:8; HCSB, “slug”). Attempts to translate “miscarriage” instead of “snail” do not seem to be based on good linguistic evidence. KJV translated the unclean reptile of Lev. 11:30 as “snail.” Other suggestions include “sand reptile” (NASB), “skink” (HCSB, NIV), “sand lizard” (NRSV), and “great lizard” (REB).

Statues found in the ruins of Smyrna (modern Izmir, Turkey).

SNARE Trap to catch birds and animals. There were basically two kinds of snares. One used rope or cord. Either the animal stepped in the trap and was snared by the feet, or the rope fell from above and caught the animal by the neck. The most common was a trap with a net. The animal would be attracted by the bait. When the baited trigger was released, the net covered the animal and captured it. Also the opening of a pit would be camouflaged with cover. The animal would fall into the pit and be captured. Figuratively, snares spoke of peril or death and the destruction of persons (Job 22:10; Ps. 18:5; cp. 1 Sam. 28:9). See Fowler; Hunt, Hunter.

SNOW Being basically in a hot climate, Palestine rarely has snow. Yet Mount Hermon has a snowcap that can be seen throughout much of Palestine. Snow is used in the Bible figuratively: whiteness (Isa. 1:18), cleanness (Job 9:30), refreshing coolness (Prov. 25:13). See Weather.

SNUFFERS Two different instruments used to tend the lamps in the tabernacle and the temple. One instrument seems to be a cutting tool used for trimming the wicks of the lamps. The other word is often translated “tongs” (Isa. 6:6), meaning that it consisted in two parts working together. Exodus 25:38 speaks of “tongs” and “snuffdishes.” Evidently these instruments were used to trim the wicks of the lamps and dispose of the waste.

SOAP Cleaner made by mixing olive oil and alkali from burning certain salt-producing plants. It was used of washing the body (Jer. 2:22) and of washing clothes (Mal. 3:2). Perhaps the scant references to soap are due to the fact that people in the Near East use oil for cleansing the body and pound clothes on rocks while wet to cleanse them. See Fuller.

SOBER Characterized by self-control, seriousness, and sound moral judgment (1 Thess. 5:6,8; 1 Tim. 3:2,11; Titus 1:8; 2:2,6; 1 Pet. 1:13; 5:8). The KJV employed “sober” to mean in one's right mind at 2 Cor. 5:13.

SOCO, SOCOH (Sô' co) Place-name meaning “thorns.” 1. Town in southern Judah hill country used as a fortification against people approaching from the south (Josh. 15:35). It is modern Khirbet Abbad. Philistines gathered to battle Saul there (1 Sam. 17:1). Rehoboam fortified it (2 Chron. 11:7). 2. Town in the southern hill country of Judah about ten miles southwest of Hebron (Josh. 15:48) at Khirbet Shuweikeh. 3. Town belonging to Ben-hesed (1 Kings 4:10 NRSV), one of the 12 officials who provided food for Solomon and his household. It is as-Shuweikeh, west of Nablus and two miles north of Tulkarm. 4. Native of Judah, the son of Heber (1 Chron. 4:18). Some interpreters feel that this is a place-name rather than personal name. May be the same as 2.

SODI (Sô' di) Personal name meaning “my counsel.” Father of Gaddiel of Zebulun, one of the spies Moses sent to spy out Canaan (Num. 13:10).

SODOM AND GOMORRAH (Sô' dom, Gomô'r rá) Place-names of uncertain meaning. Two cities in Palestine at the time of Abraham. Sodom and Gomorrah were among the five “cities of the valley” (Gen. 13:12; 19:29; KJV, NIV, “plain”) of Abraham's time. Exact locations are unknown, but they were probably situated in the Valley of Siddim (Gen. 14:3,8,10-11) near the Dead Sea, perhaps the area now covered by the Sea's shallow southern end. Lot moved to this area, eventually settling in Sodom (Gen. 13:10-12; 14:12; 19:1).

Sodom and Gomorrah were renowned for their wickedness (Gen. 18:20). Despite Abraham's successful plea (18:22-32) not even 10 righteous men could be found in Sodom, and the cities were judged by the Lord, then destroyed by “brimstone and fire” (19:24; HCSB, NIV, “burning sulfur”).

The unnatural lusts of the men of Sodom (Gen. 19:4-8; Jude 7) have given us the modern term “sodomy,” but the city was guilty of a full spectrum of sins including pride, oppression of the poor, haughtiness, and “abominable things” (Ezek. 16:49-50). Together, Sodom and Gomorrah provided a point of comparison for the sinfulness of Israel and other nations (Deut. 32:32; Isa. 1:10; Jer. 23:14). The memory of their destruction provided a picture of God's judgment (Isa. 13:19; Jer. 49:18; Matt. 10:14-15; 11:23-24) and made them an example to be avoided (Deut. 29:23-25; 2 Pet. 2:6).

SODOMITE Originally a citizen of the town of Sodom, one of the cities of the valley near the Dead Sea (Gen. 13:12). The term came to mean a male who has sexual relations with another male. The wickedness of Sodom became proverbial (Gen. 19:1-11). See Homosexuality: Sex, Biblical Teaching on.

SOLDIER Person trained to fight, usually on active military duty. In early Israelite history every male was called on to fight when the tribes were threatened. David was the first to put together a national army made up of professional soldiers. Kings often had a personal group of soldiers to guard them. The NT soldier was usually the Roman soldier. John the Baptist indicated that the average Roman soldier extorted money from civilians by threatening them (Luke 3:14). On the other hand, the centurion (leader of 100 men) is held in esteem in the NT (Acts 10). See Army; Centurion.

SOLEMN ASSEMBLY See Festivals.

SOLOMON (Söl' o mon) Personal name whose meaning is variously interpreted as “his peace,” “(God) is peace,” “Salem (a god),” “intact,” or “his replacement.” Tenth son of David and the second son of Bathsheba, Solomon became the third king of Israel and reigned 40 years about 1000 B.C.

Old Testament Solomon was born to David and Bathsheba after the death of their first son (2 Sam. 12:24). Although not the oldest living son of David, he was crowned king after his mother and Nathan the prophet intervened with David and secured David's decision to have Solomon succeed him (1 Kings 1-2). Solomon is remembered most for his wisdom, his building program, and his wealth generated through trade and administrative reorganization.

Solomon was remembered as having 3,000 proverbs and 1,005 songs in his repertoire (1 Kings 4:32). Thus, it is not surprising that Proverbs and Song of Songs are attributed to Solomon (Prov. 1:1; Song 1:1) as are several apocryphal and pseudepigraphal books. His wisdom is also illustrated in the Bible by the accounts of the two harlots who claimed the single surviving child (1 Kings 3:16) and by the visit of the queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10). See Apocrypha; Pseudepigrapha.

While Solomon's temple was the most famous of his building projects (1 Kings 5-8), it was by no means the only one. Solomon fortified a number of cities that helped provide protection to Jerusalem, built “store-cities” for stockpiling the materials required in his kingdom, and established military bases for contingents of charioteers (1 Kings 9:15-19). The temple complex in Jerusalem was composed of several buildings including Solomon's palace, the “house of the forest of Lebanon,” the “hall [or porch] of pillars,” the “hall [or porch] of the throne,” and a palace for one of his wives, the daughter of the pharaoh of Egypt (1 Kings 7). See Archaeology; Gezer; Hazor; Megiddo; Temple.

Reconstruction of Solomon's temple (957-587 B.C.) in Jerusalem. Shown is the temple (center) flanked on the north and south by ten lavers (five on each side of the temple), the molten sea (lower center), and the altar of burnt offerings (right).

Solomon divided the country into administrative districts that did not correspond to the old tribal boundaries (1 Kings 4:7-19) and had the districts provide provisions for the central government. This system, combined with control of vital north/south trade routes between the Red Sea and what was later known as Asia Minor, made it possible for Solomon to accumulate vast wealth. This wealth was supplemented both from trading in horses and chariots and from trade carried on by a fleet of ships (1 Kings 9:26-28; 10:26-29). See Eloth; Ezion-geber.

The Bible clearly notes that Solomon had faults as well as elements of greatness. The “seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines” came from many of the kingdoms with which Solomon had treaties (1 Kings 11:1,3). He apparently allowed his wives to worship their native gods and even had altars to those gods constructed in Jerusalem (1 Kings 11:7-8). This kind of compromise indicated to the historian a weakness in Solomon not found in David. Rebellions led by the king of Edom, Rezon of Damascus, and Jeroboam, one of Solomon's own officers, indicate that Solomon's long reign was not without its turmoil.

New Testament Solomon was an ancestor of Jesus (Matt. 1:6-7) and is mentioned in Jesus' teaching about anxiety (Matt. 6:29; Luke 12:27). Jesus noted that the queen of Sheba came a long way to see Solomon and that “something greater than Solomon is here” (Matt. 12:42; Luke 11:31). Jesus walked in “Solomon's porch,” a part of the temple area (John 10:23; cp. Acts 3:11; 5:12). Stephen noted that though David sought to find a place for God, it was Solomon who “built Him a house” (Acts 7:47).

SOLOMON'S PORCH The raised outermost part of Herod's temple with columns that went all the way around the outer court (John 10:23; Acts 3:11). It is called “the portico of Solomon” (NASB, NRSV, REB) and “Solomon's Colonnade” (HCSB, NIV), since Solomon's workers constructed at least the oldest portico on the east side. In Jesus' day this part of the temple had been built by Herod's laborers. See Temple.

SON OF GOD Term used to express the deity of Jesus of Nazareth as the one, unique Son of God. In the OT certain men and angels (Gen. 6:1-4; Pss. 29:1; 82:6; 89:6) are called “sons of God” (note text notes in modern translations). The people of Israel were corporately considered the son of God (Exod. 4:22; Jer. 31:20; Hos. 11:1). The concept also is employed in the OT with reference to the king as God's son (Ps. 2:7). The promises found in the Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7:14) are the source for this special filial relationship. The title can be found occasionally in intertestamental literature (Wisd. of Sol. 2:18; 4 Ezra 7:28-29; 13:32,37,52; 14:9; Book of Enoch 105:2).

Jesus' own assertions and intimations indicate that references to Him as Son of God can be traced to Jesus Himself. At the center of Jesus' identity in the Fourth Gospel is His divine Sonship (John 10:36). Jesus conceived of His divine Sonship as unique as indicated by such assertions as “the Father and I are one” (John 10:30 HCSB) and the “Father is in Me and I in the Father” (John 10:38). Elsewhere, He frequently referred to God as “My Father” (John 5:17; 6:32; 8:54; 10:18; 15:15; Matt. 7:21; 10:32-33; 20:23; 26:29,53; Mark 8:38; Luke 2:49; 10:21-22).

At Jesus' baptism and transfiguration, God the Father identified Jesus as His Son, in passages reflecting Ps. 2:7. He was identified as Son of God by an angel prior to His birth (Luke 1:32,35), by Satan at His temptation (Matt. 4:3,6), by John the Baptist (John 1:34), and by the centurion at the crucifixion (Matt. 27:54). Several of His followers ascribed to Him this title in various contexts (Matt. 14:33; 16:16; John 1:49; 11:27).

The term “Son of God” reveals Jesus' divine Sonship and is closely associated with His royal position as Messiah. Gabriel told Mary that her Son would not only be called the Son of God but would also reign on the messianic (David's) throne (Luke 1:32-33). The connection of Son of God with Jesus' royal office is also found in the Gospel of John (1:49; 11:27; 20:30), in Paul's letters (Rom. 1:3-4; 1 Cor. 15:28; Col. 1:13), and in Luke's writings (Acts 9:20-22).

Primarily, the title “Son of God” affirms Jesus' deity evidenced by His person and His work. John emphasized Jesus' personal relationship to the Father. Paul stressed the salvation that Jesus provided (Rom. 1:4; 1 Thess. 1:10), and the author of Hebrews focused on Jesus' priesthood (5:5). All of these are vitally related to His position as Son of God. David S. Dockery

SON OF MAN Expression found in both the OT and the NT. “Son of Man” is used in these ways: (1) as a poetic synonym for “man” or “human,” as in Pss. 8:4 and 80:17; (2) in Ezekiel as the title by which God regularly addresses the prophet (2:1,3; 3:1,3); and (3) in Dan. 7 as the identity of the glorious person whom the prophet sees coming with the clouds of heaven to approach the Ancient of Days. “The Son of Man” is a designation of Christ found frequently in the NT. It was Jesus' favorite designation of himself to imply both his messianic mission and his full humanity.

In the Old Testament “Son of Man” appears often in the OT as a synonym for “man” or “humankind.” In fact, outside Ezekiel and Daniel it is always used in this way (Job 25:6; Isa. 56:2; Jer. 50:40).

The book of Ezekiel used “Son of Man” more than 90 times to refer to the prophet. His meaning is debated. Some believe the expression simply serves as an editorial convention. Others say it points to his identification with his people or is used to distinguish Ezekiel from other men. In any case, Ezekiel exhibited a profound sense of the holiness and majesty of God, and the phrase is at least intended to mark the distance that separated the prophet, as human, from Jehovah.

The most important occurrence of the title “Son of Man” in the OT is in Dan. 7:13. The context is the slaying of the terrifying fourth beast of Dan. 7, whereupon “one like the Son of Man” appears before the Ancient of Days and receives everlasting dominion and glory. While some have interpreted this divine being as a symbol for faithful Jews or “saints of the Most High,” it is best to see this as a clear reference to Messiah. Jesus often designated Himself as such and the clouds of heaven appear again in association with the second coming of Christ (Rev. 1:7). Here the Lord Jesus is distinct from God the Father, the Ancient of Days, who will give to Christ a kingdom that will never be destroyed (Dan. 2:44).

In the Gospels The phrase is used 32 times by Matthew, 14 times by Mark, 26 times by Luke, and 12 times by John, for a total of 84 occurrences in the Gospels. Adding the occurrences mentioned below in Acts, Hebrews, and Revelation brings the total to 88 in the NT. Of those occurrences, the phrase is always in the mouth of Jesus except for five times: John 12:34; Acts 7:56; Heb. 2:6; Rev. 1:13; 14:14.

In the Gospels the “Son of Man” sayings fall into three general categories, all of which are found on the lips of Jesus. Eschatological or apocalyptic sayings are those in which Jesus refers to His coming in the future on the clouds of heaven with great power and majesty (Mark 8:38; 13:26; Matt. 24:27; 25:31). This use is most frequent. These references are clearly reminiscent of Dan. 7. The references to the future coming yield the following important insights: (1) The Son of Man will come in glory with angels and bring about end-time judgment (Matt. 16:27; 25:31; 26:64; John 5:27). (2) This glorious coming will be a time of renewal and regeneration. Christ will be enthroned and His apostles will be given special places of honor (Matt. 19:28). (3) This coming will be sudden and unexpected, like a flash of lightning (Matt. 24:27; Luke 12:40; 17:24). (4) When Christ comes in His glory, He will gather to Himself His elect (Luke 21:36; Mark 13:27). (5) This sudden and unexpected coming (Matt. 10:23; 24:44) will usher in the time when He takes His seat on the promised messianic throne (Matt. 25:31).

Passion or suffering “Son of Man” sayings are those that Jesus spoke with reference to His imminent suffering, death, and resurrection. The passion sayings are the second largest group. Mark records three occasions when Jesus plainly foretold the rejection, crucifixion, and resurrection of the Son of Man (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33-34). This anticipation was difficult for the Jews of Jesus' day because messianic expectation did not connect the Son of Man with suffering and death. Jesus clearly understood these predictions to refer to Himself.

Finally, there are sayings connected with the present ministry of Jesus. These references usually illustrate the lowly estate of Jesus, the glorious Lord who humbled Himself to become human. Matthew 8:20 shows that He didn't have a permanent home. His purpose was to seek and to save those who are lost (Luke 19:10) and to give His life as a ransom for many (Matt. 20:28). He is the one who sows the seed of God's kingdom (Matt. 13:37) and in so doing was misunderstood and rejected (Luke 7:34). He warned that His disciples might be called on to suffer in the same way for His sake (Luke 6:22). This humble Son of Man is no ordinary person, however. He claims authority to forgive sins (Mark 2:10) and He assumes lordship over the Sabbath (Matt. 12:8).

Another aspect of the “Son of Man” concept emerges in John. While he uses the term sparingly, he blends the elements of the first three Gospels together in a beautiful way. The ascending/descending theme of the Son of Man is John's primary emphasis. There is a constant interplay between humiliation and exaltation of the Son of Man in John. The Son of Man who descended from heaven is the same one who is now on earth (John 3:13). He was to be lifted up on a cross (the ultimate humiliation) so that He might be exalted (3:14). He is the Bread who came down out of heaven but who ascended back to heaven when His work was completed (6:62). One must accept the humanity of the Son of Man to find true life (6:53), but this one is also Son of God who came from above and who links heaven to earth (1:51). Even Judas' betrayal of Him (13:32) served the purpose that He might be glorified. In the Gospels, but especially in John, “Son of Man” means humanity and humiliation, but “Son of Man” also means exaltation and glory.

In the Rest of the New Testament Outside the Gospels the title “Son of Man” is found only four times. In Acts 7:56 Stephen saw the Son of Man standing in heaven beside God's throne to receive him after his stoning. Hebrews 2:6 quotes Ps. 8, a passage that originally referred to mankind in general. The writer of Hebrews, however, used it to ascribe uniqueness to Jesus as the perfect representative of humanity. Revelation 1:13 and 14:14 follow the Dan. 7 imagery of the Son of Man as exalted Judge. The title is noticeably absent from Paul's writings, but many Bible students have suggested that Paul's idea of Christ as the heavenly man or second Adam can be related to the “Son of Man” concept. Paul's theology certainly built on the reality of Christ's sacrificial work as the God/man, as 1 Cor. 15:3-7 clearly shows.

Conclusion Saint Augustine wrote, “The Son of God became the Son of man that you who were sons of men might be made sons of God.” Jesus became one of us, yet He was distinct from us. Only Jesus is Son of Man and Son of God united in one person. In Matt. 16:13-17 Jesus asked the disciples, “Who do people say that the Son of Man is?” Simon Peter answered, “You are the Messiah, the Son of the living God!”

SONG OF SONGS, SONG OF SOLOMON Collection of romantic poetry comprising the 22nd book of the English OT. The Hebrew title, “Solomon's Song of Songs,” means that this is the best of songs and that it in some way concerns Solomon.

Author and Date While the title appears to name Solomon as the author, the Hebrew phrase can also mean for or about Solomon. Solomon or “king” is mentioned in the book several times (1:1,4-5,12; 3:7,9,11; 7:5; 8:11-12), but scholars remain uncertain about its author. An ancient rabbinic tradition (Baba Bathra 15a) attributes the Song to Hezekiah and his scribes (cp. Prov. 25:1).

Similarly, it is hard to establish the date of the book from internal evidence. Some scholars argue on linguistic grounds for authorship much later than Solomon. Such grounds include the use of expressions akin to Aramaic and the presence of certain foreign loan words (Persian: pardes “orchard,” Song 4:13; appiryon from Greek phoreion “carriage” or [by way of Aramaic] “canopied bed,” 3:9). Others argue that such linguistic usages and borrowings can go back to the time of Solomon or merely reflect the date of the book's final editing.

Canon and Interpretation Because of its erotic language and the difficulty of its interpretation, the rabbis questioned the place of the Song of Songs in the canon. The positive resolution of that debate is reflected in the famous declaration of Rabbi Akiva, “The whole world is not worth the day on which the Song of Songs was given to Israel; all the Writings are holy, but the Song of Songs is the holy of holies.”

The problems of the book's place in the canon and its interpretation are closely related. Under the influence of Greek views, which denigrated the body, and with the loss of a biblical view of the created goodness of the body and human love, many interpreters felt compelled to find in the Song an allegory of sacred love between God and Israel, Christ and the church, or Christ and the soul. With few exceptions, allegorical readings of the Song have prevailed for most of church history.

In the modern period most scholars have returned to a literal reading of the Song. Conflict remains even about the literal sense of the text. Some compare Egyptian and Mesopotamian poems and see the Song as a mere collection of secular love ditties. Another view tries to see it as an adaptation of pagan fertility rituals. (This view is in reality a modern allegorical reading.) Others see the Song as a drama in which the pure love of the Shulammitte maid and her shepherd prevails over Solomon's callous attempt to bring the girl into his harem. This view tries to do justice to the alteration of speakers in the Song in its various dialogues. (These shifts are indicated in Hebrew by shifts in grammatical person and number.)

A recent, promising approach is aware of parallels to Egyptian love poetry but shows that the Song itself gives expression to a uniquely biblical perspective on sexual love. While containing a number of smaller love poems, the Song is unified by patterns of dialogue, repetition, the use of catchwords, and above all, a consistent vision of love. Like Gen. 2:23-25, the Song celebrates God's gift of bodily love between man and woman. Here the Creator's wisdom and bounty are displayed. Thus, the Song is best taken as an example of Israel's wisdom poetry (cp. Prov. 5:15-20; 6:24-29; 7:6-27; 30:18-20). Like many psalms that praise God and also teach, the Song's main purpose is to celebrate rather than to instruct. Yet one can overhear in it biblical wisdom on love. "Love is as strong as death...Mighty waters cannot extinguish love...If a man were to give all his wealth for love, it would be utterly scorned" (8:6-7 HCSB). Moreover, there is a right time and place for love: "Young women of Jerusalem, I charge you...do not stir up or awaken love until the appropriate time" (3:5). In these poems love is portrayed in its power and splendor, its freshness and devotion to the beloved. Love in all its variety parades before us: moments of union and separation, ecstasy and anguish, longing and fulfillment.

Finally, a certain validity remains in the long history of interpretation, which saw in the pure love of the Song a reflection of divine-human love (cp. Eph. 5:21-32; Song 3:6-11; and the messianic typology of Ps. 45). Nonetheless, this parallel should not be pushed to the point of allegorizing details of the poem.

SONS OF GOD The literal rendering of a phrase that refers to a class of beings in some relationship to God. Its meaning and translation vary according to context.

Old Testament The Hebrew phrase beney ha'elohim is found in Gen. 6:2,4 and Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7. In the Job passages, “the sons of God” are the angels (Job 38:7, in poetic parallel with “the morning stars”) or heavenly court (1:6 and 2:1).

The Genesis text (6:1-4) historically has been one of the most difficult passages in the OT to interpret. The crux of the interpretative question is how to understand the distinction between the two groups mentioned in this text: “the sons of God” and “the daughters of men.” Three views have been proposed.

The first position is that “the sons of God” were princes or civil rulers, and “the daughters of men” were commoners or socially inferior women. The principal support for this view is a comparison with the Babylonian Gilgamesh Epic in which the king, Gilgamesh, has the first right to have sexual relations with a new bride. Only then may her husband take her as his wife. The primary objection to this position is that nowhere else in the OT does the phrase “sons of God” refer to royalty.

A second position is that “the sons of God” should be translated as “godly sons” and thus refers to the godly descendants of Seth. By this view, “the daughters of men” are “worldly women,” the ungodly descendants of Cain. The argument is that these intermarriages would have diluted the line of Seth, spiritually and physically. However, good exegetical principles require that “men/mankind” has the same meaning in 6:2 as in 6:1 Ha'adam (the same word in both verses) is understood generically as “humanity/mankind” in 6:1, thus referring to the entire human race, including both the descendants of Seth and Cain. If “the daughters of men” is understood to refer only to the ungodly descendants of Cain, then ha'adam must therefore have a more restricted meaning in 6:2. This more restricted meaning would violate good exegetical principles.

The final position is that “the sons of God” were angels or supernatural beings, and thus the “daughters of men” were human women. Two objections have been raised regarding this interpretation. Both are based on presuppositions about the nature of angels, which are not supported by Scripture: (1) that angels are without gender and therefore incapable of cohabiting with human beings, and (2) that understanding “sons of God” as angels requires the narrative to be understood as a mythological rather than a historical event.

Several lines of support have been proposed in defense of this interpretation. (1) The phrase “the sons of God” is elsewhere in the OT understood as “angels” (Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7). (2) The third century b.c. Greek translation of the OT (the Septuagint, Alexandrine text) reads “angels of God” for the Hebrew “the sons of God.” (3) If 6:4 is connected to what precedes and follows, then the offspring of the union between the angels and women are the Nephilim (giants), the renowned mighty men of old. (4) Finally, it is this sexual union that prompts God to judge the world by flood. This sin was such a terrible act of rebellion against God's standards that complete destruction of the world by flood was the only response of a holy God. Would the cohabitation between godly Sethites and ungodly Cainites or between kings and commoners have warranted this complete and utter destruction? The unholy sexual union between angels and women appears to be the best explanation for the heinous sin that resulted in judgment by flood.

New Testament Israel was the adopted son of God in the OT because of God's sovereign choice and covenant (Exod. 4:22-23; Hos. 11:1; cp. Matt. 2:13-15; Rom. 9:4; 2 Cor. 6:18). Even more personally, and closer to God's heart, He adopted David and his royal seed (2 Sam. 7:14; 1 Chron. 17:13; 28:6; Ps. 2:7-8), ultimately the divine King in His role as Savior of Israel (Luke 1:32; Acts 2:29-36; 13:32-37; Rom. 1:3-4; Heb. 1:3-5). Likewise, Christians are said to be sons of God and therefore heirs of God and heirs of the kingdom (Matt. 5:9) by adoption, chosen in Christ, having the Holy Spirit live within, and destined to be conformed to Christ's image (Luke 20:36; Rom. 8:14-17,29; Gal. 3:26; 4:4-7; Eph. 1:5). "Angels" is the usual NT term for heavenly beings/messengers. See Angels; Council, Heavenly; Nephilim. Francis Kimmitt

SONS OF THE PROPHETS Members of a band or guild of prophets. "Sons of" refers to membership in a group or class and does not imply a family relationship. "Sons of the prophets" suggests a community or guild of prophets. The most extensive use of the expression occurs in the Elisha stories where the prophet is portrayed as the leader of the prophetic guild. In that capacity Elisha cared for the needs of a prophet's widow (2 Kings 4:1-7), agreed to the building of a common dwelling (2 Kings 6:1-7), and presided at a common meal (2 Kings 4:38-44). The sons of the prophets functioned either as witnesses (2 Kings 2:3,5,7,15) or as agents of Elisha's ministry (2 Kings 9:1-3).

The single reference outside the Elisha cycle to the sons of the prophets is to someone identified as "a certain man of the sons of the prophets" who condemned Ahab's release of Ben-Hadad (1 Kings 20:35-42). The "company of prophets" (1 Sam. 10:5,10; 19:20) are groups of prophets whose charismatic spirit involved Saul in prophecy (1 Sam. 10:10) and, later, both Saul and his messengers (1 Sam. 19:20).

Amos's famous declaration, "I am not a prophet, nor am I the son of a prophet" (7:14 NASB), is probably a declaration of independence from the prophetic guilds of his day. Similarly, Jeremiah's claim that God made him a prophet even before conception (Jer. 1:5) may obliquely represent a rejection of association with the prophetic schools of Judah. See Prophet.

SOOTHSAYER'S TREE See Diviner's Oak; Terebinth.

SOP KJV translation of psomion, meaning a small piece of bread that could be dipped in a dish or wine. It appears only in John 13:26-30 (cp. Ruth 2:14). Most translators today use "morsel" (NASB) or "piece of bread" (HCSB, NIV, NRSV). Today in Bible lands a host honors a guest by dipping a piece of bread into the sauce of the main dish and handing it to the guest.

Most interpreters feel that Jesus was making His last appeal to Judas to change his mind. Then Jesus would accept him. Although Judas accepted the bread signifying friendship, John said, “Satan entered him” (v. 27). At that moment Judas gave himself over to the will of Satan and left to betray Jesus. See Judas.

SOPATER (Sōp' á tēr) Personal name meaning “sound parentage.” This man accompanied Paul on his final trip to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). Some feel he is the same as “Sosipater” in Rom. 16:21.

SOPHEREETH (Sōph' ə rēth) Personal name meaning “learning.” One of Solomon's servants whose descendants returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55; Neh. 7:57). Modern translations translate it “Hassophereth” in Ezra 2:55 and “Sophereth” in Neh. 7:57 (NASB, NIV, NRSV).

SORCERER Person who practices sorcery or divination. See Divination and Magic.

SORE Translation of six Hebrew words and a Greek word in RSV and of at least 10 Hebrew and 10 Greek words in KJV. 1. Adverb meaning “very, extremely” as in “sore afraid” (Gen. 20:8 KJV). 2. Adverb meaning “severely, insistently, with urgent pressure” as in “they pressed sore” (Gen. 19:9). 3. To experience pain (Gen. 34:25). 4. “Strong, severe” as in “the famine was sore” (Gen. 43:1). 5. A wounded or diseased spot or a plague (Lev. 13:42). 6. Something evil or bad (Deut. 6:22; 28:35). 7. A great amount as in “wept sore” (Judg. 21:2). 8. With vexation or anger (1 Sam. 1:6). 9. Cruel, tough, obstinate (1 Sam. 5:7). 10. Fully, greatly (Neh. 2:2). 11. Hand (Ps. 77:2). 12. Weakness or sickness (Eccles. 5:13). 13. Horrible, terrible (Ezek. 27:35). 14. Large, exceeding (Dan. 6:14). 15. Pressing, irritating (Mic. 2:10). 16. An ulcer (Rev. 16:2). 17. Blisters or boils (Exod. 9:9). See Boils. 18. An inflamed spot sometimes interpreted as smallpox or a skin disease akin to leprosy (Exod. 9:9-11; Lev. 13:18-20; 2 Kings 20:7; Isa. 38:21). 19. A wound (Gen. 4:23; Isa. 53:5).

SOREK (Sō' rēk) Place-name meaning “red grape.” A valley on the western side of Palestine. It runs from near Jerusalem toward the Mediterranean Sea. Beth-shemesh guarded the eastern end, while the Philistines controlled the western portion during the era of the judges. Delilah, Samson's mistress, lived in the valley of Sorek (Judg. 16:4). See Palestine.

SORROW Emotional, mental, or physical pain or stress. Hebrew does not have a general word for sorrow. Rather it uses about 15 different words to express the different dimensions of sorrow. Some speak to emotional pain (Ps. 13:2). Trouble and sorrow were not meant to be part of the human experience. Humanity's sin brought sorrow to them (Gen. 3:16-19). Sometimes God was seen as chastising His people for their sin (Amos 4:6-12). To remove sorrow, the prophets urged repentance that led to obedience (Joel 2:12-13; Hos. 6:6).

The Greek word for sorrow is usually lupe. It means “grief, sorrow, pain of mind or spirit, affliction.” Paul distinguished between godly and worldly sorrow (2 Cor. 7:8-11). Sorrow can lead a person to a deeper faith in God; or it can cause a person to live with regret, centered on the experience that caused the sorrow. Jesus gave believers words of hope to overcome trouble, distress, and sorrow: “I have told you these things so that in Me you may have peace. In the world you have suffering. Be courageous! I have conquered the world” (John 16:33 HCSB). See Grief and Mourning.

SOSIPATER (Sō sīp' à tēr) Personal name meaning “to save one's father.” He is said to be a kinsman (a Jew) of Paul who sent greetings to Rome (Rom. 16:21). “Sopater...from Beroea” (Acts 20:4 HCSB) may be the same.

SOSTHENES (Sōs' thə nēz) Personal name meaning “of safe strength.” A ruler of a synagogue in Corinth (Acts 18:17). He apparently assumed the post after Crispus, the former chief ruler, became a Christian under Paul's preaching (18:8). When an attempt to prosecute Paul legally failed, the citizens of the city took revenge and beat Sosthenes. Tradition holds that Sosthenes later was converted and became one of Paul's helpers (1 Cor. 1:1). Whether the two are one person cannot be determined from existing evidence.

SOTAI (סֹטַי) One of Solomon's servants whose descendants returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55; Neh. 7:57).

SOUL In Scripture and in the history of theology and philosophy, the word “soul” has had a varied and complex constellation of meanings. Though it is often used in popular theology to refer only to the inner part of the person, the non-physical aspect of each human being, it is used in other ways in Scripture, as well.

Old Testament In the Hebrew OT the word generally translated “soul” is nephesh. The word occurs over 750 times, and it means primarily “life” or “possessing life.” It is used of both animals (Gen. 9:12; Ezek. 47:9) and humans (Gen. 2:7). The word sometimes indicates the whole person, as for instance in Gen. 2:7 where God breathes breath (neshamah) into the dust and thus makes a “soul” (nephesh). A similar usage is found in Gen. 12:5 where Abram takes all the “souls” (persons) who were with him in Haran and moves on to Canaan. Similarly in Num. 6:6 it is used as a synonym for the body—the Nazirite is not to go near a dead nephesh (Lev. 7:21; Hag. 2:13).

The word is also used in the OT to refer to the inner life, psychological or spiritual states of the human person. In Ps. 42, for instance, the soul longs to know God. “As a deer longs for streams of water, so I [my soul] long for You, God” (Ps. 42:1 HCSB). The rest of this psalm echoes this inner desire for God (vv. 2,4-6,11). In 2 Kings 4:27 the Shunammite woman's “soul is troubled within her” (NASB). In 2 Sam. 17:8 Hushai spoke to Absalom and told him, “You know your father and his men, that they are mighty men and they are fierce (literally, chafed in soul, nephesh), like a bear robbed of her cubs in the field.” The word also refers to the source of emotion in Job 30:25, “Was not my soul grieved for the needy?” In Ps. 107:26 it is used of courage: “their courage [nephesh] melting away in anguish” (HCSB; cp. 1 Sam. 1:10; Ps. 86:4; Song 1:7). It can even refer to the attitudes of God: “I [my soul] hate your new moon festivals and your appointed feasts” (Isa. 1:14 NASB).

“Soul” in the OT can also point to the physical appetite. “You may slaughter your animals...and eat as much...as you (lit., the nephesh of you) want” (Deut. 12:15 NIV; cp. verses 20,23; Mic. 7:1). The term sometimes is simply another way of indicating oneself. So in Judg. 16:16 we find that Samson was tired “to the death of his nephesh” of Delilah's nagging. Likewise, Jonathan is said to love David “as himself [nephesh]” (1 Sam. 18:1 NASB). Similar passages are in Ps. 120:6 and Ezek. 18:4.

New Testament Greek word psuche carries many of the same meanings as the Hebrew nephesh. Often the soul is equated with the total person. Romans 13:1 says, “Everyone [soul] must submit to the governing authorities” equating “soul” (one) with “person” (cp. Acts 2:41; 3:23). There will be “affliction and distress for every human being [soul] who does evil, first to the Jew, and also to the Greek” (Rom. 2:9 HCSB). Soul in the NT also indicates the emotions or passions: “But the Jews who refused to believe stirred up and poisoned the minds [psuche] of the Gentiles against the brothers” (Acts 14:2 HCSB). In John 10:24 the Jews asked Jesus, “How long are You going to keep us [our souls] in suspense?” Jesus also told the disciples that they should love God with all of their souls (Mark 12:30), indicating something of the energy and passion that ought to go into loving Him.

It is also the case that the NT speaks of the soul as something that is distinguishable from the physical existence of a person. Jesus made this point when He observed, “Don't fear those who kill the body but are not able to kill the soul; but rather, fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell” (Matt. 10:28 HCSB). James seems to have the same thing in mind when he concludes his letter, “He should know that whoever turns a sinner from the error of his way will save his life [soul] from death” (James 5:20 HCSB; cp. Rev. 6:9; 20:4). This may be the idea found in Mark 8:36, “For what does it benefit a man to gain the whole world yet lose his life [soul]?” (HCSB). Scripture clearly teaches that persons continue to exist consciously after physical death. Jesus pointed out that as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, He is the God of the living. These still live, their souls having returned to God (Eccles. 12:7). In addition, Paul equated being absent from the body with being present with Christ. Whether it is the “immaterial” aspect of the soul which is consciously alive with God after death, awaiting resurrection completeness, or whether believers exist in some kind of physical form, uninterrupted existence is certain (Phil. 1:23; 2 Cor. 5:1-10; Luke 23:43).

The NT often uses “soul” (psuche) in a manner interchangeable with “spirit” (pneuma). John 10:17 speaks of laying down one's life (psuche), and in John 19:30 Jesus gave up the spirit in the act of laying down His life. Acts 27:10,22 speak of loss of one's life in the sense of losing the soul out of the body. Matthew 11:29 speaks of rest for the soul while 2 Cor. 7:13 speaks of Titus's spirit having rest. James 5:20 speaks of salvation of the soul while 1 Cor. 5:5 speaks of salvation of the spirit. In Hebrew parallel fashion, Mary sings, “My soul proclaims the greatness of the Lord, and my spirit has rejoiced in God my Savior” (Luke 1:46-47 HCSB). Spirit and soul are not different parts of the human here but are the same. Though some interpreters appeal to Heb. 4:12 and 1 Thess. 5:23 in an attempt to distinguish these two components, the vast majority of texts demonstrate that they are not distinct. The NT does not make a fundamental distinction between soul and spirit in the person but sees the terms as interchangeable.

Theological Consideration Christians have generally taken one of two approaches to understanding the relationship between body and soul. Most have held to holistic dualism—that there is a difference between body and soul, but the two are linked together by God such that humans are not complete when the two are separated. Some have held to a monistic view that the soul is not separable from the body at all. Nearly all who have held the second view have also believed that after death Christians “go to sleep” and await the resurrection. In light of the texts listed above, this view does not seem tenable. An even more serious error, though, is the Gnostic idea that the body is inferior to the soul because the body is made up of matter. Such persons teach salvation by releasing the soul from the body. This idea is found nowhere in Scripture. See Anthropology; Salvation; Spirit. Fred Smith and Chad Brand SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD Biblical teaching that God possesses all power and is the ruler of all things (Ps. 135:6; Dan. 4:34-35). God rules and works according to His eternal purpose, even through events that seem to contradict or oppose His rule.

Biblical Teaching Scripture emphasizes God's rule in three areas: creation, human history, and redemption. Scripture testifies clearly to God's rule over His creation (Gen. 1; Mark 4:35-41; Rom. 8:20-21), including Christ's sustaining and governing of all things (Heb. 1:3, Col. 1:15-17). The Bible affirms also that God rules human history according to His purpose, from ordinary events in the lives of individuals (Judg. 14:1-4; Prov. 16:9,33) to the rise, affairs, and fall of nations (Ps. 22:28; Hab. 1:6; Acts 17:26). Scripture depicts redemption as the work of God alone. God, according to His eternal purpose, takes the initiative in the provision and application of salvation and in enabling man's willing acceptance (John 17:2; Rom. 8:29-30; Eph. 1:3-14; 2 Thess. 2:13-14; 2 Tim. 1:9-10).

Five issues seem to be at odds with the claim of God's absolute rule: evil, free will, human responsibility, evangelism, and prayer.

Sovereignty and Evil The Bible does not explain the relationship between divine sovereignty and evil. Scripture does teach that God neither does evil nor approves of evil (Hab. 1:13; James 1:13); rather, though He allows it, He also restrains it (Job 1:12-2:7), judges it (Isa. 66:3-4; Acts 12:19-23; Rev. 20:11-15), uses it for the good of His children, and the fulfillment of His purposes (Gen. 50:20; Rom. 8:28-29).

Sovereignty and Free Will Some see contradiction between divine sovereignty and human free will, an often misunderstood term. Man's will is free in that he makes willing choices that have actual consequences. Yet man's will is not morally neutral; rather, it is in bondage to sin, and without divine grace he chooses freely and consistently to reject God (Rom. 3:10-11; Eph. 2:1-3; 2 Tim. 2:25-26). Scripture affirms both divine sovereignty and man's willing activity. Pharaoh's rise to power was entirely in accordance with his own will; it was also entirely by the hand of God (Exod. 9:16). The crucifixion of Christ was fully the free act of sinful men, and at the same time fully the purpose of God (Acts 2:23; 4:27-28). Conversions are reported in Acts in a manner consistent with both concepts (Acts 13:48; 16:14).

Sovereignty and Human Responsibility Though God is sovereign, man is still accountable to God for his actions (Rom. 2:5-11; 3:19). The relationship between these two concepts is mysterious but not contradictory. Paul raises the issue but, rather than resolving the tension, simply affirms both (Rom. 9:19-29).

Sovereignty and Evangelism Jesus affirmed the absolute sovereignty of God and in the same context invited sinners to Himself for salvation (Matt. 11:25-30). Paul began his profound treatment of divine sovereignty by expressing his burden for his lost kinsmen (Rom. 9:1-5); in the same context he expressed his heartfelt prayer for their salvation (Rom. 10:1), and affirmed the promise of salvation to “everyone who calls on the name of the Lord” (Rom. 10:12-13 HCSB). Thus an affirmation of divine sovereignty is consistent with evangelism, with missionary labors (2 Tim. 1:12; 2:10), and with desiring and praying for the salvation of any lost person or people.

Sovereignty and Prayer God's sovereignty means for the believer that “if God is for us, who is against us?” (Rom. 8:31 HCSB). Scripture declares abundantly God's willingness to grant the believer's requests (Rom. 8:32; 1 John 5:14-15). The believer can pray with confidence that his prayers will be heard and answered. SOW 1. To scatter seeds on the ground (field). 2. The female counterpart of the boar. The mature female swine. See Swine.

SOWER Person who held a vessel filled with seed in the left hand and scattered the seed with a practiced motion with the right hand. The seed was usually scattered on untilled ground. Then with a plow or harrow, the ground would be scratched or turned to cover the seed. It seems that any seed to be sowed had to be ceremonially clean (Lev. 11:37). Mixed seed could not be sowed together (Lev. 19:19). Purity reached into the far corners of Hebrew life. Jesus used the sower for a parable about life and illustrated the everyday hardships farmers faced (Matt. 13:3-9; Mark 4:3-9; Luke 8:4-8). See Agriculture; Plow.

SPAIN Country still known by that name in the southwest corner of Europe. It was opened to the Romans just before 200 B.C. Paul wanted to go to Spain (Rom. 15:24,28). According to Clement (about A.D. 95-96) and the Muratorian Fragment (about A.D. 195-196), he did just that. See Tarshish.

SPAN Half a cubit. A cubit is the length of the forearm, about 18 inches. The span is measured from the thumb to the little finger both extended, about eight or nine inches. See Weights and Measures.

SPARK Literal flame of fire (Job 18:5) used in a figurative sense of a person's dying. Also used figuratively to show that humanity lives a troubled life (Job 5:7). Leviathan is pictured with a flaming mouth (Job 41:19-21). It is used of sparks from a fire (or "torches" NIV) in Isa. 50:11. See Fire.

An Arab farmer near Bethlehem sowing seeds on his land.

SPARROW Often translated “bird” (tsippor) as representative of all birds (Ps. 8:8; Ezek. 17:23 NASB, NIV, NRSV). It was ceremonially clean and sometimes eaten as food by the poor. The sparrow belongs to the finch family. The translation “sparrow” occurs in the HCSB, NIV, NRSV, and RSV in Ps. 84:3 and in Prov. 26:2. The KJV also translates tsippor “sparrow” in Ps. 102:7, but the translation “sparrow” may be inappropriate because the verse refers to a bird “alone upon the house top,” and the most common sparrows always appeared in flocks. On the other hand, the psalmist may have intended this contradiction to emphasize the depth of loneliness and utter desolation that he was experiencing.

Jesus used the sparrows (Matt. 10:31; Luke 12:7) to show their lack of worth as contrasted with human beings. In these parallel passages Jesus taught His disciples to have confidence in God's love. The God who cares for all of His creation, even the insignificant sparrow, certainly cares for people. Janice Meier SPECTACLE Theatre or play. Paul felt that he was on display before the world. The world did not appreciate the commitment of Paul to Christ but saw Paul as a spectacle, one to watch and perhaps laugh at (1 Cor. 4:9).

SPELT Wheat of an inferior quality (Triticum spelta). Egyptians made bread from it. It had not sprouted when the plagues struck Egypt (Exod. 9:32). Spelt illustrates the farmer's planning, placing it on the outer edge of the field to retard the intrusion of weeds (Isa. 28:25; cp. Ezek. 4:9). See Agriculture.

SPICES Aromatic, pungent substances used in the preparation of foods, sacred oils for anointings, incense, perfumes, and ointments used for personal hygiene and for burial of the dead.

Spices were very expensive and highly prized in antiquity. They were brought into Palestine from India, Arabia, Persia, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. Solomon had an extensive commercial venture with Hiram, king of Tyre, dealing in spices and other commodities. His fleet of ships brought much needed revenue into the Israelite economy (1 Kings 10:15). Solomon also taxed the caravan groups that passed through his lands. The land of Sheba, present-day Yemen, had an extensive commerce in spices. The queen of Sheba made a long journey of 1,200 miles because she was afraid that her caravan spice business would be hurt by Solomon's merchant fleet. In her visit she gave to Solomon “a very great amount of spices” (2 Chron. 9:9 NASB).

Spices were widely used in the worship service of the temple and in the lives of the people. Several spices, which the Talmud called “food improvers,” were used in the preparation of foods. These included cumin, dill, cinnamon, and mint. Frankincense, stacte, galbanum, and onycha were used in the preparation of the incense to be used in the worship of Israel (Exod. 30:34-35). Balsam, myrrh, cinnamon, cassia, and calamus were used in the preparation of the holy anointing oil (Exod. 30:23-25). Cassia, aloes, and spikenard were some of the spices used in the preparation of cosmetics (Song 4:14; Mark 14:3; John 12:3). Myrrh and aloes were used in ointments for burial (Luke 23:56; John 19:39). See Ointment.

Some of the most important spices were:

Aloe (Aloexyllon agallochum and Aquilaria agallocha) Spice used to perfume garments and beds (Prov. 7:17; Ps. 45:8;). The aloe mentioned in John 19:39 was a different plant. The extract from its leaves was mixed with water and other spices to make ointment for the anointing of the dead.

Balsam (Pistacia lentiscus) This product of Gilead was exported to Egypt and to Tyre. The resin from this desert plant was used for medicinal and cosmetic purposes (Jer. 46:11).

Cassia (Flores cassiae) Two Hebrew words are used to translate cassia (Exod. 30:24; Ps. 45:8). The dried bark or blooms were used in the preparation of the anointing oil; the pods and leaves were used as medicine.

Cinnamon Highly prized plant, used as a condiment, in the preparation of perfumes (Prov. 7:17) and in the holy oil for anointing (Exod. 30:23).

The NT lists cinnamon as one of the commodities found in Babylon (Rev. 18:13).

Coriander (Coriandrum sativum) Aromatic seed used as a spice in food; its oil was used in the manufacture of perfume. The Israelites compared the manna to the coriander seed (Exod. 16:31; Num. 11:7).

Cumin (Cuminum cyminum) This seed was used as a spice in bread. Its dry seed was beaten with a stick, for it was too soft to be threshed with a sledge (Isa. 28:23-28).

Dill Seed and leaves were used to flavor foods and as medicine to wash skin wounds (Matt. 23:23; KJV, “anise”).

Frankincense (Boswellia carteri and frereana) Resin of a tree which, when burned, produced a strong aromatic scent. Frankincense was used in the preparation of the sacred oil for anointing of kings and priests and for the sacrifices in the temple. The men from the East brought frankincense to Jesus (Matt. 2:11).

Galbanum Fragrant resin which gave a pleasant scent when burned; it was one of the ingredients of the holy incense (Exod. 30:34).

Henna Plant used as a cosmetic; its leaves produced a dye women used (Song 1:14; 4:13). KJV translates the word as “camphire,” but camphire was not native to Palestine and may not have been known in biblical times.

Mint Leaves were used as a condiment (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42).

Myrrh (Commiphora abessinica) Resinous gum of a plant which was included in the preparation of the holy anointing oil (Exod. 30:23). It was also used for its aromatic properties (Ps. 45:8) and used for female purification (Esther 2:12). Myrrh was given to Jesus at His birth as a gift (Matt. 2:11) and as a drink when He was on the cross (Mark 15:23).

Onycha Traditionally taken as the aromatic crushed shell of a mollusk but in light of Ugaritic plant lists probably a type of cress (Lepidium sativum]. It was used in holy incense (Exod. 30:34).

Rue (Ruta graveolens) Herb used as a condiment. It was valued for its medicinal properties. Its leaves were used in the healing of insect bites (Luke 11:42).

Saffron (Curcuma longa, Crocus sativus) Substance of a plant that produced a yellow dye and was used to color foods. When mixed with oil, it was used as medicine and perfume (Song 4:14).

Spices The Hebrew word should be translated “balsam” (Balsamodendrium opobalsamum). Shrub with a resin that gave a pleasant odor. Balsam was used as perfume and as medicine. The balsam was one of the ingredients of the anointing oil (Exod. 30:23).

Spikenard (Nardos tacs jatamansi) Very expensive fragrant oil used in the manufacture of perfumes and ointments (Song 1:12; 4:13; Mark 14:3; John 12:3). Also translated as “perfume” and “nard.” The Gospels of Mark and John record that a woman anointed Jesus with this expensive perfume.

Stacte (Pistacia lentiscus) Small tree which produced a resin used in the sacred incense (Exod. 30:34). Claude F. Mariottini

SPIDER Animal in Palestine known for spinning a web (Job 8:14; Isa. 59:5). The spider's web is usually used as a sign of frailty.

SPIKENARD See Spices.

SPINDLE Used only in Prov. 31:19, KJV translates “spindle” in the first line and “distaff” in the second line. Modern translations (NASB, NIV, NRSV) reverse the words in their translations (HCSB uses “spinning staff” and “spindle”). The distaff was a stick that held the fibers from which thread was spun. The spindle was a round stick with a round disk fastened closer to one end. The spun thread was wound around the spindle. See Cloth, Clothing.

SPINNING AND WEAVING Major elements involved in making cloth and were familiar processes in biblical times.

Spinning Threads woven into cloth were produced from raw fibers by spinning (Matt. 6:28; Luke 12:27). Flax, or linen (Lev. 13:47-48; Prov. 31:13; Jer. 13:1; Ezek. 40:3; 44:17; Hos. 2:5), and wool (Lev. 13:47) were the major fibers used in the biblical world.

In spinning, raw fibers were pulled into a loose strand and twisted to form a continuous thread. A spindle (2 Sam. 3:29; Prov. 31:19 NRSV) was a slender stick which could be twirled to twist drawn out fibers caught in a hook or slot at the top. A spindle whorl acted as a flywheel for more efficient twisting. Spun thread was wound onto the stick. Sometimes it was plied or twined, two or three threads being twisted together (Exod. 26:1; 36:8,35). The finished product could then be used for weaving (Exod. 35:25-26).

Weaving Interlacing of threads to form fabric. Weaving was conducted on looms, devices designed to create openings (sheds) between alternating vertical warp threads through which the horizontal weft threads were passed. After each weft thread was placed, it was beaten against the previous one with a flat stick, thus firming up the fabric.

Three main loom designs were used in the biblical world. On a horizontal ground loom, the warp threads were stretched between beams pegged to the ground. This type is apparently referred to in the Samson story (Judg. 16:13-14), as it would have enabled Delilah to weave his locks while he slept. When Samson jumped up, he pulled away the pin(s) of the loom (v. 14b) that secured the beams to the ground. In some vertical looms the warp was stretched between two beams fixed in a rectangular frame. Work proceeded from the bottom of the loom, and the woven cloth could be rolled onto the bottom beam (Isa. 38:12). This permitted the weaver to remain seated and to produce much longer finished products. Another type of vertical loom had the warp threads attached to an upper beam and held taut in groups by a series of stone or clay weights. Weaving was done from the top to the bottom, and the weft beaten upwards. Large numbers of excavated loom weights testify to the popularity of warp weighted looms in OT Israel.

Stripes or bands of color were made by using dyed threads for portions of the warp or weft threads. Warp weighted looms allowed portions of the shed to be opened at a time, so intricate patterns could be made in the weft by covering small areas with different colors. It was forbidden, however, to wear clothes made of linen and wool woven together (Deut. 22:11). Weavers apparently were professionals who specialized in particular types of work. The OT differentiates between ordinary weavers, designers, and embroiderers (Exod. 35:35).

SPIRIT Empowering perspective of human life and the Holy Spirit bringing God's presence and power to bear in the world. A translation of the Hebrew word ruach and the Greek work pneuma, which can be translated as “wind,” “breath,” or “spirit” depending upon the context.

In both Testaments “spirit” is used of both God and human beings. Spirit, whether used of God or of human beings, is difficult to define. The kinship of spirit, breath, and wind is a helpful clue in beginning to understand spirit. In His conversation with Nicodemus (John 3), Jesus said that the Spirit is like the wind in that one cannot see it but one can see its effects. This is true of both the Spirit of God and the spirit of a human being.

Spirit of God At the beginning of creation, the Spirit of God hovered over the waters (Gen. 1:2). Elihu acknowledged to Job that the Spirit of God had made him and was the source of his life (Job 33:4). The animals were created when God sent out His “breath” (Ps. 104:30 HCSB, NRSV note).

The Spirit of God is present everywhere. The psalmist sensed that no matter where he was, God's Spirit was there (Ps. 139:7). The Pharaoh saw the Spirit of God in Joseph (Gen. 41:38). Moses realized that the Spirit of God was on him, and he desired that God's Spirit be on all of His people (Num. 11:29). During the period of the judges, the Spirit of the Lord came to individuals and empowered them to accomplish specific tasks (Judg. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 13:25; 14:6; 14:19). When Samuel, the last of the judges, anointed Saul, Israel's first king, he told Saul that the Spirit of the Lord would come upon him. The result was that Saul prophesied and was changed into a different person (1 Sam. 10:6). Later, the Spirit departed from Saul (1 Sam. 16:14). Likewise, the Spirit came upon David when Samuel anointed him (1 Sam. 16:13). In his last words David said that the Spirit of the Lord had spoken through him (2 Sam. 23:2).

Isaiah spoke of one who is to come from the line of Jesse, one on whom the Spirit of the Lord would rest. This person would have the Spirit of wisdom, understanding, counsel, power, knowledge, and the fear of the Lord (Isa. 11:1-3). Ezekiel prophesied that God would put His Spirit within His people, removing from them hearts of stone and putting within them hearts of flesh that would be obedient to God's way (Ezek. 36:26-27).

New Testament Teaching Each of the four Gospels has numerous references to the Spirit of God or the Holy Spirit. The Spirit was the agent of Jesus' miraculous conception (Matt. 1:18,20), came down on Jesus at His baptism (Matt. 3:16), led Him into the wilderness where He was tempted by the devil (Matt. 4:1), and enabled Him to heal diseases and cast out demons (Matt. 12:28). Jesus promised the Spirit to His followers as He prepared to leave the world. The Spirit would serve as Comforter and Counselor, continuing to teach Jesus' followers and reminding them of what He had said to them (John 14:25-26). Not many days after Jesus' ascension, the promised Spirit came upon His followers during the Feast of Pentecost. The advent of the Spirit was accompanied by a sound that was like a mighty wind. Those who witnessed this event saw what seemed to be tongues of fire resting on the believers. Moreover, these disciples were empowered to speak in tongues other than their native language (Acts 2:1-3). Throughout Luke's account of the early church, the Holy Spirit empowered and guided the followers of Jesus in their mission to the world surrounding the Mediterranean (Acts 11:12; 13:2; 15:28; 16:6-7; 20:22; 21:11).

The Spirit is important in Paul's understanding of the believer's relationship to God. The Spirit is a gracious personal presence who lives in one who has confessed that Jesus Christ is Lord. Relationship to God through Christ by the Spirit is revolutionary. In Galatians, Paul argued that legalism and the way of faith are incompatible. God's Spirit comes to us as a gift based on our faith in Christ and His grace (Gal. 3:1-5). God's Spirit comes into a believer's life with assurance that we are God's children (Rom. 8:16). The Spirit is God's pledge to us that we will be fully transformed and conformed to the image of Christ (Rom. 8:1-29; 2 Cor. 1:22). Paul identified the Spirit with the Lord (the risen Christ) and asserted that where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom, a growing freedom from the law of sin and death (2 Cor. 3:18; cp. Rom. 8:2).

The Spirit distributes gifts in the church that are designed to equip God's people for serving and building up the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12; Eph. 4:7-13). Evidence that the Spirit of God is at work in a person or group of persons is love, joy, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control (Gal. 5:22-23).

At the beginning of Scripture we see the Spirit at work in creation. As Scripture closes, the Spirit and the bride, the church, issue an invitation for all who are thirsty to come and drink of the water of life (Rev. 22:17).

Human Spirits In both the OT and NT, “spirit” is used of humans and of other beings. When used of humans, spirit is associated with a wide range of functions including thinking and understanding, emotions, attitudes, and intentions. Elihu told Job it was spirit in a person, the breath of God, which gave understanding (Job 32:8). When Jesus healed the paralytic, He perceived in His “spirit” that the religious leaders present were questioning His forgiving the man's sins (Mark 2:8).

“Spirit” is used extensively with human emotions including sorrow (Prov. 15:4,13), anguish (Exod. 6:9; John 13:21), anger (Prov. 14:29; 16:32), vexation (Eccles. 1:14), fear (2 Tim. 1:7), and joy (Luke 1:47).

A variety of attitudes and intentions are associated with “spirit.” Caleb had a different spirit than most of his contemporaries in that he followed the Lord wholeheartedly (Num. 14:24). Sihon, king of Heshbon, had a stubborn spirit (Deut. 2:30). First Kings 22 refers to a lying spirit. The psalmist called persons who have no deceit in their spirits, “blessed” (Ps. 32:2). A person's spirit can be contrite (Ps. 34:18), steadfast (Ps. 51:10), willing (Ps. 51:12), broken (Ps. 51:17), and haughty (Prov. 16:18). The Gospel of Mark has numerous references to Jesus healing persons with unclean or foul spirits.

Spirit is used of nonphysical beings, both good and evil. Satan is called the ruler of the kingdom of the air, the spirit who is at work in those who are disobedient (Eph. 2:2).

One of the perennial points of conflict between the Sadducees and the Pharisees was over whether there are angels and spirits. The latter believed that there were such while the former denied that such existed. When the risen Christ appeared to the disciples, they were startled and frightened, thinking they were seeing a spirit. Jesus invited them to touch Him. He then reminded them that a spirit does not have flesh and bones (Luke 24:37-39). See Anthropology; God; Holy Spirit; Humanity. Steve Bond SPIRITS IN PRISON In 1 Pet. 3:19 the text says that Christ “went and made a proclamation to the spirits in prison” (HCSB). Peter further says that they “in the past were disobedient, when God patiently waited in the days of Noah.” Several interpretations have been offered concerning these curious words. One is that these spirits are fallen angels who tried God's patience in the antediluvian era. On this view, Christ descended into hades after His crucifixion to preach either a message of salvation or a message of triumph. This interpretation is, however, unacceptable. Scripture never suggests that demons are given the opportunity for salvation.

The better interpretation sees them as those people whom God destroyed in the flood and who are now in hell or hades. There are differing views on when and what Christ did preach to them. One view holds that Christ descended into the lower realm after His crucifixion to preach either a message of salvation or a message of triumph. Again, this is unlikely. The idea that Christ offers sinners a postmortem opportunity for salvation contradicts Heb. 9:27 and Luke 16:19-31. A better approach is that Christ preached to these persons “in the spirit” through Noah while they were still alive. This interpretation is confirmed by 1 Pet. 1:11 where Peter indicates that Christ spoke through the OT prophets and in 2 Pet. 2:5 where Noah is called a “preacher of righteousness.” See Descent to Hades. SPIRITUAL GIFTS The phrase, “spiritual gifts,” does not appear as such in the NT. It has gained common usage, though, in referring to what Scripture identifies as the God-granted empowerment for ministry on the part of believers. Scripture specifically employs these terms: “gifts” (Gk. domata, Eph. 4:8), “spiritual things” (pneumatika, 1 Cor. 12:1), “graces” [charismata, Rom. 12:6; 1 Cor. 12:4,9,28,30-31; 1 Pet. 4:10), “workings” (energemata, 1 Cor. 12:6), and “manifestation” (phanerosis, 1 Cor. 12:7). These terms point to that which God grants to believers for the carrying out of the work of ministry in the church. It seems appropriate to use the phrase “spiritual gifts,” to refer to these, since they do come from the Holy Spirit (though they could also be said to come from the Father through the redemptive work of the Son—Eph. 4:8-11; 1 Cor. 12:5-7,11), and since they are given by God according to His own sovereign purposes (1 Cor. 12:11).

In the two lengthiest discussions of these charismata, Paul emphasizes the diversity that is to be found in the church, the body of Christ, as reflected in the various spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 12:1-31; Rom. 12:3-8). Indeed, the variety of types of gifts is remarkable. Scholars have made various attempts to classify the types of gifts, but none of these schemes is compelling. One such classification (James D. G. Dunn) makes these distinctions:

(1) Activities (miracles, healing, faith)

(2) Manifestations (revelation of Christ, vision and ecstasy, knowledge and wisdom, guidance)

(3) Inspired utterance (proclamation, prophecy, discerning of spirits, teaching, singing, prayer, tongues, interpretation)

(4) Service (giving and caring, helping and guiding)

Another (Bridge and Phipps) follows this pattern:

(1) Recognized church officers (apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers, service, administrators, helpers)

(2) The whole church (wisdom, knowledge, faith, healing, miracles, prophecy, discernment, tongues, interpretation, voluntary poverty, martyrdom, celibacy, contribution, acts of mercy)

There may be other, better ways to classify the gifts. The point is that the various gifts need to be seen in the context of ministries, but that those ministries can be understood in more than one way. Just what are these gifts in the NT? There is considerable disagreement among scholars concerning the interpretation of some of the gifts, but it will be helpful to make some comments on the various gifts.

Some gifts seem to be very spectacular in their manifestation. Gifts of miracles (1 Cor. 12:28-29) refer to a gift of power by which the lordship of Christ over all of reality is made manifest. Nothing is outside His lordship.

“Message of wisdom” (1 Cor. 12:8 HCSB) has to do with the ability to speak a word of wise counsel in any difficult situation. Many have experienced that in church situations in which someone had the ability to know the mind of the Spirit and say just the right thing. The healing ministry of the church comes next. Many in the NT demonstrated remarkable gifts of healing, and these manifestations were among “the signs of an apostle” (2 Cor. 12:12). There were some, though, who were not healed, as Paul makes clear: “Trophimus I left sick at Miletus” (2 Tim. 4:20), and to Timothy he urged, “Use a little wine because of your stomach and your frequent illnesses” (1 Tim. 5:23). Though Paul had a gift to heal (Acts 14:6-10), it is clear that he could only heal those whom God willed to be healed in such a manner. It may also be significant that Paul calls this gift, “gifts of healings” (1 Cor. 12:28, lit. Gk.). The plural may indicate that such a gift can be manifested in more than one way—miraculous healing may only be one form that it takes. Other forms might be found in the prayers of the elders for the sick (James 5:13-16) or even in the use of medicine and medical technology (see Paul's words of instruction to Timothy noted above). Certainly this gift points to the fact that God will ultimately effect the complete healing of the body in glorification. However, as in other areas of the Christian experience, what we have is in some measure ours already, but not yet completely, as the final redemption of the body awaits the return of the Lord (Rom. 8:23; 1 Cor. 15:42-44). “Distinguishing between spirits” (1 Cor. 12:10) may refer either to the ability to detect evil spirits (Acts 16:16-18) or the ability to have a discerning heart in dealing with human spiritual needs (Jer. 17:9-10; 1 Cor. 2:14). See Prophecy, Prophets; Tongues, Gift of.

Other gifts appear to be more “normal” and might not even seem to come directly from God. Teaching, service, administrations helping, mercy appear to be rather mundane, yet these are listed among the spiritual gifts with no indication that they are of inferior importance in the church. Rather Paul makes it clear in his analogy of the body that the “less honorable” (1 Cor. 12:23) gifts are just as important as the more visible and frequently honored gifts. No church could function if everyone wanted to have only the roles of pastor, teacher, and evangelist. These are charismatic (grace) gifts in the same way that prophecy and miracles are.

Interpreters sometimes ask whether the gifts listed in the NT are the only spiritual gifts that God grants. That question may be impossible to answer with any authority. It does seem safe to say that these were the representative gifts in the church of the first century, and, since the real needs of people and the church do not change, they are probably representative for the church of today as well. These gifts can of course be transferable to a variety of specific ministry contexts.

Others ask whether all of the gifts listed in these texts are still operative in the church today. It is not an easy question to answer. One must recognize first that the gifts are given according to the sovereignty of the Spirit (1 Cor. 12:11). Second, there is nothing within any of these texts that would demand that merely because God has granted a special gift or ministry in the past that He is thereby obligated to give the same gift or ministry to people in every generation. It might be the case, though again it might not be, that God would wish to give some gift which has a temporary purpose, and once that purpose is accomplished, that there would not be the need for that gift in all later generations. In some periods of biblical history, miracles and wonders were not prominent, even in the lives of some of the heroes of Scripture. Moses, for instance, witnessed many signs and wonders, but David apparently did not. This question is especially relevant to the gifts of prophecy and apostleship. Paul reminded the Ephesians that these two gifts constituted the foundation of the church (Eph. 2:20), and Jesus demonstrates to John that the names of the apostles are on the foundation of the heavenly city (Rev. 21:14). If that is so, it does not seem that those gifts would need to be operative, at least not in the same way, as they were in the first generation of the Christian church. Otherwise, the foundation would be in the process of being laid again in every generation, and that does not appear to be consistent with these and other texts. That is not to say that these gifts “ceased,” as though the church of later days lost its power and focus. Rather, it may be that God's intention for some of the gifts was that they were needed for a specific intention, and once that goal had been attained, they were no longer needed. If prophecy and apostleship had to do with the formation of the Christian Scriptures and the revelation of the NT message, then we would not expect those gifts to be needed (at least in the same manner) as they were during the early days of the church.

Though the gifts are many, the Spirit who grants them is one. God has given a diverse number of gifts to the church since the needs of the Christian community are broad and complex. The church needs instruction, exhortation, ministries of mercy, administration of its program, encouragement and healing in times of illness, wise counsel in dark days, and many other things besides. So, God has given to His people a wide diversity of empowerments and enablements, and each person should find his or her own area of giftedness and be happy with that (1 Cor. 12:15-25). But this diversity ought not to result in schisms and quarrels, since all are gifted by the same Holy Spirit, who also indwells them (Rom. 8:9-11; 1 Cor. 12:4-7).

God gives spiritual gifts to His people so that they might be effective and enabled for ministry. All Christians have spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 12:7; Eph. 4:7). These gifts are never given to believers that they might profit by them or that they might somehow use the gifts for themselves. They are given, as the apostle says, “to produce what is beneficial” (1 Cor. 12:7 HCSB). Gifts entail ministry. This means that all Christians are ministers. All Christians have tasks to perform in the service of the Lord in the church. No one is ever meant merely to be a receiver of ministry; all of God's people both give and receive ministry. Churches will never achieve the level of maturity that Christ means for them to have until all members are actively demonstrating their giftedness by engaging in the ministries which their gifts entail (Eph. 4:12-16). When churches discover the importance of an everymember ministry, they will truly experience the growth of the body, for the edifying of itself in love (Eph. 4:16). See Holy Spirit. Chad Brand SPIT, SPITTLE Spitting at or on someone is the strongest sign of contempt. The brother who refused to perform levirate marriage (have a child by his brother's wife to carry on the name of the brother, Deut. 25:5-6) would have his face spit in by the spurned wife of the brother (Deut. 25:7-9). The soldiers that mocked Jesus before His crucifixion spat on Him (Matt. 27:30). The religious leaders who tried Jesus before taking Him to Pilate spat in His face (Matt. 26:67). Spittle was used to heal (Mark 8:23; John 9:6). Mixing spittle with clay (John 9:6) may have been to deliberately break the Sabbath laws of the Jewish religious leaders.

SPOIL Anything taken by a victorious soldier. In ancient warfare a soldier could take anything he could carry that had belonged to a foe. This plunder could be precious metals, clothes, cattle, or the vanquished people themselves. Holy war laws dedicated all such booty to God (Deut. 20). The battles of Joshua illustrated this.

SPONGE Skeleton of a marine animal whose structure retains water. It was especially useful in bathing. The only instances of its use in the Bible involve giving Jesus a drink while upon the cross (Matt. 27:48; Mark 15:36; John 19:29). See Cross.

SPOON KJV translation for the dish in which incense was burned in the tabernacle and temple (Num. 7:14). Other translations are “gold bowl” (HCSB), “gold pan” (NASB), “golden dish” (NRSV), and “gold dish” (NIV). The 12 dishes were made of 10 shekels of gold (vv. 84-86). See Incense; Vessels and Utensils.

SPORT To laugh at, to mock, to play with, and in one place to live in luxury. The versions do not agree on how to translate this word. For instance, Isa. 57:4 (KJV) is translated, “Against whom do ye sport yourselves?” (“jest” NASB; “mocking” NIV, NRSV). Samson is said to have made sport for the Philistines (Judg. 16:25). Modern translations use “perform” and “entertain.” Second Peter 2:13 (KJV) speaks of the unrighteous as “sporting themselves with their own deceivings while they feast with you.” Modern translations translate “reveling.”

SPORTS The Hebrew verb “make sport” is used to indicate ridicule (e.g., Gen. 21:9) but also sport in the sense of entertainment (Judg. 16:25,27) or play (Exod. 32:6; Ps. 104:26; Zech. 8:5).

Several games of skill are alluded to in the Bible. Jacob's single-handed combat at Peniel seems to have been a wrestling match between two skilled fighters (Gen. 32:24-32). The fight at the pool of Gibeon between the soldiers of Abner and the soldiers of Joab may have begun as a show of strength through wrestling (2 Sam. 2:12-17). Job 16:12-13 speaks of archery, a sport depicted on Assyrian reliefs. Isaiah 22:18 suggests a game of ball. Foot races are alluded to in Ps. 19:5. Paul mentions Greco-Roman gladiatorial bouts, surely the most gruesome of all entertainment events (1 Cor. 4:9; 15:32).

The NT uses various games as figures of the Christian life. Paul often spoke of his work on behalf of the Gospel as “running” (Gal. 2:2; 5:7; Phil. 2:16; 3:13-14; cp. Heb. 12:1) and likened the spiritual discipline required for successful living to that required for winning foot races and boxing matches (1 Cor. 9:24-27; cp. 2 Tim. 2:5; 4:7). “Racing” was a natural metaphor for Paul to adopt, not only because of the popularity of foot races in the Greco-Roman world, but also because from the earliest days of the OT a believer's relationship with God was described as “walking” or “running” with Him (Gen. 3:8; 5:24; Ps. 119:32; Isa. 40:31).

SPOT Skin blemishes of differing kinds indicating sickness that made a person ceremonially unclean (Lev. 13:1-8). The priest declared such persons clean or unclean. Only animals “without spot” (Num. 28:3 KJV) could be used for an offering to Yahweh. Jesus Himself was spoken of by Peter as “a lamb without defect or blemish [spot]” (1 Pet. 1:19 HCSB). The faithful are urged “to keep the commandment without spot” (1 Tim. 6:14). In this sense it means to be morally pure and obedient to God's will. See Sacrifice and Offering.

SPOUSAL ABUSE Physical, emotional, and sexual mistreatment of a marriage partner. Spousal abuse is a particularly serious matter in the eyes of God because it fractures the marriage relationship established as the foundation of society (Gen. 2:24). Biblical stories such as Abraham passing off his wife as his sister in Egypt (Gen. 12:10-20; cp. 20:2-14; 26:6-11) portray the consequences of spousal abuse.

The Bible describes traits that characteristically appear in persons who abuse their spouses. Jealous men act beyond the bounds of control (Prov. 6:34). Sometimes kind and gentle speech, “buttery words,” masks violence (Ps. 55:20-21 HCSB). The effects of sins committed by one person are felt in successive generations (Exod. 34:7), a pattern well-known in abused families.

Although the husband is head of his wife, his actions toward her must be like those of Christ to the church (1 Cor. 11:3; Eph. 5:23-24). Every husband must love his wife as he loves himself (Eph. 5:25-33), showing her great consideration (1 Pet. 3:7), honor (1 Thess. 4:4), and gentleness (Col. 3:19). A husband must provide for his family, for not to do so would make him worse than an unbeliever (1 Tim. 5:8).

God chose the marriage relationship as a picture of His relationship with both Israel and the church. Any action that tarnishes the marriage relationship, such as spousal abuse, cheapens a believer's relationship with God. See Marriage.

SPRING Place where water bubbles up freely from the ground (NASB, NIV, NRSV). KJV usually translates “fountain.” See Fountain; Water; Well.

SQUAD Modern translation of “quaternion” (KJV) (Acts 12:4; HCSB, “squads of four soldiers each”). See Quaternion.

STABLE Place where animals are kept either by enclosing them or tying them. Animals were usually kept in numbers rather than one animal in a stable or stall, as is often the case today. It could be a simple enclosure, a cave, or a building. Solomon kept large numbers of horses in stalls (1 Kings 4:26). Most people just kept their animals together. Some kept them in a lower part of their homes. Jesus was born in a stable possibly belonging to an inn for He was put in a manger (trough where animals were fed) after being wrapped snugly in cloth. See Manger; Solomon.

STACHYS (Stá' kīs) Personal name meaning “head of grain.” Man that Paul called “my dear friend” (Rom. 16:9 HCSB).

STACTE Gum of the storax tree which was combined with onycha, galbanum, and frankincense to make the incense to be burned in the tabernacle (Exod. 30:34). It is a small tree plentiful in rocky places in most of Palestine. See Incense.

STAFF See Rod.

STAG Modern translation of “hart,” an adult male deer. See Deer.

STAIRS Series of steps whereby a person can climb easily to another level. Houses in Palestine usually had stairs on the outside going up to the roof. Many activities were on the roof of the average house. Sometimes the steepness of city streets would make stairs from one level to another necessary. Also wells and cisterns in many cities in Palestine would have stairs leading down to the water. There were stairs in two visions in the OT: Jacob's ladder may have been stairs (Gen. 28:12); Ezekiel's temple had stairs (steps) (Ezek. 43:17). See Architecture; House.

STAKE Instrument used with cords to anchor a tent. Sometimes translated “pegs.” It was used figuratively of Jerusalem (Isa. 33:20; 54:2). See Peg

An area at Megiddo thought to be a stable complex tor possibly storehouses) from the time of Ahab.

STALL Place where animals were kept and fed. See Stable.

STANDARD Flag or banner usually used by the military to identify groups of soldiers or a central flag to rally all the soldiers at one time (Num. 1:52;

2:2; 10:14,18). It is also used figuratively of God (Isa. 59:19). See Banner.

STARGAZER See Astrologer.

STARS Constellations, planets, and all heavenly bodies except the sun and the moon. God is acknowledged to be the Creator of all such (Gen. 1:16) as well as the One who knows their names and numbers (Ps. 147:4). Biblical writers knew many of the constellations. The Lord asked Job, “Can you bind the chains of the Pleiades, or loose the cords of Orion?” (Job 38:31 NASB).

Individual stars are mentioned (Amos 5:26; Acts 7:43). Probably the most famous and intriguing of all the stars mentioned in Scripture is the star of Bethlehem (Matt. 2). Many theories have been posited regarding its identity. Suffice it to say that Scripture does not name the star. It is one of many miracles that attest to the power of our God and is similar to the pillar of fire used to demonstrate God's presence and might to the children of Israel as they made their way to the land of Canaan. In the final book of the Bible, the Lord Jesus is called “the Bright Morning Star” (Rev. 22:16 HCSB). C. Dale Hill STATURE Usually refers to the height of a person, sometimes used figuratively (Ezek. 17:6; 19:11). Jesus “increased in wisdom and stature” (Luke 2:52). It was used to show the weakness of humanity and the need to rely on God (Matt. 6:27; Luke 12:25). It was also used as a measure of the maturity of the Christian (Eph. 4:13).

STATUTE Law or commandment; could be from God or an earthly ruler. Different statutes of God were given by Moses to God's people (Exod. 15:25-26). Joseph was able to create laws as a ruler in Egypt (Gen. 47:26).

STEADFASTNESS Word meaning to endure patiently. A steadfast person is one who is reliable, faithful, and true to the end. Paul said Jesus was a person of steadfastness (Rom. 15:3-5). The NASB translates steadfastness with “perseverance” (2 Thess. 1:4). James said that trials that test our faith produce steadfastness (1:3 KJV “patience”; HCSB, NRSV, NASB “endurance”; NIV “perseverance”).

STEAL See Robbery.

STEEL KJV translation of a word that most modern versions translate “bronze” (2 Sam. 22:35). See Minerals and Metals.

STEPHANAS (Stēph' á nās) Greek name meaning “crown.” One of Paul's first converts (“firstfruits”) in the Roman province of Achaia (Greece). Paul reports that he baptized Stephanas and his household, who have now “devoted themselves to serving the saints” (HCSB)—apparently meaning that they are now serving the Corinthian church as recognized leaders (1 Cor. 1:16; 16:15; cp. 1 Clement 42.4. Stephanas served as a member of the Corinthian delegation that visited Paul during the apostle's ministry in Ephesus (1 Cor. 16:17-18).

Robert L. Plummer

STEPHEN (Stē' vən) Personal name meaning “crown.” The first Christian martyr; foremost of those chosen to bring peace to the quarreling church (Acts 6:1-7) and so mighty in the Scriptures that his Jewish opponents in debate could not refute him (Acts 6:10) as he argued that Jesus was the Messiah. Saul of Tarsus heard Stephen's speech to the Jewish Sanhedrin accusing the Jewish leaders of rejecting God's way as their forefathers had (Acts 6:12-7:53). Saul held the clothes of those who stoned Stephen to death; he saw him die a victorious death. Stephen may well have been the human agency that God used to conquer him who would become the great Christian missionary.

St. Stephen's Gate (Lion's Gate) at Jerusalem.

Stephen was in the forefront of those who saw Christianity as much more than a Jewish sect. They took seriously the commission of Jesus to carry the gospel to the whole world and led to the founding of the world mission movement that took the gospel to the whole Roman Empire in the first century. The believers had to flee Jerusalem after Stephen's death while the apostles alone remained there (Acts 8:1).

STEWARDSHIP Responsibility to manage all the resources of life for the glory of God, acknowledging God as provider.

Old Testament Asher al bayit is translated “steward” (HCSB, KJV, NIV, and NKJV) or “house steward” (NASB) (Gen. 43:19; 44:1,4; 1 Kings 16:9). The Genesis references are to Joseph and in 1 Kings, the reference is to Arza as steward of Elah, son of Baasha, who reigned over Israel for two years. The expression is literally “one over a house,” one charged with oversight of household operations. An added term, ha'ish (the man), appears in Gen. 43:19. Thus the literal translation is “the man over a house.”

Ben mesheq (Gen. 15:2) is translated “steward” (KJV), “the one who will inherit my estate” (NIV), and “the heir of my house” (HCSB, NASB, NKJV). The expression literally means “son of acquisition.” Eliezer was a servant/slave in the house of Abram, who in the absence of a son of Abraham stood to inherit his estate.

Sar is used infrequently in this regard, and may mean also “prince,” “head,” “chief,” or “captain,” or “ruler.” The term is translated in 1 Chron. 28:1 as “officials” in charge of property (NIV) and as “overseers” (NASB).

New Testament Epitropos is the first of two primary Greek terms translated “steward” in the NT (Matt. 20:8; Luke 8:3). In Matthew reference is to a “lord” who speaks to his “steward.” In Luke Chuza (HCSB, NRSB, KJV, NASB) or Cuza (NIV) is identified as the steward of Herod.

Oikonomos, the second Greek term, deals with the person, task, or place of “stewardship.” The word first appears in Luke 12:42, a “faithful and wise steward” (KJV; HCSB, “faithful and sensible manager”). This masculine noun focuses on the person, not the task. The feminine form of the noun, two words later, is usually translated “stewardship,” highlighting the task, the responsibility granted such a person.

This term is used mostly in the NT. Other occurrences include Luke 16:1,3,8; 1 Cor. 4:1-2; Titus 1:7; and 1 Pet. 4:10. Each text illumines a little more the meaning of stewardship and frames the NT picture of the believer as a “house manager” for God in this world.

The biblical concept of stewardship, beginning with Adam and Eve and developed more fully in the NT, is that God is owner and provider of all that any of us possess. Since all belongs to Him, it is incumbent that all be used for His purposes and glory. A collective responsibility was given to mankind to have dominion over the earth, care for it, and manage it for His glory. Individually, whether financial resources, real property, other valuable items, time, influence, or opportunity, the believer is to seek the mind and will of God for every decision. God not only expects that we return a portion of what He gives us as tithes and offerings, He expects for all that we have to be used in ways which please and honor Him. He expects that we, regardless of vocation, will exercise responsible stewardship, on His behalf, of every day that we live. One day His eternal kingdom will come. In the meantime, we are to live as if it has already come. See Tithe.

STOCKS Instrument that secured the feet (and sometimes the neck and hands) of a prisoner (Job 13:27; Jer. 29:26; Acts 16:24). They were usually made of wood with holes to secure the feet. They could also be an instrument of torture by stretching the legs apart and causing the prisoner to sit in unnatural positions. The Romans often added chains along with the stocks.

STONE Hardened mineral matter comprising much of the earth. Palestine is a stony country. Often it was necessary to clear a field of stone in preparation for its cultivation (Isa. 5:2). An enemy's fields were marred by throwing stones on them, and his wells were choked with stones (2 Kings 3:19,25). Stones were used for various purposes: city walls (Neh. 4:3), dwellings (Lev. 14:38-40), palaces (1 Kings 7:1,9), temples (1 Kings 6:7), pavement in courtyards and columns (Esther 1:6), and in Herodian times, at least, for paving streets. The Israelites used unhewn stones for building their altars. They often heaped stones to commemorate some great spiritual event or encounter with God (Gen. 31:46; Josh. 4). They marked the grave of notorious offenders with stones (Josh. 7:26). One of the most popular uses of stone was the building of the walls of the temple and the building of the walls of the city of Jerusalem (1 Kings 7:9-12).

Intricate stone carving on a column piece at ancient Baalbek (Hellopolls).

Single stones were used to close the mouth of cisterns, wells, and tombs (Gen. 29:2; Matt. 27:60; John 11:38). They were also used to mark boundaries (Deut. 19:14). The Israelites sometimes consecrated a single stone as a memorial to God (Gen. 28:18-22; 1 Sam. 7:12).

The OT and NT refer to stones being used as lethal weapons. Two popular stories about the use of stones for weapons are those about David killing Goliath (1 Sam. 17:49) and about the enemies of the Christian faith stoning Stephen (Acts 7:58). See Arms and Armor.

Roman marble column shafts in secondary use to reinforce a crusader sea wall at Caesarea Maritima.

Stones were often used for weights on scales. They were employed for writing documents. The most obvious example is the writing of the Ten Commandments on stone by the Spirit of God when Moses went up on Mount Sinai.

Symbolically, a stone denotes hardness or insensibility (1 Sam. 25:37; Ezek. 36:26). It could also mean firmness and strength. The followers of Christ were called living stones that were built up into the spiritual temple of Christ. Christ Himself became the chief cornerstone (Eph. 2:20-22; 1 Pet. 2:4-8). STOOL Simply made object for a person to sit on (2 Kings 4:10). Some translate “chair” (NASB, NRSV, NIV). It is also mentioned in Exod. 1:16 (“birthstool” NASB, NRSV; “delivery stool” NIV). God is said to have a footstool where the faithful worship Him (Ps. 99:5 HCSB). James speaks of a footstool being in the assembly of the early church (2:3).

STOREHOUSE, STORAGE CITY Storehouses were built early in human history to protect harvested crops from vermin and extreme weather. The typical storehouse during the Israelite period was a rectangular building with a double row of columns that divided the building into three narrow aisles. Large, thick walls supported the roof, and small side rooms led off of the main hall. Storerooms at Herod's fortress of Masada had walls 11 feet high constructed of stones weighing over 400 pounds. Community storehouses could also be used as public markets. In large cities certain sections of the town were designated as storage areas, with several storehouses lining the streets. During the divided kingdom period, royal storage facilities were established in regional capitals to collect tax payments made in flour, oil, grain, or wine. Specially marked jars held these royal stores which later could be distributed to the army or royal palaces. The temple complex included special storage areas, both for the utensils of worship and to serve as a sort of bank where valuables might be placed. The picture of a full storehouse served as an image of God's blessing and was often used by the prophets (Mal. 3:10; cp. Job 38:22; Jer. 10:13).

STORK One of a number of large, long-legged birds that usually wade for their food. They eat fish and an assortment of animals that live around water. They are known for the care they take of their young and for returning each year to the same nesting area. The stork migrates from Africa in the winter to Europe in the spring. It stops in Palestine during its migration. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:19). It is related to the heron. See Birds.

STRAW Usually barley or wheat stalks after they have been cut (sometimes translated “chaff”). It was usually used as bedding for animals, much as many farmers use it today. The Israelites were forced to use straw in the making of bricks (Exod. 5:6-13). See Stubble.

STREETS Pathways established and constructed for transportation via animals and vehicles. The layout of city streets often was established by the shape of the outer city walls. In some cities a wide street encircled the city, following the line of the outer wall. In other towns streets radiated from a main plaza or thoroughfare. The doors of shops, storehouses, and private homes opened onto the street. Often household wastes were thrown out into the street. Small, crooked lanes and alleyways led off from main streets, ending at a central courtyard serving several homes or shops. Streets were often paved with large, flat stones, although dirt paths were not uncommon. Larger towns constructed drainage canals beneath city streets, some to carry away wastewater and others to trap the runoff from winter rains, which was channeled into cisterns. During the NT era Roman engineers designed cities throughout the empire with wide, straight, and well-constructed streets, usually leading to a central plaza or temple. Sidewalks with raised curbs bordered streets set with large polygonal paving stones. Drains below the pavement carried away sewage and rainwater. The constant traffic of carts and pedestrians often wore ruts into the streets, necessitating repair.

STRONG DRINK Intoxicating drink made from grain. It may have at first been used of beer made from barley. Wine is usually included along with strong drink but is separate from it (1 Sam. 1:15; Judg. 13:4,7,14; Luke 1:15). It was usually denied to priests (Lev. 10:8-9) and those who took the Nazirite vow (Num. 6:3). Isaiah warned against drinking too much (5:11). The Bible warns against drunkenness. The NT says that the drunkard will have no place in the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6:9-10). See Drunkenness; Wine.

STUBBLE Stalks of grain dried out in the field or left on the threshing floor. It is sometimes translated “straw” or “chaff.” Stubble burns quickly and can be blown away by the wind. Figuratively it is used of God's judgment (Joel 2:5; Isa. 5:24). Stubble was used by God's people to make bricks while they were slaves in Egypt (Exod. 5:12).

STUMBLING BLOCK Anything that causes a person to stumble or to fall. It is used literally (Lev. 19:14), but most often it is used as a metaphor. It is used of idols (Ezek. 7:19), of God's work with faithless people (Jer. 6:21), and of God Himself in relation to His people (Isa. 8:14). Paul warned Christians not to let their freedom result in a stumbling block to other believers (Rom. 14:13; 1 Cor. 8:9). The disobedient are warned that Jesus Himself could be a stumbling block (Rom. 9:32-33; 1 Cor. 1:23; 1 Pet. 2:8). The Greek word skandalon was the bait stick in a trap. It was also used symbolically for the trap itself. It came to mean a temptation to sin or to have false faith.

SUAH (Sū' ah) Personal name meaning “sweepings.” Son of Zophah of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36).

SUBMISSION, SUBORDINATION Voluntary placement of oneself under the authority and leadership of another (Gk. hypotasso). Submission is taught in the context of various relationships. In divinely ordained relationships, submission enables a unique Christian harmony, based on God's good design.

Husbands and Wives The Bible's teaching about the submission of wives to husbands begins in Genesis, which declares that God made man in His own image as male and female (1:27). The equality of men and women is the necessary foundation from which to begin the discussion of headship and submission in marriage. Adam's headship and authority in marriage were established before the fall. First, Adam was created (Gen. 2:7; cp. 1 Cor. 11:8; 1 Tim. 2:13). Second, the command to leave and cleave is addressed to the man, thus giving him the responsibility to establish the home (Gen. 2:24). Third, the woman is designated as the helper for the man (Gen. 2:18; cp. 1 Cor. 11:9). Fourth, Adam's authority is seen in that he named Eve (Gen. 2:23). Fifth, man was designated "Adam," which was the term used to describe the whole human race (Gen. 1:26-27; 5:2). In the NT 1 Cor. 11:3-10 teaches the headship of the man in marriage and bases this instruction on the creation account. Ephesians 5:22-33 instructs wives to submit to the authority of their husbands as to the Lord (Col. 3:18; Titus 2:3-5; 1 Pet. 3:1-7), while husbands should love their wives. Peter also exhorts the wife to submit to her husband and cautions that the husband's authority should be exercised with understanding and honor toward his wife (1 Pet. 3:1-7). This structure, when balanced with Gen. 1:26-27, demonstrates that men and women are essentially equal before God but different in their role and function.

Some have suggested that, according to Eph. 5:21, submission in marriage is a two-way idea. That is, along with the wife submitting to the husband, the husband submits to the wife through his loving, sacrificial leadership. However, in Eph. 5:21 it is more accurate to speak of spheres of authority and submission to one another, not mutual submission.

Christ and the Church The relationship between Christ and the Church is a paradigm for submission and authority in marriage (Eph. 5:22-33). The Church willingly submits herself to Christ, her designated head (Eph. 5:23; Col. 1:18), while Christ, as head, is clearly the authority over the Church

(Eph. 1:22-23). Christ loves the Church and gave Himself for her so as to present her spotless (Eph. 5:25-27).

The Trinity One aspect of submission in the Godhead is seen in the relationship between the Father and the Son. Although fully equal with God the Father (John 5:18), the Son freely submits Himself to the Father in eternity past (1 Cor. 8:6; 11:3), throughout His earthly ministry (Phil. 2:6-11), and in the eternal kingdom (1 Cor. 15:20-28). Within the Godhead there is equality of essence but difference in role and function, providing another possible paradigm for headship and submission in marriage.

Other Relationships There are several other relationships in the Bible that are structured based on authority and submission. First, all human beings are required to submit to God (Deut. 6:1-9; Isa. 45:23; 1 John 2:3-6). Second, the Bible teaches submission to God-appointed leaders as in the cases of Abraham and Moses or, in the NT, the chosen pastor and elders of a local church (Heb. 13:17; 1 Pet. 5:1-5). Third, human beings are required to submit to governmental authorities such as kings Saul, David, and Solomon or, in the NT, government in general (Rom. 13:1-7). Fourth, children are required to submit to, and obey, their parents (Deut. 5:16; 21:18-21; Eph. 6:1-4). See Family; Marriage.

SUCATHITE (Sū' kā thit) People who claimed ancestry from the Kenites and the Rechabites (1 Chron. 2:55). KJV has Suchathites.

SUCCOTH (Sūk' ōth) 1. Place-name meaning “booths.” A city east of the Jordan in the tribal territory of Gad. Jacob dwelt there upon his return to Canaan (Gen. 33:17). It was an important town during the time of Gideon. Its leaders were punished by Gideon for not helping him in a campaign against the Midianites (Judg. 8:5-7,13-16). Near Succoth Hiram made vessels for Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:45-46). It is usually located at Tell Deir Alla, but some excavation results have called this into question. 2. Place where the Israelites camped upon leaving Egypt (Exod. 12:37; 13:20; Num. 33:5-6). It was near Pithom and is usually identified with Tell el-Maskhutah or Tell er-Retabah.

SUCCOTH-BENOTH (Sūc cōth-bē nōth) Divine name meaning “booths of daughters.” A pagan deity that people from Babylon brought with them to Israel when it was resettled by the Assyrians after the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. (2 Kings 17:30). Interpreters disagree concerning the identification of this idol. Many feel that it is likely Sarpanitu, the consort of Marduk. See Gods, Pagan; Sakkuth.

SUFFERING Causes of Human Suffering Scripture asserts suffering is inevitable in a fallen world (Gen. 3:14-19; Pss. 10:1-18; 22:1-31; 38:1-22; 90:1-17; Mark 13:12-13; John 16:33; Acts 14:22). Indeed, Christians may suffer more than do unbelievers (Rom. 6:1-14; 8:35-39; 1 Cor. 12:26; 1 Thess. 2:14; 2 Tim. 3:10-12; 1 Pet. 4:1-14; Rev. 2:10). Experiences of suffering fall into three categories: suffering caused by physical limitations (disease, physical and psychological pain, depression, and mental illness), by natural disasters (storms, fire, flood, and earthquake), and by human actions (harming oneself or others, individually or corporately).

Confronted with suffering, biblical individuals raise important questions. One is, “Why does the one true God allow evil and suffering?” The Bible teaches much about causes of suffering and articulates some explanations. However, some instances are left unexplained, and Scripture gives no comprehensive explanation. God's reasons and purposes transcend human finite knowledge, and we cannot always understand suffering. Some events remain a mystery. At times we must trust God without understanding (Job 42:2-3; Isa. 55:8-9; Hab. 2:2-4). We will not have complete answers until eternity (John 14:1-3; Rom. 8:18; 1 Cor. 2:9; 15:1-58; 2 Cor. 4:16-18; 1 Thess. 4:13-18; Rev. 21:4-5).

One cause of suffering is sinfulness (Ps. 7:12-16; Hos. 8:7; Rom. 2:3-6; Gal. 6:7-8; James 1:13-15). Misuse of God's gift of freedom, beginning with the fall of Adam and Eve and continuing in all persons, brings devastating consequences (Gen. 3:14-19; Rom. 3:23; 5:12-21; 6:23). Sin may result in suffering (Ps. 1:1-6; Jer. 31:29-30; Ezek. 18:2-4), whether by individuals or corporate groups (Josh. 7:1-12; 2 Kings 17:7-24; Amos 1:3-2:16). However, the assumption that suffering is always the direct result of sin is wrong (Job 4:1-5:27; 42:7-8; Luke 13:1-5; John 9:1-3). Some evil and suffering transcend human depravity and are caused by Satan and demonic forces (Job 1:9-12; 2:6; Luke 9:38-42; 13:16; Acts 10:38; 2 Cor. 12:7-9; Eph. 6:10-13). Though suffering intrudes into God's good creation, twisting good into evil, nothing is ever beyond God's sovereign control (2 Sam. 14:14; Amos 3:6; 4:10-13; Isa. 45:7; Rom. 8:28-39).

A second reason is that God either sends or allows suffering to teach, discipline, and mature us. Suffering reminds us of our finitude and teaches us to trust patiently in God (Judg. 2:21-3:6; Job 1:9-12; Ps. 66:10; Mal. 3:3; Rom. 5:3-5; 8:28; 1 Pet. 5:10; 1 Cor. 9:24-27; 2 Cor. 12:7-10). God disciplines those He loves. His discipline is a sign of love rather than wrath (Ps. 94:12; Prov. 3:11-12; 1 Cor. 11:32; Heb. 12:3-13). Suffering should not be received with sadness or defeat, but with rejoicing because it leads to maturity and godly character (James 1:2-12; 1 Pet. 1:6-9).

Suffering of Believers A goal of human existence is not to avoid suffering but become godly. Suffering can be redemptive or vicarious (Hos. 1:1-3:5; Isa. 53:1-12; 2 Cor. 1:3-12; 1 Pet. 3:18). Joseph realized his suffering led to blessing his people, so although suffering is not good in and of itself, it may lead to greater good (Gen. 50:15-21; Rom. 8:28). Christ exemplified vicarious suffering in the crucifixion (Matt. 16:21; Luke 24:44-48; 1 Cor. 15:1-4; Heb. 2:9-10; 9:24-28). Believers may participate in His suffering (Matt. 5:11-12; Mark 13:7-9; Luke 9:22-26; Acts 5:38-41; Rom. 8:17-18; 2 Cor. 1:5-11; 4:7-18; Phil. 1:19-29; 3:8-11; 1 Thess. 1:4-8; 1 Pet. 4:12-14).

Another question is, "Why does God allow the righteous to suffer?" The unrighteous do sometimes prosper, and the righteous sometimes suffer (Ps. 73:2-12; Jer. 12:1-4; Mal. 3:13-15). Job was a righteous man, but he suffered great disaster. Yet through all his suffering, Job continued to serve God (Job 1:21). At a national level Habakkuk asks why God allows an unrighteous nation to defeat a more righteous nation (Hab. 1:12-13). When David realized the eternal consequences of unrighteousness, he reaffirmed the goodness and justice of God (Ps. 73:1-28).

Believers should not suffer with resignation but with hope (Pss. 39:7-13; 73:15-28; 1 Cor. 15:57-58; 2 Cor. 4:16-18; 1 Thess. 4:16-18; 1 Pet. 5:8-11). Through hope in the resurrection, Christians can endure victoriously, not in defeat or despair (John 16:33; Rom. 5:1-6; 8:17-39). The promises and presence of God turn the sufferer toward the future with confidence God will redeem even the worst suffering. The ultimate solution to suffering comes in heaven (Rev. 21:4-5). Even amid suffering, Christians experience God's care. He hears and answers prayers for strength in suffering (Pss. 23:1-6; 66:13-20; 102:1-17; Mark 11:22-24; Heb. 4:14-16). However painful suffering is, it is a shadow compared to the glory yet to come (Rom. 8:17-18). Steve W. Lemke SUICIDE The Bible records several instances of suicide (Abimelech—Judg. 9:54; Samson—Judg. 16:29-30; Saul—1 Sam. 31:4; Saul's armorbearer—1 Sam. 31:5; Ahithophel—2 Sam. 17:23; Zimri—1 Kings 16:18; and Judas—Matt. 27:5; cp. Acts 16:27). Of these, the deaths of Abimelech and Saul could be called “assisted” suicide. With the possible exception of Samson (whose death may be better termed “martyrdom”), the Bible presents each person who committed suicide as an individual whose behavior is clearly not to be emulated.

While the Bible nowhere specifically prohibits suicide, it does proclaim the sanctity of life (Gen. 1:26-27; 2:7; Ps. 8:5) and assuredly declares that God's people should choose life over death (Deut. 30:15,19). The right to give life and take it away is reserved by God for Himself (Job 1:21; cp. Exod. 20:13). Christians are called to steadfastness in the midst of trial (2 Cor. 12:7-10; Phil. 4:11-13; James 1:2-4), but John saw that in the latter days men facing difficulties would instead seek death (Rev. 9:6).

Moses (Num. 11:14-15), Elijah (1 Kings 19:4), Job (Job 6:8-11), and Jonah (Jon. 4:3) each asked God to take their lives, but in every case God refused. Simeon (Luke 2:29) and Paul (2 Cor. 5:2,8; Phil. 1:20-23) longed to be in heaven yet were content to remain alive, all the while waiting for God to act in His own time. Such instances provide ample biblical evidence that suicide is never the proper choice.

SUKKIIMS (Sūk' 1 ɪms) Mentioned only in 2 Chron. 12:3, these people were part of Shishak's (king of Egypt) army when he fought against Rehoboam of Judah. They may have been desert-dwelling mercenaries out of Libya, known in Egyptian sources as Tjukten from 1300 to 1100 B.C.

SUMER (Sū' mēr) One of the two political divisions originally comprising what came to be Babylonia. Its principal cities were Nippur, Adab, Lagash, Umma, Larsa, Erech, Ur, and Eridu, most of which were on or near the Euphrates. The area consists primarily of the fertile plain between the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers and is now the southern part of modern Iraq.

In the OT Sumer is the territory referred to as Shinar (Gen. 10:10) or Chaldea (Jer. 50:10). See Shinar.

Archaeologists believe the inhabitants of ancient Sumer developed humanity's first high civilization about 3000 B.C. Perhaps the most important Sumerian contribution to civilization was the invention of cuneiform writing, a wedged-shaped script formed by pressing a reed stylus into wet clay tablets, which were later dried, baked, and stored in libraries. The Babylonians and other surrounding peoples adapted the cuneiform script to their own languages, so that for centuries cuneiform was the dominant mode of writing in ancient Mesopotamia. Most Sumerian tablets contain economic and administrative records, but others include mythology, history, hymns, wisdom texts, law, and much more. Of special interest to biblical scholars are: the law code of Ur-nammu, the Sumerian king list, the flood story of Zuisudra, the paradise myth of Enki and Ninhursag, early forms of the Gilgamesh epic, and the descent of Inanna to the underworld.

Originally Sumer consisted of a number of city-states, each with its own protective god. Political power was held by the free citizens of the city and a governor called ensi. As the city-states vied with one another for power and as pressures from outside invaders increased, the institution of kingship emerged, whereby the ruler of one city-state dominated others.

About 2100 B.C. Sumer was conquered by invading tribesmen from the west and north. A mighty warrior named Sargon (later known as Sargon I, Sargon the Great, and Sargon of Akkad) conquered this area and extended his empire from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean Sea. He founded a new capital city, Agade, which was, for more than half a century, the richest and most powerful capital in the world.

Sumer enjoyed a brief revival at Ur (about 2050 B.C.) only to decline before the rise of the Elamites, a people to their east. Finally, in about 1720 B.C., Hammurabi of Babylon united Sumer (the southern division of ancient Babylon) into one empire. This conquest by Hammurabi marked the end of ancient Sumer, but the cultural and intellectual impact of the Sumerians continued until after the Persians became the dominant force in this part of the ancient world.

SUN Source of light for earth. Ancient people considered the sun as a necessary part of the cycle of the seasons. Thus, it was often viewed as a god. Ancient Egyptians worshiped the sun as the god Re, and the Greeks as Helios. The Canaanite city of Beth-shemesh, “House of the Sun,” probably referred to a temple in the city. The Bible simply views the sun as the “greater light” God created to rule the day (Gen. 1:16). In Israel the new day began with sunset. The Psalms compared the sun's brightness to God's glory by which it will one day be replaced (Ps. 84:11). Zacharias described Christ's coming as a new sunrise (“Dawn,” HCSB) for mankind (Luke 1:78). The darkening or eclipse of the sun was often interpreted as a sign of God's displeasure with humans. See Gods, Pagan.

David Maltsberger

SUNDAY See Lord's Day.

SUNDIAL Device, generally a flat disk with numbers around its edge, used to measure time by the position of a shadow cast by the sun. The root of the Hebrew word translated “dial” (2 Kings 20:11; Isa. 38:8) means “to go up” and usually refers to stairs. Most interpreters thus understand Ahab's dial to be a staircase on which a shadow went up as the day progressed. The sign involved the shadow's moving back down 10 steps.

SUPERScription Usually the Romans identified a person's crime by writing it on a wooden sign, carrying it before the condemned person, and finally nailing it to the person's cross. All four Gospels mention such a superscription (Matt. 27:37; Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38; John 19:19) being nailed over Jesus' head. However, they do not speak of the sign being carried before Jesus as He walked to the place of crucifixion. Superscription is also used for the titles of some psalms giving information concerning the writer and the context of the psalm. See Cross, Crucifixion; Psalms, Book of; Trial of Jesus.

SUPERSTITIOUS KJV translation of Greek word deisidaimon signifies a reverence or fear for a “deity,” “demon,” or other “pagan” gods. NASB and NIV translate the same word as “religious in all respects” and “religious,” respectively; HCSB has “extremely religious.” The word has both positive and negative connotations. In Acts 17:22 Paul uses this word to describe the religious affections of the philosophers at Athens. The term is also used in Acts 25:19 by Festus in his conversation with King Agrippa to describe religious accusations against Paul by the Jewish authorities.

SUPH (^{Suph}) Place-name meaning “reed.” 1. Hebrew name for Red Sea. See Red Sea. 2. A place named in order to help locate where Moses was when he delivered the speech found in the book of Deuteronomy (Deut. 1:1). It may be Khirbet Safe just southeast of Medeba in the mountains of Moab, but this is uncertain.

SUPHAH (Suph' ah) Apparently a place-name, perhaps meaning "toward the reeds." The Hebrew text of Num. 21:14 has no verb and has been translated and emended in many ways to achieve one (cp. translations). KJV created "YamSuph," or "Red Sea." Others find a compound place-name, "Waheb in Suphah," indicating two locations in Moab.

SUR, GATE OF Gate in Jerusalem. Some feel that it may be the gate leading from the king's palace to the temple spoken of in the account of the murder of Queen Athaliah (2 Kings 11). In the parallel account (2 Chron. 23) the gate is called "the gate of the foundation" (v. 5).

SURETY Person who is legally responsible for the debt of another or the money or thing of value put down to guarantee the debt. Should there be a default, the surety would have to pay the debt or even be enslaved until the debt was paid. Judah became surety for Benjamin to Joseph (Gen. 43:9; 44:32). God was asked by a faithful psalmist to be his surety (119:121-122). Proverbs warns against being surety for someone you do not know well (11:15). In a positive sense Jesus is said to be surety for the faithful under the new covenant (Heb. 7:22). See Loan; Pledge; Slave, Servant.

SUSA (Sū' sá) Winter capital of the ancient Persian Empire. The territory is now in modern Iran. Cyrus made Susa a capital city along with Ecbatana and Babylon. When Alexander the Great captured Susa, he found a large treasure that he confiscated. Archaeologists have excavated Susa largely around four areas: the royal palace, the acropolis, the royal city, and an artisan tell. Some believe Susa to be the place where Queen Esther and King Ahasuerus ruled. See Esther, Book of; Nehemiah, Book of; Persia.

SUSANCHITES (Sū' sán kits) Citizens of the city of Susa. See Susa.

SUSANNA (Sū zán' ná) Personal name meaning "lily." One of several women who followed Jesus and supported Him financially (Luke 8:2-3).

SUSI (Sū' sī) Personal name meaning "my horse." The father of Gaddi, one of the spies Moses sent from the wilderness of Paran to spy out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:11).

SWADDLING CLOTHES A long piece of linen used in ancient times to wrap babies and broken limbs. The cloth or band of cloth was wrapped tightly around the body to prohibit movement. Mary wrapped Jesus in swaddling clothes just after His birth (Luke 2:7,12).

SWALLOW Bird that migrates to Palestine from March until winter. It made nests in the temple (Ps. 84:3) and was often seen with the common sparrow. It was sometimes confused with the swift. See Birds.

SWAN KJV rendering of the Hebrew tinshemet (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16). Other versions translate “the desert owl” or “pelican” (NRSV) or “the white owl” (HCSB, NIV, NASB). See Owl.

SWEAR See Oaths

SWEET CANE See Calamus.

SWIFT Bird similar to a swallow but unrelated to swallows. Jeremiah mentions the swift (8:7 NASB, NIV). Other versions translate “swallow” (KJV, NRSV). Some commentators think a bulbul or wryneck is meant. Perhaps “bulbul” (Pycnonotus reichenovi) is the best linguistic guess.

SWINE Stout-bodied animals that have a large snout and thick skin. The swine of the Bible, in most instances, probably were the wild pig, still common in Palestine. While Canaanite pagans kept herds of swine, the Mosaic law classified this animal as “unclean” and thus forbade the eating of its flesh (Lev. 11:7; Deut. 14:8). Isaiah condemned the eating of swine, dogs, and mice (65:4; 66:3,17). One who tended swine was barred from the temple. A scavenger in ancient times, this animal became a symbol for baseness and paganism. They were used as metaphors for uncleanness (Prov. 11:22; Matt. 7:6; 2 Pet. 2:22). Interestingly, Hezir, a proper Jewish name, is the same word as that translated “swine” (1 Chron. 24:15; Neh. 10:20).

The fact that the prodigal son resorted to tending swine points to the extreme humiliation he experienced. Mark 5:11-17 speaks of a large herd of swine in the Decapolis area where Jesus saw them as fit bearers of demons. Many ancient people ate swine and used swine for sacrifice to idols.

SWORD Close-range weapon. The Hebrew word cherev and the Greek word machaira designate either a dagger or a sword. The Hebrew word also designates an iron tool (“axes,” Ezek. 26:9) or a chisel (“tool,” Exod. 20:25). In Josh. 5:2 the word designates stone knives used in the circumcision of the people of Israel.

Archaeology has shown that different kinds of swords were used in the ancient Near East. The sickle or curved sword was used throughout Mesopotamia, Egypt, and in Palestine. The earlier swords were straight, relatively short, and made of bronze. Ehud's sword was the two-edged short dagger; it measured about 18 inches (Judg. 3:16). The sword used by the Israelites in the conquest of Canaan probably was the longbladed, curved sword (Josh. 6:21).

An Arab mother watches her baby who is wrapped in swaddling clothes.

The Sea Peoples introduced to Canaan the two-edged long sword made of iron. This type of iron sword was kept out of the hands of the Israelites by the Philistines for military and economic reasons until the times of David (1 Sam. 13:19). The OT gives witness that in the wars between the Israelites and the Philistines, the Israelites did not possess this new weapon (1 Sam. 13:22). The sword was kept in a sheath (1 Sam. 17:51; Matt. 26:52). It hung from a belt (1 Sam 25:13) and was generally put on the left hip (2 Sam. 20:8).

There are many symbolic uses for the word “sword” in the Bible. The word was used as a metaphor for war (Jer. 14:15; Matt. 10:34); the sword was an instrument of divine justice (Ezek. 21:3; Rev. 1:16). Rash words are compared to a sword that pierces (Prov. 12:18); the tongue is like a sharp sword (Ps. 57:4); malicious words are “drawn swords” (Ps. 55:21). The word of God is sharper than a “two-edged sword” (Heb. 4:12); the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, is part of the Christian's armament in the fight against evil (Eph. 6:17). See Arms and Armor. Claude F. Mariottini

SYCAMORE Combination “fig” and “mulberry” tree (Ficus sycomorus) indicating the fig tree in the Jordan Valley that had leaves like our mulberry tree. Its fruit was inferior to the fig tree and had to be punctured to make the fruit edible. Amos was employed as “one who took care of sycamore-fig trees” (7:14 NIV; cp. Ps. 78:47). This tree has no relation to the American sycamore tree. It was used as food for the poor and bore fruit several times a year (1 Kings 10:27; 2 Chron. 1:15; 9:27). It was often planted along roadways for its shade (Luke 19:4). Poor people used its wood rather than expensive cedar (Isa. 9:10).

SYCHAR (Sī' kāär) Place-name intended to note “falsehood,” though perhaps originally derived from “Shechem.” A village in Samaria where Jacob's well is located (John 4:5-6). Jesus rested by the well and there ministered to a Samaritan woman. Jacob bought the parcel of land from “the children of Hamor, Shechem's father” (Gen. 33:19). The site has been identified variously with Shechem and a village just north of there called Askar. Archaeological excavations have revealed that Sychar and Shechem are part of the same ancient settlement.

SYENE (Sī ē' nī) Egyptian sister settlement of Elephantine, island in the Nile. It bears some commercial and military significance. Syenite, a rose granite stone, was quarried there. Syene (Assuan) is the location of the dam completed in 1902 to control the irrigation of the Nile. Isaiah 49:12 in the NRSV uses “Syene,” although it is usually read as “Sinim.”

SYMBOL Token or sign. While the word “symbol” does not appear in the Bible, both the OT and NT are rich in symbolism and symbolic language.

Sword dating from the Middle Kingdom of Egypt.

Symbols, whether objects, gestures, or rituals, convey meaning to the rational, emotional, and intuitive dimensions of human beings. The universal and supreme symbol of Christian faith is the cross, an instrument of execution. For Christians this hideous object comes to be a sign of God's love for human beings.

The meaning of symbols grows and even changes over time. For the Apostle Paul the meaning conveyed by the cross changed radically as did his view of Jesus of Nazareth. As a rabbi, zealous to keep the Mosaic law and to bring others to do so, Paul believed that anyone hung on a tree was cursed by God (Deut. 21:23). For this reason and others he strongly resisted the claims that Jesus was Messiah. Only when the risen Lord appeared to Saul did he realize that what appeared to be a curse had been transformed into a source of the greatest blessing. Christ's death seen through the resurrection is at the center of the two major symbolic rituals of Christian faith—baptism and the Lord's Supper or the Eucharist. See Ordinances; Sacrament.

Baptism is a picture of the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ. In being baptized, a person says to the world that the baptismal candidate is identifying with the saving act being pictured. That means the new believer is dying to sin and is rising to walk in new life, living now for God and with God as the center of life.

The Lord's Supper employs the ordinary elements of bread and wine to picture Christ's broken body and His blood shed for humanity's sin.

While the cross, the water, the bread, and wine are symbols at the center of Christian faith and practice, they are not the only symbols. Symbols in the OT are related to symbols of the NT in important ways. Many of the events of the OT foreshadow events of the NT. For example, the sacrificial lamb in the OT points to the sacrificial death of Christ. The parables of Jesus are rich in symbols: grain, weeds, various kinds of soil, a lost sheep, a lost coin, and a lost son. Jesus used symbolic language in talking about Himself and His relationship to persons: bread of life, light of the world, good shepherd, water of life, and the door.

The apocalyptic writings of the Bible (Ezekiel, Daniel, and Revelation) are rich in symbolic language. A person reading and interpreting these books is required to come to know the symbolic meaning of the terms being used in almost the same way as a person trying to break a code. See Apocalyptic. Steve Bond

The excavated remains of a third-century synagogue at the site of ancient Chorazin (Korazin), Israel.

SYNAGOGUE (Sīn' á gōg) Local meeting place and assembly of the Jewish people during late intertestamental and NT times.

Origin Jewish tradition claimed that the synagogue was begun by Moses, but the OT does not support this claim. Local worship was discouraged during most of the OT because it often was associated with pagan practices. Worship centered on the temple in Jerusalem. Psalm 74:8, written late in OT times, may refer to local places of worship destroyed when the temple was destroyed. Some translations use the word “synagogue” of these places, but we have no other certain knowledge about them.

The synagogue of the NT era had its roots in the time after Solomon's temple was destroyed and the people of Judah went into Babylonian exile. Local worship and instruction became necessary. Even after Jews returned to Jerusalem and rebuilt the temple, places of local worship continued. By the first century they were called synagogues.

Facts about Synagogues Synagogues existed wherever the Jews lived. While the temple stood until A.D. 70, it continued to be the center for sacrificial worship. Faithful Jews continued to go to the temple for the appointed feasts. They also participated in local synagogues. During Jesus' time there was even a synagogue within the temple itself. This was probably the place in the temple where the 12-year-old Jesus talked with the teachers (Luke 2:46).

Most communities of any size had at least one synagogue; some had several. A synagogue was to be established wherever there were as many as 10 Jewish men. A synagogue had to be located close enough for faithful Jews to attend without breaking the Sabbath by exceeding the distance the rabbis allowed one to walk on the Sabbath day. A typical service consisted of recitation of the Shema (“Listen, Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is One.”), prayers, Scripture readings from the Law and the Prophets, a sermon, and a benediction. Luke 4:16-21 is a good example of a first-century synagogue service. See Shema.

Local elders had oversight of the synagogue. They appointed a ruler of the synagogue, a layman who cared for the building and selected participants in Sabbath services. The ruler had an attendant, one of whose duties was to deliver the sacred scrolls to those reading the Scriptures and return them to their special keeping place (Luke 4:17,20).

Jesus and Synagogues Jesus customarily went to the synagogue in His hometown of Nazareth on the Sabbath (Luke 4:16). After beginning His public ministry, Jesus frequently taught and preached in synagogues (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; Mark 1:39; Luke 4:44). Early in His ministry, Jesus healed a man in the synagogue in Capernaum (Mark 1:21-28; Luke 4:31-37).

Jesus often encountered opposition in synagogues. Luke 4:16-30 tells what happened in the synagogue of Nazareth (cp. Matt. 13:54-58; Mark 6:1-6). Jesus' preaching and teaching aroused strong negative reactions. Luke 13:10-16 tells of Jesus healing a woman in a synagogue on the Sabbath, bringing an angry reaction from the ruler of the synagogue. Jesus, in turn, rebuked the man for his hypocrisy.

Jesus warned against the hypocrisy of those who paraded their righteousness in the synagogue. He warned against giving and praying in order to be seen and praised (Matt. 6:2,5). He also rebuked those who sought the chief seats (Matt. 23:6; Mark 12:39; Luke 11:43; 20:46).

As opposition to Jesus increased, He warned His disciples of a future time when they would be persecuted in their own synagogues (Matt. 10:17; 23:34; Mark 13:9; Luke 12:11; 21:12).

Synagogues in Acts The early part of Acts shows that Palestinian Jewish believers continued to worship in the synagogues. Saul went into synagogues to find and persecute believers (Acts 9:2; 22:19; 26:11). As persecution developed, believers were forced out of some synagogues. See Freedmen, Synagogue of the.

After Saul's conversion, he immediately preached Christ in synagogues in Damascus (Acts 9:20). Believing Jews were still in synagogues outside Palestine, as the ministry of Paul demonstrates. During Paul's missionary journeys, he began his work in a new city by going to the synagogue (Acts 13:5,14; 14:1; 17:1,10,17; 18:4; 19:8). The exception in Philippi was probably because there were not enough Jews there to have a synagogue, so Paul went to a place where faithful Jews met to pray on the Sabbath (Acts 16:13).

Generally, Paul, as a good Pharisaic rabbi, was welcomed and given opportunity to present his views. He found receptivity especially among Gentiles who attended synagogues, but some Jews also believed (Acts 13:42-43). Others strongly opposed Paul. Often he was forced to leave the synagogue and worship elsewhere with believers (Acts 18:6-8; 19:8-10). The church and synagogue finally separated permanently in the first third of the second century.

Synagogues in the General Epistles The letter from James is one of the earliest books in the NT, written possibly around A.D. 50 to believers in Palestine. In James 2:2 the writer cautions the believers not to show favoritism to a wealthy person who comes to worship. The Greek word used is sunagoge (synagogue). Obviously, 20 years after the crucifixion, believers in Palestine were still worshipping in synagogues that accepted Jesus as Messiah.

The letter to the Hebrews probably was written to Jewish believers in Rome in the mid-60s. The situation seems to be that under persecution some believers were leaving their messianic synagogues and going back to synagogues where Jesus was not accepted as Messiah, because those synagogues were not being persecuted.

Influence of the Synagogue The synagogue was the means of preserving Jewish faith and worship. Jews all over the ancient world maintained their distinctive faith. Synagogues were a seedbed for Christian faith as missionaries spread the message of the gospel. Synagogue worshipers believed in the one true God, studied the Scriptures, and looked for the coming Messiah. Synagogues were the obvious starting place for the evangelistic thrust of the earliest church.

SYNTYCHE (Sīn' tī kē) Personal name meaning “pleasant acquaintance” or “good luck.” Woman in the church at Philippi addressed by Paul concerning an argument with Euodia (Phil. 4:2).

SYRACUSE (Sir' ə cūz) Major city on the island of Sicily. Paul stayed in the Syracuse harbor three days on his way to Rome (Acts 28:12). The city was strong enough to defeat an attack from Athens in 413 B.C. but was defeated by Rome in 212 B.C. It became the residence of the governor of Sicily under Roman government and enjoyed great prosperity during the Roman years.

SYRIA (Sīr'īā) Region or nation directly north of Palestine in the northeast corner of the Mediterranean Sea.

Name and Geography Syria is most properly a geographical term for the region situated between Palestine and Mesopotamia, roughly equal to the modern states of Syria and Lebanon with small portions of Turkey and Iraq. The name may come from a Greek shortening of Assyria and was only accidentally applied to the area. There is no geographical connection between Assyria and Syria. Syria, like Palestine, has four basic geographical features as one moves from the Mediterranean eastward: (1) a narrow coastal plain; (2) a line of mountains; (3) the rift valley; and (4) the fertile steppe fading into desert. The two main rivers rise near one another in the rift valley. The Orontes flows north before abruptly turning west to the sea in the plain of Antioch, while the Leontes flows south then turns west through a narrow gorge and empties into the sea. See Palestine; Rivers and Waterways.

Old Testament Early History During the early Bronze Age (about 3200-2200 B.C.), Syria was home to large city-states similar to those found in Mesopotamia. The latter part of this period has been illuminated by the recent discovery of cuneiform tablets in the state archive at Ebla, the capital of a small empire in northern Syria. Many of these tablets are in Eblaite, an ancient language similar to Hebrew, and promise to aid in biblical study. See Ebla.

In the middle Bronze Age (2200-1550 B.C.), the time of the Hebrew patriarchs, north Syria was home to the kingdoms of Yamhad, with its capital at Aleppo, and Qatna. The area south of Qatna was known as Amurru (the Akkadian word for Amorite). Further south, Damascus was probably in existence (Gen. 15:2), though it is unknown from contemporary records. In the late Bronze Age (about 1550-1200 B.C.), Syria became the frontier and sometimes battlefield between the empires of the new kingdom Egypt in the south and initially Mitanni, then the Hittites to the north. Important cities in this period included Qadesh and Ugarit. The former led a number of rebellions against Egyptian authority. Excavations at the latter yielded alphabetic cuneiform tablets in Ugaritic (a language similar to Hebrew), which have shed much light on the nature of Canaanite religion. See Archaeology; Canaan; Ugarit.

Aramean Kingdoms Some English versions of the OT (KJV, NKJV) use the modern designation Syria. Most versions (HCSB, NIV, NRSV, NASB) refer to the country as Aram and the people as Arameans, based on the Hebrew word Aram (Deut. 26:5). The Arameans began to settle in Syria and northern Mesopotamia around the beginning of the Iron Age (about 1200 B.C.), establishing a number of independent states. The OT mentions the Aramean kingdoms of Beth-eden in north Syria, Zobah in south central Syria, and Damascus in the south.

By the beginning of Israel's monarchy, the kingdom of Zobah held sway in Syria and was encountered by Saul (1 Sam. 14:47). David decisively defeated Aram-Zobah (2 Sam. 10:6-19) whose king, Hadadezer, had enlisted help from his Aramean subject states (10:16,19). As a result Zobah and its vassals, apparently including Damascus, became subject to David (2 Sam. 8:3-8; 10:19). Hamath, a neo-Hittite state in north Syria that had been at war with Zobah, also established friendly relations with David (2 Sam. 8:9-10). Meanwhile, a certain Rezon broke from Hadadezer of Zobah following David's victory and became the leader of a marauding band. Late in Solomon's reign, he established himself as king in Damascus (1 Kings 11:23-25), taking southern Syria out of Israelite control. Subsequent occurrences of "Aram" or "Arameans" ("Syria" or "Syrians") in the OT refer to this Aramean kingdom of Damascus.

The rise of Aram-Damascus' power was facilitated by the division of Israel following the death of Solomon. When Baasha of Israel built a fort at Ramah threatening Jerusalem, Asa of Judah enticed the king of Damascus, "Ben-hadad son of Tabrimmon son of Hezion" (NRSV), to break his league with Israel and come to Judah's aid (1 Kings 15:18-19). Ben-hadad responded by conquering a number of cities and territory in the north of Israel (v. 20). The genealogy given in this passage has been confirmed by a stele, found near Aleppo, dedicated to the god Melqart by Ben-hadad. Rezon is not mentioned, however, and it has been suggested that he is identical to Hezion. See Damascus.

Syrian Culture Aramean culture was essentially borrowed from their neighbors. Typical Semitic gods were worshiped, the most important of which was the storm god, Hadad, often called by the epithet Rimmon (2 Kings 5:18; Zech. 12:11), meaning “thunder.” The most enduring contribution of the Arameans was their language that became the language of commerce and diplomacy by the Persian period. Portions of Daniel and Ezra are written in Aramaic, which is similar to Hebrew. By NT times Aramaic was the language commonly spoken in Palestine and probably used by Jesus. The Aramaic script was adopted and slightly modified for writing Hebrew. See Aramaic; Canaan; Gods, Pagan.

The Intertestamental Period In 331 B.C. Syria, with the rest of the Persian Empire, fell to the advances of Alexander the Great. At his death the area formed the nucleus of the Hellenistic Seleucid kingdom with its capital at Antioch. It is in this period that the term “Syria” became widespread. The Seleucid kingdom oppressed Judaism, causing the Maccabean Revolt in 167 B.C. that resulted in Jewish independence. Syria continued to decline until the arrival of the Romans who made it a province in 64 B.C. See Intertestamental History and Literature; Seleucids.

New Testament In NT times Judea was made part of a procuratorship within the larger Roman province of Syria (Matt. 4:24), the latter being ruled by a governor (Luke 2:2). Syria played an important role in the early spread of Christianity. Paul was converted on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:1-9) and subsequently evangelized in the province (Acts 15:41; Gal. 1:21). Antioch, where believers were first called “Christians” (Acts 11:26), became the base for his missionary journeys (Acts 13:1-3). Daniel C. Browning, Jr.

SYROPHENICIAN (KJV) or SYROPHOENICIAN (Sì ró pǐ nē' shūn) Combination of Syria and Phoenicia. The word reflects the joining of the two areas into one district under Roman rule. Prior to this era, Phoenicia was the coastal area of northern Palestine, and Syria was a separate country located farther inland. Jesus encountered in the Syrophenician district a woman whose daughter was possessed by a devil (Mark 7:26). The parallel account calls her “a Canaanite woman” (Matt. 15:22), the ancient name for these people. After she repeatedly asked for her daughter's healing, the Lord granted her request.

SYRTIS (Sīr' ūs) Translated “quicksands” in Acts 27:17 (KJV). Probably what is now known as the Gulf of Sidra, a place of shallow water with hidden rocks, sandbanks, and quicksands off the African coast west of Cyrene. See Quicksands.

TAANACH (Tā' ā nāk) Place-name of uncertain meaning. One of the sites along the northern slope of the Mount Carmel range protecting the accesses from the Plain of Esdraelon to the region of Samaria. Irbid, Megiddo, and Taanach each protect strategic passes through the Carmel range. Taanach thus sat along one fork of the major north-south road of antiquity that went through Palestine, usually called the Via Maris. It also sat on an east-west road that led from the Jordan Valley to the Mediterranean Sea near modern Haifa.

In the Bible Taanach is only mentioned seven times, usually in lists such as tribal allotments (Josh. 17:11; 1 Chron. 7:29), administrative districts (1 Kings 4:12), Levitical towns (Josh. 21:25), or conquered cities (Josh. 12:21; Judg. 1:27). The most famous biblical reference to Taanach is that of the battle fought at “Taanach near the waters of Megiddo” (NASB) where the Hebrew forces under Deborah and Barak defeated the Canaanites under Sisera (Judg. 5:19).

Taanach was a town of about 13 acres, about the same size as the better known Megiddo. Its history runs through the Bronze Ages and into the Iron Age, from about 2700 B.C. to about 918 B.C. when the Egyptian Pharaoh Shishak destroyed it. A large fortress was built on the site during the early Islamic period, and that fortress may well have continued in use during the Crusades.

While Megiddo was apparently a major Canaanite administrative center, Taanach seems to have been less heavily populated and perhaps the home for the farmers of the surrounding area and their tenants. Excavations have shown a number of cultic objects and installations at Taanach, suggesting that it was a religious center as well.

TAANATH-SHILOH (Tā ā nāth-Shī' loh) Placename likely meaning “approach to Shiloh.” Village located about seven miles southeast of Shechem between Michmethath and Janoah (Josh. 16:6), identified with the modern Khirbet Ta'nah el Foqa.

TABBAOTH (Tāb' bā ōth) Personal name meaning “signet ring.” Head of a family of temple servants (Nethinim) returning from exile (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46).

TABBATH (Tāb' bāth) Place-name, perhaps meaning “sunken.” Site in the mountains of Gilead east of the Jordan where Gideon ended his pursuit of the Midianites (Judg. 7:22), identified with modern Ras Abu Tabat northwest of Pakoris.

TABEEL (Tāb' ē ēl) Aramaic personal name meaning “God is good.” 1. Father of a man whom King Rezin of Damascus and King Pekah of Israel hoped to install as puppet king of Judah rather than Ahaz (Isa. 7:6). Alternately, Tabeel designates a region in northern Transjordan and home of the potential puppet. Spelling has been slightly changed in Hebrew to mean “good for nothing.” 2. Persian official in Samaria who joined in a letter protesting the reconstruction of the Jerusalem temple (Ezra 4:7).

TABERAH (Tāb' ē rā) Place-name meaning “burning.” Unidentified site in the wilderness wandering. The name commemorates God's “burning anger,” which broke out in fire against the ever-complaining Israelites (Num. 11:3; Deut. 9:22). The name does not appear in the itinerary of Num. 33.

TABERING KJV term meaning “beating” (Nah. 2:7). See Grief and Mourning.

TABERNACLE (Tāb' ēr nāk ēl) , TENT OF MEETING Sacred tent, portable and provisional sanctuary, where God met His people (Exod. 33:7-10). A tent was the dwelling place of a nomadic person. When the sacred tent was meant, it was usually used with some distinguishing epithet. Two compound phrases (ohel mo'ed and ohel ha'eduth) are used to designate this tent: “the tabernacle of the congregation” (Exod. 29:42,44), literally the “tent of meeting” (NRSV, NIV, NASB, REB) and “the tabernacle of witness” (Num. 17:7) or “tent of witness.” In both cases it was the place where the God of Israel revealed Himself to and dwelled among His people. The basic Hebrew term (mishkan) translated as “tabernacle” (Exod. 25:9) comes from a verb which means “to dwell.” In this sense it is correctly translated in some instances as “dwelling,” “dwelling place,” “habitation,” and “abode.”

The OT mentions three tents or tabernacles. First, after the sin of the golden calf at Mount Sinai, the “provisional” tabernacle was established outside the camp and called the “tent of meeting” (Exod. 33:7). Second, the “Sinaitic” tabernacle was built in accordance with directions given to Moses by God (Exod. 25-40). Unlike the tent of meeting, it stood at the center of the camp (Num. 2). Third, the “Davidic” tabernacle was erected in Jerusalem for the reception of the ark (2 Sam. 6:17).

The original “tent of meeting” was a provisional edifice where God met with His people (Exod. 33:7-11; 34:34-35). Apparently, only Moses actually entered the tent to meet God. Joshua, Moses' “servant” (Exod. 33:11), protected and cared for the tent. After the golden calf was made, God refused any longer to acknowledge Israel as His people and to dwell in their midst. Estrangement brought distance between God and the people because of their sin. Because of this situation and to symbolize it, Moses pitched this “tent of meeting” outside the camp (Exod. 33:7). Ultimately, God promised again to go into the midst of Israel (Exod. 34:9).

The exact nature of this tent is uncertain. It apparently formed the headquarters of the camp until the building of the Sinaitic tabernacle. Joshua guarded the tent in Moses' absence (Exod. 33:11). Since the earliest Greek translation, some would equate Moses' tent in Exod. 18:7 with the tent of meeting, but Scripture does not explicitly make this connection. The people could all go to the tent of meeting to seek the Lord (Exod. 33:7) either in looking for God's answer to a judicial case, in petition, in worship, or for a prophetic word. Apparently, Moses acted as the prophet who took the people's questions to God and received an answer, since “to seek Yahweh” usually appears in prophetic contexts. Prophetic content appears with the tent also in Num. 11:16-29. Moses installed Joshua as his successor at the tent (Deut. 31:14-15).

Moses called it the tent of meeting because it was the place of revelation. There God met His people when the pillar of cloud descended to the door of the tent (Exod. 33:9). It may have borne its appropriate name from the first, or perhaps Moses used the name from the instructions which he received regarding the permanent tabernacle (Exod. 27:21).

Reconstruction of the Israelite tabernacle and its court. The court was formed by curtains attached to erect poles. In front of the tent was placed the altar of burnt offerings and the laver. The tabernacle was always erected to face the east, so this view is from the northeast.

Apparently, the tent did not become a national sanctuary. It did not contain an ark or those items necessary for worship nor did it possess a priesthood. This tent was cared for by Joshua (Exod. 33:11), while Aaron was responsible for the tabernacle (Lev. 10:7). The cloud descended on this tent when Moses came to inquire of God, but the cloud stayed on the permanent tabernacle and the glory of the Lord filled it so Moses could not enter it (Exod. 40:34-35,38).

The center of attention in the wilderness narratives is the tabernacle with rich decorations, curtains, bread of the presence, ark, lights, and altar. This is the portable sanctuary Israel carefully delegates to the priests and Levites for transportation (Num. 3). The camp of Israel has this tabernacle as its center (Num. 2). This, too, is the tent of meeting (Exod. 27:21), where holy God comes to sinful people. Here the sacrifices and atonement procedures of the book of Leviticus were carried out. “I will also meet with the Israelites there, and that place will be consecrated by My glory. I will dwell among the Israelites and be their God” (Exod. 29:43,45 HCSB).

TABITHA (Ṭāb'ī thā) Aramaic personal name meaning “gazelle,” which serves as the counterpart to the Greek name Dorcas (Acts 9:36). See Dorcas.

TABLE Flat surface supported by legs. 1. Dinner tables. The earliest “tables” were simply skins spread on the ground (cp. the expressions “spread a table” and “a fine spread”). Representations of tables are rare in Egyptian art before the new kingdom (1300-1100 B.C.). The earliest scriptural mention (Judg. 1:7) falls within this same time frame. Most references concern a sovereign's table (Judg. 1:7; 2 Sam. 9:7; 1 Kings 2:7; 4:27; 10:5; 18:19; cp. 1 Kings 13:20). Tables generally sat on short legs, allowing one to eat sitting or reclined on a rug (Isa. 21:5). Judges 1:7, however, reflects a table high enough for kings to rummage underneath (cp. Mark 7:28). In NT times guests ate while reclining on couches, supporting their heads with their left hands and eating from a common bowl with their right. This practice explains a woman's standing at Jesus' feet (Luke 7:38) and the beloved disciple's position at Jesus' breast (John 13:23) during meals. See Furniture. 2. Ritual tables. A table for the bread of the presence formed part of the furnishings for both the tabernacle (Exod. 25:23-30; 26:35; Lev. 24:5-7) and temple (1 Kings 7:48). Other tables were used in the sacrificial cult (1 Chron. 28:14-16; 2 Chron. 4:7-8; Ezek. 40:38-43). Malachi 1:7,12 describes the altar itself as a table. To share in a god's table was an act of worship. Isaiah 65:11 and 1 Cor. 10:21 refer to idolatrous worship. The “Lord's table” (1 Cor. 10:21) refers to the observance of the Lord's Supper. 3. Money tables. The money changers' tables were likely small trays on stands (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:15). 4. Tables of law. Some translations use table in the sense of a tablet (Exod. 24:12; 31:18; Deut. 9:9). See Tablet. Chris Church

TABLE OF NATIONS Genesis 10 lists the descendants of Noah's sons to explain the origin of the nations and peoples of the known world. The account is unique for several reasons. First, a new chapter begins in biblical history at this point; humanity has a new beginning through Noah and his three sons. Second, the account highlights the ethnic makeup of the ancient world, listing some 70 different ethnic groups that formed the basis of the known world. Third, despite our lack of knowledge about many of the groups listed in the chapter, Gen. 10 underlines the fact that the Bible is based on historical events. Fourth, Gen. 10 provides the basis for understanding Abraham, introducing his world and his relationship to that world. The account of the Table of Nations, with a few variations, also appears in 1 Chron. 1:5-23.

The Table of Nations has three basic divisions. The people and lands of the known world fit into one of three families, the family of Shem, Ham, or Japheth. The names which appear in each of the families are names which come from several different categories: racial descent, geographical location, language differences, or political units.

Japheth's descendants (Gen. 10:2-5) inhabited the Aegean region and Anatolia or Asia Minor. The descendants of Ham (Gen. 10:6-20) were located especially in the regions of North Africa and the coastal regions of Canaan and Syria. The descendants of Shem (Gen. 10:21-31) are especially important because Abraham comes from the line of Shem. Thus Abraham is a Shemite or Semite. Because he is also a descendant of Eber, he is called a Hebrew (Gen. 11:14-32). The descendants of Shem were located generally in north Syria, that is, the region of the upper part of the Euphrates River and Mesopotamia, especially the eastern part. See Assyria; Babylon; Canaan; Habiru; Israel; Mesopotamia; Semites. LaMoine DeVries TABLET Usually a flat surface used for writing. 1. Law tablets. Scripture names the stone objects bearing the Ten Commandments the tablets (or tables) of the law (Exod. 24:12), testimony (Exod. 31:18), and covenant (Deut. 9:9). These tablets were perhaps small steles such as those other nations used to publicize their laws. 2. Writing tablets. Writing was often done on clay tablets (Ezek. 4:1) or wood tablets covered with wax (Luke 1:63). The heart is often described as a tablet upon which God writes His law (Prov. 3:3; Jer. 17:1; 2 Cor. 3:3). 3. KJV translation in Exod. 35:22 for part of the jewelry brought to the Lord for constructing the tent of meeting.

TABOR (Ta' bōr) Place-name of uncertain meaning, perhaps “height.” 1. Mountain in the valley of Jezreel. About six miles east of Nazareth, it has played an important role in Israel's history since the period of the conquest. It served as a boundary point for the tribes of Naphtali, Issachar, and Zebulun (Josh. 19:12,22), where the tribes worshiped early (Deut. 33:18-19). Barak gathered an army at Tabor to defend against Sisera (Judg. 4:6). Apparently, it was the site of false worship (Hos. 5:1). Tradition holds that Tabor was the site of Jesus' transfiguration (Mark 9:2), although no evidence exists to validate the claim. 2. Levitical city (1 Chron. 6:77), apparently replacing Nahalal in the earlier list (Josh. 21:35). It may be Khirbet Dabura. 3. The “Plain of Tabor” (1 Sam. 10:3) was apparently near Gibeah.

TABOR, OAK OF NASB, NRSV designation of a site between Rachel's tomb (near Bethlehem) and Gibeah of Saul (1 Sam. 10:3). Other translations read “plain” (KJV), “great tree” (NIV), or “terebinth” (REB) of Tabor.

TABRET KJV term for tambourine. Scripture associates the tambourine with occasions of strong emotion: farewells (Gen. 31:27); prophetic ecstasy (1 Sam. 10:5); a victory procession (1 Sam. 18:6); the procession of the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:5). Tambourine music often accompanied festive occasions of drinking and merrymaking (Isa. 5:12; 24:8; 30:32; Jer. 31:4). Often women were the musicians (1 Sam. 18:6; 2 Sam. 6:5; Ps. 68:25). See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

Mount Tabor located a few miles southeast of Nazareth.

TABRIMMON (Tāb rīm' mōn) Personal name meaning “Rimmon is good.” Father of King Benhadad of Damascus (1 Kings 15:18). Rimmon was the Akkadian god of thunder. See Hadad; Hadad-rimmon; Rimmon.

TACHES KJV term meaning “hooks” or “clasps” (Exod. 26:6,11,33) used to connect the individual curtains of the tabernacle into one tent.

TACHMONITE (Tāk' mō nīt) (KJV, TEV) See Tahchemonite.

TACKLING KJV form of tackle, that is, gear used to handle cargo and rigging to work a ship's sails (Isa. 33:23; Acts 27:19). See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

TADMOR (Tād' mōr) Place-name of uncertain meaning. A city in northern Palestine built by Solomon (2 Chron. 8:4), probably to control a caravan route. Early Hebrew scribes read Tadmor as the city instead of Tamar of the written text in 1 Kings 9:18. The city enjoyed prosperity at various periods, especially during Solomon's reign and again in the third century A.D., shortly before it was destroyed. The site has been identified with Palmyra, a great Arabian city, located about 120 miles northeast of Damascus.

TAHAN (Tā' hān) Personal name meaning “graciousness.” 1. Third son of Ephraim (Num. 26:35). The parallel list gives Tahath as Ephraim's third son (1 Chron. 7:20). 2. Ephraimite ancestor of Joshua (1 Chron. 7:25).

TAHANITES (Tā' hān īts) Member of the Ephraimite clan descended from Tahan (Num. 26:35).

TAHAPANES (Tā hā' pā nēz) (KJV, Jer. 2:16) See Tahpanhes.

TAHASH (Tā' hāsh) Personal name meaning “porpoise” or “dugong.” Third son of Nahor and Reumah (Gen. 22:24) and ancestor of an Arab tribe, perhaps associated with Tahshi north of Damascus. The Tell el-Amarna letters and the records of Thutmose III mention Tahash.

TAHATH (Tā' hāth) Personal name and placename meaning “beneath, low” or “substitute, compensation.” 1. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:24,37). 2. Two descendants of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:20). See Tahan. 3. Stopping place during the wilderness wandering (Num. 33:26-27).

TAHCHEMONITE (Tā kē' mon īt) or TAHKEMONITE (NIV) Title of one of David's 30 elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:8), likely a scribal altering of the Hebrew ha Hachmonite (REB), which occurs in the parallel list (1 Chron. 11:11).

TAHPANHES (Tāh' pūn hēz) Hebrew transliteration of an Egyptian place-name meaning “fortress of Penhase” or “house of the Nubian.” City in the Nile Delta near the eastern border of Egypt (Jer. 2:16). The site, identified with Daphnai (Tell Defneh), shows little evidence of heavy occupation before the Saite dynasty (663 B.C.), which garrisoned Greek mercenaries there to hedge against Assyrian advances. In 605 B.C. then crown prince Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptian forces at Carchemish on the northern Euphrates and pursued them to the border of Egypt. In 601 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar and Pharaoh Neco again fought to a stalemate at the Egyptian border. Jeremiah 46:14 perhaps relates to one of these incidents.

Following the destruction of Jerusalem and continuing unrest in Judah, a large group of Jews took Jeremiah with them and fled to Tahpanhes (Jer. 43:7; 44:1). Jeremiah argued against the move (Jer. 42:19), warning that Nebuchadnezzar would again reach Tahpanhes (Jer. 46:14).

TAHPENES (Tāh' pə nēz) Egyptian royal consort; title for queen of Egypt in 1 Kings 11:19-20. Her sister was given in marriage to Hadad the Edomite, an enemy of David and later of Solomon.

TAHREA (Tāh rē' ā) Alternate form of Tarea (1 Chron. 9:41).

TAHTIM-HODSHI (Tāh tīm-hōd' shī) Site in northern Israel which David's census takers visited (2 Sam. 24:6). The name is not attested elsewhere, prompting various emendations: Kadesh in the land of the Hittites (REB, NRSV, TEV) and the land below Hermon.

TALENT See Weights and Measures.

TALITHA CUMI (Tāl' i thā cū' mī) Transliteration of Aramaic phrase meaning “damsel, arise.” Jesus' words to Jairus's daughter (Mark 5:41). The girl's relatives thought she was dead by the time the Lord arrived, but He pronounced it only as sleep (5:39). The Aramaic reflects Mark's attempt to preserve the actual words of Jesus, who probably spoke Aramaic rather than Greek, in which most of the NT is written. See Jairus.

TALMAI (Tāl' mi) Personal name meaning “plowman” or else derived from the Hurrian word for “big.” 1. One of three Anakim (giant, pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan) residing in Hebron (Num. 13:22). Caleb (Josh. 15:14) and Judah (Judg. 1:10) are credited with driving the Anakim from Hebron. 2. King of Geshur, father of David's wife Maacah and grandfather of Absalom (2 Sam. 3:3; 1 Chron. 3:2). After Absalom murdered his half brother Amnon, he took refuge with his grandfather (2 Sam. 13:37).

TALMON (Tāl' mōn) Personal name meaning “brightness.” 1. Levite whom David and Samuel appointed as a gatekeeper (1 Chron. 9:17), ancestor of a family of temple gatekeepers who returned from exile (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45). 2. Leader of the Post-exilic gatekeepers (Neh. 11:19; 12:25).

TALMUD Jewish commentaries. Talmud means “study” or “learning” and refers in rabbinic Judaism to the opinions and teachings that disciples learn from their predecessors particularly with regard to the development of oral legal teachings (halakah). The word “Talmud” is most commonly used in Judaism to refer specifically to the digest of commentary on the Mishnah. The Mishnah (a codification of oral legal teachings on the written law of Moses) was probably written down at Javneh in Galilee at about A.D. 220. Between A.D. 220 and 500 the rabbinic schools in Palestine and Babylonia amplified and applied the teachings of the Mishnah for their Jewish communities. Two documents came to embody a large part of this teaching: the Jerusalem Talmud and the Babylonian Talmud.

Those scholars represented in the Mishnah are referred to as the Tannaim. Generally, they lived from the first through the second centuries A.D. The Talmud gives the opinions of a new generation of scholars referred to as the Amoraim (A.D. 200-500). Various teachers became famous and attracted students from a variety of locales in the ancient world. By this means, the decisions of rabbis resident in Babylon became normative for a broad cross section of ancient Jewish life. How strongly rabbinic decisions influenced the average Jew we cannot know. Passages from the Talmud reflect the great concern of some rabbis that their advice was not being followed by the people.

The Talmud represents a continuation of the application of the oral law (halakah) to every sphere of Jewish life. This process probably began with the early Jewish sect known as the Pharisees. Many of the discussions in the Talmud, however, seem to have no direct practical application but are theoretical in nature.

The passing on of the tradition and the remembering of the specific decisions and reasoning of the teachers by their disciples was apparently emphasized in the rabbinic schools. There is some evidence that both Mishnah and Talmud were remembered according to chants or musical melodies.

The Babylonian Talmud became the more authoritative of the two written Talmuds due both to the political fortunes of the Jewish communities in Palestine and Babylon in the first four centuries A.D. and also to its more sophisticated style. Later generations of Jewish scholars also recognized that the Babylonian Talmud was completed later and so supposed that it absorbed or superseded the Jerusalem one.

Apart from haggadic passages that are mostly Hebrew, it was written in Eastern Aramaic, the language of Babylon at the time. The Babylonian Talmud reflects a highly developed system for settling disputed questions of halakah (oral law). It includes commentary on all six major divisions of the Mishnah but deletes certain subsections. For example, discussion of the segments of Mishnah that deal with the temple service are omitted, presumably because the Jewish community in Babylon did not anticipate the rebuilding of the temple in the near future (interestingly, the Jerusalem Talmud does discuss these sections).

The Babylonian Talmud also contains theoretical legal discussion as well as information on the daily life of Jewish people in the first six centuries, history, medicine, astronomy, commerce, agriculture, demonology, magic, botany, zoology, and other sciences. It also incorporates a large measure of haggadah (illustrative stories and poetry) in addition to legal discussion.

The Jerusalem Talmud was not compiled in Jerusalem but in the centers of Tiberias, Caesarea, and Sepphoris in Palestine, since Jerusalem ceased to be a major center of Jewish learning after the destruction of the second temple in A.D. 70. It uses Western Aramaic, the dialect of Palestine. It is succinct and concise in its presentation of legal arguments and does not contain the considerable body of haggadah included in the Babylonian Talmud. The Jerusalem Talmud was completed about A.D. 400, approximately a century before the Babylonian Talmud.

The importance of the Talmud to Jewish life until the modern period can hardly be overestimated. Talmud and commentary on it became a major focus of religious action in the medieval period. The Talmud became the central document for Jewish education during the medieval period.

New Testament scholars are especially interested in the Talmud. Some of the halakah embodied in the Talmud is attributed to early rabbis and may reflect Jewish practice in the time of the writers of the NT or of Jesus. This material must be used judiciously in historical reconstruction, however, since it was compiled five centuries after the fact. See Haggadah or Halakah; Mishnah. TAMAH (Tā' mah) (KJV, Neh. 7:55) See Temah.

TAMAR (Tā' mār) Personal name meaning “date palm.” 1. Daughter-in-law of Judah, wife of his eldest son, Er (Gen. 38:6). After her wicked husband died without fathering a child, Tamar was given to Er's brother, Onan, for the purpose of bearing a child in the name of the dead man. Onan refused to impregnate Tamar, for which God killed him. She then tricked her father-in-law into fathering her child (38:18). See Levirate Marriage. 2. Daughter of David raped by her half brother, Amnon (2 Sam. 13:14). The act was avenged by her full brother, Absalom, when he had Amnon murdered (13:28-29). These acts were part of Nathan's prophecy that the sword would never depart from David's house (2 Sam. 12:10). 3. Absalom named his only daughter Tamar. She is called “a beautiful woman” (2 Sam. 14:27). 4. City built by Solomon “in the wilderness” (1 Kings 9:18). The text should perhaps read Tadmor (2 Chron. 8:4), since the Hebrew lacks the qualifying phrase “of Judah” and the Masoretic vowel points correspond with Tadmor. See Tadmor. 5. Fortified city at the southern end of the Dead Sea, marking the ideal limit of Israel (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28). If identical with 4., this Tamar likely served as a supply depot for Solomon's mines in the Arabah and as a frontier post to guard the border with Edom.

TAMARISK Shrublike tree (Tamarix syriaca) common to the Sinai and southern Palestine with small white or pink flowers. Many varieties of the tree exist. Abraham planted a tamarisk at Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:33), and Saul was buried beneath one at Jabesh-gilead (1 Sam. 31:13). Saul convened his court under one (1 Sam. 22:6). KJV translated “grave” and “tree.” Some believe the resin that the tamarisk produces may have been the manna eaten by the Hebrews during the wilderness wanderings.

TAMBOURINE See Music, Instruments, Dancing; Tabret.

TAMMUZ (Tām' mūz) Sumerian god of vegetation. The worship of Tammuz by women in Jerusalem was revealed as one of the abominations in Ezekiel (8:14-15). According to the pagan religion, Tammuz was betrayed by his lover, Ishtar, and as a result dies each autumn. The wilting of the vegetation at that time of year is seen as a sign of his death. This caused great mourning in the ancient world and was why the women in Jerusalem wept. See Fertility Cult; Gods, Pagan.

TANACH (Tā' nāk) (KJV, Josh. 21:25) See Taanach.

TANHUMETH (Tān hū' mēth) Personal name meaning “comforting.” Father of Seraiah, a captain of forces remaining with Gedaliah in Judah following the deportation of Babylon (2 Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8). A Lachish stamp witnesses to the name as does an Arad inscription.

TANIS (Tān' 'is) See Zoan.

TAPHATH (Tā' phāth) Personal name meaning “droplet.” Daughter of Solomon and wife of Benabinadab, a Solomonic official (1 Kings 4:11).

TAPPUAH (Tāp' pū ah) Personal name meaning “apple” or “quince.” 1. A Calebite, likely a resident of a town near Hebron (1 Chron. 2:43). 2. City in the Shephelah district of Judah (Josh. 15:34), possibly Beit Nettif about 12 miles west of Bethlehem. 3. City of the north border of Ephraim (Josh. 16:8) whose environs were allotted to Manasseh (17:7-8), likely the Tappuah of Josh. 12:17 and 2 Kings 15:16. The site is perhaps Sheikh Abu Zarod about eight miles southwest of Shechem. Some scholars read “Tappuah” for “Tiphseh” in 2 Kings 15:16 (REB). See Bethtappuah; Entappuah.

TAR See Bitumen.

TARAH (Tā' rah) KJV form of “Terah,” the wilderness campsite (Num. 33:27-28).

TARALAH (Tār' á lah) Place-name meaning “strength.” Unidentified site in Benjamin, likely northwest of Jerusalem (Josh. 18:27).

TAREA (Tā' rə á) Personal name of unknown derivation. Descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:35; “Tahrea” 1 Chron. 9:41).

TARES KJV term for grassy weeds resembling wheat, generally identified as darnel (genus Lolium) (Matt. 13:25-30,36-40).

TARGUM (Tār' gūm) Early translations of the Bible into Aramaic, the native language of Palestine and Babylon in the first century A.D. Targum, in its verbal Hebrew form, means “to explain, to translate.” The most important of these translations still in existence is Targum Onkelos, which was probably read weekly in synagogue services from a relatively early date. The Targums are not simply translations but seem to include a large amount of biblical commentary that perhaps reflects sermons in Jewish Palestinian synagogues. Therefore, the material is of interest to NT scholars who attempt to understand the Judaism of which Jesus was a part. See Aramaic.

TARPELITES (Tār' pē lits) KJV transliteration of an Aramaic title in Ezra 4:9. Most modern translations render the term “officials” (NIV, “men of Tripolis”).

TARSHISH (Tār' shīsh) Personal name and place-name of uncertain derivation, either meaning “yellow jasper,” as in the Hebrew of Exod. 28:20; Ezek. 28:13, or else derived from an Akkadian term meaning “smelting plant.” 1. Son of Javan (Gen. 10:4; 1 Chron. 1:7) and ancestor of an Aegean people. 2. Benjaminite warrior (1 Chron. 7:10). 3. One of seven leading officials of King Ahasuerus of Persia (Esther 1:14). This name possibly means “greedy one” in Old Persian. 4. Geographic designation, most likely of Tartessus at the southern tip of Spain but possibly of Tarsus in Cilicia. Jonah sailed for Tarshish, the far limit of the western world, from the Mediterranean port of Joppa in his futile attempt to escape God's call (Jon. 1:3). Tarshish traded in precious metals with Tyre, another Mediterranean port (Isa. 23:1; Jer. 10:9; Ezek. 27:12). 5. References to Tarshish in 1 Kings and 2 Chronicles suggest a non-geographic meaning. Solomon's (1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chron. 9:21) and Jehoshaphat's (1 Kings 22:48; 2 Chron. 20:36) fleets were based at Ezion-geber on the Red Sea. Solomon's cargo suggests east African trading partners. Thus “ships of Tarshish” may designate seagoing vessels like those of Tarshish or else ships bearing metal cargo like those of Tarshish (cp. Isa. 2:16, where “ships of Tarshish” parallels “beautiful crafts”).

TARSUS (Tār' sūs) Birthplace of Paul (Acts 9:11) and capital of Roman province of Cilicia. See Asia Minor, Cities of; Paul.

TARTAR (Tār' tāk) Deity worshiped by the Awites, whom the Assyrians made to settle in Samaria after 722 B.C. (2 Kings 17:31). The name is otherwise unattested and is likely a deliberate corruption of Atargatis, the Syrian high goddess and wife of Hadad.

TARTAN (Tār' tān) Title of the highest ranking Assyrian officer under the king; commander in chief; supreme commander (2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 20:1). First mention of the office occurred under Adad-nirari II (911-891 B.C.).

TASKMASTER Oppressive overseers of forced labor gangs employed by monarchies for large public works projects (Egyptian: Exod. 1:11; 3:7; 5:6-14; Israelite: 2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 4:6; 5:16; 12:18; 2 Chron. 10:18).

TASSEL See Fringe.

TATNAI (Tāt' nī) (KJV) or TATTENAI (Tāt' tē nī) Contemporary of Zerubbabel, governor of the Persian province “across the (Euphrates) River,” which included Palestine (Ezra 5:3,6; 6:6,13).

TAW (Tāv) Twenty-second and final letter of the Hebrew alphabet, which the KJV (Tau) used as a heading for Ps. 119:169-176, each verse of which begins with the letter.

TAX COLLECTOR See Publican.

TAXES Regular payments to rulers. Early Israel only paid taxes to support the tabernacle and the priests. Terms in the OT that refer to taxes were: “assessment,” “forced labor,” “tribute,” and “toll.” Before Israel established a king, worship taxes were the only ones levied from within the nation. Tribute had to be paid, of course, to invaders such as the Philistines. During David's reign an army was maintained by tribute paid by conquered tribes. Taxes increased under Solomon's rule. Tradesmen and merchants paid duties; subject peoples paid tribute; farmers paid taxes in kind—oil and wine; and many Israelites did forced labor on the temple. The burden of taxation contributed to the rebellion following Solomon's death (1 Kings 12). Soon Israel became a vassal state, paying tribute—a compulsory tax—to Assyria and eventually to Rome.

In the NT era Herod the Great levied a tax on the produce of the field and a tax on items bought and sold. Other duties owed to foreign powers were a land tax, a poll tax, a kind of progressive income tax (about which the Pharisees tested Jesus, Matt. 22:17), and a tax on personal property. In Jerusalem a house tax was levied. These taxes were paid directly to Roman officials.

Export and import customs paid at seaports and city gates were farmed out to private contractors who paid a sum in advance for the right to collect taxes in a certain area. Such were Zacchaeus (Luke 19) and Matthew (Matt. 9). Rome apparently placed little restriction on how much profit the collector could take. An enrollment for the purposes of taxation under the Roman emperor brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem where Jesus was born (Luke 2:1-7). In addition to the taxes owed occupying powers, the Jewish people also had to pay religious duties. A didrachma (half shekel) was owed to the temple by all Jewish males throughout the world (Matt. 17:24). The second tax was a tithe, 10 percent of everything the soil produced, collected by the Levites.

The Israelites resented most deeply the duties paid to the occupying powers. Many zealous Jews considered it treason to God to pay taxes to Rome. When questioned about paying the poll tax, Jesus surprised His questioners by saying that the law should be obeyed (Mark 12:13).

TEARS See Grief and Mourning.

TEBAH (Tē' bah) Personal name meaning "slaughter." Son of Nahor and ancestor of an Aramaean tribe (Gen. 22:24). Tebah is perhaps associated with Tubihi, a site somewhere between Damascus and Kadesh.

TEBALIAH (Tēb á li' ah) Personal name meaning "Yahweh has dipped, that is, purified," or "loved by Yahweh," or "good for Yahweh." Post-exilic Levitic gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:11).

TEBETH (Tē' bēth) Tenth month (December/January) of the Hebrew calendar (Esther 2:16). The name derives from an Akkadian term meaning "sinking" and refers to the rainy month. See Calendars.

TEETH Hard bony structures in the jaws of persons and animals used to cut and grind food. In OT thinking, the loss of a tooth was a serious matter subject to the law of retaliation (Exod. 21:23-25; Lev. 24:19-20; Deut. 19:21; cp. Matt. 5:38-42). Teeth set on edge, that is made dull or insensitive, illustrates the concept of corporate or inherited guilt challenged by the prophets (Jer. 31:29-30; Ezek. 18:2-3). Gnashing of teeth displays the raging despair of those excluded from Christ's kingdom (Matt. 8:12; 13:42).

TEHAPHNEHES (Tə hăph' ně hez) Alternate form of Tahpanhes (Ezek. 30:18).

TEHINNAH (Tə hīn' nah) Personal name meaning “supplication” or “graciousness.” Descendant of Judah responsible for founding Irnashah (1 Chron. 4:12).

TEIL TREE KJV term meaning “lime” or “linden tree,” used to translate a Hebrew term generally rendered oak or terebinth (Isa. 6:13). See Plants; Terebinth.

TEKOA (Tə kō' ə) Place-name meaning “place of setting up a tent.” A city in the highlands of Judah six miles south of Bethlehem and 10 miles south of Jerusalem; home of the Prophet Amos. God called Amos from among the shepherds of Tekoa to preach to the Northern Kingdom of Israel (Amos 1:1). The priest tried to send him back to Tekoa (7:12).

One of David's chief fighting men was Ira, the son of Ikkesh from Tekoa (2 Sam. 23:26). Sometime between 922 B.C. and 915 B.C. Rehoboam cited Tekoa as one of the cities whose fortifications were to be strengthened (2 Chron. 11:5-6). Approximately 50 years later, Jehoshaphat defeated a force of Ammonite, Meunite, and Moabite invaders in the wilderness between Tekoa and En-gedi (2 Chron. 20:20-22). After the return from exile, Tekoa remained occupied (Neh. 3:5). See Amos.

TEL-ABIB (Təl-á' bēb) Place-name meaning “mound of the flood” or “mound of grain.” Telabib on the Chebar Canal near Nippur in Babylon was home to Ezekiel and other exiles (Ezek. 3:15). The Babylonians may have thought it was the ruined site of the original flood.

TELAH (Tē' lah) Personal name meaning “breach” or “fracture.” An ancestor of Joshua (1 Chron. 7:25).

TELAIM (Tə lá' im) Place-name meaning “young speckled lambs.” City in southern Judah where Saul gathered forces to battle the Amalekites (1 Sam. 15:4). Suggested sites include Khirbet Umm es-Salafeh southwest of Kurnub and Khirbet Abu Tulul 12 miles southeast of Beersheba. The earliest Greek translation of 1 Sam. 27:8 reads “from Telem” rather than “from old.” See Telem.

TEL-ASSAR (Təl-ás' sár) Place-name meaning “mound of Asshur.” City in northern Mesopotamia which the Assyrians conquered (2 Kings 19:12; KJV, “Thelasar”; Isa. 37:12). Its location is not known.

TEL-HARESHA (Tēl-há rē' shá) KJV, NIV alternate form of Tel-harsha (Neh. 7:61).

TEL-HARSA (Tēl-hār' sá) (KJV, Ezra 2:59) or TEL-HARSHA (Tēl-hār' shá) Place-name meaning “mound of the forest” or “mound of magic.” Home of Babylonian Jews unable to demonstrate their lineage (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61). Tel-harsha was likely located in the flatlands near the Persian Gulf.

TELL Semitic term meaning “mound,” applied to areas built up by successive settlement at a single site. “Tell” or “tel” is a common element in Near Eastern place-names. See Archaeology.

TELL EL-AMARNA See Amarna, Tell el.

TEL-MELAH (Tēl-mē' lah) Place-name meaning “mound of salt.” Babylonian home of a group of Jews unable to demonstrate their lineage (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61). Tel-melah is perhaps Thelma of Ptolemy in the low salt tracts near the Persian Gulf.

TEMA (Tē' má) Personal name and place-name meaning “south country.” Tema, a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:30), is associated with Tema (modern Teima), a strategic oasis located on the Arabian Peninsula 250 miles southeast of Aqaba and 200 miles north-northeast of Medina. Job 6:19 alludes to Tema's importance as a caravan stop. Isaiah 21:14 likely refers to the campaign of the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser III (738 B.C.) when Tema escaped destruction by paying tribute. Jeremiah 25:23 perhaps refers to a campaign of Nebuchadnezzar. Having conquered and rebuilt Tema, Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon, remained there 10 years, leaving his son Belshazzar as vice-regent in Babylon (Dan. 5).

TEMAH (Tē' mah) Family of temple servants (Nethinim) returning from exile (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55).

TEMAN (Tē' mǎn) Personal name and placename meaning “right side,” that is, “southern.” 1. Edomite clan descended from Esau (Gen. 36:11,15; 1 Chron. 1:36). 2. City of area associated with this clan (Jer. 49:7,20; Ezek. 25:13; Amos 1:12; Obad. 1:9; Hab. 3:3). Teman has often been identified with Tawilan, 50 miles south of the Dead Sea just east of Petra, though archaeological evidence does not confirm the site as the principal city of southern Edom. Others understand Teman to designate southern Edom in general. To others the linkage with Dedan (Jer. 49:7; Ezek. 25:13) suggests Tema on the Arabian Peninsula. See Tema.

TEMANI (Tē' mǎn ī) (KJV) or TEMANITES (Tē' mǎn īts) Descendants of Teman or residents of Teman, the southern area of Edom. The land of the Temanites designates (southern) Edom (Gen. 36:34 KJV “Temani”; 1 Chron. 1:45). The Temanites were renowned for their wisdom (Job 2:11; cp. Jer. 49:7).

In the OT the language is usually beth Yahweh or beth Elohim, “house of the Yahweh” or “house of God,” because He is said to have dwelt there. The other Hebrew expression for temple is hekal, “palace, great house,” deriving from the Sumerian word for “great house,” whether meant for God or the earthly king. So David, when he had built for himself a cedar palace, thought it only proper he should build one for Yahweh, too (2 Sam. 7:1-2). Nathan at first approved his plan, but the Lord Himself said He had been used to living in a tent since the exodus from Egypt. He would allow David's son to build Him a house (temple), but He would build for David a house (dynasty, 2 Sam. 7:3-16). This covenant promise became exceedingly significant to the messianic hope fulfilled in the coming of the ideal king of the line of David. See Tabernacle, Tent of Meeting.

Chronicles makes clear that David planned the temple and accumulated great wealth and gifts for it, though Solomon was the one who actually built it. Solomon's temple may not have actually been the first temple which housed the ark of the covenant, since there was a house of Yahweh, also called a temple, at Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:7,9,24; 3:3), but in 1 Sam. 2:22 (NIV) it is called “tent of meeting,” whether the wilderness tabernacle or not. Jeremiah in his great temple sermon warned all who came into the Lord's house in Jerusalem that if they trusted primarily in the temple instead of the Lord, He could destroy Solomon's temple just as He had the previous one at Shiloh (Jer. 7:1-15; 26:1-6).

Israel knew other worship places with history far older than the Jerusalem temple. Former patriarchal holy places near Shechem or Bethel (Gen. 12:6-8; 28:10-22; cp. Deut. 11:29-30; 27:1-26; Josh.8:30-35; 24:1-28; Judg.20:26-27), these are not called temples in Scripture though local inhabitants may have called them temples. It cannot be determined what kind of sanctuaries were at Ophrah, Gilgal, Nob, Mizpah, Ramah, or other “high places” where Yahweh was worshiped, but “the temple” is the one at Jerusalem from Solomon's time.

Solomon's Temple There were three historical temples in succession, those of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod in the preexilic, Post-exilic, and NT periods. Herod's temple was really a massive rebuilding of the Zerubbabel temple, so both are called the “second temple” by Judaism. All three were located on a prominent hill north of David's capital city, which he conquered from the Jebusites (2 Sam. 5:6-7). David had acquired the temple hill from Araunah the Jebusite at the advice of the Prophet Gad to stay a pestilence from the Lord by building an altar and offering sacrifices on the threshing floor (2 Sam. 24:18-25). Chronicles identifies this hill with Mount Moriah, where Abraham had been willing to offer Isaac (2 Chron. 3:1; Gen. 22:1-14). So the temple mount today in Jerusalem is called Mount Moriah, and the threshing floor of Araunah is undoubtedly the large rock enshrined within the Dome of the Rock, center of the Muslim enclosure called Haram es-Sharif (the third holiest place in Islam, after Mecca and Medina). This enclosure is basically what is left of Herod's enlarged temple platform, the masonry of which may best be seen in its Western Wall, the holiest place within Judaism since the Roman destruction of Herod's temple.

No stone is left that archaeologists can confidently say belonged to the Solomonic temple. We do have the detailed literary account of its building preserved in Kings (1 Kings 5:1-9:10) and Chronicles (2 Chron. 2-7). Ezekiel's vision of the new Jerusalem temple after the exile (Ezek. 40-43) is idealistic and was perhaps never realized in Zerubbabel's rebuilding of the temple, but many of its details would have reflected Solomon's temple in which Ezekiel probably ministered as a priest before being deported to Babylon in 597 B.C. The treaty with Hiram, the king of Tyre, and the employment of the metalworker Hiram (or Hiram-abi, a different person from the king), which he provided, show that considerable Phoenician influence, expertise, craftsmanship, and artistic design went into the building of the temple.

The primary meaning of the temple was the same as that of the ark it was constructed to enshrine—a symbol of God's presence in the midst of His people (Exod. 25:21-22). Because it was God's house, the worshipers could not enter the holy place, reserved only for priests and other worship leaders, much less the holiest place (holy of holies) to be entered by the high priest only once a year (Lev. 16). The worshipers could gather for prayer and sacrifice in the temple courtyard(s) where they could sing psalms as they saw their offerings presented to Yahweh on His great altar. The spirit of Israel's prayer and praise is to be found in the Psalms and in the worship experiences such as that of Isaiah when he surrendered to his prophetic call experience in the forecourt of the temple (Isa. 6:1-8).

The account of Isaiah's experience makes it clear that the earthly temple was viewed as a microcosm of the heavenly temple where the King of the universe really dwelt. The quaking and smoke of the Lord's presence at Sinai were now manifested in Zion (Isa. 6:4). Israel understood that it was only by God's grace that He consented to dwell with His people. So Deuteronomy represents the central sanctuary as the place where Yahweh caused His name to dwell (Deut. 12:5; cp. 1 Kings 8:13), and priestly thinkers viewed it as filled with His glory (cp. the tabernacle, Exod. 40:34). Obviously, no one can house God: “But will God really live on earth? Indeed, heaven, even the highest heaven, cannot contain You, much less this temple I have built!” (1 Kings 8:27 HCSB).

Solomon's temple was shaped as a “long house” of three successive rooms from east to west, a vestibule of only 15-foot depth, a nave (the holy place) of 60 feet and an inner sanctuary (the most holy place) of 30 feet (1 Kings 6:2-3,16-17). It was approximately 30 feet wide and 45 feet high by its interior measurements for the “house” proper, not counting the porch, which was sort of an open entryway. This is similar to, though not precisely the same as, the shape of several Syrian and Canaanite temples excavated in the past few decades (at Hazor, Lachish, Tell Tainat). There is even one Israelite “temple” at the southeast border of Judah in the Iron Age fortress of Arad that some have compared with Solomon's temple. None was so symmetrical or ornately decorated, or even as large as the Jerusalem temple, even though Solomon's palace complex of which the temple was only a part (1 Kings 7:1-12) was much larger and took longer to build (Tell Tainat, in northern Syria, is the closest analogy). Around the outside of the house proper was constructed three stories of side chambers for temple storehouses, above which were recessed windows in the walls of the holy place (1 Kings 6:4-6,8-10).

The inside of the house proper was paneled with cedar, floored with cypress, and inlaid with gold throughout. It was decorated with wellknown Phoenician artistic ornamentation, floral designs with cherubim, flowers, and palm trees. The most holy place, a windowless cube of about 30 feet, housed the ark of the covenant and was dominated by two guardian cherubim 15 feet tall with outstretched wings spanning 15 feet to touch in the middle and at each side wall (1 Kings 6:15-28). One of the interesting results of archaeological research is the recovery of the form of these ancient cherubim. They are Egyptian-type sphinxes (human-headed winged lions) such as are pictured as the arms of a throne chair of a Canaanite king on one of the Megiddo ivories. The ark, the mercy-seat lid of which had its own guardian cherubim (Exod. 25:18-20), was Yahweh's “footstool.” Beneath these awesome cherubim God was invisibly enthroned.

The double doors of the inner sanctuary and the nave were similarly carved and inlaid of finest wood and gold (1 Kings 6:31-35). The arrangement prescribed for the wall of the inner court, “three rows of cut stone and a row of cedar beams” (NASB), was followed in Solomonic buildings excavated at Megiddo (1 Kings 6:36; 7:12). This arrangement is also known from the Tell Tainat temple. This exquisite sanctuary took seven years to build (about 960 B.C.; 1 Kings 6:37-38). The marvelous furnishings of the holy place and the courtyard require another chapter to describe (1 Kings 7:9-51).

The most mysterious creations were two huge free-standing bronze pillars about 35 feet tall, including their beautifully ornamented capitals of lily-work netting and rows of pomegranates (1 Kings 7:15-20). They were nearly six feet in diameter, hollow, with a thickness of bronze about three inches. The pillars were named Jachin (“He shall establish”) and Boaz (“in the strength of”), perhaps to signify the visible symbolism of the temple as a testimony to the stability of the Davidic dynasty to which it was intimately related.

The reader at this point expects an account of the bronze altar, included in Chronicles (2 Chron. 4:1), but only presumed in Kings (1 Kings 8:22,54,64; 9:25). This altar is large, 35 feet square and 15 feet tall, presumably with steps.

The southeast quadrant of the upper court of the Temple Mount in Jerusalem.

The molten sea, which may have had some kind of cosmic symbolism, stood in the southcentral quadrant of the inner courtyard opposite the bronze altar. It was round with a cup-shaped brim, 15 feet in diameter, 7 and a half feet tall, with a circumference of 45 feet. It was cast of heavy bronze, ornately decorated, and resting on the back of 12 bronze oxen in four sets of three, facing each point of the compass. Since it held about 10,000 gallons of water, it must have been for supplying water to the lavers by some sort of siphoning mechanism.

The third great engineering feat was the crafting of 10 ornate, rolling stands for 10 lavers, five on either side of the courtyard. These were six feet square and four and a half feet tall, each containing some 200 gallons of water, quite heavy objects to be rolled about on chariot wheels. Chronicles says they were used to wash the utensils for sacrificial worship (2 Chron. 4:6).

At the Feast of Tabernacles, Solomon conducted an elaborate dedication festival for the temple (1 Kings 8:1-9:9). The story begins with a procession of the ark containing the two tables of the Decalogue. God's glory in the shining cloud of His presence filled the sanctuary (1 Kings 8:1-11). Then the king blessed the assembly, praised God for His covenant mercies in fulfilling Nathan's promise to David, and gave a long, fervent prayer on behalf of seven different situations in which the prayers of His people should arise to the heavenly throne of God from His earthly temple, closing with a benediction. Solomon provided myriads of sacrifices for the seven days of the great dedication festival. God had consecrated this house of prayer, but He required covenant obedience of Solomon and each of his successors, lest He have to destroy this magnificent sanctuary because of the apostasy of His people (1 Kings 9:1-9). The consistent emphasis of Solomon's prayer and God's answer is the awareness of sin and the necessity for wholehearted repentance to keep the temple a ceremonial and meaningful symbol of worship and devotion (2 Chron. 7:13-14). The great prophets preached that, in their temple worship, Israel was not able to avoid syncretism with pagan religious impulses or the hypocritical irrelevance of meaningless overemphasis upon ritual without righteous obedience to their sovereign overlord (Isa. 1:10-17; Mic. 6:6-8; Jer. 7:1-26).

Herod's temple (20 B.C.-A.D. 70) was begun in the 18th year of King Herod the Great's reign (37-4 B.C.). According to Josephus, the first-century Jewish historian, Herod's temple was constructed after removing the old foundations. The old edifice, Zerubbabel's temple, was a modest restoration of the temple of Solomon destroyed by the Babylonian conquest. The central building was completed in just two years—without any interruption of the temple services. The surrounding buildings and spacious courts, considerably enlarged, were not completed until A.D. 64. The Temple was destroyed by the Romans under the command of Titus during the second Jewish revolt in A.D. 70.

The history of Solomon's temple has many ups and downs through its almost 400 years of existence. Its treasures of gold were often plundered by foreign invaders like Shishak of Egypt (1 Kings 14:25-26). At the division of the kingdoms, Jeroboam set up rival sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan that drew worshipers away from Jerusalem for 200 years. King Asa plundered his own temple treasuries to buy a military ally, Benhadad of Syria against Baasha, king of North Israel (1 Kings 15:18-19), though he had previously repaired the temple altar and carried out limited worship reforms (2 Chron. 15:8-18). Temple repairs were carried out by Jehoash (Joash) of Judah after the murder of wicked Queen Athaliah, but even he had to strip the temple treasuries to buy off Hazael, king of Syria (2 Kings 12). Jehoash (Joash), king of Israel, when foolishly challenged to battle by Amaziah, king of Judah, not only defeated him, but also came to Jerusalem and plundered the temple (1 Kings 14:12-14). King Ahaz plundered his own temple for tribute to Assyria during the Syro-Ephraimitic war of 735 B.C., even stripping some of the bronze furnishings in the courtyard (2 Kings 16:8-9,17). Good King Hezekiah raised a huge tribute for Sennacherib, king of Assyria, in his 701 B.C. invasion, even stripping gold off the temple doors (2 Kings 18:13-16). During the long and disastrous reign of King Manasseh many abominable idols and pagan cult objects were placed in the temple that good King Josiah had to remove during his reform (2 Kings 23:4-6,11-12). Both Hezekiah and Josiah were able to centralize worship in the Jerusalem temple during their reforms and even recover some worshipers from the north for the Jerusalem sanctuary, but Josiah's successor, Jehoiakim, reversed all of Josiah's reforms and filled up the temple with pagan abominations (Ezek. 8). Despite the warnings of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the people refused to repent of their political and religious folly, and their temple and holy city were first plundered by Nebuchadnezzar in 597 B.C., then burned by Nebuzaradan, his general, in 587/586 B.C.

For both groups of Judah, those in Babylon and those still in Jerusalem, the loss of the temple and city were a grievous blow (Ps. 137; Lam. 1-5). But Jeremiah and Ezekiel had prepared a remnant in their prophecies for a return and rebuilding of the temple.

Zerubbabel's Temple The decree of Cyrus in 538 B.C. permitted the Jews to return from the Babylonian exile with the temple vessels that had been taken. It charged them to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem with Persian financial aid and freewill offerings from Jews who remained in Babylon (Ezra 1:1-4). Sheshbazzar, the governor, laid the foundation. The project was halted when the people of the land discouraged the builders (Ezra 1:8,11; 4:1-5). Then in the second year of Darius, 520 B.C., the work was renewed by the new governor Zerubbabel and Jeshua the high priest at the urging of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (Ezra 5:1-2).

When local Persian officials tried to stop the rebuilding, Darius found a record of Cyrus' decree that included the overall dimensions (Ezra 6:1-6). The size seems to have been approximately that of Solomon's temple. Ezekiel's temple vision had considerable influence on the new temple (Ezek. 40-42), so that Zerubbabel's temple perhaps was mounted on a platform and measured about 100 feet by 100 feet with the interior dimensions being virtually the same as those of Solomon's temple. It was probably not as ornately decorated (Ezra 3:12-13; Hag. 2:3).

The differences between the two sanctuaries have to do with furniture and courtyard arrangements or gates. As Jeremiah had foreseen, the ark of the covenant was never replaced (Jer. 3:16). Josephus said the holy of holies was empty. It was now separated from the holy place by a veil instead of a door. There was only one seven-branched lampstand, as had been true of the tabernacle, probably the one pictured by Titus in his triumphal arch at Rome as having been carried off when Herod's temple was plundered. The importance of the new temple was that it became a symbol of the Lord's holiness and the religious center of life for the new community. It was completed in 515 B.C. and dedicated with great joy (Ezra 6:14-16). Priesthood had replaced kingship as the authority of the Post-exilic community.

The Maccabean revolt changed this, and Judas Maccabeus rededicated the temple in 164 B.C. after Antiochus had profaned it in December 167 B.C. This joyous event is still remembered in the Jewish celebration of Hanukkah. Judas' successors appointed themselves as high priests, and the temple became more like a political institution. Pompey captured the temple in 63 B.C. but did not plunder it. See Intertestamental History and Literature.

Herod's Temple Herod the Great came to power in 37 B.C. and determined that he would please his Jewish subjects and show off his style of kingship to the Romans by making the Jerusalem temple bigger and better than it had ever been. His most notable contribution was the magnificent stonework of the temple platform that was greatly enlarged. The descriptions in Josephus and the Mishnah have been fleshed out by recent archaeological discoveries.

The Muslim Dome of the Rock on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem with the Wailing Wall in the foreground.

Herod surrounded the whole enclosure with magnificent porches, particularly the royal stoa along the southern wall. Through the Huldah gates, where double and triple arches can still be seen, worshipers went up through enclosed passageways into the court of the Gentiles. Greek inscriptions separating this court from the court of the women and the holier inner courts of Israel (men) and the priests have been found. The steps south of the temple, where Jesus may have taught on several occasions, have been excavated and reconstructed. An inscription: “To the place of trumpeting” was found below the southwest corner where there was a monumental staircase ascending into the temple from the main street below. Perhaps this was the “temple pinnacle” from which Satan tempted Jesus to throw Himself.

The Jerusalem temple is the focus of many NT events. The birth of John the Baptist was announced there (Luke 1:11-20). The offering by Joseph and Mary at the circumcision of the baby Jesus was brought there. Simeon and Anna greeted Jesus there (2:22-38). Jesus came there as a boy of 12 (2:42-51) and later taught there during His ministry (John 7:14). His cleansing of the temple was instrumental in precipitating His death. He knew no earthly temple was necessary to the worship of God (4:21-24). He predicted the temple's destruction by the Romans, and His warnings to His followers to flee when this happened actually saved many Christians' lives (Mark 13:2,14-23). Early Christians continued to worship there, and Paul was arrested there (Acts 3; 21:27-33).

After the Jewish revolt in A.D. 66, Vespasian and then his son Titus crushed all resistance. The temple was destroyed in A.D. 70. Stephen's preaching tended to liberate Christian thinking from the necessity of a temple (Acts 7:46-50), and Paul thought of the church and Christians as the new temple (1 Cor. 3:16-17; 6:19-20). For John, the ideal that the temple represented will ultimately be realized in a “new Jerusalem” (Rev. 21:2). TEMPLES, PAGAN See Canaan; Egypt; Fertility Cult; Gods, Pagan; High Place; Mystery Religions.

TEMPTATION Broadly defined, temptation is the enticement to do evil. Satan is the tempter (Matt. 4:3; 1 Thess. 3:5). Beginning with Eve, Satan successfully tempted Adam, Cain, Abraham, and David to sin. He was less successful with Job, and Jesus was “tested in every way as we are, yet without sin” (Heb. 4:15 HCSB). James explains that God cannot be tempted by evil, and He does not tempt anyone (James 1:13). Temptation may be for the purpose of destroying a person through sin leading to death and hell. This is Satan's intent. God may allow testing for the purpose of bringing forth faith and patience, which ultimately honor Him, as in the case of Job. James further explains that a blessing awaits the one who endures temptation (James 1:12).

James describes the mechanism of temptation. “Each person is tempted when he is drawn away and enticed by his own evil desires” (James 1:14 HCSB). The origin of the temptation is attributed to fallen human nature (Rom. 6:6; Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9; and 2 Cor. 5:17). On the other hand, God does not desire His children to be ensnared by evil but to overcome evil with good (Rom. 12:21).

Next James uses a metaphor, that of a woman bearing children, to paint a terrible picture. Once a person has been drawn away by his own desire, desire becomes pregnant and gives birth to sin. Temptation is not sin; yielding to temptation is. Jesus said that cherishing adultery in thought is to commit adultery (Matt. 5:28).

When the full cycle is completed, sin in turn brings forth death. For the unbeliever, spiritual death is to be separated from God forever in the lake of fire (Rev. 20:10,15). For the believer, “sin that brings death” may mean that he or she is disciplined by dying early (Acts 5:1-5; 1 John 5:16; Gal. 6:8).

Paul explains that “no temptation has overtaken you except what is common to humanity. God is faithful and He will not allow you to be tempted beyond what you are able, but with the temptation He will provide the way of escape, so that you are able to bear it” (1 Cor. 10:13 HCSB). He desires us to withstand the temptation and glorify Him in our bodies, which have been purchased by His blood (1 Cor. 6:20). See Devil, Satan, Evil, Demonic; Temptation of Jesus. David Lanier

TEMPTATION OF JESUS Jesus was tempted by the devil in the wilderness subsequent to His baptism by John. These are the only two events described by the synoptic evangelists between Jesus' childhood and the beginning of His ministry. While no reason for the temptations is given, each of the Synoptics associates Jesus' temptations closely with His baptism. The references to sonship, “You are My beloved Son; in You I take delight!” (Mark 1:11 HCSB; Matt. 3:17; Luke 3:22) and “If You are the Son of God” (Matt. 4:3,6; Luke 4:3,9) suggest that one aspect of the purpose was a test to determine what kind of Messiah Jesus would be.

The Parthenon, a temple dedicated to Athena, dominates the Acropolis in Athens, Greece.

The brevity of Mark's account (1:13-14) is striking. He reports only that the Spirit drove Jesus into the wilderness, He remained there 40 days, wild animals were present, and angels ministered to Him. The unique feature is the reference to the presence of wild animals.

Matthew and Luke describe in some detail three encounters between Jesus and Satan. The foremost difference between the accounts is the reversal of the order of the final two temptations. Matthew connects the first two with a connective particle that can have chronological implications. Luke's interest in Jerusalem and the temple (1:9; 2:22,25,37,41-50) make it more likely that he used the third temptation as a climax to the temptations.

Forty days in the wilderness is reminiscent of the fasts of Moses (Exod. 34:28; Deut. 9:9) and Elijah (1 Kings 9:8) and the 40 years of the Israelites in the desert (Num. 14:33; 32:13). The only parallel developed, however, is the wilderness wanderings of Israel. As God led Israel in the wilderness, likewise the Spirit led Jesus into the wilderness. God tested Israel in the wilderness and they failed. God allowed Jesus to be tempted by the devil and He succeeded in resisting.

The first temptation (Matt. 4:3-4) was an attempt to get Jesus to doubt God's providential care. If Jesus had turned the stones into bread, He would have been acting independently from His heavenly Father. The devil did not try to get Jesus to doubt His sonship, which was announced from heaven at His baptism (Matt. 3:17). Rather, the devil argued that since Jesus is the Son of God, He should use His powers to meet His own needs. Jesus' response (Deut. 8:3) teaches that spiritual nourishment is more significant than physical nourishment.

In the second temptation (Matt. 4:5-7) Satan misapplied Scripture (Ps. 91:11-12) in an attempt to get Jesus to jump from the highest point of the temple to test God's promise to protect Jesus from physical harm. Jesus' quote of Deut. 6:16 alludes to Israel's rebellion at Massah (Exod. 17:1-7). Jesus refused to test the faithfulness and protection of God. He trusted the Father and needed no tests.

A Christian monastery on the Mount of Temptation marks the traditional site of Jesus' temptation.

The third temptation was an opportunity for Jesus to seize a kingdom and avoid the cross. Satan first presented Jesus the “bait” (“all the kingdoms of the world and their splendor”) before the compromising stipulation (“if You will fall down and worship me”). Jesus response to the devil (Deut. 6:13) emphasized the close relationship between worship and service. While Israel had a tendency to chase false gods (Deut. 6:10-15), Jesus maintained total allegiance to God. Angels ministered to Jesus after the temptations.

Luke's placement of the genealogy (3:23-38) between Jesus' baptism (3:21-22) and temptation (4:1-13) may suggest that Jesus, "My beloved Son" (3:22 HCSB), is beginning to reverse what Adam, "son of God" (3:38), did in the fall. Whereas the first Adam fell in the idyllic setting of Eden, the second Adam withstood the enemy in the barren wilderness. Another unique feature in Luke's account is the role of the Spirit. He comments (4:1) that the Spirit led Jesus to the wilderness. After the temptation Jesus "returned to Galilee in the power of the Spirit" (4:14). Luke is the only evangelist to note that Satan's departure was not the end of the conflict (4:13), but the intensity was not repeated until Gethsemane (22:40,46,53) and Golgotha (23:35-36,39).

Several significant features stand out as one contemplates Jesus' temptation in the wilderness. His encounter with the devil in the wilderness is a source of encouragement and instruction to believers as they battle temptation (Heb. 2:18; 4:15). His commitment to the Father's will, use of Scripture, and resolve to resist the devil (James 4:7) are helpful examples for battling temptation. TEN See Numbers Systems and Number Symbolism.

TEN COMMANDMENTS Although many people refer to the "Decalogue" as "the Ten Commandments," this is unfortunate for several reasons. First, it obscures the fact that this is not what the OT calls them. Wherever it is referred to by title it is identified as aseret haddebarim, "the Ten Words" (Exod. 34:28; Deut. 4:13; 10:4). This sense is captured precisely in the Greek word decalogos. Second, in both the original context in which the Decalogue was given (Exod. 20:1) and Moses' remembrance of the event in Deut. 4:12 and 5:22, the Decalogue is presented as a set of spoken words rather than a written set of laws. Third, "Ten Commandments" obscures the fact that the Decalogue is a covenant document whose form follows ancient Near Eastern treaty tradition. Fourth, as a code of laws the Decalogue is virtually unenforceable. For all these reasons, although the 10 statements are in the form of commands, we should follow the lead of the biblical texts and refer to them as the "Ten Words/Declarations,” the 10 fundamental principles of covenant relationship. The stipulations revealed in the “Book of the Covenant,” the “Holiness Code,” and other parts of the Pentateuch represent clarifications and applications of these principles. Presumably the stipulations of the covenant were reduced to 10 principles so they could be easily memorized.

Apart from Moses' citation of the Decalogue in Deut. 5, the OT gives little if any evidence of giving the Decalogue greater authority than any of the other laws revealed at Sinai. This does not mean that these tablets were not treated as special. On the contrary, Moses notes that the Decalogue contained the only revelation that was communicated by God directly to the people (Deut. 4:12-13; 5:22) and committed to writing on tablets of stone by God's own hand (Exod. 24:12; 31:18; 34:1; Deut. 4:13; 5:22; 10:1-4). All subsequent revelation at Sinai was communicated indirectly through Moses, the covenant mediator. The special status of the tablets is reflected in the fact that these tablets (and these alone) were deposited inside the ark of the covenant (Deut. 10:5; 1 Kings 8:9).

Two forms dominate Israelite covenant law. Casuistic law is framed in the third person, usually deals with specific situations, often cites consequences for compliance/non-compliance, and is cast in the following form: “If a person does X, then Y will/shall be the consequence.” Apodictic law by contrast is framed in the second person, usually deals with general principles, rarely sets conditions or cites consequences, and is cast in the following form: “You shall/shall not do X.” The Decalogue belongs to the latter category.

The Decalogue may be interpreted legitimately as a Bill of Rights, perhaps the world's first Bill of Rights. Yet unlike modern bills of rights, this document seeks not to secure my rights but to protect the rights of others. I am perceived as a potential violator of the other person's rights. Understood this way, the significance of the 10 declarations may be summarized as follows:

St. Catherine's Monastery as seen from atop Mount Sinai where Moses received the Ten Commandments.

- (1) God's right to exclusive allegiance (Exod. 20:3; Deut. 5:7).
- (2) God's right to self-definition (Exod. 20:4-6; Deut. 5:8-10).
- (3) God's right to proper representation by His people (Exod. 20:7; Deut. 5:11).
- (4) God's right to His people's time (Exod. 20:8-11); a household's right to humane treatment by the head of the house (Deut. 5:12-15).
- (5) My parents' right to respect (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16).
- (6) My neighbor's right to life (Exod. 20:13; Deut. 5:17).
- (7) My neighbor's right to a secure marriage (Exod. 20:14; Deut. 5:18).
- (8) My neighbor's right to personal property (Exod. 20:15; Deut. 5:19).
- (9) My neighbor's right to an honest hearing in court (Exod. 20:16; Deut. 5:20).

(10) My neighbor's right to secure existence in the community (Exod. 20:17; Deut. 5:21).

The first four statements protect the rights of the covenant Lord; the last six protect the rights of the covenant community. The Decalogue calls on the redeemed to respond to the grace they have experienced in salvation with covenant commitment, first to God, and then to others. This is the essence of “love” ('ahab) as understood in both the OT and NT. See Law, Ten Commandments, Torah. Daniel I. Block TENDERHEARTED KJV used “tenderhearted” in two senses: of timidity (2 Chron. 13:7) and of compassion (Eph. 4:32). See Bowels; Compassion.

TENON KJV, NASB, REB, RSV translation of a Hebrew term meaning “hands,” applied to projections designed to fit into a mortise or socket to form a joint (Exod. 26:17,19; 36:22,24). Other translations employ “projections” (NIV, TEV) or “pegs” (NRSV).

TERAH (Tēr' ā) Personal name, perhaps meaning “ibex.” 1. The father of Abraham, Nahor, and Haran (Gen. 11:26). Along with a migration of people from Ur of the Chaldees, Terah moved his family, following the Euphrates River to Haran (11:31). He intended to continue from Haran into Canaan but died in Mesopotamia at the age of 205 (11:32). A debate has centered on Terah's religious practices, for Josh. 24:2 apparently points to his family when it claims records that the father worshiped gods other than Yahweh. 2. Wilderness campsite (Num. 33: 27-28).

TERAPHIM (Tēr' ā phīm) Transliteration of a Hebrew word for household idols of indeterminate size and shape. They were also referred to as “gods” (cp. Gen. 31:19, 30-35; 1 Sam. 19:13). Some scholars have understood ancient Near Eastern rights of inheritance as being based on the possession of these images as shown in Nuzi inheritance documents. However, the evidence is ambiguous in determining the motive of Rachel's theft or their overall meaning. Jacob (Gen. 35:2) disposed of such religious artifacts before returning to Bethel. Teraphim were sometimes used for divination (Judg. 17:5; 18:14-20; 1 Sam. 15:23; 2 Kings 23:24; Hos. 3:4; Ezek. 21:21; Zech.

10:2). The Bible condemns such idolatrous practices, however. Translations used different words in different passages to translate “teraphim.” See Divination and Magic.

David M. Fleming

TEREBINTH (Tēr' ə bīnth) Large, spreading tree whose species is uncertain so that translations vary in reading the Hebrew 'elah into English (cp. 2 Sam. 18:9; Isa. 1:30; 6:13). The tree had religious connections as a place under which pagan gods were worshiped (Hos. 4:13; Ezek. 6:13) which were at times taken up in Israel's religion (Gen. 35:4; Josh. 24:26; Judg. 6:11; 1 Kings 13:14). See Diviner's Oak.

TERESH (Tēr' rēsh) Personal name meaning “firm, solid,” or derived from an Old Persian term meaning “desire.” One of two royal eunuchs who plotted an unsuccessful assassination of the Persian king Ahasuerus. Following their exposure by Mordecai, the two were hung (Esther 2:21-23).

TERRACE KJV translation of a Hebrew term of uncertain meaning (2 Chron. 9:11). Most modern translations follow the earliest Greek and Latin versions in reading “steps” (NASB, NIV, RSV) or “stairs” (TEV). REB reads “stands.”

TERROR See Fear; Fear of Isaac.

TERTIUS (Tēr' shī ūs) Latin personal name meaning “third [son].” Paul's amanuensis (secretary) for the writing of Romans who included his own greeting at Rom. 16:22. Some suggest that Quartus, whose name means “fourth,” is perhaps Tertius' younger brother (Rom. 16:23).

TERTULLUS (Tēr' tūl' ūs) Diminutive of the personal name Tertius, meaning “third” (Acts 24:1-8). Tertullus was the prosecutor opposing Paul before Felix, the Roman governor of Judea. Tertullus accused Paul of being a political agitator and of attempting to defile the temple. According to the longer Western text (24:7), Tertullus was a Jew. The shorter text allows for his being a Roman. Whatever his ethnic origin, he was skilled in judicial oratory and was familiar with Roman legal conventions.

TESTAMENT See Covenant.

TETH (Tath) Ninth letter of the Hebrew alphabet which KJV used as a heading for Ps. 119:65-72, each verse of which begins with this letter.

TETRARCH Political position in the early Roman Empire. It designated the size of the territory ruled (literally the “fourth part”) and the amount of dependence on Roman authority. Luke 3:1 names one of the tetrarchs who served in the year of Jesus' birth. The position became less powerful with time, and the limits of authority narrowed. When Herod the Great died, his kingdom was divided among his three sons, one of whom was called “ethnarch” while the other two were named tetrarchs. See Roman Law.

TETRATEUCH See Pentateuch.

TEXTUAL CRITICISM, NEW TESTAMENT Textual Criticism (sometimes called Lower Criticism) is the art and science of reconstructing the text of a work that no longer exists in its original form. We should note that the word “criticism” is not a negative term. It refers to methods of careful study and analysis. When applied to the NT, the ultimate purpose is to determine the original text of each book with the greatest possible degree of detail and accuracy through the careful study and comparison of all extant manuscripts. This is accomplished primarily by the collation of manuscripts and evaluation of the data derived from collation. To collate is to compare the text of a manuscript with a base text, letter by letter, and to record each and every difference from the base text. By the comparison of the collations of as many manuscripts as possible, at all places where manuscripts differ (called variant readings or variants), the original text is sought. This process of comparison and evaluation is the primary element of the reconstruction of the original text.

Other objectives include following the historical transmission of the text (determining the text that was used at particular times and places) and determining relationships between and among manuscripts (allowing them to be grouped into groups, families, and text-types). This allows many insights into the theological situations and controversies that occurred during the early centuries of Christian history and into the historical development of Christian doctrine.

It is important to remember that prior to the printing press every copy of Scripture was made by hand, and all hand-copied documents of substantial length of the same document differ from one another. No two handwritten NT manuscripts of any NT book or group of books are identical. But we have every reason to believe that every original reading has survived in some manuscripts. That is why textual critics study as many manuscripts as possible.

Manuscripts of the Greek NT generally contain a group of books: Gospels, Pauline Epistles, Acts and the General Epistles, or Revelation (which generally circulated alone). Fewer than 60 manuscripts once contained the entire text of the Greek NT. Manuscripts useful for establishing the original text of the Greek NT are of six types. The very oldest and best are written on papyrus. About 115 Papyri have been identified, many of them from the second century. Most of the Papyri have a small amount of text, but some are extensive. Uncial manuscripts are written in large letters similar to capital letters. The great early Codexes Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, and Alexandrinus are among the Uncials. Over 300 Uncials have been identified, dating from the fourth through the 10th centuries. The Papyri and the Uncials are our most important sources. Minuscule manuscripts are written in a cursive style of handwriting that developed after the eighth century. Over 2,800 Minuscules are known, dating from the ninth through the 16th centuries. Lectionaries are NT texts arranged according to a reading schedule through the year for public worship. These date from the eighth through the 16th centuries, but some are valuable as they are copied from a much older exemplar. Over 2,400 lectionaries have been classified. The texts used by the early church fathers may be determined by studying their quotations of the Bible. As some of these are quite early, this is a valuable type of resource. Early translations of the Greek NT into other languages (versions) can be very useful, as they were translated from early manuscripts that no longer exist. Among the important early versions are the Latin, Syriac, Coptic, Armenian, Georgian, Ethiopic, and Slavonic. See Bible Texts and Versions.

A family, or group, of manuscripts is relatively tight knit, exhibiting striking similarities analogous to a family resemblance. A text-type is more broadly based, with definite patterns of common readings. Text-types developed in particular regions where similar exemplars were repeatedly used for copying the NT. Four text-types are identified.

The Alexandrian (Egyptian) text-type, accepted as the earliest and best by most scholars, originated with well-trained scribes in the vicinity of Alexandria, Egypt, in the second century. The oldest and best papyrus and early parchment manuscripts are of this type. The Western text-type also originated in the second century and was widely distributed. The Western text is characterized by additions to the text and paraphrase, indicating a freer and less disciplined copy process. The Western text of Acts is about 10 percent longer than the Alexandrian. The Caesarean text-type is thought to have originated when the church father Origen (third century) took early Egyptian texts with him from Alexandria to Caesarea in Palestine, and later on to Jerusalem, where they were used as exemplars for copying the Greek NT. The Caesarean tends to mix readings that are distinctively Alexandrian and Western. The Caesarean is the least homogenous of the text-types, and some scholars dispute its existence.

The latest text-type is the Byzantine (also called Koine, Syrian, or Antiochean), which did not appear until late in the fourth century. The earliest extant Byzantine manuscripts are from the fifth century. Based on a late third-century edition of the Greek NT by Lucian of Antioch in Syria, the Byzantine deliberately combined elements of the earlier text-types (called conflation of readings). Lucian and later editors wanted to produce a complete, smooth, and easy-to-read text. By the time the Byzantine text-type originated, all the others were established, as is demonstrated by the absence of distinctively Byzantine readings in earlier manuscripts. Thus the Byzantine is secondary in nature. Only very rarely (two times) does a distinctively Byzantine reading preserve an original reading in preference to the other text-types. The Byzantine is represented in the great majority of surviving NT manuscripts and became the standard text of the Greek Orthodox churches. This standardization and the preponderance of Byzantine manuscripts occurred primarily because the church in the West abandoned Greek in favor of Latin, and Greek continued to be used and the Greek NT continued to be copied in Greek only in the Eastern churches. The large number of these manuscripts does not mean that they are the best or that they represent the original text. Clearly they are not and do not. Manuscripts must be weighed as to their value, not just counted. A great number of inferior manuscripts does not somehow make theirs the best text. See Textus Receptus.

Variant readings occur only in about 5 percent of the Greek NT text, and so all the manuscripts agree about 95 percent of the time. Only about 2,100 variant readings may be considered “significant” and in no instance is any point of Christian doctrine challenged or questioned by a variant reading. Only about 1.67 percent of the entire Greek NT text still is questioned at all. We may be confident that our current eclectic, or critical, Greek NT text (an eclectic, or critical text is one based on the study of as many manuscripts as possible), is far beyond 99 percent established. In fact, there is more variation among some English translations of the Bible than there is among the manuscripts of the Greek NT. God's Word is infallible and inerrant in its original copies (autographs), all of which have perished. Textual critics of the Greek NT will continue their work until, if possible, the original of every questioned reading is firmly established.

Textual critics operate by certain procedures called the “Canons of Textual Criticism.” Variant readings are categorized as intentional or unintentional and as significant or insignificant. The overwhelming majority of all variants are unintentional and insignificant, involving spelling. The significant variant readings in manuscripts are evaluated by study of internal (literary) evidence, related to the particular manuscript itself (like scribal practices and stylistic matters), and external (historical) evidence (like the date, geographic distribution, and relationships to other manuscripts). Unintentional variants may be the result of errors of sight, hearing, lack of concentration, or poor judgment, on the part of the scribe. Intentional variants generally occurred when the scribe thought he was improving the text by making spelling or grammar changes, changes for liturgical (worship) use, correcting geography or history, or harmonizing parallel passages (especially in the Synoptic Gospels). Old Testament quotations were sometimes expanded and natural complements were added (such as changing Jesus to Lord Jesus or to Lord Jesus Christ). Occasionally changes were made for doctrinal reasons. Most of these were intended to make the text more orthodox (as the scribe understood orthodoxy). This explanation may not sound like it, but on the whole scribes were remarkably scrupulous and careful to be faithful to the text they were copying.

When evaluating internal evidence, perhaps the key consideration is determining which reading best accounts for the rise of the other readings. The more difficult reading is usually preferred, as scribes were more likely to make a reading easier rather than harder to understand. The shorter reading is generally preferred, as additions to the text are far more common than exclusions. When considering external evidence, earlier manuscripts are generally preferred because they were the result of a shorter copy process and thus are closer to the original. Place of origin, if known, is important, as are textual affinities to the various manuscript families and text-types. The wider a particular reading was distributed geographically at an early date, the more likely it is to be original. All the evidence is considered, readings from manuscripts of all text-types are evaluated, and a decision is made as to which reading is most likely original. Textual Criticism is a science, but it is also an art, and the subjective element can never be completely eliminated. This is why textual critics work together in cooperative efforts, so that all perspectives are considered and obvious biases are not allowed to determine the outcome.

There are two commonly used critical Greek NTs, the Nestle/Aland (currently in its 27th edition—N/A27) and the United Bible Societies (currently in its 4th Revised Edition—UBS4). The Nestle/Aland began with the work of Erwin Nestle late in the 19th century, which was later taken over by his son, Eberhard. Still later, Kurt Aland and a committee became responsible for it. In 1966 the United Bible Societies produced an edition of the Greek NT primarily for the use of students and translators. Since 1979 the text of these two Greek NTs has been the same, being under the supervision of the same committee. The difference is in the accompanying critical apparatuses. In a critical apparatus, significant variant readings and the evidence supporting them are placed at the bottom of each page, so that each student of the Greek NT may evaluate each variant for himself or herself. The critical apparatus of the N/A27 contains more variants and is thus more useful to scholars. The apparatus in the UBS4 contains fewer variants, but more evidence is given for each one, making it more useful to students and translators. Readings in the text at places of variation in the UBS4 are graded as to their certainty (A, B, C, D) by vote of the editorial committee.

As more and more manuscripts are collated and compared, these data are entered into databases for consideration of inclusion in future editions of the Greek NT. A major international effort, the International Greek New Testament Project, is at work on a new critical edition of the Greek NT. The Gospel of Luke is complete, the Gospel of John is nearing completion, and work is under way on the book of Acts. The work is coordinated by many leading scholars, such as Dr. Bill Warren, Director of the Center for New Testament Textual Studies at New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary. The New Orleans Center figures prominently in the effort, annually collating more manuscripts than all other North American institutions combined.

We have more copies of all or part of the Greek NT than of any other ancient text, approximately 5,700. Scholars of other ancient literature wish they could establish the texts they study as completely as the text of the Greek NT, but they cannot because their ancient documents survive in only a few, or in rare instances, a few hundred copies. Thus the Greek text of the NT is the best attested and most accurate of any ancient document. We may have confidence that the Bibles we use, based on the critical texts of the Greek NT and Hebrew OT, are the pure Word of God. See Bible Texts and Versions; Textual Criticism, Old Testament.

TEXTUAL CRITICISM, OLD TESTAMENT Textual criticism (sometimes called lower criticism) is the study of copies of any work whose original no longer survives. We should note that “criticism” is not a negative word in this context. It is rather careful study and analysis. When applied to the OT it refers to the ongoing effort to study the ancient Hebrew text of the OT as thoroughly as possible. Thousands of copies of all or part of the Hebrew OT have survived, but until recent decades nearly all of them represented a fairly uniform and stabilized text. Since the middle of the 20th century exciting discoveries have been made that expand our knowledge of the development of the original Hebrew text and its history of transmission.

The Dead Sea Scrolls are the most famous finds, containing about 40,000 fragments representing some 600 documents, 200 of them biblical texts. These predate our next oldest manuscripts of the OT by about 1,000 years, and their importance can scarcely be overstated. But also, manuscripts have been found at the Jewish fortress of Masada, at Muraba'at near the Dead Sea, at a Cairo synagogue Genizah (a storage room for worn texts awaiting proper disposal), and two tiny silver amulets have surfaced that contain a quotation from Numbers. These demonstrate that a process of development did indeed occur, but they also show that the later, stabilized text (the Masoretic text) is highly accurate. Far beyond 90 percent of the text is firmly established, and serious questions remain at only a very small percentage of variants. Old Testament textual critics are therefore more thoroughly equipped today to tackle difficult textual issues than at any time in the past. See Bible Texts and Versions.

As in NT textual criticism, manuscripts may be studied and evaluated through the data derived from the collation of manuscripts. To collate is to compare the text of a manuscript to a base, or standard, text and to note each and every difference from the base text. Places where manuscripts differ are called variant readings, or variants. The ultimate purpose is to establish the original reading at each place of variation.

Unlike NT textual criticism, OT textual criticism deals with some items other than the words of the text, because Hebrew manuscripts contain marginal readings pertaining to the text which are the product of an ancient practice of textual criticism. These shed light on the transmission of the text and aid the textual critic in making decisions about which reading is most likely to be the original.

Textual critics of the Hebrew OT are guided by “canons,” as are NT textual critics, but these are somewhat different from those for the study of the NT. The task is both science and art, and a degree of subjectivity cannot be avoided. Because the text is so thoroughly standard, OT textual criticism affects mostly relatively insignificant details and inconsistencies. Manuscripts must be evaluated (“weighed”) as to their significance and not just counted. Internal (literary) evidence of the manuscript being studied (like scribal tendencies, literary structures, grammar, syntax, chiasmic structures, acrostic patterns, and sentence structure) is considered. External (historical) evidence (like date and place of writing, and relationships to other manuscripts) is considered also. The identity of the reading most appropriate for the immediate context is sought. The reading that is most likely to account for the other variants is generally preferred, as are the most distinct reading and the shortest reading. Early translations of the Hebrew OT (early Greek and the Greek Septuagint, Aramaic Targums, Syriac Peshitta, and Latin) also are valuable, as they may sometimes represent an early Hebrew exemplar. See Textual Criticism, New Testament.

More OT textual critics are active currently than ever before. The current scholarly text, Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia, is based on the Leningrad Codex (A.D. 1009) and is under revision. The new edition, Biblia Hebraica Quinta, will be completed in the near future. A sample of it has been published (Ruth). A new edition, also based on the Leningrad Codex, Biblia Hebraica Leningradensia, has been prepared by Tel Aviv University. The long awaited Hebrew University Bible, based on the Aleppo Codex (A.D. 930), has been in development since 1955. Isaiah and Jeremiah have been published. All these editions are “diplomatic,” that is, they are based on a single manuscript. Though they have critical apparatuses that record variant readings, they are not true eclectic, or critical, texts (based on the study of many manuscripts). The editors' choices of the earliest recoverable readings remain in one of the several accompanying critical apparatuses. Various textual traditions are extant in the many manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible, and these are being studied, yet all the current texts retain the priority of one branch of the Masoretic text, that of the ben Asher family of Tiberian Masoretes. Admittedly, it became the standardized text and is best preserved, but it is itself a critical text produced long ago and far away without all the resources available to scholars today. A Hebrew text could be produced that is truly eclectic, a true editio critica maior, utilizing all available manuscript sources. The proposed Oxford Hebrew Bible of Oxford University Press appears to have an eclectic text as its goal. Regardless, the next generation will see in print richer resources for the careful study of the Hebrew text of the OT than have ever been available before.

Some argue for the priority of the ben Chayim text of the Hebrew OT over that of the traditional Masoretic text, considering it the textus receptus of the OT. The arguments for this are unconvincing, as the stated objective of Jacob ben Chayim was to recover the Masoretic text of Aaron ben Moses ben Asher, which is exactly what we have in the Leningrad and Aleppo Codexes. See Textus Receptus.

Charles W. Draper

TEXTUS RECEPTUS Term that is generally applied to certain printed editions of the Greek NT, but sometimes extended to refer also to the ben Chayim edition of the Hebrew OT.

The first Greek NT to be printed (1514), in preparation for 12 years, was edited by James Lopez de Stunica and sponsored by Spanish Cardinal Ximenes as part of the great Complutensian Polyglot Bible (a polyglot contains multiple translations or versions). The Complutensian contained Latin, Aramaic, Hebrew, and Greek versions. Formal Papal approval for its distribution did not come until 1521, and it was not distributed until 1522. The massive volume was not often reproduced in later years. In 1515 the Dutch Roman Catholic humanist NT scholar, Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam, was hired by a printer in Basel, Switzerland, Johann Froben, to produce an edition of the Greek NT. Wanting to beat Ximenes' edition into print, Froben gave Erasmus less than six months to complete his work on a critical text (a critical text is one based on comparison of more than one manuscript). The work extended to 10 months and Erasmus's Greek NT (a diglot, with Greek and Latin text on facing pages) was released in 1516.

According to Erasmus, he had access to only six manuscripts, none of them complete. His oldest and best manuscript (Codex 1) was from the 10th century, but he did not use it much because for some reason he did not trust it. The Gospels were in four of the manuscripts, the oldest from the 15th century. Acts and the General Epistles were in three, the oldest from the 13th century. The Paulines were in four of these late manuscripts. For Revelation he had only one manuscript (from the 12th century), and it was missing the last page, so Erasmus had to translate the last six verses of Revelation from the Latin Vulgate into Greek. Where his manuscripts were unclear or defective, Erasmus consulted the Vulgate, resulting in at least a dozen places where his reading is supported by no Greek manuscript. Due to the rush to get it into print, there were many printing errors in the first edition. Erasmus himself said that this work was “precipitated rather than edited.” His second edition (1522) contained over 400 corrections and changes. Luther made his German translation from the second edition. The third edition was again somewhat changed but not enough to correct its massive deficiencies. This third edition was the basis for the “Textus Receptus” and was published by various people with little change over the next four centuries. Recognizing the superiority of the Ximenes text, Erasmus drew on it to make hundreds of changes in his fourth (1527) and fifth (1535) editions, but these were not reproduced often. Thus, primarily because it was distributed first, cost less, and was smaller in size, Erasmus's work became the standard text for hundreds of years.

Erasmus's work essentially was reproduced in four editions by the French printer Robert Estienne (latinized as Stephanus) and in nine editions (1565-1604) by Reformation scholar Theodore Beza. Stephanus's fourth edition (1551) and Beza's text differed somewhat from Erasmus's, and it is these editions which are most commonly referred to as the Textus Receptus (even though the term did not originate until 1633). Stephanus, for his fourth edition (1551), included some readings from the Complutensian Polyglot and Codex Bezae (fifth century). Beza, though he followed Erasmus and Stephanus closely, did employ in some readings Codex Claromontanus (sixth century), which he owned, in his later editions. Both of these early manuscripts were used only infrequently because they differed from Erasmus so much. The texts of Beza and Stephanus underlie the NT of the King James Version of 1611.

Dutch printers, the Elzivirs, produced seven editions of the Greek NT, mainly taken from Beza's 1565 edition, beginning in 1624. There were two Elzivir brothers, Bonaventure and Matthew, and Matthew's son Abraham. Their first edition was heavily criticized for numerous errors. Having carefully corrected the first edition, in their second edition (1633) they wrote in the preface the Latin statement, "Textum ergo habes, nunc ab omnibus receptum: in quo nihil immutatum aut corruptum damus" ("You have therefore the text now received by all: in which we give nothing altered or corrupt.") Two words were extracted from this sentence, Receptum (Received) and Textum (Text), placed in their nominative forms, Textus Receptus (Received Text), and became the common way to refer to this and other editions of the Greek NT, even to some editions originating decades before the term arose. Thus, from what Bruce Metzger called a "more or less casual phrase advertising the edition," and J. K. Elliott termed "meaningless advertising," and Eldon Epp described as an "arrogant generalization," came a term of monumental import. The preface statement was the equivalent of a modern publisher's promotional "blurb." No authority figure of any kind beyond a printer ever anointed this text as superior to other texts, much less as "original." The Textus Receptus is itself a critical text, but unlike modern critical editions based on at least hundreds of manuscripts, it was based in total on fewer than 10.

Sometimes the Textus Receptus is confused with the Majority Text, a recent critical Greek NT based on the study of hundreds of the Byzantine manuscripts. They are not the same, as the Majority Text differs from the Textus Receptus at about 1,800 places, including some places where the Textus Receptus reading is not the majority reading. See Textual Criticism, New Testament.

Though the underlying textual traditions of the Hebrew OT are obviously different, the arguments for the priority of the ben Chayim text of the Hebrew OT over the Masoretic Text of the ben Asher family are similarly weak and yield the same kind of conclusion. The Masoretic text is earlier and more reliable. See Textual Criticism, Old Testament.

Erasmus would be the first to applaud the study of as many manuscripts as possible and would be horrified to know that his tentative work achieved such a revered status. Until the end of his life, he continued to improve his Greek NT whenever better manuscripts and editions became available to him.

THADDAEUS (Thăd' y ūs) Personal name, perhaps meaning “gift of God” in Greek but derived from Hebrew or Aramaic meaning “breast.” See Disciple; Judas; Lebbeus.

THANKSGIVING 1. Gratitude directed towards God (except Luke 17:9; Acts 24:3; Rom. 16:4), generally in response to God's concrete acts in history. Thanksgiving was central to OT worship. Sacrifice and offerings were to be made not grudgingly but with thanksgiving (Ps. 54:6; Jon. 2:9). The psalmist valued a song of thanksgiving more than sacrifice (Ps. 69:30-31). David employed Levites “to commemorate the LORD God of Israel, and to give Him thanks and praise.” (1 Chron. 16:4 HCSB; 23:30; Neh. 12:46). Pilgrimage to the temple and temple worship were characterized by thanksgiving (Pss. 42:4; 95:2; 100:4; 122:4). Thankfulness was expressed: for personal (Ps. 35:18) and national deliverance (Ps. 44:7-8); for God's faithfulness to the covenant (Ps. 100:5); and for forgiveness (Ps. 30:4-5; Isa. 12:1). All creation joins in offering thanks to God (Ps. 145:10). See Psalms, Book of.

Thanksgiving is a natural element of Christian worship (1 Cor. 14:16-17) and is to characterize all of Christian life (Col. 2:7; 4:2). Early Christians expressed thanks: for Christ's healing ministry (Luke 17:16); for Christ's deliverance of the believer from sin (Rom. 6:17-18; 7:25); for God's indescribable gift of grace in Christ (2 Cor. 9:14-15; 1 Cor. 15:57; OT. Rom. 1:21); and for the faith of fellow Christians (Rom. 1:8).

2. Epistolary thanksgiving: an element in the opening of a typical Greek letter. All of the Pauline Letters with the exception of Galatians begin with a thanksgiving. See Letter.

THEATER Public drama was apparently unknown in OT Israel except for possible worship activities and only arrived with the Greeks after 400 B.C. AS a symbol of Greco-Roman culture, the presence of theaters in Palestine was a constant reminder of Greek and Roman control of the Jewish state. Herod I built numerous theaters in the Greek cities during his reign in Palestine (37-4 B.C.). Their presence, especially near the temple in Jerusalem, continually infuriated the Jews. Outside of Israel and across the Roman Empire, theaters flourished. Public performances began with a sacrifice to a pagan deity, usually the patron god of the city. Dramas and comedies included historical or political themes and were often lewd and suggestive. The semicircular seats of the theater rose step fashion, either up a natural hillside or on artificial tiers. A facade of several stories (as high as the uppermost seats) was decorated with sculptures and stood behind the stage. The general public sat in the higher seats, farther back, but wealthier patrons were given seats lower and closer to the stage. A large central area was reserved for the local governor or ruler. Theaters varied in size. Those in small towns held approximately 4,000 persons, while larger theaters, such as that in Ephesus where Paul was denounced (Acts 19:29), were capable of holding 25,000 or more. THEOCRACY Form of government in which God directly rules. As the Sovereign King, God may rule directly through unmediated means, or He may choose to use various mediators to manifest His rule. In either case, God Himself is the Sovereign Ruler.

The theocracy of God is revealed progressively in the Scripture. A case could be made that the earliest forms of God's governing were His direct encounters with Adam in the garden of Eden. It was not until the call of Abram in Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. 12), however, that the plan of God to establish a national theocracy upon the earth was revealed.

The giving of the Mosaic law by God to the Israelites gave the Hebrew people a unique theocratic structure. The civil and moral laws provided the guidance for governance of the state and personal relationships within the theocracy. These laws would establish the basic social structures of the theocratic state: judicial decisionmaking, processes of adjudication, marital guidelines, parental responsibilities, regard for human life, property rights, and so forth. The ceremonial law addressed the issues of religious observances and practice.

The next step in the development of the theocratic state was the taking of promised land (the conquest) and the period of the judges (conflict). Under Joshua's capable leadership, the Israelites were able to enter and conquer Canaan according to the promises of God. In this act the people of God were provided a land in which to build a theocratic state.

The people soon asked for a king. The existence of a human king, however, did not ideally conflict with the theocracy. The king, as chosen by God, would not be a despotic, selfish dictator, but rather a man who would walk in the light of the Lord and seek God's guidance in all matters. Thus, the rule of the human monarch would glorify God and manifest the theocratic ideal.

Ram-headed sphinxes line the processional avenue before the temple of Amun-Re at Thebes.

The theocratic ideal experience declined among the Israelites following the division of the monarchy and the exilic/Post-exilic periods. There is a sense, however, in which the ideal of a theocracy is resumed in the NT. Christ, as the Messiah and the Davidic King, is the person in whom the kingdom of God resides. With His preaching and earthly ministry, He gave evidence that “the kingdom of God is at hand.” Further, following His resurrection, He declared to His followers: “All authority has been given to Me in heaven and on earth. Go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations” (Matt. 28:18-20, HCSB). With this declaration the risen King commissioned His followers to go and to proclaim the existence of His kingdom. As Christians individually and corporately submit and propagate the Lordship of Christ, in a sense they experience and express the theocratic ideal of God's direct governance. Thus, a NT church should endeavor to realize and appropriate the direct rule of the Sovereign King in all areas

THEOLOGY, BIBLICAL Discussion of what the Bible itself teaches about God and His dealings with human beings and the rest of creation. Biblical theology has existed since the Bible was written. For instance, in Deut. 1-11 Moses describes and interprets God's past acts on Israel's behalf recorded in Exodus-Numbers even as he discloses more divine revelation. Samuel interprets Israel's past theologically in 1 Sam. 8-12, Stephen does the same in Acts 7, and the list of examples could be extended.

Though biblical theology originated in biblical times, its formal modern academic origins are generally traced to 1787, when J. P. Gabler asserted the need for biblical theology to stand over against systematic theology so that church doctrine would not predetermine the meaning of biblical texts. This declaration began the practice of defining biblical theology by contrasting it with systematic theology, historical theology, and pastoral theology. This method of defining biblical theology usually follows similar lines. Whereas systematic theology uses categories drawn from philosophy as well as from the Bible, biblical theology uses categories drawn solely from Scripture. Historical theology traces the history of doctrinal development, but biblical theology describes the actual elements of those doctrines. Pastoral theology applies the contents of the Bible, while biblical theology describes them, and so forth.

These distinctions are not always useful, however, since biblical theology must organize its findings. Christians have wrestled with the Bible's theology throughout church history, and theological research should aid church ministry. Also, biblical theology has the potential to aid systematic theology by providing biblically accurate data and to help pastoral theology by providing data that is both theologically and pastorally sound. When practiced appropriately, biblical theology works in conjunction with other theological disciplines, not strictly in contrast to them.

Foundational Principles Because it takes its subject matter from the Bible, biblical theology asserts some foundational principles. First, Ps. 19:7-11 claims that the OT's law is "perfect," its testimonies "trustworthy," its precepts "right," its commandments "radiant," and its rules "reliable and altogether righteous” (HCSB). Paul summarizes his opinions on the scriptures (holy writings) by asserting that they are all “inspired by God and profitable for teaching, for rebuking, for correcting, for training in righteousness” (2 Tim. 3:16). Therefore, the Bible claims that the whole Bible is God's breathed out (inspired) word written down for permanent preservation and, as a result, is authoritative and useful for godly living for every successive generation. Second, the Bible reflects the character of the one whose word it reports. Deuteronomy 6:4-9 states that “God, the LORD is One,” or a unified, whole person. Thus, His word and its message are also a unified whole. As Jesus says, “The Scripture cannot be broken” (John 10:35). Further, since God never lies (Heb. 6:18), this unified word is truthful. Third, the Bible unfolds in a particular order, which is reflected in Luke 24:44, when Jesus taught two disciples the things written about Himself in the Law, Prophets, and Psalms. This order follows the order commonly accepted in first-century Palestinian Judaism and is reflected in the OT itself (Josh. 1:1-9; Ps. 1). The NT also has three clear segments, the Gospels and Acts, the Pauline epistles, and the General epistles and Revelation. Thus, biblical theology has a clear order in which to work that is evident in the text of Scripture. Fourth, God works in history to redeem human beings, so human history has significance. This fact is evident in passages like Pss. 78; 89; and 104-106 that survey God's past actions. It is also evident from the many biblical books that highlight Israelite and church history. Fifth, the life, death, resurrection, and second coming of Jesus Christ are the literary and thematic heart of the Bible. God's saving work in history culminates in these deeds. Sixth, God's people are redeemed by God and exist to glorify God in the world by being holy people (Exod. 19:5-6; 1 Peter 2:5-9). Seventh, within the unity of the Bible, there is obvious diversity. But this diversity operates in complementary, not contradictory, ways.

Methodology Even if one accepts these foundational principles, the Bible does not state exactly how to report what the Bible says about God and His relationship with the human race. Therefore, scholars have approached biblical theology from a variety of ways. Some have sought a central theme that helps hold the Bible's message together, such as creation, covenant, kingdom, salvation (or redemptive) history, the messianic promise, the gospel, new creation, God's presence, or some other important biblical idea. They then use that theme to integrate related ideas. Others order their study by examining major historical eras in the Bible and the themes that arose within them. Still others have focused on the NT's preaching of the gospel and how that message pulls together the Bible's major themes. Each of these methods is valid in its own way, and each one contributes to an understanding of biblical theology.

The description of biblical theology below utilizes the order of the Bible, major themes, and historical eras to make its points. It also highlights the character of God. This somewhat eclectic approach attempts to use the best elements of methods proven effective over the past several decades.

Biblical Theology: The Law (Genesis-Deuteronomy) Genesis begins with the assertion that God, not the gods, created the heavens and earth. This claim of one God making everything sets the Bible apart from other ancient creation accounts, all of which are polytheistic in theology. This one sovereign God rules everything yet commands human beings, who are made in His image, to rule the earth as His appointed stewards (Gen. 1:26-31). God situates man and woman in a garden, establishes a relationship with them, commands them not to eat of two trees, and places them in a committed relationship with one another (Gen. 2:4-25). Unfortunately, the woman and the man believed the word of the serpent instead of the word of God. Because of this lack of faith in their creator and His word, they sinned by eating the forbidden fruit (3:1-6). This sin led to shame and loss of perfect relationship with one another and with God (3:7-13). It also led to specific consequences, such as pain in childbirth and in her relationship with her husband for the woman and pain in his labor for the man (3:14-19). Still, all is not lost, for God disclosed that a child born in the future would defeat the serpent, and He also promised to protect the man and woman from harm (3:15,20-24). In many ways the rest of the Bible works out these basic themes. The Creator works to redeem a struggling, sinful humanity from lack of trust in Him. Only through God's redemptive work can human beings recover their lost relationship with God and one another.

As sin spread on earth from the first persons to their children and each successive generation, the Creator decided to destroy the creation by water, sparing only Noah and his family (4:1-8:19). Thus, the Creator and Deliverer is also the Judge of creation. But this Judge is also determined to redeem. Therefore, He makes a covenant, a binding agreement between a greater and a lesser party that includes responsibilities, benefits, and consequences, with Noah and the human race, not to destroy the earth by water again. This covenant is significant in its own right, yet even more important is the first explicit making of such an agreement between God and people.

God made another essential covenant in Gen. 12:1-9, when He promised Abram that a great nation would come from his descendants, that this nation would be given Canaan as their homeland, and that all the world would be blessed by him. The Creator determined to help the whole of sinful humanity through this family, which became the Jewish people. Abraham was counted righteous because of his faith (15:6) and lived in a faithful, though imperfect, manner because of this relationship with God.

After centuries passed and the family grew into a nation of enslaved refugees in Egypt (Exod. 1-4), God determined to deliver them from bondage through great miracles administered by Moses. This “exodus” (Exod. 5-18) demonstrated God's power over creation, God's witness to Egypt, God's faithfulness to promises made to Abraham, and God's desire to deliver His people. A mixed racial group (Exod. 12:38), the chosen people traveled to Mount Sinai, where God revealed another covenant through Moses. The purpose of this covenant was to make Israel a “kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (19:5-6).

Clearly, this covenant was based on an already existing relationship; it did not create a relationship between God and Israel. Only faith can create a relationship with God (Gen. 15:6). This covenant was intended to reflect the relationship between God and Israel so that a kingdom of priests could minister to the world God created and so bless all nations through Abraham (Gen. 12:1-9). Every law in the Mosaic covenant was intended to make Israel unique enough among the nations to glorify God in His own creation.

Sadly, the whole newly delivered nation was not faithful even in its infancy (Exod. 32-34), so God's grace and mercy (Exod. 34:6-7) compelled Him to judge for the purpose of redemption.

This covenant expressed high standards yet understood that people sin. Thus, the covenant included forgiveness for sin based on sacrifices and prayer (Lev. 1-7; 16). These sacrifices were annual, seasonal, or daily in nature. They were not permanent. Still, they were effective (4:26,31; 16:21-22). God included in this covenant laws regulating a just, fair, kind, and protective society (Lev. 11-15; 17-27).

Despite all God did for Israel, the nation did not believe God sufficiently to enter the promised land when ordered to do so (Num. 14:11-12). Unbelief continued to be the root cause of sin. Thus, God judged the incipient generation and gave the land to their children (Num. 15-36). God renewed and expanded the covenant with this new generation, setting standards for the people, kings, and prophets (Deut. 1-12; 17:14-20; 18:15-22). As the capstone to the covenant, God offered the people the choice between benefits or punishments, life or death (Deut. 27-28). The supreme punishment was loss of the promised land. If God sent this punishment, the people could still find renewal by repenting of sin and returning to the Lord (Deut. 30:1-10). Grace continued to characterize God's work, and love was the motive for God's work with Israel and their response to Him (Deut. 6-7).

Biblical Theology: The Prophets The Hebrew Bible divides the Prophets into the Former and Latter Prophets, with Joshua-Kings comprising the first group and Isaiah-Malachi comprising the second. Joshua recounts God giving the promised land to Abraham's descendants, just as was pledged some six centuries earlier, while Judges demonstrates how far Israel was able to stray from the covenant's principles and to what lengths God would go to restore the people. First and Second Samuel stress the rise of the Israelite monarchy. It particularly focuses on David's slow rise to power and subsequent successes and failures. Now the Bible begins a long process of stating ways in which God's kingdom is or is not evident on earth.

Most importantly, 2 Sam. 7:1-17 relates God's covenant with David. God promised that David's son (Solomon) would succeed him, that this son would build a temple, and that David's kingdom would be eternal. This final promise led to future prophetic passages about a coming savior, a messiah, or anointed one of God. So the child mentioned in Gen. 3:15 would come through Abraham and David's line, thereby blessing all nations and providing David with an endless kingdom. This promise to David became difficult to understand when the nation divided in 930 B.C. and had its parts destroyed in 722 and 587 B.C. respectively.

Isaiah 1-12 emphasizes Israel's pattern of covenant breaking and God's two-fold response to that sin. God will send the Davidic heir to be Israel's savior and righteous leader, and God will punish all sin on judgment day, which is called "the Day of the LORD" here and elsewhere in the Bible. Isaiah 40-55 describes a servant of the Lord who ministers to God's servant Israel and to the nations (42:1-9; 49:1-7). He will die for the people's sin, make many of them righteous, and share spoils even after death (52:13-53:12). In this way He will deal with Israel and the nations' sins. At the end of time, the Lord will defeat death (25:6-12), create a new heavens and earth and a new Jerusalem (65:17-25), and judge the wicked (66:18-24).

Jeremiah and Ezekiel agree with Isaiah's assessment of the messiah and of Israel and the nation's sin. They also highlight God's future acts. Jeremiah envisions a "new covenant," one in which all those associated with it know the Lord and have His law written directly on their hearts. The problem with the old covenant was that the people broke it, not that God failed in any way (31:31-34). In the new covenant God will finally have a faithful partner. Ezekiel states that God will change Israel's hearts by placing His Spirit on their hearts (36:22-32). Again, there will be no unfaithful covenant partners. Ezekiel envisions a vast new Jerusalem where the Lord lives with His people in the absence of sin (40-48).

While they also agree with the concept of messiah and a glorious future, the Minor Prophets stress the threat of judgment, the need for repentance, and the many ways that judgment will vindicate the righteous and punish the wicked. The Day of the Lord is a constant theme; though after Israel is destroyed, the books highlight the renewal of Jerusalem and the coming of the savior. These books end with Malachi promising a new Elijah coming to prepare the people for the Day of the Lord.

Biblical Theology: The Writings This section of the OT underscores life lived in light of the covenantal history and theology introduced in the previous two sections. For instance, Psalms offers theologically driven ways to worship in the midst of Israel's history. Job and Proverbs explain living wisely in extreme and normal circumstances, as do Ruth, Ecclesiastes, Esther, and Daniel. Ezra, Nehemiah, and 1-2 Chronicles demonstrate God's determination to restore Israel to the land before the coming of the messiah. Each book contributes examples of serving God or the opposite in the midst of suffering, judgment, or renewal.

These books also contribute to the messianic promise. In particular, Psalms states that the Davidic heir will rule the nations (Pss. 2; 110), overcome death (Ps. 16), and be rejected by many (Ps. 118:22). Daniel 7:13-14 describes “one like a son of man” to whom God gives the kingdoms of the world, and this figure shares His kingdom with the holy ones.

By NT times the OT was considered God's word. Those who believed in and served God did not doubt its authority for living even when they misinterpreted it. Any new candidate for acceptance as Scripture had to prove itself the equal of the OT, not the other way around.

Biblical Theology: The Gospels and Acts The Gospels and Acts proclaim that the promised Messiah has come. Jesus of Nazareth, a Davidic descendant (Matt. 1:1-17) and a descendant of Adam (Luke 3:23-38; Gen. 3:15) is the One promised in the OT. His appearing indicates that the “kingdom of God is near,” which means the Day of the Lord, God's judgment day, has come. Those who believe in Him protect themselves from the coming wrath (Matt. 3:1-12; Mark 1:14-15), and those who do not may expect certain judgment (Matt. 24; Mark 13). He is the new Moses (Matt. 5-7), the Son of Man to whom God gives the kingdom (Mark 14:62), and the Servant who dies for the people (Matt. 27:57; Luke 22:37). He is the Creator and the Word of God (John 1:1-18) and is therefore God. His life and teaching affirm and supplements the law (Matt. 5:17-20), yet also set aside its sacrifices (Matthew 23:23) and table laws (Mark 7:19).

His death is the heart of the Bible's message, and it is the means by which the new covenant with the new people of God is instituted (Luke 22:14-23). His resurrection from the dead means that He is the Lord (John 20:18). In short, He fulfills the Scriptures' specific predictions and broader patterns of the Messiah, or Christ. He also teaches how one may do God's will and glorify God on earth. His last command to His disciples is to go into all the earth with the message they have learned (Matt. 28:16-20). In this way the whole earth will be blessed through Abraham.

When John the Baptist, Jesus, and the early church preached and taught these themes, they called the sum total of this message “the gospel.” The details of the gospel expand or contract depending on whether the audience knows much or little about the Bible's promises and rules (cp. Acts 2:14-41; 7:2-53; 13:13-48; 17:22-34), though the resurrection is a staple in these sermons. For the early believers the preaching of the gospel meant that the great themes of the OT were related to the life, teachings, death, resurrection, and service of Jesus Christ.

Acts introduces readers to Paul, the missionary apostle who dominates the next section of the NT. A convert from Pharisaic Judaism, Paul becomes the seminal force in early Christianity, especially in the Gentile churches. His preaching and teaching of the gospel may well be the most influential writings in the church to this day.

Biblical Theology: The Pauline Epistles Paul's ministry lasted long enough and was diverse enough to make his epistles difficult to systematize. For the sake of this article, however, his letters may be divided into letters dealing with difficult specific church problems, letters that are more introductory or general in nature, and letters that deal with the organization and ordering of churches.

His general and introductory letters set forth his own understanding of the gospel. In Romans he stresses that people become right with God (are justified) the same way Abraham did—by faith (Rom. 1-4; Gen. 15:6). As people of faith, they live to glorify God (Rom. 5-8). Such living reflects God's gifts to human beings and results in a godly witness in the world (Rom. 12-16). Similarly, in Ephesians Paul stresses that God the Creator planned believers' salvation in Christ from the foundation of the world and sealed that salvation with the Holy Spirit (1:3-14; Ezek. 36:22-32). God has placed all of creation under Jesus' authority (1:15-22). Salvation is by grace through faith, which is God's gift, so that no one can boast. God saved believers so that they might do good works He prepared for them to do at the same time He planned their salvation—at the beginning of time (2:1-10). Jews and Gentiles share in this salvation, so God the Creator is worshiped and served throughout the world (2:11-22). The church, God's people, demonstrate God's wisdom in the world (3:1-13), for they have Christ's gifts (4:1-16), new life (4:17-32), and a new order for living in a sinful world (5:1-6:24). For Paul the gospel means that Christ is the Creator (Col. 1:15-20; John 1:1-18) and that Christ's salvation transforms people into witnesses of God's kingdom.

Paul's letters to troubled churches also provide connections to biblical theology. For example, as he deals with the Galatians, he teaches that one cannot be saved by doing “works of the law” because the Bible teaches salvation by faith (Gal. 3-4; Gen. 15:6). To proclaim the opposite pits the Law and Prophets against their own teachings. As he corrects the Corinthians, he stresses the Lord's Supper as a new covenant service (1 Cor. 11:17-34) and the reality of the resurrection as the capstone of the gospel (1 Cor. 15). As he corrects the Thessalonians' misconceptions concerning the final judgment, he asserts the coming of Christ and the Day of the Lord (1 Thess. 5:1-11). Paul fiercely defends the validity of the OT for believers (Rom. 7:1-12; 1 Cor. 10:1-13), even as he corrects misconceptions about what the law does or does not teach and examines Christian faithfulness that flows from faith in Christ (Rom. 1:16-17).

Paul's letters to his associates about the ordering of churches highlights the need for sound doctrine. False teachers will arise and pervert the true meaning of the law (1 Tim. 1:3-11), and in the last days false teachers will gain hearers (2 Tim. 3:1-10). Thus, teachers must guard the deposit of true doctrine until the Day of the Lord (2 Tim. 1:3-18). This deposit is found in God's breathed-out word, which is what Paul calls "all Scripture" (2 Tim. 3:14-17). It is this true deposit that the church leaders described must pass on to each successive generation.

Biblical Theology: The General Epistles and Revelation As a whole these books are written to churches under persecution, or at least under a great deal of pressure. Thus, they apply the great themes of biblical theology to difficult circumstances.

For instance, Hebrews proclaims Christ's superiority to the great truths and symbols of the old covenant. Christ has instituted the new covenant. He is greater than Moses, greater than angels, greater than Aaron, and greater than the OT sacrifices. Indeed, His death was the final sacrifice, the one in which all others found their fulfillment (Heb. 1-10). Therefore, the persecuted church should have faith in Him and live out that faith as they look for God's kingdom (Heb. 11-13). James teaches that they should consider persecution proof of their faith (1:2-4) and urges readers to live an active faith, for "faith, if it doesn't have works, is dead by itself" (2:14-26 HCSB).

Similarly, Peter tells his readers that they are, like Israel of old, a kingdom of priests and a holy nation (1 Pet. 2:5,9; Exod. 19:5-6). The persecuted church must glorify the Lord until the Day of the Lord comes (2 Pet. 3:1-13). John's readers have endured defections from their ranks, and the apostle helps them understand the need for confession of sin, love for one another, and an ability to forgive one another. Jude stresses contending for the faith in the last days.

The book of Revelation concludes the Bible on a triumphant note. The church is persecuted (Rev. 1-3), yet it will persevere and triumph. Judgment awaits the wicked (Rev. 20), but those who love Christ, the King of kings (19:16), will inhabit the new Jerusalem promised in Isaiah, where death and sorrow have ceased (Rev. 21:1-27; Isa. 65:17-25; Ezek. 40-48).

By the end of Revelation, then, the Bible has completed a journey from creation to new creation, a journey made possible by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, who was sent to redeem sinful men and women from judgment on the Day of the Lord. Revelation is a colorful rendering of the gospel within biblical theology, but it is a presentation of the gospel, nonetheless.

Conclusion Biblical theology opens up the unity of the Bible by exposing and collecting its major themes. It demonstrates the many ways in which diverse books and material are united by the character of God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Without neglecting ways, the Bible declares new divine works and reapplies old truths to new situations; it highlights the wholeness of divine revelation. Paul House

THEOPHANY (The ðph' á ne) Physical appearance or personal manifestation of a god to a person.

Need for a Theophany The basic postulate here is that to see God could be fatal. "He said, 'You cannot see My face, for no one can see Me and live!'" (Exod. 33:20 HCSB; cp. Gen. 16:13; Exod. 3:2-6; 19:20-21; Judg. 6:22-23; 13:20-22). Yet the record is unmistakable that people did see God, such as Moses and others at Sinai (Exod. 24:9-10); the Lord's rebuke of Aaron and Miriam (Num. 12:4-8); and the majestic vision to Isaiah (Isa. 6:1,5). Customarily, God is not revealed to ordinary sight, but at times chooses to reveal Himself in theophanies.

Kinds of Theophanies There are some five forms of theophanies.

In human form Without question the theophany in Exod. 24:10 involved the appearance of a human being, for the text clearly states that a pavement of sapphire appeared "under His feet." At Peniel, Jacob testified that he had seen God face to face (Gen. 32:30). On Mount Horeb it was the experience of Moses to speak to God "face to face, just as a man speaks with his friend" (Exod. 33:11 HCSB). In the same passage when Moses begged God to show him His glory (v. 18), the Lord graciously granted Moses a vision of Himself, saying, "I will take My hand away, and you will see My back, but My face will not be seen” (v. 23). If it is protested that the subject is enveloped in mystery, it needs to be remembered that theology without mystery is sheer nonsense. God in His wisdom does not restrict Himself to one method of self-revelation. Notice God's pronouncement in Num. 12:6-8, which was quite unlike that of Deut. 4:12-15 where only a voice was granted.

In vision Even self-seeking Balaam was allowed by God to see the Lord in a vision (Num. 24:3-4). Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, giants among the prophets, saw God in visions (Isa. 6; Ezek. 1 ; Dan. 7:9). Jacob, sent off by Isaac to Paddanaram, was granted a dream in which he saw the Lord (Gen. 28:12-13).

By the “Angel of the Lord” This is the most usual form of theophany, called the “angel of the Lord” or “angel of God.” Observe it is not an “angel of God,” which could include any of the angelic hosts created by God. The “angel of the Lord” is identified in the accounts with Yahweh Himself. He appears only occasionally in human form. The encounter of the angel of the Lord with Hagar is of significance in this connection (Gen. 16:7-13). See Angels.

Not in human form In some instances the theophany came as at the burning bush (Exod. 3:2-4:17) and in the guidance through the wilderness (13:21; cp. Acts 7:30). The glory of the Lord appears to people in numerous passages. God's presence is in a cloud (Exod. 16:10; 33:9-10; Ezek. 10:4). God was also manifest in nature and history (Isa. 6:3; Ezek. 1:28; 43:2). See Glory.

As the name of the Lord God's sacred name represented His presence (Deut. 12:5; Isa. 30:27; 59:19).

Contrast with the Incarnation The incarnate Christ was not, and indeed is not, a theophany. The phenomena of theophanies were temporary, for the occasion that required them and then disappeared. On the other hand, in the incarnate Christ His deity and humanity were joined, not for time alone, but for eternity. See Incarnation; Jesus Christ.

The Time Factor Only in the OT economy did God's people need a theophany; since the incarnation, there is no such necessity. The NT doctrine of God is final and complete. God is always present in the risen Christ and the Holy Spirit. Still, at times, God's people are more aware of that presence than at others.

THEOPHILUS (Tho ðph' i lūs) Personal name meaning "friend of God"; the person to whom the books of Luke and Acts were written (Luke 1:3; Acts 1:1). However, his exact identity is unknown. Speculation has ranged from the generic "friend of God" intended to all Christians to a specific benefactor, perhaps in high social and/or political standing. If the latter is true, the name may be a pseudonym to protect the individual from persecution. One conjecture holds that Theophilus was unsaved and that Luke wrote the letter to persuade his belief in Christ.

THESSALONIANS, FIRST LETTER TO THE (Thēs sá lō' ní áns) Thessalonica was the largest city in first-century Macedonia and the capital of the province. It was a free city. Paul, Silas, and Timothy evangelized the city against the strong opposition of the Jews; but, though their stay was short, they were successful in establishing a church (Acts 17:4). There was not time to give much instruction to the new converts, so it is not surprising that questions arose as to the meaning of some aspects of the Christian faith and of the conduct demanded of believers. See Macedonia.

To help the new church, Paul wrote 1 Thessalonians not long after Timothy came to him (1 Thess. 3:6). This probably means not long after Timothy's arrival at Corinth (Acts 18:5) rather than his being with Paul in Athens (1 Thess. 3:1-2), for the shorter period scarcely allows enough time for the problems with which the apostle deals in the letter to have arisen. An inscription referring to Gallio (Acts 18:12) enables us to date that proconsul's time in Corinth as the early 50s. Scholars reason from this that Paul probably wrote 1 Thessalonians early in A.D. 50 (though in view of the uncertainties this must be regarded as no more than approximate).

Plainly, this is one of the earliest of Paul's letters and one of the earliest Christian documents surviving.

The authenticity of 1 Thessalonians is almost universally accepted. It is Pauline in style and is mentioned in early Christian writings such as the lists of NT books given by Marcion in the first half of the second century and by the Muratorian Canon a little later. Some of the problems with which it deals must have arisen quite early in the life of the church (for instance, what will happen to believers who die before Christ returns?).

Among the problems the Thessalonian church faced was persecution by pagans (2:14) and a temptation for believers to accept pagan sexual standards (4:4-8). Some of the Christians seem to have given up working and to have relied on the others to supply their needs (4:11-12). There was uncertainty about the fate of believers who had died, and some of the Thessalonians appear to have thought that Christ would come back soon and take them all to be with Him. What would happen to those who had died before the great event (4:13-18)? Paul's reply to this gives us information about Christ's return that we find nowhere else. Again, some of the believers seem to have been concerned about the time of Jesus' return (5:1-11). So Paul wrote this pastoral letter to meet the needs of inexperienced Christians and to bring them closer to Christ. See Paul.

THESSALONIANS, SECOND LETTER TO THE (Thèss sá ló' ní áns) This letter claims to have been written by Paul (1:1), and the style, the language, and the theology fit in with this claim. Early writers like Polycarp and Ignatius seem to have known it, and it is included in the lists of NT books given by Marcion and the Muratorian Canon. The letter claims to have Paul's signature (3:17). Most scholars agree that this is a genuine letter of Paul written to the Thessalonian church not long after the first letter. The situation presupposed by this writing is so similar that there could not have been a long time between the two writings, perhaps only a matter of weeks.

In recent times some have argued that this is not a genuine letter of Paul. They argue that in 1 Thessalonians the second coming of Christ is seen as very near, whereas here it is to be preceded by the appearance of the man of lawlessness and other signs. This is not a serious objection, for Christians have often held both these points of view; there is no reason why Paul should not have done so. That the teaching about the man of lawlessness is unlike anything else in Paul is of no greater force, for nowhere else does Paul face the contention that “the Day of the Lord has come” (2 Thess. 2:2 HCSB).

The exact date of Paul's mission to Thessalonica is not known, and the same is true of his letters to the very young church there. Most scholars agree that 2 Thessalonians must have been written not more than a year or two after Paul and Silas left the city. The church was apparently enthusiastic, but clearly the believers had not as yet matured in their faith. Paul wrote to committed Christians who had not progressed very far in the Christian life.

The Greeks of the first century were not a stolid race. We see their enthusiasm and excitement expressed in the riots when the first Christian preachers visited them. Such a riot broke out in Thessalonica (Acts 17:5-8,13). Those who became Christians during this time did so with verve and enthusiasm. However, they had not yet had the time to come to grips with all that being a Christian meant.

The opening salutation spoke of grace and peace as coming from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ (2 Thess. 1:2). Throughout the whole letter Christ is seen in the closest relationship to the Father. This is indicated by the fact that we are sometimes uncertain whether “Lord” means the Father or the Son, as in the expression “the Lord of peace” (3:16). The greatness of Christ is seen in the description of His majestic return with the angels when He comes in judgment (1:7-10). There is not a great deal in this letter about salvation through Christ, though there are references to the gospel (1:8, 2:14), to salvation (2:13), and to the “testimony” of the preachers (1:10). It is plain enough that Paul had preached the good news of the salvation Christ had brought about by His death for sinners, and that the Thessalonians were so clear on this that Paul had no need to go over it again.

They were not allowed to study the meaning of their new faith in peace and quietness (1:4). While they exulted in what the new relationship to God meant, they apparently did not take seriously enough the demands of Christian teaching, particularly in two areas. These areas included the second coming of our Lord and that of daily living. Some of them had come to believe that “the Day of our Lord” was at hand, or had even come (2:2). Some of them had given up working for their living (3:6-13), perhaps because they held the view that the Lord's coming was so close that there was no point in it. Paul wrote to settle them down a little, while not restraining their enthusiasm.

The letter is not a long one and does not give us a definitive outline of the whole Christian faith. Paul wrote to meet a present need, and the arrangement of his letter focuses on local circumstances.

Perhaps we can say that there are four great teachings in this letter:

- (1) the greatness of God,
- (2) the wonder of salvation in Christ,
- (3) the second coming, and
- (4) the importance of life and work each day.

God loves people like the Thessalonians and has brought them into the church (1:4). He has elected them (2:13), called them (1:11; 2:14), and saved them. His purposes last through to the end when they will be brought to their climax with the return of Christ and judgment of all. It is interesting to see so clearly expressed in this early letter these great doctrines of election and call, which meant so much to Paul. We may see also his doctrine of justification behind the references to God counting the believers worthy (1:5,11) and, of course, in his teaching on faith (1:3,4,11; 2:13; 3:2).

Salvation in Christ is proclaimed in the gospel and will be consummated when Christ comes again to overthrow all evil and bring rest and glory to His own. This great God loves His people and has given them comfort and hope, two important qualities for persecuted people (2:16). The apostle prayed that the hearts of his converts would be directed to "God's love" (3:5), which may mean God's love for them or their love for God. Probably it is God's love for them that is the primary thought, but Paul also notes an answering love from the new believers. There are repeated references to Revelation (1:7; 2:6,8). While the term is not used in quite the same way as in some other places, it reminds us that God has not left us to our own devices. He has revealed what is necessary and has further revelations for the last days.

The second coming is seen here in terms of the overthrow of all evil, especially the man of lawlessness. Paul made it clear that Christ's coming will be majestic, that it will mean punishment for people who refuse to know God and who reject the gospel, and that it will bring rest and glory to believers (1:7-10). In the end it is God and good that will be triumphant, not evil.

In view of God's love issuing in election and call, it is interesting to see Paul's stress on God's judgment. He spoke of God's righteous judgment (1:5) and felt that God will in due course punish those who persecute the believers and will give the believers rest (1:6-7). Others will suffer in the judgment. Those who refuse to know God and those who reject the gospel will receive the consequences of their actions (1:8-9). Eternal issues are involved when the gospel is preached, and Paul would not allow the Thessalonians to miss these.

Some of the converts believed Christ's second coming was imminent (2:2). They had misunderstood either a “spirit” (i.e., a prophecy or a revelation) or a “message” (oral communication) or a “letter” (which may mean a genuine letter from Paul that was not understood correctly, or a letter that claimed to be from Paul and was not). In fact, they thought Christ had already returned. Of course, the glorious appearing of Christ had not taken place yet, but “the Day of the Lord” was a complex event, with quite a number of features. They evidently felt “the day” had dawned, the events had begun to unfold, and all that the coming of Christ involved would very soon be accomplished.

Paul made clear that this was not so. There were several things that must happen first, for example, “the rebellion” (HCSB, “apostasy”) that occurs and the revelation of “the man of lawlessness” (2:3). He did not explain either. He was probably referring to what he had told the Thessalonians while he had been among them. Unfortunately, we do not know what he said then, so we are left to do some guessing. That a rebellion against the faith will precede the Lord's return is clearly a well-known part of Christian teaching (Matt. 24:10-14; 1 Tim. 4:1-3; 2 Tim. 3:1-9; 4:3-4). Some manuscripts read “man of sin” (instead of “lawlessness”), but there is no real difference in meaning for “sin is the breaking of law” (1 John 3:4 HCSB). The Bible does not use the term “man of lawlessness” elsewhere, but clearly he is the same as the one called “antichrist” (1 John 2:18). Paul was saying that in the end time one would appear who will do the work of Satan in a special way. He will oppose the true God and claim divine honors for himself (2:4).

The identity of the “restrainer” in 2:6-7 is unclear. There is a neuter participle “restrainer” in v. 6 and a masculine one in v. 7. An ancient interpretation still held by some today is that the restrainer in v. 6 is the Roman Empire and in v. 7 the emperor. Paul was relying on Rome to maintain law and order. A more recent interpretation is that v. 6 refers to the preaching of the gospel and v. 7 to either the Apostle Paul or an angel. Another quite different view is that v. 6 refers to the principle (or mystery) of rebellion and v. 7 to Satan or again the Roman emperor. In this case, the verb is understood to mean not “restrain” but “hold sway,” “rule,” or “prevail.” Perhaps the most popular interpretation is that the restrainer is the Holy Spirit. A common dispensational interpretation is that the restraint will be removed when the church will be taken up by God at the rapture (1 Thess. 4:17).

However, Paul's important point is that believers should not be rushing into premature expectations. In due course these things will take place, and God will do away with all the forces of evil (2:8-10).

Paul had a good deal to say about people he calls “disorderly” and who appear to be idle, not working at all (3:6-12). This may have been because they thought the Lord's coming was so close there was no point in it, or perhaps they were so “spiritual minded” that they concentrated on higher things and let other people provide for their needs. Paul counseled all to work for their living (3:12). No doctrinal emphasis, not even that of Christ's return, should lead Christians away from work. People able to work should earn their daily bread. Believers are to work for their living and not grow weary in doing good.

Timothy had just come to Paul from Thessalonica with fresh news (1 Thess. 3:2). Paul saw that the troubles he dealt with in the first letter were still present. So he wrote once more to rebuke the lazy (2 Thess. 3:10) and to encourage the downhearted. There was a new error about the second coming, with some saying that the Day of the Lord had already come. Paul set these people right, teaching them that evil will flourish when the man of lawlessness appears, but that they should look beyond that to the certainty that in due time Christ will return and defeat every force of evil. Christians have been heartened by such teaching from that day to this.

THESSALONICA (Thĕs sá lō nī' cá) Name of modern Thessaloniki, given to the city about 315 B.C. by Cassander, a general of Alexander the Great. He founded the city in that year, naming it after his wife who was the daughter of Philip II and half sister of Alexander. Located on the Thermaic Gulf (Gulf of Salonika) with an excellent harbor—and at the termination of a major trade route from the Danube—it became, with Corinth, one of the two most important commercial centers in Greece. In the Roman period it retained its Greek cultural orientation and functioned as the capital of Macedonia after 146 B.C. See Macedonia.

When the Apostle Paul visited the city, it was larger than Philippi and reflected a predominantly Roman culture. Thessalonica was a free city, having no Roman garrison within its walls and maintaining the privilege of minting its own coins. Like Corinth, it had a cosmopolitan population due to the commercial prowess of the city. The recent discovery of a marble inscription, written partly in Greek and partly in a Samaritan form of Hebrew and Aramaic, testifies to the presence of Samaritans in Thessalonica. The book of Acts testifies to the presence of a Jewish synagogue there (17:1).

Since most of the ancient city still lies under modern Thessaloniki, it has been impossible to excavate it. However, in the center of town, a large open area has been excavated revealing a Roman forum (marketplace), about 70 by 110 yards, which dates from about A.D. 100 to 300. An inscription found in the general area, dating to 60 B.C., mentions an agora (Gk. for the Roman “forum”) and opens the possibility that a Hellenistic marketplace was located here just prior to the construction of this Roman one. In Hellenistic times there was a stadium, a gymnasium, and a temple of Serapis in the city. A third-century odeum (small theater) is preserved on the east side of the forum.

The authenticity of Acts has been questioned due to Luke's mention of Roman officials in Thessalonica by the name of politarchs (Acts 17:6), who are otherwise unknown in extant Greek literature. However, a Roman arch at the western end of ancient Vardar Street contained an inscription from before A.D. 100 that began, "In the time of the Politarchs." Several other inscriptions from Thessalonica, one of them dating from the reign of Augustus Caesar, mention politarchs. THEUDAS (Thu' dás) Personal name meaning "gift of God." Acts 5:36 refers to a Theudas who was slain after leading an unsuccessful rebellion of 400 men prior to the census (A.D. 6). Josephus knew a Theudas who led an unsuccessful rebellion during the consulate of Cuspius Fadus (about A.D. 44). Either two rebels are involved, or one of the historians incorporated an inaccurate source into his narrative.

THIEF See Crimes and Punishment; Law, Ten Commandments, Torah.

THIGH Side of the lower torso and the upper part of the leg. Sometimes the reference is simply physical (Judg. 3:16; Ps. 45:3; Song 3:8; 7:1). More often Scripture regards the thigh as the seat of vital functions, especially procreation. English translations often obscure this connection. The Hebrew text of Gen. 46:26; Exod. 1:5; and Judg. 8:30 gives the thighs (HCSB, “direct descendants”; KJV “loins”) as the source of offspring. Marital infidelity was punishable by making the “thigh shrivel” (HCSB), that is, by failure of the reproductive system (Num. 5:16-21). In the patriarchal period oaths were taken by placing a hand “under the thigh,” a veiled reference to the reproductive organs. (The English terms “testify” and “testes” witness a similar relation.) The action perhaps represents the calling of one’s descendants as witnesses of the oath. When the “stranger” at Peniel did not prevail against Jacob, he touched Jacob at the hip socket of his thigh, leaving him limping (Gen. 32:25-32). Jacob escaped the struggle broken but unbowed. Slapping the thigh indicated sorrow, shame, or remorse (Jer. 31:19; Ezek. 21:12). The thigh was among the portions of the sacrifice going to the priests (Lev. 7:32-34; 10:14; cp. 1 Sam. 9:24 where Samuel honored Saul with this portion).

THOMAS Personal name from Hebrew meaning “a twin.” One of the first 12 disciples of Jesus (Mark 3:18). The apocryphal book, The Acts of Thomas, uses the literal meaning of his name (“twin”) in making him the twin of Jesus Himself! His personality was complex, revealing a skepticism mixed with loyalty and faith (John 11:16). Thomas sought evidence of Jesus' resurrection (John 20:25) but, when convinced of the miracle, made a historic confession of faith (20:28). See Apocrypha, New Testament; Didymus; Disciple.

THORN IN THE FLESH Greek word skolops occurred in classical Greek as a stake or sharp wooden shaft used to impale. In Hellenistic Greek the variations “thorn” and “splinter” are found. The majority of references in the LXX, the NT, and papyri are translated as thorn, splinter, or sliver. Origen's theological opponents Ceisus and Eustathius used skolops as a derogatory reference to the cross.

Because false teachers in Corinth claimed receiving divine revelation, Paul shared his vision of the “third heaven” as miraculous evidence of his apostolic calling. Paul's revelation was balanced by a “thorn in the flesh” (2 Cor. 12:7). During this era physical ailments were a constant problem. As a result, most patristic writers perceived Paul's affliction as either a painful, chronic physical problem or ongoing persecution.

In the Middle Ages the “thorn” was taken as carnal temptation. The Vulgate encouraged the perception of the thorn as a sexual temptation. In the Reformation Luther and Calvin rejected the idea of sexual temptation. Calvin interpreted the “thorn in the flesh” as a variety of physical and spiritual temptations. Luther interpreted the thorn as physical illness.

Four modern theories concern Paul's thorn in the flesh. The most common theory is some sort of recurring physical illness, possibly malaria, based on a perceived relationship to Paul's bodily illness of Gal. 4:13. Some hold that Paul suffered from an eye disease (ophthalmia), pointing to Gal.

4:13-15, where Paul confirmed that the Galatians would have given him, if possible, their eyes. Further, in Gal. 6:11 Paul indicates he wrote in large script, which is logical for a person with eye trouble. A third common theory was sorrow and pain because of Jewish unbelief (Rom. 9:1-3). A fourth theory is that of a “messenger of Satan,” rather than a physical ailment, given as a redemptive judgment of God on Paul for the purpose of humility.

Other theories were hysteria, hypochondria, gallstones, gout, rheumatism, sciatica, gastritis, leprosy, lice, deafness, dental infection, neurasthenia, a speech impediment, and remorse for persecuting the Church. Steven L. Cox

THUMMIM See Urim and Thummim.

THUTMOSE (Thût mô' sə) Egyptian royal name meaning “Thoth the moon god is born.” Four pharaohs of the Egyptian 18th Dynasty (about 1550-1310 B.C.). Their combined efforts, especially those of Thutmose I and III, did much to expand Egyptian wealth and influence.

Thutmose I rose to power through his skills as a general and by marrying the daughter of his predecessor, Amenhotep I. His military exploits expanded Egypt to include Nubia to the south and Syria, north to the Euphrates River. The tribute from his conquests allowed Eneni, his architect, to restore and add to the temples of Thebes. Eneni was also instructed to initiate the work at Biban el-Moluk (gates of the kings) known today as the Valley of the Kings. Thutmose I had no clear heir to the throne when he died.

Thutmose II succeeded in gaining the throne by marrying his ambitious half sister Hatshepsut. His reign lasted only a few years and was obscured by the shadow of this queen.

Thutmose III marched in the steps of his grandfather Thutmose I but only after about 20 years of “co-rule” with Hatshepsut. His hatred of her must have smoldered all those years, for he removed much of the evidence of her reign as soon as she was dead. Thutmose III conducted 14 military campaigns in 17 years, continuing his rule another 15 years. The Theban temple of Karnak contains displays of his exploits. He especially enjoyed hunting and was devoted to the god Amun. Some scholars believe him to be the pharaoh of the Israelite oppression. Amenhotep II became co-regent with his father for about three years at the conclusion of his reign.

Thutmose IV, like Thutmose II, seized his position by marriage. He seemed content to maintain the status quo and clear the sand from the Sphinx where he had dreamed of becoming Pharaoh according to a stela, an ancient stone bearing some inscription. That he was not the firstborn son of the previous pharaoh is considered by some to be evidence that Amenhotep II was the pharaoh of the exodus. See Egypt; Thebes. Gary C. Huckabay THYATIRA (Thī á tí' rá) City in the Lycus River Valley. Although never a magnificent city, Thyatira was the center of a number of trade guilds that used the natural resources of the area to make it a very profitable site. Thyatira had a Jewish contingent out of which grew a NT church. One of Paul's first converts from the European continent, Lydia, was a native of Thyatira (Acts 16:14). She probably was a member of a guild there that dealt in purple dye. The church at Thyatira was praised for its works of charity, service, and faith (Rev. 2:19), but criticized for allowing the followers of Jezebel to prosper in its midst (2:20). See Asia Minor, Cities of; Revelation, Book of.

TIAMAT (Te a' ma) Sumerian-Akkadian goddess viewed by the Babylonians as one of the major gods of their pantheon. She controlled the salt waters and was seen as a capricious goddess because of the destructive yet beneficial nature of the rivers and seas. In the creation epic, Enuma Elish, Tiamat and her consort, Apsu, gave birth to Anshar and Kishar, the universe above and below. According to the epic, the creation of the earth was the result of Tiamat's defeat by the god Marduk, who split Tiamat in two to form heaven and earth, a picture of the primordial sea being driven back and giving way to the land.

TIBERIAS (Ti bir' Yas) Mentioned only in John 6:23 (cp. 6:1; 21:1), Tiberias is a city located on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee encompassing today what was in ancient times two separate cities, Tiberias and Hammath, each surrounded by its own wall. Once a mile apart (Palestinian Talmud, Megillah 2.2), they were combined into a single city, apparently in the first century after Christ (Tosefta, Erubin 7.2, 146). At this time, about A.D. 18, Herod Antipas (Luke 3:1) built the larger city on a major trade route connecting Egypt with Syria, to replace Sepphoris as the capital of Galilee (Josephus, Antiquities 18.36). It remained the capital until A.D. 61 when it was given to Agrippa II by Nero (Antiquities 20.159). It was paganized by Hadrian after the second Jewish revolt in A.D. 132-135 but became the center of Jewish learning after A.D. 200. The Mishnah, which was compiled in Sepphoris by Judah haNasi, took its final shape in Tiberias as did the Talmud and the Masoretic Text of the Hebrew Bible.

Excavations by N. Slouschz in 1921 and M. Dothan in 1961 at Hammath-Tiberias, near the warm baths, revealed several superimposed synagogues dating from about 300 to 800, some having beautiful mosaic floors. In 1973 and 1974 G. Foerster, digging just south of this area, found the southern gate of the city, having two round towers and dating to the founding of Tiberias before A.D. 100. John McRay

TIBERIUS CAESAR (Ti bīr' i ūs Çē' zār) Person who had the unenviable task of following Augustus as Roman emperor. He ruled the empire from A.D. 14-37. Tiberius was especially ill suited to follow Augustus. A solid, taciturn man, he lacked the public relations ability of Augustus.

Tiberius was 54 when he ascended to the throne. He was a republican at heart, so he must have felt very uncomfortable with the system of government that Augustus left him. He had a deep respect for the Senate, and he took great pains to preserve the dignity of that body. Yet even Tiberius came to realize that it was too late to make the Senate an equal partner in government.

During the reign of Tiberius, Jesus began His ministry, and He was crucified. This event was probably not noted at the emperor's court. Tiberius died in A.D. 37. He was 79 years old. See Rome and the Roman Empire. Gary Poulton

TIBHATH (Tib' hāth) Place-name meaning “place of slaughter.” City from which David took spoils (or received tribute) of bronze (1 Chron. 18:8). The site is likely in the vicinity of Zobah north of Damascus. The parallel in 2 Sam. 8:8 reads “Betah.”

TIBNI (Tib' nī) Personal name meaning “intelligent” or “straw” Likely an army officer who struggled with Omri over succession to the throne of Israel following Zimri's suicide (1 Kings 16:21-22).

TIDAL (Tī' dāl) One of four kings allied against five in Gen. 14:1,9. The name is similar to Tud'alia, the name of several Hittite kings, suggesting the king's origin in eastern Asia Minor. The king is perhaps Tudhalia I (about 1700-1650 B.C.).

Modern Tiberias, built over the ancient city of Tiberias, overlooks the Sea of Galilee.

TIGLATH-PILESER (Tig lāth-pī lē' zēr) Personal name meaning “My trust is the son of Esarra (the temple of Asshur).” King of Assyria from 745 to 727 B.C. (2 Kings 16:7), also known as Tilgath-pilneser (1 Chron. 5:6; 2 Chron. 28:20) and Pul (2 Kings 15:19; 1 Chron. 5:26). See Assyria.

TIGRIS RIVER See Euphrates and Tigris Rivers; Rivers and Waterways.

The Tigris River flows through the country of Iraq (ancient Mesopotamia).

TIKVAH (Tik' vah) Personal name meaning “hope, expectation.” 1. Father-in-law of Huldah, the prophetess (2 Kings 22:14; 2 Chron. 34:22). 2. Father of Jahaziah who opposed Ezra's call for Israelites to divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 10:15).

TIKVATH (Tik' vāth) KJV alternate form of Tikvah (2 Chron. 34:22), perhaps representing original form of foreign name written in Hebrew as Tikvah.

TILGATH-PILNESER (Til gāth-pil ne' zēr) Alternate form of Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. 5:6; 2 Chron. 28:20).

TILON (Ti' lōn) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

TIMAEUS (Ti me' ūs) Personal name meaning “highly prized” (Mark 10:46). Bartimaeus is Aramaic for “son of Timaeus.”

TIMBREL KJV term for a tambourine. See Tabret; Music, Instruments, Dancing.

TIME, MEANING OF God and Time God is Lord over time because He created and ordained time (Gen. 1:4-5,14-19). God Himself is timeless and eternal, not bound by space or time (Exod. 3:14-15; 1 Chron. 16:36; Pss.

41:13; 90:1-2; 93:2; 146:10; Isa. 9:6; John 1:1-18; 8:58; Heb. 13:8; 2 Pet. 3:8; Jude 25). On the other hand, God is not removed from time. Through His providential care and especially in the incarnation of Jesus Christ, God enters into time without being limited by the constraints of time.

Because of His foreknowledge, only God knows and foreordains events in time (Dan. 2:20-22; Mark 13:31-32; Acts 1:7; 2:22-23). God sees all things in time from a perspective of eternity, sees the end from the beginning. Humans, however, are trapped in time, and sometimes cannot discern the meaning and significance of time in their own day (Eccles. 3:1-11; 9:12; Ps. 90:9-10; Luke 12:54-56; James 4:13-16). Being bound by the remorseless march of time is a telling reminder of human finitude and temporality.

Structure of Time The agricultural societies surrounding the Hebrew people had a cyclical view of time tied to the annual cycle of the sun. Israel's economy was also agricultural, and thus the Israelite calendar took account of the cycles of the moon and the sun (Num. 10:10; 1 Sam. 20:5,18,24; 1 Kings 4:23; Ps. 81:2; Isa. 1:13-14; Col. 2:16). Scripture sometimes hints at a cyclical view of history, such as in the life cycles described in Ecclesiastes (1:3-12; 3:1-8), and in the repeated pattern in the book of Judges (Israel sins, a crisis arises, the people cry out for God's help, and God's delivers them). However, the Bible affirms a distinctively different view of time than that of the surrounding cultures. Scripture frames history with a linear view of time, beginning with creation, continuing through history directed by the providence of God, and culminating in the Day of the Lord. Time begins at a decisive moment by the creation of God (Gen. 1:14-19). The history of God's interaction with humanity is recorded in Scripture in chronological order in narrative books in both the OT and NT. Whereas the overarching theme of the Bible is God's actions in history, the scriptural writers were careful to document the date of their narratives very specifically. For example, there are over 180 references in the Bible translated "month," usually in reference to a specific holy day, to an event in the life of Israel, or to the reception by prophets of the Word of the Lord. All the Gospel writers had concern for chronology, but Luke was most careful to date biblical events intentionally by well-known public events (Luke 1:1-4; 2:1-3; 3:1-2). The specific dating of these events underscores that these are real events in time and space, not merely mystical or mythological stories.

Measuring Time God ordained the day and night (Gen. 1:14-19) and weeks (Gen. 1:1-2:3; Exod. 16:25-26; 20:9-11) as measures of time. At the time that Scripture was written, Jews viewed the day as beginning the evening before (Gen. 1:5,8,13,19, 23,31; Mark 13:35). The daytime hours were counted as 12 hours, with noon being the sixth hour (Mark 15:25; John 11:9). The days were divided into three or four “watches,” evidently tied to the watch hours of military sentries (Exod. 14:24; 1 Sam 11:11; Judg. 7:19; Lam. 2:19; Matt. 14:25; Mark 6:48; Luke 12:38). The only time instrument mentioned in the Bible is a sundial owned by King Ahaz (2 Kings 20:8-11; Isa. 38:7-8).

There were 12 months in the Hebrew year. These months were counted on the lunar calendar as about 30 days each, and thus adjustments were made periodically to make the year 365 days and correspond to the solar calendar. The first month was called Abib (Exod. 13:4; 23:15; 34:18; Deut. 16:1) or Nisan (Neh. 2:1; Esther 3:7). The second month was Ziv (1 Kings 6:1,37); the third month was Sivan (Esther 8:9); and the names of the fourth and fifth months are not given in Scripture. The sixth month is Elul (Neh. 6:15); the seventh is Ethanim (1 Kings 8:2); the eighth is Bul (1 Kings 6:38); the ninth is Chislev (Neh. 1:1; Zech. 7:11); the tenth is Tebeth (Esther 2:16); the eleventh is Shebat (Zech. 1:7); and the twelfth is Adar (Ezra 6:15; Esther 3:7,13; 8:12; 9:1,15,17,19,21). The annual Israelite calendar was framed by a series of feast days, holy days, and religious festivals. There was no systematic dating system for years, but years were usually stated in reference to other historical events. In the books of 1 and 2 Kings and 1 and 2 Chronicles, the date a king began his reign in one kingdom was measured by the date the king in another kingdom began his reign (1 Kings 15:1,9,15,28,33; 16:8,10,15, 23,29). The coronation of kings and other dramatic events became the measuring rods for dating other events (Isa. 6:1; 20:1; Amos 1:1; Luke 2:1-3; 3:1-2).

Discerning Time Apart from the chronological measurement of time, another sense of time is emphasized in Scripture as divinely appointed times. Although the distinction is not absolute, there are two words in the NT that emphasize these two dimensions of time. Chronos is the Greek term usually referring simply to the chronological measurement of time (Luke 20:9; John 7:33; Acts 14:28), while kairos usually refers to the spiritual significance of an era (Mark 1:15; Luke 19:44; Rom. 5:6; Titus 1:3; Rev. 1:3). Some times are divinely appointed, especially in carrying out God's will for a specific mission at a specific time (Acts 17:26; Heb. 9:27), or in events appropriate to each season of life (Deut. 11:14; Ps. 145:15; Eccles. 3:1-11; Jer. 18:23). It was of vital importance that Jesus' incarnation occurred in the kairos moment, in the fullness of time (John 7:8; Gal. 4:4). Sometimes the spirit of the age may be characterized as evil or good (Isa. 49:8; Eph. 5:15; 4:2-3). It is incumbent on all believers to look beyond the surface things of life to discern the spiritual significance of their own day, the deeper spiritual issues which give life meaning (Ps. 90:9-10; Luke 12:54-56). For example, John portrays the miracles of Jesus as not merely a series of unusual events, but as signs pointing to the divinity of Christ (John 2:11,23; 4:54; 6:2,14,26; 9:16; 11:47; 12:37; 20:30). With spiritual discernment, there is more to the events of an era than meets the eye. Each moment of this life is an arena for decisions with eternal consequences (2 Cor. 6:2; Eph. 5:15-16). Therefore, Christians should be careful to discern the meaning and significance of their time, comprehending both the reality of evil and the movement of God in history.

Time and Eternity A Christian lives in time but looks forward to the day when the sting of time shall be no more. In the present we participate in the kingdom of God. There is a sense in which we already have a foretaste of eternity within time. John particularly emphasized this “realized eschatology” in his Gospel—that eternal life is a present possession of the believer (John 3:16,36; 5:24). The kingdom of God is realized in us as we acknowledge Jesus' lordship in our lives. Yet we also look toward an age to come, the Day of the Lord (Amos 5:18-20; Obad. 1:15; Zeph. 1:7-14; 2 Thess. 2:1-12). The Bible draws a clear distinction between the present age and the age to come (Mark 10:30; Rom. 8:18; Eph. 1:21; 2:4-7; Titus 2:12-13). The present age is the time of decision and service in the kingdom of God; the age to come is the full realization of God's provision of eternal life. Christians thus live in the tension between “already” (that eternity has invaded time through Jesus Christ) and the “not yet” (that our salvation awaits completion in heaven). Time will cease being meaningful when we enter into eternity, believers with God in heaven and unbelievers with Satan in hell (Dan. 7:18,27; Matt. 25:41-46; Rev. 14:11; 20:5,10-15). Human finitude and death give time its significance. In eternity time will be redeemed. See History. Steve W. Lemke

The modern name Timna refers to a large coppermining area north of the Gulf of Aqaba.

TIMNA (Tīm' nā) Personal name meaning “holding in check” or “she protects.” 1. Sister of the Horite clan chief Lotan (Gen. 36:22; 1 Chron. 1:39), concubine of Esau's son Eliphaz, and mother of Amalek (Gen. 36:12). 2. Son of Eliphaz (1 Chron. 1:36; Gen. 36:16 “Teman”) and Edomite clan chief (Gen. 36:40; 1 Chron. 1:51). Timna is associated with either Timna in southern Arabia or, following Gen. 36:16, Teman in southern Edom. It is the name of the capital of Qataban. 3. Modern name for an ancient copper mining site 14 miles north of Elath.

TIMNAH (Tīm' nah) Place-name meaning “allotted portion.” 1. Town assigned to Dan (Josh. 19:43), located on the southern border with Judah (Josh. 15:10). The site is likely Tell el-Batashi about four miles northwest of Bethshemesh in Judah. Philistines occupied the site at the time of Samson (Judg. 14:1-5). Uzziah likely took the site as part of his conquest of Philistine cities (2 Chron. 26:6). His grandson Ahaz lost the city to the Philistines again (2 Chron. 28:18). The city fell to the Assyrian king Sennacherib in 701 B.C. 2. Village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:57). This Timnah was the likely scene of Judah's encounter with Tamar (Gen. 38:12-14). The probable site lies south of Hebron about four miles east of Beit Nettif.

Overview of Tell Batash (site of the ancient city of Timnah).

TIMNATH (Tīm' nāth) (KJV, Gen. 38:12-14) See Timnah 2.

TIMNATH-HERES or TIMNATH-SERAH (Tīm nāth-hē' rēz, Tīm nāth-sē' rah) Place of Joshua's inheritance and burial (Judg. 2:9; Josh. 19:50; 24:30). Timnath-heres means “portion of the sun,” suggesting a site dedicated to sun worship (Judg. 2:9). Timnath-serah means “remaining portion,” pointing to land given to Joshua following distribution of land to the tribes (Josh. 19:50; 24:30). The site is identified with Khirbet Tibneh about 17 miles southwest of Shechem.

TIMNITE (Tīm' nīt) Resident of Timnah (Judg. 15:6).

TIMON (Ti' mōn) Personal name meaning “honorable.” One of seven chosen to supervise distribution of food to the Greek-speaking widows of the Jerusalem church (Acts 6:5).

TIMOTHY Personal name meaning “honoring God.” Friend and trusted coworker of Paul. When Timothy was a child, his mother Eunice and his grandmother Lois taught him the Scriptures (2 Tim. 1:5; 3:15). A native of Lystra, he may have been converted on Paul's first missionary journey (Acts 14:6-23). Paul referred to Timothy as his child in the faith (1 Cor. 4:17; 1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2). This probably means that Paul was instrumental in Timothy's conversion. When Paul came to Lystra on his second journey, Timothy was a disciple who was well respected by the believers (Acts 16:1-2). Paul asked Timothy to accompany him. Timothy's father was a Greek, and Timothy had not been circumcised. Because they would be ministering to many Jews and because Timothy's mother was Jewish, Paul had Timothy circumcised (Acts 16:3).

Timothy not only accompanied Paul but also was sent on many crucial missions by Paul (Acts 17:14-15; 18:5; 19:22; 20:4; Rom. 16:21; 1 Cor. 16:10; 2 Cor. 1:19; 1 Thess. 3:2,6). For example, when Paul was unable to go to Corinth, he sent Timothy to represent Paul and his teachings (1 Cor. 4:17). Later when Paul was in prison, he sent Timothy to Philippi (Phil. 2:19). Paul felt that no one had any more compassion and commitment than Timothy (Phil. 2:20-22).

So close were Paul and Timothy that both names are listed as the authors of six of Paul's letters (2 Cor. 1:1; Phil. 1:1; Col. 1:1; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1; Philem. 1). In addition, Paul wrote two letters to Timothy (1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2). As Paul's ministry neared the end, he challenged Timothy to remain true to his calling (1 Tim. 1:18). As Paul faced death, he asked Timothy to come to be with him (2 Tim. 4:9). At some point in his life, Timothy was imprisoned, but he was released (Heb. 13:23). TIMOTHY, FIRST LETTER TO First of two letters Paul wrote to Timothy. The letter was written in approximately A.D. 63, following Paul's first imprisonment in Rome. It is likely that Paul left Rome and traveled to Ephesus. There is some debate concerning the place of writing. Rome and Macedonia have been offered as possibilities. Perhaps, in light of 1 Tim. 1:3, Macedonia could be the better choice. The letter was addressed to Timothy in Ephesus. Paul had urged Timothy to remain in Ephesus and lead this important church as its pastor (1:3).

Purpose Paul had hoped to visit Timothy in Ephesus but was fearful of a delay. If he were delayed, he wanted Timothy to “know how people ought to act in God's household” (3:14-15 HCSB). The epistle contains instructions concerning order and structure in the church and practical advice for the young pastor. One important theme in this and the other two Pastoral Epistles (2 Timothy and Titus) is sound teaching. Paul urged Timothy and Titus to confront the false teaching by sound or healthy teaching. This word occurs eight times in these three letters (1Tim. 1:10; 6:3; 2 Tim. 1:13; 4:3; Titus 1:9,13; 2:1-2). See Letters; Paul; Timothy.

Overview Chapter One Paul wrote as an apostle of Jesus Christ. He was writing with the authority of Jesus Himself. The error described in verses 3-4 was Jewish in nature. Some were falsely teaching a mythological treatment of OT genealogies. This teaching was both meaningless and controversial. Timothy was urged to teach “sound teaching” in its place (1:10-11 HCSB). Two leaders among the false teachers were Hymenaeus and Alexander; Paul said he “delivered them to Satan, so that they may be taught not to blaspheme” (1:20; cp. 1 Cor. 5:5). The purpose of this and all Christian discipline was the eventual restoration of the offender.

Chapter Two Prayer is given priority in the worship services in the church. Seven different Greek words appear in the NT for prayer, and four of them occur in verse 1. One of the most significant statements in the entire NT is found in verse 5. Paul wrote there is “one God” and “one mediator between God and man, a man, Christ Jesus” (HCSB). Monotheism is clearly taught as opposed to the polytheism of the first-century religious world. Mediator is a word that means “go-between.” Jesus is humanity's “go between” to God.

He is also called our “ransom” in verse 6. A ransom was paid to a slave owner to purchase the freedom of the slave. Jesus paid for our redemption with His death on the cross.

Chapter Three Qualifications for church leadership are discussed in this chapter. Fifteen moral and ethical requirements are mentioned in verses 2-7. See Offices in the New Testament.

Chapter Four Paul affirmed that “everything created by God is good” (4:4 HCSB). Some false teachers maintained that marriage and certain foods were wrong. Paul drew from the message of Genesis in which God affirmed everything He created was good! Mankind takes God's good creation and corrupts it. The apostle reminded Timothy to be a “good servant of Christ Jesus” (4:6) and to “be an example to the believers in speech, in conduct, in love, in faith, in purity” (4:12).

Chapter Five Paul gave practical instructions concerning the ministry of the church to various groups that comprise its membership.

Chapter Six The teachers of false doctrine were motivated by “material gain” (6:5 HCSB). Paul warned in light of this fact and others that “the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil” (6:10).

Mark E. Matheson

TIMOTHY, SECOND LETTER TO Second of Paul's letters to Timothy, pastor of the church in Ephesus. The letter was the last letter of which we have a record written by Paul. He wrote this letter from his jail cell during his second imprisonment in Rome. He was awaiting trial for his faith. It is clear that he felt he would not be released (4:6). If Nero executed Paul and if Nero was killed in A.D. 68, then Paul had to have been executed sometime before. The letter can be dated between A.D. 63 and A.D. 67. Timothy was the recipient of Paul's letter. He had been the apostle's representative in the city of Ephesus for sometime.

Purpose The letter contains Paul's stirring words of encouragement and instruction to his young disciple. Paul longed to see Timothy (1:4) and asked him to come to Rome for a visit. It is generally believed that Timothy went. Paul asked him to come before winter (4:21) and bring the winter coat Paul left in Troas (4:13). Timothy was also asked to bring the scrolls and the parchments so Paul could read and study (4:13). See Letters; Paul; Timothy. Overview Chapter One Paul was reminded that Timothy's faith first lived in his grandmother Lois and in his mother Eunice (1:5). Paul had in reality become Timothy's father (1:2). Timothy may have been a naturally timid person. Because of this, Paul told him to minister with a spirit of power (1:7). The Holy Spirit empowers believers, but we should be careful to exercise this power in a spirit of "love and sound judgment" (1:7 HCSB). Two men, Phygelus and Hermogenes, deserted Paul (1:15).

Onesiphorus was a refreshing friend and not ashamed of Paul's chains (1:16).

Chapter Two Paul urged Timothy to be strong in Jesus Christ. Paul used the metaphors of a good soldier, athlete, and a hardworking farmer when describing the Christian's calling. The purpose of that calling is so all “may obtain salvation, which is in Christ Jesus” (2:10 HCSB). Timothy was to be one who would be “correctly teaching the word of truth” (2:15) in the face of those who mishandled it. Hymenaeus (1 Tim. 1:20) and Philetus were singled out. They were teaching that the resurrection had already taken place and were destroying the faith of some (2:18).

Chapter Three “The last days” are a reference to the second coming of Jesus. The days preceding His return will be “difficult.” Characteristics of these last days have appeared in many different ages, but the times before Jesus' actual return will be even more intense. Paul listed 18 characteristics of evil men in verses 2-5. He compared them to Jannes and Jambres who opposed Moses (3:8). Although these two individuals are not mentioned in the OT, Jewish tradition maintains that these men were two Egyptian magicians who opposed Moses and Aaron. The evil and false teaching is to be overcome by the holy Scripture (3:16-17).

Chapter Four Paul further instructed Timothy to be prepared to “proclaim the message” (HCSB) at all times. The need is paramount, for people will not always adhere to “sound doctrine” (4:3). Paul, drawing on the imagery of Num. 28:24, compared his life to that of a “drink offering.” This was poured on a sacrifice before it was offered. He was ready to depart this life and go to be with the Lord. He anticipated the “crown of righteousness” that awaited him (4:8). The letter closes with practical instructions and pastoral remarks for Timothy.

TINKLING ORNAMENTS (KJV) Anklets making a tinkling noise as one walked. Part of the finery of the affluent women of Jerusalem (Isa. 3:16,18). See Anklet.

TIPHSAH (Tiph' sah) Place-name meaning "passage, ford." 1. City on the west bank of the Euphrates about 75 miles south of Carchemish, representing the northeastern limit of Solomon's kingdom (1 Kings 4:24). 2. Site near Tirzah in Samaria (2 Kings 15:16), possibly a corruption of Tappuah, the reading of the earliest Greek translation which REB, RSV, TEV follow.

TIRAS (Tir' ras) Division of the descendants of Japheth who are all seagoing peoples (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5). Traditionally, they have been related to Turscha, part of the sea peoples Rameses III (1198-1166 B.C.) fought. Some have identified them with the Etruscans of Italy.

TIRATHITES (Tir' rath its) Family of Kenite scribes (1 Chron.2:55).

TIRE KJV term meaning "turban" (Ezek. 24:17,23).

TIRHAKAH (Tir ha' kah) Egyptian pharaoh of the 25th Dynasty (689-664 B.C.) who supported Hezekiah's revolt against the Assyrian king Sennacherib (2 Kings 19:8-9; Isa. 37:9).

TIRHANAH (Tir ha' nah) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Caleb and Maacah (1 Chron. 2:48).

TIRIA (Tir' i á) Personal name meaning “fear.” Descendant and family of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16).

TIRSHATHA (Tir shá' thá) Title of honor designating respect for an official, sometimes translated “your excellence” (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65,70; 8:9; 10:1).

TIRZAH (Tir' zah) Personal name and placename meaning “she is friendly.”
1. Daughter of Zelophehad who inherited part of tribal land allotment of Manasseh since her father had no sons. 2. Originally a Canaanite city noted for its beauty (Song 6:4) but captured in the conquest of the promised land (Josh. 12:24). It became one of the early capitals of Israel when Jeroboam I established his residence there (1 Kings 14:17) and continued as the capital until Omri built Samaria (1 Kings 16:23-24). Archaeological discoveries, coupled with biblical references, suggest that Tirzah is to be identified with modern Tell el-Fara, a tell of extraordinary size about seven miles northeast of Shechem. The area evidently was first occupied before 3000 B.C. and flourished, off and on, as a Canaanite city until its capture by Joshua between 1550 and 1200 B.C. It remained an Israelite city until the Assyrian conquest of 722 B.C. By 600 B.C. Tirzah was completely abandoned. Hugh Tobias

TISHBITE (Tish' bit) Resident of an unidentified village, Tishbe, used as a title of Elijah (1 Kings 17:1; 21:17,28; 2 Kings 1:3,8; 9:36). Tishbite is possibly a corruption of Jabeshite or a class designation (cp. the Hebrew toshab which designates a resident alien, Lev. 25:6). See Elijah.

TITHE Tenth part, especially as offered to God. Abraham presented a tithe of war booty to the priest-king of Jerusalem, Melchizedek (Gen. 14:18-20). Jacob pledged to offer God a tithe of all his possessions upon his safe return (Gen. 28:22). The tithe was subject to a variety of legislation. Numbers 18:20-32 provides for support of the Levites and the priests through the tithe. The Deuteronomic code stipulated that the tithe of agricultural produce be used for a family feast at the sanctuary celebrating God's provision (Deut. 14:22-27). The same code stipulated the third year's tithe for care of the Levites, orphans, widows, and foreigners (Deut. 14:28-29).

Some scholars think the differences in legislation reflect different uses of the tithe at various stages of Israel's history. The rabbis of the NT period, however, understood the laws as referring to three separate tithes: a Levitical tithe, a tithe spent celebrating in Jerusalem, and a charity tithe. Malachi 3:8 equates neglect of the tithe with robbing God. Jesus, however, warned that strict tithing must be accompanied by concern for the more important demands of the law, namely, for just and merciful living (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42). TITIUS JUSTUS See Justus.

TITTLE See Dot.

TITUS (Τίτῆς) Gentile companion of Paul (Gal. 2:3) and recipient of the NT letter bearing his name. Titus may have been converted by Paul who called him “my true child in our common faith” (Titus 1:4 HCSB). As one of Paul's early associates, Titus accompanied the apostle and Barnabas to Jerusalem (Gal. 2:1), probably on the famine relief visit (Acts 11:28-30).

Though Acts does not mention Titus, he was quite involved in Paul's missionary activities as shown in the Pauline letters. He was evidently known to the Galatians (Gal. 2:1,3), possibly from the first missionary journey to that region. Titus also seems to have been a very capable person, called by Paul “my partner and coworker” (2 Cor. 8:23 HCSB). He was entrusted with the delicate task of delivering Paul's severe letter (2 Cor. 2:1-4) to Corinth and correcting problems within the church there (2 Cor. 7:13-15). Titus' genuine concern for and evenhanded dealing with the Corinthians (2 Cor. 8:16-17; 12:18) no doubt contributed to his success, which he reported in person to Paul, anxiously awaiting word in Macedonia (2 Cor. 2:13; 7:5-6,13-15). Paul responded by writing 2 Corinthians that Titus probably delivered (2 Cor. 8:6,16-18,23).

Paul apparently was released after his first Roman imprisonment and made additional journeys, unrecorded in Acts. One of these took him and Titus to Crete, where Titus remained behind to oversee and administer the church (Titus 1:5). It was to Crete that Paul wrote his letter, asking Titus to join him in Nicopolis on the west coast of Greece (Titus 3:12). Following Paul's subsequent re-imprisonment, Titus was sent to Dalmatia (2 Tim. 4:10). According to church tradition, Titus was the first bishop of Crete. See Crete. Daniel C. Browning, Jr.

The Arch of Titus, emperor of the Roman Empire and son of Vespasian, in the city of Rome, Italy.

TITUS, CAESAR (Ti'tūs) Roman emperor A.D. 79-81, eldest son of Vespasian. Titus, like his father, was a soldier. He served in Germany and Britain and later in the Middle East. When Vespasian left his Middle East command to become emperor in A.D. 69, he left Titus in charge of crushing the Jewish revolt. In A.D. 70 his troops captured the temple in Jerusalem. They took the last stronghold, Masada, in A.D. 73. His victory over the Jews was vividly depicted on the Triumphal Arch erected in Rome that still stands today.

Titus was deeply admired by his soldiers; when he later became emperor, the populace loved him. He was considered an honest ruler and an efficient administrator. An adherent of Stoic philosophy, he believed that the Roman emperor was the servant of the people. He and his father before him (the so-called Flavian emperors) struggled after the excesses of Nero to reestablish stability in the empire and in the government. They managed to return the empire to sound financial footing.

Titus was constantly plagued by the activities of his younger brother, Domitian. Even though he did not believe that Domitian was worthy to be his successor, he would not dispose of him. See Jerusalem; Rome and the Roman Empire.

TITUS, LETTER TO Paul the apostle wrote to Titus, a trusted Gentile co-worker. When Paul and Barnabas went to Jerusalem to discuss the gospel with the apostles, they took Titus along with them as an example of a believing Gentile who had not been circumcised (Gal. 2:1-3). The apostle also used Titus to deliver a difficult letter to the Corinthian church (2 Cor. 2:3-4,13; 7:6-16) and to collect the church's gift for the poor saints in Jerusalem (8:16-24).

The circumstances of the writing of Titus are similar to those of the first letter to Timothy. After his first Roman imprisonment (A.D. 60-62), Paul returned to the East for missionary work. Apparently after Paul and Titus had evangelized Crete, Titus was left behind to set the churches in order, appointing elders in every city (Titus 1:5). Paul probably wrote this letter on the way to Nicopolis from Crete around A.D. 63-65. Just as in the first letter to Timothy, Paul warned against false teachers and issued instructions to various groups regarding proper Christian behavior. Furthermore, he instructed Titus to join him in Nicopolis whenever a replacement arrived (3:12).

Paul described the gospel as a fixed set of beliefs, “godliness” (Titus 1:1), “the truth” (1:1), “sound teaching” (1:9; 2:1,8), and “the faith” (1:13). That the gospel is described in this way should not trouble us nor lead to a suspicion that Paul did not write Titus. Unlike his letters to churches, Paul wrote to a person he trusted with the ministry of the gospel, and we would expect him to describe the gospel in these ways. In other letters Paul referred to the gospel in similar ways, stressing holding firmly to tradition (1 Cor. 11:2), citing creedal statements which reflected the gospel's content (15:3-5), and designated the gospel as “the faith” (Gal. 1:23).

As in the other Pastorals, heresy was a problem, made up of myths (Titus 1:14) and genealogies (3:9), as well as some Jewish elements (1:10,14). The false teachers enjoyed controversies and disputes (1:10; 3:9-10) and were deceptive (1:10), detestable, disobedient, and worthless (1:15-16). They also hoped for profit from their teaching (1:11). The false teaching may have been similar to the Colossian heresy.

Paul mentioned two offices of church leaders: elder (presbuteros, Titus 1:5), bishop/overseer (episkopos, 1:7), apparently used interchangeably, as in Acts 20:17,28. “Bishop” is more descriptive of function, while “elder” may refer to age and/or experience. These had spiritual oversight of the congregations. This does not necessarily reflect monarchical church structure later than Paul's lifetime. Paul did not discuss the duties of bishops and elders in detail, but elders/ overseers must be of unimpeachable moral character (Titus 1:5-9) and are to manage their families well (1:6).

Because the term “elders” is plural (Titus 1:5) many hold that each congregation had a plurality of elders. However, this cannot be proven. The use of the plural is natural when more than one person is indicated. The plural could easily be because there were multiple churches, thus multiple elders. Though multiple elders may have led each congregation, it seems more likely that individual elders led each house church.

Paul viewed humanity as having a problem with sin (Titus 3:3), but salvation was provided graciously by God, based solely on His grace and mercy and not on works (3:4-7). Paul also explained that those saved by Christ should devote themselves to good works (2:11-14; 3:3-8). See Apollos; Circumcision; Holy Spirit; Paul; Salvation.

TIZITE (Tɪˈzi) Title of Joha, one of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:45), designating his hometown or home region, which is otherwise unknown.

TOAH (Təˈah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “humility.” A Kohathite Levite (1 Chron. 6:34). The parallel lists read Natiath (1 Chron. 6:26) and Tohu (1 Sam. 1:1).

TOB (Tɒb) Place-name meaning “good.” Syrian city in southern Hauran to which Jephthah fled from his brothers (Judg. 11:3-5). Tob contributed troops to an unsuccessful alliance against David (2 Sam. 10:6-13). Tob is perhaps identical with Tabeel (Isa. 7:6). The site is perhaps et-Taiyibeh about 12 miles east of Ramoth-gilead near the source of the Yarmuk River.

TOBADONIJAH (Tɒb əd ɒ nɪˈjah) Personal name meaning “Yah, my Lord, is good.” Levite whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach the people of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8). The name is perhaps a combination of the two preceding names in the list.

TOBIAH (Tō bi' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah is good.” 1. One of the major adversaries to Nehemiah's rebuilding efforts at Jerusalem, Tobiah was a practicing Jew who lived in a residence chamber in the temple. He is called an “Ammonite” (Neh. 2:10,19) probably because his family fled to that territory at the destruction of Jerusalem. He enjoyed aristocratic favor and had the title “servant” bestowed on him by the Persian ruler. He opposed the rebuilding of Jerusalem because it would weaken his political authority in the area. Tobiah allied with Sanballat and Geshem in trying to thwart Nehemiah. 2. Ancestor of clan who returned from exile but could not show they were Israelites (Ezra 2:60)

TOBIJAH (Tō bi' jah) Alternate form of Tobiah. 1. Levite whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach the people (2 Chron. 17:8). 2. Returned exile who apparently brought a gift of gold from Babylon for the Jerusalem community. Zechariah used him as a witness for his crowning of Joshua, the high priest, and to preserve the crowns in the temple (Zech. 6:9-14).

TOCHEN (Tō' kēn) Place-name meaning “measure.” An unidentified village in Simeon (1 Chron. 4:32). The parallel lists in Josh. 15:42; 19:7 have “Ether.”

TOGARMMAH (Tō gár' mah) Son of Gomer and name of a region of Asia Minor (Gen. 10:3; 1 Chron. 1:6; cp. Beth-togarmah, Ezek. 38:6) inhabited by his descendants. Togarmah was famed for its horses (Ezek. 27:14). This site is likely modern Gurun, 70 miles west of Malatya, or an area in Armenia.

TOHU (Tō' hū) Ancestor of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1). Parallel lists read “Nahath” (1 Chron. 6:26) and “Toah” (6:34) in the corresponding position.

TOI (Tō' ī) Personal name meaning “error.” King of Hammath on the Orontes who sent tribute to David following his defeat of their mutual foe, Hadadezer of Zobah (2 Sam. 8:9-10; Tou, 1 Chron. 18:9-10).

TOKEN KJV term meaning “sign” (Gen. 9:12-17; Pss. 65:8; 135:9). See Sign.

TOKHATH (Tōk' hāth) Alternate form of Tikvah (2 Chron. 34:22).

TOLA (Tō' lā) Personal name meaning “crimson worm.” 1. Issachar's firstborn son (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:23; 1 Chron. 7:1-2). 2. Judge who governed Israel for 23 years from Shamir, likely at or near Samaria (Judg. 10:1).

TOLAD (Tō' lād) Alternate form of Eltolad (1 Chron. 4:29).

TOLAITE (Tō' lā it) Division of Issachar descended from Tola (Num. 26:23-25).

TOMB OF JESUS According to the NT accounts, the tomb of Jesus was located in a garden in the place where Jesus was crucified (John 19:41) outside the city walls of Jerusalem (19:20). It was a “new tomb” which had been “cut into the rock” by Joseph of Arimathea (Matt. 27:60 HCSB; cp. Luke 23:50-56) who had apparently prepared it for his own family's use. It was not uncommon for the well-to-do to prepare such a tomb in advance because of the difficulty of digging graves in the rocky ground around Jerusalem. The tomb was large enough for someone to sit inside (Mark 16:5; cp. John 20:11-12) and required that one stoop down to look inside and enter (John 20:5-6,11; cp. Luke 24:12). A great rolling stone sealed the entrance (Matt. 27:60; Mark 15:46; 16:3).

This description suggests a typical Jewish tomb of the Herodian period consisting of (1) an antechamber, (2) a low doorway that could be sealed with a stone (in many cases a rolling stone fitted into a groove or track so that the tomb could be opened and closed by rolling the stone back and forth in front of the doorway), and (3) a passageway leading to a rectangular-shaped tomb chamber. Here the body (having been wrapped in a linen cloth) could be laid lengthwise in either a rectangular, horizontal, oven-shaped shaft driven back into the vertical rock face measuring 78x25x20 inches or laid on a simple rock shelf cut laterally into the rock with a vaulted arch over it. The sequence of events narrated in the Gospel accounts (esp. John 20:5-6) would seem to indicate that Jesus' tomb had this vaulted arch.

The traditional site of the tomb of Jesus is marked by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which stands over the site of a first-century rock quarry that in Jesus' day was outside the city walls of Jerusalem and in which other typical first-century tombs have been discovered. An alternative site known as the "Garden Tomb" (adjacent to "Gordon's Calvary") was identified in 1883. HulittGloer

TONGS Pinchers for holding coals (1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron. 4:21; Isa. 6:6). KJV used "tongs" at Exod. 25:38; Num. 4:9 where modern translations read "snuffers" (HCSB, NASB, NRSV) or "wick trimmers" (NIV).

TONGUE The tongue (Hb. lashon, Gk. glossa) is the organ of speech. In both the OT and NT the word is also used for languages spoken (Isa. 28:11-12; Acts 2:4,11) as well as for the people who are represented by those languages (Isa. 66:18; Rev. 5:9). The word is also used of the tongues of animals, especially when humans are said to take on some animal-like quality related to the tongue, such as having a poisonous tongue like an asp (Job 20:16).

Because the tongue is the instrument of speech, many passages use the word metaphorically (or metonymically) to praise or criticize the kinds of speech in which humans engage. The speech that comes from the tongue can be either good or evil (Ps. 120:2; Prov. 6:17; 10:20; James 3:7-12). Proverbs addresses these matters in picturesque language. "The tongue of the righteous is pure silver" (10:20 HCSB). "The tongue of the wise [brings] healing, ... but a lying tongue [is for] only a moment" (12:18-19). "The tongue that heals is a tree of life" (15:4). "A ruler can be persuaded through patience, and a gentle tongue can break a bone" (25:15). Finally, for the "capable wife," "loving instruction is on her tongue" (31:26).

The Garden Tomb is one site offered by tradition as the burial place of Jesus' body.

The tongue can be a window into the human heart. It pronounces the thoughts and intents contained in the heart, which could be good (Ps. 34:1) or evil (Pss. 34:13; 52:2; 109:2; 120:2-3; Isa. 59:3). The tongue is important in demonstrating one's true relationship to God. For the unbeliever the tongue is an instrument of deceit, showing man's true nature (Rom. 3:13). Jesus said that it is by men's words that they are justified or condemned (Matt. 12:37).

Controlling the tongue is one of the keys to a successful life (Prov.21:23; James 3:2; 1 Pet. 3:10). It is so potent that both death and life are in its power (Prov. 18:21). The tongue is sharp, even as sharp as a sword (Ps. 64:3) or an arrow (Jer. 9:3,8).

Genesis 11 refers to the confusion of "tongues" that resulted from God's judgment on human pride at the building of the tower. That judgment brought about a division in human life exemplified in the diversity of languages. That diversity was symbolically broken down at Pentecost (Acts 2:4-12), though that diversity of tongues will not be realized finally until the fulfillment of the kingdom expectations (Rev. 5:9). In addition, though not all persons will ultimately be saved, it is the case that one day every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord (Phil. 2:11). See Spiritual Gifts; Tongues, Gift of.

TONGUES, GIFT OF The NT deals with the practice of speaking in tongues both by example and instruction in Acts and the first letter to the Corinthians. There is also a brief mention of it in the long ending of Mark. There is no specific presentation of the practice in the OT, though some interpreters see the prophetic activities of Saul and the elders to be precursors (1 Sam. 10:9-13; 19:18-24) of “tongues” speech. There is no clear evidence in the text, though, that this prophesying involved speaking in tongues.

Three passages in Acts treat this phenomenon. In Acts 2 the disciples are baptized in the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and, as a witness to this event, they speak with other tongues (heterais glossais—Acts 2:4). These tongues are known languages, as is clear from the following verses, where the pilgrims from Cappadocia, Phrygia, Egypt, etc., heard them speaking of the wonders of God in their own languages (dialektot—Acts 2:8), or tongues (glossais—Acts 2:11). Here Luke uses the two words, dialektos (language) and glossa (tongue, language), interchangeably. In other NT literature the terms are likewise both used to mean “known language” (cp. Acts 1:19; 22:2; 26:14 for examples of dialektos and Rev. 7:9; 10:11; 11:9; 13:7; 14:6; 17:15 for examples of glossa), though the word glossa also refers to the tongue as a part of the anatomy (Acts 2:26; James 3:5; Rev. 16:10). Glossa is used as well in identifying the tongue with a person in the act of speech (metonymy): “Every tongue should confess” (Phil. 2:11 HCSB; Rom. 14:11, “will give praise”). Glossa carries the same range of meaning in other Greek literature.

Speaking in tongues in Acts 2 is evidentiary. The unique speech is demonstrable proof that something supernatural has happened to the 120 disciples of Jesus. Tongues are the sign that these people have received the promise given by Jesus in Acts 1:5, “You will be baptized with the Holy Spirit not many days from now.” This sign was clear enough so that all of those present for the Feast of Weeks were able to see that an impossible event was actually happening. The language speech in this chapter has a second, though subordinate, purpose—the communication of the gospel to people of a foreign tongue. It is likely that the pilgrims present could speak Greek, but the text does indicate that the communication of the gospel in their languages was still important.

In Acts 10 Peter was sent by God to preach to Cornelius, a centurion of the Roman guard, with his family and associates. While Simon was preaching, the Spirit fell upon the assembly (v. 44), and the Gentiles spoke with tongues, demonstrating to the Jews there that these persons had “received the Holy Spirit just as we [the Jews] have” (v. 47 HCSB). Immediately Peter returned to Jerusalem to report to the believers there on the outpouring of salvation to the Gentiles. When the Jerusalem Christians heard about the gift of the Spirit, evidenced by tongues, they responded, “So God has granted repentance resulting in life to even the Gentiles” (11:18). In chapter 19 Paul encountered a group of 12 disciples of John the Baptist. He showed them that John had taught the people “that they should believe in the One who would come after him, that is, in Jesus” (19:4 HCSB). When they believed in Christ, the Spirit came upon them, and “they began to speak with [other] languages and to prophesy” (v. 6). This was significant since John still had many disciples in the world of that day, and since John himself had first predicted the coming Spirit baptism that would be given by Jesus (Matt. 3:11).

The book of Acts features these three texts as occasions of what scholars call “glossolalia.” It is possible that the evangelization of the Samaritans in Acts 8 also featured “tongues” speech, since Simon Magus witnessed an unusual phenomenon when the Spirit was given (8:17-18), though the text makes no specific mention of tongues. In each case the experience is linked to the reception of the Spirit. However, it is important to note that each case represents the movement of the gospel to include a new group: Jews, Samaritans (possibly), Gentiles, disciples of John. There are no other examples of glossolalia in Acts.

The other extended treatment of this gift is found in the first letter to the Corinthians. There Paul lists it as a spiritual gift (1 Cor. 12:7-10), gives instructions about its nature, suggests qualifications for its use, and contrasts it with prophecy (14:1-40). He who speaks in tongues speaks mysteries (mysteria—14:2). This word is used by Paul, John, and Jesus to refer to the giving of new revelations to the new covenant community (Matt. 13:11; Rom. 11:25; 16:25; 1 Cor. 2:1,7; 4:1; 15:51; Eph. 1:9; 3:3-4,9; 6:19-20; Col. 1:25-27; 2:2; 4:3; 1 Tim. 3:9,16; Rev. 10:7; 17:5-7). Among other things, then, tongues constituted one of the ways in which God revealed the content of the NT revelation to the early church. The apostle also noted that unless tongues speech is interpreted, it ought not to be employed in public worship, since the purpose of spiritual gifts is the edification of the body (1 Cor. 14:3-6). But interpreted tongues speech might have the same function as prophecy. Further, tongues speech, like all public expressions in worship, needs to be done in an orderly manner (14:26-33). Some interpreters have postulated that the tongues speech at Corinth differed from that in Acts in that it was not languages, but “ecstatic speech.” This cannot be proven from the linguistic evidence, since both Luke and Paul use the word glossa predominately. Nor can it be proven contextually, as there is no evidence in the text that this was a different kind of speech than that in Acts. One would not be likely to come to such a conclusion simply from looking at the text of Corinthians. This interpretation likely arises out of experience in communities that practice glossolalia, since they rarely attest to actual languages being spoken.

Several key questions have been voiced concerning this practice. One, is this a gift only for NT times or is it also for the church all through history? As noted above, tongues in the NT has three functions—to show the progress of the gift of the Spirit to the various people groups in the book of Acts in a salvation-history context, as a way of revealing the content of the NT revelation, and as a means of communicating crosslinguistically. The first two purposes would no longer be applicable, since the gospel has now gone out to the entire world and the NT revelation has been given. The third possibility will be addressed shortly. Two, is tongues speech the sign of Spirit baptism? It was in Acts, but only among the people groups that constituted the process of salvation history: Jews, Samaritans, Gentiles, and finally the disciples of John, who first predicted the gift of the Spirit. Spirit baptism occurs at conversion, and its evidence is the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22-23), not tongues. Three, ought all persons to speak in tongues? Paul answers this clearly in the negative (1 Cor. 12:30). Four, is modern tongues supposed to be languages or ecstatic utterance? This article has argued that there is no compelling reason to believe that “ecstatic utterance” is the same thing as the biblical gift of tongues. Five, is there such a thing as a private prayer language? People certainly do pray in tongues, but nothing in the text authorizes a private prayer language. Though Paul mentions praying with reference to tongues in 1 Cor. 14:2,14-15, the entire context is one of public worship, not private prayer. Such tongues speech comes under the guidance of the entire chapter in the governing of public tongues. Six, might tongues speech be demonic? It might. The enemy can counterfeit God's good gifts. But even in cases where someone's “tongues” does not match the biblical criteria, the experience might not be demonic; it is possible for persons to tap into a basic ability that all have to engage in such linguistic-free discourse. It would not be the same thing as the biblical gift of tongues and would not be miraculous, but it might still be done reverently. Seven, is it possible for one to receive a gift of languages for the purpose of evangelism? No one would wish to limit God's ability to grant such a gift. There are even stories of such events from the mission field, though undoubtedly some of them have been embellished. It is also the case that all Pentecostal groups that send missionaries send them for language training first. TOOLS Implements or instruments used with the hands for agricultural, construction, commercial, or craft purposes. In the earliest periods tools were made of stone, especially flint. An effective cutting surface was achieved by chipping off flakes along the edge of the shaped stone. The first metal tools were of copper, which proved to be too soft for most applications. It was soon found that much harder tools could be made from bronze, an alloy of copper and tin. Bronze, like copper, could be melted and poured into molds before final shaping by a smith. The hardest tools were made of iron (Deut. 27:5; 1 Kings 6:5-7), which required much higher temperatures to smelt. Iron only came into use in Canaan around 1200 B.C., about the time of the Israelite settlement. Handles and other parts of certain tools were made of wood, leather, bone, or ivory. See Minerals and Metals.

Knives One of the most common of tools is the knife. The flint knives of earlier periods continued in use even after metal became widespread. It has been suggested that the command to use flint knives for circumcision (Josh. 5:2 NIV) reflects a taboo on using new technology for ancient rites. The real reason, however, is probably more practical: flint knives kept a sharp edge longer than metal blades. Nevertheless, bronze knives became the standard for general use prior to the Israelite monarchy. The blade was cast in a stone mold, and handles of wood were usually attached by a tang or rivets. Iron knives, which became popular during the Israelite monarchy, were made in a similar fashion.

The knife served various purposes and was known in different forms. The average knife in Palestine was between 6 and 10 inches, but a mold has been found to produce 16-inch blades. These would have been used for general cutting and butchering (Gen. 22:6; Judg. 19:29). A smaller version used by Jehoiakim to cut up Jeremiah's scroll (Jer. 36:23; KJV, NRSV, "penknife"; NIV, "scribe's knife") is represented by a Hebrew word elsewhere used for razors (Num. 6:5; Ezek. 5:1). The latter (Judg. 13:5; 16:17; 1 Sam. 1:11) were evidently quite sharp, as they are used as symbols of God's judgment (Isa. 7:20) and the cutting power of the tongue (Ps. 52:2).

A winnowing fork was a tool to aid the farmer in separating chaff from the grains of wheat.

Agricultural Tools Plows had basically the same design from the earliest models known down to those used in the present day in the Near East. The handles, crossbar, and other structural parts were of wood, while the plow point, or plowshare, needed to be of harder material to penetrate the ground. The earliest plowshares were of bronze, which was only slowly replaced by iron following the Israelite settlement of Canaan. Early Iron Age levels at several archaeological sites in Palestine have produced examples of both types. Plowshares were elongated blades with a pointed end for cutting into the ground and the other end rolled like a pipe to fit on the wooden shaft. Plows were pulled by animals which were prodded with a goad, a wooden stick fitted with a metal tip (Judg. 3:31; 1 Sam. 13:21; Eccles. 12:11). On hilly or rocky terrain which was difficult to plow, the ground was broken using a hoe (Isa. 7:25 NRSV, NIV; KJV, “mattock”). A similar tool, the mattock (1 Sam. 13:21), was also used for digging chores. It is probably incorrectly translated as “plowshares” in the famous prophetic passages about the tools of war and peace (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3; Joel 3:10). Just prior to the monarchy, the Philistines, perhaps holding a monopoly on iron technology, forced the Israelites to come to them for sharpening of agricultural tools. The charge in silver was a pim, two-thirds of a shekel, for sharpening plowshares and mattocks and one-third of a shekel for smaller tools (1 Sam. 13:19-22). See Weights and Measures.

The reaping of standing grain was done with a sickle (Deut. 16:9; 23:25; Jer. 50:16), a small tool with a handle and curved blade. Sickles consisting of several serrated flint segments fitted into a shaft of bone or hollowed-out wood were typical of the Canaanite culture. In Israelite and NT times sickles had metal blades and short wooden handles. The sickle is used as a symbol of God's judgment (Joel 3:13) and the ingathering of the saints (Mark 4:29; Rev. 14:14-19). A tool, which resembled the sickle but with a broader and shorter blade, was the "pruning hook" (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3; Joel 3:10). It was a type of knife used for pruning and harvesting grapevines (Isa. 18:5).

Building Tools The OT mentions several different types of axes used in various hewing chores. The largest ax (Isa. 10:15) was used for felling trees (Deut. 19:5; 20:19) and quarrying stone (1 Kings 6:7). This type of ax was mentioned as a stone cutting tool in the Siloam Tunnel inscription in Jerusalem. A smaller ax was used for lighter jobs (Judg. 9:48; 1 Sam. 13:20-21; Ps. 74:5; Jer. 46:22). The Hebrew word used for ax head literally means "iron," indicating its material (Deut. 19:5; 2 Kings 6:5; Isa. 10:34). Trimming was done with a different tool (Jer. 10:3 REB; NIV, "chisel"), perhaps an adze with its cutting edge perpendicular to the handle. Small hand axes or hatchets were also known (Ps. 74:6 KJV; NRSV, "hammers"; REB, "pick"). A single word is used for axes in the NT (Matt. 3:10; Luke 3:9). See Siloam.

Wood and stone were also cut using saws (2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Kings 7:9; 1 Chron. 20:3; Isa. 10:15). Single and double-handled varieties are pictured in Egyptian tomb paintings. Bronze was used for the blades in the earlier periods and iron in the later. According to an apocryphal work (the Ascension of Isaiah), the Prophet Isaiah was martyred by being sawn in two (cp. Heb. 11:37).

Detail work was marked out using a “line” and “compass” (Isa. 44:13; NIV, “chisels” and “compasses”). Various types of measuring tools, lines, and chisels have been found in Egyptian tombs. Plumb lines were used quite early in Egypt and Palestine for determining verticality and levels in construction. The true levels determined by the measuring line and the plumb line are compared to the justice and righteousness God required of Israel and Judah (2 Kings 21:13; KJV, “plummet”; Isa. 28:17; Amos 7:7-8).

Hammers (Isa. 44:12; Jer. 10:4) were originally stone pounders, but in the Bronze Age holes were often bored for the insertion of a handle. Egyptian paintings show the use of broad wooden mallets not unlike those still used today in sculpture work. The “planes” used in shaping (Isa. 44:13) were probably chisels (as in the NIV). Chisels were used for rough and detail work in both wood and stone. Holes were made with awls (Exod. 21:6; Deut. 15:17) or drills.

Industrial Tools Special tools were used in the work of various industries. Early potters used wooden tools to help shape their handmade vessels. A considerable advance came with the invention of the pottery wheel (Jer. 18:3). See Pottery.

Weavers conducted their craft on devices called looms. A number of tools were used to assist in the weaving process. In some types of weaving, the horizontal weft threads were “beaten” in with a flat wooden stick. The weaving of patterns required picks and combs to manipulate and press up the threads. These were usually made of bone, less often of ivory or wood. See Spinning and Weaving.

Metalworking required unique tools as well. A bellows was needed to bring a fire to the high temperatures required for smelting ore. Hand operated bellows are shown in an Egyptian tomb painting of Semitic nomads from about the time of Abraham. These were used in small furnaces equipped with nozzles of clay to withstand the extreme heat. Molds were used to shape molten metal into tools, weapons, and other items. Metal smiths also used a variety of tongs, clamps, and hammers (Isa. 44:12), and the like.

TOPHEL (Tō' phēl) Place near the site of Moses' farewell speech to Israel (Deut. 1:1), identified with et-Tafileh about 15 miles southeast of the Dead Sea between Kerak and Petra. It may represent the name of a territory rather than a city.

TOPHET (Tō' phēt) or TOPHETH (Tō' pheth)

Name for a place in the Hinnom Valley outside Jerusalem derived from Aramaic or Hebrew meaning “fireplace” but altered by Hebrew scribes to mean “shameful thing” because of the illicit worship carried on there (Jer. 7:31-32; KJV, “Tophet”). Child sacrifice was practiced at Topheth, leading the prophet to declare a slaughter of people there when God would come in vengeance (Jer. 19:6-11). See Hinnom, Valley of.

TORAH (Tō' rah) Hebrew word normally translated “law,” which eventually became a title for the Pentateuch, the first five books of the OT.

Old Testament Though universally translated “law” in the KJV, torah also carries the sense of “teaching” or “instruction,” as reflected in more recent translations (Job 22:22; Ps. 78:1; Prov. 1:8; 4:2; 13:14; Isa. 30:9). The meaning, law, is certainly present in the OT. Torah, for example, is used in connection with terms for requirements, commands, and decrees (Gen. 26:5; Exod. 18:16). The Torah was given to Moses (Exod. 24:12) and commanded to be kept (Exod. 16:28; Deut. 17:19; Ezek. 44:24).

Within the book of Deuteronomy, Torah is used to represent the body of the Deuteronomic Code (Deut. 4:8; 30:10; 32:46), that is, the essence of Israel's responsibilities under the covenant. Subsequent OT writings continue to speak of Torah as “The Law” in this sense (Isa. 5:24; Jer. 32:23; 44:10; Dan. 9:11), often as “the book of the law,” the “law of Moses,” or a combination (Josh. 1:8; 8:31-32,34; 2 Kings 14:6). The “book of the law” found in the temple which fueled Josiah's reforms (2 Kings 22:8-13) is often regarded to be roughly equivalent to the book of Deuteronomy. By the time of Ezra and Nehemiah “the book of the law of Moses” (Neh. 8:1) included more material than the Deuteronomic Code. Ezra cited “the law of Moses that the LORD had commanded Israel” (HCSB) concerning the feast of booths, which is prescribed in Leviticus (23:33-43). Eventually the name Torah came to be applied to the entire Pentateuch, the five books traditionally ascribed to Moses: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. In rabbinical Judaism the scope of the Torah is sometimes expanded to include all of the Scriptures or even the entirety of God's revelation.

New Testament During NT times the limits on the OT canon were being finalized. The Jews began to think of their Scriptures as consisting of three sections: the Torah (Law), the Prophets, and the Writings (cp. Luke 24:44). The books of Moses were considered “law” despite the fact that a considerable amount of their material is not legalistic in nature. The Torah was unquestionably considered the most important division of the Scriptures. The Sadducees, in fact, accepted only the Torah as inspired Scripture. The same is true of the Samaritans who considered themselves God's true chosen people.

In the NT period the Torah was more than merely a section of the Scriptures; it became central to Judaism. The will of God was seen as embodied in the observance of the law. Pious Jews, therefore, needed some elaboration on the commands contained in the Torah to determine more precisely their obligation, and the interpretation of various passages became the subject of much debate. The traditions of the Pharisees went far beyond the bounds of the law as spelled out in the Torah. These traditions became for them the oral Torah, considered given to Moses at Mount Sinai to accompany the written law. Jesus scathingly denounced the Pharisees' placing their tradition above the intent of the law (Mark 7:8-13). Jesus never denied the authority of the Torah but denounced the elevation of ritual concerns above “more important matters of the law—justice, mercy and faith” (Matt. 23:23 HCSB). Some of the precepts of the law, according to Jesus, were provided because of humanity's nature and fall short of God's perfect will (Matt. 5:33-37; 19:8-9). For true believers Jesus demanded a commitment that went far beyond the supposed righteousness gained by keeping the law (Luke 18:18-23).

Jewish rabbis conversing in front of an elaborately decorated scroll of the Torah.

The Apostle Paul preached justification by faith rather than by the keeping of the law. Thus, he had much to say about Torah. Torah, according to Paul, would lead to life if it were actually practiced (Rom. 10:5), but such practice is impossible (Rom. 3:20). The effect of the law has been to manifest a knowledge of sin and bring about its increase (Rom. 3:20; 5:20; 7:5,7-11; 1 Cor. 15:56). Mankind was thus consigned to sin and God's resulting wrath (Rom. 4:14; Gal. 3:22), which set the stage for the revelation of God's grace through Christ (Rom. 3:21-26; Gal. 3:22-25). For Paul the Torah epitomized the old covenant, with the law written on stone (2 Cor. 3:7). In the superior new covenant, the law is in the Spirit (2 Cor. 3:6), written on the hearts of believers (cp. Jer. 31:33). Believers are not subject to the Torah (Gal. 5:18), but by walking "according to the Spirit" (Rom. 8:4 HCSB; Gal. 5:16) they produce fruits which transcend (Gal. 5:22-25) and fulfill the essence of the law (Rom. 13:8-10; Gal. 5:14; cp. Matt. 22:37-40). See Law, Ten Commandments, Torah; Pentateuch.

TORCH Long pole with cloths dipped in oil wrapped around one end used as a light. The Greek lampas is generally rendered "torch" (John 18:3; Rev. 4:5; 8:10), unless the context suggests the translation "lamp" (Acts 20:8). The lamps of the wise and foolish virgins (Matt. 25:1-8) were perhaps torches.

TOSEPHTA Hebrew term tosaphah and its Aramaic parallel tosephta denote a collection of additional rabbinic opinion arranged in the order of the Mishnah of Judah ha-Nasi. It may be regarded as a collected appendix to the Mishnah. In its current form the Tosephta was probably edited about the end of the fourth century A.D. It was compiled in Palestine at about the same time as the Jerusalem Talmud. The intent of the editor seems to have been to "update" or further supplement the Mishnah with reference to new case law developed over the two centuries that separated the two works. Its existence shows the development in the legal system of the rabbis of Palestine as they sought to adapt the law orally to new and changing social and religious conditions. TRADITION Teaching or ritual which is handed down. The term “tradition” has several usages. The term is often used to speak of denominations or distinct theological viewpoints, such as the Baptist tradition or the Reformed tradition. The term is also commonly used to refer to liturgical consistency or to historical practice, as in a tradition of the church. Tradition also is used to speak of legend material, such as the tradition of Peter asking to be crucified upside-down. From a technical standpoint, the term is used to describe two distinct groups of theological material: Biblical material prior to its being written down as Scripture and writings which are not part of the Bible but are still esteemed by the church.

Scriptural Tradition Scholars use the word “tradition” to describe the existence of biblical material before it reached its biblical form. It is necessary to talk of tradition given the gap in time between the occurrence of biblical events and the biblical recording of those events. The term “tradition” describes the knowledge of the event during the time between the event and its recording in Scripture. Certain parts of the Bible, such as Revelation, did not have an existence prior to their writing, yet much of the biblical material did exist in some form. For example, when Paul ministered to the churches in Asia, he taught numerous things about Jesus, living a Christian life, and the ministry of the church. Many of these same teachings were reiterated in his epistles. Thus elements of Paul's teaching existed before he physically wrote his teaching down in the epistles, even though those elements were not written down anywhere.

Traditional material may have taken a number of forms. Tradition may have been in a written form. Luke implies that he used written sources to help him write his Gospel (Luke 1:1-4). The writer of the book of 1 Kings also mentions that he has utilized written documents when writing his work (1 Kings 14:19; 15:7; 16:5; 22:39). In addition, tradition may have been orally transmitted. In ancient cultures accounts were often ritualistically repeated around a campfire or as part of a religious service. Thus everyone in the community became a repository of the tradition. Whatever form it took, the existence of tradition is true of both OT and NT material.

The OT describes events that occurred over a period of thousands of years. Thus when Moses wrote the book of Genesis, he was writing about some events that had occurred some 2,500 years before he was born. Yet, Moses was able to write Genesis under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, in part, because the teaching of how God had created the world, how He had saved Noah, and how He had made a covenant with Abraham had been passed down to Moses as tradition. Deuteronomy 6 clearly teaches that subsequent generations must be told of God's works. Thus the Bible itself contains a command to continue to pass on the tradition. In addition, most of the prophetic material was originally delivered as sermons. The prophets would quite literally preach to the people. These sermons existed as tradition until they were finally written down. In fact, the Bible describes Jeremiah's effort to hire Baruch to help him record his sermons (Jer. 36). Thus the OT was the product of tradition, preserving the memory of God's deeds in the consciousness of man.

This same process was at work in the formation of the NT. The Gospels, which describe the life and work of Jesus Christ, were not written immediately after His resurrection but were written some years later. Yet that does not mean that the church did not know what Jesus had done and what He had taught. Jesus' deeds and teachings were orally transmitted to new converts. Acts 2:42 records that the church “devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching” (HCSB). Elements of this teaching undoubtedly included information about Jesus' acts and teachings given to the disciples. Peter himself, when confronted by the Jewish religious leaders, proclaimed, “We are unable to stop speaking about what we have seen and heard” (Acts 4:20). This oral testimony of Christ was tradition. Paul alluded to this process in 1 Cor. 15:3 when he said, “For I passed on to you as most important what I also received” (cp. 1 Cor. 11:2). In fact, the pluralistic form of tradition is shown in 2 Thess. 2:15 where Paul stated, “Therefore, brothers, stand firm and hold to the traditions you were taught, either by our message or by our letter.” Paul recognized the existence of tradition and understood that it may have been contained in several different forms.

Biblical scholars have dealt with tradition in different ways at different times. In the past OT scholars worked to separate the biblical texts into the traditions that lay behind the text. The most famous of these types of works was the Documentary Hypothesis, popularized by Julius Wellhausen, which separated the Pentateuch into four distinct traditions (Yahwist, Elohist, Priestly, and Deuteronomistic). The end result tended to be the fragmentation of both the text and its message. Modern OT scholarship has tended to preserve the literary integrity of the biblical text while recognizing the existence of tradition behind the text.

New Testament scholars have also been interested in identifying the traditions that lay behind the text. This is especially true of the Gospel materials. The similarities and differences between the Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke) have birthed an effort to discover the traditions which are the foundation to all three. Indeed, NT scholarship has spent over 200 years trying to explain the relationship of the Synoptic Gospels and their use of tradition. In recent NT studies in America, a non-evangelical group has begun to try and actually reconstruct the traditions that lay behind the Gospels. This group, selfentitled the Jesus Seminar, has gone so far as to edit Jesus' teaching and remove those elements which they believe to be additions to the original traditions. However, evangelical scholars have rejected the group's methodology, presuppositions, and findings.

Extrabiblical Tradition This refers to writings that are not included in the NT canon but are esteemed by the church. There are two primary factors that contributed to the continued usage of tradition in the church. The first factor relates to early church practice using non-canonical materials. Initially, before the canon was constructed, churches used both documents that were later accepted as part of the NT and material not accepted later into the NT. The formation of the canon was a gradual process that occurred over a long period of decades, during which non-canonical documents continued to be used. Even after the formation of the canon, the church continued to use some of these documents, which they recognized as tradition, meaning something other than canonical literature.

The second factor relates to the church's response to heretical groups. Various heretical groups, which arose within the church often, reinterpreted Scripture to support their particular viewpoint. Rather than address the hermeneutical methodologies of the heretics, the church argued that the new heretical interpretations were not what the church had always believed. In other words, these new ideas were not in keeping with church tradition, as expressed in these non-canonical writings. Thus the church began to elevate the traditional material, which supported their biblical interpretations and stood as a witness against the heretics. This practice eventually evolved into what the church called the rule of faith. The rule of faith is what the church has always believed as expressed in the various tradition materials.

Tradition, whether it be canonical antecedents or non-canonical writings, can be very useful to the modern student. Tradition shows the development and evolution of theology and church structure. It is also extremely helpful in explaining the development of the Roman Catholic Church. See Bible Formation and Canon; Inspiration of Scripture.

TRAIN Used to refer to the part of a robe that trails behind the wearer (Isa. 6:1 KJV, NASB, NIV). See Caravan; Retinue.

TRANCE Translation of the Greek term that literally means a change of place. The term came to mean a mental state of a person who experienced an intense emotional reaction to stimuli that were perceived as originating outside the person, the results of which were visual or auditory sensations or other impressions of the senses.

Trance is descriptive of an experience in which a person received a revelation by supernatural means (Acts 10:10; 11:5; 22:17; HCSB, “visionary state”). In these instances, the author of Acts, in reference to the experiences of Peter and Paul, seemed to be interested in showing that the trance was only a vehicle for a revelation from God. Luke illustrated that the trances that Peter and Paul experienced “happened” to them and were not self-induced. The distinctions between “trance,” “dream,” and “vision” are not always clear. See Ecstasy; Prophets.

TRANSFIGURATION Transformation of Jesus in His appearance with Moses and Elijah before Peter, James, and John (Matt. 17:1-13; Mark 9:1-13; Luke 9:28-36; cp. 2 Pet. 1:16-18). This event took place shortly after the confession at Caesarea Philippi, the first passion prediction, and a discourse on the cost of discipleship. Jesus took Peter, James, and John to a mountain where the event took place. Jesus' personal appearance and that of His garments were changed. Moses and Elijah appeared and talked with Jesus. Peter said it was good to be there, and they should build three booths. A cloud came over them, and God spoke from the cloud identifying Jesus as His Son (cp. the voice at the baptism) and commanding the disciples to hear Him. When the cloud lifted, Jesus was alone with the disciples, who were afraid. Jesus told the disciples to tell no one.

Aside from minor differences in wording, Mark alone states that Jesus' garments became so white that “no launderer could whiten them” (HCSB) and that Peter did not know what to say. Also Mark alone has no reference to a change in Jesus' face. Matthew alone indicates that God expressed His pleasure with Jesus, that the disciples fell on their faces, and that Jesus touched them to get them up. Instead of the “six days” of Matthew and Mark, Luke has “about eight days.” He alone indicated that Jesus and the disciples were praying, that Moses and Elijah conversed with Jesus about His coming death, that the disciples were sleepy, and that they saw Jesus' glory. Luke alone has “Chosen One” rather than “beloved Son.” In Matthew, Jesus is addressed as Lord, in Mark as Rabbi, and in Luke as Master.

The Nature of the Event It has often been claimed that the story is a misplaced resurrection appearance; but it is Moses and Elijah, not Jesus, who appear, and there is no reference to them or a voice from heaven in any other resurrection account. Others have claimed that the transfiguration was not an objective but a visionary experience. This is possible, but there is no more of the miraculous in three different disciples actually having similar visions than in a historical event, which is certainly what the writers described.

The Place The traditional site is Mount Tabor in lower Galilee, but it is not a high mountain (only 1,850 feet) and was probably fortified and inaccessible in Jesus' day. Much more likely is Mount Hermon (9,100 feet) to the north of Caesarea Philippi. See Hermon, Mount.

Meaning A mountain in the Bible is often a place of revelation. Moses and Elijah represented the law and the prophets respectively, which testify to but must give way to Jesus. (The latter is the reason why Peter's suggestion was improper.) Moses and Elijah themselves were heralds of the Messiah (Deut. 18:15; Mal. 4:5-6). The three booths suggest the Feast of Tabernacles which symbolizes a new situation, a new age. Clouds represent divine presence. The close connection of the transfiguration with the confession and passion prediction is significant. The Messiah must suffer, but glorification and enthronement, not suffering, are His ultimate fate. These involve resurrection, ascension, and return in glory. The disciples needed the reassurance of the transfiguration as they contemplated Jesus' death and their future sufferings. See Jesus, Life and Ministry. James Brooks.

TRANSJORDAN Area immediately east of the Jordan River settled by Reuben, Gad, half of Manasseh, Edom, Moab, and Amon. The most prominent topographical feature of Palestine is the Jordan River Valley, referred to in the OT as the "Arabah" and called today, in Arabic, the Ghor. This valley represents a huge geographical fault line which is prominent also in Lebanon, where it creates the Beqa'a Valley, continues southward from Palestine to form the Red Sea, and extends even as far as Mozambique in east Africa. Center stage of the biblical narrative is the hill country west of the Jordan where most of the Israelite tribes were settled and where the famous cities of Samaria, Shechem, Jerusalem, and Hebron were sited. See Jordan River; Palestine.

The highlands east of the Jordan also played a significant role, especially during OT times. Transjordan included the River Jabbok, scene of the account of Jacob's wrestling on his return from Aram (Gen. 32:22-32); the Plains of Moab, where the Israelites are said to have camped following their exodus from Egypt and where Balaam prophesied; and Mount Nebo from which Moses viewed the promised land (Num. 22:1-24:25; Deut. 34). Three Transjordanian kingdoms (Ammon, Moab, and Edom) were contemporary with the two Hebrew kingdoms (Israel and Judah), sometimes as allies, sometimes as enemies (1 Sam. 11; 14:47; 2 Sam. 8:12; 10; 2 Kings 3; Amos 1:11-2:3). The Prophet Elijah was from Tishbe, a town in the Transjordanian territory of Gilead (1 Kings 17:1). Other Israelite prophets and poets often referred to the territories and peoples of the Transjordan. See, for example, the allusions in Amos 4:1 and Ps. 22:12 to the cows and bulls of Bashan.

The vast Arabian Desert stretches southeastward from the geological fault line described above. The Transjordan, which figures in the biblical narratives, is not the whole desert expanse but rather the north-south strip of highlands sandwiched between the Jordan Valley and the desert. This strip of highlands receives abundant rainfall from the Mediterranean winds during the winter months, which allows farming and cattle grazing. The rainfall fades rapidly as one moves eastward, however, so that the generally rugged and cultivable land gives way to rocky desert approximately 30 to 35 miles east of the Jordan.

Four major rivers, along with numerous smaller and intermittently active streambeds, drain the Transjordanian highlands into the Jordan Valley. (1) The Yarmuk River, not mentioned in the Bible, drains the area known in OT times as Bashan. Bashan, good cattle country as indicated above, was situated roughly east of the Sea of Galilee. Main biblical cities in the Bashan region were Ashtaroth and Karnaim (Josh. 9:10; 12:4; Amos 6:13). (2) Nahr ex-Zerqa, the Jabbok River of OT times, drains the area known then as Gilead. Gilead, situated east of that portion of the Jordan which connects the Sea of Galilee with the Dead Sea, produces grapes, olives, vegetables, cereals, and also is mentioned in the Bible as a source of balm (Gen. 37:25; Jer. 8:22). Among Gileadite cities which appear in the biblical narratives were Mizpah, Jabesh, and Ramoth (Judg. 10:17; 1 Sam. 11:1; 31:12; 1 Kings 22:3, 2 Kings 8:28). (3) Wadi el-Mujib, the Arnon River of ancient times, bisected the ancient land of Moab and enters the Dead Sea approximately midway along its eastern shore. (4) Wadi Hesa—probably the ancient Zered but not absolutely certain—would have separated Moab from Edom and enters the Arabah at the southern end of the Dead Sea.

An important trade route passed through the Transjordan during biblical times, connecting Damascus and Bostra of Syria with the Gulf of Aqaba and western Arabia. Some scholars prefer to translate the term derek hamelek (Num. 20:17; 21:22) as a proper noun (“the King's Highway”) and identify it with this ancient route. Others interpret the term as a common, appellative noun (“royal road”) and doubt that it referred to a specific route, in the same sense that present-day terms such as “freeway” and “state road” refer to categories of roads rather than to specific highways. In either case, we know that the old trade route which traversed the Transjordan would have played an important role in the economy of ancient Palestine and was refurbished by the Romans who named it the Via Nova Traiana.

The Israelite tribes of Reuben and Gad along with certain Manassite clans settled in the Transjordan—primarily in Gilead, it seems, although with some spillover into Bashan and into the traditionally Moabite territory immediately north of the Arnon (Num. 32). Later, after the establishment of the Hebrew monarchy, several Israelite and Judean kings attempted, some more successfully than others, to rule this portion of the Transjordan with which Israelite tribes were associated. David, Omri, Ahab, and Jeroboam II were the more successful ones. Weaker kings, such as Rehoboam and Jehoash of Judah for example, had little or no influence in the Transjordan. Of course, one reads of occasional Moabite and Edomite military campaigns which threatened even Jerusalem (2 Chron. 20).

With the rise of Assyria, especially during and following the reign of Tiglath-pileser III (744-727 B.C.), the various regions of Syria-Palestine fell under Assyrian domination. The Transjordan was no different. Several of the kings of Ammon, Moab, and Edom are mentioned in Assyrian records—usually listed among those paying tribute or providing other forms of involuntary support to the Assyrian monarch. When the Assyrian Empire collapsed and was superseded by the Babylonian Empire, presumably the Babylonians also controlled the Transjordan.

By NT times a cluster of Greco-Roman-oriented cities with primarily Gentile populations (the so-called “Decapolis” cities) had emerged in the northern Transjordan (earlier Bashan, Gilead, and Ammon). The southern Transjordan (earlier Moab and Edom) was dominated, on the other hand, by the Nabateans, a people of Arab origin who established a commercial empire along the desert fringe with its capital at Petra. Eventually, the whole of the Transjordan was incorporated into the Roman Empire. Domitian annexed the northern Transjordan in A.D. 90, forming the administrative province of Arabia. Trajan added the Nabatean territory in A.D. 106 and renamed the province Arabia Petraea. TRANSPORTATION AND TRAVEL Means and ways of commercial and private movement among towns and nations in the biblical period. Travel in the ancient, as well as the modern world, is the result of economic, political, social, and religious factors. For the most part, transportation and travel in the biblical world was on foot (Judg. 16:3; Josh.

9:3-5; 1 Kings 18:46). At first this meant following the paths animals made through the hills and valleys of Palestine. However, as the economic and political demands of the region increased, so did the traffic. Bettermarked and smoother roads were needed for travelers and for the transport of larger amounts of goods from place to place. Large draft animals of various types also had to be domesticated and harnessed to this work (Exod. 23:5).

As trade began to expand beyond the local area, international highways and trade routes such as the coastal road, the Via Maris, and the Transjordanian king's highway were developed. Heavily traveled routes such as these were a factor in the founding of many cities. They also functioned as the principle link from which branched lesser roads connecting cities and towns in Palestine to the rest of the Near East (Prov. 8:2-3). These highways promoted the movement of businessmen, religious pilgrims, government officials, and armies between regions of the country and foreign nations. The resulting blend of cultures and economies created the society described in biblical and extra-biblical texts.

Geographical Factors in Travel Perhaps the greatest obstacle that travelers and road builders had to overcome was the rugged geographical character of Palestine. The desert regions of the Negev and Judean highlands in the south required the identification of wells and pasturage for the draft animals. The hilly spine of central Palestine forced the traveler to zigzag around steep ascents (such as that between Jericho and Jerusalem) or follow ridges along the hilltops (the Beth-horon route northwest of Jerusalem), or go along watersheds (Bethlehem to Mizpah). Numerous streams as well as the Jordan River had to be forded by travelers (2 Sam. 19:18), sometimes at the expense of baggage and animals.

Where valleys, such as the Jezreel, had to be traversed, roads generally followed the higher ground along the base of the hills so as to bypass marshy areas and stay away from the raging torrents that sometimes filled streambeds in the rainy season. Narrow, twisting valleys, as in the Judean desert, often provided perfect areas for ambushes by bandits. Along the coastal plain sandy dunes required a detour further inland into the foothills of the Shephelah plateau.

The rough coastline of Palestine lacked a good, deep-water port for shipping. As a result, an additional journey overland was required to transport agricultural and other trade goods to and from the ports of Ezion-geber (1 Kings 9:26-28) on the Red Sea and the Phoenician ports of Tyre and Sidon to the cities of Israel. Solomon kept a fleet of ships operating in the Red Sea to ply the African trade. Another group of Solomon's ocean-going vessels (Hb. "ships of Tarshish") joined forces with the fleets of Hiram of Tyre in the Mediterranean (1 Kings 10:22). Despite this activity, Israel's kings had a general lack of experience with the sea. This sometimes made them reluctant to rely on shipping. For instance, King Jehoshaphat of Judah rejected further attempts to obtain gold from Ophir after his first fleet of ships was sunk off Ezion-geber (1 Kings 22:48-49). See Ships, Sailors, and Navigation.

Despite these difficulties, the desire to travel and the commercial needs of nations motivated the identification of routes that were relatively safe from attack by bandits and allowed free transport of goods by pack animals and carts to every region in the land. The roads that carried this traffic varied in size from two land thoroughfares about ten feet wide to simple tracks through fields barely wide enough for a man and donkey to pass single file. The determining factor in each case was the usage each received. Roads carrying two- and four-wheeled carts and wagons pulled by oxen required more room and a smoother roadbed (Isa. 62:10) than a lane crossing a vineyard.

Kings of the ancient Near East (Shulgi of Ur III, Mesopotamia, and Mesha, king of Moab) often boasted in their official inscriptions of their road-building activities. These roadways, so important to the maintenance of political and economic control of the nation, were probably kept in shape by government-sponsored corvée workers (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 9:15) or by the army. Since bridges were unknown in the biblical period, fords were identified (Judg. 12:5-6 NASB, NRSV, NIV) for general use, and, in the Roman period, were smoothed by the placement of flat stones in the riverbed. Where no river crossing could be found, boats were lashed together to form temporary ferries or large transports.

Political and Military Factors in Transportation While terrain had a great deal to do with the building of roads, another important factor was the political situation in the region. In ancient Israel roads not only linked trading and religious centers, they also protected population centers and speeded the nation's armies to war. The vast network of roads in the difficult area of the Judean hill country speaks eloquently of the importance of Jerusalem, which was the hub of activities in that region. It functioned as the political center of the Davidic monarchy as well as the religious focus of the nation with many pilgrims making the ascent to Zion (Ps. 122:1). An even more elaborate system of highways was built by the Roman legions to help them dominate the country and forestall organized rebellion after the revolts of A.D. 69-70 and 135.

Throughout the monarchy, military campaigns required well-kept roadways to facilitate the movement of troops about the country. Protecting the valleys and highways that led to the capital at Jerusalem were a series of fortresses including Gezer, Beth-horon, Baalath, and Tamar (Tadmor) (1 Kings 9:17-19). Royal entourages also traveled these guarded roads in peacetime to conduct governmental business (1 Kings 12:1; 18:16).

To help with the constant flow of government travelers, way stations (every 10 to 15 miles in the Persian Empire) and administrative outposts were constructed. In a time before inns, these stations provided supplies to traveling officials and fresh mounts to couriers. The private traveler had to rely on the hospitality of towns or friends along the way (Judg. 19:10-15; 2 Kings 4:8).

The road systems and port facilities of the kings of Israel and Judah were expanded in times of prosperity and contested for in times of war (2 Kings 16:6). Megiddo, which commanded the western entrance into the Jezreel Valley, controlled the traffic along the Via Maris as it moved inland and then north to Damascus. Solomon demonstrated his awareness of its strategic importance for fortifying the site, along with Hazor and Gezer, to protect the borders of Israel (1 Kings 9:15). Foreign rulers also fought to hold the city (which was destroyed over a dozen times during its period of occupation), and King Josiah of Judah died here defending the pass against the army of Pharaoh Neco II in 609 B.C. (2 Kings 23:29).

Religious Factors in Travel One of the chief reasons given for travel in the biblical text was to visit a religious shrine and make sacrifices. Throughout much of Israel's history the people are described as making journeys to places like Shechem (Josh. 24), Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:3), Ophrah (Judg. 8:27), Dan (Judg. 18:30), and Bethel (1 Kings 12:26-33). Here they would make their devotions before a sacred image or the ark of the covenant. High places (bamot) were also popular sites for religious pilgrims. In the period before Jerusalem's ascendancy as the religious focal point of the nation, prophets like Samuel regularly visited these local shrines to officiate at sacrifices (1 Sam. 9:12). Local religious rites sometimes also included an ingathering of family from across the nation as well as part of the yearly celebration (1 Sam. 20:6).

Animals Used in Travel Most of what is known about the animals used to transport people and materials in the ancient world is based on textual evidence and art. The Bible mentions several different types of draft animals: donkeys, mules, camels, and oxen. Among these, donkeys appear to have been the most popular means of transport in the Near East. They are described in Old Assyrian texts (about 2100 B.C.) transporting copper ingots from Cappadocia in Turkey. The Beni-hasan tomb paintings from Egypt dating to 1900 B.C. graphically portray Semitic caravanners with their donkeys laden with baggage and trade goods.

A traveler along the Jericho road to Jerusalem riding one donkey while his other donkey leads the way.

In the biblical narrative the donkey was the chief means of private and commercial transport throughout the history of the nation of Israel. Jacob's sons carried their grain purchases from Egypt to Canaan on donkey back (Gen. 42:26); Jesse sent David and a donkey loaded with provisions to Saul's court (1 Sam. 16:20); and Nehemiah became incensed when he saw Judeans transporting grain on donkeys during the Sabbath (Neh. 13:15).

Mules are less commonly mentioned. This may be due to a shortage of horses for breeding or to a custom restricting the use of mules to the upper classes (2 Sam. 13:29). For instance, David's sons Absalom (2 Sam. 18:9) and Solomon (1 Kings 1:33) are described as riding mules. One passage (Isa. 66:20) pictures the caravan of returning exiles riding on horses, mules, and dromedaries, as well as in chariots and litters. Each of these means of transport, however, fits the prophet's vision of a glorious procession on its way to Jerusalem rather than the normal groupings of travelers along the international route.

Camels appear several times in the text carrying huge loads (five times that of a donkey). One clear example of this is found in 2 Kings

8:9. Ben-hadad, the king of Syria, sent 40 camels loaded with goods to Elisha in an attempt to learn if he would recover from an illness. In another case Isaiah denounced the leaders of Judah for sending camel loads of gifts to Egypt to buy their aid against Assyria (30:6). Because of its broad but tender hoofs, best fit for desert travel, the camel was of little use in the hill country. These beasts were probably used only on the major routes such as the Via Maris, along the coast, or on the smoother valley roads of the Shephelah and the Negev.

Oxen are exclusively associated with travel by wheeled vehicle and will be discussed below in that context. Israelite use of horses does not appear in the text before 1000 B.C. when David began to incorporate them into his forces (2 Sam. 8:3-4). They are mentioned primarily in military contexts: ridden into battle (Job 39:18-25) and harnessed to chariots (1 Kings 12:18). Official messengers also rode horses (2 Kings 9:18-19), as did scouts for the army (2 Kings 7:13-15).

Wheeled Vehicles The most commonly mentioned wheeled vehicle in the biblical narrative is the chariot. It was used first by Israel's enemies during the conquest period (Judg. 1:19; 4:3). However, it could not be used effectively in the rough hill country where the tribes first settled (Josh. 17:16). Once the monarchy was established, chariots became an integral part of the kings' battle strategy (1 Kings 10:26; 22:31-34). They were also used as a standard means of travel by kings (2 Kings 9:16) and nobles (2 Kings 5:9). Private ownership of chariots is found in Isa. 22:18. In this passage the prophet condemns Shebna, the king's household steward, for his extravagance and pride. His chariots, like his rock-cut tomb, were status symbols for highranking members of the royal bureaucracy in Hezekiah's time (cp. Acts 8:26-38).

No physical remains of chariots have been found in Palestine, although a magnificent example of a royal Egyptian chariot was discovered in the tomb of Pharaoh Tutankhamen (about 1300 B.C.). A three-man Judean battle chariot is depicted in the Assyrian relief (about 701 B.C.) of Sennacherib's siege of Lachish. It was fitted with a yoke for four horses. Estimates of the chariot's size in this period are based on the width of ruts in the roadways in Mesopotamian and Roman cities. If these are used, the standard width of chariots was 1.23 meters between the wheels and 1.53 meters overall.

The use of large-wheeled vehicles apparently originated in Sumer where models, dating to 2500 B.C., of large covered wagons drawn by oxen have been found. These bulky vehicles, carrying heavy loads, required well-kept, broad roadways. Neglected paths could become overgrown (Prov. 15:19) or filled with stones from eroded hillsides. Thus, for traffic to be maintained, teams of workmen must have traveled the roads making necessary repairs. Gateways also had to be widened to permit the entrance of wheeled vehicles. Those excavated in Israel range in width from 2.5 to 4.5 meters. Some, like those at Gezer and Megiddo, had a cobblestone or crushed-stone roadbed within the heavily traveled gate complex.

Large two- and four-wheeled carts and wagons were also commonly used in biblical times for transporting heavy loads and people. In the patriarchal period Joseph sent carts to Canaan to carry his father and the households of his brothers to Goshen (Gen. 45:19-27). After the completion of the wilderness tabernacle, six covered wagons, each pulled by two oxen, were donated by the tribal leaders to the Levites to transport holy items along the line of march (Num. 7:1-8).

Once the people had settled into Canaan, carts became an everyday aid to farmers who had to transport sheaves of grain to the threshing floor

(Amos 2:13). A similar two-wheeled cart was used by David to carry the ark of the covenant from Kiriath-jearim (also called Baale of Judah) to his new capital in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:2-17). The somewhat clumsy nature of these carts can be seen in its almost overturning as it came to the threshing floor of Nacon. Several men walked beside the cart to guide the oxen and prevent the cargo from shifting.

The broader roads and heavy-wheeled vehicles of Palestine were also used, in the period of the Assyrian conquest, to transport the people into exile. Sennacherib's stone relief of his siege of Lachish includes a picture of Judeans being taken away in two-wheeled carts drawn by a team of oxen. The new exiles sit atop bundles containing their belongings while a man walks alongside the left-hand ox guiding it with a sharpened stick. Isaiah's vision of the return (66:20) must have struck a poignant note for the exiles who had seen their ancestors depicted in the Assyrian relief. See Economic Life.

TREASURE, TREASURY What one values, whether silver and gold or something intangible, and the storage place of what is valuable. In OT times treasure might be stored in the king's palace (2 Kings 20:13) or in the temple (1 Kings 7:51). In Jesus' day the term also applied to 13 trumpet-shaped offering receptacles in the temple court of the women where Jesus watched people make their offerings (Mark 12:41). "Treasure" and "treasury" are also used as illustrations or figures of speech. Israel was God's treasure (Exod. 19:5). This is reflected in the idea of Christians as God's own people (1 Pet. 2:9). A person's memory is a treasure (Prov. 2:1; 7:1). Fear (awe) of the Lord was Israel's treasure (Isa. 33:6).

Jesus Himself used the term frequently. He contrasted earthly treasures to those of heaven (Matt. 6:19-20). What a person treasures or values determines one's loyalty and priorities (Matt. 6:21). Paul marveled that the treasure of God's revelation of Himself in Christ had been deposited in an earthen vessel such as Paul himself (2 Cor. 4:7). See Temple. Elmer Gray

TREE OF KNOWLEDGE Plant in the midst of the garden of Eden whose fruit was forbidden to Adam and Eve (Gen. 2:17). Reference to “the tree of the knowledge of good and evil” is in a context concerned with the fall. In Gen. 3:3 the tree is designated as “the tree in the middle of the garden” (HCSB). Eating from the tree brought the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. 3:5,22).

The tree of knowledge was Adam and Eve's opportunity to demonstrate obedience and loyalty to God, but the serpent used it to tempt Eve to eat and to become like God “knowing good and evil” (Gen. 3:5). When Adam joined Eve in eating the forbidden fruit, the result was shame, guilt, exclusion from the garden, and separation from the tree of life and from God. The Bible's primary interest about the tree of knowledge is not what kind of knowledge it represented—moral judgment, secular knowledge, sexual knowledge, universal knowledge, or some other kind—but how it served as God's test and Satan's temptation. The result for mankind was disaster as they failed the test and fell to the temptation. See Adam and Eve; Eden; Tree of Life.

TREE OF LIFE Plant in the garden of Eden symbolizing access to eternal life. Also, a metaphor used in Proverbs. For the biblical writer the tree of life was an important consideration only after Adam and Eve disobeyed. Sin interrupted the quality of life God intended for them. They were to obey God (Gen. 2:17) in a family setting (Gen. 2:18-25) and perform their assigned tasks (Gen. 2:15). The implication is that they had access to all the trees in the garden, including the tree of life, but God gave an explicit command not to eat of the tree of knowledge. Their relationship to God changed radically when they disobeyed that command. Chief among the radical changes was that they no longer had access to the tree of life (Gen. 3:22-24).

The “tree of life” appears in Proverbs four times (Prov. 3:18; 11:30; 13:12; 15:4) and in Rev. 2:7; 22:2,14. To lay hold of wisdom is to lay hold on “a tree of life” (Prov. 3:18). “The fruit of the righteous is a tree of life” (11:30). Yet another proverb has this comparison: “Fulfilled desire is a tree of life” (13:12 HCSB). The author of another proverb wrote, “The tongue that heals is a tree of life” (15:4). None of these proverbs seems to refer to “the tree of life” mentioned in Genesis. All of the references in Revelation do. See Adam and Eve; Eden; Tree of Knowledge.

TRIAL OF JESUS Two systems of justice combined to produce a sentence of death for Jesus. Jewish religious leaders accused Jesus of blasphemy, a capital offense under Jewish law (Lev. 24:16). The Jewish leaders at Jesus' trial manipulated procedures to coerce Jesus into an admission that He was God's Son (Luke 22:66-71). For them this constituted blasphemy.

Roman leaders allowed conquered people such as the Jews to follow their own legal system so long as they did not abuse their privileges. The Romans did not give the Jews the right of capital punishment for the accusation of blasphemy. The Jews had to convince a Roman judge that their demand for capital punishment was justified.

The Jewish Trial Jewish leaders were determined to seek Jesus' death when they put Him on trial (Luke 22:2; Mark 14:1). They held the Jewish trial at night hoping that Jesus' supporters would be asleep and unable to protest His arrest. The Jewish portion of the trial had three separate phases: an appearance before Annas, an informal investigation by Caiaphas, and a condemnation by the Sanhedrin. Annas was father-in-law of the high priest Caiaphas. He had been high priest himself from A.D. 7-15. He was the most influential member of the Sanhedrin. The details of the interview before Annas are meager (John 18:12-14,19-24). The high priest mentioned in John 18:19 may have been Annas. If so, he held a brief interrogation of Jesus and sent Him to his son-in-law Caiaphas (John 18:24).

The meeting with Caiaphas took place in his residence (Luke 22:54). Some members of the Sanhedrin worked frantically to locate and train witnesses against Jesus (Matt. 26:59-60). The carefully prepared witnesses could not agree in their testimony (Mark 14:56; cp. Deut. 19:15).

During this circuslike activity Caiaphas talked with Jesus and put Him under oath (Matt. 26:63-64). He charged Jesus to tell if He were God's Son. Perhaps Jesus felt that silence under this oath would be a denial of His divine origin. He affirmed that He was God's Son (Mark 14:62), knowing that this would lead to death. The Sanhedrin condemned Him but did not pronounce a sentence (Mark 14:64). After the condemnation the group broke up into wild disorder. Some began to slap and spit upon Jesus (Mark 14:65).

Shortly after dawn the Sanhedrin convened again to bring a formal condemnation against Jesus (Luke 22:66). Jewish law stipulated that a guilty verdict in a capital crime had to be delayed until the next day. The vote for condemnation after dawn gave the semblance of following this requirement.

The procedure at this session was similar to that of the night trial. No witnesses came forward to accuse Christ. Jesus again claimed that He was God's Son (Luke 22:66-71). The Sanhedrin again approved the death sentence and took Jesus to Pilate for sentencing (Luke 23:1).

The procedures of the Jewish leaders during Jesus' trial were illegal. Jewish law required that trial for a capital crime begin during the daytime and adjourn by nightfall if incomplete. Sanhedrin members were supposed to be impartial judges. Jewish rules prohibited convicting the accused on His own testimony.

The Roman Trial The Roman trial of Jesus also had three phases: first appearance before Pilate, appearance before Herod Antipas, and second appearance before Pilate. The Jews asked Pilate to accept their verdict against Jesus without investigation (John 18:29-31). Pilate refused this, but he offered to let them carry out the maximum punishment under their law, probably beating with rods or imprisonment. They insisted that they wanted death.

The Jews knew that Pilate would laugh at their charge of blasphemy. They fabricated three additional charges against Jesus which would be of concern to a Roman governor (Luke 23:2). Pilate concerned himself only with the charge that Jesus had claimed to be a king. This charge sounded like treason. The Romans knew no greater crime than treason.

Pilate interrogated Jesus long enough to be convinced that He was no political rival to Caesar (John 18:33-37). He returned to the Jews to announce that he found Jesus no threat to Rome and hence not deserving of death (John 18:38). The Jews responded with vehement accusations against Jesus' actions in Judea and Galilee (Luke 23:5). When Pilate learned that Jesus was from Galilee, he sent Jesus to Herod Antipas of Galilee who was then in Jerusalem (Luke 23:6-12). Herod wanted Jesus to entertain him with a miracle. Jesus did not even speak a word to Herod. The king and his soldiers mocked and ridiculed Jesus, finally sending Him back to Pilate.

When Herod returned Jesus to Pilate, the Roman governor announced that he still found Jesus innocent of charges of treason. Three times Pilate tried to release Jesus. First, Pilate offered to chastise or beat Jesus and then to release Him (Luke 23:16). Second, he offered to release either Jesus or Barabbas, a radical revolutionary. To Pilate's surprise the crowd chanted for Barabbas' release (Luke 23:17-19). Third, he scourged Jesus. Soldiers flailed at Jesus' bare back with a leather whip. The whip had pieces of iron or bone tied to the ends of the thongs. Pilate then presented the bleeding Jesus, who was wearing a crown of thorns and a purple robe, to the crowd as their king. He hoped that this spectacle would lead them to release Jesus out of pity. Again they chanted for crucifixion (John 19:4-6).

When Pilate seemed to waver one more time concerning crucifixion, the Jews threatened to report his conduct to Caesar (John 19:12). That threat triggered Pilate's action. After symbolically washing his hands of the entire affair (Matt. 27:24), he delivered Jesus for crucifixion (John 19:16). See Annas; Caiaphas; Pilate, Pontius; Roman Law; Sanhedrin.

TRIBES OF ISRAEL Social and political groups in Israel claiming descent from one of the 12 sons of Jacob.

Tribal Unit The tribal unit played an important role in the history of the formation of the nation of Israel. In ancient times a nation was referred to as “a people,” an am; in Israel's case it was the “people of Israel.” The nation in turn was made up of “tribes.” The “tribe,” a shevet or matteh, was the major social unit that comprised the makeup of the nation. The tribe was comprised of “clans.” The “clan,” a mishpachah, was a family of families or a cluster of households that had a common ancestry. The clan was comprised then of the individual households or families referred to as the “father's house,” the beth av. Actually, the family in ancient times might be made up of several families living together and forming one household (Num. 3:24). See Family.

Tribal Origins The ancestral background of “the tribes of Israel” went back to the patriarch Jacob, whose name was changed to “Israel.” The nation of Israel was identified as “the children of Israel,” or more literally “the sons of Israel.” According to the biblical account, the family of Jacob, from which the tribes came, originated in north Syria during Jacob's stay at Haran with Laban his uncle. Eleven of the 12 sons were born at Haran, while the 12th, Benjamin, was born after Jacob returned to Canaan. The birth of the sons came through Jacob's wives Leah and Rachel and their maids Zilpah and Bilhah. The sons of Leah included Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah (Gen. 29:31-35), Issachar, and Zebulun, as well as one daughter named Dinah (Gen. 30:19-21). Rachel's sons were Joseph (Gen. 30:22-24), who became the father of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 41:50-52), and Benjamin (Gen. 35:16-18). Jacob's sons through Zilpah, Leah's maid, were Gad and Asher (Gen. 30:9-13), while Bilhah, the maid of Rachel, bore Dan and Naphtali (Gen. 30:1-8).

This family of families or family of tribes occupied the focal point in the history of the development of Israel as a nation. While there are details of that history that we do not clearly understand and other groups simply referred to as “an ethnically diverse crowd” (Exod. 12:38 HCSB) that were perhaps incorporated into the nation, the central focus is always on the “tribes of Israel,” the descendants of Jacob. For that reason lists of the 12 sons of Jacob or of the tribes appear in several places in the OT, though the lists vary somewhat. Some of the major lists include that of Jacob's blessing of the 12 (Gen. 49), the review of the households as the period of oppression in Egypt is introduced (Exod. 1:1 -10), Moses' blessing of the tribes (Deut. 33), and the song of Deborah (Judg. 5).

Tribes of Israel Each tribe had its own history in its allotment of land. We know few details about the individual tribes.

1. Reuben, the firstborn son of Jacob by his wife Leah, was in line to assume a leadership role in the family, but he forfeited that right because of an illicit affair he had with his father's concubine Bilhah (Gen. 35:22). The impact of this reflected in Jacob's blessing where Reuben is addressed as “turbulent as water, you will no longer excel, because you got into your father's bed” (Gen. 49:4 HCSB). At the time of the migration of Jacob's family to Egypt, Reuben had four sons (Gen. 46:8-9).

In some of the lists of the tribes of Israel, Reuben is mentioned first (Exod. 1:1-4; Num. 1:5-15), while in other lists Reuben appears further down (Num. 2:1-11). During the journey through the wilderness, the tribes of Reuben, Simeon, and Gad formed the second unit of the procession with the tribe of Reuben in the lead position (Num. 10:17-20). This cluster of tribes headed by the tribe of Reuben was next in line after the tabernacle (Num. 10:17-18). As the tribes approached the land of Canaan and allotments were made to each tribe, the tribe of Reuben along with Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh occupied the Transjordan, that is the highland plateau region east of the Jordan River (Josh. 13:8-31; cp. Num. 32:1-5,33-42). The tribe of Reuben occupied the southern region extending roughly from the Arnon River to the site of Heshbon (Josh. 13:15-23). Formerly, this territory was the homeland of the kingdom of Sihon. While we know little about the tribe of Reuben during the period of the settlement, the song of Deborah suggests that the tribe was criticized by some of the other tribes for not taking a more active role in the conquest (Judg. 5:15-16). See Transjordan.

2. Simeon was Jacob's second son by Leah and played a key role in the encounter Dinah had with Shechem. Because Simeon and Levi were full brothers of Dinah, they sought to avenge her (Gen. 34:25-26) for Shechem's actions (34:1-4). The radical response of the two brothers, in which they “took their swords, went into the unsuspecting city, and killed every male” (Gen. 34:25 HCSB), is reflected in Jacob's blessing of the two: “their knives are vicious weapons...Their anger is cursed, for it is strong, and their fury, for it is cruel! I will disperse them throughout Jacob and scatter them throughout Israel” (Gen. 49:5-7 HCSB). During the years of famine as the sons of Jacob traveled back and forth between Egypt and Canaan, Simeon was held hostage by Joseph at one point (Gen. 42:24).

In the lists of the tribes, Simeon is listed in second place, that is, next after Reuben (Exod. 1:2;6: 14-15; Num. 1:5-6,22-23; 13:5; 26:12-14). Generally, the tribe of Simeon seems to be characterized by weakness. Its status is best reflected in the final statement of Jacob's blessing of Simeon and Levi: “I will disperse them throughout Jacob and scatter them throughout Israel” (Gen. 49:7 HCSB). Perhaps because of its weak status, the tribe of Simeon apparently was not given a separate inheritance in the land (Josh. 19:1-9). Rather, “their inheritance was within the portion of the descendents of Judah” (Josh. 19:1 HCSB), in the southern Negev.

3. Levi was the third son of Jacob and Leah (See Simeon above). During the journey from Egypt to Canaan, the sons of Levi slaughtered 3,000 rebellious Hebrew males (Exod. 32:25-29). They became the landless priestly tribe. See Levites; Levitical Cities; Priests.

4. Judah, the fourth son of Jacob by his wife Leah (Gen. 29:35), appears as a leader and a spokesman among his brothers (Gen. 37:26; 43:3; 44:16; cp. 46:28). Judah was promised preeminence over the other tribes in Jacob's blessing (Gen. 49:8-12).

In the journey from Egypt to Canaan, Judah had the lead position (Num. 2:9). As the tribes entered the land, it was Achan of the tribe of Judah who was guilty of taking some of the forbidden booty or loot from Jericho (Josh. 7). The tribe of Judah occupied the southern part of Palestine, basically the territory between the Dead Sea on the east and the Mediterranean on the west (Josh. 15). The northern boundary of Judah was marked by the territories of Benjamin and Dan. The territory of Jerusalem may have formed something of a barrier between Judah and the tribes of the north because it was not finally secured until the time of David (2 Sam. 5:6-10). The capture of Jerusalem by David paved the way for the tribes to have a kind of unity they had not previously experienced. The territory of the tribe of Judah constituted the major portion of the Southern Kingdom, thus forming the kingdom of Judah with its capital Jerusalem.

5. Issachar was the ninth son born to Jacob, but the first of a second family he had by Leah (Gen. 30:18). Beyond his birth little else is known about his life or that of the tribe. During the journey from Mount Sinai to Canaan the tribe of Issachar followed the tribe of Judah; that is, it was a part of the first cluster of tribes located on the east side of the tabernacle (Num. 2:5). The territory occupied by the tribe of Issachar is difficult to outline precisely (Josh. 19:17-23). They were located west of the Jordan in the region just south of the Sea of Galilee stretching on down to the Valley of Jezreel. Because the blessing of Moses says that Zebulun and Issachar “summon the peoples to a mountain; there they offer acceptable sacrifices” (Deut. 33:19 HCSB), some have speculated that the two tribes perhaps had a center of worship on Mount Tabor, a mountain located on the border between the two tribes. Because the blessing of Jacob speaks of Issachar as a beast of burden and as “a forced laborer” (Gen. 49:14-15 HCSB), the tribe of Issachar may have faced a variety of hardships. For instance, there may have been a time during the tribal period when the people of Issachar served as slaves in the forced labor projects of their neighbors, the Canaanites.

6. Zebulun was the tenth son of Jacob and the sixth and final son by his wife Leah (Gen. 30:19-20). Little else is known about Zebulun's life. The territory allotted to the tribe of Zebulun was in the north in the region of southern Galilee bounded by Issachar on the south-southeast, Naphtali on the east, and Asher on the west (Josh. 19:10-16). The blessing of Jacob speaks of Zebulun's territory including "the seashore," presumably the Mediterranean Sea, and "his territory will be next to Sidon" (Gen. 49:13 HCSB) a city on the coast north of Mount Carmel. While this territory was traditionally occupied by the tribe of Asher, it is quite possible that at some point Zebulun occupied a part of this region and, therefore, would have had access to the sea. The blessing of Moses further states that Zebulun along with Issachar would benefit from "the wealth of the seas and the hidden treasures of the sand" (Deut. 33:19 HCSB). During the period that the tribes were settling in the land of Canaan, Zebulun apparently went beyond the call of duty in providing support. It is the only tribe in the song of Deborah to be mentioned twice (Judg. 5:14,18).

7. Joseph was the first son born to Jacob by Rachel, Jacob's favorite wife (Gen. 30:22-24). Two of the tribes of Israel came from Joseph, namely, Ephraim and Manasseh.

The story of Joseph is the most eventful of the sons of Jacob. Joseph had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen. 41:50-52), who were born in Egypt. Jacob adopted Ephraim and Manasseh and therefore each became the father of a tribe in Israel (Gen. 48:8-20). While Manasseh was the older of the two, Jacob gave preference to Ephraim (v. 14; cp. Deut. 33:17). The blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49:22-26) mentions only Joseph; the blessing of Moses (Deut. 33:13-17) begins with Joseph and notes Ephraim and Manasseh; the song of Deborah (Judg. 5:14) speaks of Ephraim and Machir. See Joseph; Machir.

Ephraim occupied a major portion of the central hill country with Manasseh during the tribal period. Ephraim's territory consisted of the region just north of Dan and Benjamin and ran from the Jordan River on the east to the Mediterranean Sea on the west. That Ephraim played a major leadership role among the tribes is reflected in the tribal history. Joshua, one of the 12 spies and a member of the tribe of Ephraim, became the successor of Moses (Num. 13:8,16; Josh. 1:1-11). Ephraim demanded leadership in the period of the judges (Judg. 3:27; 4:5; 7:24; 8:1; 10:1; 12:1-6; 17:1; 18:2,13; 19:1). Shiloh, located in the territory of the tribe of Ephraim, became the major center of worship during the tribal period (Josh. 18:1; 1 Sam. 1:1-18). Samuel, the leader of the tribes (1 Sam 7:15-17) near the end of the period of the judges and just prior to the beginning of the kingship, came from Ephraim (1 Sam. 1:1-20).

Ephraim's influence is seen not only during the tribal period but in Israel's later history as well. For instance, as the nation Israel divided into two kingdoms following the death of Solomon in 922 B.C., it was an Ephraimite named Jeroboam who led the northern tribes in their plea for leniency (1 Kings 12:1-5). When Rehoboam rejected their plea, the northern tribes broke their ties with the south, formed a separate kingdom (1 Kings 12:16-19), and selected Jeroboam as their king (1 Kings 12:20). Ephraim's influence is seen also during the time of the prophets. For instance, Hosea refers to Israel some three dozen times using the name Ephraim as being synonymous with Israel.

Manasseh was the oldest son of Joseph and Asenath. The tribe of Manasseh occupied territory both east and west of the Jordan River. Manasseh's territory east of the Jordan included the regions of Gilead and Bashan and most likely extended from the Jabbok River to near Mount Hermon. Manasseh's territory west of the Jordan was located north of Ephraim. Apparently the tribe of Manasseh played an important role in the conquest. For instance, the sons of Machir, Manasseh's son, took the land of Gilead and drove out the Amorites who occupied it (Num. 32:39; cp. Judg. 5:14) while other descendants of Manasseh engaged in the activities of the conquest elsewhere (Num. 32:41-42). Perhaps Gideon is the most familiar of the descendants of Manasseh (Judg. 6:12-15). Gideon defeated the Midianites with a small band of men (Judg. 6-7).

8. Benjamin was Jacob's youngest son, born to him by Rachel, and the only son born after returning to Palestine from Haran (Gen. 35:16-20). He was the only full-blooded brother of Joseph. Therefore, the tribes of Benjamin, Ephraim, and Manasseh formed a special group. Benjamin's tribal territory was a small area west of the Jordan, sandwiched between Ephraim to the north and Judah to the south (Josh. 18:11-28). The Benjaminites had a reputation as men of war. The blessing of Jacob refers to them as “a wolf” who “tears his prey” (Gen. 49:27 HCSB). The book of Judges notes their activities as warriors during the tribal period (Judg. 5:14; 20:12-16). They were referred to as those “who were left-handed” and experts with the sling (Judg. 20:16). The story of the Levite and his concubine reflects the inhumane acts for which the Benjaminites were responsible (Judg. 19). The second judge, Ehud (Judg. 3:12-30), and the first king, Saul (1 Sam. 9:15-17; 10:1), came from the tribe of Benjamin.

9. Dan was the fifth son of Jacob and the first of two sons by Bilhah, Rachel's maid (Gen. 30:5-8). Therefore, Dan and Naphtali were full-blooded brothers and are often mentioned together (Gen. 46:23-24; Exod. 1:4). The tribe of Dan originally occupied the territory just west of Benjamin with Ephraim on the north and Judah and the Philistines on the south (Josh. 19:40-48). Shortly after settling in this area, the Amorites and the Philistines apparently attempted to drive them out of the region (Judg. 1:34-36). The pressure and harassment the people of Dan experienced from the Philistines is reflected in the stories of Samson, the Danite, and his encounters with them (Judg. 13-16). The Philistine pressure resulted in the migration of the tribe to an area north of Lake Hula, to the city of Laish and its territory (Judg. 18:14-27). The people of Dan captured the city and renamed it Dan (Judg. 18:29). See Dan.

10. Naphtali was the sixth son of Jacob and younger full-blooded brother of Dan (Gen. 30:6-8). The name, Naphtali, which conveys the idea of “wrestling” was selected because of the personal struggles between Rachel and Leah (Gen. 30:7-8). The Bible provides little information concerning Naphtali the person or tribe. During the tribal period the tribe of Naphtali occupied the broad strip of land west of the Jordan in the area of Lake Hula and the Sea of Chinnereth (Galilee). This band of land ran from Issachar and Zebulun in the south to near Dan in the north (Josh. 19:32-39). Apparently the tribe of Naphtali provided forces during the conquest of the land (Judg. 5:18) and during the Midianite threat (Judg. 6:35; 7:23).

11. Gad was the seventh son of Jacob and the first of two sons by Zilpah, the maid of Leah (Gen. 30:9-11). Because Leah saw this birth as a sign of “good fortune,” especially in light of the fact that she had ceased having children, she named him “Gad” which means “fortune” (Gen. 30:11). We know very little about Gad the patriarch beyond the brief details about his birth. The tribe's territory was the east side of the Jordan River and the Dead Sea, including a part of the region called Gilead (Num. 32:34-36; Josh. 13:24-28), extending from the region of the Jabbok River in the north to the region of the Arnon River in the south. According to the blessing of Jacob, the tribe of Gad perhaps experienced numerous raids (Gen. 49:19) especially from groups like the Ammonites as reflected in the story of Jephthah (Judg. 11). Perhaps such raids were prompted by the fact that Gad occupied some of the best land in the Transjordan (Deut. 33:20-21). Apparently the men of Gad achieved great expertise as warriors (1 Chron. 12:8).

12. Asher was the eighth son of Jacob, the second son by Zilpah and the younger full-blooded brother of Gad (Gen. 30:9-13). Like Gad, little information is shared about the patriarch Asher. The tribe of Asher occupied the region west of Zebulun and Naphtali, that is, the northern coastal region of Palestine. The territory extended from near Mount Carmel in the south to near Tyre in the north (Josh. 19:24-31). Asher is the only tribe not recognized as providing a judge during the tribal period. While Asher occupied choice territory (Gen. 49:20), it apparently was reproached and perhaps failed to gain the respect of some of the other tribes (Judg. 5:17b).

Conclusion While discussion and research will continue concerning the history of the tribes and the territory they occupied, the tribal period will always be recognized as an important though enigmatic period in the development of the history of Israel. With the development of the monarchy, the tribal period came to an end. However, tribal ties and traditions may have continued to be quite strong. Many scholars suggest that tribal jealousies and traditions played a major role in bringing about the division of the kingdom and the formation of two kingdoms, the Northern Kingdom and the Southern Kingdom in 922 B.C. LaMoine DeVries

TRIBULATION Generally refers to the suffering and anguish of the people of God. According to the NT, tribulations are an expected reality

among the followers of Christ.

The Hebrew word commonly rendered tribulation is tsara, which literally means “narrow” (Num. 22:26) or “compressed” (Job 41:15). A figurative understanding means “affliction, distress, or tribulation” (Deut. 4:30; Job 15:24; Ps. 32:7; Isa. 63:9; Jon. 2:2). The Greek word thlipsis conveys the idea of “severe constriction,” “narrowing,” or “pressing together” (Matt. 7:14; Mark 3:9). Similar notions underlie the Latin term tribulum (a threshing sledge), from which the English word comes.

The Bible teaches several important truths concerning the tribulations of believers. First, the tribulations of Christ are the pattern for the sufferings of believers. As tribulation was inevitable and expected in the messianic ministry of Jesus, so tribulation will be present among His followers (Matt. 13:21; John 16:33; Acts 14:22; Rom. 8:35; 12:12; 1 Thess. 3:3; 2 Thess. 1:4; Rev. 1:9). Second, the tribulations of believers are in a sense participation in the sufferings of Christ (Col. 1:24; 2 Cor. 1:5; 4:10; Phil. 3:10; 1 Pet. 4:13). Third, the tribulations of believers promote transformation into the likeness of Christ (Rom. 5:3; 2 Cor. 3:18; 4:8-12,16). Tribulation teaches Christ's followers to comfort and encourage others in similar situations, enabling those suffering to persevere and persist (2 Cor. 1:4; 4:10; Col. 1:24; 1 Thess. 1:6).

Another biblical understanding of tribulation is eschatological. The expression “great tribulation” refers to the time of trouble that will usher in the second coming of Christ (Matt. 24:21; Rev. 2:22; 7:14). Jesus warned that the great tribulation would be so intense that its calamities will nearly decimate all of life (Matt. 24:15-22). Jesus' words in Matt. 24:29 may refer to Dan. 12:1, “a time of distress such as never occurred since there was a nation until that time” (NASB). This allusion suggests an eschatological view of the great tribulation.

One's millennial view usually determines the interpretation of the time and nature of this period of intense tribulation. Postmillennialists and amillennialists consider the great tribulation as a brief, indefinite period at the end of this age, usually identifying it with the revolt of Gog and Magog in Rev. 20:8-9. Dispensational premillennialists identify the tribulation with the 70th week of Daniel's prophecy (Dan. 9:27), a period of seven years whose latter half is the great tribulation. The rapture of the church precedes a literal, seven-year tribulation, which is followed by the second coming of Christ. Historical premillennialists (posttribulationists) assert that the tribulation is a horrific period of trouble immediately preceding the millennium and typically teach that believers and unbelievers will both undergo this tribulation.

Although this event should rightly be regarded as a future occurrence, attempts to connect the time of tribulation with specific events or persons have proved futile. Believers are exhorted to watch for Christ and fix their hope on Him, not upon events surrounding His coming (1 John 3:3). Stan Norman

TRIBUNE Commander of an ancient Roman cohort, a military unit ideally comprising 1,000 men. Some English versions use this term for the Greek word chiliarchos, which is also rendered “commander.” The Greek word for “cohort” is speires, which is sometimes rendered “regiment” (cp. Acts 21:31-33; 22:24-29; 23:10-22; 24:22; 25:23). According to Josephus, the Romans stationed a cohort in Jerusalem at the Antonia Fortress to suppress disturbances in the city. E. Ray Clendenen

TRIBUTE Any payment exacted by a superior power, usually a state, from an inferior one. The weaker state, called a vassal state, normally contributed a specified amount of gold, silver, or other commodities on a yearly basis. The imposition of tribute demonstrated the subservient status of the vassal state, thus undermining political autonomy and often causing financial weakness. Powerful nations collected tribute from both hostile states and allies. Refusal to render tribute by either was regarded as rebellion and normally resulted in military reprisals.

Imposing tribute was practiced widely and can be tracked back to before 2000 B.C. The Tell el Amarna Letters from Canaanite kings after 1400 B.C. clearly reveal their vassal status to Egypt. During a few periods of strength, Israel took tribute from neighboring peoples. David and Solomon exacted tribute from several smaller states (2 Sam. 8:14; 1 Kings 4:21). Later, Moab paid a tribute of 100,000 lambs and the wool of 100,000 rams to Ahab of Israel (2 Kings 3:4).

After the division of Solomon's kingdom in 922 B.C., the relatively weaker states of Judah and Israel more often were forced to pay tribute to the large powers which increasingly dominated the Near East. This was especially true of the Assyrian period (850-600 B.C.) as both biblical and archaeological evidence attest. The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III (about 841 B.C.) shows Jehu of Israel paying tribute prostrate before the Assyrian king. Menahem of Israel (2 Kings 15:19) and Ahaz of Judah (2 Kings 16:7-9) rendered tribute to Tiglath-pileser III (Pul) for different reasons. The heavy tribute paid by Hezekiah to Sennacherib about 701 B.C. was recorded in both biblical and Assyrian texts (2 Kings 18:13-16).

The Jews later paid tribute in one form or another to Babylon, Persia, the Ptolemies and Seleucids, and Rome. The Roman tributum was a form of taxes. In effect the famous question posed to Jesus by the Pharisees about taxes (Matt. 22:15-22) was about tribute. See Assyria; Babylon; Egypt; Rome and the Roman Empire.

TRIGON (Tri' gŏn) Small, three-cornered harp with four strings (Dan. 3:5,7,10; KJV "sackbut"; HCSB, "lyre").

TRINITY Theological term used to define God as an undivided unity expressed in the threefold nature of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit. As a distinctive Christian doctrine, the Trinity is considered as a divine mystery beyond human comprehension to be reflected upon only through scriptural revelation. The Trinity is a biblical concept that expresses the dynamic character of God, not a Greek idea pressed into Scripture from philosophical or religious speculation. While the term "trinity" does not appear in Scripture, the trinitarian structure appears throughout the NT to affirm that God Himself is manifested through Jesus Christ by means of the Spirit.

A proper biblical view of the Trinity balances the concepts of unity and distinctiveness. Two errors that appear in the history of the consideration of the doctrine are tritheism and unitarianism. In tritheism error is made in emphasizing the distinctiveness of the Godhead to the point that the Trinity is seen as three separate Gods, or a Christian polytheism. On the other hand, unitarianism excludes the concept of distinctiveness while focusing solely on the aspect of God the Father. In this way Christ and the Holy Spirit are placed in lower categories and made less than divine. Both errors compromise the effectiveness and contribution of the activity of God in redemptive history.

The biblical concept of the Trinity developed through progressive revelation. The OT consistently affirms the unity of God through such statements as “Listen, Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is One” (Deut. 6:4 HCSB). God's oneness is stressed to caution the Israelites against the polytheism and practical atheism of their heathen neighbors. See Revelation, Book of; Shema.

The OT does feature implications of the trinitarian idea. This does not mean that the Trinity was fully knowable from the OT, but that a vocabulary was established through the events of God's nearness and creativity; both receive developed meaning from NT writers. For example, the word of God is recognized as the agent of creation (Ps. 33:6,9; cp. Prov. 3:19; 8:27), revelation, and salvation (Ps. 107:20). This same vocabulary is given distinct personality in John's prologue (John 1:1-4) in the person of Jesus Christ. Other vocabulary categories include the wisdom of God (Prov. 8) and the Spirit of God (Gen. 1:2; Ps. 104:30; Zech. 4:6).

A distinguishing feature of the NT is the doctrine of the Trinity. It is remarkable that NT writers present the doctrine in such a manner that it does not violate the OT concept of the oneness of God. In fact, they unanimously affirm the Hebrew monotheistic faith, but they extend it to include the coming of Jesus and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The early Christian church experienced the God of Abraham in a new and dramatic way without abandoning the oneness of God that permeates the OT. As a fresh expression of God, the concept of the Trinity—rooted in the God of the past and consistent with the God of the past—absorbs the idea of the God of the past but goes beyond the God of the past in a more personal encounter.

The NT does not present a systematic presentation of the Trinity. The scattered segments from various writers that appear throughout the NT reflect a seemingly accepted understanding that exists without a full-length discussion. It is embedded in the framework of the Christian experience and simply assumed as true. The NT writers focus on statements drawn from the obvious existence of the trinitarian experience as opposed to a detailed exposition.

The NT evidence for the Trinity can be grouped into four types of passages. The first is the trinitarian formula of Matt. 28:19; 2 Cor. 13:13/14; 1 Pet. 1:2; Rev. 1:4-6. In each passage a trinitarian formula, repeated in summation fashion, registers a distinctive contribution of each person of the Godhead. Matthew 28:19, for example, follows the triple formula of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit that distinguishes Christian baptism. The risen Lord commissioned the disciples to baptize converts with a trinitarian emphasis that carries the distinctiveness of each person of the Godhead while associating their inner relationship. This passage is the clearest scriptural reference to a systematic presentation of the doctrine of the Trinity.

Paul, in 2 Cor. 13:13/14, finalized his thoughts to the Corinthian church with a pastoral appeal that is grounded in “the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit.” The formulation is designed to have the practical impact of bringing that divided church together through their personal experience of the Trinity in their daily lives. Significantly, in the trinitarian order Christ is mentioned first. This reflects the actual process of Christian salvation, since Christ is the key to opening insight into the work of the Godhead. Paul was calling attention to the trinitarian consciousness, not in the initial work of salvation that has already been accomplished at Corinth, but in the sustaining work that enables divisive Christians to achieve unity.

In 1 Pet. 1:2 the trinitarian formula is followed with reference to each person of the Godhead. The scattered Christians are reminded through reference to the Trinity that their election (foreknowledge of the Father) and redemption (the sanctifying work of the Spirit) should lead to holy living in obedience to the Son.

John addressed the readers of the book of Revelation with an expanded trinitarian formula that includes references to the persons of the Godhead (Rev. 1:4-6). The focus on the triumph of Christianity crystallizes the trinitarian greeting into a doxology that acknowledges the accomplished work and the future return of Christ. This elongated presentation serves as an encouragement to churches facing persecution.

A second type of NT passage is the triadic form. Two passages cast in this structure are Eph. 4:4-6 and 1 Cor. 12:3-6. Both passages refer to the three persons of the Trinity, but not in the definitive formula of the previous passage. Each Scripture balances the unity of the church. Emphasis is placed on the administration of gifts by the Godhead.

A third category of passages mentions the three persons of the Godhead but without a clear triadic structure. In the accounts of the baptism of Jesus (Matt. 3:13-17; Mark 1:9-11; and Luke 3:21-22), the three Synoptic writers recorded the presence of the Trinity when the Son was baptized, the Spirit descended, and the Father spoke with approval. Paul, in Gal. 4:4-6, outlined the work of the Trinity in the aspect of the sending Father. Other representative passages in this category (2 Thess. 2:13-15; Titus 3:4-6; Jude 20-21) portray each member of the Trinity in relation to a particular redemptive function.

The fourth category of trinitarian passages includes those presented in the farewell discourse of Jesus to His disciples (John 14:16; 15:26; 16:13-15). In the context of these passages, Jesus expounded the work and ministry of the third person of the Godhead as the Agent of God in the continuing ministry of the Son. The Spirit is a Teacher who facilitates understanding on the disciples' part and, in being sent from the Father and the Son, is one in nature with the other persons of the Trinity. Jesus said the Spirit takes what is His and declares it to believers (John 16:15). The discourse emphasizes the interrelatedness of the Trinity in equality and operational significance.

All of these passages are embryonic efforts by the early church to express its awareness of the Trinity. The NT is christological in its approach, but it involves the fullness of God being made available to the individual believer through Jesus and by the Spirit. The consistent trinitarian expression is not a formulation of the doctrine, as such, but reveals an experiencing of God's persistent self-revelation.

In the postbiblical era the Christian church tried to express its doctrine in terms that were philosophically acceptable and logically coherent. Greek categories of understanding began to appear in explanation efforts. Discussion shifted from the NT emphasis on the function of the Trinity in redemptive history to an analysis of the unity of essence of the Godhead.

A major question during those early centuries focused on the oneness of God. The Sabellians described the Godhead in terms of modes that existed only one at a time. This theory upheld the unity of God but excluded His permanent distinctiveness. The Docetists understood Christ as an appearance of God in human form, while Ebonites described Jesus as an ordinary man with God's power existing within Him at baptism. Arius was also an influential theologian who viewed Jesus as subordinate to God. To Arius, Jesus was a being created by God, higher than man, but less than God. This idea, as well as the others, was challenged by Athanasius at Nicea (A.D. 325), and the council decided for the position of Jesus as "of the exact same substance as the Father."

Probably the most outstanding thinker of the early centuries was Augustine of Hippo (A.D. 354-430). He began with the idea of God as one substance and sought explanation of the Godhead in psychological analogy: a person exists as one being with three dimensions of memory, understanding, and will; so also the Godhead exists as a unity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. While this explanation is helpful and contains the concept of three persons in one, it does not resolve the complex nature of God.

Perhaps four statements can summarize and clarify this study.

1. God is One. The God of the OT is the same God of the NT. His offer of salvation in the OT receives a fuller revelation in the NT in a way that is not different but more complete. The doctrine of the Trinity does not abandon the monotheistic faith of Israel.

2. God has three distinct ways of being in the redemptive event, yet He remains an undivided unity. That God the Father imparts Himself to mankind through Son and Spirit without ceasing to be Himself is at the very heart of the Christian faith. A compromise in either the absolute sameness of the Godhead or the true diversity reduces the reality of salvation.

3. The primary way of grasping the concept of the Trinity is through the threefold participation in salvation. The approach of the NT is not to discuss the essence of the Godhead, but the particular aspects of the revelatory event that includes the definitive presence of the Father in the person of Jesus Christ through the Holy Spirit.

4. The doctrine of the Trinity is an absolute mystery. It is primarily known, not through speculation, but through experiencing the act of grace through personal faith. See God; Holy Spirit; Jesus Christ. Jerry M. Henry TRIPOLIS (Trī' pū līs) (Ezra 4:9 HCSB, NIV) See Tarpelites.

TRIUMPHAL ENTRY Term used for the entry of Jesus into the city of Jerusalem on the Sunday prior to His crucifixion. Due to the fact that palm branches were placed before Him, this day is often called "Palm Sunday." The event is recorded in Matt. 21:1-9; Mark 11:1-10; Luke 19:28-38; John 12:12-15. All accounts agree in substance with each adding certain detail. Whether by prearrangement or by divine foreknowledge, the disciples found a colt in Bethphage as Jesus had described. (Matthew ties the account closely to Zechariah's prophecy [9:9], mentioning the colt and its mother.) It is possible that Christ rode the donkey for the more difficult part of the journey, transferring to the colt upon actually entering Jerusalem. There a large crowd applauded Him, spreading the road with their garments and with branches. They acknowledged Him as the son of David.

The triumphal entry is of vital significance in understanding the messianic mission of Jesus. Prior to this moment, Jesus had refused to allow any public acknowledgement of His being the Messiah. By conducting His ministry outside Jerusalem, He had avoided further intensification of conflict with the Jewish religious leaders. Now, however, the time was at hand. The opponents of Jesus understood the strong messianic implications of the manner of His entry into Jerusalem. The riding upon the colt, the garments and palm branches in the road, and the shouts of the multitude—all of these pointed to Jesus as the Messiah. When He was urged to quiet the people, Jesus replied, “If they were to keep silent, the stones would cry out!” (Luke 19:40 HCSB).

Ironically, though the triumphal entry was a public acceptance of Jesus being the Messiah and presented a direct challenge to His enemies, it must have been a disappointment to many of His followers. Christ did not enter Jerusalem upon a warhorse of conquest but upon a colt representing humility. As a result, the religious leaders demanded His crucifixion, while the multitudes ultimately turned away with indifference. See Jesus, Life and Ministry; Messiah.

TROAS (Trō āz) City in northwest Asia Minor visited by Paul during his second and third missionary journeys (Acts 16:8, 11; 20:5-6; 2 Cor. 2:12; 2 Tim. 4:13). Troas was founded before 300 B.C. by Antigonus, a successor of Alexander the Great, and was located about 10 miles south of the city of Troy. The emperor Augustus (31 B.C.-A.D. 14) made it a Roman colony. It served as an important seaport in the Roman Empire for those traveling between Asia Minor and Macedonia. Today ruins of the city wall (about six miles in circumference), a theater, and an aqueduct remain. See Asia Minor, Cities of; Paul.

TROGYLLIUM (Trō gīl' ī ūm) Promontory on the west coast of Asia Minor less than one mile across the strait from Samos, a stopping place on Paul's return to Jerusalem according to the Western text of Acts 20:15.

TROPHIMUS (Trōph' ī mūs) Personal name meaning “nutritious.” Gentile Christian from Ephesus who accompanied Paul to Jerusalem for the presentation of the collection (Acts 20:4; 21:29). Paul's free association with Trophimus led to the false charge that Paul had defiled the temple by bringing a Gentile within the Court of Israel (Acts 21:19). The Trophimus whom Paul left in Miletus (2 Tim. 4:20) is either another Trophimus or else evidence for a second Roman imprisonment. According to Acts, Paul did not pass by Miletus on his way to Rome.

TRUTH Past biblical scholars often overgeneralized about distinctions between Greek and Hebrew conceptions of truth, claiming Greek philosophical tradition understood truth to be static, timeless, and theoretical, in contrast to the Hebrew view of truth as practical and experiential. They maintain that, though Hebrew understanding predominates in the Bible, the contrasting Greek view is represented in the NT, especially in Johannine literature.

The tide has turned against this idea (see A. Thiselton, “Truth” in The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology). Increasingly, scholars now recognize that major biblical words translated “truth” (Hb. emet; Gk. aletheia) have a wide range of meaning, as propositional, personal, moral, and historical truth. Emet frequently does mean “faithfulness,” OT writers using it to describe God's word and deeds. His word can be trusted because He is faithful and because it is true. The genius of biblical teaching is that all truth is unified and grounded in the faithful and true God.

Truth as Truth Telling The most common meaning of biblical words refers to statements accurately reflecting facts, such as accurate and trustworthy witnesses (Prov. 12:17; cp. 1 John 2:21). Lying is the opposite of truth (Jer. 9:3; cp. Gen. 42:16). The people of God are to speak truth to one another (Zech. 8:16; Eph. 4:25). Jesus stresses the authority and certainty of His message in saying, “I tell you the truth” (Luke 9:27 HCSB; cp. Luke 4:24; John 16:7). John stresses he is telling the truth about Jesus (John 19:35), and Paul emphasizes he is not lying (Rom. 9:1; cp. 2 Cor. 7:14; 1 Tim. 2:7; Acts 26:25).

For Moses the covenant God abounds in truth (Exod. 34:6). His truth is eternal (Ps. 117:2). Human testimony can swear to truth by nothing higher than God (1 Kings 22:16; Isa. 65:16). Since God is true, so is His word (Ps. 119:160; cp. John 17:17; 2 Sam. 7:28; Pss. 43:3; 119:142,151). Scripture is this very word of truth and thus should be handled carefully (2 Tim. 2:15). The gospel is equated with the truth (Gal. 2:5,14; Eph.1:13), and the truth is equated with the gospel (Gal. 5:7).

Other Uses of “Truth” Because God's word is truth, it is ultimately real and not ephemeral, as opposed to all else, and liberates men (John 8:32). Satan and men lie (John 8:44; Rom. 1:25) and enslave. Jesus is Savior because He is Truth incarnate (John 14:6; cp. 1:14,17; Eph. 4:21). Now the Holy Spirit indwells believers, guiding them into all truth (John 14:17; 15:26; 16:13; cp. 1 John 5:6).

Yet people resist truth. Jesus implied this, “Because I tell the truth, you do not believe Me” (John 8:46 HCSB). The Bible teaches that believing truth is not a mechanical psychological function but is related to the human will. People choose the lie rather than God's truth (Rom. 1:25; 2 Tim. 3:8; 4:4; Titus 1:14).

More than half the uses of aletheia and cognates occur in Johannine writings (John 16:7; 1 John 2:4,21,27). John uses it to refer to reality in contrast to falsehood or appearance but does not reject OT teaching on truth. Nor does John have a Greek mind-set. In fact, John 1:14 describes Jesus in His incarnation as “full of grace and truth,” a reference to the OT concept of covenant loyalty/faithfulness [chesed], now seen firsthand in the Logos as the genuine reality of God. In John 14:6 Jesus describes Himself as “the way, the truth, and the life,” combining a number of concepts. Jesus is the true way leading to life, and men should not come to Him seeking truth but, because He is the end of the search, the revealed reality of God.

TRYPHAENA AND TRYPHOSA (Trì phè' nà, Trì phó' sá) Personal names meaning “dainty” and “delicate.” Two women whom Paul greeted as those “who have worked hard in the Lord” (Rom. 16:12 HCSB). The two were perhaps deacons serving the Roman church (cp. Phoebe in Rom. 16:1) or else “marketplace” evangelists like Priscilla (Acts 18:26; Rom. 16:3). The similarity of their names suggests the two were perhaps (twin) sisters.

TUBAL (Tù' bál) Son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5) and ancestor of a people, likely of Cappadocia or Cilicia in Asia Minor (Isa. 66:19; Ezek. 27:13; 32:26; 38:2-3; 39:1).

TUBAL-CAIN (Tù' bál-cán) Son of Lamech, associated with the origin of metalworking (Gen. 4:22). The two elements in his name mean “producer” and “smith.”

TUNIC Loose-fitting, knee-length garment worn next to the skin (Matt. 10:10; Mark 6:9). See Cloth, Clothing.

TURBAN Headdress formed by wrapping long strips of cloth around the head. A distinctive headdress formed part of the garb of the high priest (Exod. 28:4,37,39; 29:6; 39:28,31; Lev. 8:9; 16:4). Removal of one's turban was a sign of mourning or shame (Isa. 3:18-23; Ezek. 24:17,23). See Cloth, Clothing; Headband, Headdress.

TURNING OF THE WALL Expression used in the KJV, elsewhere translated as “the corner buttress” (NASB), “the Angle” (NRSV), “the escarpment” (REB), and “the angle of the wall” (NIV). One segment of the Jerusalem ramparts probably located near the palace. It was fortified by Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:9) and rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. 3:19-20,24). Not to be confused with “the corner” (Neh. 3:31) nor associated with the corner gate. See Corner Gate.

TYCHICUS (Tik' i cūs) Personal name meaning “fortunate.” One of Paul's fellow workers in the ministry. A native of Asia Minor (Acts 20:4), he traveled with the apostle on the third missionary journey. Tychicus and Onesimus carried the Colossian letter from Paul (Col. 4:7-9) and were to relate to the church Paul's condition. Paul also sent Tychicus to Ephesus on one occasion (2 Tim. 4:12) and possibly to Crete on another (Titus 3:12). Tradition holds that he died a martyr.

TYPOLOGY Method of interpreting some parts of Scripture by seeing a pattern which an earlier statement sets up by which a later is explained. The Greek words that help us understand typology come under a verbal root that means “to beat, strike, or smite.” In building construction, what is “beaten out” can become a pattern. This article will examine how various words in the family are used and how typology functions in interpreting the OT.

Foundational Words and Meanings All of these related words show the effects of an imprint.

1. Blow, strike, mark A literal meaning tupos is found in the narrative about Thomas' skepticism: “If I don't see the mark (tupos) of the nails in His hands, put my finger into the mark of the nails, and put my hand into His side, I will never believe!” (John 20:25 HCSB). Jesus invited Thomas to examine His hands and side. Then Jesus urged: “Don't be an unbeliever, but a believer” (John 20:27). Thomas showed he did just that when he exclaimed, “My Lord and my God!” (John 20:28).

2. Technical model or pattern Both Heb. 8:5 and Acts 7:44 use tupos to refer to Exod. 25:40, where the Lord commanded Moses to make the furniture and utensils of the tabernacle “according to the model of them you have been shown on the mountain” (HCSB). The Hebrew word for pattern is tabnit, from a Hebrew root meaning “to build.” The noun means “construction, pattern, or figure.” The writer of Hebrews stressed that Christ could not be an earthly priest, for such priests served in the copy and shadow of heavenly things. Moses saw an earthly copy of the heavenly reality. Jesus became a high priest and a minister of the holy places and true tent, which the Lord pitched (Heb. 8:2). Even this earthly language shows the superiority of Christ's heavenly priesthood to that of the earthly priests.

In Acts 7:44 Stephen said that the whole tabernacle, which he called “the tabernacle of the testimony” (HCSB), was made “according to the pattern” that Moses had seen. The word tupos means a model or pattern.

3. Image or status In Acts 7 Stephen said that Israel “took up the tent of Moloch and the star of your god Rephan, the images that you made to worship” (Acts 7:43 HCSB). Here what is stamped or beaten out is an idol. The imprint became an object of worship.

4. Pattern as a mold or norm While Stephen pointed out a bad pattern in the case of idolatry, Paul emphasized a good pattern in Rom. 6:17. Paul thanked God that, although the Romans were once slaves of sin, they became subject to the gospel. He described the gospel as the “pattern of teaching you were entrusted to” (HCSB). The gospel is a norm or pattern showing how we should live (cp. Rom. 1:16-17).

5. Persons as examples or patterns When people internalize the gospel, their lives begin a process of transformation. Paul spoke of himself and his fellow workers as examples or patterns. He urged the Philippians to become imitators of himself: “observe those who live according to the example you have in us” (Phil. 3:17 HCSB). He said to the Thessalonians, “We did it to make ourselves an example to you so that you would imitate us” (2 Thess. 3:9). Paul obtained mercy and God showed His forbearance to Paul “as an example to those who would believe in Him” (1 Tim. 1:16).

The Thessalonians, by their faith during tribulation, became models or patterns for believers in Macedonia and Achaia, “in every place that your faith in God has gone out” (1 Thess. 1:7-8 HCSB). Paul commanded Timothy to be a pattern or model for believers “in speech, in conduct, in love, in faith, in purity” (1 Tim. 4:12). At the same time, Timothy had his own standard to guide him: “Hold on to the pattern of sound teaching that you have heard from me, in the faith and love that are in Christ Jesus” (2 Tim. 1:13). Titus likewise was to be a model or pattern of good works, soundness in teaching, respectfulness, sound preaching that is beyond reproach (Titus 2:7-8). Peter urged all the elders to become examples or patterns for the flock rather than “lording it over” the flock (1 Pet. 5:3). Christians, and especially Christian leaders, are being watched and often imitated. The pattern or model they exhibit is crucial.

Typology as a Method of Interpreting the Old Testament Sometimes the NT explicitly refers to its method of interpreting the OT as “type,” or “typically.” Usually, however, the NT uses typology as a method of interpreting the OT without explicitly saying so. Typology involves a correspondence, usually in one particular matter between a person, event, or thing in the OT with a person, event, or thing in the NT. All elements except this one may be quite different, but the one element selected for comparison has a genuine similarity in the two different historical contexts.

1. Old Testament warnings Paul used this kind of typology in 1 Cor. 10:1-11. He rehearsed the experiences of the people of Israel in the exodus and in their 40 years in the desert: the destruction of Pharaoh's army in the sea (Exod. 14-15); the eating of manna (Exod. 16); their conduct when thirsty—Rephidim—striking the rock (Exod. 17); Kadesh—speaking to the rock (Num. 20); sin of the golden calf (Exod. 32); fornication with the daughters of Moab at Baal of Peor (Num. 25); murmuring when going from Mount Hor around the land of Edom (Num. 21). Paul stressed one point of correspondence between the OT events and the NT message: All the people participated in these experiences, but God was not pleased with most of them; the majority died in the desert and could not enter the promised land (1 Cor. 10:5). Paul pointed to this conduct of the majority who angered God as types or warning patterns, models, examples for Christians (1 Cor. 10:6). Christians are not to desire evil things, as in the golden calf incident and as at Baal-Peor (1 Cor. 10:7-8). They were not to complain or murmur as the Israelites did when they were bitten by fiery serpents or in the judgment of the sons of Korah (1 Cor. 10:9-10; cp. Num. 16; 21). Paul concluded, “Now these things happened to them as examples, and they were written as a warning to us, on whom the ends of the ages have come” (1 Cor. 10:11 HCSB).

compared Adam and Christ in Rom. 5:12-21. He argued that Christ's deed is much more powerful than Adam's transgression. Paul said specifically that Adam "is a prototype of the Coming One" (v. 14 HCSB). Certainly, huge differences separate Adam and Christ. The one point of correspondence in the passage is the effect of influence upon mankind. Adam affected mankind adversely; Christ affects the same mankind for the good. Adam's trespass brought a verdict of condemnation of all people; Christ's righteous deed brought the gracious benefit to all people for the acquittal that brings life (vv. 16,18). Where sin abounded, grace was overflowing in greater abundance (v. 20). To make Christ's deed effective, people must receive the abundance of God's grace and the gift of righteousness (v. 17).

2. Adam as a type of Christ Paul

3. Baptism as a fulfillment Peter, after discussing Christ's work in preaching in the spiritual realm to spirits in prison, mentioned Noah's ark and the flood: "In it [the ark], a few—that is, eight people—were saved through water. Baptism, which corresponds to this, now saves you (not the removal of the filth of the flesh, but the pledge of a good conscience toward God) through the resurrection of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 3:20-21 HCSB). Baptism is a drama of faith. Here it is called a "pledge"—an acted-out pledge of a good conscience. We are saved by faith expressed in water baptism. What is the one point of correspondence with the flood? The flood was a type of baptism because people of faith (and recipients of God's favor) experienced deliverance. Noah and his family were delivered by the ark and the water. Christians expressing in baptism genuine faith are delivered from bondage to sin.

One point of correspondence between an OT event and a NT event shows the same God at work in both covenants. Typology, a comparison stressing one point of similarity, helps us see the NT person, event, or institution as the fulfillment of that which was only hinted at in the OT.

TYRANNUS (Tì răn' nūs) Latin form of the Greek term turannos, a ruler with absolute authority. After Paul withdrew from the synagogue in Ephesus, he preached for two years at the lecture hall of Tyrannus (Acts 19:9). Tyrannus was either the owner of the hall or a prominent philosopher associated with it. According to some Western texts, Paul preached from 11:00 until 4:00 p.m., the time of the afternoon break from work. If accurate, this tradition explains the availability of the hall (schools generally met in the morning) and the freedom of “all Asia” to hear Paul during their “siesta.”

TYRIAN (Tir'ī ān) Person from Tyre.

TYROPOEON VALLEY (Tī rō' pī ðn) Narrow depression between Jerusalem's Ophel (Hill of David) and the western or upper hill of the city. It was much deeper in ancient times but has been filled up with debris through the centuries, especially since the destruction of the city by the Romans in A.D. 70. When David captured the city, the valley served as one of the natural defensive barriers. During Hellenistic times it was included within the city walls. During Herod's building campaign, he constructed bridges across the valley to connect the palace area with the temple complex.

UCAL (U' cal) Personal name meaning "I am strong" or "I am consumed." Pupil of Agur, the wisdom teacher responsible for Prov. 30 (v. 1). REB followed the earliest Greek translation in rendering the proper names Ithiel and Ucal as "I am weary, God, I am weary and worn out" (cp. HCSB,NRSV).

UEL (U' al) Personal name meaning "will of God," or a contraction of Abiel meaning "God is father." Contemporary of Ezra with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:34).

UGARIT (U gar rit) Important city in Syria whose excavation has provided tablets giving the closest primary evidence available for reconstructing the Canaanite religion Israel faced.

Location Ruins of the ancient city of Ugarit lie on the Mediterranean coast about nine miles north of Latakia. The contemporary name is Ras Shamra, "head [land] of fennel." Located at the juncture of major trade routes from Anatolia, northwest Mesopotamia, and Egypt, and possessing a harbor (modern Minet el-Beida) which accommodated vessels from Cyprus, the Aegean, and Egypt, Ugarit was an important commercial center in most periods until the Sea Peoples destroyed it in 1180 B.C. Its culture was cosmopolitan, so much so that it is difficult to identify those elements that were uniquely Ugaritic. Although it was the capital of a city-state, it was most often under the power or dominating influence of larger states.

The Excavations Although the existence of Ugarit had been known from Mesopotamian and Egyptian documents, its location was uncertain. In 1928 a farmer's discovery of what turned out to be an extensive cemetery just north of Minet el-Beida led in 1929 to excavations in the cemetery and on the tell nearby (Ras Shamra). In that first season of excavations, important texts written in a previously unknown cuneiform script were discovered, one of which mentioned that the document was written during the time of Niqmaddu, king of Ugarit. This was the first indication that the site was indeed ancient Ugarit.

Excavations were carried out annually, 1929-1939, under the direction of C. F. A. Schaeffer. After the hiatus caused by World War II, excavations were resumed and continued on a regular basis through 1976. In addition, adjacent sites have either been surveyed or excavated. The history of the city may now be traced from its earliest beginnings in the pre-pottery Neolithic period (about 6500 B.C.), through the Chalcolithic, early Bronze, and middle Bronze periods, to its complete and final destruction in the late Bronze period soon after 1200 by the Sea Peoples. We have no evidence that the site of Ugarit was ever occupied again, although artifacts from as late as Roman times have been found.

An overview of the ruins of Ugarit at Ras Shamra on the Syrian coast near the Orontes River.

The late-Bronze city of Ugarit, covering about 70 acres, contained the remains of palaces, temples, private dwellings, workshops, storage areas, and fortifications. Temples were found dedicated to Baal and to El; between these buildings was located the house of the high priest and scriptorium. The palaces were located on the northwestern side of the tell. The material culture of late Bronze Ugarit was of the highest order, showing cultural influences from all the surrounding areas.

The most significant discoveries at Ugarit for the study of both history and religion are the discoveries of the epigraphic materials. Clay tablets and other inscriptions representing eight languages have come to light. The majority of these documents consist of economic and administrative texts, private correspondence, and liturgicalreligious texts that represent major mythological themes.

From the first season of excavation, a large number of clay tablets emerged that were written in an unknown script. The new script, used to inscribe texts in the Ugaritic language, was in alphabetic cuneiform consisting of 31 signs, 28 of which were consonants and three of which indicated the letter aleph as used with three different vowels. For the student of the Bible, the religious and mythological texts present a rather full picture of Canaanite religious practice and belief already known from the Bible. The study and evaluation of all the material remains from Ugarit and contiguous sites will continue until the archaeological history can be clarified, until the fullest possible social and political history can be written, and until the full yield of information from the Ugaritic texts has been achieved. See Canaan.

The Religious Texts The poetic mythological texts and poetic legends have elicited the greatest interest because of the information they provide about Canaanite religion. Foremost is the Baal-Anath cycle that has survived in a number of large tablets and smaller fragments. It is difficult to determine the exact story line because there is little agreement on the order of the tablets. The central figure was Baal, the god of storm cloud and rain or the giver of life and fertility, who struggled against his foes in order to gain a dominant position in the pantheon. The head of the pantheon was El who appears in the epic as far removed, almost a god emeritus, although nothing could be accomplished without his approval. Asherah and Anath were the consorts of El and Baal, respectively. Baal's antagonists were Prince Sea (Yam) and Mot (god of the dry season and underworld). Having received permission to build a house (temple), Prince Sea struck fear into the hearts of the gods by demanding that Baal be surrendered to him. Yet Baal defeated Prince Sea in an episode reminiscent of Marduk's defeat of the sea monster, Tiamat, in the Enuma Elish. Then Baal was permitted to build a palace (temple) as a symbol of his new status among the gods. However, Baal's mightiest foe, Mot, defeated Baal, crushing him like a kid in his gullet and taking him down to the netherworld. The world went into mourning. El wept piteously at the news, gashing his back, chest, and arms, while Anath, having found Baal's corpse, put on sackcloth and bewailed the death of the lord of life. Mot boasted of his victory to Anath, whereupon she slew Mot, ground him up, and scattered his remains over the fields. Then came the joyous cry that Baal was alive; the rains came, and the world returned to life. See Babylon.

The excavated areas of Ugarit that have yielded much material about Canaan and Canaanite religion.

The myth was closely related to the cycle of the year and described the ongoing struggles between life and death. While Baal ruled half the year, giving rain and crops, Mot held dominion over the other half—the dry season. Fertility religion consisted in part of various magical and ritual practices designed to bring Baal back to life. Hints of these practices are given in the Baal-Anath cycle. El, upon hearing that Baal was dead, gashed his body: “He harrows the roll of his arm, he plows his chest like a garden, harrows his back like a plain.” Like the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18), he was practicing imitative magic as though preparing the fields to receive the rain. For her part, Anath wept for Baal, the falling tears intended to encourage the rain to fall. In addition to these acts, in actual practice the Canaanites employed sacred prostitution and other imitative practices to restore fertility to the world. See Fertility Cult.

The legend of King Keret and the legend of Aqhat are also related in some way to the fertility cycle. King Keret, having lost his seven wives to various tragedies before they could give him an heir, bewailed his fate. In a dream El told him to attack another kingdom to obtain another wife who could produce an heir. Keret succeeded in this, and eight sons and eight daughters were born to him. However, apparently because of an unfulfilled vow, Keret fell sick; his impending death seemed to affect the fertility of the land. El intervened, death was shattered, and Keret returned to normal life. The full significance of the Keret legend is difficult to determine, whether it is a cultic myth or a social myth with a historical basis, but it does seem to affirm the central role of the king in the fertility of land and people.

The legend of Aqhat also treats the typical elements of the birth of a long-awaited son, the tragedy of death, and the possibility of immortality. Danel's son, Aqhat, was given a composite bow which the goddess Anath coveted. Anath promised Aqhat immortality if he would give her the bow, but Aqhat refused and was killed. The rains then failed for seven years. Aqhat's sister was sent to avenge his death, but the text broke off before the story was completed, leaving unanswered the question whether Aqhat was restored to life and the drought ended. While the connection of the legend with fertility is clear enough, there is no clear consensus on how to interpret the legend.

These myths and legends, together with others like Shachar and Shalim and Nikkal and the Kathirat, may have been used as the spoken parts of annual or periodic rituals. In any case these texts, together with other artifacts, provide a more complete picture of Canaanite religious practice that proved such a temptation to the Israelites (cp. the book of Judges) and against which the prophets protested.

Importance for Old Testament Study The Ugaritic texts and material remains offer OT scholars primary resources for much of their study.

1. Lexicography The Ugaritic texts have provided a welcome resource for clarifying the meanings and nuances of unknown and obscure words and phrases in the OT. Although we must use due caution because of the chronological, geographical, and cultural factors that separate the Ugaritic texts from the OT texts, no scholar today would neglect the linguistic data provided by Ugarit. New readings of biblical texts in the light of Ugaritic grammar, syntax, and lexicon open up innumerable possibilities for new or revised interpretations and translations. Translators now do not hasten so quickly to emend the Hebrew text on the basis of early translations. They look first to Ugaritic evidence.

2. Poetic studies Poetic parallelism, the chief characteristic of Hebrew poetry, is characteristic of Ugaritic poetry as well. Indeed, the study of Ugaritic poetic texts makes one more sensitive to the sophisticated techniques of the psalmists and other poets. Clear Ugaritic cases of chiasmic construction, composite divine names separated within a verse, nouns and verbs serving a double-duty function, characteristic wordpairs, and the analysis of meter by the counting of syllables are helpful in the analysis of Hebrew poetry, especially the Psalms.

3. Religion While about 250 deity names occur in the texts from Ugarit, a much smaller number actually comprised the pantheon. Many of these names are known in the OT: El, Baal, Asherah, Anath, Yarih (moon), Shahr, Shalim, Mot, Dagon, for example. The existence of the divine assembly (Ps. 82; Job 1-2) is attested at Ugarit, especially in the Baal-Anath cycle. The practice of imitative magic in order to manipulate deity and the natural order is mentioned often (cp. 1 Kings 18:28; Jer. 41:5). So too was religious prostitution (cp. Deut. 23:18; Hos. 4:14). All in all, the texts from Ugarit give a rather full picture of the type of fertility religion, characteristic of an agricultural people, which many Israelites adopted in most periods of Israelite history. A comparative study of Hebrew and Ugaritic texts allows one to see the common cultural and religious possessions as well as the distinctive characteristics of each.

ULAI (Ū' lai) Canal connecting the Kerkha and Abdizful Rivers just north of Susa (Dan. 8:2,16).

ULAM (Ū' lam) Personal name meaning “first” or “leader.” 1. Descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:16-17). 2. Leader of a family of Benjaminite archers (1 Chron. 8:39-40).

ULLA (Ūr' la) Personal name meaning “burden” or “yoke.” Descendant of Asher (1 Chron. 7:39). Scholars suggest a variety of emendations.

UMMAH (Ūm' mah) Place-name meaning “kin.” Town in Asher (Josh. 19:30). The name is perhaps a copyist's change from Acco as may be indicated by Greek manuscript evidence.

UNITY State of being undivided; having oneness; a condition of harmony.

Old Testament Central to the faith of Israel is the confession of the unity of God: “Listen, Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is One” (Deut. 6:4 HCSB). Because God is one, one set of laws was to apply to both Israelites and foreigners (Num. 15:16). Human history is a story of sin's disruption of God's ordained unity. God's ideal for marriage is for husband and wife to experience unity of life, “one flesh” (Gen. 2:24). Sin in the garden bred mistrust and accusation (3:12). Stubbornness of will (“hardness” of heart, Mark 10:5) continues to disrupt God's desired unity in marriage. God's ideal for the larger human family is again unity. The primeval unity of humanity (“same language” Gen. 11:1) was likewise disrupted as a result of sinful pride (11:4-8). The prophetic vision of God's future anticipates the day when God will reunite the divided kingdoms of Israel and Judah, bringing back all the scattered exiles (Ezek. 37:15-23). Indeed, the prophetic hope includes the reuniting of all the peoples of the world under the sovereignty of the one Lord (Zech. 14:9).

New Testament Jesus prayed that His disciples would experience unity modeled on the unity that Jesus experienced with the Father (John 17:11,21-23). Such unity verifies Jesus' Godsent mission and the Father's love for the world. Jesus' prayer for unity was realized in the life of the earliest church. The first believers were together in one place; they shared their possessions and were of one heart and soul (Acts 2:1,43; 4:32). As in the OT, sin threatened the God-ordained unity. The selfishness of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1-11), the prejudice of those who neglected the Greek-speaking widows (6:1), the rigidity of those who demanded that Gentiles become Jews before becoming disciples (15:1)—all threatened the unity of the church. In every circumstance, however, the Holy Spirit led the church in working out creative solutions that challenged the church to go beyond dissension to ministry (Acts 6:2-7; 15:6-35). Paul spoke repeatedly of believers as “one body in Christ,” which transcends varieties of giftedness (Rom. 12:5-8; 1 Cor. 12:13,27-30) and human labels (Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:14-15; 3:6). For Paul the unity of the church reflects the unity of the Godhead: one God (1 Cor. 12:6), one Lord (Rom. 10:12; 1 Cor. 12:5; Eph. 4:5), and one Spirit (1 Cor. 12:4,11; Acts 11:17). Christian unity has various aspects: the shared experience of Christ as Lord and confession of Christ in baptism (Eph. 4:5,13); the shared sense of mission (“thinking the same way,” Phil. 2:2 HCSB); the shared concern for one another (1 Cor. 12:25; “same love,” Phil. 2:2; 1 Pet. 3:8); and the shared experience of suffering for Jesus' sake (2 Cor. 1:6; Phil. 1:29-30; 1 Thess. 2:14; 1 Pet. 5:9). Chris Church

UNLEAVENED BREAD Bread baked without using leaven, a substance such as yeast that produces fermentation in dough. Unleavened bread was often served to guests (Gen. 19:3; Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 28:24). The eating of unleavened bread took on special significance through the Feast of Unleavened Bread celebrated in connection with Passover (Exod. 12:8,15,20; 13:3,6-7). See Exodus; Festivals; Passover.

UNNI (Ūn' ni) or UNNO (Ūn' no) Personal name, perhaps meaning “afflicted” or “answered.” 1. Levitical harpist in David's time (1 Chron. 15:18,20). 2. Levite returning from exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:9). The Hebrew Masoretic text reads Unno; the scribal marginal notes (Qere) read Unni.

UNPARDONABLE SIN All three Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 12:31-32; Mark 3:28-29; Luke 12:10) refer to this concept. The context is identical in Matthew and Mark, following an exorcism by Jesus, including the accusation that Jesus casts out demons by Beelzebub's (Satan's) authority. Luke records the saying together with a warning about confessing and denying Jesus before men (Luke 12:8-9). It would be a mistake to equate the “unpardonable sin” with unbelief and equally wrong to interpret it as rejection of the work of the Holy Spirit. Both were true of Paul prior to his conversion. Luke's context is of controversy with the Pharisees (Luke 11:15), with the accusation that Jesus' authority for exorcism came from Beelzebub.

The warning includes the statement that blasphemy against the Son of Man, while a sin, can be forgiven. This would be a rejection of the gospel, the good news of God's salvation in Jesus. In light of the context, the unpardonable sin can be defined as rejecting the power and authority of the Holy Spirit working in Jesus and crediting that authority to Satan. The Pharisee's false accusation prompts the warning, but Jesus never explicitly says that they have crossed the line and committed the unpardonable sin. Perhaps this indicates that the unpardonable sin occurs when one knowingly credits the power and authority of the Holy Spirit to Satan. If so, some Pharisees may or may not have been guilty of making a charge against Jesus that they knew was false.

People could only knowingly give Satan the credit for the working of the Holy Spirit if their hearts were so hardened that they had already irrevocably rejected God's offer of salvation in Jesus Christ. A genuine believer in Christ could never commit this sin. See Blasphemy; Devil, Satan, Evil, Demonic; Holy Spirit; Sin.

UPHARSIN (U phär' sîn) See Mene, Mene, Tekel Upharsin.

UPHAZ (U' pház) Unidentified source of fine gold (Jer. 10:9; Dan. 10:5) or else a term for fine gold. A related Hebrew term is translated “best gold” (1 Kings 10:18; Isa. 13:12). “Uphaz” is possibly a copyist's change for “Ophir” at Jer. 10:9 as indicated by early versions.

The traditional site of the upper room, or Hall of the Coenaculum, in Jerusalem.

UPPER CHAMBER or UPPER ROOM Upstairs room chosen by Jesus in which to hold a final meal with His disciples before His arrest (Mark 14:14-15). Jesus commanded two of His followers to prepare the room and the meal. Tradition holds that the disciples gathered in this room following Jesus' ascension (Acts 1:13). More than a century after Christ's ministry on earth the room believed to be the one in which the meal was eaten was made into a shrine and still is commemorated today. See Chamber.

UR (U) Place-name meaning “fire oven.” An ancient city in lower Mesopotamia that is mentioned as Abraham's birthplace. Ur, Kish, and Uruk were three important population centers in Sumerian and Babylonian civilization. Abraham's family home is alluded to in Gen. 12:1 and Acts 7:2. The site associated with Ur is located in present-day Iraq, in the lower eastern portion of the Fertile Crescent. It is identified with Tell el-Muqayyar some 350 kilometers (220 miles) southeast of Baghdad. The site had an oval shape with harbor facilities on the Euphrates River, until its course shifted 12 miles east from the city's western limit. With the river's shift the city lost both its population and prominence. Other sites have been proposed for the biblical Ur, such as Urartu (Turkey) or Urfa (northwest of Haran). Occupation of Tell el-Muqayyar began about 4000 B.C. and was important in Sumerian, Babylonian, and Neo-Babylonian cultures. The third dynasty of Ur was its most prosperous and highly developed period. Important remains discovered were a ziggurat (a three-stage, stepped pyramid) and royal tombs. This Sumerian site is most probably to be identified as Abraham's city of origin. Yet, as with most identifications, such can be questioned. See Abraham; Babylon; Chaldees; Mesopotamia

URBANE (Ūr' bān)(KJV) or URBANUS (Ūr bā'nūs) Personal name meaning “of the city,” that is, “elegant, refined.” Roman Christian whom Paul greeted as a “co-worker in Christ” (Rom. 16:9 HCSB).

URI (Ūr' n) Personal name meaning “fiery.” 1. Father of the tabernacle artisan Bezalel (Exod. 31:2; 35:30). 2. Father of Geber, one of Solomon's officers charged with providing the royal household food for a month (1 Kings 4:19). 3. Postexilic, Levitical singer with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:24).

URIAH (Ūr' n' ah) Personal name meaning “fire of Yah.” 1. Hittite mercenary or native, perhaps noble Israelite of Hittite ancestry, in David's army (2 Sam. 11), a member of David's elite warriors (23:39). He was the husband of Bathsheba, the woman with whom David committed adultery. The sin led to the eventual murder of Uriah after the king could cover the affair no longer. The Dead Sea Scrolls and Josephus report that Uriah was Joab's weapon-bearer. Uriah displayed more character and morality than did the king. See Bathsheba; David. 2. High priest in Jerusalem temple under King Ahaz who followed the king's instructions in setting up an altar in the temple according to a Syrian pattern (2 Kings 16:10-16). He apparently served as a witness for Isaiah (8:2). 3. Priest in time of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 8:33; Neh. 3:4,21). 4. Person who helped Ezra in informing the people of God's word (Neh. 8:4).

URIEL (U' rī ʾēl) Personal name meaning “God is light” or “flame of God.” 1. Chief of the Levites assisting in David's transport of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 6:24; 15:5,11). 2. Grandfather of King Abijah of Judah (2 Chron. 13:2).

URIJAH (U' rī ʾ jah) Personal name meaning “flame of Yahweh.” Variant spelling of Uriah. 1. Chief priest who complied with Ahab's order to build an Assyrian-style altar for the Jerusalem temple (2 Kings 16:10-16). Ahab likely hoped the incorporation of foreign elements into Israel's worship would impress the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser with his loyalty. 2. Prophet who joined Jeremiah in preaching against Jerusalem. When King Jehoiakim ordered his execution, Urijah fled to Egypt. He was, however, captured, returned to Jerusalem, and executed (Jer. 26:20-23).

URIM AND THUMMIM (U' rīm and Thūm' mīm) Objects Israel, and especially the high priest, used to determine God's will. Little is known about the Urim and Thummim. They are first mentioned in Exodus as being kept by the high priest in a “breastplate of judgment” (Exod. 28:15-30). Later on, Moses gave the tribe of Levi special responsibility for their care (Deut. 33:8). After Aaron's and Moses' death, Eleazar was to carry and to use the lots to inquire of the Lord (Num. 27:18-23). They apparently were two objects that served as sacred lots. That is, they were used to determine God's will or to receive a divine answer to a question. Saul called for their use, for instance, in determining who had broken Saul's vow in a battle with the Philistines (1 Sam. 14:41-45). This text also hints as to how the objects were used. They were “given,” perhaps drawn or shaken, from a bag. One object gave one answer. The other lot gave another answer. Probably, whichever lot came out first, that was understood to be God's answer. The Urim and Thummim were not, however, automatic or mechanical. God could refuse to answer. Saul sought the spirit of Samuel through a witch because God would not answer Saul through the Urim or dreams or prophets (1 Sam. 28:6-25).

The ultimate fate of the Urim and Thummim is unknown. In Nehemiah's time expectation continued that someday a priest would arise with the Urim and Thummim (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65). This probably refers to the ability to receive an answer from the Lord, however, rather than a return of the lots given to Aaron. See High Priest; Inquire of God; Lots; Oracles.

USURY Sum of money charged for a loan. OT laws prohibited a Jew from charging another Jew usury but permitted it when money was loaned to a Gentile (Deut. 23:19-20). Although the word has negative connotations today, it was not so in biblical days when usury simply was the interest charged for a loan. Excessive usury was condemned.

UTHAI (U' thi) Personal name meaning "Yahweh is help" or "He has shown Himself supreme." 1. Postexilic descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 9:4). 2. Head of a family of those returning from exile (Ezra 8:14).

UZ (Uz) Personal name and place-name, perhaps meaning "replacement." 1. Unspecified territory, most likely in Hauran south of Damascus (Jer. 25:20) or else between Edom and northern Arabia (Job 1:1; Lam. 4:21). 2. Descendant of Shem's son Aram (Gen. 10:23; 1 Chron. 1:17) and progenitor of an Aramaean tribe. 3. Descendant of Abraham's brother Nahor (Gen. 22:21). 4. Descendant of Esau (Gen. 36:28) and member of the Horite branch of Edomites.

UZAI (U' zai) Personal name meaning "hoped for" or "he has heard." Father of one helping with Nehemiah's repair of the wall (Neh. 3:25).

UZAL (U' zai) Son of Joktan and ancestor of an Arabian tribe (Gen. 10:27; 1 Chron. 1:21). Scholars have linked the tribe with Izalla in northeastern Syria and Azalla near Medina. Ezekiel 27:19 includes them among Tyre's trading partners.

UZZA (Uz' za) Personal name meaning "strength." 1. Descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:7). 2. Descendant of Levi (1 Chron. 6:29). 3. Head of a family of postexilic temple servants or Nethinims (Ezra 2:49). 4. Owner of the garden in which Manasseh and Amon were buried (2 Kings 21:18,26). 5. Variant English spelling of "Uzzah."

UZZAH (Ūz' zah) Personal name meaning "he is strong." 1. One of the drivers of the cart carrying the ark of the covenant when David began moving it from the house of Abinadab in Gibeah to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:3). When the ark started to slip from the cart, Uzzah put out his hand to steady it, and God struck him dead for touching the holy object (6:6-7). 2. Ancestor of exiles who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 2:49). 3. Name of garden in which kings Manasseh and Ammon were buried. This distinguished them from other kings who "slept with their fathers," that is, were buried in the royal tomb. Uzzah may have been a noble who owned the garden burial plot or may have been a variant spelling of the Canaanite god Attar-melek. 4. Member of tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:7). 5. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:29).

UZZEN-SHEERAH (Ūz zən-she' ə rah) Placename meaning "ear of Sheerah." Village which Ephraim's daughter, Sheerah, founded (1 Chron. 7:24). The site is perhaps Beit Sira, three miles south of lower Beth-horon.

UZZI (Ūz' zi) Personal name; an abbreviated form of "Yahweh is my strength." 1. Aaronic priest (1 Chron. 6:5-6,51; Ezra 7:4). 2. Family of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2-3).

3. Descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7; 9:8).

4. Overseer of Jerusalem Levites after the exile (Neh. 11:22). 5. Postexilic priest (Neh. 12:19). 6. Musician involved in Nehemiah's dedication of Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 12:42).

UZZIA (Ūz zi' ə) Personal name meaning "Yahweh is strong." One of 16 whom the Chronicler added to the list of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:44).

UZZIAH (Ūz zi' ah) Personal name meaning "Yahweh is [my] strength." 1. Descendant of Levi (1 Chron. 6:24). 2. Father of one of David's treasurers (1 Chron. 27:25). 3. Also known as Azariah (2 Kings 15:1,6-8,17,23,27); son and successor of King Amaziah of Judah. "All the people of Judah" declared Uzziah king when he was 16 (2 Kings 14:21; 2 Chron. 26:1). Some conjecture that the Judeans, rather than have King Joash of Israel install a puppet king, put Uzziah forward as king following Amaziah's defeat and subsequent imprisonment by Joash (2 Chron. 25:21-24). According to this reconstruction, Uzziah began his reign about 792 B.C. and continued as joint regent after his father's release upon the death of Joash (2 Chron. 25:25). Uzziah's reign was a time of great material prosperity for Judah. Uzziah mounted a successful campaign against the Philistines, destroying the walls of some of their chief cities, Gath, Jabneh, and Ashdod. To secure the caravan route along the Mediterranean coast (Via Maris), Uzziah built cities, perhaps military outposts, in the vicinity of Ashdod and at other sites on the Philistine plain (2 Chron. 26:6). To secure the eastern caravan route (the King's Highway), Uzziah rebuilt Elat (Elath), the strategic port on the Gulf of Aqaba (26:2) and campaigned against the Arabs of Gurbaal (possibly Gur east of Beersheba), the Meunites (a branch of Edomites), and the Ammonites (2 Chron. 26:7-8). Uzziah refortified the walls of Jerusalem with towers (2 Chron. 26:9; cp. 25:23). His construction of numerous cisterns and military outposts in the wilderness (the Arad Negev) made widespread settlement possible. Archaeological evidence confirms that construction in the Negev flourished during Uzziah's reign. Uzziah was a lover of the soil who promoted agriculture (2 Chron. 26:10). Unlike his predecessors who relied on the troops to supply their own arms, Uzziah armed his troops with the most advanced weapons (2 Chron. 26:11-15). Uzziah is not so much remembered as the leader who brought Judah to a golden age rivaling David's and Solomon's empires but as the "leper king." The brief account of Uzziah's reign in 2 Kings 15:1-7 portrays the king as one who did what "was right in the Lord's eyes" (15:3 HCSB). No explanation for the king's affliction is given in Kings other than "the LORD afflicted the king" (15:5). The Chronicler traced Uzziah's leprosy to his prideful attempt to usurp the priestly prerogative of offering incense in the temple (2 Chron. 26:16-20; cp. Num. 16:1-40; 1 Sam. 13:8-15). Thereafter, his son Jotham reigned in his stead, though Uzziah likely remained the power behind the throne (26:21). As a leper, Uzziah was denied burial in the royal tombs at Jerusalem. Rather, he was buried in a field (26:23). 4. Postexilic priest with a foreign wife (Ezra 10:21). 5. Descendant of Judah and father of a postexilic resident of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:4). Chris Church

UZZIEL (Ūz' zī ʾil) Personal name meaning “God is strength.” 1. Descendant of Levi (Exod. 6:18; Num. 3:19; 1 Chron. 6:2,18) and ancestor of a subdivision of Levites, the Uzzielites (Num. 3:27; 1 Chron. 15:10; 26:23). 2. One captain in the successful Simeonite attack on the Amalekites of Mount Seir (1 Chron. 4:42). 3. Descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7). 4. Levitical musician (1 Chron. 25:4). 5. Levite involved in Hezekiah's reform (2 Chron. 29:14). 6. Goldsmith assisting in Nehemiah's repair of the Jerusalem walls (Neh. 3:8).

UZZIELITE (Ūz zē' ʾil) Member of Levitical clan of Uzziel.

VAIN Self-conceit, usually a translation of a number of words that mean “nothingness” or “unreliability.” In relation to God, trying to thwart His will is vain (Ps. 2:1; Acts 4:25). Trying to do things without God's help is vain (Ps. 127:1). We are warned not to take God's name in vain (as though it were nothing) in the Ten Commandments (Exod. 20: 7; Deut. 5:11). Mark warned that believers are not to give God vain lip service but obedience from the heart (Mark 7:6-7; Isa. 1:13; 29:13; James 1:26).

VAIZATHA (Vī' zá thá) or VAJEZATHA (Vá jēz' á thá) Persian personal name, perhaps meaning “the son of the atmosphere.” One of Haman's 10 sons the Jews killed after Esther gained permission to retaliate against Haman's deadly plan (Esther 9:9).

VALLEY Depression between mountains, a broad plain or plateau, a narrow ravine, or a low terrain. “Valleys” of varying shapes and sizes mark Palestine's landscape.

Five Hebrew terms are designated “valley” in the OT. Biqe'ah is a broad plain (Gen. 11:2; Isa. 41:18). Gaye' is a deep ravine, gorge, or valley (Isa. 40:4; Zech. 14:4). Nachalis awadi, that is, the bed of a stream that is often dry (Num. 34:5; Ezek. 48:28). Emeq is a long, broad sweep between parallel ranges of hills (Num. 14:25; Josh. 8:13; Jer. 21:13). Shephelah is the low land, plain, or slope sweeping gently down from mountains (Deut. 10:1; Josh. 9:1; Jer. 17:26). One Greek term, pharanx, is used in the NT for each of these.

The western edge of the Jordan Valley from the top of OT Jericho.

“Valley” is often used symbolically to refer to the difficulties of life. The classic example of this is Ps. 23:4. All people go through these trials, but God is present with His people, protecting them during these times. See Palestine.

VANIAH (Và ni' ah) Personal name possibly meaning “worthy of love.” Man who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:36).

VASHNI (Vâsh' ni) Personal name, perhaps meaning “weak.” Samuel's son according to Hebrew text of 1 Chron. 6:28 (KJV), which reads literally, “And sons of Samuel the firstborn Vashni and Ab iah.” Modern translations and commentators follow 1 Sam. 8:2 and manuscripts of early versions, taking Vashni as a copyist's change from the similar Hebrew word for “the second” and inserting “Joel.”

VASHTI (Vāsh' tī) Personal name meaning “the once desired, the beloved.” Wife of King Ahasuerus and queen of Persia and Media (Esther 1:9). The king called for her to show off her beauty to a group he was entertaining, but she refused. Vashti was deposed as queen (1:19), and a beauty contest was arranged to select a new queen. Esther was chosen as the new queen (2:16). No records yet have been recovered that name Vashti as the queen of any king of the Medo-Persian Empire, leading some to speculate whether she was a historical person. The only other queen with Ahasuerus (also called Xerxes) was named Amestris. See Ahasuerus; Esther; Persia; Xerxes.

VEIL [KJV “vail”] Cloth covering. 1. Womens' veils Rebekah veiled herself before meeting Isaac (Gen. 24:65). Her veil was perhaps the sign that she was a marriageable maiden. Tamar used her veil to conceal her identity from Judah (Gen. 38:14,19). Another Hebrew term renders “veil” at Isa. 3:23. Here veils are but one of the items of finery which the elite women of Jerusalem would lose in the coming siege. The same Hebrew term is rendered “shawl” (NASB), “cloak” (HCSB, NIV, REB), and “mantle” (KJV, NRSV) at Song 5:7. There, removal of the shawl was part of a humiliating assault on the king's beloved. At Isa. 47:2 the removal of one's veil is again a sign of shamelessness. Paul regarded the wearing of veils as necessary for women praying or preaching (“prophesying”) in public (1 Cor. 11:4-16). 2. Moses' veil Moses spoke to God with his face unveiled and then delivered God's message to the people with his face still unveiled. Afterwards Moses veiled his face (Exod. 34:33-35). For Paul, Moses' practice illustrated the superiority of the new covenant: Christians see the abiding splendor of the era of the Spirit and God-given righteousness; Israel saw the fading splendor of the era of death reflected in Moses' face (2 Cor. 3:7-11). Moses' veil further illustrated the mental barrier preventing Israel from recognizing Christ in the OT (3:12-15). Through faith in Christ the veil is removed, and believers enjoy free access to God who transforms life (3:15-18). 3. Imagery The “veil which is stretched over the nations” (Isa. 25:7 NASB) is likely an image for death which is also swallowed up (25:8).

The veil possibly includes reproach as well. 4. Temple veil This curtain separated the most holy place from the holy place (2 Chron. 3:14). Only the high priest was allowed to pass through the veil and then only on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:2). At Jesus' death the temple veil was ripped from top to bottom, illustrating that in Christ God had abolished the barrier separating humanity from the presence of God (Matt. 27:51; Mark 15:38; cp. Luke 23:45). Hebrews 10:20 uses the tabernacle veil, not as the image of a barrier but of access. Access to God is gained through the flesh of the historical Jesus (cp. John 10:7). Chris Church

VENGEANCE English word used principally to translate several Hebrew words in the OT, which are constructed on the stem nqm, from which the most recurring form, naqam, means “to avenge,” “to take vengeance,” “to be avenged,” or “to be punished.” The English word “vengeance” also translates the Greek word ekdikeo and its cognate forms. This Greek term was used to translate the Hebrew words for “vengeance” in the Septuagint, the earliest Greek rendering of the Hebrew OT. The Law (Pentateuch) was translated around 250 B.C. The other parts of the OT were translated later.

Old Testament Behind the Hebrew usage of naqam stood the awareness that Israel's sense of community solidarity and integrity had been damaged by the nation's enemies. The restoration of community integrity seems to have expected some deed(s) of retaliation or punishment by God. The range of meanings in this community motif go beyond “vengeance” as punishment. They include the positive side as well, “vengeance” as “deliverance” for the people of God.

Human revenge against one's enemies is expressed in a variety of situations in the OT (Gen. 4:23-24; Jer. 20:10). Thus, Samson's reaction to his enemies was described as “vengeance” in Judg. 15:7. Such “vengeance” was a just punishment directed at an adulterer (Prov. 6:32-34). It might also be directed against a whole ethnic group like the Philistines (1 Sam. 18:25). Sometimes, this human “vengeance” is sought against Israel by her enemies (Ezek. 25:12,15,17).

In the context of loving one's neighbor, human revenge toward a fellow Hebrew was strictly forbidden (Lev. 19:17-18; Deut. 32:35). On occasion, however, the word naqam was used of legitimate punishment administered by humans on humans for wrongs having been done (Exod. 21:20,23-25; Lev. 24:19; Deut. 19:21). As an act of God on behalf of His people, the term is best understood as just retribution (Judg. 11:36) rather than emotion-driven vengeance.

In support of this usage, David was often the recipient of such favor (2 Sam. 4:8; 22:48; Ps. 18:47). Vengeance is used in this same manner in the prayers of Jeremiah (Jer. 11:20; 15:15; 20:12) and of the psalmist (Pss. 58:10; 79:10; 94:1). In several of these passages deliverance is the apparent intent, a positive motivation for vengeance. Ultimately, the intended deliverance has an eschatological dimension. God is preserving Israel for an eternal reason, an eschatological deliverance to be made available to all people. The equating of the “day of vengeance” and the “year of (His) redemption” in Isa. 34:8 seems to support that conclusion.

New Testament Primary Greek word translated “vengeance” in the NT is ekdikeo, a verb (used five times in cognate forms). Its noun form, ekdikesis, is used nine times, ekdikos, an adjective/pronoun form, meaning “one who is vengeful,” twice. The motif of “vengeance” in the NT occurs infrequently and is kept in perspective by a strong emphasis on “compassion” and “forgiveness.”

Interestingly, Luke is the only Gospel writer who used both the verb and noun forms. He used them in Jesus' parable of the unjust judge/ persistent widow. Vengeance against her enemies was reluctantly granted (Luke 18:1-8). Another Lukan use of this word is found in Luke 21:22, reflexive of Isa. 63:4, where the eschatological dimension is in focus. Luke finally used the term for God's vengeance in Stephen's speech in Acts 7:34.

Paul forbade human “vengeance” much like Deut. 32:35 (cp. Lev. 19:18), asserting that God is the one who avenges wrong (Rom. 12:19; 1 Thess. 4:6-7). He utilized both the noun and verb forms in the Corinthian correspondence to speak of a “punishment” designed to bring about repentance (2 Cor. 7:10-11; 10:5-6). He also wrote of the eschatological wrath (vengeance/judgment) of God (2 Thess. 1:7-8; cp. Isa. 66:15; Ps. 79:6). See Avenger; Wrath, Wrath of God. Don Stewart

VENISON Flesh of a wild animal taken by hunting (Gen. 25:28; “game,” NASB, NRSV; “wild game,” NIV, HCSB). The word is only used in the narrative of Jacob's stealing Esau's birthright. Isaac preferred Esau because of his love of wild game.

VENOM Poisonous secretion from an animal such as a snake, spider, or scorpion that is released into its victim by a bite or sting. Venom is a translation of ro'sh (Deut. 32:33; Job 20:16). The same Hebrew term is used for a dangerous, poisonous plant (Deut. 29:18; Hos. 10:4, among others). See Poison.

VESPASIAN (Vēs pā' zhán) Emperor of Rome A.D. 69-79. He was born into a wealthy family and became a military hero as commander of a legion under Emperor Claudius. After becoming commander of three legions, he was ordered to quell the Jewish revolt in Palestine in A.D. 66. Three years into the war, he answered the call of the army to become emperor. Vespasian left his command to his son, Titus, and went to Rome. He sought to establish a dynasty, but it lasted only through his two sons, Titus and Domitian. See Caesar; Rome and the Roman Empire; Titus, Caesar.

VESSELS AND UTENSILS Implements or containers ordinarily used in, for example, the temple service or household activities. Vessels are utensils designed for holding dry or liquid products. A number of vessels and other utensils are mentioned in the Bible.

Vessel Materials Vessels in biblical times were made of a variety of materials. As early as 3000 B.C. cups and goblets of precious metals were made by silversmiths and goldsmiths throughout the Near East. These were used for religious service (Num. 7:13,19; 1 Chron. 28:17; 2 Chron. 4:8; Ezra 1:9-10; 8:27) or by persons of great wealth or authority (Gen. 44:2). Copper and bronze vessels were also known (Exod. 27:3; Lev. 6:28).

Metalware has been found in abundance in the lands of the Bible. Although palaces and temples often had vessels made of gold or silver, by far the most common material for metalware was an alloy of copper and tin called bronze. Pure copper rarely was used.

Many containers, both large and small, were made of stone. Alabaster was easily carved and polished. It was especially prized for storage of perfumes (Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3-4; Luke 7:37). According to rabbinical writings, stone containers were not susceptible to ritual uncleanness. Thus, a sizable industry existed in Jerusalem of NT times for making a variety of stone vessels. Excavations there have produced examples of all sizes and types, from large stone jars (John 2:6) turned on a lathe to cups carved by hand. By NT times glass was becoming widely used for juglets and bottles.

Baskets, made from reeds, were inexpensive containers that could be used for transportation and sometimes storage. Water or wine bottles were frequently made from animal skins (Josh. 9:4,13; Judg. 4:19; 1 Sam. 1:24; 10:3; 2 Sam. 16:1; Neh. 5:18; Job 32:19; Ps. 119:83; Matt. 9:17; Mark 2:22; Luke 5:37). Such leather vessels were popular among nomadic peoples for their durability.

Wood was used to produce storage boxes and bowls. Boxes were made by nailing together planks, whereas bowls usually were hollowed from single pieces of wood. More wooden containers have been found in Egypt partly because the climate is more conducive to their preservation than other parts of the Middle East.

By far the most widely used material for vessels was clay, which was cheap and readily available. Indeed, pottery or “earthenware vessels” (Num. 5:17; Jer. 32:14) were among the most common objects made in antiquity. The earliest ceramics, beginning before 5000 B.C., were handmade and somewhat crude. Though making pottery by hand continued, wheel-made pottery was predominant by Israelite times.

The abundance of pottery and widespread familiarity with the process of its manufacture provided object lessons for understanding spiritual truths. Isaiah referred several times to potters and their products. He likened the fury of God's chosen instruments to a potter treading clay (Isa. 41:25). Israel is compared to a potter's vessel that, when broken, will not yield a single useful fragment (Isa. 30:14). For Isaiah the potter's work demonstrated the sovereignty of the Creator (Isa. 45:9). Paul took up the same analogy to make a point about election (Rom. 9:20-21): the potter can make any sort of vessel he chooses. Jeremiah also allegorically related a potter and his work to God, who molded His people Israel (the clay) and is able to rework a spoiled product (Jer. 18:1-6). A completed clay vessel was used by the prophet to announce the fate of Jerusalem, which like the vessel would be irreparably smashed (Jer. 19:1-2,10-11).

The fragments, or sherds, of a broken pottery vessel are extremely hard (cp. Job 41:30) and thus remain forever. They are found in enormous quantities at every Near Eastern archaeological mound or tell and were quite familiar to biblical persons. Job, for example, used a handy potsherd to scrape his sores (2:8). The ubiquitous sherds served as symbols of dryness (Ps. 22:15) and useless remnants (Isa. 30:14). See Glass; Pottery; Potsherd.

Types of Vessels The OT sometimes refers to pottery by a generic term translated “earthen(ware) vessel” (Lev. 6:28; 11:33; 14:5,50; Num. 5:17; Jer. 32:14; NIV “clay jar”). Only two types of vessels are specifically designated as pottery, “earthen pitchers” (Lam. 4:2) and “earthen bottle” (Jer. 19:1). Nevertheless, other common vessels mentioned in the Bible were presumably made of clay as well. The terms, especially for the OT, are not entirely clear and are variously rendered even within the same English translation.

One of the most common and basic pottery forms was the bowl. Large mixing and serving bowls or basins (Exod. 24:6 HCSB, NRSV, “basins”; Song 7:2 NIV, “goblet”; Isa. 22:24 NRSV, “cups”), called “kraters” by archaeologists, generally had handles in the Israelite period. A different Hebrew word identifies similar, perhaps smaller, serving bowls (Judg. 5:25; 6:38). Sprinkling bowls (Num. 7:84-85; HCSB, NRSV, “basins”) were usually of metal. A generic word for bowl designates the silver vessels used in the dedication of the altar (Num. 7:84; NASB, “dishes”; NRSV, NIV, “plates”). The main “dish” (2 Kings 21:13; Prov. 19:24; 26:15 NRSV; Matt. 26:23) at meals was actually a medium-sized handleless bowl. It was evidently large enough to use for boiling (2 Chron. 35:13; NRSV, NIV, “pans”). Smaller versions were used for other purposes (2 Kings 2:20). Plates did not become common until NT times. Cups in the modern sense also were virtually unknown in OT times. Three Hebrew words so translated (Gen. 40:11; Isa. 51:17,22; Jer. 35:5; Zech. 12:2) refer to small bowls. Joseph's silver “cup” (Gen. 44:2, 12,16-17) was probably a goblet or chalice. NT cups (Luke 11:39) remained bowl-like and varied in size.

A special bowl-like trough was used for kneading dough in bread making (Exod. 8:3; 12:34; Deut. 28:5,17). Other special bowls served as firepots for holding coals (Zech. 12:6). Lamps in the OT were essentially bowls for oil whose rims were pinched in to hold a wick. By NT times lamps (Matt. 25:1; Mark 4:21) were molded in two parts forming a covered bowl with central opening to which a handmade spout was added. See Lamps, Lighting, Lampstand.

“Pot” in the OT (Exod. 16:3; Num. 11:8; 2 Kings 4:38-41; Job 41:20,31; NIV, “caldron”) generally translates several Hebrew words which designate cooking pots. In pre-Israelite times these were similar to deep bowls without handles. Israelite cooking pots of the monarchy period usually had two handles and were more closed. A more globular shape with a short neck and smaller mouth also developed. NT cooking pots were similar but smaller and more delicate with thin straplike handles. Cooking pots required clay tempered with various grit materials to withstand the expansion of extreme heating and cooling. They were produced in graduated sizes much like their modern counterparts.

Another basic vessel type in antiquity was the storejar, a tall oval or pear-shaped jar usually having two or four handles. The top was closed with an appropriately shaped potsherd or by a clay stopper. Jars were used for storage of flour or meal (1 Kings 17:14) or for transport and storage of liquid rations such as water (Mark 14:13; HCSB, “water jug”; KJV, “pitcher”; John 4:28 KJV, “waterpot”). A smaller jar was used for storing oil (2 Kings 4:2; KJV, “pot”; NIV, “a little”). Storejars were often designed to hold standard measures, a common size in the OT period being two baths, averaging 25 inches high and 16 inches in diameter. Typical storejars had rounded, almost pointed bases and were placed in stands, holes in wood planks, or pressed into soft ground. A special type was shaped like a cylinder with no handles and a ribbed rim.

Jugs or pitchers (1 Kings 14:3; KJV, “cruse”; Jer. 19:1,10; KJV, “bottle”; 35:5; KJV, “pots”) were smaller than storejars and generally had a single handle attached to the neck and shoulder. There were wide and narrow-necked varieties, the former being more likely to have a pinched rim forming a slight spout. A variation on the jug was the pilgrim flask, a flattened bottle with twin handles around a thin neck that functioned like a canteen. Saul may have used one of these (1 Sam. 26:11-12; NRSV, “jar”), but the same Hebrew word (1 Kings 17:14) can refer to the smaller juglet. Juglets with round or oblong bodies, a single handle, and small necks and openings are well-known to archaeologists who work in the Holy Land. They were used for dipping liquids out of large jars and keeping oil (1 Sam. 10:1; NRSV, “vial”; NIV, “flask”; 2 Kings 9:3; NRSV, NIV, “flask”). NT versions (variously translated) are mentioned as containers for oil (Matt. 25:4) and, in alabaster, for perfume (Matt. 26:7).

By the time Rome conquered Palestine in 63 B.C., a new type of cylindrical jar with angular to rounded shoulders appeared. It had a ring base and a rim made to receive a lid. This type vessel made an excellent storage jar for solids, especially scrolls. The famous Dead Sea Scrolls were kept in these finely crafted containers for almost 2,000 years.

Utensils A general word for utensils (KJV, “vessels” or “furniture”) is often used in the OT as a collective term for the gold and bronze articles used in the tabernacle service (Exod. 25:39; 27:3,19; 30:27-28; NIV, “accessories,” “utensils,” or “articles”). These included snuffers, trays, shovels, pots, basins, forks, firepans, hooks, and the like. The same word is used of utensils used in the temple service (1 Chron. 9:28-29; 2 Chron. 24:14-19; Jer. 27:18-21; NIV, “articles” or “furnishings”) and for household articles (1 Kings 10:21; 2 Chron. 9:20; NRSV, “vessels”).

Common household utensils included items for cooking. In OT times grain was ground by hand (Exod. 11:5; Isa. 47:2) using grindstones usually made of basalt, a hard volcanic stone with many cavities that made natural cutting edges. In the Roman world of the NT, large examples of millstones were common; the heavy upper stones (Matt. 18:6; Mark 9:42; Luke 17:2; Rev. 18:21) required animals or two persons (Matt. 24:41) to operate. Smaller grinding and crushing chores were done with a mortar and pestle (Num. 11:8; Prov. 27:22). See Cooking and Heating.

Eating utensils are not usually found in excavations and were probably made of wood. Knives (Gen. 22:6; Judg. 19:29; Prov. 30:14) for various purposes were made of flint (Josh. 5:2-3), copper, bronze, or iron. See Archaeology; Tools.

VIA DOLOROSA (Vī ā Dō lō rō sá) Literally, “way of suffering.” Christian pilgrims from the time of the Crusaders have retraced the alleged path of Jesus from the Fortress of Antonia to the cross. This journey assumes the trial took place at the Antonian Fortress, which is debatable. Even if the fortress was the location of Jesus' trial before Pilate, the centuries of remains have filled in and changed the streets from Jesus' time. Thus, the 14 “stations” of the cross are traditional rather than authentic. Franciscan monks follow the “way of suffering” in an organized procession on Friday afternoons, stopping at each of the 14 stations. Several of the stations are based on “legend” and have no foundation in the biblical accounts. The final five stations of the Via Dolorosa are located inside the Church of the Holy Sepulcher.

One of the stations on the Via Dolorosa (“the Way of Suffering,” or “the Way of the Cross”) in Jerusalem.

The 14 stations are: (1) Jesus is condemned to death, (2) Jesus receives the cross, (3) Jesus falls for the first time, (4) He meets His mother Mary, (5) Simon is enlisted to carry the cross, (6) Jesus' face is wiped by Veronica, (7) Jesus falls for a second time, (8) Jesus speaks to the women of Jerusalem, (9) He falls for a third time, (10) He is stripped of His clothing, (11) Jesus is nailed to the cross, (12) Jesus dies on the cross, (13) He is taken down from the cross, (14) Jesus is placed in the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea.

VIAL Vessel that held oil, usually for anointing purposes (1 Sam. 10:1 KJV, NRSV; NASB, NIV, “flask”). The same word is used a number of times in the book of Revelation (5:8; 15:7; 16:1-4,8,10,12,17; 17:1; 21:9; HCSB, NASB, NIV, NRSV, “bowls”). See Anoint; Oil; Vessels and Utensils.

VILLAGE OT distinguishes between city and village. The city was usually walled and much larger, while the village was characterized by no wall and usually homes consisting of one room (Lev. 25:29,31). The village had little or no organized government. Archaeology shows Israelite villages built around the circumference with house walls joining to form the only defense system and open community space left in the middle. Many villages had 20 to 30 houses. The cattle were kept in the inner open space where grain was stored. The main job in the villages was farming. Small craft manufacturing was practiced. Usually a common threshing floor was available. Shepherds often gathered around villages. The pastureland was seen as the possession of the village (1 Chron. 6:54-60). See Agriculture; Cities and Urban Life; House.

VINE Any plant having a flexible stem supported by creeping along a surface or by climbing a natural or artificial support. While ancient Israel grew different types of plants that produced vines, such as cucumbers and melons (Num. 11:5; Isa. 1:8), the word “vine” almost always refers to the grapevine or vineyard. The climate of Palestine was well suited for growing vineyards. Along with the olive and fig trees, the grapevine is used throughout the OT to symbolize the fertility of the land (Deut. 6:11; Josh. 24:13; 1 Sam. 8:14; 2 Kings 5:26; Jer. 5:17; 40:10; Hos. 2:12).

The origin of viticulture lies in the antiquity of the unknown past. The Bible traces the origin of caring for vineyards to the time of Noah (Gen. 9:20-21). Such knowledge seems to have been an indigenous undertaking known in many regions of the ancient world. References to vineyards appear from the time of Gudea (a ruler in ancient Sumer before 2100 B.C.). A wall painting found in a tomb at Thebes in Egypt, dating from before 1400 B.C., depicts the entire process of wine making from the gathering and treading of the grapes to the storing of the wine in jars.

The planting and care of a vineyard required constant and intensive care. The most detailed description of the work involved is found in Isa. 5:1-6. Hillsides are frequently mentioned as the most desirable locations for the vines, especially since they were less suitable for other forms of agriculture (cp. Ps. 80:8-10; Jer. 31:5; Amos 9:13). However, vineyards were also grown in the plains and valleys; the Hebron area was particularly noted for its grapes (Num. 13:22-24).

Stone walls and/or hedges were usually built around the vineyard to protect the grapes from thirsty animals and from thieves (Song 2:15; Jer. 49:9). Watchtowers were also built to provide further protection. The hewing out of a winepress or vat completed the vineyard installation (Isa.

5:2). During the harvesting season the owner of the vineyard might live in a booth to stay close to his valuable crop (Isa. 1:8).

After the grapes had set on the branches, the vines were pruned (Lev. 25:4; Isa. 18:5; John 15:1-2). This process produced stronger branches and a greater fruit yield. The pruned branches were useless except to be used as fuel (Ezek. 15:2-8). The vines for the most part were allowed to run on the ground, though occasionally they might climb a nearby tree (cp. Ps. 80:8-10; Ezek. 15:2; 19:11). Perhaps it was this latter occurrence that made it possible for a man to “sit under” his vine (1 Kings 4:25). Only in the Roman period were artificial trellises introduced.

Grapes growing on the vine.

The harvest of the grapes took place in August or September. How many grapes an average vineyard produced is unknown (cp. Isa. 5:10), but a vineyard was considered so important that a man who had planted one was exempt from military service (Deut. 20:6). Some of the harvested grapes were eaten fresh (Jer. 31:29) and others dried into raisins (1 Sam. 25:18). Most were squeezed for their juice to make wine.

Several laws governed the use of vineyards in OT times. Vineyards could not be stripped totally of their grapes; the owner was to allow gleanings for the poor and the sojourner (Lev. 19:10), as well as the fatherless and the widow (Deut. 24:21). Vineyards were to lie fallow every seventh year (Exod. 23:10-11; Lev. 25:3-5), and other plants could not be sown in them (Deut. 22:9). This latter law apparently was not followed by NT times (cp. Luke 13:6). Vineyards were cultivated by their owner or hired laborers (Matt. 20:1-16), or rented out to others (Song 8:11; Matt. 21:33-43). See Gleaning.

The Bible frequently uses vine or vineyard as a symbol. Vine is often used in speaking of Israel. Thus Israel is said to have been brought out of Egypt and planted as a vine on the land but was forsaken (Ps. 80:8-13; cp. Isa. 5:1-7). Israel was planted a “choice vine” but became a “wild vine” (Jer. 2:21; cp. Hos. 10:1). As the dead wood of a vine is good for nothing but fuel, so the inhabitants of Jerusalem would be consumed (Ezek. 15:1-8; 19:10-14).

On the other hand, the abundance of vines and vineyards was seen as an expression of God's favor. The fruit of the vine gladdens the heart of mankind (Ps. 104:15; Eccles. 10:19) and suppresses pain and misery (Prov. 31:6-7). Israel was “like grapes in the wilderness” when God found them (Hos. 9:10), and the remnant surviving the exile is compared to a cluster of grapes (Isa. 65:8). Finally, an abundance of the vine symbolizes the glorious age to come when the treader of the grapes will overtake the one who sows the seed (Amos 9:13-15; cp. Gen. 49:10-12).

In the NT Jesus often used the vineyard as an analogy for the kingdom of God (Matt. 20:1-16). Those who hope to enter the kingdom must be like the son who at first refused to work in his father's vineyard but later repented and went (Matt. 21:28-32 and parallels). Ultimately, Jesus Himself is described as the “true vine” and His disciples (Christians) as the branches (John 15:1-11). See Agriculture; Eschatology; Israel; Wine, Winepress. John C. H. Laughlin

VINEGAR Literally, “that which is soured,” related to Hebrew term for “that which is leavened” and referring to a drink that has soured, either wine or beer from barley (Num. 6:3). In biblical times vinegar was most commonly produced by pouring water over the skins and stalks of grapes after the juice had been pressed out and allowing the whole to ferment. However, any fruit could be used for making wine or vinegar. Vinegar in two forms was forbidden to the Nazirite because of its association with strong drink (Num. 6:3). It irritates the teeth (Prov. 10:26) and neutralizes soda (Prov. 25:20). It was an unpleasant drink (Ps. 69:21), though some sopped bread in it (Ruth 2:14); some see this as the common Near Eastern chickpea paste called chimmuts. In the NT it is mentioned only in connection with the crucifixion. The first instance, which Jesus refused, was a mixture used to deaden the sense of the victim and nullify the pain. Possibly the vinegar mentioned in the second instance, which Christ accepted, was the customary drink of a peasant or soldier called posca, a mixture of vinegar, water, and eggs.

Vinegar was most commonly used as a seasoning for food or as a condiment on bread (Ruth 2:14). Solomon figuratively used vinegar to describe the irritation caused by a lazy man's attitude. See Wine. C. Dale Hill

VIOLENCE One of many terms for sin in the OT. The Hebrew word often translated “violence” (chamas) occurs 60 times in the OT. All such “violence” is ultimately directed against God (Ezek. 22:26; Zeph. 3:4). But it usually also involves what has been described as “cold-blooded and unscrupulous infringement of the personal rights of others, motivated by greed and hate and often making use of physical violence and brutality.” It sometimes includes false accusation (Ps. 27:12) and usually describes those who are strong doing wrong or injury to the weak (Ps. 72:14; Isa. 53:9; Jer. 22:3; Mic. 6:12). So it can often be equated with oppression and does not necessarily involve physical action.

The word is also one of many in the OT used to describe human wickedness in a somewhat general sense and is the sin charged against corrupt mankind before the flood (Gen. 6:11,13). There and almost everywhere the Greek translation of the OT rendered chamas with terms meaning “unrighteousness,” “lawlessness,” or “ungodliness.” Chamas is the charge against the Edomites, who were arch villains of Israel and of God (Joel 3:19; Obad. 10), the people of Nineveh (Jon. 3:8), and even Israel when they were ripe for judgment (Hab. 1:3,9). As such it is found closely related to words such as sin, iniquity, pride, malice, wickedness, and especially oppression (Pss. 12:5; 55:11; 73:8; Isa. 59:6-7; 60:18; Jer. 6:6-7; 20:8; Ezek. 45:9; Amos 3:9-10; Hab. 2:17). “Violent men” are also described (HCSB) as “wicked” (Ps. 140:4; Prov. 3:33), “evil” (Ps. 140:1), “worthless” (Prov. 16:27), and “contrary” (16:28).

The opposite of committing “violence” would be bestowing “blessings,” “good,” “salvation,” “praise,” “right,” and especially “peace” and “justice” (Prov. 10:6; 13:2; Isa. 59:6,8; 60:18; Amos 3:10; Hab. 1:2-3). The word in Mal. 2:16 should probably be translated “unrighteousness” or “injustice.” In Ps. 73:6 the arrogant and wicked are said to be clothed with violence like a garment, which means it is a characteristic of their lives and they practice it shamelessly (cp. also Jer. 2:34).

The term “violence” is less frequent in the NT. Matthew 11:12 (“From the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven has been suffering violence, and the violent have been seizing it by force,” HCSB) is difficult to translate. It seems to speak of the world's opposition to Jesus and the kingdom of God (also Luke 16:16). Those who are citizens of the kingdom, on the other hand, are commanded to avoid unnecessary conflict (1 Tim. 3:3; 2 Tim. 2:24; Titus 3:2; James 4:1).

VIOLET See Blue; Colors.

VIPER Poisonous snake. Several species of snakes are called vipers, and the various words used in the Bible for them probably do not designate specific types. Some scholars take the OT references to refer to the Echis colorata. Jesus spoke of the wicked religious leaders as vipers (Matt. 3:7) because of their venomous attacks on Him and their evil character in leading the people astray. Paul was bitten by a viper (Acts 28:3) but suffered no ill effect from it.

VIRGIN, VIRGIN BIRTH The event that initiated the incarnation of Christ whereby He was supernaturally conceived in the womb of a virgin without the participation of a human father.

Old Testament Among the few OT prophecies that allude to Christ's birth (e.g., Mic. 5:2), the only one that the NT interprets as a reference to a virginal conception is in Isaiah (Isa. 7:14; Matt. 1:23). During the reign of Ahaz over the Southern Kingdom of Judah, Isaiah foretold that a virgin would conceive and give birth to a son whose name would be Immanuel (Isa. 7:14). There are questions concerning the way this prophecy was initially fulfilled in Ahaz's day, as well as debate about the meaning of the Hebrew word translated as "virgin." The word used in Isa. 7:14 is one of two words in the OT that refer to young women. The more generic betulah (approximately 60 times) was used to refer to virgins (Gen. 24:16; Deut. 22:16-17), maidens who may not have been virgins (Esther 2:17-19), and symbolically to Israel (Jer. 14:17). The less common almah (approximately 9 times), which is used in Isa. 7:14, likewise referred to virgins (Gen. 24:43), but some translators argue that it was also used to refer to maidens who were not necessarily virgins (Prov. 30:19). The semantic versatility of almah does not, however, conclusively eliminate the possibility that a virginal conception was being conveyed in Isa. 7:14, though of course the reference to Isaiah's wife would preclude that she was a virgin. Almah certainly could be translated "virgin," and in Matthew's use of the text, "virgin" would be the appropriate translation.

A viper partially hidden in the surrounding grass and wildflowers.

New Testament The NT texts that deal with the virgin birth are Matt. 1:18-25 and Luke 1:26-35. Matthew recounts that after discovering Mary was pregnant, Joseph contemplated whether he should dissolve their betrothal. While struggling with this decision, an angel informed Joseph that Mary was still a virgin and the child she had conceived was the Messiah. Matthew then gives a parenthetical summary of this event by stating that Isa. 7:14 had herein found its fulfillment (Matt. 1:23). This interpretation of Isaiah has raised serious questions, one being that Matthew quotes from the Septuagint rather than the original Hebrew text, thereby translating the original almah with the Greek word parthenos. In the Septuagint parthenos is occasionally used to describe females who were not virgins (Gen. 34:4), but in the NT it is only used with reference to virgins or spiritual purity (approximately 15 times). Consequently, Matthew's choice of words displays his belief that Isaiah's prophecy included a promise that a virgin would supernaturally conceive. In addition, Isa. 7:14 must be read in light of the entire context of 7:1-9:7. This requires the interpretation that Isaiah's words do not find their primary fulfillment in the birth of his own son, but in the birth of the Messianic "Son," who will be called, "Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Eternal Father, Prince of Peace" (Isa. 9:6 HCSB).

In Luke's Gospel the story is told with Mary as the emphasis. He begins by mentioning that Mary was a virgin (parthenos, Luke 1:27) and to clarify the meaning of the term, the following dialogue is explicitly clear. After the angel Gabriel's announcement that Mary would conceive, she asks how this can occur "since I have not been intimate with a man?" (HCSB); or as some translations render it, "since I am a virgin?" (NASB, NIV). Mary was obviously uncertain about the possibility of conceiving because she had never experienced sexual union. Gabriel then answers that the Holy Spirit would bring about the conception supernaturally (1:36). It is, therefore, unquestionable in Luke's account that Mary was indeed a virgin prior to her conceiving.

Other references that implicitly support the virginal conception are found in instances where the maternal relationship is emphasized almost to the exclusion of the paternal. For example, in the genealogies of Christ, it is stated that Jesus was born of Mary, not Mary and Joseph (Matt. 1:16), and that Jesus was only the "supposed" son of Joseph (Luke 3:23; KJV, NIV, NASV). Throughout His life Jesus was also socially identified with His mother and siblings instead of His "father" (Mark 6:3). There was even a tone of scandal during His ministry because of accusations that He was born illegitimately (John 8:41).

Theological Relevance The virginal conception affects two major areas of theology. First, it relates to the truthfulness of Scripture. The NT clearly states that Jesus was born of a virgin, and to deny this is to question the veracity and authenticity of the text. Second, the virgin conception is linked to the deity of Christ, for through this event He simultaneously retained His divine nature and received a sinless human nature. Furthermore, Scripture reveals it as a critical aspect of the incarnation. Everett Berry

VISION Experience in the life of a person whereby a special revelation from God was received. The revelation from God had two purposes. First, a vision was given for immediate direction, as with Abram in Gen. 12:1-3; Lot, Gen. 19:15; Balaam, Num. 22:22-40; and Peter, Acts 12:7. Second, a vision was given to develop the kingdom of God by revealing the moral and spiritual deficiencies of the people of God in light of God's requirements for maintaining a proper relationship with Him. The vision of prophets such as Isaiah, Amos, Hosea, Micah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and John are representative of this aspect of revelation.

Several Greek and Hebrew terms are translated by the English word "vision." In some references the literal sense of perception with the physical organs of sight is the intended meaning of the word (Job 27:11-12; Prov. 22:29). In 2 Sam. 7:17; Isa. 22:1,5; Joel 3:1; and Zech. 13:4, the Hebrew word refers to the prophetic function of receiving and delivering the word of God by the prophet.

"Vision" in varying forms occurs approximately 30 times in the book of Daniel. The term denotes the mysterious revelation of that which the prophet described as knowledge of the future. In Ezekiel the words are used literally and metaphorically.

Among the classical prophets (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, Obadiah, etc.) the vision was the primary means of communication between God and the prophet. By this avenue the prophets interpreted the meaning of immediate events in the history of Israel. "Vision" and "Word of Yahweh" became synonymous in these prophetic writings (Obad. 1:1). VOCATION See Call, Calling.

VOLUNTEERS Persons who ask God to use them to accomplish His work. The spirit of volunteerism, prompted by devotion to God, arose at crucial times in biblical history, enabling daunting tasks to be accomplished. Moses received voluntary contributions of precious goods from the Israelites sufficient to construct the tabernacle (Exod. 25:1-9). Israelites voluntarily contributed their wealth so Solomon could build the temple (1 Chron. 29:6-9). Under Josiah Israel's leaders again made a voluntarily contribution so that the people of Israel and the priests could have lambs for Passover (2 Chron. 35:7-9). When Sheshbazzar led the returnees from exile in Babylon back to Jerusalem, they carried great wealth voluntarily given by "all those about them" (Ezra 1:5-6 NASB), including the Persian king (Ezra 7:14-15).

In financial giving the lead in volunteerism was normally taken by persons who had the means by which to give. However, even the widow without means willingly gave (Luke 21:1-4), thus providing an example of selfless giving adopted by the early church (2 Cor. 8:1-4; 9:7).

Others contributed their time and skills. Deborah led volunteer military commanders (Judg. 5:9) and fighters (Judg. 5:2) who delivered to Israel Jabin, king of Canaan (Judg. 4:23-24). Those who volunteered to move to Jerusalem during the days of Nehemiah were blessed for doing so (Neh. 11:1-2). Amasiah served as a volunteer in the temple during the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 17:16).

VOPHSI (^{vōph' sī}) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Father of Nahbi of the tribe of Naphtali (Num. 13:14). Nahbi was one of the spies Moses sent into Canaan.

VOWS Voluntary expressions of devotion usually fulfilled after some condition had been met. Vows in the OT usually were conditional. A common formula for vows was the "if...then" phrase (Gen. 28:20; Num. 21:2; Judg. 11:30). The one making the religious vow proposed that if God did something (such as give protection or victory), then he or she in return would make some act of devotion. Not all vows, however, were conditional. Some, such as the Nazirite vow (Num. 6), were made out of devotion to God with no request placed upon God. Whether conditional or not, the emphasis in the Bible is on keeping the vow. A vow unfulfilled is worse than a vow never made. While vows do not appear often in the NT, Paul made one that involved shaving his head (Acts 18:18).

VOYEURISM Seeking sexual stimulation by visual means. In the culture of the Bible, having one's nakedness exposed and viewed publicly was normally done to indicate shame for previous sin not for sexual titillation (e.g., Gen. 9:20-23; Isa. 3:17; 20:2-4; 47:2-3; Jer. 13:22,26; Lam. 1:8; Hos. 1:10; Rev. 3:17-18). Before the fall, because there was neither shame nor voyeurism, nakedness and sexuality were undefiled (Gen. 2:25).

Voyeurism was the prelude to further sexual sin by David (2 Sam. 11:2) and evidently played a part in the desirous affections of Pharaoh toward Sarah (Gen. 12:14-15) and Potiphar's wife toward Joseph (Gen. 39:6-7). The beauty contest sponsored by Ahasuerus had voyeuristic overtones (Esther 2:2-4).

Job recognized that voyeurism, an act of the heart, breaks God's laws (Job 31:1-4). This was confirmed by Jesus, who equated voyeurism with adultery (Matt. 5:28). Paul's injunctions to avoid youthful lusts (2 Tim. 2:22; cp. 1 Thess. 5:22) in favor of pure thoughts (Phil. 4:8) speak against voyeurism. Paul H. Wright

VULTURE Both carrion vulture and vulture are listed in the unclean bird lists (Lev. 11:13-19; Deut. 14:12-18 RSV). The English word “vulture” is used to translate several different Hebrew terms. The Bible does not permit a positive identification of the types of vultures known during the biblical period. In contrast to eagles and hawks, which usually kill living prey, vultures feed on dead animals.

The Hebrew term nesher, sometimes translated “eagle,” is translated “vulture” in Hosea's threat to Israel (8:1). Lack of a proper burial was viewed as a great horror in biblical times. The common belief was that as long as a body remained unburied, the person could not be gathered to the fathers and experience rest in Sheol. Goliath and David threatened one another with this fate (1 Sam. 17:44,46). The curses in Deuteronomy warned the disobedient of this horrible consequence (Deut. 28:26). Ultimately the author of Revelation used the image of the birds of prey to picture the defeat of evil before the reign of Christ (Rev. 19:17-21; cp. Ezek. 29:5; 32:4; 39:4,17-20). Janice K. Meier WAGES Terms of employment or compensation for services rendered encompass the meaning of the Hebrew and Greek words. Their usage in the text applies to commercial activities and labor service, as well as judgmental recompense for one's actions in life.

In a mixed economy of agriculture and pastoralism without coined money, wages often included little more than meals and a place of employment (cp. Job 7:2; John 10:12). Still, a skilled shepherd, like Jacob, might receive a portion of the flock and thus begin his own herd (Gen. 30:32-33; 31:8; and legal texts from both Assyria and Babylonia). No fixed wage was set for farm laborers. They may have received a portion of the harvest (John 4:36), or, as in Matt. 20:1-8, an agreed upon daily wage. By law these landless workers were to be paid at the end of each day for their efforts (Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:14-15). Texts mention enough instances of fraud, however, to suggest that this group was often cheated out of their wages (Jer. 22:13; Mal. 3:5; James 5:4).

Kings hired mercenary troops to fight their wars (Judg. 9:4; 2 Sam. 10:6) and employed skilled laborers, along with slaves and unpaid draftees, to build and decorate their palaces and temples (1 Kings 5:6-17; Isa. 46:6; 2 Chron. 24:11-12). The services of priests (Judg. 18:4; Mai. 1:10) and the advice of elders (Ezra 4:5; 1 Tim. 5:17-18) were obtained for gold or silver at fees to match their abilities. The authority of prophets could also be purchased. Balaam, for example, was paid “fees for divination” in exchange for his cursing of Israel (Num. 22:7), and Shemaiah was hired by Sanballat to trap Nehemiah with a false prophecy (Neh. 6:10-13). Theological usage of these terms promises God's reward for the faithful (Gen. 15:1) and proper recompense for His people Israel (Isa. 40:10; 62:11). His justice also ensured that the reward of the unrighteous was equal to their crimes (Ps. 109:20; Rom. 6:23; 2 Pet. 2:15). See Commerce; Economic Life; Slave, Servant.

WALLS Outside vertical structures of houses and the fortifications surrounding cities. In ancient times the walls of cities and houses were constructed of bricks made of clay mixed with reed and hardened in the sun. Archaeologists estimate that the walls of Nineveh were wide enough to drive three chariots abreast and the walls of Babylon were wide enough to drive six chariots abreast on the top.

In scriptural language a wall is a symbol of salvation (Isa. 26:1; 60:18), of the protection of God (Zech. 2:5), of those who afford protection (1 Sam. 25:16; Isa. 2:15), and of wealth of the rich in their own conceit (Prov. 18:11). A “fortified wall of bronze” (NRSV) is symbolic of prophets and their testimony against the wicked (Jer. 15:20). The “wall of partition” (Eph. 2:14 KJV; HCSB, dividing wall of hostility) represented temple worship and Jewish practice separating Jew from Gentile. See Architecture; Fort, Fortification.

WANDERINGS IN THE WILDERNESS Israel's movements from Egypt to the promised land under Moses, including the placenames along the routes. A reconstruction of the Israelites' wilderness wanderings is more complex than a casual reading of the biblical account at first would seem to indicate. The “wanderings” refer to that difficult period in Israel's history between their departure from the area of Egyptian enslavement in the land of Goshen and arrival in the Jordan Valley to claim their long-standing inheritance of the promised land (Exod. 12:31-Num. 33:49). The sequence of that extended event is complicated by the nature of the biblical data.

The itinerary from the border of Egypt to the oasis of Kadesh-barnea is relatively clear. Only three established trade routes across the northern Sinai were viable options for the movement of such a large contingent of people and livestock. Decisions in Egypt during the early stages of their migration reduced those options to only one. The shortest, most northerly route along the Mediterranean shoreline was not taken because of a possible encounter with Egyptian military guarding oasis forts or returning from regular incursions and punitive raids in Canaan (Exod. 13:17). A second relatively direct route to Kadesh-barnea appears to have been avoided by divine plan when they approached the border at Etham and then were instructed to turn back to the seemingly impossible situation “by the Sea” where God miraculously delivered them from the pharaoh's forces (Exod. 13:20-14:2). This route is identified with Marah (15:23), Elim (15:27), the Wilderness of Sin (16:1), Rephidim (17:1), the Wilderness of Sinai (18:5; 19:1), Sinai (19:2), the Wilderness of Paran (Num. 10:12), Taberah (11:3) or Kibroth-hattaavah (“the cemetery of the lusters,” 11:34), Hazeroth (“corrals,” 11:35; 12:16) where the mention of enclosures for the livestock and a series of events in the biblical account suggest an extended stay, and, ultimately, Kadesh (Num. 20:1). A later reference to the distance between Mount Sinai (Horeb) and Kadesh-barnea (Deut. 1:2) seems to suggest that the early itinerary took them basically along the major trade route used by the Amalekites between modern Suez at the northern end of the Gulf of Suez and the northern end of the Gulf of Aqaba (Elath and Ezion-geber) and then northward into the extensive clustering of oases at Kadesh that would become their tribal center and the location of the tabernacle during the next 38 years.

The negative response to an immediate conquest following the spies' report resulted in the additional 38 years in the Sinai wilderness. When that generation of military died, the camp of Israel again was mobilized for the assault on Canaan. Their request to pass through Edomite territory and to proceed along the King's Highway through Moab and into the Jordan Valley opposite Jericho was blocked by a show of military force by the king of Edom. Their attempt to enter Canaan from the south was stopped by the king of Arad, and so a very difficult detour southward to the head of the Gulf of Aqaba and northeastward around Edomite and Moabite lands (Num. 20:14; Deut. 2) brought them finally to Mount Nebo overlooking the Jordan Valley north of the Dead Sea.

This itinerary is complicated by a comprehensive list of place-names in Num. 33 related to the exodus and wanderings that includes many more locations seemingly playing a part in this extended event. Obviously many of these places naturally may be related to the 38 years of the wanderings. More important is the fact that Num. 33 indicates that in fact the Israelite itinerary from Egypt to the Jordan Valley did include passage through Edomite and Moabite territory along the King's Highway. This route cannot be associated with the Moses/Joshua-led exodus because of the specific statements in Num. 20-21. Many scholars therefore conclude that Num. 33 is a combined compilation of placenames that are related to pre-Mosaic infiltration from Egypt to Canaan by way of the King's Highway, the place along the second route around Edomite-Moabite territory followed by the Moses/Joshua-led contingent and all those places visited by the Israelites during those 38 punitive years of desert wanderings when like the nomads of every generation they sought water and pasturage for their flocks within that hostile arid environment of the Sinai. WAR CRIMES Illegal actions by nations, armies, and individuals in time of battle and fighting. Clearly some of the practices of warfare—ancient and modern—exceed all sensibilities (e.g., 2 Sam. 8:2; Ps. 137:9). It may be helpful to label such acts with modern terminology such as “war crimes” or “ethnic cleansing.” Amos declared that waging war in order to deport whole populations as slaves or massacring Israelite women and children in warfare deserved the judgment of God (Amos 1:6,9). Similarly, Moses recognized that Amalek's ambush of the Israelites from behind when they were tired and helpless should not go unpunished (Deut. 25:17-19). More problematic is God's response that Israel similarly wipe out Amalek, including its helpless women and children (1 Sam. 15:1-3; cp. Ps. 137:9) or His command to annihilate the Canaanites (Deut. 7:2). In some ways God's election of Israel as a nation (Gen. 12:1-3; Exod. 19:5-6) superseded the right of other nations to harm Israel. The Mosaic law included rules of warfare intended to allow the enemies of Israel room to surrender (Deut. 20:1-20) and to safeguard the rights of captive women (Deut. 21:10-14).

WATCH Division of time in which soldiers or others were on duty to guard something. They are listed as “evening,” “midnight,” “crowing of the rooster,” and “morning” (Mark 13:35 HCSB). Nehemiah set watches that may mean armed persons or just citizens on guard (4:9; 7:3). The OT seems to have had three watches rather than four. There was the “beginning of the night watches” (Lam. 2:19), the “middle watch” (Judg. 7:19), and the “morning watch” (Exod. 14:24). See Time, Meaning of. WATCHMAN One who stands guard. Ancient cities had watchmen stationed on the walls. Their responsibility was to sound a warning if an enemy approached (2 Kings 9:17; Ezek. 33:2-3). Israel's prophets saw themselves as watchmen warning the nation of God's approaching judgment if the people did not repent. Vineyards and fields also had watchmen, especially during harvest. Their responsibility was to guard the produce from animals and thieves.

WATER The Bible speaks of water in three different ways: as a material resource, as a symbol, and as a metaphor.

A Material Necessity that God Provides

Water as a material resource is necessary for life. God made water a part of His good creation, and He exercises sovereignty over it (Gen. 1-2; Isa. 40:12). He controls the natural processes of precipitation and evaporation, as well as the courses of bodies of water (Job 5:10; 36:27; 37:10; Pss. 33:7; 107:33; Prov. 8:29). God normally assures the provision of water for human needs (Deut. 11:14). However, water is sometimes used in punishment for sin, as with the flood of Noah's day (Gen. 6:17) or the drought proclaimed by Elijah (1 Kings 17:1). The divine control of water teaches people obedience to and dependency upon God.

Many of the great acts of God in history have involved water, such as the parting of the sea (Exod. 14:21), the provision of water for the Israelites in the wilderness (Exod. 15:25; 17:6), and the crossing of the Jordan River (Josh. 3:14-17). Water was also involved in several of Jesus' miracles (Matt. 14:25; Luke 8:24-25; John 2:1-11).

An Arab man drinks from the spout of a multi-spouted waterpotas he would have done in biblical times.

Water was a crucial element in God's gift of the promised land to Israel (Deut. 8:7). Palestine contains several natural sources of water: rain, springs, wells, and a few short, perennial streams. The average annual rainfall in Palestine is about 25 inches, all of which normally falls between November and April. The dry months of May to October made necessary the use of cisterns and pools for water storage. Several famous biblical cities had pools, such as Gibeon (2 Sam. 2:13), Hebron (2 Sam. 4:12), Samaria (1 Kings 22:38), and Jerusalem (2 Kings 20:20).

A Theological Symbol and Metaphor The OT contains laws for the use of water in rituals as a symbol of purification. Priests, sacrificial meat, and ritual utensils were washed before involvement in rituals (Lev. 1:9; 6:28; 8:6). Unclean people and things were also washed as a symbol of ritual cleansing (Lev. 11:32-38; 14:1-9; 15:1-30; Num. 31:23). The book of Genesis uses water as a symbol of instability before the completion of creation (1:2), and Ezekiel spoke of water as a symbol of renewal in the age to come (47:1-12).

The Bible contains dozens of metaphorical usages of water. For example, in the OT, water is a metaphor or simile for fear (Josh. 7:5), death (2 Sam. 14:14), sin (Job 15:16), God's presence (Ps. 72:6), marital fidelity (Prov. 5:15-16), the knowledge of God (Isa. 11:9), salvation (Isa. 12:3), the Spirit (Isa. 44:3-4), God's blessings (Isa. 58:11), God's voice (Ezek. 43:2), God's wrath (Hos. 5:10), and justice (Amos 5:24). Among the metaphorical uses of water in the NT are references to birth (John 3:5), the Spirit (John 4:10), spiritual training (1 Cor. 3:6), and life (Rev. 7:17). WATERPOT Vessel made for carrying water, usually made of clay although some were made of stone (John 2:6). Large pots stored water (1 Kings 18:33; John 2:6); a woman could carry smaller pots on her shoulder (John 4:28). Small pitchers were used for pouring water (Luke 22:10; Jer. 19). Water was also carried in animal skins. See Pottery; Skin; Vessels and Utensils.

WEALTH AND MATERIALISM Physical possessions having significant value, such as land, livestock, money, and precious metals, and the practice of valuing such possessions more highly than they ought to be valued, especially when this results in the misalignment of ones' priorities and undermines one's devotion to God.

Wealth To understand the biblical view of wealth, one must understand the biblical account of creation. On that account God created the universe—and everything therein—"out of nothing" (Gen. 1:1-27). This means that while He created the entire universe, God used no preexisting materials in doing so. So, unlike painters who use things that already exist (brushes, canvases, paints) in creating their works, God created the universe without using anything which already existed. Here the psalmist instructs: "For the LORD is a great God, a great King above all gods. The depths of the earth are in His hand, and the mountain peaks are His. The sea is His; He made it. His hands formed the dry land" (Ps. 95:3-5 HCSB). Thus, in virtue of being the absolute Creator, God's claim on the universe and everything therein is absolute—everything ultimately belongs to Him and to Him alone (cp. Ps. 50:10-12).

Of course, in His wisdom, God gave humanity dominion over the earth (Gen. 1:26-28), thus entrusting His wealth to humans. In so entrusting them, God appointed them stewards over creation. However, from this fact several consequences follow. First, since everything belongs ultimately to God, whatever one possesses—and thus owns—comes as a trust from Him; for this reason, one's right of ownership is never absolute—one's property always belongs first and foremost to God Himself. Second, since it comes as a trust from God, ownership of property carries with it significant responsibilities. For instance, God holds those to whom He has entrusted wealth responsible for giving to His work (cp. Num. 18:20-32; Deut. 14:28-29; Mal. 3:8-10; 2 Cor. 9:6-14; 1 Tim. 5:18) and for caring for the poor among them (cp. Prov. 29:7; Amos 5:11-12; Matt. 19:21; 1 Tim. 5:3-5). It is important to note that while God calls His children to underwrite the ministries of the church through sacrificial giving, the responsibility to handle wisely what God has given extends further. So one dare not think that once a certain percentage of one's income has been given to the church that it does not matter what one does with the rest.

God has blessed some with abundant wealth. Abram, Isaac, Solomon, and Job were each blessed with great riches (cp. Gen. 13:2; 26:12-14; 1 Kings 3:13; Job 42:12). This does not mean, however, that poverty is a sign of God's disfavor. According to Scripture, God takes special interest in the poor (Ps. 72:12-15). Moreover, Job was righteous when God allowed him to become impoverished (Job 1:1,13-19). Job's righteousness is evident even as he reacts to his misfortune: "He said, 'Naked I came from my mothers womb, and naked I shall return there. The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away. Blessed be the name of the LORD'" (Job 1:21 NASB). Therefore it would be a mistake to conclude that Job's impoverishment indicates God's displeasure with him. Still, from those whom He has blessed abundantly, God expects much. Jesus' own words underscore this: "Much will be required of everyone who has been given much" (Luke 12:48 HCSB).

Materialism Scripture warns against valuing one's wealth too highly. Riches can prevent one from bearing spiritual fruit (cp. Luke 8:14). Perhaps awareness of this lies behind Agur's plea that he not be given riches lest he deny God (Prov. 30:8-9). That riches can hinder spiritual growth receives eloquent expression from Jesus: "Again I tell you, it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich person to enter the kingdom of God" (Matt. 19:24 HCSB). Elsewhere Jesus warns against splitting one's allegiance: "No one can be a slave of two masters, since either he will hate one and love the other, or be devoted to one and despise the other. You cannot be slaves of God and of money" (Matt. 6:24 HCSB). Moreover, as Paul tells Timothy, the love of money has led to many evilseven leading some to wander from the faith (1 Tim. 6:10). So, then, one ought to be content with one's possessions and seek righteousness rather than wealth (Matt. 6:33; Luke 12:15-21; Heb. 13:5).

A generous spirit accompanies righteousness. Zacchaeus responds to Jesus not only by restoring fourfold what he had gained dishonestly, but also by giving freely to the poor (Luke 19:8), and the members of the church in Jerusalem shared their possessions with one another (Acts 2:44-45; 4:32-35). Such generosity characterizes those who have been freed from the love of money and have sought to store up for themselves treasure in heaven rather than on earth (Matt 6:19-21). WEAPONS Since mankind's beginnings, the desire to impose one's will upon another person or being has led to active conflict using many types of weapons. Human history shows marked means by which the implements were advanced technologically through the past six millennia.

The implements of warfare and defense are known from three sources: excavations; pictorial representations in murals, reliefs, and models; and written documents. Tombs of Egypt contained actual weapons and models. Assyrian reliefs depicted great battles in detail. Excavations have uncovered numerous examples of stone and metal weapons; and biblical and inscriptional sources provide names of objects, strategy and tactics, and methods of construction.

Military action has been defined in terms of ability to achieve supremacy over the enemy in three fields: mobility, firepower, and security. Mobility is exemplified by the chariot and cavalry; firepower by bow, sling, spear, ax and sword; and security by shield, armor, and helmet. See Arms and Armor; Chariots; Horse.

WEATHER Climatic conditions in Palestine, including geographical factors and seasonal changes. The weather patterns of Palestine result from the clash between the extreme heat of the Arabian Desert and the cooler Mediterranean winds from the west. The climate is subtropical with humid, cold winters and hot, dry summers. From October to April the days range from cool and sunny to overcast, cold, and rainy. The rains fill the seasonal brooks and streams, which provide the majority of water for the coming year. The elevation of the land, dropping from 3,900 feet in upper Galilee to 1,296 feet below sea level at the Dead Sea, provides natural barriers that influence the weather. Rain generally diminishes as one travels farther south and inland. Thus, the coastal plain and Galilee receive more rain than the central hill country and Negev desert. Snow covers the higher elevations of Mount Hermon throughout most of the winter and occasionally falls on Jerusalem and the surrounding hills. The Jordan Valley, particularly in the area of the Dead Sea, remains mild in the winter, making it the traditional site of the winter palaces of kings and rulers. The Mediterranean Sea becomes windy and cold, making travel dangerous.

In April and May the climate changes dramatically. Hot desert winds blow across the land from the east in the early morning hours. The land and seasonal rivers begin to dry, and the vegetation turns brown. Near noon each day, the air turns to the west, bringing with it slightly cooler air from the sea. The difference is minimal, however, and the heat remains intense. The central hill country is cooler than the foothills and coastal areas, but the Judean wilderness and Negev become fiercely hot. Temperatures along the Dead Sea and Arabah remain above 90 degrees Fahrenheit for weeks on end. Once across the Jordan Valley atop the Transjordan plateau to the east, the temperature moderates once more. Rain is uncommon in the summer months, usually falling in October, November, February, and March.

The Bible hints at the influence that the weather imposed on life in Palestine. The winds and rain were considered to be under God's personal direction. Thus, Christ's control of the elements demonstrated to the disciples His heavenly calling. The hot east wind was often viewed as the wrath of God, bringing infertility and death. Rain signified the continued blessings of God; its absence, His judgment. See Fertility Cults; Palestine; Rain; Wind.

WEDDINGS In biblical times the father selected the bride for his sons. Abraham sent his servant to Haran to find a wife for his son Isaac (Gen. 24). In arranging a marriage, the bridegroom's family paid a price (Hb. mohar) for the bride (cp. Gen. 34:12; Exod. 22:16; 1 Sam. 28:25). When the marriage had been arranged, the couple entered the betrothal period, usually lasting a year and much more binding than the engagement of today. During that year the man prepared the home for his bride. The betrothal was established in one of two ways: a pledge in the presence of witnesses together with a sum of money or a written statement and a ceremony with a concluding benediction. Before Israel's exile the betrothal was ratified by a verbal promise (Ezek. 16:8); after the exile the bride and groom's parents signed a covenant binding the couple together. In NT times the parents of the bride and groom met, along with others as witnesses, while the groom gave the bride a gold ring or other valuable item. To the bride he spoke this promise: "See by this ring you are set apart for me, according to the law of Moses and of Israel."

The serious nature of the betrothal is evident. If a man had sexual relations with a woman betrothed to another man, they were both subject to the death penalty (Deut. 22:23-24). Had she not been betrothed, the man would have paid 50 shekels to the woman's father as a dowry, and she would have become his wife (Deut. 22:28-29).

The wedding was largely a social event during which a blessing was pronounced on the bride: “May you, our sister, become thousands of ten thousands, and may your descendants possess the gate of those who hate them” (Gen. 24:60). The blessing reflected the concept of God's blessing, namely, a large family and victory over one's enemies. The marriage itself was secured by the formalizing of a marriage contract.

The parable of the 10 virgins is rich with explanation of the Jewish wedding (Matt. 25:1-13). The wedding ceremony began with the bridegroom bringing home the bride from her parents' house to his parental home. The bridegroom, accompanied by his friends and amid singing and music, led a procession through the streets of the town to the bride's home (cp. Jer. 16:9). Along the way friends who were ready and waiting with their lamps lit would join in the procession (Matt. 25:7-10). Veiled and dressed in beautifully embroidered clothes and adorned with jewels, the bride, accompanied by her attendants, joined the bridegroom for the procession to his father's house (Ps. 45:13-15). Isaiah 61:10 describes the bridegroom decked out with a garland and the bride adorned with jewels. The bride's beauty would be forever remembered (Jer. 2:32). The bride and groom were considered king and queen for the week. Sometimes the groom even wore a gold crown.

Once at the home, the bridal couple sat under a canopy amid the festivities of games and dancing which lasted an entire week—sometimes longer (Song 2:4). Guests praised the newly married couple; songs of love for the couple graced the festival. Sumptuous meals and wine filled the home or banquet hall (John 2:1-11). Ample provision for an elaborate feast was essential—failure could bring a lawsuit (John 2:3). The bridal couple wore their wedding clothes throughout the week; guests also wore their finery, which was sometimes supplied by wealthy families (Matt. 22:12).

On the first night, when the marriage was to be consummated, the father escorted his daughter to the bridal chamber (Gen. 29:21-23; cp. Judg. 15:1). The bride's parents retained the bloodstained bed sheet to prove their daughter's virginity at marriage in case the husband attempted any recourse by charging that his bride was not a virgin (Deut. 22:13-21; cp. v. 15).

In some cases the bride did not remove the veil from her face until the following morning. When Jacob thought he was marrying Rachel, in the morning he discovered his wife was Leah (Gen. 29:25). At other times the veil was removed during the feast and laid on the groom's shoulder and the pronouncement made, "the government shall be on his shoulders" (cp. Isa. 9:6). WEEK For the Jews, any seven consecutive days ending with the Sabbath (Gen. 2:1-3). The Sabbath began at sunset Friday and lasted until sunset Saturday. The Christians moved their day of worship to Sunday, the first day of the week. In this way they called attention to the resurrection of their Lord Jesus Christ (Luke 24:1-7). The week is of ancient Semitic origin. It was shared with the ancient world through the Bible and the religious practice of both Jews and Christians. See Calendar; Time, Meaning of.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES Systems of measurement. In the ancient Near East weights and measures varied. The prophets spoke against merchants who used deceitful weights (Mic. 6:11).

Weights Considering first the OT evidence, Hebrew weights were never an exact system. An abundance of archaeological evidence demonstrates that not even inscribed weights of the same inscription weighed the same. Weights were used in a balance to weigh out silver and gold, since there was no coinage until the Persian period after 500 B.C. This medium of exchange replaced bartering early in the biblical period.

The shekel is the basic unit of weight in the Hebrew as well as the Babylonian and Canaanite systems, though the exact weight varied from region to region and sometimes also according to the kind of goods for sale.

The Mesopotamian system was sexagesimal, based on sixes and sixties. So, for example, the Babylonian system used a talent of 60 minas, a mina of 60 shekels, and a shekel of 24 gerahs.

The Hebrew system was decimal like the Egyptian, though the weights were not the same. Variations in the weights of the shekel may be attributed to several factors other than the dishonesty condemned in the Law (Deut. 25:13-16) and the Prophets (Amos 8:5; Mic. 6:11). There could have been variation between official and unofficial weights, including the setting of new standards by reform administrations such as that of good King Josiah. There might have been a depreciation of standards with passage of time, or a use of different standards to weigh different goods (a heavy standard was used at Ugarit to weigh purple linen), or the influence of foreign systems. There seems to have been three kinds of shekel current in Israel: (1) a temple shekel of about 10 grams (.351 ounces) which depreciated to about 9.8 grams (.345 ounces); (2) the common shekel of about 1.7 grams (.408 ounces), which depreciated to about 11.4 grams (.401 ounces); and (3) the heavy (“royal”?) shekel of about 13 grams (.457 ounces).

The smallest portion of the shekel was the gerah, which was 1/20 of a shekel (Exod. 30:13; Ezek. 45:12). The gerah has been estimated to weigh .571 grams. There were larger portions of the shekel, the most familiar of which was the beqi or half shekel (Exod. 38:26), known also from Egypt. Inscribed examples recovered by archaeologists average over six grams and may have been half of the heavy shekel mentioned above. The pim, if it is $\frac{2}{3}$ of a shekel as most scholars suppose, is also related to the heavy shekel and weighs about eight grams. It may have been a Philistine weight, since it is mentioned as the price the Philistines charged Israelite farmers to sharpen their agricultural tools when the Philistines enjoyed an iron monopoly over Israel (1 Sam. 13:19-21).

Multiples of the shekel were the mina and the talent. According to the account of the sanctuary tax (Exod. 38:25-26), 3,000 shekels were in a talent, probably 60 minas of 50 shekels each. This talent may have been the same as the Assyrian weight, since both 2 Kings 18:14 and Sennacherib's inscriptions mention the tribute of King Hezekiah as 30 talents of silver and of gold. This was 28.38 to 30.27 kilograms (about 70 pounds). The mina was probably 50 shekels (as the Canaanite system), though Ezekiel 45:12 calls for a mina of 60 shekels, and the early Greek translation reads “50.” The mina has been estimated at 550 to 600 grams (1.213 to 1.323 lbs.). One table of OT weights, based on a shekel of 11.424 grams, is as follows:

1 talent (3,000 shekels)	34.272	kilograms	75.6 lbs.
1 mina (50 shekels)	571.2	grams	1.26 lbs.
1 shekel	11.424	grams	.403 oz.
1 pirn (2/3 shekel?)	7.616	grams	.258 oz.
1 beqa ^c (1/2 shekel)	5.712	grams	.201 oz.
1 gerah (1/20 shekel)	.571	grams	.02 oz.

We should remember, however, that this is misleading, for OT weights were never so precise as this. The Lord's ideal was “just” weights and measures (Lev. 19:36; Prov. 16:11; Ezek. 45:10), but dishonest manipulations were all too common (Prov. 11:1; 20:23; Hos. 12:7). Archaeologists have discovered weights that have been altered by chiseling the bottom. Interesting things weighed in the OT were Goliath's armor (1 Sam. 17:5-7) and Absalom's annual haircut (2 Sam. 14:26). In the NT the talent and mina were large sums of money (Matt. 25:15 -28; cp. Luke 19:13-25), and the “pound of fragrant oil” (John 12:3 HCSB) is probably the Roman standard of 12 ounces.

Measures Measures of capacity, like the weights, were used from earliest times in the market place. These were also only approximate and varied from time to time and place to place. Sometimes different names were used to designate the same unit. Some names were used to describe both liquid and dry measures as the modern liter. The basic unit of dry measure was the ephah that means basket. The homer, “ass's load,” was a dry measure, the same size as the kor; both a dry and a liquid measure. Each contained 10 ephahs or baths, an equivalent liquid measure (Ezek. 45:10-14). The ephah is estimated at 1.52 to 2.42 pecks, about $\frac{3}{8}$ to $\frac{2}{3}$ of a bushel.

The bath is estimated from two fragments of vessels so labeled from Tell Beit Mirsim and Lachish to have contained 21 to 23 liters or about 5 1/2 gallons, which would correspond roughly to an ephah of 3/8 to 2/3 of a bushel. Letek, which may mean half a homer (or cor), would be five ephahs. Seah was a dry measure that may be a third of a ephah. Hin, an Egyptian liquid measure, which means “jar,” was approximately a sixth of a bath. The omer, used only in the manna story (Exod. 16:13-36), was a daily ration and is calculated as a tenth of an ephah (also called issaron, “tenth”). A little less than half an omer is the kab (only 2 Kings 6:25 NRSV), which was four times the smallest unit, log (only Lev. 14:10-20 NRSV), which is variously estimated according to its Greek or Latin translation, as a half pint or 2/3 pint.

Although OT measures of capacity varied as much as the difference between the American and English gallon, the following table at least represents the assumptions of the above discussion:

Dry Measures
kab	1.16 quarts
omer, issaron 1/10 ephah	2.09 quarts seah, 1/3 ephah	% peck
ephah	1/2 bushel
letek, 1/2 homer	2.68 bushels
homer, kor	5.16 bushels
Liquid Measures
log	0.67 pint
hin	1 gallon
bath	5 1/2 gallons
cor, homer	55 gallons

In the NT measures of capacity are Greek or Roman measures. The sextarius or “pot” (Mark 7:4) was about a pint. The measure of John 2:6 [metretas] is perhaps 10 gallons. The bushel [modios] of Matt. 5:15 and parallels is a vessel large enough to cover a light, perhaps about a fourth of an American bushel. As remarked before, the amount of ointment Mary used to anoint Jesus (John 12:3) was a Roman pound of 12 ounces (a measure of both weight and capacity), and Nicodemus brought a hundred such pounds of mixed spices to anoint Jesus' body (John 19:39).

In measures of length, all over the ancient Near East, the standard was the cubit, the length of the forearm from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger. Israel knew two different lengths for the cubit just as did Egypt. The common cubit, mentioned in connection with the description of the bed of Og, king of Bashan (Deut. 3:11), was about 17 1/2 inches. This may be deduced from the 1,200 cubit length mentioned in the Siloam inscription for King Hezekiah's tunnel that has been measured to yield a cubit of this length. Ezekiel (40:5) mentions a long cubit consisting of a common cubit plus a handbreadth which would yield a “royal” cubit of about 20 1/2 inches, similar to the Egyptian short and long cubits.

Even figuring with the common cubit, Goliath's height was truly gigantic at six cubits and a span (1 Sam. 17:4), about nine and a half feet tall. If Solomon's temple is figured with the common cubit, it was about 90 feet long, 30 feet wide, and 45 feet high (1 Kings 6:2). The span is half a cubit (Ezek. 43:13,17), or the distance between the extended thumb and little finger. If it is half the long cubit, the span would be about 10 1/2 inches; if half the common cubit, it was about 8 3/4 inches.

The handbreadth or palm is a sixth of a cubit, consisting of the breadth of the hand at the base of the four fingers. This measure is a little less than three inches. The smallest Israelite measure of length was the finger, a fourth of a handbreadth (Jer. 52:21) and was about three-fourths inch. Larger than a cubit was the reed, probably consisting of six common cubits. Archaeologists have noticed several monumental buildings whose size can be calculated in round numbers of such cubits or reeds. Summarizing on the basis of the common cubit, linear measurements of the OT were:

Common Cubit
1 reed	6 cubits	8 ft. 9 in.
1 cubit	6 handbreadths	17.5 in.
1 handbreadth	4 fingers	2.9 in.
1 finger		.73 in.
Ezekiel's Cubit
1 reed	6 cubits	10 ft. 2.4 in.
1 cubit	7 handbreadths	20.4 in.

There were indefinite measures of great length, such as a day's journey or three day's journey or seven day's journey, the calculation of which would depend on the mode of transportation and the kind of terrain. Shorter indefinite distances were the bowshot (Gen. 21:16) and the furrow's length (1 Sam. 14:14 NRSV; HCSB, about a half-acre).

In the NT measures of length were Greek or Roman units. The cubit was probably the same as the common cubit, since the Romans reckoned it as one and one-half times the Roman foot. The fathom (Acts 27:28) was about six feet of water in depth. The stadion or furlong was a Roman measure of 400 cubits or one eighth Roman mile. The Roman mile (Matt. 5:41) was 1,620 yards. Josephus calculated this as six stadia or 1,237.8 yards.

Measures of area were indefinite in the OT. An “acre” was roughly what a yoke of oxen could plow in one day. Land could be measured by the amount of grain required to sow it. In NT times a Roman measure of land was the Latin jugenrum, related to what a yoke of oxen could plow, figured at 28,000 square feet or $\frac{5}{8}$ of an acre. Another was the furrow, 120 Roman feet in length.

In conclusion, weights and measures in biblical times are seldom precise enough to enable one to calculate exact metric equivalents, but the Lord set forth an ideal for “just” balances, weights, and measures. Different standards in surrounding Near Eastern countries affected biblical standards. Sometimes there were two standards operating at the same time, such as short and long, light and heavy, common and royal. There is enough evidence to figure approximate metrological values for the biblical weights and measures. M. Pierce Matheney WELFARE PROGRAMS Governmental attempts to assist people in economic need. God expects people to work for a living (Prov. 10:4; 19:5; 20:4; Eph. 4:28; 1 Thess. 4:11; 2 Thess. 3:6-13). Yet the Bible also recognizes that in every society there will be poor people in need of assistance (Deut. 15:11; John 12:8). For this reason God commands His people to be willing, free, and generous in helping others (Deut. 15:10-14; Acts 11:29; 1 Cor. 16:2-3; 2 Cor. 8:1-4; 9:5-7).

The Mosaic law provided for those who could not adequately care for themselves: sojourners, widows, fatherless, and Levites; the latter did not receive a landed tribal inheritance. Each was to receive assistance paid by other Israelites in the form of a tithe (Deut. 14:28-29). These poor were to be allowed to glean in the fields, orchards, and vineyards of those who were able to earn a productive living (Exod. 23:10-11; Lev. 19:9-10; 25:1-7; Deut. 24:19-22; Ruth 2:2-3; 15-17). Every seventh year was a year of release in which all debts were forgiven, thus allowing the poor a fresh start (Deut. 15:1-18). To neglect the poor in ancient Israel was to close oneself to God's blessing (Job 31:16-22; Prov. 25:21-22; 28:27). Yet the prophetic denunciation regarding the lack of social justice in ancient Israel suggests that these welfare programs were not practiced (e.g., Isa. 58:6-7; Ezek. 18:5-9).

Jesus taught the necessary union of true spirituality and personal social responsibility (Matt. 5:42; 19:21; 25:31-46; Mark 9:41; Luke 10:32-37), a connection stressed by James (2:14-17) and the other apostles (Gal. 2:9-10; Eph. 4:28; 1 Tim. 6:18; 1 John 3:17-18). The early church provided for the physical needs of its members (Acts 2:43-47; 4:32-35; 6:1-4; 10:1-2; 11:27-30; Rom. 15:25-27; 2 Cor. 8:1-4; Phil. 4:15-18). See Poor, Orphan, Widow.

WELL Source of water created by digging in the earth to find available water. In the semiarid climate of ancient Israel, the availability of water was a constant concern; the Bible contains many references to the sources used for obtaining it. Several Hebrew words are used in different contexts to denote these sources, making it sometimes difficult to know which English word to use in translation.

The Hebrew word most commonly translated “well” is be'er (Gen. 21:30-31; Num. 21:16-18). Be'er also occurs in several placenames indicating the location of important wells: Beer (Num. 21:16); Beer-elim (Isa. 15:8); Beeroth (Deut. 10:6); Beer-lahai-roi (Gen. 16:14); Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:31).

The digging of a well could be a time for celebration (Num. 21:17-18), but wells were also fought over as different people tried to control the precious resource (Gen. 21:25-26; 26:15-22; Exod. 2:16-17). Wells were located wherever a water source could be found. This included fields (Gen. 29:2), towns (2 Sam. 23:15), and the wilderness (Gen. 16:7,14).

“Well” is also used figuratively of a “forbidden woman” (Prov. 23:27 HCSB) and of a wicked city (Jer. 6:7). Elsewhere it is used as a metaphor for sexual pleasure (Prov. 5:15; Song 4:15). See Cistern; Fountain; Pit; Spring; Water.

WHALE Large aquatic mammal that resembles a large fish (Ezek. 32:2; Jon. 1:17; Matt. 12:40).

The Greek word translated “whale” in Matt. 12:40 (KJV) is also called “a great fish” (Jon. 1:17), “great creature” (Gen. 1:21; Ps. 148:7 NIV), “monster” (Job 7:12; Ezek. 32:2 NIV). The exact identification of the animal is impossible with present knowledge.

KJV translation (Gen. 1:21; Job 7:12; Ezek. 32:2; and in Matt. 12:40 with reference to Jonah) for Hebrew tannin. The Hebrew term can refer to a primeval sea monster or dragon (Isa. 27:1; 51:9), to a serpent (Exod. 7:9; Ps. 91:13), or possibly a crocodile (Ezek. 29:3; 32:2). Matthew used the Greek ketos, indicating a great sea monster rather than indicating a particular species.

WHEAT Staple grain of the ancient Near East (Num. 18:12). Wheat has been raised in this region since at least Neolithic times (8300-4500 B.C.). Many species exist, and exact types cannot be determined from the biblical words. It became the major crop after the nomads began settling into agrarian societies. It is used as an analogy to speak of God's judgment (Matt. 3:12) and His care (Ps. 81:16). Wheat was used to make bread and was also parched (Lev. 23:14). KJV often translated “wheat” by the word “corn” (Mark 4:28). Wheat harvest was an ancient time reference (Exod. 34:22) and was celebrated by the Feast of Weeks. Wheat is said to have been harvested (1 Sam. 6:13), threshed (Judg. 6:11), and winnowed (Matt. 3:12). See Agriculture; Bread; Harvest; Plants.

WHEEL Disk or circular object capable of turning on a central axis. Archaeologists and historians believe that the wheel was probably invented in Mesopotamia before 3000 B.C.

The Bible describes both a functional use and symbolic meaning for the wheel. The wheel was indispensable for transportation. It was used on wagons, carts, and chariots, and the word “wheel” could be a synonym for any of these vehicles (Ezek. 23:24; 26:10; Nah. 3:2). In Solomon's temple there were 10 stands upon which rested 10 lavers. Each of the stands was adorned with four wheels (1 Kings 7:30-33).

Ezekiel's vision of the great wheel in the sky (1:4-28; 10) was a symbol of God's presence. There were four cherubim around the throne. Beside each there was a wheel which “sparkled like chrysolite” (1:16 NIV). Ezekiel described the rims of the wheel as “high and awesome” and “full of eyes” (v. 18). The exact meaning of these mysterious images is unknown. Perhaps they represented the wheels of God's invisible chariot moving across the sky (“chariots of the sun,” 2 Kings 23:11) or the wheels of God's throne (Dan. 7:9).

Other symbolic uses of the wheel are a whirlwind (Ps. 77:18 HCSB, NIV, NRSV, NASB) and God's judgment, as a wheel is driven over the wicked (Prov. 20:26). Jeremiah described God's redemption as the reshaping of marred clay on a potter's wheel (18:13). See Chariots.

WHELP Lion's cub, used figuratively in the OT (Gen. 49:9; Jer. 51:38; Nah. 2:11). See Lion.

WHIRLWIND English translation of four Hebrew words that designate any windstorm that is destructive. Only Ps. 77:18 uses a term indicating circular motion. True whirlwinds and tornadoes are rare in Palestine. They usually occur near the coast where the cool breezes of the from the desert. Lesser whirlwinds are seen as whirling dust is thrown up into the air. The Lord used the raging wind to take Elijah to heaven (2 Kings 2:1,11) and to talk with Job (38:1; 40:6). The prophets used the “storm wind” as a figure for judgment (Isa. 5:28; Jer. 4:13; Hos. 8:7; Amos 1:14; Zech. 7:14). God comes to deliver His people riding the stormy winds (Zech. 9:14).

WIDOW Special consideration for widows is first mentioned in Exod. 22:22 (fatherless are also mentioned in v. 22, and foreigners are mentioned in v. 21; see Ps. 94:6). Since God has compassion on widows (Pss. 68:5; 146:9; Prov. 15:25), we should do the same (Isa. 1:17; 1 Tim. 5:3; James 1:27). When a nation and its leaders do so, they are promised a blessing (Deut. 14:29; Jer. 7:5-7); the person or nation that does not is cursed (Deut. 27:19; Job 22:9-11; Jer. 22:3-5; Ezek. 22:7,15-16; Mal. 3:5; Mark 12:40). Joab appealed to David's compassion for childless widows when he sent the woman of Tekoa to tell a story in order to get David to restore Absalom (2 Sam. 14:1-21).

Widows and orphans lacked the economic, legal, and physical protection a man provided in that society.

To be both a widow and childless is a double hardship. Such a woman has no husband to be provider and protector and also has no son or even prospects for a son to carry on the family name and to support her in her old age (Ruth 4:10; 2 Sam. 14:7; 1 Kings 17:8-24; 1 Tim. 5:4). For this reason, God is sometimes doubly gracious to such a person (Ruth 4:13-17; Luke 7:11-15). In the biblical accounts the bereaved widow was given a son either by miraculous restoration (the widow of Zerahath, the widow of Nain) or by marriage (Naomi). See Levirate Law, Levirate Marriage.

A high priest was not allowed to marry a widow or a divorced woman (Lev. 21:14).

Sometimes nations were threatened or cursed by saying that the women would become widows (Exod. 22:24; Ps. 109:9). This is another way of saying that the men would be killed (Ezek. 22:25; Jer. 15:8; 18:21). In a similar image, a city or country can be called a "widow" figuratively (Isa. 47:5-9; Lam. 1:1; Rev. 18:7), meaning that it would be destitute and not under anyone's protection. Babylon is depicted as a widow in denial (Isa. 47:5-9; Rev. 18:7). God can restore a “widowed” city (Isa. 54:4).

The law provided for widows through a special tithe (Deut. 14:28-29; 26:12-13) and a policy of leaving gleanings during harvest (Deut. 24:19-21). The early church also had a policy of supporting its widows (Acts 6:1). Paul instructed Timothy to withhold this support from those widows who had other family who should support them, those who lived an ungodly lifestyle, and those young enough to support themselves or to remarry (1 Tim. 5:3-16). WILD OX See Ox.

WILDERNESS Holy Land areas, particularly in the southern part, with little rainfall and few people. The words for “wilderness” in the OT come close to our word “desert” because they usually mean a rocky, dry wasteland. Desert in the lands of the Bible is usually rocks instead of sand dunes. These have been called “tame” deserts because they have infrequent rainfall and wells or oases enough to accommodate some nomadic or seminomadic human occupancy. It was the land that neighbored inhabited land to which shepherds could drive their sheep and goats for pasture. David's older brother Eliab taunted him: “With whom have you left those few sheep in the wilderness?” (1 Sam. 17:28 NRSV). The wilderness could also have the forbidding sense of uninhabitable land, as Jeremiah described it: “a land of deserts and pits...a land of drought and deep darkness ... a land that no one passes through, where no one dwells” (Jer. 2:6 NRSV). It was a fearful place in which to get lost (Ps. 107:4-9).

Geographically the wilderness lay south, east, and southwest of the inhabited land of Israel in the Negev, Transjordan, and the Sinai. A particular wilderness, closer to home, lay on the eastern slopes of the Judean mountains in the rain shadow leading down to the Dead Sea. This particular wilderness, sometimes called Jeshimon, became a refuge for David when he fled from Saul and was the locale of the temptation of Jesus.

Historically the wilderness was particularly connected with the wandering of the Hebrews after their miraculous escape from Egypt and just prior to the conquest of Transjordan. This was remembered in their retelling of the story as “the great and terrible wilderness” (Deut. 1:19 HCSB; 8:15). There was good news and bad news about this period of the nation's existence. The good news was that God had provided manna, quail, and water from the rock. He had led them in the wilderness and revealed Himself and His covenant laws to them at Sinai/Horeb, the mountain of revelation. The bad news was they had rebelled against the Lord and murmured against Moses again and again in the wilderness. The book of Numbers is called in the Hebrew Bible bemidbar, “in the desert.” It tells the tragic story of Kadesh-barnea in the Wilderness of Paran and the spy committee who persuaded the people not to attack the promised land from the south, so that a whole generation died in the desert (Num. 13-14). In the book of Psalms the worshipping Israelites confessed these ancient sins (78:40; 106:26), and NT preachers used them as a warning to “wilderness Christians” not to make the same mistakes (1 Cor. 10:1-13; Heb. 3:16-19). There were several specific wilderness areas mentioned, such as those of Sin, Shur, Sinai, Paran, and Zin on the way of wilderness wanderings. Some specific locales were connected with David's outlaw years, such as Wilderness of En-gedi, of Judah, of Maon, of Ziph. Jeremiah once yearned for a desert lodge as a place of escape from his rebellious audience (9:2). People in biblical times mostly feared the desert as a place inhabited by beasts of prey, snakes, and scorpions (even demons) to which one might drive out the scapegoat (Lev. 16:10,22,26; Isa. 13:21-22; 34:13-14). So it was appropriate as a place for Jesus' temptation (Matt. 4:1-11; Mark 1:12-13; Luke 4:1-13).

The prophets felt that most of Israel's religious troubles began with the settlement of Canaan and apostasy to Canaanite idolatry, but they also looked forward to a renewed pilgrimage in the wilderness (Hos. 2:14-15; 9:10, cp. Deut. 32:10; Jer. 2:2-3; 31:2-3). There would be a new exodus after the Babylonian exile through the north Syrian Desert to make the Lord their king and “prepare his way” (Ezek. 20:30-38; Isa. 40:3-5). John the Baptist appeared in the wilderness of Judea as the promised prophetic forerunner (Matt. 3:1-3; Mark 1:2-4; Luke 3:2-6; John 1:23). Not only did Jesus overcome the tempter in the wilderness, but He fed the 4,000 in a desolate place east of the Sea of Galilee (Mark 8:1-9). See Desert; Mount

WILL See Sovereignty of God.

WILL OF GOD God's plan and purpose for His creation and for each individual. God does whatever He pleases (Ps. 135:6) and desires that all people do His will. Only people fully mature in Christ are able to do God's will consistently (Col. 4:12; cp. Ps. 40:8). God's will is always good, acceptable, and perfect (Rom. 12:2). Doing God's will sustained Jesus for life (John 4:34). Sometimes, however, the will of God leads to suffering (Rom. 8:28; James 1:2-4; 1 Pet. 3:17), as it did for Jesus (Isa. 53:10; Matt. 26:39,42).

Christians are to strive to know the will of God for their lives (Ps. 143:10; Eph. 5:17; Col. 1:9; cp. Rom. 1:10). Christians are to discern God's will through prayer (Col. 1:9) and also pray that God's will for the world be done (Matt. 6:10). Jesus counted those who did God's will as His own family members (Matt. 12:50). They, like Jesus, will live forever (1 John 2:17).

WILLOW Tree usually found where water is plentiful, particularly along the Jordan River. Often the willow and the poplar are found together. The willow can grow up to 40 feet high. Willow branches were used to make the booths for the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:40). In Babylonian captivity the Jews hung their harps on willow trees because they did not feel like singing about Jerusalem in a foreign land (Ps. 137:1-4). NIV often translated willow as “poplar.” See Plants.

WIND Natural force that represents in its extended meaning the breath of life in human beings and the creative, infilling power of God and His Spirit.

Early Concepts Two words in the Bible—the Hebrew ruach and the Greek pneuma—bear the basic meaning of wind but are often translated as spirit. Some understanding of the development of the latter word clarifies this transfer in meaning and enriches the concept.

Pneuma originally represented an elemental, vital, dynamic wind or breath. It was an effective power, but it belonged wholly to the realm of nature. This force denoted any type of wind and ranged from a soft breeze to a raging storm or fatal vapor. It was the wind in persons and animals as the breath they inhaled and exhaled. It was life, since breath was the sign of life. It was soul, since the animating force left when breathing ceased.

Metaphorically speaking, pneuma could be extended to mean a kind of breath that blew from the invisible realms; thus, it could designate spirit, a sign of the influence of the gods upon persons, and the source of a relationship between mankind and the divine. In primitive mythology this cosmic wind possessed a life-creating power, and a god could beget a son by his breath. The divine breath also inspired poets and granted ecstatic speech to prophets.

In all of these reflections, wind remained an impersonal, natural force. When we come to the Judeo-Christian understanding, however, the concept and terms retain their dynamic characteristics but rise from cosmic power to personal being.

Old Testament In the OT the primary meaning of the word ruach is wind. There is the slight breeze (Ps. 78:39), the storm wind (Isa. 32:2), the whirlwind (2 Kings 2:11), and the scorching wind (Ps. 11:6). Winds from the mountains and sea to the north and west brought rain and storm (1 Kings 18:43-45; Exod. 10:19; Ezek. 1:4); those coming from the deserts of the south and east could at times be balmy but more often would sear the land and dry up the vegetation (Gen. 41:6; Job 37:1-2). Coming from different directions, wind was identified with those directions, referring to the four corners or quarters of the earth or of heaven (Jer. 49:36; Ezek. 37:9).

Theophanies, or manifestations of God, were often associated with the wind. God answered Job out of the whirlwind (Job 38:1), and the four living creatures appeared to Ezekiel in a strong wind from the north (1:4).

Wind was a symbol of transience (Ps. 78:39), fruitless striving (Eccles. 1:14), and desperateness (Job 6:26). More importantly, it was a mighty force which only God could command (Jer. 10:13). The wind did God's bidding (Ps. 104:4). So closely is the wind connected with God's will that it is called His breath that He blew on the sea to cover the chariots of Pharaoh (Exod. 15:10), or by which He froze rivers (Job 37:10) and withered grass (Isa. 40:7).

The wind is also breath in humans as the breath of life (Gen. 6:17). The entry of breath gives life (Ezek. 37:5-7); and, when it is taken away, the person dies (Ps. 104:29). The breath that brings death when it is withdrawn is identified as God's breath (Job 34:14-15). This same breath of the Almighty is the spirit of wisdom and understanding in a person (Job 32:8). When ruach is used of the will, intellect, and emotions, or related to God, the meaning often expands from the wind to spirit (Isa. 40:13). Thus Psalm 51 uses ruach three times when referring to the steadfast, willing, and broken spirit of the psalmist and once when speaking of God's Holy Spirit (vv. 10-12,17). Sometimes opinions differ whether the meaning is best served by translating the word as “wind” (breath) or “spirit” when it is specifically designated the ruach of God. Thus NRSV translates Gen. 1:2, “a wind from God,” to mean that a wind was moving over the primordial waters; other translations speak of God's Spirit hovering there.

New Testament God makes His angels winds (Heb. 1:7), and “with the breath of His mouth” the Lord Jesus will destroy the wicked one (2 Thess. 2:8).

The extended meaning, after the experience of Pentecost, has become dominant, and pneuma usually refers to a person's inner being (in distinctions from the body) with which the personal Spirit of God communicates and blends as it generates and sanctifies Christians and forms them into the body of Christ (John 3:5-8; Rom. 8:14-16; 1 Cor. 12:7-13; Gal. 5:16-23). In each of these extended meanings, we can still detect in their foundation the image of the wind (pneuma) which blows where it wills (John 3:8). See Spirit

The Hebrew term indicates holes in the wall for air and light (Gen. 8:6; Josh. 2:15; Judg. 5:28). WINE Beverage made from fermented grapes. Grapes grew throughout ancient Palestine. Even in areas with limited rainfall, enough dew fell at night to support thriving vineyards. Wine was produced by pressing the juice from the grapes in large stone vats with a small drain at one end. The juice was collected in troughs, poured into large jars, and allowed to ferment while stored in cool, rock cisterns. In NT times wine was kept in skin flasks and often diluted with water. It was also used as a medicine and disinfectant. Scripture condemns drunkenness and overindulgence but pictured wine as a part of the typical ancient meal. See Drink; Vine.

WINEPRESS Machine used for making wine from grapes. Making wine has always been a major industry in Syria-Palestine. The ancient Egyptian story of Sinuhe, dating from the time of the middle Bronze Age (about 2200-1550 B.C.), describes this land as having “more wine than water.”

In OT times the presses for making wine were usually cut or hewed out of rock (Isa. 5:2) and were connected by channels to lower rockcut vats where the juice was allowed to collect and ferment. The juice was squeezed from the grapes by treading over them with the feet (Job 24:11; Amos 9:13). Recent excavations at Tel Aphek have uncovered two unusually large plaster winepresses dating from the late Bronze Age (1550-1200 B.C.). The presses were connected to large collection pits that still contained the Canaanite jars for the storage of the wine.

After the juice had fermented, it was collected into jars or wineskins (Matt. 9:17, and parallels). At ancient Gibeon archaeologists discovered a major wine-producing installation dating from about 700 B.C. In addition to the presses and fermentation tanks, 63 rock-cut cellars were found with a storage capacity of 25,000 gallons of wine. In these cellars the wine could be kept at a constant cool temperature of 65 degrees Fahrenheit. Both royal presses and cellars are mentioned in 1 Chron. 27:27 and Zech. 14:10. Other activities besides the making of wine could go on at a press site (Judg. 6:11; 7:25). By the NT period both beam presses and presses with mosaic pavements were in use.

The harvesting and treading of the grapes was a time of joy and celebration (Isa. 16:10; Jer. 48:33; Deut. 16:13-15), and the image of the abundance of wine is used to speak of God's salvation and blessing (Prov. 3:10; Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13). But God's judgment is also vividly portrayed as the treading of the winepress (Isa. 63:2-3; Rev. 14:19-20). See Agriculture; Vine; Wine. John C. H. Laughlin WING Specialized part of the bird that allows flight (Gen. 1:21). The word is most often used figuratively: of God's help (Ruth 2:12), of God's judgment (Jer. 48:40), of strength to return from exile (Isa. 40:31).

WINNOWER A step in the processing of grain whereby the grain is separated from the inedible parts. The stalks are thrown into the air, and the wind blows away the chaff and the straw, letting the heavier pure grain fall back to the ground (Isa. 30:24). John the Baptist used winnowing as an analogy of God's judgment, when the Lord would separate the sinful from the righteous (Matt. 3:12). See Agriculture.

WISDOM AND WISE MEN Educated class of people responsible for preserving and transmitting the culture and learning of the society. Though wisdom and the wise men who perpetuated it have been around almost as long as have people, the study of wisdom in the ancient Near East is a relatively new endeavor. This has been due, in part, to a lack of a clear definition of the term “wisdom,” as well as the difficult nature of the poetic language within which most of the wisdom material has been found. Sad to say, neither of these issues is completely solved today though much has been learned in recent years.

Real Wisdom Is the Fear of God Three basic definitions of wisdom summarize the status of the field of study very well. Note that the first two of these definitions are quite secular in nature while the third is religious.

First, wisdom is considered by many to be simply the art of learning how to succeed in life. Apparently ancient persons learned very early that there was orderliness to the world in which they lived. They also learned that success and happiness came from living in accordance with that orderliness (Prov. 22:17-24:22). Second, wisdom is considered by some to be a philosophical study of the essence of life. Certainly much of the books of Job and Ecclesiastes seem to deal with just such existential issues of life (Job 30:29-31). Third, though the other definitions might include this, it seems that the real essence of wisdom is spiritual, for life is more than just living by a set of rules and being rewarded in some physical manner. Undoubtedly in this sense wisdom comes from God (Prov. 2:6). Thus, though it will involve observation and instruction, it really begins with God and one's faith in Him as Lord and Savior (Prov. 1:7; Job 28:28).

The Wise Men Preserved This Wisdom Though at first such wisdom was probably the responsibility of the patriarch or head of the clan, it appears that every ancient culture developed a distinct class of people, the chakam or sages, who were responsible for the creating and preserving of their wisdom. No doubt these people were part of the more educated group of their societies who could read and write and had the economic freedom to do so.

Certainly Israel was no exception. The first clear reference to wise men in the biblical text is the one about Ahithophel and Hushai during the reign of David (2 Sam. 16:15-17:23). However, during Solomon's day, the wisdom movement took on a whole new significance, for Solomon and his court became world renowned for their wisdom (1 Kings 4:29-34; 10). Certainly his reign became known as the “golden age” of Israelite culture (Luke 12:27).

Though the movement became less visible during the early part of the divided monarchy, it was still quite active, for Hezekiah's wise men were very concerned about preserving the wisdom tradition for future generations (Prov. 25:1). Later still, Jeremiah's enemies even confronted him regarding his prophecy that the Law would perish from the priests, the prophets, and the sages (Jer. 18:18). Thus, clearly by the fall of Judah, the sage had taken his place as one of the key leaders in Israelite society.

No doubt, as the role of the prophet became less visible during the intertestamental period, the role of the sage and the priest became more prominent (Ecclesiasticus 38:24-39:11). Apparently this development continued right on into the NT era when the magi (or sage) announced the birth of Christ (Matt. 2:1-12) who became the greatest of all wisdom teachers (Matt. 12:42; 13:54; Mark 6:2).

Most Wisdom Is in Poetic Form Most of the ancient Near Eastern wisdom material has been found in some type of poetic structure. Until recent years these structures have been a mystery because they did not seem to rhyme either in meter or sound as modern languages do. However, in A.D. 1753 Bishop Robert Lowth unlocked the key to such poetic writing when he discovered that Hebrew poetry rhymed in thought. Moreover, he surmised that such thoughts were most commonly expressed in parallel patterns. Some of these patterns expressed the same thoughts (Prov. 20:1), while others expressed opposing thoughts (Prov. 10:1) or developed a given thought (Prov. 31:10-31). In time these parallel patterns were structured into specific forms such as the proverb, riddle, allegory, hymn, disputation, autobiographical narrative, didactic narrative, and lists. No doubt such beautiful and intricate poetic structure was clearly a mark of the sage and the wisdom schools of his day and age. See Poetry.

Wisdom Became the Guide for Daily Living Though in recent years many parts of the sacred Scripture have been considered under wisdom's umbrella, no doubt the greatest contribution of Israel's sages has been the three books found in the "Writings" (Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes). However, certain of the other "writings" such as the Psalms, the Song of Songs, and Lamentations contain figures of speech and stylized forms reflective of the wisdom tradition. In addition to these, the intertestamental works of Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon continued the tradition and laid an excellent foundation for the ultimate revelation of wisdom in Christ Jesus (Matt. 11:19; Luke 11:49-51; 1 Cor. 1:24,30; Col. 1:15-20; Rev. 5:12). See Apocrypha; Intertestamental History and Literature; Pseudepigrapha.

Certainly biblical wisdom like that of other cultures emphasizes the success and well-being of the individual. This is visible not only in the topics it chooses to deal with, but also in the way it deals with them. Some of its major topics are: knowledge, the world, justice, virtue, family, and faith. The greatest of these may be faith, which is constantly watching over wisdom and really all of life (Prov. 1:7). See Ecclesiastes, Book of; Job, Book of; Proverbs, Book of.

WISDOM LITERATURE A genre of writing featuring wise sayings and astute observations. These writings teach how to live according to such principles as intelligence, understanding, common sense, statecraft, and practical skills. With regard to the Bible, the term refers to the books of Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes. Portions of other biblical books—such as Esther, Psalms, Song of Songs, and Daniel—can also be classified as Wisdom literature, as can the apocryphal books Sirach and the Wisdom of Solomon. Ancient Egypt and Babylon also produced Wisdom literature, but biblical Wisdom literature is unique, teaching that the fear of God is the foundation of true wisdom (Prov. 9:10) and ultimate success (Ps. 25:12-13; Eccles. 8:12-13).

WITNESS, MARTYR Refers generally to something or someone that bears testimony to things seen, heard, transacted, or experienced. The bearing of testimony can be either passive (as when one is present as a spectator or bystander-Gen. 21:30; Ruth 4:7; Heb. 12:1) or active (as when one gives evidence as a witness). The conventional meaning and usage pertains to the legal sphere but can also refer to the moral sphere. Bearing witness may also denote the content and/or the significance of the testimony. Additionally, a witness (testimony) may refer to facts about which a person is firmly convinced by faith and for which that person would willingly die. In this last sense such a person would be referred to as a martyr. The distinction between witness (marturion, marturia) and martyr (martus) consists only in the degree of their testimony, since both words are cognates of the same Greek verb meaning, “I testify/bear witness” (martureo).

Old Testament The words translated “witness” and “testimony” derive from three Hebrew words: 'ed, a legal witness, and mo'ed, or sometimes 'edah, meaning agreement or appointment.

Legal The chief usage of witness is in the legal sphere, referring to facts or personal experiences (Lev. 5:1; Num. 23:18; Isa. 8:2). It also denotes the proof or evidence presented in a court case, primarily by the prosecution (Num. 5:13; 35:30; Deut. 17:6-7; 19:15). False, unrighteous, and overhasty witnesses are disdained and subject to reprisals (Deut. 19:16-21; Exod. 23:1; Pss. 26:12; 34:11; Prov. 6:19; 12:17; 19:5; 21:28). Examples of a witness to an agreement are found in Ruth 4:9-10 and Jer. 39:10,25,44. God may be invoked as a witness to one's integrity (Job 16:19). In an accusatory sense the Israelites stand self-accused if they return to idolatry (Josh. 24:22). Israel is also a witness to the uniqueness, reality, and deity of God on the basis of their experience of election by God (Isa. 43-44).

Memorial Inanimate objects sometimes served as witnesses to promises, pacts, and covenants. Altars (Josh. 22), piles of stones (Gen. 31:44; Josh. 24:27), and even God's law (Exod. 25:22) are examples. Mo'ed is used over 100 times for “witness” in the phrase “Tent of Witness” (ohel mo'ed), meaning the appointed place where God met Moses (Exod. 25:22).

Moral This ideological nuance of witness involves the proclamation of certain truths, views, and internal convictions one holds by faith, and for which one would willingly die. This sense is not as distinct in the OT as it later became in the NT and early church. A firm case cannot be made for any kind of martyr theology in the OT.

New Testament Legal In the judicial sense “witness” refers to a person who gives testimony and/or to the content of that testimony (John 1:7; 3:28; 1 Pet. 5:12; Matt. 18:16; cp. Deut. 19:15), whether true or false (Matt. 26:60-68). Jesus tells the scribes and Pharisees they are self-accusing witnesses (Matt. 23:31).

Personal Witness is used meaning “reputation” (Luke 4:22, Acts 6:3; 1 Tim. 3:7; Rev. 3:1) and may also refer to one's own life or person (as John the Baptist; John 1:6-7). Jesus, throughout John's Gospel, was a witness to God's love and gift of eternal life to believers and was an accusing witness to non-believers (John 20:30-31; 21:24).

Evangelistic Especially in the Lukan material, witness is used in an active, evangelistic sense. Christians proclaim the gospel (kerugma) in an active, insistent way, encouraging listeners to receive and respond to their message (Acts 2:40; 18:5; 1 Thess. 2:11-12).

Mortal The word martus refers to a martyr, one who is deprived of life as a result of one's testimony for Jesus Christ. This term is only used three times in the NT (Acts 22:20; Rev. 2:13; 17:6). See Martyr. Stefana Dan Laing

WIZARD See Medium.

WOLF Largest of wild carnivorous canines (Canis lupus; Canis pallipes) that include dogs, foxes, and jackals. It is thought to be the primary ancestor of the domestic dog. The wolf is known for its boldness and fierceness of attack (Luke 10:3). It often killed more than it could eat because the taste of blood put it into a frenzy. Shepherds knew the wolf as the greatest enemy of sheep. The wolf was well-known in biblical days (John 10:12), yet nearly every reference to wolves is in a figurative sense. Its name is used symbolically to describe deceitful and greedy people (Gen. 49:27; Jer. 5:6; Ezek. 22:27; Zeph. 3:3; Acts 20:29). Jesus used the figure of the false prophet as a wolf in sheep's clothing (Matt. 7:15). One of the signs of the messianic age is that the “wolf and the lamb will feed together” (Isa. 65:25).

WOMAN The Bible's paradigm for womanhood, while allowing for diversity and uniqueness, is nevertheless entirely consistent and without contradiction in its presentation of the Creator's plan for the nature and purposes of womanhood.

The Origin of the Woman The woman came after the man as his acknowledged offshoot, having a nature like his but her own unique existence. This creative act establishes the unity of the human race, guarantees the dignity and worth of the woman, and forges an exclusive and permanent kinship between the man and the woman.

The woman was received by the man as designed and offered to him by the Creator (Gen. 2:22). She is the only creature said to be “built” by God (Hb. banah, “made” in 2:22, literally “built”). God “built” the woman from raw resources derived from the man (Gen. 2:22). According to the rabbis, the wife “builds” the home and her children as her responsibility in marriage.

When Adam said “she was taken from man” in 2:23, he used a clever play on words to affirm the physical congruity of this new person. “Man” (Hb. ish) is contrasted with “woman” (ishshah). This linguistic similarity is also in other languages: the Anglo-Saxon “wombman,” literally “the man with the womb”; the German mann and maennin.

Man and woman are created “in the image of God” and their position in Christ eliminates any possibility of inferiority of either to the other. Yet, because they are complementary, they cannot be identified one as the other. Equal dignity prohibits the despising of one by the other; complementary interaction of one with the other requires that differences be honored.

Together man and woman are equipped to continue the generations and to exercise dominion over the earth and its resources. Yet the divine order calls for a reciprocity exhibited in male servant leadership and female submission, both of which are modeled in Jesus Himself.

Old Testament Israelite women managed the household and performed the duties of wives and mothers (Prov. 31:10-31). They had a measure of anonymity in life and were subordinate to their husbands. Beauty is associated with women in the Bible but without detail as to what makes them beautiful (Gen. 12:11; 26:7; 29:17; 2 Sam. 11:2; Song 4:2-3). Inner beauty, defined as “the fear of the Lord” and a “gentle and quiet spirit,” is elevated over an attractive countenance (Prov. 31:30; 1 Tim. 2:9-10; 1 Pet. 3:3-4). Women were expected to meet their husbands' sexual needs, but their own needs were also to be met (Song 1:2; 2:3-6,8-10; 8:1-4; 1 Cor. 7:3,5).

The husband was the patriarch of his family or clan, and the wife became part of her husband's family. Women were an integral part of the community and were to be protected therein. Marriage was the ideal (Gen. 2:24); a good wife was usually praised and honored (Prov. 31:10-31); godly women were admired and their contributions greatly valued (e.g., Deborah, Hannah, Abigail, Naomi, Ruth, Esther); widows were to be protected (Deut. 24:19-22; 26:12).

A woman's legal position in Israel was weaker than a man's. Though a husband could divorce his wife for “some uncleanness in her,” no law is given suggesting that a wife could divorce her husband (Deut. 24:1-4). Wives could be required to take a jealousy test if they were suspected of unfaithfulness to their husbands, but no law is given permitting a wife to require the same of her husband (Num. 5:11-31).

Hebrew laws did offer protection for women. If a husband added a second wife, he was not allowed to ignore the needs of his first wife (Exod. 21:10). Even a woman taken captive in war had rights (Deut. 21:14), and a man found guilty of raping a woman was stoned to death (Deut. 22:23-27). Although men usually owned property, daughters could receive the inheritance from their fathers if there were no sons in the family (Num. 27:8-11). Often the importance of the dowry to women is overlooked. Since theoretically the dowry belonged to the bride, some have suggested that this gift represented the daughter's share of her father's estate. She received her “inheritance” upon marriage, while her brothers had to wait to receive their shares until the father's death.

The Bible identifies women who were active in ancient society: Deborah, a prophetess and judge; Esther, a queen whose skills in diplomacy saved the Jews from extinction; Lydia, a trades-woman with a thriving business. Just because the placement of women in civil and business pursuits is the exception rather than the rule does not lessen the valuable role of women in society. From the ancient world until now, society stands or falls according to its infrastructure, that is, the family, over which the wife and mother is to preside.

Children were to respect both mother and father equally (Exod. 20:12), even though they were the mother's special charge (Exod. 21:15; Prov. 1:8; 6:20; 20:20). The names of mothers appeared in biographies of successive kings (2 Chron. 24:7; 27:6). To disobey or curse either parent was punishable by stoning (Deut. 21:18-21). If a man and a woman were caught in the act of adultery, both were to be stoned (Deut. 22:22).

The husband exercised his spiritual leadership by presenting the sacrifices and offerings for the family (Lev. 1:2), but only women offered a sacrifice after the birth of a child (Lev. 12:6). Women also participated in worship, but they were not required, as the men, to appear before the Lord (Deut. 29:10; Neh. 8:2; Joel 2:16). This optional participation may have been because of their responsibilities as wives and mothers (1 Sam. 1:3-5,21-22).

New Testament Jesus offered women new roles and equal status in His kingdom. A woman was the first to bear witness of His resurrection (Matt. 28:8-10). Women followed Jesus with the multitudes (Matt. 14:21), and Jesus featured women and used things associated with them in His parables and illustrations (Matt. 13:33; 25:1-13; Luke 13:18-21; 15:8-10; 18:1-5).

An Arab village woman and small girl carrying large waterpots balanced on their heads.

In the NT the birth and infancy narratives note a remarkable number of women. Matthew includes four—Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Bathsheba—in his genealogy of Christ (Matt. 1:3,5-6). Through these women to whom God extended His forgiveness, Messiah would come. Jesus spoke to women (John 4) and taught them individually and privately (Luke 10:38-42). A company of women often traveled with Him (Luke 8:1-3), and He often spoke highly of women (Matt. 9:20-22; Luke 21:1-4). He safeguarded the rights of women, especially in His teachings on marriage and divorce (Matt. 5:27-32; 19:3-9). For Jesus to expend time and energy in teaching women indicates that He saw in them not only intellectual acumen but also spiritual sensitivity.

Jesus treated men and women as equal in spiritual privilege but as different in spiritual activity. No woman was among the 12 disciples nor among the 70 He sent out (Luke 10:1-12); the Lord's Supper was instituted within a group of men (Matt. 26:26-29). Jesus' selectiveness by no means minimized the ministries He gratefully received from godly women—words of encouragement, hospitality, gifts to undergird His work. Jesus elevated domestic responsibilities that women used in ministering to Him to a new importance.

According to the Ancients The Apostolic Fathers did speak on the subject of women. Most frequently they commented on the church's responsibility to care for its widows. The work of Christian women in the keeping of their homes and proper training of their children was praised.

Although statements of the Church Fathers may seem unfair and prejudiced toward women, one must not ignore the fact that the Church Fathers were united in acknowledging the home as the place for women. Within the home there is much evidence that special emphasis was given to protect a woman and to elevate the importance of her role. The Church Fathers also assigned subordination to the woman, but it was through this subordination that the woman received honor and responsibility in her sphere—the home.

Rabbinic Thought The Jewish attitude toward women expressed outside the canon of Scripture at times was discriminatory and demeaning. Many rabbis would not speak to women or teach them. Such depreciation of women in rabbinic literature is found in their commentary on Scripture and can be attributed to rabbinic legalism. Although Israel failed at times to give proper honor and recognition to her women, the Law of Israel protected women in their vulnerability (e.g., the widow through the custom of levirate marriage, Deut. 25:5-10).

In Judaism men alone comprised the required quorum and fulfilled religious duties in worship. Women did not even sit with the men. Women may have been freed from public religious obligations in order to perform the spiritual rituals in the home and to be unencumbered to nurture their children. The difference is not that one role is better than another but rather that each is important for its respective contribution.

The Helper: A Different Function Although in contemporary usage “helper” (Hb. ezer) is generally understood as someone in a menial position, “helper” in the OT merely describes the ethical, spiritual, and physical assistance given to one in need. The term “helper” defines a woman's role in the functional difference existing between husband and wife. Whoever helps provides support, walks alongside, offers advice without forcing compliance, and acts in response to a need presented.

A “helper” is one who provides what is lacking in another, one who can do what another cannot do alone. The Lord comes as a helper to assist the helpless, not because He is inferior and relegated to menial “helping” tasks, but rather because He alone has what is necessary to meet the needs (Exod. 18:4; Deut. 33:7; Hos. 13:9; Ps. 70:5). He may choose to bring the powers of His deity to human affairs.

General assignments within the divine order have not changed, but the leader always has the prerogative to choose to function as a helper. The nuance of meaning in the term “helper” is not related to worth or personhood but rather concerns role or function, for example, the realm in which help is to be offered.

As a helper the woman limits her subordination to her function and role but is complete within that function. This self-imposed limitation does not invalidate any superior giftedness but makes all her gifts and abilities available to the one she is committed to help.

The woman is the “one corresponding to him” (KJV, “meet for him”) possessing neither inferiority nor superiority but being in her personhood like and equal to him. The phrase “helper who is like him” (HCSB) shows in the language itself the equality of personhood linked to the difference in function. One is set over against another by way of comparison, or one corresponds to another in a complementary way.

In order for the man to accomplish the Creator's plan for his life, he needed the help of one corresponding to him in every way, one who will be a partner in continuing the generations as well as in fulfilling the responsibilities of dominion assigned to the man by God Himself. Only the woman is the helper who corresponds to the man as a partner to provide something different than he provides for himself.

The foundation for the divine institution of marriage is found in the man's need and the woman's ability to meet that need—a reciprocity designed by the Creator. The woman in no way is the result of male planning or action, for God created her while Adam was in a deep sleep (Gen. 2:21). Intimacy does not have to be understood as the loss of uniqueness by the male or the female, nor does it suggest that one's identity must be absorbed into another. The oneness of the man and woman was never intended to negate their uniqueness of individualities and personalities, which was God's idea.

The Kingdom of Christ Scripture affirms that women functioned in the early church with service, influence, leadership, and teaching. Mark's mother Mary and Lydia of Thyatira opened their homes for meetings of believers and practiced hospitality (Acts 12:12; 16:14-15). Paul mentioned Phoebe with favor (Rom. 16:1-2), and he employed women in kingdom service (Phil. 4:3). Priscilla, with her husband Aquila, instructed Apollos in individual ministry (Acts 18:26). Women offered themselves in special ministries to Jesus (John 12:1-11).

Some women are identified as prophetesses: Miriam, who led the women of Israel (Exod. 15:20); Huldah, whose only prophecy in Scripture was to a man who consulted her at home (2 Kings 22:14-20); Noadiah, who was labeled a false prophet (Neh. 6:1-14); Anna, who prophesied in the temple (Luke 2:36-40); and the daughters of Philip (Acts 21:9). God also reserves the right to interdict history with the unexpected or extraordinary by His own divine fiat, such as calling Deborah to be a judge of Israel (Judg. 4-5).

No evidence exists of suppressing women in kingdom ministries. Rather, they are encouraged to work within the divinely given framework based upon the natural order of creation and appropriateness of function. Paul commended learning for women (1 Tim. 2:11). He exhorted spiritually mature women to instruct the younger women and outlined what they were to teach (Titus 2:3-5). Women are admonished to share the gospel (1 Pet. 3:15), and mothers and fathers are to do lifestyle teaching to their children (Deut. 6:7-9). Women may pray and prophesy in the church (1 Cor. 11:5), but they are given boundaries within which to exercise their gifts. Only two restrictions are given: teaching men and ruling over men—and that within two spheres, the home and church (1 Tim. 2:11-15). See Anthropology; Humanity; Sin.

WOODWORKER Person who worked with wood in some sense—cutting trees in a forest (1 Kings 5:6), bringing the logs to where they were needed (v. 9), building the house and the furniture needed for it (2 Kings 22:6), and making beautiful objects of art from wood. See Occupations and Professions.

WOOL Thick hair, forming the coat of sheep and some other animals. It was made into thread and used to make clothing, blankets, and other articles. It was one of the major economic factors in Israel and the surrounding countries. Gideon used a piece of wool to determine God's will for his life (Judg. 6:35-40). Wool was also used as a symbol of whiteness and purity (Isa. 1:18). See Cloth, Clothing; Sheep.

WORD Utterance or saying that may refer to a single expression, the entire law, the gospel message, or even Christ.

Old Testament Dabar is the primary Hebrew expression for “word.” It has various meanings and can refer to a spoken utterance, a saying, a command, a speech, or a story—linguistic communication in general. Dabar can also mean a thing, event, or action (Gen. 18:14). Occasional difficulty arises in distinguishing between these meanings (Ps. 35:20 HCSB, “deceitful schemes”; NRSV, “deceitful words”; KJV, “deceitful matters”; REB, “intrigues”; NIV, “false accusations”). The frequent construction of “the word of the Lord” or “the word of Yahweh” refers to communication made by God to people. The meanings of this communication are seldom related, nor must the phrase refer to a particular set of words. Three aspects of this word demand special attention.

prophets claimed to deliver the “word of God” (Jer. 1:9). For this purpose they were commissioned (Isa. 6:8). This word of God addressed human beings and demanded a response. Thus God's word may be visualized as a great salvation (Isa. 2:2-5) or a great judgment (Jer. 26:4-6). A prophetic word The the covenant law God spoke the words of the law to Moses (Exod. 20:1; 24:3-8). The heart of the law is called the 10 words (Exod. 34:28; Deut. 4:13). The entire law represents the will of God and so can be called a single “word” (Deut. 4:2 KJV). This word also demands response: faithful obedience will bring God's blessing while disobedience will lead to a curse (Deut. 30:15-20). A legal word In

A creative word God created the world by His word (Gen. 1; Isa. 48:13; Ps. 33:9). This world reveals God's majesty (Ps. 19:1) and thus extends the sphere of His revelation beyond His work with covenant Israel to all people. The word is spoken of as if it were a person who directs the events of nature (Ps. 147:15-18; 148:8), saves (107:20), and gives life (Ezek. 37:1-4).

New Testament Logos and hrema are the two primary Greek words meaning “word.” They are used interchangeably and variously as with the OT dabar. The NT can use these words to apply to Jesus' message, the message about Jesus, and Jesus Himself.

Jesus' message of the coming kingdom can be called a “word” (Mark 2:2; 4:33; Luke 5:1) as can His individual sayings (Matt. 26:75; Luke 22:61; John 7:36). Significantly, Jesus avoided citing rabbinic authorities or using the traditional language of a prophet who would claim that “the word of the Lord came to me” or declare “thus says the Lord.” Perhaps these phrases did not significantly honor His special relationship with the Father and His own authority (Matt. 11:27; cp. 5:21-26; Mark 3:28-29). As in the OT, so also Jesus' word demanded decision on the part of the hearers (John 8:51; 12:47).

The message concerning Jesus can also be called “a word.” Paul spoke of “the message about God that you heard from us” that is mediated by his human words (1 Thess. 2:13 HCSB). The content of this word is certainly the good news story concerning Jesus' death and resurrection—the heart of the gospel (1 Cor. 15:3-5). This message is the word of the cross (Gal. 3:1) and is the core content of Paul's preaching (1 Cor. 2:2). Because of His sacrifice and resurrection, the gospel message is a “message of reconciliation” (2 Cor. 5:19) and a “message of life” (Phil. 2:16). The word is witnessed and proclaimed by Jesus' followers (Luke 1:2; Acts 4:2; 6:7). The word revealed through the Son (Heb. 1:1-4) brings illumination and judgment.

Jesus Himself is the Word—the living Word. The preexistent Word who was with God “in the beginning” has now become flesh (John 1:1-18). Scholars have frequently claimed that John used logos in a philosophical sense to refer to the world's controlling rational principle (Stoicism) or to the created intermediary between God and His world (Philo). However, John's Word is not a principle or divine characteristic. It is a preexistent, life-giving person. John opposed Greek philosophy by arguing that salvation comes not by mankind's escape from this world but by God entering and redeeming creation. More probably logos was chosen because of its meaning in the OT, its Greek translation, and contemporary Hebrew literature, where the concepts of “wisdom” and “word” were being spoken of as a distinct manifestation of God. John saw that the same agent of God who gave life in the first creation was also giving life in the new creation inaugurated by Jesus' coming. The creative Word of God became flesh; being divine He embodied divine communication. Now the Word dwells among us revealing the glory of God (John 1:14).

Power of the Word It is often assumed that in Hebrew thought words had a mysterious binding authority. For example, when Isaac discovered he had been deceived and had wrongly given his blessing to Jacob, he declared that his blessing had been given and Jacob would be blessed (Gen. 27:33). Isaac's word seems conclusive—like an arrow once shot, it could not be recalled. Caution must be exercised here. Actually, only God's word has this type of irresistible potency (Isa. 55:11) and absolute creative power (Gen. 1:3-31; Luke 1:32-35; cp. Isa. 9:8; 31:2; 45:23). Most occurrences like Isaac's may be explained in terms of their social custom. Following a prescribed social custom, a person may form a bond, or a will, by speaking a word. Even today a couple can make or create a marriage by saying “I do.” We must also note that Scripture teaches that a person's word is often powerless (1 Cor. 2:4; 4:19-20) and frequently fails (Matt. 21:28-32).

Words are capable of great good and great evil (Matt. 12:36; James 3:5-6,8). Words can deeply injure (Prov. 12:18; 18:14) or revive (Prov. 12:18,25; 16:24). Words can have a widespread influence: words from the wicked are like “a scorching fire” (Prov. 16:27-28 HCSB); words from the righteous can be “a fountain of life” (Prov. 10:11; 12:14). Randy Hatchett

WORK, THEOLOGY OF Refers to the significance of work in light of the nature of God. God is a personal being whose manifold activities and works not only bestow blessings upon His creatures, but even infuse the act of work with meaning and divine significance, enjoining upon humans an obligation to engage in work even as God works.

God provides Himself as an example of balance between working and refraining from work, resting and delighting in the fruit of His labors. The importance of working is underscored by the fact that God ordained six out of seven days for work and only one day for rest (Exod. 20:8-11). Scripture clearly states that humans both work and rest in imitation of God (Exod. 20:11). Later (Deut. 5:12-15), the Sabbath is not only a day of physical rest and refreshment for all workers (servants, beasts, etc.), but also the Sabbath serves as a memorial of Israel's redemption from Egyptian bondage. See Sabbath.

A Working God Genesis opens with the image of a working, collaborative Creator, whose primal work constitutes an investment of His creativity, intelligence, words, breath, and “hands” (the image of the Son and Spirit as the two “hands of God” is a later, second-century theological development).

A Working Creature God's purpose for humans, who are the pinnacle of His creation, was to work, specifically in Eden, to till the soil (Gen. 2:15) and to manage the garden as good stewards. However, aside from God's direct injunction to till and manage the garden, it seems that working actively is integral to God's nature, and all His creatures reflect His nature when they work actively and diligently (Prov. 6:6-11). Despite the perfection of God's creation, human disobedience marred the image of God in them, resulting in a curse on the ground (Gen. 3:17-19). Henceforth, the cooperative relationship between humans and the rest of creation turned work from a pleasant task into toil and hardship. This state will continue until that eschatological time when the curse is lifted and all creation is redeemed (Rom. 8:19-23). In the intervening time both the OT and NT teach that work (no longer restricted to agriculture but expanded to include business dealings, household obligations, and any employment in which people find themselves) brings to humans a sense of joy, satisfaction, dignity, and respect (Eccles. 3; 4). God's people are not only to put forth their best efforts to accomplish their tasks; they are also called upon to maintain the highest moral and ethical standards. Transacting business with integrity, working with all diligence, and treating one's employees well are admired and praised (Boaz in Ruth 2:4), while dishonesty, laziness, and slothfulness are abhorred (Prov. 6).

The Wisdom literature might appear to portray creaturely work in a dismal light, harking back to the curse of Genesis (Eccles. 2:11, 18-23), in which humans must exert themselves to eke an existence out of the ground, as a daily reminder that they will one day return to it (Gen. 2:17-19,23). However, the message of the Wisdom literature regarding work is not that work is a curse for sin, but rather that humans will only survive by constant, toilsome physical exertion because the ground will no longer yield fruit easily. It is clear that the task set for humans remains the same outside paradise as within it: to till the ground (Gen. 3:23). The positive light for the Teacher (Preacher; Koheleth) was the blessing of God wherein humans are allowed to enjoy the fruits of their own toil (Eccles. 3:13) and also to find meaning in life (apart from their toil) through wisdom and the fear of God (Eccles. 2:24-26; 12:13).

In the NT creaturely labor is somehow sanctified because the Son of God also worked. Jesus and His disciples exemplified a life of working in various occupations (fishing, carpentry), and through many of His parables Jesus taught kingdom principles by using illustrations involving work (fairness and generosity in dealing with employees: Matt. 18:23-35; 20:1-16; resourcefulness in investing: Matt. 25:14-30; shrewdness and prudence:

Luke 16:1-13). In general, the Gospels and the Pauline literature portray work positively and exhort God's people to labor faithfully, honestly, fruitfully, and with a view to pleasing God more than earthly masters. Diligence receives praise while idleness draws censure (Eph. 6:5-9; 1 Thess. 2:9; 4:11-12; 2 Thess. 3:6-12).

Special New Testament Use of Work Beginning in the Gospels, “work” (kopos: toil, labor, hardship; or ergon: work, deed, action) and “worker” (ergates) frequently describe the ministry of the gospel. Jesus refers in this way to Himself (John 4:34, work of God; John 5:17, the work of healing; John 17:4, work of redemption) and to the Twelve sent out (Matt. 10:10: ergates, preaching the Gospel), and Paul uses this meaning on numerous occasions, in such phrases as “worked hard (ekopiasen) in the Lord,” referring to Mary, Tryphaena, Tryphosa, and Persis (Rom. 16); earning a “living by the gospel” (1 Cor. 9:14), “work (ergou) of faith” (1 Thess. 1:3), and a “workman” (ergaten) referring to Timothy, whose “work” consists of “correctly teaching the word of truth” (2 Tim. 2:15). Regardless of one's earthly, human vocation, every Christian also has divine avocation, which consists of doing the work of God in whatever measure he or she is enabled and gifted by the Holy Spirit. Stefana Dan Laing

WORKS Refers to acts, deeds, or accomplishments. Often indicates physical or mental activity to accomplish a task. Work was a duty given to Adam and was originally a fulfilling activity (Gen. 2:15). Work became a curse as a result of the fall (3:17-19), yet man was to continue to work (Exod. 20:9). Fulfillment and virtue are still found in labor.

“Works” is used also to describe deeds of God. It refers to evil deeds and good deeds. In the OT forms of the Hebrew word (pa'al, po'al) describe the works of God in creation (Exod. 15:17; Prov. 16:4), providence (Deut. 32:4; Isa. 51:2; Job 36:24), and judgment (Hab. 1:5). In the NT forms of the Greek term (ergon) are commonplace. Ergon is frequently used to describe the “works” of Jesus Christ. Used in all the Gospels, it is employed most frequently by John (5:36; 7:3,21; 10:25,32-33,38; 14:11-12; 15:24). This word is used also to describe deeds of man (John 6:27; Rom. 4:4-5) The Gospels asserted that believers demonstrate by good works that God is active in their lives (Matt. 5:16; John 6:28-29; 14:12).

Much debate exists concerning the relationship of faith and works in the salvation process. Paul stated that justification comes from faith alone apart from works (Rom. 4:2-3,9-10; Gal. 3:9-11; Eph. 2:8-9; Phil. 3:7-9). James, however, seems to affirm a closer relationship (James 2:14-24). This apparent contradiction has troubled many, especially Luther, who called James “an epistle of straw” and declared its message to be “flatly against St. Paul and all the rest of scripture in ascribing justification to works.”

There is a credible solution to the apparent contradiction. Paul, often dealing with Jewish legalists, used the term to describe “works of the law,” which legalists believed would earn salvation. Paul rejects these “works” as insufficient. However, he freely acknowledged the inevitability of good works by those genuinely converted by faith (Eph. 2:10). Conversely, James' argument is that any “faith” that cannot be seen by the evidence of “works” is not true saving faith (2:14). The definite article in the text (harpistis) indicates James is not speaking of genuine saving faith, but rather of a particular fictitious faith, proven to be such by a lack of good deeds. Paul and James are speaking from two sides of the same coin. Works of the law are insufficient to earn one's salvation, while good works are a natural consequence of saving faith. As Calvin put it: “Faith alone saves, but the faith that saves is not alone!” Joel Rainey WORLD Generally refers to what we would call today “the earth,” though sometimes its meaning seems to include the heavenly bodies as well. On other occasions it is used to refer to things in this “world,” or even to the time in which we live—in this “age of the world.” Old Testament Various Hebrew words speak in one way or another of the world. Erets (earth) is used in Isa. 23:17 and Jer. 25:26 to speak of this earth in which we live and is translated as “world” in the KJV. Olam is also translated “world” in the KJV in Ps. 73:12 and Eccles. 3:11, though newer translations usually render it as “age.” The major word in Hebrew that is translated “world” is tebel, a poetical term that speaks of the dwelling place of humans in all its fruitfulness (Job 18:18; 34:13; 37:12; 1 Sam. 2:8; Ps. 9:8).

Old Testament writers did not have access to the kind of scientific understanding of the world which is available to us, but that is not to say that the Hebrew Scriptures present us a mythological worldview. What does the OT say about the structure of the world in which we live?

Ezekiel 38:12 speaks of the fact that Israel is at the center of the earth or “the top of the world.” Some scholars claim that this means that the world is like a disc whose midpoint is the temple. This may be due to the fact that Homer believed the world had a midpoint that could be found in the sea (Odyssey 1.50) or that some Greek legends saw the Oracle of Delphi (or, in some, Athens) as the “navel of the earth.” However, this is to claim too much. The idea that the Hebrew word tabbur should be translated as “navel” is the key to this interpretation. The word is so used in Talmudic Hebrew, but there is no evidence that it is used in this manner in the OT itself. In fact, Ezekiel himself uses a word for “navel,” the word sor, in 16:4. It is not likely, then, that he is using the word in this fashion in this text. One of the great transgressions of biblical scholarship in the previous century, especially liberal scholarship, has been its tendency to read the Bible in the light of Greek myths or in the light of later Talmudism. This is to decontextualize and anachronize biblical teachings. Hebrew lexicographers have rejected the translation “navel of the earth” and proposed instead “top of the land” or “center of the land.”

Ezekiel 5:5 claims that Israel had been placed by God “at the center of the nations, with lands around her.” It stands in the middle of God's purposes in the world or at least in reference to her neighbors. Yet the word in Ezek. 38:12 is far more limited even than that. The immediate context, which contrasts Israel to the surrounding “unwalled villages,” indicates something like a “safe and secure location.”

Judges 9:37 is cited by some to support the notion that the OT writers saw the earth as a “disc, whose middle point is the central sanctuary,” but this interpretation cannot be accepted. In the KJV the verse reads, “See there come people down by the middle of the land, and another company come by the plain of Meonenim.” The key phrase here is “the middle of the land.” Read in context, the passage means only that some folk were coming from what was likely “a prominent landmark, probably a mountain,” as Arthur Cundall notes in his commentary on this text. The REB reads, “There are people coming down from the central ridge” (similarly NASB). In addition, regardless of the appropriate translation of Judg. 9:37, the phrase is not uttered by a prophet or an inspired speaker, but by someone not touted as a holy man at all—by Gaal. It therefore does not claim status of an inspired claim to truth; it is only a report of what someone said.

Job 9:6 speaks of the pillars of the earth. Psalm 104:5 and 1 Sam. 2:8 speak also in this vein, though those passages refer only to the “foundations” of the earth. The idea of the earth's “foundations” is non-specific and does not seem to involve any kind of specific or clear cosmological assertion. With the reference to “pillars,” though, some scholars point to the fact that in some ancient cosmologies it was believed that the earth sat upon pillars, as in some versions of Greek myth where the earth was believed to be suspended on the shoulders of Atlas. We have no way of knowing what Job thought, since we have access only to his writings, and the reference is in a highly poetic text, not a text of discursive prose. In addition, it is an incidental reference, not one that is central to the truth being taught, which is that God is sovereign.

One final text needs explaining: Gen. 1:6-8. Some argue that “firmament” is a clear example of the older idea of a heavenly dome. But, is this so? First, it should be noted that the translation, “firmament,” found in the KJV, is no longer considered credible. The English translation is taken from the Vulgate's firmamentum, which naturally gives the notion of something solid. The term raqi'a, though, simply means “expanse.” It is something spread out as a covering, as in Ezek. 10:1, which refers to the “expanse that was over the heads of the cherubim.” Certainly, such an expanse might be a solid covering, but this is not demanded by the word itself, as K. A. Mathews has noted in his commentary on Genesis. A raqi'a is something that is spread out either by stretching (as a tent) or by hammering. It seems that the old argument that the OT presents a mythical view of the world is not tenable.

New Testament The most common word for “world” in the Greek NT is kosmos. This often carries the notion of an ordered or regimented world that is open to observation and understanding (Matt. 4:8; Mark 8:36; John 1:9; 8:12; Acts 17:24; Rom. 1:20). The word aion is used often also to speak of the “world,” though literally it means “age,” and so, “world-age” or “this age” (Matt. 12:32; 13:22; Rom. 12:2; Heb. 1:2). Occasionally the idea of “all creation” is indicated by the term, “all things” (panta), as in John 1:3, or the phrase, “the whole creation” (pasa he ktisis) in Rom. 8:22.

Mankind was often referred to in the Scripture as the “world” or “earth.” This was because mankind is the most important part of God's creation as seen in the fact that “God loved the world in this way: He gave His only Son, so that everyone who believes in Him will not perish but have eternal life” (John 3:16 HCSB). The world that has fallen under His judgment consists of those who did not know Him (John 1:10), who rejected Him (12:48), and who did not believe in Him (3:18-19). John the Baptist referred to Jesus as the “Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world” (1:29). Satan was able to offer Jesus “all the kingdoms of the world” (Matt. 4:8-9; Luke 4:5) because he is the “ruler of this world” (John 9:39; 12:31; 14:30; 16:11), the “god of this world” (2 Cor. 4:4) and “the one who deceives the whole world” (Rev. 12:9). Christ's death brought the downfall of the “ruler of this world” (John 12:31). Jesus prophesied that the gospel will be preached by His disciples to the whole world (Matt. 24:14; 26:13; Rom. 10:18), and the first-century Christians were said to have “turned the world upside down” (Acts 17:7) with their proclamation.

The moral world overlaps with the human world because many people are hostile toward God and therefore the Scriptures use the term “world” to describe that environment or spirit of evil and of enmity toward God and the things of God. Particularly, in the Gospel of John, “world” takes on this sinister meaning. The world was not originally evil, yet “the whole world,” since the fall, has come “under the sway of the evil one” (1 John 5:19 HCSB). The cross is foolishness and an offense to the world. In contrast to the moral corruption and darkness of the world Jesus came as the “light of the world” (John 8:12; 9:5; 12:46) to keep men from stumbling in the darkness (11:9-12).

Worldliness is the idolatrous worship of the things one lusts after that belong to this world. “Therefore, put to death whatever in you is worldly” (Col. 3:5 HCSB). Things of this world cannot be considered inherently wrong or evil but can become so when not used in accordance with God's word and/or when one exalts them to a position that belongs to God alone. For this reason the world stands as a picture of corruption (2 Pet. 1:4). James calls the worldly person an adulteress and warns that to be allied to the world is to be at war with God (James 4:4). John discourages the believer from being a lover of the world and the things of the world (1 John 2:15) while Paul proclaims that “the world has been crucified to me, and [I] to the world” (Gal. 6:14). When one has “died with Christ” and been born of God, that person no longer belongs to the world (Col. 2:20) but has conquered the world through their faith in Jesus Christ (1 John 5:4-5), being instructed through grace to deny worldly lusts (Titus 2:11-12). Christ warns of danger of losing one's soul as a result of striving after the world (Matt. 16:26). ChadBrand

WORM Small, slender, soft-bodied animal without a backbone, legs, or eyes. They often improve the soil by working decaying matter into the soil while aerating it by their movements. There are many examples in the Bible where insect larvae are called worms. The earthworm is the most representative of the worms of Palestine. It is also used in the Bible as a figure of lowliness or weakness (Ps. 22:6; Job 17:14; Isa. 41:14). Both the OT and the NT speak of the place of the ungodly and unbeliever as being where the worm is always alive and working (Isa. 66:24; Mark 9:44,48). See Insects.

WORMWOOD Nonpoisonous but bitter plant common to the Middle East. Wormwood often is used in analogy to speak of bitterness and sorrow. OT prophets pictured wormwood as the opposite of justice and righteousness (Amos 5:7; Jer. 23:15). Revelation describes as wormwood one of the blazing stars that brings destruction (8:10-11).

WORSHIP Term used to refer to the act or action associated with attributing honor, reverence, or worth to that which is considered to be divine by religious adherents. Christian worship is often defined as the ascription of worth or honor to the triune God. Worship is more fully understood as an interrelation between divine action and human response: worship is the human response to the self-revelation of the triune God. This includes: (1) divine initiation in which God reveals Himself, His purposes, and His will; (2) a spiritual and personal relationship with God through Jesus Christ on the part of the worshiper; and (3) a response by the worshiper of adoration, humility, submission, and obedience to God.

Worship may be understood in either a broad or narrow context. In a broad sense, worship is seen as a way of life (Rom. 12:1). In this context all of life is viewed as an act of worship or service before God (1 Cor. 10:31; Col. 3:17). Worship is also pictured as an act of the assembled people of God, as seen in the worship prescribed by God in the tabernacle (Exod. 25-40; Lev. 1-7) and temple (1 Chron. 22-29; 2 Chron. 3-7; 29-31), as well as in the worship of the NT church (Acts 13:2; 1 Cor. 11-14). In addition to the various congregational descriptions, worship sometimes involves individual encounters with God (Gen. 29:35; 35:11-15; Exod. 3:1-22; Josh. 5:13-15; Isa. 6), family worship (Gen. 4:2-5; 8:16-9:17; 35:2-7), and includes a few descriptions of worship in heaven (Isa. 6; Rev. 4; 5; 7; 15; 19).

The concept of the divine initiation of worship is seen in several biblical texts. It is apparent that God enjoyed communion with Adam (Gen. 3:8-24), His newly formed creature. The Bible states that the Lord created man to bring glory to God (Isa. 43:7), and man's refusal to function in this capacity is seen by the Apostle Paul as a fundamental offense against the Creator (Rom. 1:21-23). God demonstrated initiative in His worship relationship with Israel when He commanded Moses, "They are to make a sanctuary for Me so that I may dwell among them" (Exod. 25:8 HCSB). In the tabernacle instructions, God prescribes: (1) sacred space (qadosh, "holy place"); (2) a sacred time, the Sabbath (Exod. 31:12-17; 35:1-3); and (3) His desire to dwell among His people. God promised to be present with His people (Exod. 25:8; 29:45-46; 33:14-15) and to reveal to them His glory (Exod. 29:43; 40:34-37). The Lord continued this relationship with Israel in temple worship.

Similar concepts emerge in the NT. Divine initiative is seen in Jesus' encounter with the Samaritan woman in John 4. There, Jesus states that God is seeking true worshipers, those who worship Him in spirit and truth (John 4:21-24). In this passage Jesus teaches that genuine worship is no longer confined to a particular place (John 4:21) but is based upon a spiritual relationship between the worshiper and God through faith in Jesus Christ (cp. Phil. 3:3). The regular time for Christian worship shifted to the "first day of the week" (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2), known as "the Lord's day" (Rev. 1:10), no doubt associated with the resurrection of Jesus, which occurred on that day. God's presence among His people is revealed in Jesus who is Emmanuel—"God with us"(Matt. 1:23)—and the glory of the Lord is revealed in the incarnate Christ who "took up residence among us" (John 1:14 HCSB). Jesus promised the permanence of His presence among His people (Matt. 28:20), specifically through the ministry of the Holy Spirit (John 14:15-26; 16:5-16; 1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19).

One of the striking features of worship in the Bible is that, following the instructions given for the liturgy of the tabernacle and temple, there is relative silence regarding formal structure in worship. Instead, various models of worship emerge. The individual and family models have already been noted. Descriptions of worship in the congregation vary. The tabernacle worship involves various offerings (Lev. 1-7) that allow for the worshipers to express gratitude, reverence, and confession to the Lord in the setting of dramatic ritual offerings. Temple worship maintains these elements and employs music on a rather grand scale (1 Chron. 25). There is a general pattern in the worship of the tabernacle and the temple, proceeding from the outer courts to the inner court and then to the holy of holies, which is entered once a year by the high priest on the Day of Atonement. Similar patterns of entrance and progressive movement are also evident in certain psalms (Pss. 95; 100).

In the NT there is some emphasis on prayer, praise, and instruction (Acts 2:42-47), which may indicate the influence of the Jewish synagogue. The patterns of tabernacle/temple worship are employed in Hebrews, where Jesus is identified as both perfect high priest (Heb. 8:1-9:10) and perfect once-for-all sacrifice (9:11-10:18), by whom all Christians now "have boldness to enter the sanctuary [holy place] through the blood of Jesus” (Heb. 10:19 HCSB). While there are instructions for orderly worship (1 Cor. 14:26-40), there is no formal prescription for a certain order of worship in the NT.

A survey of biblical elements of worship includes: prayer, praise, thanksgiving, charity/ giving (Acts 2:45; 1 Cor. 8-9), confession (Neh. 9; Ps. 51; James 5:16), preaching and teaching (Neh. 8:7-9; Acts 2; 5:42; 8:4; 14:7; 1 Cor. 14:26), the reading of Scripture (Neh. 8:1-6; 1 Tim. 4:13), and discipline (Matt. 18:15-20; 1 Cor. 5:1-5). Two central features of Christian worship are the ordinances of baptism (Matt. 28:19; Acts 2:38,41) and the Lord's Supper (Luke 22:19; 1 Cor. 11:17-34). Since there is no order of worship prescribed in the NT, it seems best to conclude that Christian worship should draw from the several models of worship in the Bible while employing the various elements of worship that are more clearly defined in Scripture.

There are complex issues related to Christian worship. The relationship between the vertical (doxological) and horizontal (doctrinal/hortatory) aspects of worship is critical (Ps. 136; 1 Cor. 14:1-25; Eph. 5:18-21; Col. 3:16). This relationship is seen, for example, in the clearly Trinitarian nature of Christian worship, where one's doctrine has profound implications upon one's worship. The vertical/horizontal interplay is seen, too, in the relationship between worship and evangelism (Ps. 96; Rom. 15:16). Also, the relationship of worship and ethics is of fundamental importance (Pss. 15; 24; Amos 5:21-24; Matt. 15:8), since obedient response to God's will is vital to genuine worship (1 Sam. 15:22).

WRATH, WRATH OF GOD Used to express several emotions, including anger, indignation, vexation, grief, bitterness, and fury. It is the emotional response to perceived wrong and injustice. Both humans and God express wrath. When used of God, wrath refers to His absolute opposition to sin and evil. When used of humans, however, wrath is one of those evils that is to be avoided.

Old Testament The OT speaks very frequently of both God's wrath and human wrath, but the wrath or anger of God is mentioned three times more often than human wrath. There are some 20 different Hebrew words, used approximately 580 times, that refer to God's wrath in the OT. Most of these terms are borrowed from concrete physiological expressions. The most frequent is 'aph, occurring about 210 times. It is the word for “nose” or “face.” How such a word came to be used to express wrath has been traditionally explained by the common notion that “snorting” or “wheezing” through the nose is indicative of anger. The second most frequently used term is chemah (ca. 115 times), having the primary meaning of “heat” (cp. Ezek. 3:14), but most frequently translated with “fury” or “wrath.” The KJV captures the intensity of the emotion expressed with this term by rendering it three times as “hot displeasure” (Deut. 9:17; Pss. 6:1; 38:1). Lesser used terms are: charah (33 times), used commonly in combination with aph and translated as “fierce wrath” (KJV, NASB, NIV); qetseph (28 times), meaning “indignation”; ebrah (24 times), translated as “wrath,” “fury,” and “burning anger.”

These anthropopathic terms must not be construed in such a way as to attribute to God the irrational passion we find so frequently in man and which is ascribed to pagan deities. They do, on the other hand, point to the reality and severity of God's wrath in the OT (Isa. 63:1-6). God's wrath is not capricious but is always a moral and ethical reaction to sin. Sometimes that sin may be spoken of in general terms (Job 21:20; Jer. 21:12; Ezek. 24:13) and at other times specified as the shedding of blood (Ezek. 8:18; 24:8), adultery (Ezek. 23:25), violence (Ezek. 8:18), covetousness (Jer. 6:11), revenge (Ezek. 25:17), affliction of widows and orphans (Exod. 22:22), taking brethren captive (2 Chron. 28:11-27), and especially idolatry (Ps. 78:56-66). The means by which God expressed His wrath was always some created agency: His angels, His people the Israelites, Gentile nations, and the forces of nature.

In the prophetic books the wrath of God is commonly presented as a future judgment. It is usually associated with the concept of “the day of the LORD” (Zeph. 1:14-15), or simply “that day.” That day will be a great and terrible day, a day of darkness and gloominess, day of the vengeance of God (Joel 2:2,11; Isa. 63:4). While some of these prophetic utterances may have referred to the judgment of God in history, their ultimate fulfillment will come in a final act by which the world and its inhabitants will give account to God (cp. the NT use of the “day of the Lord,” 1 Thess. 5:1-9; 2 Pet. 3:10).

New Testament The wrath of God is not mentioned as frequently in the NT nor is there the richness of vocabulary that is found in the OT. There are only two primary NT terms for wrath: thumos and orge. Both are used to express a human passion and a divine attribute or action. When used of human passion, wrath is repeatedly named in lists of sins that are to be avoided, and if not, may incite God's wrath (Eph. 4:31; 5:6; Col. 3:8; Titus 1:7).

Some have seen a distinction in meaning in these synonyms, the difference being that thumos expresses a sudden outburst of anger whereas orge emphasizes more deliberateness. There may be an intentional difference in occasional uses of the terms, but this does not prevent both terms from being condemned as vices when applied to human passion. In addition, both terms are used to describe the character of God, particularly in the book of Revelation. A few times they are used together, and in such cases it is orge that is translated “wrath,” and thumos as “indignation” or “fierceness” (Rom. 2:8; Rev. 14:10).

There is great emphasis in the NT placed on the wrath of God as a future judgment. John the Baptist began his ministry by announcing the wrath of God that is to come, from which men should flee (Matt. 3:8). Jesus, likewise, pronounced a wrath that is to come upon Israel and produce great distress (Luke 21:23). Paul speaks of a day of wrath to come that awaits some, but from which believers are to be delivered (Rom. 2:5; Eph. 2:3; 1 Thess. 2:10). The idea of a future wrath of God is unfolded on a large scale in Revelation. It is described in very graphic terms, as cataclysmic upheavals in the universe (Rev. 6:12-17), “the winepress of the fierce anger of God, the Almighty” (Rev. 19:15 HCSB), and “the cup of His anger” (Rev. 14:10).

In the NT the wrath of God is not only a future judgment, it is a present reality. It does not merely await people at the future judgment. Jesus stated that the wrath of God abides on unbelievers, and consequently they stand presently condemned (John 3:18,36). For Paul, God's wrath is revealed against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men (Rom. 1:18), all people in their natural state are “children under wrath” (Eph. 2:3 HCSB).

Theological Considerations The doctrine of the wrath of God is unpopular in much modern theological discourse. Some deny that there is ever anger with God. Others think of God's wrath as an impersonal moral cause-and-effect process that results in unpleasant consequences for evil acts. Still others view God's wrath as His anger against sin but not the sinner.

God's wrath is real, severe, and personal. The idea that God is not angry with sinners belongs neither to the OT nor to the NT. God is a personal moral being who is unalterably opposed to evil and takes personal actions against it. Wrath is the punitive righteousness of God by which He maintains His moral order, which demands justice and retribution for injustice.

Moreover, God's wrath is inextricably related to the doctrine of salvation. If there is no wrath, there is no salvation. If God does not take action against sinners, there is no danger from which sinners are to be saved. The good news of the gospel is that sinners who justly deserve the wrath of God may be delivered from it. Through the atoning death of Christ, God is propitiated and His anger is turned away from all those who receive Christ (Rom. 3:24-25). Therefore, those who have faith in Christ's blood are no longer appointed to wrath but are delivered from it and appointed “to obtain salvation” (1 Thess. 1:10; 5:9).

WRITING Human ability to record and communicate information through etching signs on stone or drawing them on skins or papyrus. Present knowledge shows that writing began in the ancient Near East about 3500 B.C. The increasing complexity of commercial and civil life made some system of writing necessary. The development of writing, in turn, made possible the development of increasingly sophisticated civilizations.

Mesopotamia About 3500 B.C. the earliest documents appeared in Mesopotamia. These were business documents used for accounting purposes. Prior to this, accounts were kept by enclosing counters or tokens of various shapes in clay or mud balls over which a cylinder seal would be rolled identifying the owner or sender. The early tablets typically were inscribed with a picture or pictures identifying the commodity, numbers, and personal names. The language used by the writers of these early tablets is not known. The Sumerians were the first to write different words having the same sound with the same picture. Soon after, the Sumerians began to use stylized pictures composed of wedges impressed in the clay tablet with a stylus. So there began to be developed the hundreds of wedge-shaped signs which comprise the cuneiform script.

The early pictographic writing, which depicted an object, developed into logographic writing in which a picture could stand for a word associated with the idea of the object. Several pictures could be combined to present a concept or a phrase. Rebus writing occurred when a picture or sign was associated with another word of the same sound. In logo-syllabic writing, a sign came to represent a sound rather than a word; this is commonly regarded as the emergence of true writing. The correct reading of signs could be indicated by the addition of phonetic complements or by prefixing determinatives, which could indicate “wood,” “city,” “male,” “mountain,” and so forth. The rapid development of the cuneiform script made it suitable not only for the mundane task of keeping business accounts but also for legal documents, letters, and literary and religious documents.

The Sumerians established the scribal school in which the student spent several years learning how to write documents of all kinds. The teacher would write a text on one side of the tablet, and the student would copy the text on the other side for the teacher's evaluation. Grammars and verb charts were compiled. Trained scribes were in heavy demand for service at the temple, the court, and at trading firms.

The cuneiform script of the Sumerians was adopted by the Semitic speaking Akkadians, the Elamites, and Hurrians. Cuneiform continued to be expanded and adapted to meet the demands of the various languages. Excavations have yielded thousands of documents in Sumerian and Akkadian showing the progress of civilization, the arts, and sciences. So successful did Akkadian become that it was used as the international language of trade and diplomacy for several centuries. The modern historian is indebted most of all to King Ashurbanipal of Assyria (668-626 B.C.) who founded a library at Nineveh. Ashurbanipal sent his scribes all over Mesopotamia to make copies of thousands of important documents, especially literary and religious texts. The discovery of this library provided a corpus of texts coming from all periods of Mesopotamian history.

Egypt By about 3000 B.C. the Egyptians had developed a hieroglyphic system of writing, the so-called “sacred picture writing,” used chiefly for inscriptions on public monuments. In a manner similar to Sumerian, hieroglyphic signs could be read as signs for words or ideas, as phonetic signs, and as determinatives. Vowels were not indicated in the script, but the debate about whether the logographic script became a syllabic script apparently continues. The decipherment of hieroglyphics was accomplished by Champollion in 1822 after several years of rigorous study.

The Egyptians developed a cursive script, called hieratic, to meet the needs of everyday life, such as record keeping, inventories of goods, and so forth. Hieratic, simplified hieroglyphics, was written with brush and ink on the smooth surfaces of stone and papyrus. About 700 B.C. hieratic was further simplified into another cursive script, demotic. By A.D. 200 Greek letters were used for the writing of the Egyptian language, then in use, called Coptic.

Asia Minor The Hittites of Anatolia, who spoke an Indo-European language, adopted the Mesopotamian cuneiform system of writing. The Hittite cuneiform texts are known mainly from the archives of Bogazkoy discovered in 1906. The pioneering work in the interpretation of the texts was done by F. Hrozný who recognized that the texts were characteristically written with a mixture of Sumerian logograms, Akkadian words and phrases, and phonetically written Hittite words and phrases. Variant copies of the same or similar texts often contain the phonetically written equivalents of the Sumerian and Akkadian elements. The Hittites, like the Elamites and Hurrians, also used Akkadian for documents dealing with international relations.

About 1500 B.C. a hieroglyphic system known as Hittite hieroglyphics began to appear. This system of writing was not influenced by the older Egyptian hieroglyphics. Students of the texts have determined that the language is related to but not identical with the Hittite known from the cuneiform texts. The Karatepe bilingual inscription, composed of a text in hieroglyphics and Phoenician, came to light in 1947 and confirmed not only the meanings of some words but also that the previous research, done without the aid of bilingual texts, had been on the correct course.

Syria-Palestine The first-known attempts to produce an alphabet were made in Syria-Palestine. The texts from Ugarit (Ras Shamra) date from 1500 to 1200 B.C. and were written in an alphabetic cuneiform. The alphabet consists of 31 characters, 28 of which are consonants and three of which indicate the vowel accompanying the letter aleph.

In work carried out in 1904-1905 at Serabit el-Khadem in the Sinai, Flinders Petrie discovered inscriptions written in a script reminiscent of Egyptian hieroglyphics but consisting of only about 30 signs. Although not all the signs have been deciphered conclusively, it is possible to see the relationship of some of the characters to letters in the Phoenician alphabet from about 1000 B.C. The script of the Sinaitic inscriptions is the earliest stage in the development of the Canaanite linear script.

The sources available for the study of the development of the Hebrew script are of several kinds: monumental inscriptions (incised in stone), ostraca (inscribed potshreds), inscriptions incised on seals, weights, jar handles, ossuaries, and documents written in ink on papyrus and leather. The monumental inscriptions include the Gezer Calendar (950 B.C.), the Moabite Stone (850 B.C.), the Siloam tunnel inscription and the Siloam tomb inscription (700 B.C.). The ostraca include those from Samaria (800

B.C.), Hazor (800 B.C.), Yavneh-yam (550 B.C.), and Lachish (500 B.C.). After the exile the “square” script of Aramaic origin began to replace the cursive script, as the Elephantine papyri show. The documents from the Qumran and Wadi Murabba'at areas (200 B.C. to A.D. 150) complete the data. These source materials make it possible to trace the development of the Hebrew-Aramaic scripts for more than a thousand years and, therefore, to date with greater precision the documents which continue to come to light in the course of excavations.

Biblical References to Writing Several writing systems were in use in Syria-Palestine by the time of Moses and Joshua. Many Bible texts refer to Moses being directed to write down accounts of historical events (Exod. 17:14), laws and statutes (Exod. 34:1-9), and the words of the Lord (Exod. 24:4). Joshua wrote on stones a copy of the law of Moses (Josh. 8:32) and later wrote down statutes and ordinances in the book of the law of God (Josh. 24:26). Gideon had a young man of Succoth to write down the names of the 77 officials and elders of that town (Judg. 8:14). Samuel wrote down the rights and duties of kinship (1 Sam. 10:25). David could write his own letter to his general (2 Sam. 11:14). Kings engaged in international correspondence (2 Chron. 2:11). Many references to the chronicles of the kings of Israel and Judah perhaps indicate court diaries or annals (1 Kings 14:19). The prophets wrote, or dictated, their oracles (Isa. 8:1,16; 30:8; Jer. 30:1-2; 36:27-28). By at least 800 B.C. court scribes were tallying the payment of taxes (cp. the Samaria Ostraca). Commemorative and memorial inscriptions were in use (cp. the Siloam inscription and the Siloam tomb inscription). Nehemiah as an official under Persian appointment wrote down the covenant to keep the law of God (Neh. 9:38), to which several men set their seals as witnesses (Neh. 10:1-27).

Similarly, in the NT period literacy was widespread. Jesus could both read (Luke 4:16-21) and write (John 8:6). The writers of the Gospels and Paul wrote in excellent Greek, with Paul regularly using an amanuensis or scribe.

The various kinds of documents and writings mentioned in the Bible were letters (personal and official), decrees (religious and civil), legal documents, deeds of sale, certificates of divorce, family registers, topographical descriptions, and books of scrolls containing laws, court records, and poetic works. See Book\(s\).

It is difficult to determine how widespread literacy may have been in OT times. Most of the persons listed as writers are those in professional capacities or in positions of leadership that required writing, such as kings, religious leaders, prophets, and governors. Even then, scribes or secretaries were most often used. One of the cabinet officials was the secretary (sopher) who handled official correspondence, including international communications (2 Sam. 8:17; 20:25). Jeremiah dictated his oracles to his scribe, Baruch (Jer. 30:2; 36:27). In addition the Hebrew inscriptions provide no firm evidence that the general populace could read or write, or even that they had much need to do so.

Writing Materials and Implements Stone was used in all periods in the ancient Near East as a writing surface, especially for monumental and memorial inscriptions. In Egypt the walls of temples were covered with historical inscriptions chiseled into the stone. In Mesopotamia and Anatolia inscriptions were cut into the faces of mountains (cp. the Behistun Rock) or into stones of various sizes for monuments on public display (cp. the Code of Hammurabi and boundary markers) or for small inscriptions to be included in foundation deposits. In Syria-Palestine several monumental inscriptions were cut into stone, including the Moabite Stone, the Siloam inscription, and the inscriptions of Aramaean and Phoenician rulers from 1000 B.C. onward. In the OT the law was written on stone (Exod. 24:12) and written on stones covered with plaster (Deut. 27:1-10).

Clay was the main writing medium for those cultures that used cuneiform scripts. Impressions were made on the soft clay by the use of a stylus. Often legal documents and letters would be encased in a clay envelope on which a summary of the text was written and over which cylinder seals would be rolled to identify witnesses. Although clay documents written in cuneiform scripts have been found in Palestine, there is no clear OT reference to clay tablets used by Israelites.

Wooden tablets, covered by clay or wax, were used as writing surfaces in both Egypt and Mesopotamia. In the Bible there is the mention of writing on wooden staffs (Num. 17:2-3) and on wooden staves (Ezek. 37:16). The references in Isa. 30:8 and Hab. 2:2 may be to writing on wooden tablets. In Luke 1:63 Zechariah wrote on a tablet of wood with a wax surface.

In several periods metal was used as a writing medium, especially bronze or copper. Inscriptions in a poorly understood syllabic script from Byblos were written on bronze sheets. Especially well-known are the two copper scrolls from Qumran, which contained a list of the treasures of the community.

The potsherd provided a cheap and highly useful surface for letters, economic records, and school copy texts. Inscribed potsherds (ostraca) were commonly used in Egypt in all periods and in Palestine. They were inscribed with pen (or brush) and ink. Ostraca form a major part of the corpus of Hebrew inscriptions, such as the Samaria and Lachish ostraca.

Papyrus was used very early in Egypt and continued in use through the early centuries of our era. The papyrus reed was split into thin strips arranged in two layers at right angles and then pressed together and polished to form a smooth surface. Sheets of papyrus could be glued together to form long scrolls. As Aramaic began to be accepted as the international language, papyrus became more widely used in Mesopotamia and Syria-Palestine. It is likely that the first edition of Jeremiah's book was written on papyrus (Jer. 36). The documents of the Jewish community at Elephantine were written on papyrus. Several works on papyrus were among the literary remains from Qumran. Large collections of papyri from Egypt written in Koine Greek helped to elucidate the NT writings.

Carefully prepared leather was used for most of the biblical scrolls at Qumran. Torah scrolls are still written on leather. Sections of leather would be sewn together to form scrolls of lengths appropriate for the book or work. Horizontal lines were often pressed into the leather to act as guides for the scribe. The codex, or book, was made only from parchment.

Two words are used in the OT for writing implements, et and cheret. The first term is usually rendered “pen.” Psalm 45:1 (HCSB) speaks of the “pen of a skillful writer,” and thus it is probably a reference to a reed pen whose end fibers were separated to form a brush. Jeremiah 17:1 and Job 19:24 refer to an iron pen designed to make inscriptions on rock. The second term, cheret, is mentioned as both a graving tool (Exod. 32:4) and as a stylus (Isa. 8:1; KJV, “pen”). Since Isa. 8:1 mentions a tablet (NRSV) as the writing surface, it is possible that the stylus was used to carve or scratch the inscription into the wood or its covering of wax.

Ink was made from carbon black and gum resin and could be washed from a writing surface such as papyrus. Papyrus could thus be used more than once. A sheet of papyrus that was used more than once, with the original writing having been rinsed away, is called a palimpsest. Paleographers have often found palimpsests to be valuable because the original writing, incompletely expunged, may be more significant than the later writing.

Ezekiel 9:2-3,11 mention the equipment of the scribe, the qeset hasopher. The man clothed in linen who appeared to Ezekiel had a “writing case” or “inkhorn” upon his loins (at his side). Writing cases are known in both Egyptian and Mesopotamian literature and art work. They provided containers for pens, brushes, styluses, and ink.

The last implement to be mentioned is the scribe's knife in Jer. 36:23. As Jeremiah's scroll was being read, the king took a scribe's knife and cut off the columns of the scroll and burned them. The knife was probably used by the scribe to size and trim papyrus, leather, or parchment. That Jeremiah's scroll was made of papyrus and not leather is indicated by the fact that the king was in his winter quarters seeking warmth from a charcoal brazier. The odor of burning leather in an enclosed space would have been obnoxious. See Akkadian; Aramaic; Archaeology; Cuneiform; Hebrew; Paper; Papyrus; Pottery.

XERXES (Zērək' sēz) Persian king who reigned 486-464 B.C., known in the book of Esther as Ahasuerus. He was the son of Darius the Great and grandson of Cyrus the Great. He campaigned militarily against the Greeks, avenging the loss at Marathon in 490. However, his armada suffered a crippling defeat in the Bay of Salamis in 480, and he soon lost interest in attempting to defeat the Greeks. See Esther, Book of; Persia.

YAH Shortened form of Yahweh, the Hebrew name for the God of the covenant. See God; I Am; Jehovah; Lord; YHWH.

YEAR See Calendar.

YEAR OF JUBILEE The 50th year after seven cycles of seven years (Lev. 25:10) in which Israel's land and people gained freedom. It was begun with a blast from a ram's horn on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 25:9). During this year of joy and liberation the law stipulated three respects in which the land and people were to be sanctified: (1) It was to be a time of rest for the soil as well as people (Lev. 25:11). The unattended growth of the field was for the poor to glean and for the beasts of the field (Exod. 23:11). (2) All land was to revert to the original owner (Lev. 25:10-34; 27:16-24). The original distribution of land was to remain intact. All property which the original owner had been obligated to sell (and had not yet been redeemed) was to revert (without payment) to the original owner or his lawful heirs. Some exceptions to this pattern are noted in Lev. 25:29-30; 27:17-21. (3) Every Israelite who had sold himself—either to his fellow countryman or to a foreigner settled in the land—because of poverty and remained unredeemed was to be freed along with his children (Lev. 25:39-46).

The gate building of Xerxes at Persepolis that led to a mammoth terrace built by Darius the Great.

The Year of Jubilee prevented the Israelites from oppression of one another (Lev. 25:17). It had a leveling effect on Israel's culture by giving everyone a chance for a new start. It discouraged excessive, permanent accumulations of wealth and the deprivation of an Israelite of his inheritance in the land. Families and tribes were preserved by the return of freed bondservants to their own families. Permanent slavery in Israel was rendered impossible.

This year was a constant reminder of God's interest in economic freedom (Ezek. 46:17). Purchase of property was actually tantamount to assuming a lease for a maximum of 49 years, and the seller always retained the right to cancel the purchase by settling with the buyer on the amount of money that was still payable, taking into account the number of years that the buyer had made use of the property. If the seller was either incapable or not desirous of making use of this right of redemption, the property nevertheless returned to his possession automatically in the next Year of Jubilee. So the sale of a house, for example, was equivalent to renting it for a specified period of time (Lev. 25:29-34). This made it difficult to accumulate vast permanent holdings of wealth (cp. Isa. 5:8; Mic. 2:2). God's designed arrangement was against both large estates and pauperism. The Israelites were repeatedly given the opportunity to begin anew, and the impoverished were enabled to maintain themselves in society.

This year also reflected God's provision for the soil's conservation (Lev. 25:11-12,18-21). During the Year of Jubilee, the Israelites were once again taught that they were to live in faith, that the Lord would satisfy their needs (cp. Exod. 16:17-18). See Festivals.

YELLOW Two Hebrew words are translated “yellow.” Charuts (Ps. 68:13) refers to gold strongly alloyed with silver or the sallow color of sick skin (Lev. 13:49). Tsahob (Lev. 13:30,32,36) refers to the color of hair in a patch of skin that lets the priest know it is leprous. The basic meaning of tsahob is “shining” and represents bright red or gold. See Colors.

YHWH Known by the technical term Tetragrammaton (Gk., meaning “four letters”), these are the four consonants which make up the divine name (Exod. 3:15; found more than 6,000 times in the OT). The written Hebrew language did not include vowels, only the consonants were used; thus readers supplied the vowels as they read (this is true even today in Hebrew newspapers). Reverence for the divine name led to the practice of avoiding its use lest one run afoul of commandments such as Exod. 20:7 or Lev. 24:16. In time it was thought that the divine name was too holy to pronounce at all. Thus the practice arose of using the word Adonai: “Lord.”

Many translations of the Bible followed this practice. In most English translations YHWH is recognizable where the word LORD appears in caps.

The tomb of Xerxes located in the modern state of Iran.

In the course of the centuries the actual pronunciation of YHWH was lost. In the Middle Ages Jewish scholars developed a system of symbols placed under and beside the consonants to indicate the vowels. YHWH appeared with the vowels from “Adonai” as a device to remind them to say “Adonai” in their reading of the text. A latinized form of this was pronounced “Jehovah,” but it was actually not a real word at all. From the study of the structure of the Hebrew language most scholars today believe that YHWH was probably pronounced Yahweh (Yah' weh). YIRON (Yi' rōn) (NASB, Josh. 19:38). See Iron.

YOD (Yod) Tenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet used as title of Ps. 119:73-80 (KJV, “Jod”) in which all verses begin with this letter.

YOKE Wooden frame placed on the backs of draft animals to make them pull in tandem. The simple yokes consisted of a bar with two loops either of rope or wood that went around the animals' necks. More elaborate yokes had shafts connected to the middle with which the animals pulled plows or other implements. The word is used most often to speak of slavery, bondage, and hardship (1 Kings 12:4; Jer. 27:8). Positive usages include the yoke of Christ (Matt. 11:29-30) and the joint nature of the church's work (Phil. 4:3).

ZAANAIM (Zā' ā nā' Im) KJV, TEV spelling of Zaananim (Judg. 4:11) following written Hebrew text rather than scribal note and Josh. 19:33.

An ox and a donkey yoked together and pulling a wooden plow.

A tomb in Jerusalem that by local tradition is said to be Zacharias's tomb.

ZAANAN (Zá' á nán) Place-name, possibly meaning “sheep country” or “outback.” Unidentified city in southernmost Judah (Mic. 1:11), probably identical with Zenan (Josh. 15:37).

ZAANANNIM (Zá' á nán' ním) Place-name of uncertain meaning. Town on northeastern corner of tribal allotment of Naphtali near Kadesh (Josh. 19:33; Judg. 4:11). The “plain of Zaanaim” (Judg. 4:11 KJV) is literally translated “great tree in Zaanannim” (NIV) or “oak in Zaanannim” (NASB; note transliterations of REB, NRSV). This probably indicates a “sacred tree” associated with a worship center. See Elon; Terebinth.

ZAAVAN (Zá' á ván) Personal name meaning “tremble or quake.” Son of Ezer (Gen. 36:27).

ZABAD (Zá' bád) Personal name meaning “He has given” or “gift.” 1. Member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:36-37). 2. An Ephramite (1 Chron. 7:21). 3. One of David's 30 elite warriors (1 Chron. 11:41); the first of 21 names which the Chronicler appended to a list paralleling that of 2 Sam. 23:24-39. 4. Assassin of King Joash (2 Chron. 24:26), called Jozacar in 2 Kings 12:21. 5. Three postexilic laymen ordered to divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 10:27,33,43).

ZABBAI (Zāb' bāi) Abbreviated personal name, perhaps meaning “pure.” 1. Son of Bebai who promised Ezra he would put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:28). 2. Father of Baruch who worked on the wall of Jerusalem with Nehemiah (3:20). Some say that 1. and 2. may be the same person. The early scribal note (qere) in Nehemiah writes the name Zaccai.

ZABBUD (Zāb' būd) Personal name meaning “gift.” Descendant of Bigvai who returned to Jerusalem with Ezra after the exile (Ezra 8:14) according to written Hebrew text. Scribal note (qere) has Zaccur. See Zabud.

ZABDI (Zāb' dī) Personal name meaning “my gift” or short form of “Yah gives.” 1. Son of Zerah of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 7:1). 2. Man of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:19). 3. Man in charge of the wine cellars of David (1 Chron. 27:27). 4. Son of Asaph who led in thanksgiving and prayer (Neh. 11:17).

ZABDIEL (Zāb' dī ēl) Personal name meaning “God gives gifts” or “My gift is God.” 1. Descendant of David (1 Chron. 27:2). 2. Overseer in Jerusalem during the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:14).

ZABUD (Zā' būd) Personal name meaning “given.” Son of Nathan, a priest and Solomon's friend (1 Kings 4:5).

ZABULON (Zāb' ū lōn) (KJV, NT) See Zebulun.

ZACCAI (Zāk' ā i) Personal name meaning “pure” or “innocent.” One whose descendants returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:9; Neh. 7:14).

ZACCHAEUS or ZACCHEUS (Zā kē' ūs)

Greek form of Hebrew name meaning “innocent.” A corrupt tax collector in first-century Jericho (Luke 19:2-9). Out of curiosity he went to hear Jesus. Because of his short stature, he had to climb a tree to catch a glimpse of the Lord. To his surprise Jesus called him by name to come down and He went home with Zacchaeus. There the official believed and was converted. As a result of his newfound faith, he restored with interest the money he had taken illegally.

ZACCHUR (Zāk' ūr) or ZACCUR Personal name meaning "well remembered." 1. Father of Shammua of the tribe of Reuben (Num. 13:4). 2. Descendant of Mishma of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:26). 3. Descendant of Merari among the Levites (1 Chron. 24:27). 4. Son of Asaph (1 Chron. 25:2; Neh. 12:35). 5. Son of Imri who helped Nehemiah rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (3:2). 6. One who sealed the covenant of reform during the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (10:12). 7. Father of Hanan, one of the treasurers appointed by Nehemiah (13:13).

ZACHARIAH (Zāk ā rī' āh) (KJV) See Zechariah.

ZACHARIAS (Zāk ā rī' ās) (KJV) Greek form of Hebrew personal name "Zechariah," meaning "Yah remembered." See Zechariah.

ZACHER (Zā' kēr) (KJV, 1 Chron. 8:31) See Zechariah.

ZADOK (Zā' dōk), ZADOKITES Personal name meaning "righteous," a short form of Zedekiah, "the Lord is righteous." See Zedekiah. 1. Son of Ahitub and father of Ahimaaz, descended from Aaron through Eleazar and was a priest in the time of David (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chron. 6:3-8). He is named in company with Abiathar, who was descended from Aaron through Ithamar (1 Chron. 24:3). Zadok was loyal to David when Adonijah rebelled in his father's old age (1 Kings 1). As a consequence he continued as a priest in Solomon's day. Abiathar was soon removed in accordance with the prophecy to Eli (1 Sam. 2:31-33; 1 Kings 2:26-27). The genealogy of Zadok is given in 1 Chron. 6:3-15 from Aaron through Eleazar on down to Jehozadak of postexilic times (cp. Zech. 6:11). The genealogy mentions a second Zadok seven generations later of whom we know little, but his name emphasizes the fact that standard names do reappear in genealogical lists.

In a touching scene Zadok with Abiathar carried the ark to go with David in his flight from Absalom (2 Sam. 15:24). David sent them back to carry on their worship in Jerusalem and be spies for him. Zadok's son Ahimaaz was the gobetween and was also the first to bring David news of Absalom's defeat (2 Sam 18:27). David then appealed to Zadok and Abiathar to arrange a welcome for him to come back to Jerusalem. As a reward for Zadok's loyalty to Solomon and as punishment for the sins of Eli's sons, Zadok's descendants (the line of Eleazar) replaced the descendants of Ithamar as the leading priests. The developing role of Jerusalem as the exclusive center of Israel's worship furthered the position of the Zadokites.

In later days Ezekiel declared that the priests who were sons of Zadok were the only faithful ones at the time of the exile and that they only would be allowed to serve in the ideal future temple. This statement agrees with the genealogies of Chronicles that list only two families as far as the captivity—David of Judah and Zadok the descendant of Aaron through Eleazar. The returning priests, including Joshua son of Jehozadak (1 Chron. 6:15) and Ezra (7:1-7), were of the line of Zadok which lasted long into the intertestamental period. The line of Ithamar after the removal of Eli's family was of less importance. The Zadokites to a degree lived up to their name as righteous priests of the Lord. See Abiathar.

2. Grandfather of Jotham, king of Judah (2 Kings 15:33). 3. and 4. Men who helped Nehemiah rebuild the Jerusalem wall (Neh. 3:4,29). 5. Leader who signed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:21). 6. A faithful scribe whom Nehemiah appointed as a treasurer (Neh. 13:13). See High Priest; Levites; Priests.

ZAHAM (Zá' hám) Personal name meaning “fatness” or “loathing.” Son of King Rehoboam by Abihail (2 Chron. 11:18-19).

ZAHAR (Zá' hār) Source of wool traded with Tyre (Ezek. 27:18 NIV; “Sahar,” TEV; “Suhar,” REB). KJV, NASB, and RSV translate the Hebrew as “white wool.” If the Hebrew refers to a place, the association with Damascus and Helbon suggests a Syrian site, perhaps modern as-Sahra, northwest of Damascus.

ZAIR (Zá' ír) Place-name that means “small.” Place where Joram, king of Judah (853-841 B.C.), fought with Edom (2 Kings 8:20-21). The location of Zair is still in dispute. Some place it south of the Dead Sea near Edom. Others equate it with Zoar (Gen. 13:10) or Zior (Josh. 15:54; cp. 2 Chron. 21:9).

ZALAPH (Zá' láph) A personal name meaning “caper plant.” Father of Hanun, who helped Nehemiah repair the walls of Jerusalem (3:30).

ZALMON (Zál' mǒn) Personal name and placename meaning “little dark one” or “small image.” 1. Mountain near Shechem where Abimelech and his men cut brush with which to burn the tower of Shechem (Judg. 9:48-49). 2. One of David's 30 mighty men (2 Sam. 23:28). He is also known as Ilai (1 Chron. 11:29). 3. Psalm 68:14 mentions a “hill of Bashan” named Zalmon (KJV, “Salmon). This may refer to the Golan Heights.

ZALMONAH (Zál' mǒ' nah) Place-name meaning “dark” or “shady.” Israel's first stop after leaving Mount Hor (Num. 33:41-42). The place cannot be identified.

ZALMUNNA (Zál' mǔn' ná) Personal name meaning “Protection is withdrawn” or “Zelem (god) rules.” King of Midian captured and killed by Gideon (Judg. 8:1-21; Ps. 83:11).

ZAMZUMMIM (Zám' zǔm' mím) or ZAMZUMMITES (NIV) Name the Ammonites gave to the Rephaim. They lived east of the Jordan River until the Ammonites drove them out (Deut. 2:20). See Rephaim.

ZANOAH (Zá' nǒ' ah) Place-name meaning “broken district” or “stinking.” 1. Village in Judah identified with Khirbet Zanu about three miles south-southeast of Beth-shemesh (Josh. 15:34). 2. City in the highlands of Judah (Josh. 15:56), whose identification with Khirbet Zanuta, 10 miles southwest of Hebron or Khirbet Beit Amra, is disputed.

ZAPHENATH-PANEAH (Záph' è' nâth-pân' è' áh) or ZAPHNATH-PAANEAH (KJV) Personal name meaning “the god has said, he will live.” Pharaoh's name for Joseph when he made Joseph second only to himself in Egypt (Gen. 41:45). See Joseph.

ZAPHON (Zá' phôn) Place-name meaning "north." 1. City east of the Jordan River in Gad's territory (Josh. 13:27). It was probably a center of worship of the god Baal-zaphon in the days of Canaanite supremacy before the Gadites took over. It is identified with Tell el-Qos, Tell es-Saidiye, or Tell el-Mazar. Shopan (Num. 32:35) may be another spelling of the same city. 2. Mountain viewed as home of the gods in Canaanite thought, perhaps referred to in Ps. 48:2 (NIV), Isa. 14:13 (NRSV), and Job 26:7 (NRSV), showing Yahweh controls what Canaan thought their gods possessed.

ZAREPHATH (Zá' rí pháth) Place-name possibly meaning "smelting, refining." A town on the Mediterranean seacoast just south of Sidon. At God's command Elijah fled there after prophesying a drought in Israel (1 Kings 17:2-9). While in Zarephath he was hosted by a widow and her son. Although the drought affected the widow's income, too, her supply of meal and oil was miraculously sustained (17:12-16). Elijah also restored her son to life and health (17:17-23).

ZARETAN (Záph ẹ năth-păn ẹ'áh) (KJV, Josh. 3:16) See Zarethan.

ZARETH-SHAHAR (Zár' ẹ tăn) (KJV) See Zereth-shahar.

ZARETHAN (Zá rěth-shá' hăr) Place-name, perhaps meaning "cooling." The Jordan River backed up and Israel passed over into Canaan on dry ground near there (Josh. 3:16). It was near Beth-shean (1 Kings 4:12). Hiram of Tyre cast bronze temple vessels near there (1 Kings 7:46; the parallel in 2 Chron. 4:17 reads Zeredah). Zarethan is most often identified with the two mounds of Tell es-Saidiyah on the east bank of the Jordan about 14 miles north of Adam (Tell ed-Damiyeh). Archaeologists have uncovered numerous bronze artifacts from the vicinity of Succoth and Zarethan, confirming activity like that attributed to Hiram. Alternate sites include Tell Umm Hamad, Sleihat, and Tell el-Merkbere.

ZARHITE (Ză' rō thăn) KJV form of Zerahite, descendants of Zerah, one of the twins born to Judah by Tamar (Num. 26:20; cp. 1 Chron. 9:6; Neh. 11:24). See Zerahites.

ZARTANAH (Zăr' hit) (KJV, 1 Kings 4:12) or ZARTHAN (Zăr' tâ nah) (KJV, 1 Kings 7:46) See Zarethan.

ZATTHU (Zăr' thăn) (KJV) or ZATTU (Zăt' tho)

Head of family who returned to Jerusalem after the exile (Ezra 2:8; Neh. 7:13). Some of the sons of Zattu put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:27). He seems to be the same as the “Zatthu” who signed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (10:14).

ZAVAN (Ză' vãn) (KJV, 1 Chron. 1:42) See Zaavan.

ZAYIN (Ză' yin) Seventh letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Title of Ps. 119:49-56 where each verse begins with this letter.

ZAHA (Ză' ză) Son of Jonathan and descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:33).

ZEALOT (Zël' ot) One who had a “zeal” for a particular cause. The term came to refer to a Jewish segment that sought to overthrow foreign control over Palestine, particularly Roman control. These Zealots often resorted to extreme measures to accomplish their task. Simon, one of Jesus' disciples, is described as being a “Zealot” (Matt. 10:4), though the KJV incorrectly translates it as “Canaanite.” See Jewish Parties in the New Testament.

ZEBADIAH (Zĕb á di' ah) Personal name meaning "Yahweh has given." 1. Son of Beriah (1 Chron. 8:15). 2. Son of Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:17). 3. Son of Jehoram of Gedor (1 Chron. 12:7). 4. A gatekeeper (1 Chron. 26:2). 5. Fourth captain in David's army (1 Chron. 27:7). 6. One of nine Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law in the towns of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8). 7. Son of Ishmael who ruled civil cases in a court system Jehoshaphat set up (2 Chron. 19:11). 8. Son of Shephatiah who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 8:8). 9. Priest who put away his foreign wife in Ezra's time (10:20).

ZEBAH (Zĕ' bah) Personal name meaning "slaughter" or "sacrifice." He and Zalmunna were Midianite kings that Gideon captured and killed because they had killed Gideon's brothers (Judg. 8:4-21; Ps. 83:11; Isa. 9:4; 10:26). This account shows the act of blood revenge that often prevailed in that day and marks a turning point in Israel's struggles against Midian.

ZEBAIM (Zĕ bá' 'im) Home of the children of Pochereth (Ezra 2:57) who returned to Jerusalem from Babylonian captivity (KJV). See Pochereth-hazzebaim.

ZEBEDEE (Zĕb' ə də) Greek form of Hebrew personal name meaning "gift." A fisherman on the Sea of Galilee and father of James and John, two of Jesus' first disciples (Mark 1:19-20). Based at Capernaum on the north shore of the sea, Zebedee ran a considerable fishing business which included several hired servants, Simon Peter, and Andrew (Luke 5:10). His wife also followed Jesus and ministered to Him (Matt. 27:56). The Bible does not say if Zebedee ever became a believer, but he did not stand in the way of his sons or wife becoming Jesus' disciple.

ZEBIDAH (Zĕ bí' dah) Personal name meaning "gift." Daughter of Pedaiiah of Rumah and the mother of King Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:36; KJV "Zebudah").

ZEBINA (Zĕ bí' ná) Personal name meaning "purchased." One who had a foreign wife during Ezra's time (Ezra 10:43).

ZEBOIIM (Zə boi' im) Place-name possibly meaning “hyenas.” One of the cities in the Valley of Siddim (Gen. 14:2-3) at the southern end of the Dead Sea. The site probably is under water now. Zeboiim was ruled by King Shemeber but under the control of Chedorlaomer, king of Elam. When Shemeber rebelled, Chedorlaomer came to suppress the rebellion. Although the text is not clear, it appears the city was delivered when Abram defeated Chedorlaomer (14:16-17). Zeboiim was destroyed when God sent fire and brimstone on Sodom and Gomorrah (Deut. 29:23; cp. Hos. 11:8). Recent attempts to identify Zeboiim in the Ebla tablets have been hotly debated.

ZEBOIM (Zə bō' im) Place-name meaning “hyenas” or “a wild place.” Not to be confused with Zeboiim. 1. One of the towns the Benjamites occupied upon returning to Palestine from exile (Neh. 11:34). It may be Khirbet Sabije. 2. Valley in Benjamin between Michmash and the wilderness overlooking the Jordan River (1 Sam. 13:17-18). It may be Wadi el-Oelt or Wadi Fara.

ZEBUDAH (Zə bū' dah) (KJV) See Zebidah.

ZEBUL (Zē' būl) Personal name meaning “prince” or “captain.” Resident of Shechem who was a follower of Abimelech, son of Gideon. When Gaal plotted against Abimelech in Shechem, Zebul sent word to Abimelech who came to Shechem and defeated Gaal (Judg. 9:30-41).

ZEBULUN (Zēb' ū lūn) Personal and tribal name, probably meaning “elevated dwelling.” Jacob's tenth son and sixth by Leah (Gen. 30:20). The tribe named for him settled in the area between the Sea of Galilee and Mount Carmel (Josh. 19:10-16). The tribe hosted the other tribes with religious festivals at Mount Tabor (Deut. 33:18-19). Their menu included the delicacies fished from the Sea of Galilee. Militarily, the tribe distinguished itself in the struggles to possess the land, fighting faithfully in the armies of Deborah and Barak, and Gideon (Judg. 4:6; 6:35). See Israel, Land of; Tribes of Israel.

ZECHARIAH (Zēk ā rī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yah (in long form Yahweh) remembered.” 1. Son of Jeroboam II, who reigned over Israel for six months in the year 746 B.C. until he was assassinated by Shallum (2 Kings 15:8-12). See Israel. 2. The Prophet Zechariah, who flourished immediately after the exile in 520-518 B.C. and urged the people of Judah to rebuild the temple. 3. Grandfather of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:2). 4. Priest and prophet whom the people stoned and Joash, the king, killed (2 Chron. 24:20-22). 5. Postexilic gatekeeper of temple (1 Chron. 9:21). 6. Member of family who lived in Gibeon (1 Chron. 9:37). 7. Temple musician (1 Chron. 15:20). 8. Community leader Jehoshaphat the king sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7). 9. One of Josiah's overseers in repairing the temple (2 Chron. 34:12). 10. and 11. Men who accompanied Ezra on return from Babylon (Ezra 8:3,11). 12. Man whom Ezra sent to get Levites to return from Babylon (Ezra 8:16). 13. Israelite with foreign wife (Ezra 10:26). 14. Man who helped Ezra as he taught the law (Neh. 8:4), perhaps identical with 12. or other one above. 15. Ancestor of postexilic resident of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:4). 16. Ancestor of postexilic resident of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:5). 17. Ancestor of priest in Nehemiah's day (Neh. 11:12). 18. Leading priest in time of Joiakim's high priesthood, possibly the same as the prophet (Neh. 12:16). 19. and 20. Priestly musicians who helped Nehemiah celebrate (Neh. 12:35,41). 21. High official Isaiah used as witness, perhaps the same as 3. above (Isa. 8:2). 22. Son of Jehoshaphat the king whom his brother Jehoram killed upon becoming king (2 Chron. 21:2-4). 23. Godly advisor of King Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:5). 24. Descendant of tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:7). 25. Father of leader of eastern half of tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 27:21). 26. through 34. Levites (1 Chron. 15:18,24; 24:25; 26:2,11,14; 2 Chron. 20:14; 29:13; 35:8). 35. A priest in Jerusalem and the father of John the Baptist (Luke 1:5-64). As he was burning incense in the temple as part of his duties, the angel Gabriel appeared to Zechariah and announced that he and his elderly wife, Elizabeth, would have a son. Since both were past the age of childbearing, Zechariah asked for a sign that the birth would occur. Because of his lack of faith, the angel struck him dumb. When John was born, the people assumed that he would be named after his father despite Elizabeth's objections that the boy be called "John." When Zechariah confirmed the name by writing it on a tablet, his speech returned.

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF One of the postexilic Minor Prophets. Like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, Zechariah was a priest as well as a prophet. This is fitting since the book largely concerns the temple and priesthood and the purification of the people. Zechariah's grandfather Iddo was a priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:4), making it likely that Zechariah was Haggai's younger colleague. Whereas Haggai's focus is on the rebuilding of the temple and the reinstatement of the sacrificial system, Zechariah's is on the people's spiritual transformation.

Many are convinced that chaps. 9-14 were written much later than chaps. 1-8 and by a different author. The evidence, however, does not require this conclusion, and the thematic unity of the book argues against it. The historical situation is the same as that of the book of Haggai.

Message and Purpose Indictment Zechariah explained that the Lord's displeasure was on His people because they had abandoned Him in the past. They were also discouraged due to opposition and the apparent insignificance of the building project. After Zerubbabel's time, Judah would again have wicked leaders who would mislead the people. This would result in their rejecting the Lord again.

Instruction The Lord called on Judah to “return” to Him and so to remove His displeasure. He exhorted the high priest Joshua and the remnant to faithful obedience in order to retain His blessings. Implied is an exhortation to complete the temple. The Lord also reminded Judah that He required of His people justice and mercy.

Lord's judgment of the previous generation was intended to teach Israel to repent and maintain their faithfulness to Him. Their future rejection of Him would result again in foreign opposition and the scattering of Israel. Judgment The Hope The Lord promised to “return” to Israel with blessing as they returned to Him in faithful obedience. He would also enable Zerubbabel and Joshua by His Spirit to complete the temple that would prefigure the coming messianic kingdom. Furthermore, He assured them that He would judge the nations that oppressed them, but that even a remnant of the nations would become His worshipers. As He had preserved a remnant of Israel and cleansed them, so the Lord would send the Messiah to provide by His death permanent forgiveness and peace and the total eradication of evil. He would also send His Spirit to bring about national repentance.

Structure Zechariah comprises two major sections surrounding a central and therefore highly prominent smaller section. The two major sections, each introduced by a date formula, are 1:1-6:8 and 7:1-14:21. The central section in 6:9-15 is a narrative describing the commissioning of Joshua the high priest with a crown. Each of the major sections comprises seven smaller sections plus an introductory section. In each case the seven subsections are arranged in a repetitive structure surrounding a central and therefore highly prominent subsection. The central subsection in 3:1-10 describes the commissioning of Joshua the high priest with a turban, and the central subsection in 11:1-17 is a narrative describing the commissioning of Zechariah with two staves.

Zechariah's Night Visions (1:1-6:8) The main themes of the night visions are (1) God's judgment of the nations, (2) His election and future blessing of Jerusalem, (3) the purification of the land, (4) rebuilding the temple, and (5) the leadership of Zerubbabel and Joshua. The first three visions (the horses in the myrtles, 1:7-17; the horns and the craftsmen, 1:18-21; the measuring line, 2:1-13) assure the people of the Lord's coming judgment against the nations who have scattered Israel, of His renewed love for and promise to bless Jerusalem, and of their success in rebuilding the temple.

The fourth and central vision in 3:1-10 describes the high priest Joshua's appearance before the angel of the Lord who is also the Lord Himself (vv. 1-2; cp. Gen. 16:7-13; 21:17; 22:11-12,15-16; 31:11-13). This vision speaks of a future permanent forgiveness the Messiah would accomplish when He comes to redeem the nation and to establish peace, prosperity, and security on the earth (vv. 8-10; cp. 1 Kings 4:25; Mic. 4:1-8).

The fifth vision of the lampstand and olive trees (4:1-14) encourages Zerubbabel and Joshua, represented by the two olive trees, to trust not in financial or military resources but in the power of God's Spirit working through them, represented by the oil (cp. Isa. 61:1-3). The lampstand probably represented the temple that would glorify God in the earth.

The sixth vision (5:1-11) of the flying scroll and the measuring basket is a composite like the second vision. It speaks of God purifying His people. The final vision of the chariots (6:1-8) reflects the first. It describes divine judgment sent throughout the earth (cp. Jer. 49:36; Rev. 6:1-8; 7:1). Because of the divine program of judgment and redemption outlined in the seven visions, the superficial and false rest and peace established by the nations in the first vision (1:11) is transformed into genuine divine rest in the last vision (6:8).

The Crowning of Joshua, the High Priest (6:9-15) The oracle in this central and most prominent section of the book forms a hinge between the two larger sections. Like 3:1-10 it describes a messianic prototype receiving the signs of his office. Zechariah is told to make royal crowns (in Hebrew the word is plural) and to crown Joshua. Then the crowns are to be placed in the temple as a reminder of what God was going to do.

But first, Joshua receives a divine message that “the Branch” (since the message was for Joshua, “the Branch” designates someone else) would build the temple, be glorified, and rule (cp. 1 Chron. 29:25). Now the building of the postexilic temple was already assigned to Zerubbabel (4:9), who as a Davidic descendant prefigured the Messiah (Hag. 2:23). But, the Messiah would build the temple associated with His earthly kingdom of righteousness (6:12-13), a future temple prefigured by Zerubbabel's (4:8-10). Therefore, this oracle spans both contemporary and future fulfillment of God's purposes. The passage's ambiguity regarding the number of crowns and the number of thrones (v. 13) is due to the need for both Zerubbabel and Joshua to foreshadow the Messiah, who would be both king and priest. Finally, although the future kingdom was assured by God's grace and power, the contemporary “sign” depended upon the diligent obedience of Zerubbabel, Joshua, and the remnant (v. 15).

A Question Concerning Fasting (7:1-8:23) These two chapters serve to introduce the two oracles in chaps. 9-14, just as 1:1-6 introduces the visions of 1:7-6:8. The themes of ceremonial days, for example, the holiness of God's dwelling, universal worship of the Lord, regathering the exiles, and the repopulating of Jerusalem are introduced in chaps. 7-8 and reappear in chaps. 9-14.

Oracles Concerning the Coming Kingdom (9:1-11:17; 12:1-14:21)
The remainder of the book, probably written after the temple was completed, contains two divine oracles or messages in chaps. 9-11 and 12-14. Both messages deal with God's establishing His kingdom on the earth. Both describe future events, some of which were fulfilled before Jesus' incarnation, some during Jesus' earthly ministry, and some will be fulfilled when He returns. Each oracle contains three main sections, but the first oracle concludes with a fourth section (11:1-17) that acts as a hinge between the two oracles. It is the third of the commissioning ceremonies in Zechariah (cp. 3:1-10; 6:9-15).

According to 9:9-10, “one of the most Messianically significant passages of all the Bible” (Merrill), God's kingdom would be established through a human ruler (see also Isa. 9:6-7; Pss. 2; 45; 72, especially v. 8 quoted at the end of Zech. 9:10). Although kings sometimes rode donkeys (cp. 1 Kings 1:33), contrast with the use of a warhorse (cp. Rev 19:11-16) seems to suggest humility and peace (the word translated “gentle” is better rendered “humble”). Jesus' fulfillment of v. 9 in His “triumphal entry” in Jerusalem is clear in Matt. 21 and John 12. In light of Jesus' crucifixion a few days later, the resultant lasting peace and universal divine dominion described in v. 10 suggest either an undisclosed gap between the two verses or that Jesus' fulfillment then amounted to a “historical prototype” of another event yet to come. Few prophetic passages that describe messianic glory explain that it would be preceded by suffering and humiliation (Isa. 52:13-53:12 being the most significant exception).

The last commissioning ceremony in 11:4-17 contrasts with the previous ones in that Zechariah is not just an observer but plays the part of the messianic priest-king. Apparently in a vision He is commissioned as the good shepherd (9:16; 10:3) with two staves. But the Lord announces that He will deliver the flock to foreign oppressors (v. 6) because of the way they treat Him (vv. 7-14). He resigned His commission as their shepherd, breaking His staves. For His services He was paid the insulting price of 30 pieces of silver, the price of a slave, which Zechariah is instructed to throw to the potter in the Lord's house. The significance of this scenario only becomes apparent as we watch its fulfillment in the Gospels (cp. Matt. 26:15; 27:3-10). Then at the vision's conclusion Zechariah must play the part of the false shepherd whom the Lord sent to punish the flock for a time before His own judgment (11:15-17). The message is that Israel's deliverance and glory would be preceded by their oppression and suffering, not only by foreigners but also by their own Jewish leaders, because they would reject the Lord as their Good Shepherd (cp. 13:7-8).

The second oracle (12:1-14:21) focuses on God's deliverance of Jerusalem from her enemies, especially in the first (12:1-9) and last (14:1-21) sections. Although God would deliver His people over to their enemies for punishment, He would not abandon them (cp. Jer. 30:11).

The second section (12:10-13:9) promises a coming national repentance produced by God's Spirit (cp. Ezek. 36:24-32; Joel 2:28-32). Israel will experience severe and sincere grief over the way they have treated the Lord, that is, His Messiah (cp. 11:8; 13:7-8; Isa. 53:1-9; John 19:37). The character of the Messiah as both God and man is suggested by referring to Him in v. 10 as both "me" (that is, God) and "him" (cp. Isa. 9:6-7; a similar phenomenon occurs in passages where the angel of the Lord is referred to both as the Lord and as someone distinct from the Lord; cp. Gen. 16:7-13; Exod. 3:2-4; Judg. 6:11-27; Zech. 3:1-6). Shocking is the Lord's command in 13:7 that the sword should "strike" (meaning to "kill") His shepherd, "the man who is close to me" (that is, God's "neighbor," "associate," or "friend"), an apparent reference to the Messiah (cp. Isa. 53:4). The purpose of the Lord's command is first that His flock might be scattered and chastised, and that many should perish (cp. Matt. 26:31). Then after His people are purged and refined, they would be revitalized as the Lord's covenant people, cleansed by the blood of the one they had slain. Thus would the Lord fulfill the gospel He proclaimed in Gen. 3:15.

The final section (14:1-21), which elaborates on the first, describes God's deliverance of Jerusalem in the last days and His coronation as King of all the earth. Jerusalem's initial defeat will be turned to victory when the Lord appears (14:1-7; on the splitting of the Mount of Olives, see 6:1). The site of the Lord's deepest agony will witness His greatest glory. The culmination of God's work will be the perfect holiness of His people among whom He will dwell, expressed figuratively as extending even to the most common items in God's land (vv. 20-21; cp. Exod. 19:6; Jer. 2:3).

ZECHER (Zē' kēr) Form of Zechariah (1 Chron. 9:37) used in 1 Chron. 8:31. See Zechariah.

ZEDAD (Zē' dād) Place-name meaning “a sloping place” or “mountainous.” It is Sadad, 62 miles north of Damascus, the northern border of Canaan (Num. 34:8; Ezek. 47:15).

ZEDEKIAH (Zēd ē ki' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh is my righteousness” or “Yahweh is my salvation.” 1. False prophet who advised King Ahab to fight against Ramoth-gilead, assuring the king of victory (1 Kings 22). His prophecy conflicted with that of Micaiah, who predicted defeat. When Micaiah stated that God had put a lying spirit in the mouths of Zedekiah and his band of prophets, Zedekiah struck Micaiah on the cheek. Micaiah forecast that Zedekiah would feel the brunt of God's Spirit, but the text does not tell what became of the false prophet. See Micaiah; Prophecy, Prophets. 2. Last king of Judah (596-586 B.C.). Zedekiah was made king in Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon (2 Kings 24:17). When he rebelled, the Babylonian army besieged Jerusalem and destroyed it. Zedekiah was taken to Riblah along with his family. At Riblah he witnessed the executions of his sons before his own eyes were blinded (25:7). Then Zedekiah was taken to Babylon. He apparently died in captivity. See Israel, Land of. 3. Son either of Jehoiakim or Jeconiah (1 Chron. 3:16), the Hebrew text being unclear at this point. 4. Signer of Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:1; spelled Zidkijah by KJV). 5. Prophet who promised quick hope to exiles in Babylon (Jer. 29:21). Jeremiah pronounced God's judgment on him. 6. Royal official in Jeremiah's day (36:12).

ZEEB (Zē' ēb) See Oreb and Zeeb.

ZEKER (Zē' kēr) (NIV, 1 Chron. 8:31) See Zecher.

ZELA (Zē' lā) (NRSV, REB, RSV, TEV) or ZELAH Place-name meaning “rib, side, slope.” Town allotted to Benjamin (Josh. 18:28), in which the bones of Saul and Jonathan were buried (2 Sam. 21:14). The site is probably Khirbet Salah between Jerusalem and Gibeon or else another site in the hills north and west of Jerusalem.

ZELEK (Zē' lēk) Personal name meaning “cleft, fissure.” One of David's 30 elite warriors (2 Sam. 23:37; 1 Chron. 11:39).

ZELOPHEHAD (Zə lō' phə hād) Personal name meaning “protection from terror” or “the kinsman is my protector.” A Hebrew who wandered in the wilderness with Moses. He had no sons to receive his property and carry on his name, so his daughters pled with Moses to receive a share of inheritance following his death (Num. 26:33; 27:1-4). Despite the inheritance customs that allowed only men to own property, God led Moses to declare the daughters eligible (27:6-7). The only stipulation was that the women had to marry within their own tribe (36:5-9).

ZELOTES (Zə lō' tēz) KJV transliteration of name for Simon, Jesus' disciple. Modern translations translate as “Zealot.” See Simon; Zealot.

ZELZAH (Zēl' zah) Unidentified site near Rachel's tomb in the territory of Benjamin, site of the first of three signs that Samuel promised Saul as confirmation of his kingship (1 Sam. 10:1-2). Many commentators use Greek manuscript evidence to emend the Hebrew text to something other than a place-name.

ZEMARAIM (Zēm' á rá' im) Place-name meaning “twin peaks.” 1. Town allotted to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:22), likely Ras ex-Zeimara about five miles northeast of Bethel. 2. Mountain in the territory of Ephraim where Abijah rebuked Jeroboam (2 Chron. 13:4). The parallel text in 1 Kings 15:7 mentions hostilities between Abijam and Jeroboam but not the speech at Zemaraim. The town and mountain may be located in the same place. Some would place the town at Khirbet es-Samra four miles north of Jericho.

ZEMARITES (Zēm' á rīts) Canaanites inhabiting the area north of Lebanon between Arvad and Tripolis (Gen. 10:18; 1 Chron. 1:16). The Zemarites possibly gave their name to the town Sumra in this region. The town figures in the Tell Amarna letters and in Assyrian records. NRSV emended the text of Ezek. 27:8 to read “men of Zemer” (KJV, “thy wise men, O Tyrus”).

ZEMER (Zē' mōr) Place-name meaning “wool.” See Zemarites.

ZEMIRA(H) (Zə mī' rá) Personal name meaning “song.” Descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

ZENAN (Zē' nān) Place-name meaning “flocks.” Village in the Shephelah (wilderness) district of Judah (Josh. 15:37), likely identified with Araq el-Kharba. Zenan is perhaps identical to Zaanan (Mic. 1:11).

ZENAS (Zē' nās) Abbreviated form of the personal name Zenodoros meaning “gift of Zeus.” Christian lawyer whom Paul asked Titus to send, together with Apollos, on his way, lacking nothing (Titus 3:13). Paul had in mind, no doubt, material provisions for itinerant evangelistic work. Zenas and Apollos perhaps delivered Paul's letter to Titus.

ZEPHANIAH (Zēph á nī' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh sheltered or stored up” or “Zaphon (god) is Yahweh.” 1. Prophet whose preaching produced the 36th book of the OT. 2. Priest whom King Zedekiah sent asking Jeremiah to pray for the nation threatened by Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon (Jer. 21:1-7; 37:3). He reported false prophecy from Babylon to Jeremiah (29:24-32). When Jerusalem fell, the priest was executed (52:24-27). 3. Father of Josiah and Hen (Zech. 6:10,14), possibly identical with 2. above. 4. A Levite (1 Chron. 6:36), perhaps the same as Uriel (1 Chron. 6:24).

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF Only three chapters in length, this book looks toward the punishment of all sinful nations, including Judah, followed by the restoration of Judah and the nations as well.

The Prophet Zephaniah The first verse tells all we really know about the prophet. His ancestry is traced back four generations to a man named Hezekiah. Some scholars think that Hezekiah was the king of Judah by that name who reigned in the late eighth century during the ministry of Isaiah (2 Kings 18-20). If so, Zephaniah would have belonged to the royal line. That would perhaps explain why he did not condemn the king in Zeph. 1:8; 3:3-5, where he blames most of Judah's upper classes for their sins. Other scholars note that the name Hezekiah was quite common and that the ancestor is not identified as king. Further, Zephaniah's father was named Cushite, which could mean "Cushite" or "Ethiopian." They suggest that Zephaniah's ancestry was traced four generations to demonstrate that he was indeed Israelite.

The Date of Zephaniah According to 1:1, Zephaniah's ministry occurred during the reign of Josiah (640-609 B.C.). Most scholars date the book in 630 or between 630 and 621. In 621 King Josiah instituted a sweeping reformation of worship in Judah (2 Kings 22:3-23:25), which officially abolished the worship of Baal and the stars mentioned in Zeph. 1:4-6. Jeremiah also condemned those practices (Jer. 2:20-28; 8:1-3). Jeremiah 26:1 shows that the practices flourished again as early as the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim (609 B.C.); it might be the case that such worship continued secretly between 621 and 609. If that were so, Zephaniah might have prophesied during those years. In short, it is a good guess that he preached between 630 and 621, but he might have flourished anytime during the reign of Josiah.

Contents of the Book Zephaniah looked toward a future punishment. In 1:2-6 he predicted punishment upon the whole world, including Jerusalem. Verses 7-18 depict the inability of sinful humanity to escape God's punishment. The intervening verses further describe the punishment as the Day of the Lord. Verses 14-16 describe the time of God's approaching wrath. Punishment would come upon the nobles at the king's court, those who gained materially through violence, the merchants, and those who denied the power of God to reward good or punish evil.

The second chapter contains a series of threats against the Philistines (vv. 4-7), the Moabites and Ammonites (vv. 8-11), the Ethiopians (v. 12), and the Assyrians (vv. 13-15). Zephaniah called all nations to repent and become righteous and meek. Zephaniah would not presume on God's grace by promising forgiveness, but he counseled turning to righteousness and meekness as the means for possibly avoiding punishment on the Day of the Lord.

The third chapter is marked by a change in perspective between verses 7 and 8. The first seven verses pronounce a woe upon Jerusalem for oppression within her walls. Her princes preyed like lions upon their people, her prophets committed treachery, and her priests polluted the temple. God indicted the people not only for their sins but also for their failure to receive instruction from His dealings with other nations.

In the face of such a dismal picture of human corruption as Zephaniah drew in 3:1-7, believers are exhorted to “wait” for the Lord to come as witness, to pour out His wrath against all peoples, and to purify a remnant who will seek refuge in Him. To “wait” for the Lord means to “long for” Him (Job 3:21; Isa. 30:18) and to place one's confident hope only in Him (Ps. 33:20; Isa. 8:17; 64:4).

God's purpose, expressed in vv. 9-13, is to purify from the nations a people united to worship Him. Their speech will be cleansed of sinful pride and idolatry (Isa. 2:17-18; 6:5; Hos. 2:17). Terms used of the remnant in v. 13 are used of the Lord in v. 5. It will be a time of right, of truth, and of security (cp. Jer. 50:19; Ezek. 34:14; Mic. 4:4; 7:14).

The book concludes with a hymn of praise, an exhortation for restored Jerusalem to rejoice in the Lord's redemption. This describes the messianic age with the Lord, their victorious King, in their midst (vv. 15,17), again taking great delight in loving His people (cp. Deut. 30:9). It ends with the Lord's promise to regather and glorify Israel after their time of punishment is over.

Outline

- I. Identification of the Messenger of God's Word (1:1)
- II. God's Warning of Worldwide Judgment (1:2-3:8)
 - A. God's day of judgment is coming (1:2-2:3).
 1. His judgment will include all mankind (1:2-3).
 2. His judgment will include His own sinful people who forsake Him (1:4-6).
 3. The Day of the Lord calls for awesome silence in the face of God's judgment (1:7-11).

4. God's skeptics will see Him in action on His day (1:12-13).
 5. God's wrath will be poured out against sin on that day (1:14-17).
 6. Wealth is good for nothing on His day (1:18).

ZEPHATH (Zē' phāth) Place-name meaning "watchtower." City in southwestern Judah in the vicinity of Arvad. Following their destruction of the city, the tribes of Judah and Simeon renamed the site Hormah (Judg. 1:17). The site is identified with Khirbet Masas on the main road from Beer-sheba to the Arabah Valley.

ZEPHATHAH (Zēph' á thah) Place-name meaning "watchtower." Asa met Zerah, the Ethiopian king, in battle "in the valley of Zephathah at Mareshah" (2 Chron. 14:10). The earliest Greek translation translated Zaphon "north" instead of Zephathah. If Zephathah is identified with Safiyah, less than two miles northeast of Beit Jibrin, the "valley of Zephathah" is the Wadi Safiyah. See Mareshah.

ZEPHI (Zē' phi) or ZEPHO (Zē' phō) Short form of personal name meaning "purity" or "good fortune." Descendant of Esau (1 Chron. 1:36) called Zepho in the parallel passage (Gen. 36:11,15).

ZEPHON (Zè' phôn) Personal name, perhaps meaning “north.” Eldest son of Gad and ancestor of the Zephonites (Num. 26:15). The Samaritan Pentateuch and the earliest Greek translation support the identification with Ziphion (Gen. 46:16).

ZEPHONITE (Zè' phôn it) Member of clan of Zephon.

ZER (Zër) Place-name meaning “narrow” or “enemy.” Fortified town in the territory of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35), possibly identified with Madon, which is conspicuously absent from this list. Commentators often take “Zer” as a copyist's modification, repeating the Hebrew for “fenced cities.” See Ziddim.

ZERAH (Zè' rah) Personal name meaning “sunrise.” 1. A twin born to Tamar and her father-in-law, Judah (Gen. 38:30; Zarah, KJV). One of his descendants was Achan, who was executed for taking forbidden booty (Josh. 7:1,25). Zerah is included in Matthew's genealogy of Christ, although Perez was the direct ancestor (1:3). 2. Descendant of Esau and thus clan leader of Edomites (Gen. 36:13,17). 3. Ancestor of Edomite ruler (Gen. 36:33). 4. Clan leader in tribe of Simeon (Num. 26:13), apparently same as Zohar (Gen. 46:10). 5. Levite (1 Chron. 6:21,41). 6. Cushite general God defeated in answer to Asa's prayer about 900 B.C. (2 Chron. 14:8-13). See Cush; Ethiopia.

ZERAHIAH (Zè rá hí' ah) Personal name meaning “Yahweh has dawned.” 1. Priest descended from Phinehas (1 Chron. 6:6,51; Ezra 7:4). 2. Descendant of Pahath-Moab (“governor of Moab”) and father of Eliehoenai (Ezra 8:4). See Izrahiah.

ZERAHITES (Zè' rá hīts) Name of two families, one from the tribe of Simeon (Num. 26:13), the other from the tribe of Judah (Num. 26:20; Josh. 7:17), descended from men named Zerah. Two of David's 30 elite warriors, Sibbecai and Maharai, were Zerahites (1 Chron. 27:11,13).

ZERED (Zè' rëd) River name, perhaps meaning “white thorn.” A stream that empties into the southern end of the Dead Sea. Its entire length is only about 38 miles, but it drains a large area of land. Israel crossed the Zered after wandering in the wilderness for 38 years (Deut. 2:13-14). See Arabim; Palestine; Rivers and Waterways.

ZEREDA or ZEREDAH (Zēr' ə dah) Place-name of uncertain meaning. 1. Site in Ephraim of the home of Jeroboam (1 Kings 11:26), possibly identified as Ain Seridah in the Wadi Deir Ballut in western Samaria. 2. City in the Jordan Valley (2 Chron. 4:17). The parallel text in 1 Kings 7:46 reads Zerethan.

ZEREDATHAH (Zē rə dā' thah) (KJV, 2 Chron. 4:17) See Zeredah

ZERERAH (Zē' rə rah) or ZERERATH (Zē' rə rāth) (KJV) Site on the route by which the defeated Midianites fled from Gideon (Judg. 7:22; KJV, Zererath); possibly a variant rendering of Zarethan (Josh. 3:16; 1 Kings 4:12; 7:46) or Zeredah (2 Chron. 4:17). See Zarethan.

ZERESH (Zē' rēsh) Personal name meaning “shaggy head, disheveled.” Haman's wife and counselor (Esther 5:10,14; 6:13).

ZERETH (Zē' rēth) Personal name, perhaps meaning “splendor.” Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:7).

ZERETH-SHAHAR (Zē rēth-shā' hār) Placename meaning “splendor of the dawn.” The city located “on the hill of the [Dead Sea] valley” was allotted to Reuben (Josh. 13:19). The site is perhaps modern Zarat near Machaerus on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. Others suggest Khirbet el-Libb, seven miles south of Medeba, or Khirbet Qurn el-Kibsh, six miles northwest of Medeba.

ZERI (Zē' rī) Personal name meaning “balsam.” Levitical harpist (1 Chron. 25:3). Zeri is possibly a copying variant of Izri (25:11).

ZEROR (Zē' rōr) Personal name meaning “bundle, pouch” or “particle of stone.” Ancestor of Saul (1 Sam. 9:1).

ZERUAH (Zē rū' ah) Personal name meaning “stricken” or “leprous.” Mother of King Jeroboam (1 Kings 11:26).

ZERUBBABEL (Zĕ rūb' bā bēl) Personal name meaning “descendant of Babel.” The grandson of King Jehoiachin (taken to Babylon in the first exile in 597 B.C. by Nebuchadnezzar; 2 Kings 24:10-17) and the son of Shealtiel (Ezra 3:2), second son of Jehoiachin (1 Chron. 3:17-19). He is named in Ezra 2:2 among the leaders of those who returned from exile. The list in Ezra 2:1-67 (cp. Neh. 7:6-73a) probably names people who returned in 539, the first year of the reign of Cyrus the Great, ruler of the Persian Empire (Ezra 1:1), or between 539 and 529, despite the contention of many American scholars that the list belongs to an unmentioned second return led by Zerubbabel in 521/520.

According to Ezra 3, Zerubbabel and Jeshua (or Joshua, the high priest) rebuilt the altar and in their second year (538?) laid the foundation of the temple, but their work was halted by opposition from persons who had remained in Palestine during the exile (4:1-6,24). Darius (Persian emperor, 522-486 B.C.) granted the Jews permission to continue rebuilding the temple (6:1-12). Under the urging of Haggai (1:1,12-15; 2:1,20) and Zechariah (4:6-10a), Zerubbabel, now governor (Hag. 1:1) in place of Sheshbazzar (Ezra 5:14), resumed the task (Ezra 5:1-2), completed in 515 B.C.

Zerubbabel himself, however, disappeared from view. He was a Davidic prince, so it is possible that the Jews tried to crown him king during the civil war surrounding the rise of Darius as emperor (522/521). Zechariah 6:9-14 may reflect the wish to crown Zerubbabel, but his fate remains unknown. See Babylon; Israel, Land of; Zechariah, Book of. Paul L. Redditt

ZERUIAH (Zĕ rū' i' ah) Personal name meaning “perfumed with mastix” or “bleed.” Mother of three of David's generals: Joab, Abishai, and Asahel (2 Sam. 2:18). According to 1 Chron. 2:16, Zeruiah was David's (half-) sister. According to 2 Sam. 17:25, her sister, Abigail, was the (grand) daughter of Nahash rather than of Jesse, David's father. Kinship with David accounts for the positions of trust enjoyed by Zeruiah's sons.

ZETHAM (Zē' thām) Personal name meaning “olive tree.” Levite who served as a temple treasurer (1 Chron. 23:8; 26:22).

ZETHAN (Zē' thān) Personal name meaning “olive tree” or “olive merchant.” Member of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:10).

ZETHAR (Zē' thār) Personal name, perhaps meaning “slayer,” “kingdom,” or “victor.” One of seven eunuchs who served King Ahasuerus of Persia (Esther 1:10).

ZEUS (Zūs) Greek god of the sky and chief of the pantheon; ruler over all the gods. His devotees believed all the elements of weather were under his control. The worship of Zeus was very prevalent throughout the Roman Empire during the first century. Barnabas was mistaken for Zeus (equivalent of the Roman god, Jupiter) by the people of Lystra after Paul healed a cripple (Acts 14:8-12). See Gods, Pagan; Greece.

ZIA (Zi' ā) Personal name meaning “trembling.” Head of a family of the tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:13).

ZIBA (Zi' bā) Personal name, perhaps Aramaic for “branch.” Servant of Saul. When David desired to show kindness to surviving members of Jonathan's family, Ziba directed David to Mephibosheth (2 Sam. 9:1-8). David placed Ziba in charge of Mephibosheth's restored property (9:9-13). During Absalom's rebellion, Ziba assisted David with supplies and (falsely) accused Mephibosheth of treason (2 Sam. 16:1-4). David rewarded Ziba with Mephibosheth's property. Mephibosheth met David on his return to power in Jerusalem and accused Ziba of deception (2 Sam. 19:24-29). David, either uncertain whom to believe or else desiring to leave no strong rivals, divided Saul's property between Ziba and Mephibosheth.

ZIBEON (Zi' bē on) Personal name meaning “little hyena.” Horite chieftain (Gen. 36:29) and ancestor of one of Esau's wives (Gen. 36:2). Zibeon established kinship between the Horites and Edomites (Gen. 36:20,24,29; 1 Chron. 1:38,40).

ZIBIA (Zib' ı á) Personal name meaning “gazelle.” Head of a family of Benjaminites (1 Chron. 8:9).

ZIBIAH (Zib' ı ah) Personal name meaning “female gazelle.” Mother of King Jehoash (Joash) of Judah (2 Kings 12:1; 2 Chron. 24:1).

ZICHRI (Zik' nı) or ZICRI (NIV) Personal name meaning “remembrance, mindful.” 1. Levite in Moses' time (Exod. 6:21). 2. Heads of three families of Benjaminites (1 Chron. 8:19,23,27). 3. Levite (1 Chron. 9:15), perhaps identical to Zaccur (1 Chron. 25:2,10; Neh. 12:35) and Zabdi (Neh. 11:17). 4. Descendant of Moses assisting with David's treasury (1 Chron. 26:25); 5. Reubenite (1 Chron. 27:16). 6. Father of one of Jehoshaphat's army commanders (2 Chron. 17:16). 7. Father of one of Jehoiada's generals (2 Chron. 23:1). 8. Ephraimite warrior assisting Pekah in the elimination of Ahaz's family and advisors (2 Chron. 28:7). 9. Father of the leading Benjaminite in postexilic Jerusalem (Neh. 11:9). 10. Postexilic priest (Neh. 12:17).

ZIDDIM (Zid' dım) Place-name meaning “sides.” Fortified town in Naphtali (Josh. 19:35), perhaps identical with Hattin el-Qadim about eight miles west-northwest of Tiberias. Some commentators see it as copyist's repetition of “fenced cities.” See Zer.

ZIDKIJAH (Zid ki' jah) (KJV, Neh. 10:1) See Zedekiah.

ZIDON, ZIDONIANS (Zi' don, Zi dō' nı áns) KJV alternate forms of Sidon and Sidonians.

ZIF (Zıf) (KJV) See Ziv.

ZIGGURAT (Zig' gũ räť) Stepped building, usually capped by a temple. The architecture was made popular by the Babylonians. The design consisted of placing smaller levels of brick on top of larger layers. Those so far excavated reveal advanced building techniques used by ancient civilizations. Most biblical scholars believe the tower of Babel was a ziggurat (Gen. 11:3-9).

ZIHA (Zi' há) Egyptian personal name meaning “the face of Horus (god) has spoken.” 1. Family of temple servants (nethinim) (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46). 2. Overseer of postexilic temple servants (Neh. 11:21).

ZIKLAG (Zik' lág) Village in the southern Judean plain; variously identified either as Tell el-Khuweilifeh, 10 miles north-northeast of Beersheba, Tell esh-Shariah, nine miles north-northwest of Beersheba, or Khirbet el-Mashash. City in tribal inheritance of Judah given to Simeon (Josh. 15:31; 19:5).

Ziklag appears to have belonged to the Philistines and was taken by Israel during the time of Israel's judges (1 Sam. 27:6). The town was given to David by Achish, king of Gath, during David's “outlaw” period. The gift may have been a means of shortening Philistia's over-extended borders. Ziklag appears never to have been a part of Philistia proper.

David made the town his headquarters as he gathered his private army and made raids against the Amalekites. On returning to his base following Philistia's refusal to allow him to fight with them against Saul, David found the town had been raided and burned by the Amalekites and his family taken hostage. A daring night raid on the base of the enemy resulted in the rescue of his people and their return to Ziklag (1 Sam. 30). Jews returning from Babylonian exile inhabited Ziklag (Neh. 11:28).

ZILLAH (Zil' lah) Personal name meaning “shadow.” Second wife of Lamech and mother of Tubal-Cain and Naamah (Gen. 4:19,22-23).

A ziggurat dating to the Babylonian period (605-550 B.C.).

The ziggurat, or temple tower, located at Ur in ancient Mesopotamia (modern Iraq).

ZILLETHAI (Zil' la thi) Personal name; an abbreviated form of "Yahweh is a shadow," that is, a protector. 1. Family of Benjaminites (1 Chron. 8:20). 2.

Manassite supporter of David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:20).

ZILPAH (Zil' pah) Personal name, perhaps meaning "short-nosed." Leah's maid (Gen. 29:24; 46:18), given to Jacob as a concubine (30:9; 37:2); mother of Gad and Asher who were regarded as Leah's sons (30:10,12; 35:26).

ZILTHAI (Zil' thi) (KJV) See Zillethai.

ZIMMAH (Zim' mah), ZIMNAH (OTm nah)

(TEV) Personal name; perhaps an abbreviation of "Yahweh has considered or resolved." A Levite (1 Chron. 6:20,42; 2 Chron. 29:12).

ZIMRAN (Zim' rān) Personal name meaning "celebrated in song, famous" or "mountain goat." Son of Abraham and Keturah and ancestor of an Arabian tribe (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32), possibly identified with Zabram, located somewhere west of Mecca on the Red Sea, and with Zimri (Jer. 25:25).

ZIMRI (Zim' ri) Short form of personal name meaning "Yah helped," "Yah is my protection," or "Yah is my praise." 1. Son of Zerah and grandson of Judah (1 Chron. 2:6). 2. Chariot captain in Israel who usurped the throne by killing Elah (1 Kings 16:9-10). His reign was the shortest of all the kings of Israel, seven days (16:15). Zimri committed suicide by burning his palace around him after Omri besieged Tirzah. His name became a byword for king killers (2 Kings 9:31). 3. Leader of tribe of Simeon slain by Phinehas for bringing Midianite woman into the wilderness camp (Num. 25). 4. Descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:36). 5. A difficult name of a nation God judged (Jer. 25:25), often taken as a copying change from the Hebrew for Cimmerians or a coded designation for Elam clarified by the immediate mention of Elam. Nothing is known of a nation of Zimri.

ZIN, WILDERNESS OF (Zin) Rocky desert area through which Israel passed en route from Egypt to Canaan (Num. 20:1; 27:14; 33:36). The Wilderness of Zin, stretching from Kadeshbarnea to the Dead Sea, formed part of the southern border of Canaan and later Judah (Num. 34:3-4; Josh. 15:1,3). "From the Wilderness of Zin to Rehob" in Galilee encompasses almost the whole promised land (Num. 13:21). The Wilderness of Zin should be distinguished from the Wilderness of Sin, which embraces the western Sinai plateau. See Negeb or Negev; Palestine; Sin, Wilderness of; Wilderness.

ZINA (Zi' nâ) (KJV, 1 Chron. 23:10) See Ziza.

ZION (Zi' on) Transliteration of the Hebrew and Greek words that originally referred to the fortified hill of pre-Israelite Jerusalem between the Kidron and Tyropean Valleys. Scholars disagree as to the root meaning of the term. Some authorities have suggested that the word was related to the Hebrew word that meant “dry place” or “parched ground.” Others relate the word to an Arabic term that is interpreted as “hillcrest” or “mountainous ridge.”

The name “Zion” was mentioned first in the account of David's conquest of Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:6-10; 1 Chron. 11:4-9). The phrase “stronghold of Zion” may have referred to only the fortified section of the city. Jerusalem was the name of the city-state as a whole and included numerous villages and houses located outside of the fortified area of the city itself. After David captured Zion, he resided there and changed its name to the “city of David.”

Zion was used by biblical writers in a variety of ways. Many of the psalmists used the term to refer to the temple built by Solomon (2:6; 48:2; 84:7; 132:13). In Isa. 1:27 the idea of “Zion” included the whole nation. Zion also stood for the capital of Judah (Amos 6:1). The most common usage of Zion was to refer to the city of God in the new age (Isa. 1:27; 28:16; 33:5).

Zion was understood, also, to refer to the heavenly Jerusalem (Isa. 60:14; Heb. 12:22; Rev. 14:1), the place where the Messiah would appear at the end of time. The glorification of the messianic community will take place on the holy mountain of “Zion.” See Jerusalem.

ZIOR (Zi'ôr) Place-name meaning “smallness.” Village allotted to Judah, located in the hill country near Hebron (Josh. 15:54). Archaeological research indicates that the frequently suggested site Si'ir about five miles north-northeast of Hebron was uninhabited before A.D. 400.

ZIPH (Ziph) Personal name and place-name, perhaps meaning “flowing.” 1. Son of Mareshah and grandson of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:42). The text perhaps means Mareshah was the founder of Ziph near Hebron. 2. Family of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16). 3. Town in the Judean hill country (Josh. 15:24), likely Tell Zif about three miles southeast of Hebron. Mereshah likely founded the town (1 Chron. 2:42). David hid from Saul in the surrounding wilderness (1 Sam. 23:14-15; 26:2). Ziphites, residents of Ziph, twice revealed David's hideouts to Saul (1 Sam. 23:19; 26:1). Rehoboam fortified the site (2 Chron. 11:8). 4. Town in the Negev (Josh. 15:24), likely Khirbet ez-Zeifeh, southwest of Kurnub.

ZIPHAH (Zi' phah) Clan name, perhaps meaning “flowing.” Family of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16).

ZIPHIMS (Ziph' ims) KJV alternate form of Ziphites (superscription of Ps. 54). See Ziph.

ZIPHION (Ziph' Y' ðn) See Zephon.

ZIPHITES (Ziph' its) See Ziph.

ZIPHRON (Ziph' rôn) Place-name, perhaps meaning “fragrance.” Site on the northern border of Canaan, near Hazar-enan (Num. 34:9). It may be modern Zapherani, southeast of Restan between Hamath and Horns.

ZIPPOR (Zip' pôr) Personal name meaning “(little) bird.” Father of King Balak of Moab (Num. 22:2,4,10).

ZIPPORAH (Zip pô' rah) Personal name meaning “small bird” or “sparrow.” Moses' first wife (some believe the woman named in Num. 12:1 may be a reference to Zipporah, too) and mother of his children, Gershom and Eliezer (Exod. 2:21-22; 18:4). She was one of the daughters of Reuel, a priest of Midian. She saved Moses' life when the Lord sought to kill him by circumcising Gershom (4:24-25). It appears that Zipporah stayed with her father until Moses had led the people out of Egypt (18:2-6).

ZITHER (Zith' ēr) Stringed instrument composed of 30 to 40 strings placed over a shallow soundboard and played with a pick and fingers (Dan. 3:5,7,10,15 NASB margin). See Music, Instruments, Dancing.

ZITHRI (Zith' rī) (KJV) See Sithri.

ZIV (Ziv) Second month of calendar (1 Kings 6:1). See Calendar.

ZIZ (Ziz) Place-name meaning “blossom.” Site involved in Judah's battle plans with Ammon and Moab (2 Chron. 20:16). A pass through a steep place where the people of Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir were going to enter Judah to attack King Jehoshaphat. It is often located at Wadi Hasasa, southeast of Tekoa near the Dead Sea. The Lord won this battle for His people without their fighting (vv. 22-30), causing surrounding nations to fear God.

ZIZA (Zi' zā) or ZIZAH Personal name meaning “shining” or “brightness.” 1. Son of Shiphi who was a part of the expansion of the tribe of Simeon into Gedor (1 Chron. 4:37). 2. Son of Shimei, a Levite from Gershon, following some manuscript and early translation evidence (1 Chron. 23:10). “Zina” is the reading of KJV, NASB, REB following Hebrew text. 3. One of Rehoboam's sons by Maachah (2 Chron. 11:20).

ZOAN (Zo ān) Hebrew name for Egyptian city of Tanis located at San el-Hagar on the Tanitic arm of the Nile. Zoan became capital of Egypt about 1070 B.C. under Smendes I and remained so until 655 B.C. Numbers 13:22 notes that Hebron was seven years older than Zoan, but the exact date when either was built is not known. The prophets used Zoan to refer to the Egyptian government and its activities (Isa. 19:11,13; 30:4; Ezek. 30:14). The psalmist praised God for exodus miracles near there (Ps. 78:12,43).

ZOAR (Zō' ār) Place-name meaning “small.” One of the cities in the Valley of Siddim, also known as Bela (Gen. 14:2). It was attacked by Chedolaomer but apparently delivered by Abraham (14:17). Lot fled to Zoar with his family just before God destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah (19:23-24). He was afraid to remain there with his two daughters, so he went up to a mountain above the city (19:30). Isaiah prophesied that the citizens of Moab would flee to Zoar when destruction would come upon their nation (Isa. 15:5; cp. Jer. 48:34). It was apparently a Moabite city, perhaps Safi on the Zered River.

ZOBA(H) (Zō' bah) City-state name, perhaps meaning “battle.” First Saul (1 Sam. 14:47), then David (2 Sam. 8:3) fought the kings of Zobah (cp. title of Ps. 60). Zobah seems to be roughly where Syria later became a nation, northeast of Damascus. It was the leading Syrian power before the rise of Damascus. At one time the Ammonites hired mercenaries from Zoba (2 Sam. 10:6) to help them fight David. The Ammonites came from the South while the Zobaites came from the North, causing David to fight on two fronts. David won, and the people of Zobah served him (vv. 13-19). See David; Syria.

ZOBEBAH (Zō bē' bah) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8; NIV “Hazzobebah”).

ZOHAR (Zō' hār) Personal name, perhaps meaning “witness.” 1. Hittite (Gen. 23:8; 25:9). 2. Son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15), also called Zerah (Num. 26:13; 1 Chron. 4:24). 3. Descendant of Judah according to the traditional marginal correction (Qere) at 1 Chron. 4:7. The Hebrew text reads Izhar.

ZOHELETH (Zō' hā lēth) Place-name meaning “creeping one,” “sliding,” or “serpent stone.” Stone of sacrifice where Adonijah offered sacrifices in light of his coming coronation as king (1 Kings 1:9). This place was near En-rogel, a spring or well near Jerusalem where the Kidron Valley and the Valley of Hinnom meet. Adonijah's bid for the throne was short lived. David named Solomon to follow him on the throne (vv. 29-30).

ZOHETH (Zō' hēth) Personal name of uncertain meaning. Son of Ishi (1 Chron. 4:20) and the head of one of the families in Judah.

ZOPHAH (Zó' phah) Personal name, perhaps meaning “jug.” Family in the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35-36).

ZOPHAI (Zó' phi) Personal name, perhaps meaning “honeycomb.” Son of Elkanah (1 Chron. 6:26). See Zuph.

ZOPHAR (Zó' phār) Personal name of uncertain meaning. One of Job's three friends who came to sit with him in his misery (2:11). Zophar probably was the youngest of the three since he is mentioned last. He was the sharpest critic of the three men and was more philosophical in his criticism of Job. His words were more coarse and his dogmatism more emphatic. Although there was a place called Naamah in Judah (Josh. 15:41), doubt remains that it was Zophar's home. The exact location is unknown.

ZOPHIM (Zó' phīm) Place-name meaning “watchers” or common noun meaning “the Field of the Watchers” (REB) or lookout post. It was a high place at “the top of Pisgah,” near the northeastern end of the Dead Sea. Balak took Balaam there to curse the Israelites (Num. 23:14).

ZORAH (Zó' rah) Place-name meaning “wasps” or “hornets.” City of Dan (Josh. 19:41) about 13 miles west of Jerusalem on the border with Judah (Josh. 15:33; KJV, “Zoreah”). It was the home of Manoah, Samson's father (Judg. 13:2). Rehoboam, king of Judah, strengthened Zorah in case of war (2 Chron. 11:5-12). It is modern Sarah.

ZORATHITES (Zó' rä thits) Descendants of Shobal who lived in Zorah (1 Chron. 2:52-53). See Zorah.

ZOREAH (Zó' rē ah) (KJV) See Zorah.

ZOPJTES (Zó' rits) People from Zorah (1 Chron. 2:54). See Zorah.

ZOROASTER (Zó rō äs' túr) Ancient Iranian prophet after whom a religion called Zoroastrianism was named. See Persia.

ZOROBABEL (Zó rōb' á bəl) (KJV, Matt. 1:12-13; Luke 3:27) See Zerubbabel.

ZUAR (Zu' ar) Personal name meaning “young” or “small.” Member of the tribe of Issachar (Num. 1:8; 2:5; 7:18,23; 10:15).

ZUPH (Zūph) Personal name and place-name meaning “honeycomb.” 1. Levitic ancestor of Elkanah and Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1; 1 Chron. 6:16,26,35) from Ephraim. 2. “Land of Zuph” where Saul was looking for some donkeys (1 Sam. 9:5). Its exact location is not known.

ZUPHITE (Zu' phit) NIV term for a resident or descendant of Zuph (1 Sam. 1:1).

ZUR (Zūr) Personal name meaning “rock.” 1. Midianite tribal chief (Num. 25:15) whose daughter, Cozbi, was killed along with an Israelite man by Phinehas. Zur was later killed in a battle Moses led (Num. 31:7-8). 2. King Saul's uncle (1 Chron. 8:30; 9:36).

ZURIEL (Zu' rī ēl) Personal name that may mean “God is a rock.” Son of Abihail and head of the Merari family of Levites (Num. 3:35).

ZURISHADDAI (Zu rī shād' ī) Personal name meaning “shaddai is a rock.” The father of Shelumiel, a leader of the tribe of Simeon, in the wilderness wanderings (Num. 1:6).

ZUZIM (Zu' zīm) or ZUZITE (Zu' zit) (NIV) National name of uncertain meaning. People who lived in Ham and were defeated by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:5). They are apparently called the Zamzummin in Deut. 2:20.
